lian (1), made this Distinction between the Chariot of the Sun and that of the Moon; the Former being always drawn by four Horses, and the Latter only by two. The other Monument is taken from the Cabinet of Messieurs de Charlet. The Field exhibits Flames, the broken Chariot, whereof you see but one Wheel, Phaeton dead, and the Horses in great Disorder. You see also by one of the Horses two Fowls, with Crests on their Heads, which are taken for two Swans, and it is thought that the Sculptor designed to represent at the same Time the Metamorphosis of Cygnus King of Liguria. However, to speak the Truth, the two Fowls have no Resemblance to Swans. The Artist has too well designed the Rest of the Piece, to believe he would blunder so grossly in the Representation of Swans. They are of those Sorts of enigmatical Figures that occur but too often in Antiquity, and which it is needless to attempt to find out. In the third Monument, which is taken from Beger, Phaeton is mounted upon a Chariot, and the Horses in Disorder, threaten an approaching Fall. One Singularity in this Monument is, that the Heliades, Phaeton's Sisters appear there upon the Bank of a River, in the Moment that they begin to be transformed into Poplars. The Swan that is by, shews that the Sculptor designed to draw together all the Circumstances of this Fable. But I should have observed that Apollonius Rhodius (2) relates one Particularity more on this Subject, which is not to be met with in the other Poets; namely, that the Water of the Po was so infected by the Conflagration, and by the Thunder which Jupiter hurled against Phaeton, that the Birds which flew over this River, unable to bear the Stench of it, dropt down dead.

C c 3

As

(1) Book of Spect. c. 9.

(2) Book of the Argonauts.

As to the Metamorphosis of Phaeton's three Sisters, Phæbe, Lampetia, and Ægle, we may say these Princesses actually died for Grief upon the Po, whither they had come to bewail the Disaster of their Brother ; and that their Metamorphosis is only a poetical Ornament, as also what is said of their Tears that were changed into Amber, because there distils from the Poplar a sort of Gum that pretty much resembles yellow Amber. The same way we may conceive of the Transformation of Cygnus, King of Liguria, his Brother, whom Similitude of Names had transformed into a Swan.

The Ancients are not agreed as to the Nature of the Transformation of the Heliades ; tho' the most common Opinion is that they were transform'd into Poplars : Virgil (a), in one of his Eclogues, makes Silenus say they were turned to Alder-trees ; but yet in the tenth Book of the Eneid he returns to the common Opinion, telling us that Cygnus pass'd his Days in deploring the Loss of his dear Phaeton, under the Shade of the Poplars, into which the Sisters of that unfortunate Prince had been transformed (b). There was yet a third Opinion as to this Subject, that they were transformed into the Larch, a Tree resembling the Pine, and whose Gum is a sort of Turpentine. The Accoleian Family, originally from the Confines of the Po, according to Fulvius Ursinus, got the Surname of Larifcola upon that Account ; and in the Medal of that Family now extant, which is also referred to in Vaillant, you see on one Side the Head of a Woman, which Authors take to be that of Clymene, Phaeton's Mother, with this Inscription, P. Accoleius Larifcola ; and on the Reverse, three Women transformed into the Larch Tree, who are the three Sisters of Phaeton. Vitruvius and

(a) Tum Phætoniadas musco circumdat amaræ
Corticis, atque solo proceras erigit alnos.

Virg. Ec. 6. 63.

(b) Populeas inter frondes umbramque fororum
Dum canit, &c. Idem Æneid. L. 1.

(1) and Pliny (2) tell us, that the Larch Tree is only to be found about the Po; that it sheds a Gum, and that it does not burn; that is to say, it has Difficulty to burn, because of the humid Juices with which it is impregnated, and not, as Palladius relates (3) upon the Credit of some Ancient, from the Antipathy it has to the Fire which had consumed its Brother.

Might I be allow'd to offer a Conjecture about this Fable, I would say it comes from the Northern Countries, and that the River Reidanus, which, having run thro' Prussia, disembogues itself into the Baltick Sea, had given rise to most of the Circumstances that enter into it. Accordingly, there is upon the Banks of that River a great Quantity of Poplars, and Swans that come thither in the Spring to deliver their young. The Place where it disembogues itself into the Sea, is known by the yellow Amber that is found there, which brings in a great Revenue to the Prince who governs that State, and is only to be found in that Country, but not at all upon the Po. 'Tis no wonder that what Tradition delivered concerning that River should have made the Po be named Eridanus; the two Names resembling one another too much, not to incline us to be of this Opinion.

The Islands Electrides, which Apollonius Rhodius, in his Expedition of the Argonauts, places in the Adriatick Sea towards the Mouth of the Po, are a mere Fiction; Amber is neither to be found upon this River, nor in those pretended Islands, in which I only follow the Opinion of Pliny (a). What Lucian relates (4) serves also not a little to confirm my Conjecture. He tells us that having travelled along the Po, in order to enquire there for Amber, Poplars,

C c 4

(1) L. 2. c. 9.

(2) L. 16. c. 10.

(3) L. 12. c. 13.

(a) Juxta eas, Electrides vocavere, in quibus proveniret succinum quod illi electrum appellant, vanitatis Græcæ certissimum documentum; adeo ut quas earum designent haud unquam constiterit. Plin. L. 3.

(4) De Cygnis.

lars, and Swans, the Inhabitants of the Country answered him, that there were upon that River neither Swans nor Poplars, nor Amber ; and he adds that when he was going to set forth to some Watermen the Fable of Phaeton and his Sisters, they laugh'd at him, assuring him that they had never heard of it.

To illustrate now what we have said of Cygnus, 'tis proper to be informed that ancient History makes mention of six Persons of this Name. The first was the Son of Mars : Hercules mounted upon the Horse Arion vanquish'd him, with which that God was so incensed, that he would needs enter the Lists himself with the Conqueror of his Son ; but Jupiter parted them with a Peal of Thunder.

The second was the Son of Neptune, and was invulnerable ; this was he whom Achilles stifled near Troy.

The third was the Son of Hieres, and was transformed into the Fowl of that Name (1).

The fourth was Phaeton's Cousin, who deploring his Death was also transformed into a Swan (2).

The sixth is known to us only from his Adventure related by Pausanias. The sixth, in fine, is mentioned by Canon in Photius (3).

C H A P. XV.

The History of Apollo.

I HAVE said, in the Beginning of the preceding Chapter, that the Ancients made two distinct Divinities of the Sun and Apollo ; and yet when the latter was made the Symbol of the Sun among the Greeks and Romans, the Distinction gradually vanish'd away, and at length he came to be considered only as the Sun himself. It now remains that I set forth what the Mythology of these two Nations teach us concerning him. Cicero distinguishes four Apollo's ;

(1) Ovid. Met. L. 2. (2) Virg. En. L. 10. (3) Narr. 32.

Apollo's ; the first, the Son of Vulcan, was the tutelar Deity of the Athenians ; the second was the Son of Corybas, and Native of Crete, who is said to have waged War with Jupiter himself for that Island ; the third, who pass'd from the Country of the Hyperboreans to Delphos, was the Son of the third Jupiter and Latona ; the fourth was of Arcadia, and went by the Name of Nomion, because he had given Laws to the Arcadians.

It would seem that Cicero had taken these four Apollo's for real Personages, since he gives their Genealogies : However, Vossius (1) reckons this God only a metaphorical Personage, and maintains that there never was another Apollo but the Sun : Here are the Reasons he relies upon ; if, says he, Apollo has been accounted the Son of Jupiter, 'tis because that God was always reckoned by the Ancients the Author of the World. His Mother was said to be called Latona, a Name which signifies hid, because before the Sun was created, all Things were wrap'd up in the Obscurity of Chaos. They add, that he was born at Delos, a Name which signifies Manifestation, because the Beams of this Luminary enlighten all the Earth. He is represented always beardless and youthful, because the Sun never grows old, nor decays. What else can his Bow and Arrows signify but his piercing Beams ? He was the God of Medicine, because the Sun makes the Plants to grow whereof Medicaments are composed. In fine, says he, let us run over all the Ceremonies of Worship that were paid to him, we shall see that they had a plain relation to the Luminary which he represented : Whence he concludes, that we are to seek for no other Apollo but the Sun, the Divinity adored over all the World.

I agree with this learned Author, that the Ancients frequently took Apollo for the Sun, as has been said in the preceding Chapter ; and that most of the Things

(1) De Orig: & Progr. Idol.

Things they said of him are applicable to that Luminary ; but this does not prove but there was some illustrious Personage named Apollo, who after his Apotheosis was taken for the Sun ; as it happened in Egypt, that Osiris and Orus, whose Existence cannot be called in question, were after their Death confounded with the Sun, whose Symbols they became ; whether it was believed their Souls had gone to reside in that Luminary, or for some other Reason which we know not.

Lactantius (1), who was thoroughly acquainted with the Antiquities of Greece, proves to the Pagans that their Apollo had only been a Man whose Parents were named, and whose Vices, notwithstanding his many good Qualities, were but too well known.

Of the four Apollo's mentioned by Cicero, it appears that the three last were Greeks, and the first an Egyptian, whom Herodotus makes to have been the Son of Osiris and Isis, and who was called Orus. Latona, according to that Author, with whom Isis had entrusted him, was his Nurse ; and, in order to save him from the Persecutions of Typhon, she hid him in the Island of Chemnis, which is in a Lake near Butbos, where Latona dwelt. Pausanias is of the same Mind with Herodotus, and ranks Apollo, like him, in the Number of the Egyptian Divinities. “ The Senator Antoninus, says he, built at Epi- “ daurus a Temple to Esculapius and Apollo, two “ Egyptians.” The Testimony of Diodorus Siculus is yet more express, since in speaking of Isis, after having told us that she had invented the Practice of Medicine, he adds, she taught the same to her Son Orus, who was named Apollo, and was the last of the Gods who reigned in Egypt.

Marßam (2), who has ranged the Dynasties of Egypt in a manner peculiar to himself, sets Orus at the Head of the Demi-Gods, and gives him a Reign
of

(1) Div. Inf. c. 8 & 10.

(2) Can. Chron. p. 31. of the Quarto Edition.

of twenty-five Years. This Author distinguishes him not only from the Sun, whom he, conformably to the Opinion of Cicero, makes to have been the second in the first Dynasty, at the Head of which was Vulcan; but also from another Apollo, who was but the eighth King of the second Dynasty. Thus, according to that learned Author, the Sun, Orus, and Apollo, were three Princes which we must carefully distinguish, having reigned at Periods of Time very remote from one another.

The result of all these Disquisitions is, that the true Apollo was of Egypt, and that however the Greeks gave that Name to some one of their own Nation, yet they formed his History upon that of the Egyptian Prince. Accordingly, is it not evident that what they say of their Island of Delos, the Birth-place of Apollo, is taken from what the Egyptians, according to Herodotus, related of Chemnis, where Latona had hid Orus? If they gave out that Delos was a floating Island, and never fix'd but at the Birth of Apollo and Diana, did not the Egyptians say the same thing of their Chemnis? Herodotus, to whom this Relation was given, when he was in Egypt, says he look'd upon that Island with all possible Attention, and that he saw nothing like that floating Quality about it. The Greeks added, that it was Neptune with a Blow of his Trident had made the Island of Delos to rise up from the Bottom of the Sea, to secure to Latona, persecuted by Juno, a Place where she might bring forth her Children: Who sees not that this is an exact Copy of what the Egyptians fabled of Typhon's Persecutions of Isis, who, to save her Son from the Cruelty of her Brother-in-Law, committed the Care of his Education to Latona, who hid him in the Island of Chemnis? As for the Interposition of Neptune, this is a Fiction grounded upon the Custom of ascribing to that God whatever happened in the Sea, and particularly all Earth-quakes; and as the Word Delos imports Manifestation, tion, that Island, either for being before unknown, supposing it to have existed, or because it rose up from the Sea by the Effect of some Earthquake, as we have seen in our own Days the new Santorine formed, was therefore called Delos. If the Greeks have made their Apollo to be the Son of Jupiter, it was because the Egyptian had Osiris to his Father, whom the Greeks confounded with their Jupiter. If the Greek Apollo was reckoned the God of Eloquence, Musick, Medicine, and Poetry, the Reason is that Osiris, who was the Symbol of the Sun among the Egyptians, as well as his Son Orus, had there taught these fine Arts. If the Greek Apollo was the God and Conductor of the Muses, 'tis because Osiris, as we have said from Diodorus Siculus, carried with him in his Expedition to the Indies singing Women and Musicians. The Greek Apollo was reckoned a God of Oracles, because Osiris had one in Egypt, as well as Latona, as we learn from Herodotus. If the Greeks asserted that one of their Apollo's came from the Hyperboreans, it is because that God was peculiarly worship'd there from the Time that Sesostris carried his Arms into that Country, and the Greeks had some Communication of Religion with those People, as we have said elsewhere (1). What accounts for the Greek Apollo's being often confounded with the Sun, is that Osiris and Orus were his Symbols in Egypt. In fine, if Apollo was given out to have been at Delos, the Reason is, that in that Island his Worship was the most solemn ; and, as Herodotus tells us, the Birth of a God in any Country denotes the Introduction of his Worship into it. This Parallel might be carried farther, but I have said enough to prove that the true Apollo was that of Egypt.

I don't deny however, that the Greeks might give this Name to some Prince of their own Country ; and tho' I am forced to own myself perfectly at a Loss to know who he was, 'tis requisite however, that I unfold his Mythology, and explain the Fables that have been publish'd about him.

a

(1) V. 1.

Jupiter, they tell us, being in love with Latona, Juno conceived such Jealousy of him, that she persecuted her Rival with unparalleled Fury. She made the Earth produce a Monster named Python, to be the Instrument of her Vengeance; and, as if the whole Universe had espoused Juno's Resentment, Latona found no Place where she could be delivered. Neptune, affected with the sad Fate of this unfortunate Mistress, with a Stroke of his Trident made the Island Delos spring up from the Bottom of the Sea; and Latona, whom Jupiter metamorphosed into a Quail, having retired thither, brought forth Apollo and Diana. This gave a Handle to say that this Island, floating before, was fixed upon that Occasion: But Virgil has follow'd another Tradition (1), when he says it was Apollo that fixed it afterwards, joining it to Mycone and Gyarus, two neighbouring Islands in the Number of the Cyclades as well as Delos.

Among the Gods of Paganism, there is none of whom the Poets have fabled so many Wonders as of Apollo; and, according to them, he excelled in all the fine Arts, such as Poetry, Musick and Eloquence; and by a Hyperbole common enough upon such Occasions, they fabled that he was the Inventor of them. He was the God and Protector of the Poets, Musicians, and Orators. The Muses, as shall be said in their History, were also under his Protection, and he presided over their Concerts. Add to this, that there were none of the Gods who excelled so much as he in the Art of Prediction; and accordingly he, of all others, had the greatest number of Oracles.

To so many Perfections was joined, Beauty, Grace, the Art of captivating the Ear and Heart no less
by

(1) En. L. 3.

by the Sweetness of his Eloquence, than by the harmonious Sounds of his Lyre, which equally charmed Gods and Men. But yet with all these good Qualities he had not always the Talent of pleasing the Ladies with whom he happened to be in Love; which drew upon the Pagans some Railleries from the Apologists for the Christian Religion. For in order to seduce Iffé the Daughter of Macareus; he was obliged to transform himself into a Shepherd (1), and in vain did he display all his Perfections to Daphne; she still was deaf to his Addresses. But not to amuse myself here with what is to be found in the Greek and Latin Poets, let us trace out the Origine of the Fables which they have delivered on this Occasion.

To explain that of Daphné transformed to a Laurel, while Apollo was in Pursuit of her, we may suppose that some Prince, among those who for his Love of the Belles Lettres had got the Name of Apollo, falling in Love with Daphné, the Daughter of Peneus King of Thessaly, and being one Day in Pursuit of her, that young Princess died upon the Banks of a River in Sight of her Lover. Some Laurels springing up in that Spot gave rise to her Metamorphosis; or rather the Etymology of Daphne's Name, which in Greek imports a Laurel, was the Foundation of the Fable. If we may credit Lylion-Gyraldi, Daphne was so called from Δαφνέω, voco, because the Laurel makes a crackling Noise as it burns, Crepitat; and as this Tree was consecrated to Apollo, hence, according to that Author, came the Fable of the Amours of Apollo and Daphne.

Pausanias (2) however explains this Adventure otherwise: He says Leucippus, the Son of Oenomaus King of Pisa, the same who gave his only Daughter Hippodamia in Marriage to Pelops, being in love with Daphne, disguised himself in the Form of a young Maid, to accompany her in the Chace, which which she loved exceedingly, and consecrated himself to Diana, according to the Custom of those Times. The Assiduity and officious Zeal he shewed for his Mistress, soon procured him her Love and Confidence; but Apollo his Rival, having discovered the Intrigue, as Daphne and her Companions were going to bathe themselves, they would oblige Leucippus to follow their Example, and he having excused himself upon various Pretexts, they would needs strip him, and upon his revealing himself, they slew him with their Arrows. Pausanias, as we see, intermixes something fabulous with this Event; but as 'tis certain that Oenomaus had a Son named Leucippus, who died in his Youth, much in the Way as he relates it; to rectify his Account we need say no more but that on some sultry hot Day, those Virgins having obliged the Youth to wash himself, they discovered his Disguise and punish'd him for his Insolence.

(1) Ovid Met. L. 4.

(2) In Arcad.

Diodorus Siculus asserts that Daphne is the same with the Fairy Manto the Daughter of Tiresias, who was exiled to Delphos, where she wrote many Oracles, which Homer has so happily used in his Poems. What was more needful to make her pass for the Daughter of Apollo? The Inhabitants of Antioch pretended that this Adventure had happened in the Suburbs of their City, which from that Time got the Name of Daphné. Saint John Chrysostom describes, from Libanius, a fine Statue of Apollo which was in those Suburbs. The God held a Lyre in one Hand, and a Patera in the other, with which he seemed to be offering Libations to the Earth who had swallowed up his Mistress.

That of Leucothoe, buried alive by her Father Orchamus, and that of Clytia her Rival metamorphosed into the Flower called the Heliotrope, contains nothing historical; at least I have discovered nothing satisfying on this Subject. I have laid it down for a Principle, and I think I have sufficiently ciently proved it (1), that Fables were commonly founded upon History, but I have all along acknowledged that they sometimes contained Morality and Physiology. Thus what may be said of this now in Question, is, that Leucothoe passed for the Daughter of Orchamus King of Persia, only because that Prince was the first who planted in his Kingdom the Tree which bears Incense, and which was called Leucothoe. They added that this pretended Princess was in Love with Apollo, because Incense is an aromatick Drug very much used in Medicine, whereof that God was the Inventor, and to this they added the Circumstance of Clytia's Jealousy, because the Heliotrope is a Plant which, according to Naturalists, kills the Tree that bears Incense. I must own however that Pliny, who describes several Properties of the Heliotrope, speaks nothing of this. I am sorry I have nothing more particular to say upon this Fable, for it appears to me very surprising, that in order to tell us Orchamus planted the Incense Tree, they should have so many far fetch'd Circumlocutions, as that he buried his Daughter alive, as a Punishment for having been sensible to the Addresses of the Sun her Lover; and that her Rival Clytia, for having revealed this Intrigue, had been metamorphosed into the Heliotrope. And yet, 'tis better to content ourselves with this Explication, than to risque Conjectures which it would be difficult to render any Ways probable. I have found nothing in Antiquity concerning this Orchamus, whom Ovid speaks of in his Metamorphoses, and whom he makes to have been the seventh Descendant from Belus, and to have reigned over the Persian Achemenidæ.

Apollo had also other amorous Intrigues laid to his Charge; amongst others, that which he had with Coronis, who bore a Son to him, Esculapius; but but of this we shall speak in the History of that God of Medicine.

(1) V. I. B. I.

Further, as Apollo was the God of fine Arts, those who cultivated them pass'd for his Sons, such as Esculapius, Orpheus, Linus and many others; or at least for his Favourites, as Hyacinthus and Cyparissus whose History I am going to relate.

Hyacinthus, according to Pausanias (1), was a young Prince of the City of Amyclæ in Laconia. His Father Oebalus, whom the Author now quoted calls Amycles, had taken so much Care of his Education, that he was looked upon as a Favourite of Apollo and the Muses. While he was one Day at play with his Fellows, he was unfortunately struck on the Head with the Blow of a Coit, whereof he died some Time after. Some Poem probably was composed upon this Adventure, wherein by Way of Consolation to his Parents it was said that Boreas, jealous of Apollo's Love to this young Prince, had given the fatal Direction to the Coit wherewith they were playing together; and the Fiction, it must be owned, was ingenious enough. The Lacedemonians celebrated every year a solemn Festival near the Tomb of this Prince, where they offered to him Sacrifices; they even instituted Games to his Honour, as we learn from Atheneus (2), who gives the Description of them.

Pausanias mentions this Prince's Tomb, whereon he says was represented the Figure of Apollo. His Metamorphosis into a Flower of the same Name, is only an Episode to the Romance. 'Tis not very well known what Flower the Hyacinth is: Dioscorides takes it to be the Vaccinium, or the wild Onion, which has a Flower of a purple Colour, and on which you see, tho' imperfectly, the two Letters which Ovid speaks of. Be that as it will, this Fable shews us what Idea the Pagan Religion had of its Gods, since they did not blush to ascribe to them the most scandalous Weaknesses. The Complaints of Apollo for the Death of Hyacinth have often been the Subject of the smartest Railleries upon that God, even among the Pagans themselves.

(1) In Lacon.

(2) L. 4.

Cyparissus, who, according to Ovid, was born in Carthea, a Town in the Island of Cos, was a young Man who had a great Talent for Poetry and polite Learning; which made him be accounted the Favourite of Apollo. His Metamorphosis into the Cypress-tree is founded upon Resemblance of Names, that Tree being called by the Greeks Cyparissos. They added to this Fable, that Apollo, to comfort himself for his Death, had ordered the Cypress for ever after to be the Symbol of Mourning; that it should accompany Funerals, and that no other Tree should be planted near Tombs; Circumstances founded upon the Nature of that Tree, whose Branches strip'd of Leaves, have a most mournful Aspect. There are others who pretend that Cyparissus was also beloved by Sylvanus, and that this is the Reason why that God is often seen with Branches of the Cypress in his Hand.

Tho' Apollo was not always successful in his Amours, he was so in all the Challenges that any had the Presumption to give him, and in these came always off victorious. Pan, who thought he excelled in the Art of playing upon the Flute, would needs compare that Instrument with the Lyre of Apollo. The Challenge was accepted; and the River Tmolus, chosen Arbiter, adjudged the Victory to Apollo. Midas witness to this Trial of Skill, rejected the Judgment of Tmolus, and Apollo, to shew his Stupidity, gave him Asses Ears. Midas took always great Care to hide under a Phrygian Bonnet this dishonourable Deformity; but his Barber who had discovered it, but durst not speak of it, imparted the Secret to the Earth, whence sprung Reeds that divulged it. These Fictions are founded upon History, consequently I must explain them.

Midas, according to Pausanias (1) was the Son of Gordius and Cybele, and reign'd in the greater Phrygia,

(1) In Atticis.

Phrygia, as we learn from Strabo. The Former of the two Authors now quoted, says he built the City of Ancyra, now Angoura, and that of Pessinus, upon Mount Agdistis, famed for the Tomb of Atys; and the second says only that he and Gordius his Father fixed their Residence near the River Sangar, in Cities, which in his Time were only sorry Villages. We know not the Time when Midas lived; but he was contemporary with Tmolus, as appears from Ovid: What I am to say of this Prince at the End of this Article, will serve to fix the Date of his Reign. As Midas was very rich and a very good Oeconomist, they fabled that he turned into Gold whatever he touched, and Bacchus who, according to the Fable, taught him how to get rid of a Quality so incommodious to him, was perhaps brought in only because he was the God of the Vine, and Midas honoured him with a particular Worship. We may further add that what had given Rise to this Fable, is, that he perhaps was the first who discovered Gold in the Pactolus. Strabo (1), speaking of the Places whence some Princes had got their Riches, says only that Midas had acquired his in the Mines of Mount Bermius.

From his Infancy it was foreseen that he would be extremely rich and very frugal, because the Ants approaching his Cradle, had put grains of Corn into his Mouth. As he was very dull and stupid, they invented the Fable of the Judgment he had given in Favour of Pan against Apollo. The Scholiast upon Aristophanes, to explain the Fiction of the Asses Ears wherewith Apollo had made Midas a Present, says it was designed to intimate that he had a very fine Ear like that Animal; or because he kept Spies thro' all his Dominions; or, in fine, because he commonly dwelt in a Place named ὠτρα ἑνς, the Asses Ears: Strabo tells us (2) that Midas swallowed bulls Blood whereof

D d 2

(1) L. 14. p. 680.

(2) L. 4. p. 61.

whereof he died: and Plutarch (1) adds that it was to get rid of the uneasy Dreams that molested him for a long Time; as we know the Time when the Cimmerians enter'd Phrygia, 'tis easy to fix the Date of Midas's Reign, since Strabo tells us that they came thither at the Time of his Death. As Ovid speaks of the Judgment of Imolus which Midas disapproved, 'tis proper that we speak of that Prince and his Genealogy.

Imolus King of Lydia, if we may credit Clytophon, was the Son of the God Mars and the Nymph Theogena, and according to Eustatbius, of Sipylus and Ep-tonia. One Day as that Prince was at hunting, he perceived one of Diana's Companions, who was named Arriphé. As she was a consummate Beauty, Imolus became enamoured of her. The Passions of the Great are almost always violent. The King, bent on gratifying his, eagerly pursued that young Nymph, who, that she might not fall into his Hands, thought to find a Sanctuary in the Temple of Diana: But how little Influence has the Fear of Heaven over the Hearts of Tyrants? Arriphé was violated at the Feet of the Altar; so cruel an Outrage plunged her into the deepest Anguish, and she would not survive the Misery that had befallen her. The Gods did not allow her Death to be unpunish'd: Imolus carry'd off by a Bull, fell upon Stakes, whose Points run into him and made him expire in the most exquisite Pains. Thus perish'd that Prince who was buried upon the Mountain that went afterwards by his Name.

The History of Marfyas. Marfyas (a), another Player upon the Flute, was yet more unfortunate than Midas, in the Challenge which he presumed to give Apollo, since this God fled him

(1) Treatise of Superstition.

(a) See the Notes of M. Burette upon the Treatise of Musick by Plutarch, whence I have taken almost this whole Article, Mem. de l'Academ. Tom. 10.

him alive. Here is the History of this Personage celebrated in Antiquity. He was of Celenæ a Town in Phrygia, and Son of Hyagnis, or, according to Hyginus (1), of Oeagrus (Oeagri); instead whereof the Commentator Munker willingly substituted the old genitive Hyagni. Humphrey Prideaux is of the same Mind, in his Notes upon the Chronicle of Paros (2); and they are both in the Right since Oeagrus was the Father, not of Marsyas, but of Orpheus. Some, says Plutarch, have alledged that the true Name of Marsyas was Masses. Diodorus tells us, that besides great Genius and Application he was possessed of a large Share of Wisdom, and Continnence, Proof against all Temptation. His Genius especially appeared in the Invention of the Flute, in which he had the Skill to unite the Sounds, which before were divided among the several Pipes of the Reed. He had a particular Attachment to Cybele the Daughter of Dindyma, and of a King of Phrygia and Lydia called Meon, and the Misfortunes that befel that Princess in Consequence of her Amours with Atys, could not oblige Marsyas to part from her. Banish'd her Father's House after the Murder of her Gallant, and grown frantick and a Vagabond, she found Marsyas a faithful Companion of all her Ramblings and Excursions, which brought them both at last to Nysa the Mansion of Bacchus, where they met with Apollo proud of his new Discoveries in the Lyre.

Marsyas gave him a Challenge, which Apollo accepted, on Condition, says Pausanias, that the Victor should use his Competitor as he pleased; and that God having won the Victory caused him to be flcad alive, or, according to Diodorus, he performed that cruel Operation himself. Hyginus and the younger Philostratus, who alledge that Apollo had employed for that Purpose the Ministration of a Scythian, are mistaken about the Word ἀποκρυτίσαι,

D d 3

which

(1) Cap. 165.

(2) Page 169.

which was in the Greek Treatise they had read, and which they in honest Simplicity took to signify to give Commission to a Scythian; whereas, according to Hesychius, it imports simply to flea.

It was added, that his Blood was metamorphosed into a River that bore the Name of Marsyas, whose Waters were actually reddish, and run thro' the City Celenæ, where, according to Herodotus, was to be seen in the publick Place, the Skin of that unfortunate Musician suspended in form of a Bladder, or of a Foot-ball: It must have been transported thither, since Xenophon informs us, that Apollo had suspended it in a Cave. Other Authors give him a less cruel Death, and assure us that thro' desperate Grief for being overcome, or having lost his Reason, he had thrown himself into that River, where he was drowned.

The ancient instrumental Musick was indebted to him for several Improvements, and he with Olympus is made the Author of the Phrygian and Lydian Measure, which others ascribe to his Father Hyagnis. He especially improved the Flute and Reed, which before him were simple. He joined together by means of Wax and some Threads, several Pipes or Reeds of different Lengths, whence came that compound Reed, and he was the Inventor of the double Flute, whereof some however ascribe the Honour to his Father.

Antiquity has preserved to us several Monuments representing this Action. You see him in Beger, in Maffei, and in Du Choul, fastened to a Tree, with his Hands behind his Back: Apollo, holding the Lyre in his left Hand, has a young Man at his Feet, who appears to implore his Assistance; this is thought to be Olympus, Marsyas's Scholar, who asks Pardon for his Master, or rather Permission to give him Funeral Obsequies; which he accordingly obtained, as we learn from Hyginus.

Maffei

Maffei has likewise got a Print of a magnificent Statue at Rome, where you see Marsyas with his Arms extended, fastened to a Tree. We find others where Apollo holds a Knife in one Hand, and in the other Marsyas's Skin, which confirms the Opinion of those who alledge that he flaid him himself. Others in short, where Marsyas has the Ears and Tail of Fawns and Satyrs. There was anciently to be seen in the Citadel of Athens, a Statue of Minerva chastising the Satyr Marsyas, for appropriating to himself the Flutes which the Goddess had rejected with Contempt. These Flutes of Marsyas had been consecrated in the Temple of Apollo at Sicyon, by a Shepherd who had collected them. At Mantineia, in the Temple of Latona, was also to be seen a Marsyas playing upon the double Flute, and he had not been forgot in the fine Picture of Polygnotus. Servius the Grammarian asserts, that the free Towns had in the publick Places a Statue of Marsyas, which was a Symbol of their Liberty, because of the close Connection between Marsyas taken for Silenus, and Bacchus, known to the Romans under the Name of Liber. There was at Rome in the Forum one of those Statues, with a Tribunal set up by it, where Justice was administred. The Advocates who gained their Causes, took care to crown this Statue, as it were, to thank Marsyas for the Success of their Eloquence, and to engage his Favour to them in quality of an excellent Player on the Flute ; for we know how great Influence the Sound of that and other Instruments in those Times, had upon Declamation, and how apt it was to animate Orators and Actors.

Notwithstanding so many Testimonies for Marsyas's having been flaid alive, there are Authors who take this to be a mere Allegory, founded upon the River Marsyas's making a harsh disagreeable Noise, such as is grating to the Ears ; or rather, if we believe Fortunio Liceti (1), upon this, that before the Invention of the Lyre, the Flute was esteem'd above all the Instruments of Musick, and enriched all those who could play upon it; and as the Lyre brought the Flute into Discredit, and nothing was to be got by it, hence they feigned that Apollo had strip'd off Marsyas's Skin: Which was the better imagined that the Money of those Days was of Leather (2).

The Defeat of the Serpent Python, described by Ovid (3), is likewise ascribed by the Poets to the same God. This Monster made terrible Devastations; but Apollo with his winged Shafts rid the Earth of him, and delivered his Mother from his Persecutions.

The Waters of the Deluge, says Ovid (4), which had overflowed the Earth, left a Slime whence sprung several Insects, among others the Serpent Python, which made great Havock in the Country about Parnassus. Apollo, armed with his Darts, put him to Death; which, physically explain'd, imports that the Heat of the Sun having dissipated the noxious Steams, those Monsters soon disappeared. If we refer this Fable to History, this Serpent was a Robber who haunted the Country about Delpbos, and very much infested those who came thither to sacrifice. A Prince who bore the Name of Apollo, or one of the Priests of that God, rid the Country of him. This Event gave rise to the Institution of the Pythian Games, so well known in Greece. They were celebrated every four Years, and the Prize given to the Conquerors, was either Apples consecrated to Apollo, or, as Pindar alledges, Laurel Crowns. The chief Exercises there were dancing, and playing upon Instruments. As to which you may consult the Marbles of Paros (5) and Meursius (6). This Event, which Ovid places imme-

(1) Hierog. ch. 109.

(2) Pollux, L. 4. c. 10.

(3) Met.

L. 1.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Page 202 and 203 of the Oxford

Edition.

(6) Græcia feriatæ.

immediately after the Deluge, must needs have happened not till a long time after, since in the Time of Deucalion, Apollo was not yet known at Delphos. Themis it was, according to the same Poet and all Antiquity, that delivered Oracles there at that Period of Time, and before Themis there was another Oracle that had been delivered by Terra.

I have just now said that the Arrows of Apollo were the Sun-beams, and this is what gave rise to two Fables of no less Note than Antiquity. The first, that to Apollo were always attributed sudden and untimely Deaths. Of this we find an hundred Examples in Homer; and whenever that Poet speaks of any Death of that kind, he never fails to ascribe it to Apollo, or to Diana; with this Difference, that he imputes to the God those of the Men, and to Diana those of the Women. But the most noted Example in Antiquity is that of Niobe's Children, whom Apollo and Diana slew with their Darts: Their History is too remarkable to be here omitted.

The haughty Niobe, says Ovid (1), The History of grieved that Latona should have a Niobe and her Chilreligious Worship paid her, and that no dren slain by Apollo Altar was raised to herself, tho' by and Diana.
reason of her Birth and numerous Offspring she had a just Claim to divine Honours, run thro' the Streets of Thebes to put a stop to the Sacrifices that were offered to that Goddess. Latona, in Revenge, implored the Aid of Apollo and Diana, who having found, in the neighbouring Plains of that City, Niobe's Children, who were there performing their Exercises, slew them with their Arrows.

All the ancient Historians agree with Diodorus Siculus and Apollodorus, that Niobe was the Daughter of Tantalus, and Sister of Pelops; for we must not confound her, who is the Subject of this Fable, with another Niobe, who was Daughter of Phoroneus, neus, and whom Homer makes the first Mortal whom Jupiter was in love with. Pelops having left Phrygia, to remove into that Part of Greece, which since took his Name, carried his Sister with him. Being desirous to secure his new Dominion by some Alliances, that might support him against the Assaults of his Enemies, he gave her in Marriage to Amphion, a Prince equally powerful and eloquent ; by whom Thebes had lately been fortified with Walls. Niobe's Portion was probably employ'd in building a Town in Beotia, or at least this was one of the Conditions of the Marriage ; since Pausanias informs us, that it was at that time Pelops laid the Foundations of it. The same Pausanias in more Places than one speaks of Amphion's Alliance with the House of Pelops ; and in his Beotica he expressly says, that Prince having contracted an Alliance with Tantalus, had learned from the Phrygians the Lydian Measure, and added three new Strings to the four which the Lyre had before.

(1) Met. L. 6.

There is great Probability that Niobe was the Seal of the Peace that was concluded between Amphion and Pelops ; for the latter had quarrelled with the King of Thebes, for having received into his Dominions Maius, whom Amphion and Zethus had banished, as we have it in Apollodorus (1). Whatever be in that, the Match was very happy by the Fruitfulness of Niobe, who had a numerous Progeny. Homer gives her twelve Children, six Sons and as many Daughters ; Herodotus only two Sons and three Daughters ; Diodorus Siculus fourteen, seven of either Sex. Apollodorus (2), upon the Authority of Hesiod, alledges she had ten Sons, and as many Daughters. However, that Author names only fourteen of them, as follows, Sipylus, Minytus, Ismenus, Damasichthon, Agenor, Phedrus, and Tantalus ; and as many Daughters, Echodea, or

(1) L. 3.

(2) Ibid.

or according to others Thera, Cleodora, Astyocha, Phthia, Pelopias, Astycratia, and Ogygia.

Niobe, elated upon Account of her Fruitfulness, despised Latona, who in Revenge engaged Apollo and Diana to put all her Children to Death, in the manner as Ovid relates from the other ancient Poets, and as may be seen in Plutarch's Book of Superstition. This Episode, ingeniously enough invented, contains a History as real as it is tragical. The Pestilence which desolated the City Thebes, destroy'd all Niobe's Children; and because contagious Distempers used to be attributed to the immoderate Heat of the Sun; hence they gave out that Apollo had slain them with his Darts. What I here advance for the ground of this Fable, is authorised by Antiquity. Homer (1) tells us that Laodamia, and the Mother of Andromache had been slain by Diana. Valerius Flaccus (2) describes the Lamentations of Clyta the Wife of Sysicus upon the Death of her Mother, whom Diana had put to Death (a); and not to multiply Examples, I only add that the Scholiast upon Pindar (3) remarks, after Phercydes, that Apollo sent Diana his Sister to put to death Coronis and several other Women, while he himself was going to destroy Ischis. After this 'tis no wonder to see Penelope, in Homer, praying Diana to put her to death. If these Testimonies were not sufficient to prove this Tradition, I might add the Authority of Strabo (4) and Eustathius, who give the same Account; and the latter observes very judiciously, that the Poets who attributed to those Divinities sudden Deaths, and such as were owing to the Pestilence, always imputed those of the Men to Apollo, and those of the Women to Diana (5). Homer has indeed deviated from this

(1) Il. L. 2. v. 20.

(2) L. 3.

(a) ——— Triviaeque potentis
Occidit arcanâ genetrix absumpta sagittâ.

(3) Upon the third Pythick. (4) L. 4.

(5) Upon the second Book of the Iliad.

this Rule, in saying that Diana had put Orion to Death (1): But as he had a mind to violate the Honour of that Goddess, 'tis no wonder that she would needs punish him herself; which however is so very contrary to the common Practice, that there are Authors, according to Eustathius (2), who take this Passage in Homer to be spurious.

Nothing is better imagined than this System, since there is Reason for attributing contagious Distempers to the Exhalations of the Earth, and to the immoderate Heat of the Sun: Accordingly Homer tells us, the Pestilence fell upon the Grecian Camp, so soon as that God in Wrath had darted his Arrows; that is to say, when his too warm Beams had infected the Air. 'Tis proper to remark by the by, that the Arrows were the Symbol of Apollo provok'd, as the Lyre signified that he was appeased, as Servius observes (3): Accordingly they never failed, in time of epidemical Distempers, to implore the Aid of this Divinity, and to offer Sacrifices to him, as we learn from Horace and Pausanias. It was also their Practice to put Branches of Laurel upon the Doors of their Houses, in hope that the God would spare the Places that were under the Protection of a Person whom he had loved; as may be seen in Diogenes Laertius, and in the Author of the great Etymologicon.

Ovid makes Niobe's Sons die in a Cirque, where these young Princes were exercising themselves in managing Horses; but Pausanias says (4), with more Probability, that they died upon Mount Cytberon, where they had been hunting; and the Daughters at Thebes. The Reason why they have added upon the Authority of Homer (5), that these unfortunate Children remained nine Days without Burial, because the Gods had transformed all the Thebans into Stones, and that the Gods themselves performed performed their funeral Rites on the tenth Day ; the Reason I say is, that they having died of the Plague, no body durst interr them, and all appeared insensible to the Misfortunes of the Queen ; a lively Figure of the Calamities which accompanied this Plague, where every one apprehending almost certain Death, thinks only of his own Preservation, and neglects the most essential Duties of Life. However, as the Priests, after the Violence of the Distemper was a little abated, set about the burying of them, it was given out that the Gods themselves had performed that Duty to them. They add that Ismenus, the eldest of these Princes, to deliver himself from the acute Pains he endured from so violent a Distemper, threw himself into a River of Beotia, which was then called the Foot of Cadmus, but since that Event got its Name from that young Prince.

(1) Odyss. L. 5. v. 125. (2) Upon the Odyss. (3) Upon the third Book of the Eneid. (4) In Beot. (5) Il. L. 24.

Niobe, no longer able to stay at Thebes after the Death of her Children, and Husband, who in the Extremity of his Grief killed himself, returned into Lydia, and ended her Days near Mount Sipylus ; upon which, according to Pausanias (1) was to be seen a Rock, which being seen at a Distance resembled a Woman in deep Melancholy and Distress, tho' at hand it had not the most remote Resemblance to it, as we are assured by the same Author, who had travelled thither himself. This is what made Ovid say a Whirlwind had carried away that unfortunate Princess upon that Mountain, and that she had been transformed into a Rock, a Circumstance which intimates, as Cicero observes (2), that Niobe had kept so profound a Silence in her Affliction, that she looked like one deprived of Speech and Motion, which is the Character of consummate Grief. Sophocles, in his Antigone, says this Princess was not at first transformed into a Stone, but that the Gods, at her Request, granted her her that Favour afterwards. The same Poet, in his Eleſtra, ſays Niobe ſheds Tears in a Tomb of Stone.

(1) In Att.

(2) Tusc. Quæst. L. 3.

Ovid undoubtedly thought the Story would be more moving, when he ſaid all the Children of Niobe had been Victims to Latona's Reſentment. Pauſanias (1) however tells us that Melibeia or Chloris, and Amyclea, two of her Daughters appeaſed Diana, who ſaved their Lives; that is they recovered of the Plague. The firſt of theſe two Princeſſes married Neleus the Father of Neflor, as we are told by Apollodorus (2); but the ſame Pauſanias declares that he chooſes rather to be of the Opinion of Homer, who makes all the Children of Niobe to have died by the Hands of Apollo and Diana. I muſt not forget alſo to obſerve what gave Melibeia the Surname of Chloris; namely that ſhe never having recovered the Fright ſhe received from the Death of her Brothers and Siſters, remained always extremely Pale, as we are likewiſe told by Pauſanias (3).

The Fact which I have been now relating happened about 120 Years before the Trojan War; which might be eaſily proved from the Genealogy of Neflor, the Son of Chloris, but more eſpecially from that of Laius the Father of Oedipus, who ſucceeded Amphion and Zetbus in the Kingdom of Thebes, as ſhall be ſaid, when I came to explain the Fable of Amphion.

Such is the Truth of this Event ſo celebrated in the ancient Poets. The fertile Imagination of Ovid who relates it ſo ingeniouſly, is indeed to be admired: Let us transport ourſelves with him to Thebes, view theſe young Princes mounted on proud Steeds performing their Exerciſes, while Apollo and Diana, eſpouſing the Cauſe of their injured Mother, diſcharge their Darts upon them, and kill them without Mercy. The Siſters of the unhappy Princes run up to the Ramparts, upon the Report of this ſaid Diſaſture, and they too fall by the unſeen Arrows of Diana:

(1) In Attic.

(2) L. 1.

(3) In Corin.

Diana: Next arrives the Mother distracted with Grief and Despair, has just Time to bathe in Tears the Bodies of her Children, and then is transformed into a Rock: these we must needs own are fine poetical Embellishments, but if Fable gives great Ornaments to Truth, yet the Discovery of that same Truth yields still higher Pleasure to the Understanding, than all these vain Ornaments can do to the Imagination.

An antique Monument quoted by Montfaucon (1) represents this Story according to the Tradition which Ovid has followed. The Sons of Niobe are there represented with their Manage-horses, Apollo and Diana are shooting their Arrows at them, and the distressed Mother seeing them fall one after another, is hugging some of them in her Bosom.

But if the Arrows of Apollo were upon many Occasions serviceable to him, they were upon the following one extremely fatal. Jupiter incensed that Esculapius had restored Hippolitus to Life, alledging that the Right of raising the Dead ought to be reserved to himself alone, thunder-struck the unhappy Physician; and Apollo, to revenge the Death of his Son, having with his Darts slain the Cyclops who had forged Jupiter's Thunder, was expelled Heaven. Thus being obliged to shift for his Living, he enter'd into Admetus's Service and kept his Flocks.

Boccace (2), upon the Authority of Theodotion, says this Adventure relates to that Apollo whom Cicero makes to have been the Law-giver of the Arcadians, and who was dethroned for having governed his Subjects with too much Severity. He retired to the Court of Admetus, who received him favourably, and gave him in Sovereignty that Part of his Dominions which lay along the Banks of the River Amphrifa. Hence arose this Fable of his having been expelled Heaven, because he had actually

(1) Anti. Expl. T. 1.

(2) Gen. of the Gods.

actually been banish'd from his Throne. The Meaning of his being reduced to keep Admetus's Flocks, is that Admetus put some of his Subjects under his Dominion, and made him King of a Part of Thessaly. King and Shepherd are frequently synonymous Names, especially in Homer; and indeed every King ought to be the Shepherd of his People, who are his true Flock. As these ancient Traditions were not always uniform, Ovid says that it was not in Thessaly, but in Elis, that Apollo became a Shepherd, and had the Adventure of Battus who stole away some of his Oxen.

The History which I have before related proves that Apollo was not ready to put up with an Affront; of this we have an additional Proof in the Story of Phorbas the Robber, who raised Contributions from all that travell'd to Delphos. To gratify his Resentment the God metamorphos'd himself into a Wrestler, and put the Offender to Death. But for understanding most of these Fables, we are to reflect upon the Principle laid down in the first Volume, that it was usual to croud into the History of a God or Heroe the Adventures of all those who had bore the same Name; and not only so but frequently the Adventures of their Priests too: This now mentioned, was probably of that Number, some of the Ministers of Delphos, finding the Offerings that used to be brought to Apollo's Temple daily diminish'd by the Incursions of Phorbas, disguised himself, and being so happy as to kill that Robber, fabled that it was Apollo himself had revenged the Insult done to his Temple.

But let this be as it will, there was hardly any God in the Pagan World more revered than Apollo. He had Temples thro' all Greece and Italy, Oracles without Number, and a vast many Festivals were celebrated to his Honour, especially at Delos. I need not dwell long upon this Subject, it suffices to remark that almost all the Ceremonies of Worship that were paid to him had a Reference to the Sun; whose Symbol he was, or to the Attributes which he was thought to possess. Thus the Wolf and the Hawk were consecrated to him, because both of them have a fine piercing Eye; the Crow, the Raven, and the Swan, because these Fowls were reckoned to have by Instinct a Faculty of Prediction. The Laurel was consecrated to this God, from a Persuasion that those who slept with some Branches of this Tree under their Head, received certain Vapours which enabled them to prophecy. Porphry too informs us that the Ancients foretold future Events, from the Crackling which the Laurel made when it was burning; which makes Tibullus say: When the Laurel gives you a good Omen, ye Husbandmen rejoice (a): But then when it burn'd without any crackling it was a bad Prognostick (b). The Cock was also consecrated to him, because by his crowing he intimates the rising of the Sun; and the Grasshopper, because her chirping does Honour to the God of Musick.
that

Time has preserved to us a great many Monuments of this God; I have no Mind to run over them all, most of them are to be seen collected in Montfaucon's Antiquities. I shall only Remark that this God is always distinguished in them by his Youth, the Rays that shine about his Head, and his Lyre, or the Cythara that accompanies him. Apollo, as has been said, was generally represented youthful, and without a Beard, as well as Bacchus, which Form, according to Tibullus, was exactly suitable to them both; but as the latter appears sometimes with a Beard, so Lucian (1) informs us that there was also a bearded Apollo: However we have no Monuments extant that represent him in that Manner.

In fine, to close this Article, it remains that I speak of the different Names of Apollo. As the whole

VOL. II.

E e

(a) Laurus ubi bona signa dedit, gaudete coloni.

(b) Et jacet extincto Laurus adusta foco. Propert.

(1) De Dea Syria.

whole World adored this God, or at least the Sun whose Symbol he was, he had almost as many Names as there were different Countries that worship'd him, as has been said more than once before; but besides these Names the Greeks and Romans gave him several others.

That of Vulturius was given him from a pretty singular Adventure related by Conon (1). Two Shepherds who were feeding their Flocks upon Mount Lissus near Ephesus, seeing some Bees come out of a Cavern; one of them let himself down thither with a Basket and there found a Treasure. He who had remained above, having pulled up the Treasure by Means of the same Basket, left his Companion to shift for himself, not doubting but he would soon perish. While the deserted Shepherd was thus abandoned to cruel Despair, he sunk down to sleep, and Apollo appeared to him in a Dream, bidding him bruise his Body with a flint Stone, which accordingly he did. Some Vulturs allured by the Scent of his Blood, entered into the Cavern, and having lodged their Bills in his Wounds and Cloaths, and at the same Time raising themselves upon their Wings, thus drew the poor Wretch out of the Cave. So soon as he was cured, he tabled his Complaint before the Ephesian Magistrates, who put the other Shepherd to Death; and giving him the half of the Gold that was found in the Cave, he built with it upon the Mountain a Temple in Honour of his Deliverer, under the Name of Apollo over Vulturs.

He was called Hyperborean, for Reasons given in the Article of the Religion of the northern Nations (2). Phæbus in Allusion to the Light and Heat of the Sun, which gives Life to all Things, or from the Name of Phæbe Latona's Mother: Delius either from the Island Delos where he was born, or because he enlightens all the World: Cynthius, from a Mountain

(1) Nar. 35.

(2) V. I. B. 7.

Mountain of that Name, as we learn from Servius and Festus: Epidelius from a Temple which he had near the Promontory of Malea. Menophanes, who commanded Mithridates's Fleet, having plundered the Island of Delos, ordered the Statue of Apollo to be thrown into the Sea; the Lacedemonians having found it, built a Temple to this God, which they named Epidelius, as it were to signify that he came from Delos.

The People of Cbios worship'd him under the Name of Phanæus, and gave the Name of Phanæa to one of their Promontories, because it was from thence Latona had seen the Island of Delos (1). That of Lycius was given him, if we may credit Pausanias (2), by Danaus, who as he was disputing the Crown with Gelanor, having perceived a Wolf, which the Greeks call Lycos, gain the Victory over a Bull with whom he was fighting, gave out that Apollo was pleased to shew the People of Argos, that a Stranger was to prevail over a Citizen, since the Wolf which is a foreign Animal, had vanquish'd the Bull. When this Prince had mounted the Throne, he built a Temple in Honour of Apollo Lycius. He was denominated Delphinius, because it was believed that under the Figure of a Dolphin he had accompany'd the Ship of Castalius, who conducted a Colony from Crete into Phocis: Delphicus from the City Delphos, so famous for his Oracle: Clarius, from that of Claros where he had also an Oracle. Ismenius, from a Hill near Thebes, as we learn from Pausanias (3), or from a River of this Name, if we may believe Stephanus: Nomius, because he had kept Admetus's Flocks: Pythius from the Victory he obtained over the Serpent Python; and the Games that were instituted in Memory of this Event were called Pythian, as we learn from Ovid (a). The

E e 2

Name

(1) Steph. upon the Word φάναι. (2) In Att. (3) In Beot.

(a) Neve operis famam posset delere vetustas,
Instituit sacros celebri certamine ludos;
Pythia perdomiti Serpentis nomine Dictos.

Name of Smynthian was given him, because, as Strabo has it (1) after Callinus and Heraclides of Pontus; the Descendants of Teucer having set out from Crete in Quest of a fit Place to settle in, learned from the Oracle that they were to stop at a Place where the Inhabitants should come to receive them. Being obliged to pass the Night upon the Borders of the Sea in the lesser Asia, a great Number of Rats came in the Night Time and gnaw'd their Belts and Bucklers: The next Day seeing this Havock, and thinking the Oracle accomplish'd, they stop'd in that Place, and gave Apollo, who was there highly honoured, the Name of Smynthian, which in their Language imports a Rat. The same Author adds, that in the City Chrysa was to be seen a Statue of Apollo, by the Hand of Scopas the celebrated Statuary of Paros, with the Figure of a Rat near his Feet; and Heraclides of Pontus asserts that the Rats about that Temple were sacred.

Orpheus, Homer, Ovid and several other Poets frequently give Apollo the Name of Smynthian (a). That of Aëlius was derived to him from the Promontory of that Name, so noted for the Victory of Augustus over Antony: That of Daphnæus, from the Fable of his Amours with Daphne: That of Soraëtes, from a Mountain in Italy where he was worship'd, and whose Priests, if we believe Pliny and Virgil, walk'd upon burning Coals, without receiving any Hurt (b). Strabo likewise takes Notice of the same Miracle (2), but

(1) L. 13.

(a) Other Derivations are given of this Name, as may be seen in Lysio Gyraldi Synt. 7.

(b) Haud procul urbe Roma in Faliscorum agro sunt paucae familiae quæ Hirpinæ vocantur, quæ Sacrificio annuo, quod fit ad Montem Soraëtem Apollini, super ambustam ligni struem ambulantes non adiurantur, & ob id perpetuo Senatus consulto, militiæ aliorumque munerum vacationem habent. Plin. l. 2. c. 93.

Summe Deum, Sancti custos Soraëtis Apollo,
Quem primi colimus, cui Pineus ardor acervo
Pascitur, & medium freti pietate per ignem
Cultores multâ premimus vestigia plantâ.

Virg.

(2) L. 5.

but he says it was the Goddess Feronia who was worship'd upon Mount Soraete, and that it was in Honour of her those Priests walk'd upon those burning Brands.

In fine, Apollo had several other Names, mostly taken from the Places where he was worship'd, not to mention those which the other Nations gave him, as has been already said at the Beginning of his History, and when we were upon the Origin of Idolatry.

Diana and the Moon.

The History of Diana will not carry us so far as that of Apollo, since the same Attributes agree to Brother and Sister. Accordingly Diana may be considered as the Moon, and then she was the same with Isis, who is the most ancient Diana of all. We may run a Comparison between them two, similar to what we have now drawn between Apollo and Osiris. We may in like Manner say that the Greeks, who had received the Egyptian Theology, adjusted it to their own Ideas, and attributed to the Sister of Apollo what they said of the Sister of Osiris. Thus to pursue my own Plan, I have only to deliver and explain the Greek Mythology concerning Diana.

Cicero (1) reckons three Dianas: “ The first, who is thought to have been the Mother of winged Cupid, was the Daughter of Jupiter and Proserpina; the second, who is the best known, was the Daughter of the third Jupiter and Latona; the third, to whom the Greeks often give the Name of her Father, was the Daughter of Upis and Glauce.”

Strabo (2) and Pausanias mention another Diana named Britomartis. She was Eubulus's Daughter, and a great lover of hunting. As she was flying from Minos who was enamoured of her, she threw herself into the Sea, and was taken in some Fishers Nets ; which, according to Vossius got her the Name of Dictynna ; unless you choose rather to say that this Name was given her from Mount Diété ; or, as Solinus pretends, because it signifies a soft and gentle Virgin, 'Tis even very probable that Cicero and Strabo intended only to speak of the Dianas of Greece. Ovid has gone farther, since he makes us acquainted with a Diana yet more ancient ; this was she of Egypt who metamorphosed herself into a Cat, in the Time that Typhon waged War with the Gods : Fele soror Phæbi latuit (1). She is the same with her whom Herodotus mentions (2) under the Name of Bubastis, adding that the Egyptians said she was the Daughter of Dionysius, that is Osiris, and of Isis, and that Latona was only her Nurse : Or rather 'tis Isis herself who is the true and most ancient Diana, since 'tis she whom the Egyptians took for the Symbol of the Moon, as we have said in her History. But because the Greeks always copied after the Egyptians, what these attributed to their Isis, those have said of some of their Princesses, and it would seem that their Accounts of her ought to be applied to that Diana who was the Daughter of Jupiter and Latona, and Sister of Apollo. As she loved hunting, they look'd upon her as the Divinity of those who were addicted to that Exercise. Her Love of Chastity made them give her Virgins for her Companions. She is ordinarily represented with a Quiver, and Dogs, drawn in a Chariot by two white Stags : Sometimes however she was figured with Wings, as we learn from Pausanias, having in one Hand a Lion and in the other a Panther, her Chariot being drawn either by two Heifers, or by two Horses of different Colours ; but this Author owns at the same Time that he knows not what is the Meaning of these Symbols.

E e 3 herself

(1) De Nat. Deor. l. 3.

(2) L. 10.

'Tis proper to remark, 1st, That as in the Pagan Theology Diana was both a natural and animated Divinity,

(1) Met. L. 5.

(2) L. 1.

Divinity, so the Poets say many Things of her which it would be very ridiculous to think of reducing to History; since 'tis obvious they can only be understood of the Moon whom she represented. Even according to their own Principles, Diana, Lucina, Juno, Venus, Bubastis and Isis were frequently but one and the same Divinity, that is to say, the Planet which they represented, and this is the Key to all that we find in their Works concerning most of the Attributes of this Goddess. 2d, That when she represented the Moon, she was called Lucina; Diana again, when she was taken for the Goddess who loved hunting; and Proserpina or Hecate, when she was accounted an infernal Divinity. Hence the Name of Triformis given her by the Poets (1), and the Custom of representing her with three Heads (a), whereof the one on the Right, was that of a Horse, the one on the left that of a Dog, and in the Middle that of a Boar. But this Custom if we may believe Pausanias (2), was neither universal nor very ancient. “As far as I can judge of it, says that Author, Alcámenes was the first who thought of making a triple Statue, with three Bodies and three Faces, to represent the Goddess Hecate; and this is the Statue which the Athenians call the Epipyrgis (b), and which they have placed at Athens near the Victory without Wings.”

When Diana was invoked by Women in Child-bed, she was called Lucina, as also Juno Pronuba. She had several other Names; such as that of Trivia, importing that she was worship'd in the Cross-ways, the Streets, and publick Roads, where her Statues were commonly erected. That of Ortlione

E e 4 was

(1) Horace, Virgil, Martial, &c.

(a) Tergeminamque Hecatē, tria Virginis ora Dianæ.

Virg. Æn. 4.

(2) In Corin. c. 30.

(b) A Word derived from πύργος a Tower, because this Statue was very high.

was given her, either from a Place of that Name in Arcadia, where she was worship'd, or rather from the Severity wherewith she punish'd those of her Companions, who did not maintain strict Chastity ; or in fine, because the Youths of Lacedemon whip'd themselves cruelly, and sometimes even to Death, in presence of her Statues ; a rigorous and barbarous Custom, which may have occasioned that Surname of Diana, the Greeks calling one Ortion, who is obdurate and inflexible ; the Names of Militta, Alilat, and Anaitis were given her by the Phenicians, Arabians and Cappadocians, as has been said in the first Volume. That of Diana, which was her most common Name, and the same with Jana, signifies the Moon, according to Varro. That of Deviana had its rise from this Goddess's being a Lover of hunting, those who are fond of that Exercise being apt to lose themselves, or to deviate. Spon (1) is the first who has given a Print of a Monument, where Diana is named Clatra. This Goddess is there represented with Apollo, both of them charged with Symbols, after the manner of the Panthean Figures. Apollo with his Lyre holds in his Hand Jupiter's Thunder, and has his Head encircled with Rays ; and above, the Sun. In a Circle Diana has upon her Head the Crescent, a Turret, and a Pine-apple, like Cybele, a Serpent wreathed about her Arm, as Hygieia the Goddess of Health, the Sistrum of Isis, a Prow of a Ship, like Isis surnamed Pelagia. 'Tis plain that this is Diana, in so far as she represents the Moon, that is to say, an Isis after the manner of the Greeks.

The other Names that are given to the same Goddess are mostly derived from the Places where she was worship'd ; thus Hesychius calls her Aerea, from a Mountain of that Name in Argolis ; and Pausanias, Coryphæa, from another Mountain near

Eji-

(1) Misc. Erud. Ant.

Epidaurus ; the Eleans named her Speculatrix ; the Cretans, Dietyinna ; the Eginetæ, Aphæa ; those of Sicily, Lya, because they believed she had cured them of the Spleen. Those of Tauris, Taurica, from the Name of their Country ; Thoantina, from that of Thoas their King ; Orestina, because Orestes stole away her Statue. Those of Ephesus, Ephesia, and we have shewn in the Description (1) of her Temple in that City, how much she was adored there. Those of Elis, Alphæa, as we learn from Strabo ; and the Reason they gave of this Surname was, that Alphæus falling in love with this Goddess, she daubed over her Face with Dirt, and did the same to her Companions. As the Sagacity of the Gods, whom the Pagans worship, was not very great, Alphæus was not able to distinguish the Goddess from the Nymphs of her Court, and gave over his Pursuits. Those of Achaia called her Triclaria : And Pausanias (2) tells us that Menalippus and Cometbo gratify'd their Lust in the Temple of Diana Triclaria. This Profanation was follow'd with a general Barrenness, insomuch that the Earth produced no Fruit, and with an epidemical Distemper; which swept away Numbers of People. The Achaians having consulted the Oracle of Apollo, were answered by the Priestess, that the Impiety of Menalippus and Cometbo was the Cause of all their Calamities, and that the only way to appease the Goddess was to sacrifice to her every Year a Boy and a young Virgin.

Hypermnestra having gained her Cause against Danaus her Father, who prosecuted her for having saved Lynceus her Husband against his Command to put him to Death, dedicated a Temple to Diana under the Name of Pitbo, or Goddess of Persuasion, as we learn from the same Pausanias (3). Pindar gives her that of Didyma, to denote that she was Apollo's Twin-Sister. The Inhabitants of

Pellene

(1) V. i. B. 4. (2) In Corint. (3) Ibid.

Pellene called her Pellené, upon Occasion whereof Plutarch (1) tells us, when her Statue was carried in the Processions, her Aspect became so terrible, that no body durst look upon it. This Author adds likewise, that the Priest who served her having carried her Statue into Eolia, all those who saw it became delirious. Strabo (2) speaks of a Diana Peresia, so named, because her Worship had been transported by Sea to Castabalis, a Town in Capadocia. Lastly, we find in the Ancients, especially in Pausanias, several other Names of this Goddess, which are easy to be explained, and which may be read in that Author.

We see, from what we have now said, that several People were distinguish'd by the Worship they paid to this Goddess, towards whom they carried their Superstition so far as to offer to her human Sacrifices. The Island of Delos celebrated the Festivals named Delia, which drew together a great Confluence of Strangers. The Island of Nicaria, if we believe Strabo, had a Temple consecrated to this Goddess, under the Name of Tauropolia (3), and we find in Goltzius a Medal struck in that Island, where on one Side appears Diana in the Equipage of a Huntress, and on the other a Person riding upon a Bull. From the Island Micaria the Worship of this Goddess was propagated, according to Titus Livius (4), to Andros, and to Amphipolis, a City in Thrace.

Diana is easily known in the Figures that represent her, either by the Crescent which she has commonly upon her Head, or by her hunting Habit; or in fine, by the Dogs that accompany her. We find besides upon these Monuments many Singularities that may be seen in the Antiquaries. I ought, however, to observe that the Diana of Ephesus was represented with a great number of Breasts, and with

(1) In the Life of Aratus.
sa, Protectress of Bulls.

(2) L. 21.
(4) L. 44.

(3) That is to

with other Symbols which signified the Earth and Cybele, or rather Nature herself, whom that Goddess represented. The Pagans look'd upon this Goddess as the Symbol of Chastity, which she obliged the Nymphs of her Retinue to observe with great Regularity. 'Tis well known in what manner she banish'd Callisto, whom Jupiter had seduced, and how dearly Acteon paid for having seen her in the Bath (1); but as Mythology was not very consistent in its Principles, it was reported that she had been in love with Endymion, and went every Night to visit him in the Mountains of Caria. 'Tis true this Fiction is thought to have no other Foundation but that Endymion, whom some Authors contend to have been a King of Elis, frequently retired into a Cave upon a Mountain in Caria, to observe the Motions of the Moon (a); and that what we are told of his being always asleep, and of the Moon's taking that Opportunity to come and embrace him, was designed to teach us that he was there employ'd in continual Contemplation (b). But Pausanias informs us at great Length of the History of that Prince. "The Fable, says he, tells us that Endymion was beloved by the Moon, and that he had by her fifty Daughters; but it is a more probable Opinion that he married Asterodia; others say Chromia, the Daughter of Itonus, and Grand-daughter of Amphictyon; others, Hyperipne, the Daughter of Arcas, and that he had three Sons, Peon, Epeus and Etolus, and a Daughter named Eurycide. Endymion put forth in Olympia a running Match to the three Princes his Children; the Prize was the Kingdom. Epeus gained the Victory, reigned after his Father, and his Subjects were called Epeans.

(1) See the History of Cadmus.

(a) We see him in some Antiques under the Figure of a Man asleep, and Diana, or the Moon, by him.

(b) Cicero. L. 1. Tusc. Quæst. & Lucian. Dial. Lunæ & Veneris.

“ Epeans. His Brother Etolus is said to have dwelt
 “ with him in the Country ; but Peon inconsolable
 “ for being vanquish’d in a Matter of such Impor“ tance, went to push his Fortune out of his own “ Country, and having stop’d upon the Banks of “ the River Axius, gave his Name to that Coun“ try which was since called Peonia. The Elians
 “ and the Heracleotes are not agreed as to the Death “ of Endymion ; for the Elians shew his Tomb in “ the City of Olympia, and the Heracleotes, who are “ in the Neighbourhood of Miletus, say Endymion “ retired to Mount Latmus. Accordingly there is “ a Place of that Mountain which is called at this “ Day the Grotto of Endymion,”

The same Pausanias says the Tomb of this Prince was in that Spot of Ground, which lay before the Stadium of Olympia, which was called the Barrier, and that at Metapontus was a Statue of the same Prince all of Ivory, except the Drapery.

We have just now been told by Pausanias that the Eleans and Heracleotes were not agreed as to the Death of Endymion. To reconcile them, Paulmier of Grantmenil says with a great deal of Probability (1), that there were two Persons of this Name, the one King of Elis the other this celebrated Shepherd of Mount Latmus : And indeed if the Shepherd was the same with the King of Elis, how can we distinguish two Endymions ?

The God
Lunus. I ought to say something here of the God Lunus, whom we find upon some Monuments ; But I have said enough about him in the History of the oriental Gods. Besides we know the Pagans gave both Sexes to their Gods.

The Night. As in the History of the Sun, I took Notice transiently of Aurora who ushers in that Luminary, so I shall here speak of the Night whom the Ancients reckoned a Divinity. Hesiod tells us she was the

(1) In his Greece.

the Daughter of Chaos, and according to Mythologists, she was the most ancient of Divinities. And indeed it is so far true that Darkness preceded the Light; and in this Manner we may conceive of this chimerical Divinity, and understand the Author of a Hymn which is ascribed to Orpheus, where the Night is termed the Mother of Gods and Men. Theocritus represents her running in a Chariot preceded by the Stars of the Firmament. Others give her Wings, like Cupid, Victory, &c. But Euripides (1), has described her better, by representing her in her Chariot accompany'd with Stars, and muffled up in a large black Veil. This Portraiture agrees well enough with a Draught, that is in a Manuscript of the Kings Library, which Montfaucon has publish'd in his Paleography, where this Goddess appears clad in black, with a Veil bespangled with Stars fluttering about her Head, having her Torch turned downward, as if she was going to extinguish it. The Ancients give the Night several Children, all Metaphorical Personages; Grief, Terror, Love, Envy, Old-age, &c. the worthy Offspring of this Goddess and of Erebus her Father.

C H A P. XVI.

Of the Muses.

AS Apollo was the Conductor of the Muses, whence he got the Name of Musagetes, 'tis proper to say something at Present of these Goddesses. Nothing is better known in the Poets than the Muses, whom they are every Moment invoking; and yet nothing is more obscure than what Mythology delivers about them. For in short, the Ancients vary both as to their Original, their Number, their Attributes, and their Names.

Hesiod,

(1) In the Tragedy intituled Io.

Hesiod, who has employed the first hundred and seventeen Verses of his Theogony, in invoking the Muses, and in celebrating their Memory, says they were nine in Number, the Daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. He calls them Heliconiades, because they resided on Mount Helicon, and Pierides because they were born in Pieria. This Poet, who gives them the Names that I am to explain by and by, says when they were in Olympus, they sung the Wonders of the Gods, especially of Jupiter their Father ; that they knew the past, the present, and the future, and that nothing so much gladdened the Courts of Heaven, as their Voices and melodious Consorts. Lastly, he adds that it was they had taught him Poetry, and inspired him with all he was going to deliver in his Theogony.

Cicero (1) first enumerates four of them, Thelxiope, Aædé, Arché, Meleté, Daughters of the second Jupiter : after them nine, whose Father was the third Jupiter, and their Mother Mnemosyne. Then other nine, who have the same Names with the Former, but are the Offspring of Piérus and Antiope ; these last the Poets are wont to call Pierides and Pierian.

Varro allowed only three of them ; the Muses, says he, denote Harmony : Now Harmony being performed only three Ways, either by the Voice, or by wind Instruments, or lastly by those which we strike with the Hand, there ought consequently to be but three Muses. Others of the Ancients believed there were nine of them. One makes them the Daughters of Pierus, another says Jupiter was their Father. Museus contends they were the Daughters of Cælus ; several others give them Terra for their Mother. S. Augustine relates from Varro, that in a City which is thought to be Sicyon, three able Artists had been employed to make three Statues of the Muses, with a Design to consecrate the finest of them ; but that they were found to be all so exquisitely sitely wrought, that the whole nine were kept and consecrated in the Temple of Apollo.

(1) De Nat. Deor.

Pausanias (1) has transmitted to us the Names of the three Statuaries, mentioned by Varro, and he calls them Chephisidotus, Strongyliones, and Olympheosthenes.

Diodorus Siculus (2) gives the Muses a more ancient Original. If we may credit that Author, these Goddeffes so famous among the Greeks, were fine Singers whom Osiris carry'd about with him in his Conquests, and to whom he had given Apollo one of his Generals to be their Director: This perhaps is the Reason of giving that God the Name of Musagetes, or Conductor of the Muses, as well as to Hercules, who had been also one of Osiris's Generals. M. le Clerc (3) takes the Fable of the Muses to have come from the Consorts which Jupiter had instituted in Crete. According to him, they were composed of nine Virgins who formed his royal Academy of Musick. He adds, as a Reason why that God pass'd for the Father of the Muses, that he was the first among the Greeks, who, in Imitation of Jubal had a regular Consort; and that these singing Virgins, had Mnemosyne or Memory given them for their Mother, because 'tis she who furnishes the Subject of Verses and Poems.

There is no less Variety about the Names of the Muses than their Original; Diodorus says it comes from Misin, which signifies to teach Things Sublime. M. le Clerc derives the Name from Motfa, to invent; Huetius will have it to come from the Name of Moses. Other Etymologies given of it by Plato and Suidas, deriving the Word from what signifies Inquiry, come pretty near to those now quoted. But as the Muses were famous, and very much honoured in the Country of Macedonia, which was anciently called Pieria, long before their Worship was known upon Mount Helicon and Parnassus, 'tis very probable probable that this is the Country whence they derived their Original. This Sentiment is conformable to what we read in Newton's Chronological Abridgment. Osiris, says this illustrious Author, had matched one of the singing Women, who followed him in his Expeditions, with Oeagrius King of Thrace, and of this Marriage was born Orpheus. The Musick Women, says he, of this Conqueror became famous in Thrace, under the Name of Muses, and the Daughter of Pierus, a Thracian by Birth, having learned their Musick, and imitated their Consorts, took the Name of these Goddeses. This is what made the Daughters of this Pierus be called the Muses.

(1) In Beot.

(2) L. 4.

(3) Notes upon Hesiod.

As ancient Authors and Monuments, frequently confound the Names of the nine Muses, and the Symbols that represent them, 'tis proper here to give the most common Manner of naming and characterising them. Clio, the first of the Muses, who derives her Name from Glory or Renown, holds a Lute in one Hand, and in the other a Plectrum or Quill; she is believed to be the Inventress of the Lute.

Euterpe, so called because she imparts Joy, has a Mask in her left Hand, and a Club in her Right. She had invented Tragedy, which is intimated by her Mask. Her double Face, which we find on one Medal, is no where else to be observed: She holds Hercules's Club, perhaps because Tragedy represents Heroes, among whom Hercules is the most illustrious: Others will have it that the Club marks Tbalia, for the Reason which we shall give below: They are likewise of Opinion that Tbalia is she who has the double Head. Spon, who has publish'd a fine Marble representing the Muses, has sometimes confounded them.

Tbalia or the flourishing Maid, who invented Comedy, holds also a Mask in her Right Hand, the Medals represent her leaning against a Pillar.

Melpomene,

Melpomene, or the Charming Fair, is distinguish'd by the Barbiton: As Terpsichore, that is, the Jovial, is by the Flutes which she holds, as well on Medals as in other Monuments.

Erato, or the Lovely, is not easy to be distinguish'd.

Polyhymnia, so called from multiplicity of Songs, and not from faithfulness of Memory, as some Authors have alledged, is to be seen on some Medals. She is drawn with a Lyre, as the Inventress of Harmony; this is the Barbiton which Horace gives her.

Urania, or Cælestis, is the Inventress of Astronomy, and holds a Globe in her Hand: In Medals this Globe stands upon a Tripod.

Calliope, so called from the Sweetness of her Voice, holds a Volume, as Inventress of the heroick Poem.

Apollo has always been looked upon by the Poets as the Patron and Conductor of the Muses; and nothing is finer than their Descriptions of the Consorts of Parnassus over which that God presided, and where they sung in Strains that charmed both Gods and Men. But they are not content with giving them Apollo for their Conductor. Hercules too had the same Title, and hence the Name given him of Musagetes, as shall be said in his History.

Vossius was at a Loss to imagine for what Reason the Ancients believed the Muses to be warlike Goddesses: But since they were consecrated to Apollo and Bacchus, who, according to Diodorus, had passed their Lives in making War, why not consider the Women who accompany'd them in their Conquests as Warlike? Besides the Muses were often confounded with the Bacchanals, and we are assured by Plutarch (1), that Sacrifices used to be offered to them in Greece before giving Battle.

The Fable of the Muses being invited to Pyreneus's Court, and of his offering Violence to them so that they were obliged to ask Wings from the Gods to save themselves, is, according to Plutarch, an Allegory informing us that this Tyrant, who reigned in Phocis, had no Love to the Belles Lettres: As he had demolished the Colleges and Academies where Literature had been taught, it was said, in order to render him odious, that he attempted to violate the Muses; that the Gods, to secure them from him, had given them Wings, and that he had lost his Life in pursuing them. Ovid is the only one I know, who has mentioned this Tyrant, known only by so dishonourable an Adventure. 'Tis doubtless upon this Authority that Antiquity relies, for giving the Muses Wings, as we see them represented in a Monument quoted by Montfaucon.

The Challenge given by the Pierides to the Muses, to sing better than they, is another Adventure I find in no Poet ancients than Ovid. 'Tis said by Way of Explication of it, that Pierus was a very bad Poet, whose Works were full of Anecdotes not much to the Honour of the Gods. Plutarch too informs us (1) that he had composed one reflecting on the Honour of the Muses. This then is the original of the Contest which Ovid describes. His Daughters, that is, his Works were transformed into Magpies, because they were stuff'd with a Kind of empty Prattle equally impertinent and distasteful.

Tho' I am unwilling to enter into a long Detail on this Article of the Muses, which Lyllo Gyraldi (2) has treated at great length, and of whom you may see all the Figures in the first Volume of Montfaucon's Antiquities, yet I must not here omit to take notice at least of some of the different Epithets

(1) In his Book of Musick.

(2) Synt. de Musis.

thets that were given to these Goddesses, and of the Motives for giving them.

That of Camænæ, according to Festus, Macrobius and Servius, comes from the Word Cano, because their principal work was to celebrate the Actions of the Gods and Heroes. They were called Heliconiades, from a Mountain in Beotia named Helicon, which Otus and Ephialtes, the Sons of Aloeus, consecrated to the Muses, and not from a Hill of the same Name adjoining to Mount Parnassus as most Grammarians have thought. Some Authors however are of Opinion that this Name came neither from one nor other of those Mountains, but from a musical Instrument, also called Helicon, whereof Ptolemy makes mention.

The Name of Parnassides, given them likewise by the Poets, comes from Mount Parnassus in Phocis, which they were said commonly to frequent: That of Aonides, is derived from the Mountains in Beotia called the Aonian Mountains, whence the Province itself was often called Aonia. From Thespia a Town in Beotia, they were denominated Thespeades: And Castalides, from the Name of the Fountain of Castalia which was at the Foot of Mount Parnassus.

Tho' the Muses received divine Honours, and their Worship was celebrated in most places of Greece and Macedonia, where Sacrifices were offered to them, yet no Body has so highly adored them as the Poets, who, in Imitation of Hesiod, Homer and Virgil, seldom fail to invoke them at the Beginning of their Poems, as Goddesses capable of inspiring them with that Enthusiasm which is so essential to their Art.

They were named Citheriades, from Mount Citheron; Pierides or Pieriæ, from Mount Pierus, according to Festus, or according to Stephanus, from the Name of a City, or from that Part of Mace- donia called Pieria; the Names of Pegafides, and Hippocrenæ, were given them from the Fountain which Pegasus made to spring out of the Earth with a Blow of his Foot: 'Tis also from the Name of the same Fountain that they are frequently called Aganippides, because that Fountain was equally called Aganippe and Hippocrene.

C H A P. XVII.

The History of Bacchus.

THE Greeks, who would needs have all the Gods and Heroes to be born in their own Country, did not fail to reckon Bacchus of that Number; and to give a greater Air of the marvellous to his History, they added to it several Fables according to their usual Way.

Euripides (1), Orpheus, Ovid and several others, tell us that Jupiter being in Love with Semele the Daughter of Cadmus, Juno fired with Jealousy, assumed the Figure of Beroe her Rival's Nurse, to try if she could artfully infuse into her Distrust and Suspicion of her Gallant; insinuating to her that if he was actually Jupiter, as he pretended to be, he would not disguise himself as he did under the Figure of a Mortal; that it must undoubtedly be some other Gallant who borrowed so august a Name, only to betray her, and that it was of Importance for her to be undeceived: That the Way to bring it about, was to desire him to appear before her with the same Majesty wherein he used to visit Juno; and that if he was really the Father of the Gods, he would not refuse her that mark of Affection, which would be a satisfying Discovery, and without it she could not be at Rest. Semele having followed followed the Counsel of the fictitious Beroë; and Jupiter having come to her with his Thunder, and all the Splendour of his Majesty, set the Palace on Fire, and Semele perish'd in the Flames. As she was at that Time seven Months gone with child, the God was obliged to take out of her Womb the Infant Bacchus, and bear him in his own Thigh the two Months of the Term that remained; as the Story is told by Ovid in his Metamorphoses (a); The Poet Manilius says the same (b); or if we may credit Hyginus (1) and Lucian, Mercury took him out of the Flames, and carry'd him to Nysus, who brought him up in the Caves of Mount Nysa in Arabia. Pausanias tells us that at Brention, a City of Laconia, there was another Tradition about the Death of Semele.

(1) In Bacchis.

It would seem that the Ancients had formed a Design to throw a Veil of Obscurity over the true History of this Prince's Birth and Education; for if we may believe Ovid, Ino his Aunt was his first Nurse (c): But the same Poet, not very consistent in his Narrations, says elsewhere this God was nursed by the Hyades (d): Demarchus again in the Poet Nonnus, asserts that the Hours were his Nurses. Pausanias alledges that it was a received Tradition among the People of Patras in Achaia, that Bacchus had been educated in the City of Mesatis, and that Pan and the Satyrs had laid Ambuscades for him, which

F f 3 he

(a) Inferitur femori, maternaque tempora complet. Met. l. 3.

(b) Atque iterum patrio nascentem corpore Bacchum.

(1) Fab. 179.

(c) Furtim illum primis Ino Matertera curis
Educat, inde datum Nymphæ Nyseides Antris
Occuluere suis, Lactisque alimenta dedere.

Ov. Loc. cit.

(d) Ora micans Tauri septem radiantia flammis, Navita quas Hyadas Graius ab imbre vocat,
Pars Bacchum nutritisse putat, &c.

Id. Fast. l. 5.

he had with difficulty escaped. Apollonius says Mercury, by Jupiter's Order, carry'd young Bacchus into the Island of Eubœa, and delivered him to the Care of Macris the Daughter of Aristæus, and that Juno moved with Jealousy that the Son of her Rival should be educated in an Island consecrated to her, had banish'd his young Nurse, who having retired into the Country of the Pheacians, brought him up secretly in a Cave.

Other Authors assure us that he was educated in the Island of Naxos, and several assert after Lucian, that it was in Arabia. Did these grave Authors take a Pleasure in finding out so many Nurses for a God, who was to be immortal? or rather in their fond Desire to have it believed that all the Gods were Natives of Greece, were they so blind as not to perceive the Ridicule of their own extravagant Fictions?

Be that as it will, several ancient Authors, better informed than those now quoted, among whom is Herodotus (1), Plutarch (2) and Diodorus (3), say with more Probability, that Bacchus was born in Egypt, that he was educated at Nysa, a Town in Arabia felix, whither his Father Ammon had sent him; and in a Word that he is the same with the famous Osiris who conquered the Indies. And certainly say these Authors, 'tis evident that what the Ancients report of Bacchus, can agree to none but that ancient King of Egypt: For, not to mention here his other Adventures, the Aid which he gave to Jupiter in the famous War with the Giants, which was many Ages before the Birth of Cadmus and Semele, what Relation can this have to the Theban Prince whom the Greeks give out to be the true Bacchus? And yet it is true, according to the

(1) L. 2.

(3) L. 3.

(2) Of Isis and Osiris.

the poetical Tradition, that Bacchus cloathed with the Skin of a Lyon or Tyger, gave vigorous Assistance to the Father of the Gods, and that the Giants tore him in pieces, a Circumstance which refers to the fatal Death of Osiris, slain by the Giant Typhon his Brother, as has been said in its proper Place.

Diodorus adds (1) that what may have misled the Greeks is, that the Worship of this ancient Egyptian Divinity was propagated to Greece, and had been introduced thither by Orpheus, who by adding to it several Ceremonies of his own, endeavoured so to disguise it, as not to be known, having a Design, in Honour to the Family of the Cadmeans, by whom he had been very kindly entertained, to accommodate the Fable and Ceremonies of that Egyptian Divinity, but little known in Greece to some Prince of the Family of Cadmus.

This Truth cannot be called in question, being confirmed by these two Particulars; the one is, that the Worship of Bacchus bears too great a Resemblance to that of Osiris, except in a few Ceremonies, not to be believed to be the same; the other, that it is impossible to comprehend how the Opposition which Cadmus made to the Establishment of the Worship of Bacchus, and which Ovid so fully describes, can relate to his Grandson. Would ever that Prince, who was but newly settled in Greece, where he should have endeavoured by all means to make himself popular, have set himself in Opposition to a Worship which did so much Honour to his own Family? Would he, from a false Delicacy, have risked the Loss of his Kingdom, and passing for Atheistical, by hindering one of his own Children from being rank'd among the Gods? And yet it cost him no less than

F f 4

(4) Loc. cit.

than his Crown, as also his Son Polydorus, and his Grandson Pentheus his Life, he having been torn in Pieces on Mount Citheron by the Bacchanals, who in their Fury took him for a Lion, as we are told by the Poet Nonnus (1), by Philostatus (2), Euripides (3), and Ovid (4).

But it may be objected that Cadmus and Pentheus suffered, not for having opposed the Worship of Bacchus, but the infamous Ceremonies that had crept into the Festivals which Orpheus had establish'd. I answer, it may be so ; but hence it follows not that this Worship related to the Son of Semele. Is it credible that a Grandfather in his own Life-time would see his Grandson deify'd, and his Worship establish'd in a whole Country ? There is in this no Probability, and therefore we ought to be told in plain Terms, that the Worship of Bacchus having been propagated from Egypt to Greece, Cadmus strongly remonstrated against the Abuses that began to be made of it, which occasioned his being expelled his Kingdom ; and that the Son of Semele was not deify'd till many Years after. After this manner reason those, who, after having studied Antiquity, generally find in other Countries than Greece the Origin of their Gods, whose Worship was introduced thither with the Eastern Colonies.

To give each of these Opinions the Degree of Probability that belongs to it, we must have recourse to what has been before observed as to the Plurality of Persons who bore the same Name, and distinguish several Bacchus's. Diodorus Siculus owns three of them ; the Indian, or rather the Egyptian, who made a Conquest of the Indies, surnamed the bearded Bacchus ; he who was said to be the Son of Jupiter and Proserpine, or Ceres,
who

(1) Dionys. L. 6.

(2) In Bacchis.

(3) In Pentheo.

(4) Met. L. 3.

who was represented with Horns, either because he had taught to cultivate the Ground, or because Horns were the ancient drinking Vessels, (for this Hero was the God of Wine) or in fine, to denote the Rays of the Sun, whose Symbol he was; the third and last was Bacchus the Son of Jupiter and Semele, and he it is who was commonly called the Bacchus of Thebes.

Cicero says there were five of them; the first, according to that Author, was the Son of Proserpine; the second had Nilus for his Father, and it was he who built the City Nysa; the third was the Son of Caprius, and it was he who reigned in the Indies, and was surnamed Sabazius, a Name that was given to the Festivals that were instituted to his Honour. The fourth was the Son of Jupiter and of the Moon, or Diana, and it was to him the Orphica were dedicated; the fifth, in fine, was the Son of Thyone and Nisus, and he it was that instituted the Festivals that were celebrated to him every Year (a).

This Variety of Opinions has thrown our Moderns into another Extreme; they would needs have recourse to Scripture for the Original of this Divinity, and make the fabulous Hero a Copy of those in the Bible.

Vossius has been at great Pains to prove (1) that Bacchus is Moses; and the chief Heads of the Parallel which he draws between them are these: Moses was born in Egypt, and so was Bacchus; the first was exposed upon the Nile, the Poets say the same of the second; and both of them derived their their Name from their having been preserved from perishing by Water ; for Orpheus calls Bacchus, Myfas. The latter was educated in a Mountain in Arabia called Nysa ; it was in the same Country that Moses spent forty Years. The Poet Nonnus speaks of the Flight of Bacchus towards the Waters of the Red Sea ; nothing can agree more exactly to Moses. The Army of that God, according to Diodorus, consisting of Men and Women, traversed Arabia in their way to the Indies ; that of the Legislator, full of Women and Children, pass'd the Desert in their Way to Palestine, which was in Asia. The Horns given to the fabulous God, what are they but an Allusion to the Rays of Light, which had the same Effect upon Moses's Head as two Horns ? Is not Mount Nysa the same with Syna, by the Transposition only of a single Letter ?

(a) Multos Dionysios habemus; primum Jove & Proserpina natum; secundum Nilo, qui Nysam dicitur condidisse; tertium Caprio patre, eumque Asiae regem praefuisse dicunt, cujus Sabazia sunt instituta; quartum Jove & Luna, cui sacra Orphica putantur confici; quintum Nyso natum, & Thyone, a quo trieterides constitutae putantur. Cic. L. 3. de Nat. Deor.

(1) Treatise of Idolatry.

Father Thomassin adds (1) new Arguments to support Vossius's Parallel : Bacchus, armed with his Thyrsis, defeats the Giants, according to Nonnus ; and is not Moses obliged to combat with the Sons of Anak, the Remainder of the Giants ? and his Rod is the Instrument of his Miracles. The Legislator crosses the Red Sea ; and Nonnus relates the same Miracle of a Nymph of Bacchus. Jupiter sends Isis to Bacchus to order him to go and destroy an impious Nation in the Indies ; and God orders Moses to go into Palestine to abolish the Abominations of an idolatrous People. Caleb, whose Name comes near that which signifies a Dog, was Moses's faithful Companion ; the Poets tell us that Pan gave Bacchus a Dog to accompany him in his Expeditions. Moses and Joshua stop the Course of the Sun ; Nonnus says the same of Bacchus in so many Words. The Legislator, in short, makes Streams

(1) Tom. 2. L. 1. c. 5. Lect. des Poetes.

Streams of Water gush out of a Rock ; the Conqueror, by striking the Earth with his Thyrsis, brings forth from it Torrents of Wine.

Huetius (1) is of the same Opinion, and likewise runs the Parallel between Moses and Bacchus : The learned Bochart (2) on the contrary, and after him M. le Clerc, who never departs from his Opinions, take Bacchus to be the same with Nimrod the Son of Chus, whence he got the Name of Barchus ; and both these Authors find a great deal of Resemblance between that first Conqueror and the fabulous Hero (3). Bochart shews that all the Names of Bacchus are derived from the Assyrian Language, which the Greeks adjusted to their own. Thus, according to that Author, the Worship of Bacchus began in Assyria, whence it pass'd into Phenicia and Egypt, and from thence into Greece by means of Cadmus and Melampus. This Parallel tho' striking has not however gain'd universal Approbation, and there are learned Men again who contend that Bacchus is the same with Noah, since the Invention of the Vine, which is attributed to the Greek, agrees solely to the Patriarch, as we learn from Scripture (4); and those add with Reason, that he is the first and most ancient Bacchus, and he who was the first Model of all the rest.

I grant there are some pretty similar Strokes between the Character of Moses, and that of Bacchus ; and as the Legislator of the Hebrews made himself very famous in Egypt, it may very possibly have happened that they borrowed some of those Strokes to embellish the History of Bacchus, or Dionysius ; that is to say of Osiris, who is the true Bacchus. The Worship of this Divinity was introduced

(1) Dem. Evang. p. 4.

(2) Chan. L. 1. c. 18.

(3) Comp. Hist. Univer.

(4) Gen. 4.

roduced into Greece by Cadmus's Colony ; and Semele his Daughter having had a Son who was called, or at least surnamed Bacchus, who performed some Conquests and Actions resembling those of the ancient one, hence they came in after-times to be confounded together ; and in Honour to the Family of Cadmus, his Grandson was taken into the Number of the Gods ; he had all the Worship paid to him that had been long before established among them in Honour of the ancient Bacchus, and they filled up his History with the Adventures of Osiris and other Bacchus's.

We have said enough at the End of the first Volume concerning the true Bacchus, namely Osiris, we must now relate the History of him who was his Copy ; that is, of the Prince of the Family of Cadmus, who usurped those divine Honours that had been paid long before his Time to the Prince whose Name he bore.

First of all, 'tis obvious that what gave rise to the Fable of his Birth, is, that Semele having had some Intrigue, it was thought fit for saving her Honour, to charge it upon Jupiter. Some Authors (1) say that Cadmus, offended at his Daughter, exposed her upon the Sea with her Son, that they were thrown a-shoar upon the Borders of Orcates, an ancient City of Laconia, where Semele was found dead in a kind of Coffin, where she had been shut up, and they interred her with a great deal of Magnificence. According to others, she was Thunder-struck, which, together with the Report that had been spread of her Intrigue with Jupiter, gave a Handle to the Fable which the Greeks recite to us. Diodorus Siculus adds, that this Princess was delivered of a Son in the seventh Month ; and as Children born in that Age were not thought capable to live, Cadmus gave out that Jupiter, who was

(1) Pausan.

was the Father, had lodged him in his Thigh for two Months (a) ; but asking Diodorus's Pardon, 'tis an equivocal Word that gave rise to this Fable, and it relates to the ancient Bacchus ; the same Greek Word μηρός signifies equally the Thigh, and a Mountain, Latus Montis ; thus instead of saying that Bacchus had been nursed upon Mount Nysa, his Father Ammon having sent him to some Peasants to screen him from the Jealousy of his Wife (b), they added this Circumstance to the Greek, who was a Copy of the other, and said he had been carried in Jupiter's Thigh : When two Meanings came in Competition, the Greeks always preferred the marvellous. Bochart, who has strain'd hard to find in the Phenician, or Hebrew Language a Key to all the Fables, alledges this to have taken its rise from that Phrase so frequent in Scripture, natus ex femore.

The Greek and Latin Authors say, the Theban Bacchus travelled into the Indies with an Army composed of Men and Women, but we have shewed in the first Volume, that this Expedition respected the ancient Bacchus or Osiris. For in fact the Grandson of Cadmus never left Greece, and he became more famous by the Usurpation of the Worship of the ancient Osiris, than by those pretended Conquests, which are mentioned by no ancient Historian before Megasthenes, who was the first that trumped up this Fable to flatter Alexander who took that Heroe for his Model, as Quintus Curtius often remarks. Further, it was the Custom of the *Oriental*s, and not of the Greeks, to carry Women in their Armies ; and this Circumstance refers to

Osiris

(a) From this Circumstance they took Occasion to represent Jupiter in Child-bed, attended by those Goddesses who assisted at Child-bearing, as you have it in Pliny, L. 35.

(b) Which made it be said that he had been nursed by Nymphs in the Cave which Homer speaks of.

Osiris particularly rather than to any other Prince, since, as Diodorus remarks, he carry'd about a great Number of musick Women, and a Kind of ambulatory Seraglio ; but we have no Proof that the Greek Bacchus ever carry'd his Armies into Asia.

As Bacchus had won the Affections of the People among whom he travelled ; having made it his Business to improve their Minds, and taught them the Art of planting the Vine, so he was honoured as a God even in his Life-time. One Eleutherus according to Hyginus (1), was the first who erected a Statue to him, and who taught in what Manner he was to be worship'd. All the Nations of India among whom he travelled, decreed divine Honours to him ; and none but the barbarous Scythians refused to worship a God, who had found out the Use of a Drink which frequently levelled Men with the Beasts.

Greece afterwards refined upon the Ceremonies of the Indians and Egyptians, and claim'd Bacchus as one of her greatest Divinities. She instituted to the Honour of her Heroe those tumultuous Feasts, where the Bacchanals, to celebrate the Memory of his Conquests, run up and down with their Hair desheveled, making the Air resound with the Noise of their Tabrets, and crying Evobe Bacche. The Chief of these Festivals was that which they celebrated every third Year (a), to intimate that he had employed all that Time in the Conquest of the Indies. I shall not undertake to give any fuller Description of them ; it suffices to observe that several Obscenities were intermixed with them ; there they carry'd about a Phallus, in Imitation of that which Isis had consecrated to Osiris ; tho' the Greek

(1) Fab. 225.

(a) Named Trietelia. See Dicdor. L. 4.

Greek Authors, who would needs prove upon all Occasions that the Gods and their Worship had taken rise in their Country, have invented another Reason of the Institution of this Ceremony, namely, that when the People of Attica would not embrace the Worship of Bacchus, this God had afflicted them with a scandalous Disease, and that in order to appease him they were obliged to consecrate the Representation of those Parts upon which the Vengeance of the God had fallen.

'Tis proper to explain here in a few Words the different Names that are given to this Divinity. First, 'tis very probable that the Name of Bacchus was given him upon Account of the Lamentations and Howlings of the Bacchanals. Hesychius expressly says so (a). He was called Bimater, to denote that he had in a Manner two Mothers. Dionysius, in Allusion to the God who was his Father, and to Mount Nysa where he was educated (b). Liber, because Wine enlarges and exhilarates the Heart. Bromius, from the Noise of the Bacchanals (c). Liceus, because he drives away Care. Evan, from the Ivy that was consecrated to him. Læneus, or Torcularius, because he invented the Use of the Wine-press; and 'tis for the same Reason that he was termed Sabassius, as may be seen in Bochart (1).

Biformis, because he was sometimes represented like an Infant, sometimes like a bearded Man. Triambes, because he had triumph'd three times. Euge Fili, because having transformed himself into a Lion to defend his Father against the Giants, that God had animated

(a) Βακχὸν κλαυθρὸν ποίνετες, as also Eustathius who derives the Word ὑπὸ τῷ Βαχεῖν, Ululare, incondite clamare.

(b) As you would say Δίος καὶ νύστα.

(c) This Word signifies roaring.

(1) Chan. L. 1.

animated him by these Words : Euge Fili, Evobe Bacche, well done my Son Bacchus :

That of Thyonæus is given him by Horace, because according to Diodorus and Hesychius, there was one Bacchus the Son of Thyone, as we have said but a little ago ; tho' some Authors, quoted by Lyllo Gyraldi (1) give other Reasons for it.

That of Ditbyrambus, if we may credit Diodorus, Origen, and Eusebius comes from the Fable which imports that when the Giants had cut Bacchus in Pieces, his Mother Ceres collected his dissipated Members, and restored him to Life.

He takes the Name of Meliastes, from a Fountain of this Name, near which the Orgies were celebrated. That of Psilas was given him, if we may believe Pausanias (2), by the Amycleans, from the Word Pfila, which, in the Dorick Dialect, signifies the Tip of the Wing of a Fowl, to intimate that Man is carried away and born up by Wine, just as a Bird in the Air upon its Wings ; and this Denomination is extremely ingenious. That of Bicorniger, from the Horns which he sometimes wears, the Symbols of the Beams of the Sun which this God represented. That of Corymbifer, in Allusion to the Ivy Branches, named Corymbi, wherewith his Crown was sometimes garnish'd.

The same God had several other Names, derived either from the Places where he was worship'd, or from some Ceremonies of his Worship. Ovid has drawn together some of them in his Metamorphoses (a).

Several

(1) Synt. 8.

(2) In Lacon. c. 19.

(a) Thuraque dant, Bacchumque vocant, Bromiumque, Liæumque, Ignigenamque, Satumque iterum, Solumque Bimatrem.

Additur his Nyseus, Indetonfusque Thyoneus ;

Et cum Læneo genialis Confitor uvæ,

Nycteliusque, Eleleusque parens, & Iacchus & Evan,

Et quæ præterea per Graias plurima gentes

Nomina Liber habet.

Met. L. 4.

Several Names were also given the Women who celebrated his Festivals ; they were called Bacchantes, from the Howlings and Noise which they made : Mimallonides, because they prattled with an unbounded freedom, and Thyades, because heated with Wine they roam'd about like mad (1).

The whole of Bacchus's Army, both Men and Women, were armed with Thyrsus's. The Thyrsus, was a small Arrow wrap'd about with Vine and Ivy-branches, which covered its Point. The Poets attributed to it surprizing Virtues. A Bacchanal, as Euripides has it, having struck the Ground with what he carried, there sprung up forthwith a Fountain of living Water, and another, says the same Author, made a Spring of Wine bubble up in the same Manner.

The Greeks added other Fables to the History of Bacchus, which 'tis necessary to explain. When Diodorus Siculus (2), and Plutarch (3), say Bacchus went down to Hell from thence to fetch back his Mother, 'tis probable they designed by it some piece of Necromancy which Bacchus performed in calling up Semele's Ghost, or rather they meant his Deification of her, having, as we may say, translated her from Hell to place her in Heaven, where she was taken into the Number of the Goddesses under the Name of Thyoné. Pausanias says Bacchus went down to Hell near the Alcionian Lake, which is in the Neighbourhood of Lerna, that one Polymnus had pointed out the Way to him ; because in all Probability Bacchus had employed him in performing the Evocation, or the Apotheosis of his Mother (4).

VOL. II.

G g & H h

Other

(1) See Bochart. Cha. l. 1. c. 18.

(2) L. 4.

(3) De Serz Num. Vindicta.

(4) The Ancients intermix this Fable with such ugly Circumstances as I am obliged in Modesty to suppress.

Other Authors add with Ovid, that Bacchus transform'd into Dolphins the Mariners who had attempted to carry her off (1); and this Fable has no other Foundation but the Adventure which befel some Phenician Merchants, who as they were carrying Wine into Italy were shipwrack'd, or rather if we may credit Bochart, because these Merchants who were Tyrians, had upon their Ship the Figure of a Sea-fish, Tursis, a Sea-hog (a) whose Name resembled theirs; which gave a Handle to say that they had been transform'd into Dolphins: On which 'tis proper to remark that the Poets drew together into the History of one and the same Person, Events that happened at very distant Periods of Time.

The Poet whom I have now named, says also that Bacchus transform'd the Mineides into Bats, for having wrought on the Day of his Festival (b). The Meaning probably is that some young Theban Ladies of Note having shewed their Contempt of the Worship of Bacchus, a strict Search was made for them, and when they could not be found, or rather when the Priests had made secretly away with them, it was given out that Bacchus had transform'd them into those Birds that are so careful to hide themselves. These pretended Punishments of Pentheus, the Mariners, Mineides and Lycurgus, made Bacchus pass for a very revengeful Divinity, and the Priests did not fail to improve these Stories to make his Worship more venerable.

The Fable of this Lycurgus is thus related in Homer.

Not

(1) Ov. Met. l. 4. & Philostr.

(a) The Sea-hog and the Dolphin have a great Resemblance to one another.

(b) — — — — Mineia proles

Urget opus, spernitque Deum, festumque profanat.

Ovid. Met. L. 3.

Not long Lycurgus view'd the golden Light,
That daring Man who mix'd with Gods in fight;
Bacchus, and Bacchus' Votaries, he drove
With brandish'd Steel from Nyssa's sacred Grove,
Their consecrated Spears lay scatter'd round,
With curling Vines and twisted Ivy bound;
While Bacchus headlong fought the briny Flood,
And Thetis' Arms receiv'd the trembling God.
Nor fail'd the Crime th' immortals Wrath to move,
(Th' immortals blest with endless Ease above)
Depriv'd of Sight by their avenging Doom,
Chearless he breath'd, and wander'd in the Gloom:
Then sunk unpity'd to the dire Abodes,
A Wretch accurst, and hated by the Gods!

Pope's Iliad. 6. 161.

The Explication which Father Hardouin gives of this Fable in his Apology for Homer (1), to me appeared ingenious. Lycurgus, says he, is a Prince who forbids the Use of Wine to his Subjects. He is called a Lycurgus who does Wolf-like Actions, λύκε ἔργα, who ravages the Country, and makes such Havock as the Wolves. He was the Son of Dryas; that is to say, he was pitiless, had a Heart as hard as an Oak, which the Greeks call δρῦς. The Nurses of Bacchus, who is a celestial God, say they, because Wine is the Product of a Heaven, or of a temperate Climate; these Nurses, or these Vineyards, forthwith threw down their Thyrus's, that is the Vine-sets or Stocks, that were rooted up. As it was also to be feared, that he would destroy the Wine in the Cellars, this was offered to Tethys; that is, it was sold to the Sea-Officers who gave it a very kindly Reception. Jupiter, or Destiny, struck him blind after this; that is to say, it happened in Fact that Lycurgus died at Length, and at Death we loss Sight and Life. He was hated by the Gods; that is, he had not any one good Quality.

G g 2

at

Plutarch relating this Fable has not been at the Pains to refine so much upon it. This Author informs us only that Lycurgus having attempted to pluck up the Vines that were in Thrace, where he reigned, and having put his own Hand to the Work, cut off his two Limbs, which was look'd upon as the Effect of the Vengeance of the Gods.

I forgot to take Notice that the Panther was consecrated to Bacchus, either because that Animal is very hot, which agrees to Wine; or because Bacchus being the Osiris of the Egyptians, who was the Symbol of the Sun, the Panther by his Spots figured the Stars, as some Authors are of Opinion (1); or rather because the Skin of this Animal was worn by that Heroe, according to the Usage of those early Times.

He was represented sometimes as a young Man, to denote the Joy of Feasts (a), sometimes as an old Man, to teach us that Wine taken immoderately consumes the Health, and makes us talkative like old Men, and incapable of keeping any Secret. The Magpie was consecrated to him, because in Triumphs whereof he was the Inventor, People were permitted to speak with an unbounded Licence, and even to insult over the Vanquishers, by upbraiding them with their Faults, as we learn from Suetonius on Occasion of Cæsar's Triumph.

Thus it is that the Egyptians had allegorized this History; it was their Genius, and their whole Theology was full of such Symbols. But the Greeks,

(1) Lect. des Poët.

(a) Tu puer æternus, tu formosissimus alto
Conspiceris Cælo.

Ovid. Met. L. 4.

Greeks, who did not understand it, and who would not see that whatever they related of Bacchus had a Reference to Wine, or to the Sun, whereof that God was the Symbol, had no other Resourse for explaining it but their own Fables. They say'd, for Example, that he had Horns given him, because Ceres whom Jupiter had debauched, brought forth a Son under the Figure of a Bull; that he was crowned with Leaves of the Fig-tree, because the Nymph Syca, whose Name imports a Fig-tree, and with whom Bacchus was in Love, had been transformed into that Tree. 'Twas for the same Reason they fabled that the Vine and the Ivy were consecrated to him, because the Nymph Staphyla and the young Cisson, had been transformed into those Plants; and so of the Rest.

I have no mind to explain all the Figures, Bas-reliefs and Intaglios of Bacchus which we have now remaining. There are few Pagan Divinities of whom Time has transmitted to us a greater Number of Representations, and we may consult to this effect the Antiquaries, and especially Montfaucon, who has faithfully collected them. But because there are some of them that, by the Symbols they bear, serve exceedingly to illustrate the History of this God, 'tis proper that I take a cursory View of them.

He is commonly represented like a young Man, without a Beard, tho' there is likewise the bearded Bacchus: Oft times even like an Infant crowned with Ivy or Vine Leaves; and, according to Pliny, he is the first of the Gods who wore a Crown, holding the Thyrsus in one Hand, a Cluster of Grapes in the other, and sometimes a Horn, which was a drinking Vessel. A fine earthen Vase publish'd by Spon (1), represents to us Mer- cury giving the young Bacchus to a Nymph whom this Author takes to be Leucothoe. But how shall we find this out, considering what Variety there is among the Ancients with Respect to the Education of this God? 'Tis true Lucian says Bacchus after his Birth was carry'd by Mercury to Nysa, to be educated by the Nymph of the Place; but there are other ancients who assure us that he was educated at Melatis, or in the Island of Eubœa, or at Naxos.

(1) Miscel. Erud. Ant.

Sometimes he was represented naked, sometimes his Shoulders covered with a Panther's Skin, and sometimes riding upon the Shoulders of Pan, or in the Arms of Silenus, who according to Nicander of Colophon, was his Foster Father. You see him also seated upon a celestial Globe bespangled with Stars, and then he is the Sun or Osiris; as also when he appears with Arrows, which Figure the Rays of that Luminary, as he is to be seen upon a Medal of Maronea, a City, according to Diodorus Siculus, built by Maro, the Companion of Osiris, whom I have spoke of in the first Volume (1).

The Symbols which most commonly accompany this God, are the Thyrsus, the Ivy, the Vine Leaves, Clusters of Grapes, the Skin of the Goat, or Leopard, or Panther or Lion.

The Figure of Bacchus surnamed Esymnetus, which Beger says is upon an Intaglio, and M. Vailant, upon a Medal, contains a Passage of History which I ought not to omit. Pausanias (2) tells us that the Greeks having, after the Siege of Troy, divided the Spoils, Erypilus had in his Lot a Coffer wherein was a Statue of Bacchus, by the Hand of Vulcan, which Jupiter had given to Dardanus; and that Erypilus having opened the

(1) Hist. of Osiris.

(2) In Achaic.

the Coffin and cast his Eyes upon this Statue became delirious. In one of his lucid Intervals, he went to consult the Oracle of Delphos, which answered him that he was to stop in a Place where he found People ready to offer a barbarous Sacrifice, there deposite the Coffin and fix his Residence. Erypilus upon his Return to the Place where his Ship was, reimbarks, and giving himself up to the Mercy of the Winds, arrives upon the Coast of Patras, where having landed at a Time when they were going to sacrifice a young Man and a young Virgin to Diana Triclaria, according to the Custom of the Country, he presented himself with the Coffin: Those of the Country persuaded that there was some Divinity within it, interrupted the Sacrifice, and received the Prince, who was in that Moment cured of his Madness. There Erypilus fixed his Residence, and after his Death the Inhabitants of the Country paid high Honours to him, and celebrated every Year the Anniversary of his Death. They instituted likewise an annual Festival in Honour of the God who was shut up in the Coffin, whom they called Bacchus Esymnetus.

Among the Monuments of Bacchus now extant, the finest are those that represent his Marriage with Ariadne, whom Theseus, as shall be said in his History, had left in the Island of Naxos. This Ceremony is engraved upon a Stone of inestimable Value, which is called Michel Angelo's Seal, which is in the King's Cabinet, and has been designed at large by Mr. Hay. But a Bas-relief of the Villa Montalte, represents this Ceremony yet more particularly. In a Chariot drawn by Centaurs, are Bacchus and Ariadne; their Train of Attendants is magnificent. First, you see Players upon Pipes and Timbrals, of both Sexes, who appear upon the Head of the Procession; an Elephant that comes after, figures the Conquest of the Indies; he is bound with a Fillet like the Victims doom'd for Sacrifice. Silenus riding upon an Ass, and drunk as his Way was, comes next accompany'd by Fawns, Satires and Nymphs, who are bearing Pots, drinking Vessels, Vine Branches, Bunches of Grapes, and Thyrus's.

Those two Monuments, representing the Triumph of this God after the Conquest of the Indies, are also very Magnificent. There the God appears in a Chariot drawn by Lions or Panthers. As the Chariot is followed with all the Pageants that accompany'd the Festivals of this God, which were term'd Trieterides, and as the other now mentioned belongs to the Orgies, I shall give a Description of these two Festivals which at first I thought to have omitted.

As Bacchus had been three Years in conquering, or rather traversing the Indies, so the Trieterica were celebrated, alter a Revolution of two Years, in the third Year; and it was the Opinion, that during the Celebration of this Solemnity, Bacchus came in Person, and conversed with Men. This Festival was celebrated by the Matrons and Virgins, like the other Mysteries of this God. The Virgins, who carried the Thyrus's, appeared to be acted with Enthusiasm, as well as the Matrons, who parted into Bands, run loose and dishevelled with terrible Grimaces and Contorsions, tossing their Heads in a frightful manner, and in every thing resembling mad Women. They made a great Noise with their Drums and Cymbals, and bawling out, Evobe Bacche. This horrid Procession was accompanied with vile Representations; the Night, which was the Time employ'd in this Festival, concealed at least the Abominations that were there committed. It was at one of these Festivals, to mention it by the by, that the Bacchanals, whose Fury is so well described by Ovid (1), tore in Pieces the unfortunate Pentheus, who attempted to restrain the Abuses that were committed at the Celebration of this Solemnity.
whose

Tho' by the Orgies are sometimes Orgies, their to be understood Sacrifices, not those Origin. only that were offered to Bacchus, but also to other Gods, yet the Word was more particularly apply'd to the Festivals of that Name, which were likewise called the Mysteries. Greece had three Solemnities of this Name, those of Bacchus, those of Cybele, and those of Ceres; and each of them had many Ceremonies peculiar to itself. I am only to speak now of the Orgies of Bacchus, and I shall briefly examine into their Original, their Extent, their Ceremonies; what was signified by the Symbols that were there employed, and how long these infamous Mysteries continued.

That the Orgies derived their Original from Egypt, is a Fact equally agreed to by both Mythologists and Antiquaries, which therefore needs not to be proved; and they owe their Institution to Isis, who having recovered the dissipated Members of her Husband, murdered by the Conspirators, at whose Head was Typhon his Brother; and not being able to find his manly Parts, which the Fishes of the Nile had devoured, consecrated the Representation of them, which the Priests in after-times carried about in the Festivals instituted in Honour of that Prince. This is the true Origin of the Phallus, or Ithyphallus, which made a Part of the Ceremonies of the Orgies. That Orpheus and Melampus, in their Travels to Egypt, had seen the Festivals of Osiris celebrated, and introduced them into Greece, where they were received, as all the other Festivals, those especially where
Lewdness

(1) Met. L. 4.

Lewdness and Libertinism reign with the greatest Impunity ; this is a second Fact yet more agreed to : Only 'tis a Mistake to ascribe their Origin to Orpheus and Melampus which would confound the Orgies with the Thesmophoria, (tho' these had a great Resemblance to the other, and Bacchus was mentioned there too) since Herodotus tells us (1), that the Orgies were introduced into Greece by Danaus and his Daughters, long before the Birth of Orpheus and Melampus. In fine, that Bacchus, in Honour of whom the Orgies were celebrated, is the same with Osiris, is a Truth not controverted.

The Celebration of the Orgies was not confined to Greece, this Festival was soon diffused thro' almost the whole Pagan World. It was undoubtedly the same that was celebrated by the Moabites, the Midianites, and some other neighbouring Nations, in Honour of Baal-Phegor, that Idol of Nakedness, as he is called by Isidorus, who was the same with Priapus ; and he again the same with Osiris, and honoured with the same Ceremonies.

From Greece they passed into Phrygia, whither Orpheus is thought to have introduced the Use of them in the Time of Laomedon (2) ; and that small Coffer, or Basket, which Erypilus had for his Lot, is a Proof that the Trojans celebrated this Festival, whereof that mysterious Basket, as shall be seen in the Sequel, made a considerable Part.

That the Knowledge of the Orgies was brought into Italy, either by the Arcadians, when they planted a Colony in Latium, or by Eneas himself with his Trojans, is what I have no Occasion to examine ; but certain it is, that these Festivals were known there from the earliest Periods of Time, and that they were celebrated there with a great deal deal of Solemnity. 'Tis not my Design to go over all the Countries where they were received and celebrated under different Names (a); you may find a Detail of them in Father Panel's Treatise of Cistophori.

(1) L. 2.

(2) Lact. de fals. Rel. l. 1. c. 22.

At first the Orgies were not charged with many Ceremonies: There was only carried in Procession a Pitcher of Wine, with a Branch of the Vine; then followed the He-goat, which they sacrificed as an Animal hateful to Bacchus, whose Vines he ravaged; then appeared the mysterious Coffin or Basket, which was followed by those who carried the Phallus; but this primitive Simplicity did not last long, and Luxury, which introduced Riches, infected also the religious Ceremonies. On the Day set apart for this Solemnity, Men and Women crown'd with Ivy, with their Hair dishevelled, and their Bodies almost naked, run thro' the Streets, crying out as delirious, Evohe Bacche, &c. In the midst of this Gang were to be seen People drunk, dress'd like Satyrs, Fauns, and Silenus's, making Grimaces and Contorsions; where so little Regard was had to Modesty, that it would be quite shameful to attempt a Description of them. Followed next a Company mounted upon Asses, which was attended with Fauns, Bacchanals, Thyades, Mimalonides, Naiads, Nymphs and Tityri, or Shepherds; who made the whole City re-echo to their Shrieks and Howlings. After this tumultuous Herd were carried the Statues of Victory, and Altars in form of Vine-sets crown'd with Ivy, smoking with Incense, and other Aromaticks: Then appeared several Chariots loaded with Thyrus's, Arms, Garlands, Casks, Pitchers, and other Vases, Tripods and Vans. The Chariots were followed by young Virgins, who carried the Baskets and little Boxes, wherein wherein was contained the most mysterious Circumstance of this Festival, and for that reason they were called Cistophoræ. The Phallophori followed them with a Chorus of Ityphallophori habited like Fauns, counterfeiting Persons drunk, and singing in Honour of Bacchus Songs suitable to their Functions. This Procession was closed by a Troop of Bacchanals, crowned with Ivy interwoven with Branches of Yew, and with Serpents.

(a) Apateria, Lencea, Anthesteria, Phallophoria, Liberalia, Brannonia, Sabazia, and Numbers of others.

In some of these Festivals, which were the same, only under other Names, naked Women whip'd themselves, others tore their Skin. But let us draw the Curtain over these Obscenities ; only we may take notice, that on those Festival-days all Crimes were committed, which Drunkenness, Example, Impunity, and the most uncontrouled Licentiousness can encourage. After this, who would not blush to see even a Queen, Olympia, celebrating those scandalous Mysteries.

For understanding the Meaning of all the Circumstances of this Festival, and of the Symbols that were therein exhibited, it suffices to reflect upon what has been said in the first Volume concerning Osiris, the same with Bacchus, and his Expedition to the Indies, whereof the Orgies were a Commemoration. That Prince had taken along with him Women, Musicians of both Sexes, Satyrs, Fauns, &c. that is to say, Men equip'd like Fauns and Satyrs ; and this is what was represented by these Bacchanals, and the other female Enthusiasts above-mentioned ; by the Silenus's, the Satyrs, and the rest of that mad Gang ; by those Quires of Musick, those Songs, Shrieks and Howlings.

The Ivy that was used in all the Parts of the Ceremony, was especially consecrated to Bacchus, for which the Mythologists give several Reasons ; among others, the Metamorphosis of young Cisson, who having lost his Life in the Fury of one of these Festivals; was transformed into Ivy; but the true Reason is, that this Plant, always green, signified the Youth of Bacchus, who was said never to wax old; that is to say, the State of the Sun permanent in his Strength and fructifying Virtue.
who

The Serpents, which twined about the mysterious Basket, and were wore by several of those who joined in the Festival, either by way of Shoulder-belts, or otherwise, being Animals whose Youth is renewed every Year, at changing their Slough, were Emblems of the same Import.

The infamous Representation of the Phallus kept up the Remembrance of that which Isis had consecrated, as has been said. As for the Van, which Virgil calls Bacchus's mystical Van (a), I am persuaded we need seek for no other Mystery in it, but that it was intended to be an Emblem of that Prince's having taught the Art of Agriculture, and the manner of cleansing the Corn.

The Bow and Arrows that were carried in this Solemnity figured, that to mild Measures Osiris had added Force in the Conquest of the Indies. On this likewise depends the true Signification of the Thyrus; for we are told that the Women, whom this Prince had carried with him, attack'd the Indians with that Instrument, who were not upon their guard against it; observing only the Ivy and the Vine-Leaves, which covered real Pikes.

As one Part of the Solemnity of the Orgies was celebrated in the Night-time, whence Bacchus had got the Name of Nyctileus, no wonder that that they bore lighted Torches in the Procession which we have now described : We are only to remark, that the Function of the Daduchi, that is, of the Torch-bearers, was the most honourable of all.

(a) ————Mystica Vannus Jacchi.

Georg. L. 3.

The Caduceus, which was also exhibited there at Times, intimated that Bacchus had always preferred Peace to War ; and that in the Conquest of the Indies he had not employed Arms, till he had in vain tried all mild Methods to subdue an untractable People. This is the Reason why the Ancients give that God the Caduceus as well as Mercury. They added too, that it was he had reconciled Jupiter to Juno, at the time of their greatest Difference.

Antiquaries think some of those Medals called Cistophori, exhibit the Figure of the Plant named Ferula, which is a sort of Cane very light and full of Pith, as we have said in the History of Prometheus ; and if they carried it in the Solemnity of the Orgies, it was to point out that Osiris, who was reckoned the Inventor of Medicine, had prepared some Medicaments of that Plant, which Pliny reckons to be very salutary. For what is alledged by some of the Ancients, that he had commanded Arrows to be made of that Cane, whose Lightness might hinder them from doing much Mischief, relates to the Times when he was at Peace.

In fine, of all the Symbols that accompanied this Solemnity, none remains to be explained but the mysterious Basket : But here I must imitate the Silence of the Ancients, who, whenever they came to speak of what that Basket contained, checked themselves, from a Principle of religious Veneration. I am indeed of Opinion, that Clemens Alexandrinus, whose Business it was to detect the Abominations of Paganism, ought not to have shewed shewed the same Reserve; but it is a Question whether he himself was well informed as to what was contained in that Box.

Debauchery, Lewdness, and Prostitution being carried to the greatest Extremity, it was thought convenient at last, tho' somewhat late, to put a stop to their Progress. Cicero (1) informs us that Diagondas abolished these infamous Festivals at Thebes; and under the Consulship of Posthumius, the Year of Rome five hundred and sixty-eight, was published that famous Decree of the Senate which interdicted them. This Edict, which threatened Death to those who should celebrate them for the future, was published and promulged through the whole Empire, with all the Solemnity requisite in such a Case. It was dug up about sixty or fourscore Years ago, engraved upon a Table of Brass, published by Fabretti, but with several Faults. At last a Modern copied and explained it with more Correctness, as may be seen in the eighth Volume of the Bibliotheca Italica.

Such scandalous Rites ought long ago to have been buried in Oblivion; but great Care was taken to perpetuate their Memory; for besides the Historians and Poets, who make frequent mention of them, Medals of them were struck by publick Authority, and Monuments erected that kept them in Remembrance: These Medals are called Cistophori, because there you see the Figure of the Coffer, with the Serpents around, or coming out of it. As for the Monuments, they represent the whole Pomp of these Festivals, and there you see Bacchus, the Bacchanals, the Menades, the Players on Flutes, Matrons and Virgins, with the Crotalum lum and Tympanum ; Fauns, Satyrs, holding in their Hands Vases and Cups ; Priests leading the Victims destined for the Sacrifice, such as the Boar , the He-goat, the Bull, &c. and last of all the old Silenus quite drunk, upon his Ass, which he is hardly able to manage.

(1) De Leg. 2.

B O O K II.

MYTHOLOGY and FABLES

Explain'd by

HISTORY.

B O O K II.

Of the Gods of the Sea, the Rivers, and Fountains.

THE Waters occupy too considerable a Part in the Globe, to have been left without tutelary Deities ; this perhaps is the Part of the World over which Paganism had established the greatest Number : The Ocean, the Seas, the Rivers, the Floods, the Fountains, the Streams, the Lakes, and all the other Collections of Water, had their particular Gods ; the Water itself was reckoned a Divinity, and had a religious Worship paid to it ; this is what I shall endeavour to prove in the following Chapter.

C H A P. I.

Of the Worship paid to the Water, and of the Causes of its Institution.

IF the Exigencies of Life made Numbers of Gods to be invented, and led the first Pagans to deify almost all the Parts of the World, especially the four Elements, the Water had a Title to be one of their first Divinities, since the antient Philosophy, the Principles whereof Thales fetched from Egypt, and propagated them afterwards in Greece, taught that it was the first Principle of all Things; that it had the greatest Share in the Production of Bodies; that it made Nature fruitful, nourished the Plants and Trees; and that were it not for this, the Earth, quite withered, parched, and burnt up, would be a sterile Mass, and exhibit only a frightful Desert: But before we go any further, we must call to Mind what we have said of the physical or natural Gods, and of the animated Gods. The Water, as an Element, could only be a physical Divinity; but those Gods were seldom left without joining to them animated ones, who became their Symbols, as Osiris, Orus, and Isis, among the Egyptians, and Apollo and Diana among the Greeks, became the Symbols of the Sun and Moon.

The Worship which was paid to these Divinities came to be confounded, nor was the Distinction any longer kept up between the natural Gods and those that were called animated. Just so it was with the Water: The Ocean, the Seas, the Rivers, &c. became the Objects of religious Worship; but Nephtune was reckoned an animated God, who presided over them: The Case was the same with every Flood and Fountain, and every other Mass of Water, that had each a particular Divinity, or a Nymph, or Naiad, and the Honours that were paid to the Water in general, were afterwards blended with those that that were paid to the representative Divinities of the Water.

That the Water, as an Element, received divine Honours, is a Fact that cannot be controverted. We have seen, in the seventh Book, what Herodotus says of the Veneration which the antient Persians had for it, the Sacrifices which they offered to it, and that they carried Superstition so far, as not to dare to spit, to blow their Noses, or wash their Hands in it, let fall, or throw any Ordure into it, nor even make use of it for quenching their Fire. Strabo, on this Occasion, gives much the same Account with Herodotus, only he attributes to the Cappadocians what the other ascribes to the Persians.

Saint Cyril (1) says the Persians did not indeed pay divine Honours to Stocks and Stones, like the Greeks, nor did they worship the Ibis and Ichneumon, with the Egyptians, but they adored only the Fire and Water.

Tho' the Egyptians had a peculiar Reason for having the Sea in Abhorrence, because they believed it represented Typhon, yet they had not therefore the less Veneration for Water. Saint Athanasius, who, as he was born in Egypt, must needs have been acquainted with the Religion of his Country, after having said (2) in general, the Pagans adored the Water, adds, the Egyptians especially were distinguished in the Worship which they paid to that Element, which they looked upon as a Divinity.

Julius Firmicus (3) asserts the same; the Egyptians, says he, pay a religious Worship to the Water, and address their Prayers and Vows to it. The Water of the Nile above all was held by them in high Veneration: That beneficial River, to which they gave the Name of Oceanus, Xpeus, and Nilus, was also called Siris, which, by Abbreviation, is the same Name with Osiris, because in Reality it represented that God; for, as has been said more than once, the same God was the Symbol of several Things at once; thus Osiris, who in the Heavens represented the Sun, on Earth denoted the Waters of the Nile. Without this Distinction, we shall never understand the Pagan Theology; but ther, so soon as we adopt it, we must be persuaded that the Nile was the great Divinity of the Egyptians.

(1) Adv. Jul. (2) Orat. contra Gentes. (3) De Er. Prof. Rel.

In the first Volume, we have taken Notice that the Egyptians represented the God of the Water by a Vase perforated on all Sides, which they called Hydria; and we mentioned at the same Time the Victory which that God had gained over the Fire, which was the great Divinity of the Persians. I shall add here, that according to Vitruvius (1), the Priests upon certain Days filled that Vase with Water, adorned it with great Magnificence, and then placed it upon a kind of publick Theatre, where all prostrated themselves before the Vase, with Hands lifted up to Heaven, and gave Thanks to the Gods for the Benefits they received from this Element. The Intention of this Ceremony was to teach the Egyptians that Water was the Principle of all Things, and had communicated Life and Motion to every Thing that breathes.

But among that People Water, by way of Eminence, was the Nile, and to it was referred all the Veneration which they had for this Element. Indeed never was River so useful nor so necessary as that is, since besides the Goodness of its Water, which is a drink both salutary and delicious, its periodical Overflowings render Egypt one of the most fertile Countries in the World; which, were it not for that, would be one of the most barren and desert. The same Fruitfulness it communicates to Women, and to all Animals; and 'tis no rare Thing, in that Country, to see Ews that have brought forth some two, some three Lambs, Goats that suckle three or four Kids, and so others; and here, if any Thing among Men, who have not Knowledge to of the the Honour of all that is in Nature, to him who created the same for our Use, had a Title to great and lively Acknowledgments even of Homage, 'tis undoubtedly so beneficial a River: Accordingly nothing could surpass the Respect and Veneration which the Egyptians had for it.

(1) Lib. 8.

But of all the Festivals they celebrated in honour of this River, that of opening the Canals at the Times of its swelling, was the most solemn and magnificent. I shall not enter at present into the Description of this Festival, at which the antient Kings of Egypt assisted in Person, accompanied by their Ministers, by all the Grandees of the Kingdom, and by an innumerable Multitude of People; you may consult the Travellers, (a) who in this Article have entred into a most curious and particular Detail; and confining myself to what immediately relates to my Subject, I shall only say, that by way of Thanks before hand to the River for the Benefits which the overflowing was to produce, they used to throw into it in the Form of Sacrifice, Barley, Corn, Sugar, and other Fruits. What was practised at Memphis, upon the opening of the Canal, was in like Manner proportionally performed in the Provinces; and we may say that the Season of cutting the Nile, so it is called in the Country, was a general Festival thro' all Egypt.

But as Superstition knows no Bounds, they stained with Blood, and that in the most cruel Manner, a Day that seemed to breathe nothing but Joy, by the Sacrifice of a young Virgin whom they drowned in this River: A barbarous Custom, which lasted a very long Time, and was so difficult to be abolish'd, that nothing would satisfy the People, when this Sacrifice came to be absolutely prohibited, but to sacrifice at least the Representation of a young Person.

This Festival still continues, tho' the Avarice of the Bashaws makes it less solemn; the same Liba-

(a) See the third Voyage of Paul Lucas; the Description of this Festival given by M. de Maillet and other Travellers.

tions are performed to the Nile, with Offerings of Fruits and Pulses; and the Priests called Coptes, the most ignorant of all Mortals, think they sanctify it, by throwing into it some Beads, or some Bits of a Cross. The same Egyptians paid also a religious Worship to the Water, under the Symbol of their God Canopus, who represented that Element; but I shall add nothing here to what I have said of him in the History of the Gods of that People (1).

The Indians, we know, paid high Tributes of Adoration to the Ganges, whose Waters, to which they attributed signal Virtues, were reckoned by them holy and sacred: Their Superstition in this Respect continues still, and the Princes who reign upon the Banks of that River, well know how to make Gain of it, by making their Subjects buy the Permission to draw Water from the River, or to bathe themselves in it.

The Worship paid to Water was not long confin'd to Persia and Egypt, but was very soon propagated, like the other Superstitions of the oriental Nations, to the neighbouring Countries. Maximus Tyrius informs us, that the People on the North-side of the Euxine Sea, paid a religious Worship to the Palus Meotis, whereof they had Statues, by which they used to swear.

Vossius (2), who has treated this Article with his usual Erudition, asserts the same of the antient Germans, and some other Nations, as may be seen in his learned Work upon the Origin and Progress of Idolatry.

'Tis well known that the Antients offered frequent Libations to the Ocean, to the Seas, and Rivers, and that they hardly ever embarked till they had first performed Sacrifices to the Waters, and to the Divinities who presided over the same; of this I might quote Numbers of Examples, but shall content myself with that of the Argonauts. When they were ready

(1) V. 3. B. 6. (2) De Orig. & Prog. Idol.

ready to set sail, Jason (1) ordered a solemn Sacrifice in order to propitiate the Divinities of the Sea; every one was impatient to comply with the Commands of his Leader, they raised an Altar upon the Sea-shore, and after the usual Oblations, the Priests poured out Flour, mixed with Honey and Oil, offered up Oxen to the Gods in whose Honour the Sacrifice was performed, and prayed for their Favour and Protection in their Voyage (2).

Maximus Tyrius, already quoted, assigning the Reasons that induced several Nations to worship the Rivers that watered their Country, lets us know, at the same Time, the Universality of the Worship that was paid them. The Egyptians, says he, worship the Nile, because of its Usefulness; The Thessalians, the Peneus, for its Beauty; The Scythians, the Danube, for the vast Extent of its Waters; The Etolians, the Achelous, because of the Fable of his Combat with Hercules; The Lacedæmonians, the Eurotus, by an express Law that enjoins it; The Athenians, the Ileusus, by a Statute of Religion; Sacro Instituto.

The Greeks and Romans were too superstitious not to adopt the Worship of the watery Gods. Besides what the Author now quoted says of the Thessalians, the Etolians, Athenians and Spartans, Antiquity furnishes us with a thousand Examples of the Excesses to which they went in this Respect. Their Temples contained Statues of the Rivers and Fountains, as those of the other Gods. There were few Rivers and Fountains in Greece, near which you would not have seen Statues, Numbers of Inscriptions, and Altars consecrated to those Rivers and Fountains; there they regularly went to perform Libations, and offer Sacrifices, as we learn from Pausanias.

Medals represent to us the Rivers as Gods, among others one of Posthumius, whereon is the Rhine, with this Inscription, DEUS RHENUS. The Tyber,
I i 4 in

(1) Apollon. Rhod. l. 4. (2) See the History of this Expedition, Vol. 6.

in like Manner, appears upon the Reverse of a Ves-pasian, not only as a Divinity, but also as the Patron and Protector of Rome. When Æneas arrived in Italy, he performed religious Ceremonies to that River, gave himself up to his Protection, and prayed him to be propitious to him (a). Sibotus, King of Messene, was not content with worshipping the River Pamifus, he made a Law obliging his Successors to go every Year and offer Sacrifices to him; but not to multiply Examples, of which there would be no End, I shall only quote here from the younger Pliny, what Religion had consecrated to Clitumnus, a River in Umbria. “Near the Source of this River, says that Author (1), is a Temple antient and Venerable: The God of the River himself is there represented in a Robe; he is a very propitious Deity, and predicts future Events, as appears from the whole Apparatus that is there to be seen, and which is proper for the Delivery of Oracles. Around this Temple are Chapels dispersed in great Numbers; each of them has a Statue of the God, each is famous, each is distinguished by some particular Piece of Devotion, &c.”

If the great Usefulness of Water to the Earth, induced the first Idolaters to make a Divinity of it, we may suppose the Wonders that have been observed in that Element, did likewise contribute not a little to promote the Superstition. God is wonderful in the Waters, say the holy Books (2), and 'tis on this Element especially that he seems to have laid out a Profusion of Wonders. The ebbing and flowing of the Sea, that periodical Motion which swells and sinks the Waters by Turns every six Hours, and perpetuates their Motion, whereby they are preserved from Corruption; the Irregularity of this Motion, more

(a) *Tuque, o Tybri, tuo Genitor cum flumine sancto
Accipite Æneam, — — —
Adsis o tandem, &c.*

Æn. L. 8. V. 72.

(1) Epist. ad Rom. L. 8. (2) Mirabilis in altis Dominus.

more or less in the different Terms of the Moon, as well as in different Seasons ; the Flux of the Eurippus, which bears little or no Resemblance to that of the Ocean ; the saltness of the Sea, a second Source of its Incorruptibility ; the prodigious Number and Variety of Monsters which it engenders, and the enormous Bulk of some of its Inhabitants, such as the Whale, and some others that far surpass the greatest of the Land Animals, all are wonderful, all astonishing. Add to this the Accounts given of the Properties of Fountains, whereof some have a regular Flux like the Ocean, others are periodically hot and cold ; a vast Number of them very medicinal ; the Fables that were propagated with respect to others, whereof some communicated to those who drunk of them an Aversion to Wine ; others render'd effeminate, and made those who bathed in them to change their Sex ; others again, whence a Person after bathing in them came out all covered over with Feathers ; some which deprived People of their Reason, while others restored it ; here a Spring, whose Water cured of some unhappy Passion, there another which inspired with Love ; one improved the Memory, another brought on a total Oblivion ; in fine, it was fabled of some Waters, that they had a prophetick and oracular Virtue. We might enlarge a great deal upon this Article ; but the Reader may consult the Naturalists, and particularly the fourteenth Book of Ovid's Metamorphoses, where that Poet introduces Pythagoras expatiating upon the Properties of Rivers and Fountains. All these breed Admiration, and instead of ascribing such surprizing Effects to natural Causes, or to Relations not much to be depended upon, they abridged the Study of Philosophy, and made a blind Adoration of the Element itself where those Wonders were produced, to supply the Place of Experiment and Examination.

Lastly, The Fictions of the Poets conduced exceedingly to this Idolatry towards the Water, For
in

in Fact they spoke of the Rivers, the Floods and Fountains, only as of so many Gods ; they painted and represented them in their Works, as if they had actually seen them ; they make them come forth from their humid Grottos to appear to their Heroes, and foretel their Destinies ; they relate their Amours, their Combats, &c. There you have Alpheus pursuing Arethusa, whom Diana transforms into a Fountain ; here you have Archelous contending with Hercules for Deianira, and vanquished by his Rival ; sometimes young Women, to avoid the Pursuits of an amorous God, throw themselves into a River, and are instantly metamorphosed into Nymphs or Naiads ; or bewailing their Frailty, and melting into Tears, are dissolved into Fountains. The Charms of Poetry animated these Descriptions, and from being affected by them in the reading, People came to take them literally, and no longer to think of Rivers and Fountains, but as so many animated Divinities.

Hence that prodigious Number of Water-gods and Goddesses, a Number that surpasses that of Heaven itself, and of the other Parts of the Universe. For not only was every River, Fountain and Flood, believed to be a Divinity, or at least to have a tutelar God ; the Sea alone contained Gods without Number. Oceanus had by Tethys Seventy two Nymphs named Oceanides ; Nereus, fifty Nereids, whose Names we have in Hesiod. The Number of Nymphs, if we may believe that Author, amounted to three thousand, and probably he had not computed them all. If we add to the Nymphs the Naiads, the Napææ, the Limniades, &c. we shall find the Water-gods to have been past reckoning.

But 'tis not enough to have proved that a religious Worship in general was paid to the Water, and to the Divinities who inhabited it, we must further examine wherein this Worship consisted, and after what Manner their Gods were represented.

CHAP. II.

Of the different Sacrifices that were offered up to the Water-gods.

I Shall say nothing here of the extraordinary Sacrifice which the Persians and Cappadocians offered to the Water, according to the Testimony of Herodotus and Strabo, because this would oblige me to repeat what I have said in the History of the Religion of these Nations (1). To range this Subject in some Order, I shall first speak of the Worship paid to the Ocean and the Seas ; then of that which was given to the Rivers and Fountains, and shall conclude with that of the Nymphs, and the other Divinities of this Class.

Antiquity lets us know little or nothing concerning the Worship of the Ocean ; Justin of all the Antients has spoke of it most distinctly, when he tells us, that Alexander, upon his Return to his Ships, poured out Libations to the Ocean, praying he would grant him a happy Return into his own Country (a). Aristeus having come in quest of his Mother to the Grottos of the River Peneus, that Nymph having learned his Errand, offers a Sacrifice to the Ocean, the Author of all Beings ; but the Sacrifice consists only of simple Libations. She poured out the Liquor three Times, says Virgil, upon the live Coals of the Altar, and three Times a sparkling Flame rose up from the sacred Fire, and mounted up as high as the Roof (b).

The Victims most commonly offered to Neptune, were the Horse and the Bull ; the first of those Animals

V. 1. L. 7.

(a) Expugnata deinde urbe, reversus ad naves libamenta dedit, prosperum reditum in patriam precatur. Just. L. 2.

(b) Oceano libemus, ait, simul ipsa precatur, Oceanumque patrem rerum, &c.

Virg. Georg. L. 4 382.

mals was especially consecrated to that God, who was thought to have produced the first Horse, which he had made to spring out of the Earth with a Blow of his Trident; a Fiction which I have explained in the History of the Contest between him and Minerva; the Bull, because by his Strength and bellowing, he figures the roaring Waves of a troubled Sea, and as he was the Symbol of the Floods, as shall be said afterwards. 'Tis needless to quote Examples to prove that it was the Custom to offer these two Kinds of Victims to Neptune; History abounds with them; and Virgil, who keeps strictly to the Customs that commonly prevailed, represents Laocoon offering upon the Shore a Bull to Neptune (a).

The Sacrifices that were offered to the Sea were of a different Nature. We learn from Homer (1), that when she was troubled, they offered to her a black Bull, or a Hog and a Lamb when she was Calm and smooth. But the Victim most commonly offered to the Sea was the Bull, and the Horse as to Neptune, who was its Sovereign; sometimes they actually sacrificed this last Animal, sometimes threw it into the Waves, sometimes, in short, they contented themselves with consecrating it to the Sea, and to the Rivers, by allowing it the Liberty to feed in the neighbouring Pasturages; frequently the Sacrifice was performed upon the Sea itself, sometimes upon the Shore; and Antiquity furnishes us with Examples of all these Variations. Cloantus in Virgil (b), thus addresses himself to the Gods of the Sea.

It

*The Gods, who rule the Ocean which I sail;
Victor before your Altars, on this Shore,
To you a Snow-white Bull I will present,
Oblig'd by Vow* ——— Trap's Virgil:

- (a) Laocoon, ductus Neptuni sorte sacerdos Solemnes Taurum ingentem mactabat ad aras.
Æn. L. 2. V. 201.

- (1) Odysf. 7.

- (b) *Di quibus imperium pelagi, quorum æquora curro,
Vobis lætus ego hoc candentem in littore taurum Constituum voti reus.*

Æn. L. 5. 236.

It was the Practice in these Kinds of Sacrifices to receive in a Patera the Blood of the Victim, which was afterwards poured out into the Sea by way of Libation. When the Sacrifice was offered upon the Sea itself, they let the Blood of the Victim flow into it, and also threw into it the Entrails, as we learn from Titus Livius (a), upon occasion of the Sacrifice that was offered to the Sea by Scipio Africanus, when he was setting out for Africa.

Sometimes to this Rite was added a Libation of Wine, and an Offering of Fruits (1). Thus we see it represented upon Trajan's Pillar, near the Altar where Trajan appears with a Patera in his Hand to perform a Libation to the Sea. As for the Rivers, they were worshipped in a different Manner.

First of all Hesiod lays it down as a Precept, that no Person was to pass a River till he had first washed his Hands. The Roman Magistrates never passed the little Rivulet which was near the Campus Martius, till they had first consulted the Augurs, and the Generals did the same before they set out for War. 'Tis certain, says Cicero (2), that our Captains are wont to sacrifice to the Waves before they embark. But their religious Veneration for them was carried much higher afterwards, since before crossing them for any military Expedition, they offered up Horses to them in Sacrifice; thus Xerxes, according to Herodotus, before he passed the Strymon in his Way to Greece, sacrificed some of them to that River, and Tiridates offered one to the Euphrates, while Vitellius, who was with him, performed the taurobolick Sacrifice in honour of that River; for Bulls were also offered up to the Rivers, as well as to the Ocean and the Sea. Lucullus, as we read in Plutarch (3), made a Sacrifice thereof to the Euphrates, while he was pursuing Tymnes: This Practice too must needs have have been very antient, since Achilles says to Lycaon, This rapid River, the Xanthus, to which we offer so many Bulls, will not protect you. Lastly, they carried this Superstition so far, that the young Virgins of Troy were obliged, the Evening before their Marriage, to go and offer their Virginity to the River Scamander, in consequence of which we need not be told what sometimes happened.

(a) Cruda exta cæsa victimâ, uti mos est, in mare porrigit. Lib. 29.

(1) Virg. Æn. L. 9. (2) De Nat. Deor. L. 3. (3) 24 in Luc.

The Grecian Youth, as we are told by Pausanias (1), contented themselves with offering Locks of their Hair to the River Neda; and Homer informs us, that Peleus had consecrated to Sperchius that of his Son Achilles.

The Nymphs, the Napææ, the Naiads, had also their Sacrifices, sometimes of Goats and Lambs that were offered to them, with Libations of Wine, Honey and Oil; frequently of nothing but Milk, Fruits and Flowers. 'Tis true, Aristæus, as we read in Virgil (2), offers to the Nymphs four Bulls, and as many Heifers; but so solemn a Sacrifice to those petty Divinities of the Water, has no other Example in Antiquity. As for the rural Festivals that were celebrated in honour of them, they were usual among the Country People, and in those rustick Ceremonies you might have seen Milk, Honey, and Oil flowing in Abundance.

C H A P. III.

Of the Ocean and Tethys.

THE Ocean was justly intitled to the first Place among the Water-gods, since he contains the greatest Collection of Waters, and communicates them to the other Seas, and to the whole Earth, by that admirable Circulation which diffuses Fruitfulness over all.

The

(1) In An. (2) Geor. L. 4.

The Poets, by whom he was made a Person, have described his Genealogy; Hesiod tells us he was the Son of the Heavens and the Earth. “The Earth, “says he, by her Marriage with Uranus, had the “deep engulphed Ocean, and with him Cæus and “Creius, Hyperion, Iapetus, Rhea, Themis, &c. (1).”

As this Poet joins the Generation of the Ocean with that of several Persons who had a real Existence, as has been proved in the History of the celestial Gods, one would be inclined to believe, that in this Place he has an Eye not to a purely physical Generation, but to a natural one; and consequently, we may reckon there was one of the Titans had the Name of Oceanus. Hence we might explain literally, 1. What Homer says of all the Gods having derived their Original from Oceanus and Tethys (2), because they had actually a great Number of Children who were deified, like the other Titans. 2. What is said by the same Poet, that the Gods went frequently to Ethiopia to visit Oceanus, and to share in the Festivals and Sacrifices that were there offered, which would signify, that all those of the Titans, who, upon account of their Conquests, had settled in different Places, assembled from Time to Time to go and pay their Respects to Oceanus in the Place where he reigned. 3. That Juno had been brought up by Oceanus and Tethys, because in Reality Rhea sent her to her Sister-in-law to take Care of her Education, and to save her from the cruel Superstition of Saturn. 4. What Eschiles says, that Oceanus was the intimate Friend of Prometheus the Brother of Atlas. But at the same Time it must be owned, that the Antients have, for the most Part, considered Oceanus only as a natural Divinity; and as his Name, according to Diodorus Siculus (3), imports Foster-father, he is justly said to have been the Father not only of the Gods, but also of all Beings; which is true in this Sense, that Water alone contributes more to the Production and Nourishment of Bodies,

(1) Theog. (2) Il. 14. V. 312. (3) In Prometheus, L. 2.

Bodies, than all Nature besides. For according to both antient and modern Experiments, a Tree, or Plant, in Vegetation consumes several thousand Portions of Water for one of Earth. What the Greeks said of the Ocean, the Egyptians applied to the Nile, (which among them went a long Time under the Name of the Ocean) and perhaps with more Reason, since it was actually in their Country that the first Gods had lived. “The Ocean, among the Egyptians, “ says Diodorus Siculus (1), is nothing else but the “ River Nile, whence they alledge the Gods deri“ ved their Birth, because Egypt is the only Country
 “ in the World that has Cities built by the Gods “ themselves.”

The Greeks derived the Name of Ocean, Ὠκεανός, from the Word ὠκύς, which denotes the rapid Motion of the Water (2); they termed it also βαθυδίνες, because as its Motion was swift, so it extends to the very Bottom of the Waters. Euripides, in his Orestes, gives it the Epithet of Tauriceps (3), which equally agrees to Neptune and the Rivers, partly because of the raging of the Waves that seem to imitate the bellowing of that Animal, partly from the different Branches that form the Rivers, which were figured by the Horns. Thus we are told that Hercules had torn off one of Achelous's Horns, because he had reduced to the Channel of that River one of its Arms that overflowed Etolia (4). The Ocean is married to Tethys, to signify that he refines and purifies all Things, and unites them together; or, to express myself in the Terms of a learned Mythologist (5), Quod pura omnia & splendida efficiat, resque contrarias concordæ ac mutuo nexu decenter copulet. As to what remains, we must carefully distinguish this Tethys from the Nereid Thetis, who married Peleus the Father of Achilles. The Mythologists even observe upon this Subject, for we must not omit Circumstances however trifling, that the Name of the first first is written with a Greek T, and that of the Mother of Achilles with an Iota. An ancient Fable informs us, that Jupiter having been bound by the other Gods, Tethys, with the Aid of Egeon, set him at Liberty; which undoubtedly signifies that this Princess made use of that Giant in delivering her Relation from some Danger, or to save him from the Ambuscades which were laid for him by the other Titans who were at War with him.

(1) L. 1. (2) ὠκύς a velocitate. (3) ταυροκεphάλος. (4) See the Hist. of this Hero. (5) Lyl. Ger. Syn. 5. p. 168.

Antiquity has transmitted to us only two Monuments that represent Oceanus; one is a Statue that was dug up at Rome about the sixteenth Century, which shews us that God under the Figure of an old Man sitting upon the Waves of the Sea, with a Pike in his Hand, and by him a Sea-monster with which we are not acquainted; the other is an Intaglio of Beger, whereon that God is in like Manner drawn under the Figure of an old Man sitting upon the Waves, with some Ships appearing at a Distance.

But before I close this Chapter, I shall give my Sentiments of those frequent Voyages of Homer's Gods to visit Oceanus, by whom they were entertained twelve Days amidst banqueting and good Cheer. The Poet, on this Occasion, designs to inform us of the Piety of the Ethiopians, and particularly of an ancient Custom that prevailed among those who dwelt upon the Coasts of the Atlantick Ocean, who celebrated, at a certain Season of the Year, solemn Festivals, during which, they used to carry about in Procession the Statues of Jupiter and their other Gods, offered Sacrifices to them, and kept great Feasts, which lasted twelve Days. Pausanias (1), speaking of those Ethiopians who inhabited the City Meroë and the neighbouring Plains, who were accounted the most blameless of the human Race, says, the Sun was believed to keep his Table among them; and 'tis undoubtedly from this Table and those Feasts that the Greeks, and after them the Romans, got the Custom of serving Tables before the Statues of their Gods, which Ceremony they termed Leſtiſternia (a). I am not ignorant, that thoſe who are for allegorizing all the antient Fictions, alledge the Poet by this deſigned to teach us, that the Sun, and the Planets, whoſe Names were given to the Gods, fed upon the Exhalations from the Ocean; as if Homer's Ideas on this Subject had been individually the ſame with thoſe of Cleantes the Philoſopher.

(1) In Att:

However that be, the Fable of Oceanus is very obſcure; and what has perplexed it ſo much, is, that it blends Hiſtory and Phyſiology together. Oceanus has ſometimes been conſidered as a Titan Prince, ſometimes as the vaſt Expansion of Waters that goes under that Name. The Antients have thrown many Things together on this Subject, which to reduce wholly to Hiſtory, or wholly to Phyſiology, would be equally ridiculous; the ſame may be ſaid of the Children who are given him, whom he had, ſay they, by Tethys his Wife and Siſter; ſince in that Number they reckon not only the Rivers, the Nymphs and Fountains, but alſo moſt of the Perſons who had reigned or dwelt along the Sea Coaſts, ſuch as Proteus, Etbra the Wife of Atlas, Perſeis the Mother of Circe, and ſeveral others.

C H A P. IV.

Neptune and Amphitrite.

AS the Ocean, according to the Remarks of Gerard Voffius (1), after the antient Mythologiſts, denoted the exterior Sea, or the great gathering of Waters that encompaſſes the whole Earth, ſo Neptune was taken for the interior Sea, ſuch as the Mediterranean, and the other Seas. The Stoick Philoſophers puzzled to know what that God was, agreed at

(a) See what has been ſaid to this Purpoſe in the Article of Sacrifices, V. 1. B. 4.

(1) De Idol. 3.

at last that he was an Intelligence that filled the Sea; as Ceres was that of the Earth. But Cicero (1) owns he neither knows nor conceives what was that Intelligence of the Sea and Earth; nor had so much as a Notion what it could be.

If we take Varro's Authority, the Latins gave to this God the Name of Neptune, a nubendo, because he covers the Earth (a). The learned F. Tournemin derives the Word from the Hebrew Naphta, which signifies to flow, and this Etymology, no doubt, is preferable to that which derives it from Nare to swim, by changing a little the first Letters; for how shall we support this Etymology, since, instead of changing the first Letters, the first is the only one wherein the Word Neptune, and that of Nare coincide. Accordingly Cotta in Cicero (2) laughs at it; " 'Tis true, " says that Speaker, since you derive Neptune from " Nare, to swim, wherein, if I may be allowed the " Expression, you yourself seem to swim more than " Neptune; you may, with the same Ease, find the " Original of all the Names in the World, since " the Ground of it is only the Conformity of a sin- " gle Letter."

Let us remark here, by the By, what there will be occasion to observe oftener than once in this Work, the Negligence I mean of some Authors, otherwise of good Learning, who take for a Writer's own Sentiment what he has occasionally mentioned in his Works. Thus Lylio Giraldi says Cicero derives the Name of Neptune from Nare, to swim. 'Tis true, in the second Book de Natura Deorum, one of the Speakers in that Dialogue, says the Persians said so; but in the third, Cotta, who is Cicero himself, destroys almost all that the other two had advanced; besides, 'tis not easy to know, either from the two first Books of that Work, or from the third, what was the real Sentiment of that Author.

K k 2

(1) Dē Nat. Deor. L. 3.

(a) Neptunus a nubendo, quod nubat, id est, operiat terras;

(2) L. 3. de Nat. Deor.

chor. As for those, says he, who want to know what is my sincere Opinion upon every Subject, they carry their Curiosity too far. I hope I shall be pardoned for this little Digression, which I judged necessary.

The Greeks called Neptune Poseidon, and we find several Etymologies of this Name; for in short it may signify either he who shakes the Earth with his Feet, or who sees many Things, or who dashes Ships in Pieces (a). Those who have been studious to find out the Origin of this God, have been still more perplexed than those who contented themselves with tracing the bare Derivation of the Name. If we may credit Herodotus (1), Neptune was a Lybian by Birth, and had been in high Veneration in that Country, Time out of Mind. The Egyptians, says the same Author, were not acquainted with him; even when they put him into the Number of their Gods, they paid no Worship to him; it was not therefore from the Egyptians, concludes that Author, that the Greeks received this God, as they had done almost all the others, but immediately from the Libyans. History informs us, that the People of Africa were acquainted with Greece, and brought their Horses thither from the earliest Periods of Time; and perhaps even before the first Colonies of Egypt and Phenicia had arrived there. It was undoubtedly by this Means that they came to know Neptune, whom they reckoned among their great Gods, and honoured him with a particular Worship. But after all, we know not what Ideas the Libyans had of him. Did they look upon him as the God of the Sea, or as that God who had first taught the breeding and breaking of Horses? For my Part, I am apt to think the last was the Idea they had of this God; and

(a) Ποσειδών from πῆς, a Foot, and σείω, to shake, and δῶν for γῆ, the Earth, in the Dorick Dialect. The word may come from πολλὰ εἶδεν, who sees many Things. M. Le Clerc and F. Tournemin are for the third Etymology.

(1) L. 2. C. 51, 52.

and the Greeks, who took him for the God of the Sea, perhaps because it was by the Sea the Knowledge of him had come to them, retained still the old Notion of him which they had got from the Libyans; hence the Epithet of Hippius, or Horseman, which they gave him; hence also the Notion they entertained of his having made the Earth to produce the first Horse, as we have it in Virgil, who thus invokes him in the Georgicks (a).

And thou whose Trident struck the teeming Earth,
And made a Passage for the Courser's Birth.
Essay on the Georgicks.

And it must needs have been under this Idea that the Poet invoked him; for would he ever have addressed him as God of the Sea in a Work where he was describing the Country Life, and especially Horses, as he does in the third Book?

Some Authors call the Horse which was formed by the Earth struck with his Trident, Arion; others, as Servius, give it the Name of Scythius. But his true Name was Scyphius; and as this Name denotes a small Vessel, a Skiff, which the Allemands name Chiph, so they had taken for a Horse the Ship which carried the Libyans into Greece, and for his Rider, the God whose Worship they introduced thither. What confirms this Conjecture, is, that a Ship may well be compared to a Horse, because of its swift Motion; and we know the antient Inhabitants of Cadiz called their small Vessels Horses, because they moved swiftly. Thus the Poets formed their winged Horse Pegasus, from the Idea of a Ship under Sail.

Whatever be in this, Antients and Moderns are equally divided as to what Idea we ought to have of

K k 3

Neptune.

(a) ——— Tuque, o, cui prima frementem
Fudit equum, magno tellus percussa tridenti
Neptune! ———

Neptune. The greatest Number look upon him only as a physical Being, or a natural Divinity, figuring the Water over which he presided ; others however, as Diodorus Siculus and Lactantius, from Euhemerus's sacred History, take him for an animated God, for a real Personage. Among the Moderns, Don Pezron and M. Le Clerc are of the same Opinion with the Antients now named ; and I am convinced with them, that Neptune was a Prince of the Race of the Titans. He was, according to Hesiod (1), the Son of Saturn and Rhea, and Brother of Jupiter and Pluto. Rhea having hid him in order to evade Saturn's Cruelty, gave out that she was delivered of a Colt, which the God swallowed as he had done her other Children. As he was the first, according to Diodorus (2), who embarked upon the Sea with the Apparatus of a naval Army, he was intitled to the Empire thereof ; and Saturn, his Father, having given him all Power over that Element, he was considered afterwards as the God of it ; and this is also what makes the Mariners, according to the same Author, address to him their Vows and Sacrifices ; or which amounts to the same Thing, in the Division which the three Brothers made of the Empire of the Titans, Neptune had for his Lot the Sea, the Islands, and all the Places that are adjoining to them. Lactantius, who had read Euhemerus's History, expressly says so (a) ; which however, as M. Le Clerc remarks, is only to be understood of the Mediterranean Sea, the Ocean being then so little known, that they durst hardly venture upon it ; Neptune signalized himself very much by Sea, even in his Father Saturn's Lifetime ; who, as we have it in Diodorus Siculus (3), had given him the Command of his Fleet ; he was always careful to check the Enterprises of the Titan Princes,

(1) Theog. (2) L. 5.

(a) Jupiter imperium Neptuno maris, ut Insulis omnibus, & quæ secundum mare loca sunt, omnibus regnaret. Lact. Div. Inst. L. 1. C. 2.

(3) L. 5.

Princes, hindered them from settling in some Islands as they designed; and when Jupiter his Brother, whom he served always with very great Fidelity, had forced his Enemies to retire to the western Countries, he shut them up therein so closely, that they never could stir out; which gave Rise to the Fable of his having kept the Titans imprisoned in Hell, and hindered them from getting out, as we have already said in the preceding Book.

I doubt not but Neptune also distinguished himself by Sea, no less by the Establishment of Commerce than by his Victories. 'Tis probable that there were Merchant-ships that traded in his Time upon the Coasts of Africa, to which he was a good Protection. In a Word, this Prince, according to Lactantius (1), was Jupiter's Admiral, and the Superintendant of the Seas, such as Marc Antony was by Order of the Senate; Cujus regnum tale fuisse dicemus, quale Marci Antonii fuit infinitum illud imperium, cui totius oræ maritimæ potestatem Senatus decreverat. This is what had given the Antients a Handle to look upon this Prince as the God of the Sea, to speak of him only under this Idea; to consecrate Temples and Altars to him, and to supplicate his Favour by Prayers and Sacrifices.

'Tis however certain, that the Greeks have embellished the History of Neptune with that of Japhet and Javan; Japhet, who had for his Lot the western Countries, equipped some Ships to carry him thither (2); and this, no doubt, induced Bochart, (3) who has found a great deal of Conformity between the History of Neptune and that of Japhet, to take them for one and the same Person, and he draws a Parallel between them which tallies pretty exactly.

In like Manner, it is not to be doubted that the Name of Neptune was given to most of the unknown Princes, who came by Sea, and settled in some new

K k 4
Country,

(1) L. 1. C. 2. (2) V. Vossius de Idol. (3) Phaleg. L. 2. C. 2.

Country, or who reigned over Islands, or who signalized themselves by their maritime Victories, or by the Establishment of Commerce. This Name was even extended, if we may believe Aulus Gellius, to those who had as much Sternness and Ferocity as Valour (a), or like Cercyon, the Cyclops, &c. Hence so many Neptunes, the many Wives and Mistresses, and the numerous Offspring they give to this God; the many Metamorphoses, and the many Rapes laid to his Charge. Vossius (1) has taken the Trouble to unmask some of those Neptunes, and to determine the Time when they lived. He who had by Libya Belus and Agenor, was some Egyptian Prince, who lived about the Year before Christ 1483. He has probably distinguished himself by Sea, and, at same Time, by his Application to the Method of the breaking Horses. He who by Amymone the Daughter of Danaus, had Nauplius, the Father of Palamedes, lived about the Time of that Prince. 'Tis not amiss, by the by, to relate his Adventure. They tell us, that Danaus having sent his Daughter to draw Water for offering a Sacrifice, a Satyr attempted Violence upon her (2). The frightened Princess implored Neptune's Aid; the God relieved her, and put the Satyr to Flight: But he himself offered the same Insult to her which she had just evaded by his Means. 'Tis probable that this Adventure, which happened near one of Neptune's Temples, in the Neighbourhood of Argos, where Danaus, who came from Egypt, was going to offer a Sacrifice, refers to some Priest of that God. He who was the Father of the famous Cercyon, whom Theseus slew, lived a little before the Conquest of the Argonauts. He who by Tyro, the Daughter of Salmones, had Pelias,

(a) Præstantissimos virtute, &c. Jovis filios Poetæ appellaverunt; ferocissimos & immanes tanquam e mari genitos, Neptuni filios dixere Cyclopes & Cercyona, & Scyrone, & Lestrigonas, L. 15. C. 21.

(1) De Idol. (2) Philost. Fable of Neptune and Amymone.

as, lived about the same Time. He who passed for the Father of Theseus, was Egeus King of Athens, who had a Mind to conceal his Marriage with Ethra, the Daughter of Pithæus. He, in fine, who is the Subject of this Article, and whose History is full of the Adventures of all the rest, live in the Time of Isaac, a little before the Death of Abraham (1).

The Scythians, according to Herodotus, had also their Neptune, and called him Thamimasades; in fine, the first Neptune is undoubtedly Japhet, or some of his Sons, since this is he to whom the Scripture tells us the Isles of the Gentiles fell by Lot (2). 'Tis perhaps he of whom Sanchoiatho speaks, when he says Chryſor invented Floats of Timber, and was the first who sailed, and that for this Reason he was deified after his Death; unless we will understand it of Noah himself, who, in this Sense, is the antientest of all the Neptunes. But he who distinguished himself most was the Son of Saturn, or the Titan Prince whom I have been speaking of.

We are farther told, that Neptune had to Wife Amphitrite, the Daughter of Oceanus and Doris, that this Prince being in love with her, but unable to gain her Consent to marry him, sent to her a Dolphin, that acted his Part so well, as to compel her at last to marry this God of the Sea. They add, that Neptune, to reward the Dolphin, placed him among the Stars (a). Some Authors take this Amphitrite to be only a poetical Personage, whose Name signifies to surround (b). Thus we may easily account for their giving her to be the Wife of Neptune, or of the Sea, which encompasses the Earth.

But I see no Reason why we may not look upon her as Queen of some Islands, and the Fable of the Dol-

(1) See what has been said of the Age of Jupiter, B. 1.

(2) Gen. 10.

(a) See Hyginus, Cælo Poet. Astr. in Delphino, & Aratus in Phen.

(b) Ἀμφὶ τὴν γῆν περιετρεφεῖτο. Hinc Ovid. L. 1. Met.

————— Nec brachia longo
Margine terrarum porrexerat Amphitrite.

Dolphin, as the Intrigue of some able Confident, or of some Ambassador who settled all the Articles of his Master's Marriage, and thereby became highly in favour with him.

Amphitrite was perhaps the Daughter of Oceanus, who was a Prince of the Blood of the Titans, Uncle to Neptune, who settled upon the Coasts of Africa, as has been said; and then there will appear nothing extraordinary in this Match, nor in the Genealogy of this Princess. We ought, as little as possible, to depart from what is historical in the Poets, and, by no Means, deny the Existence of those antient Princes upon weak Etymologies; as if for that of Neptune's Name, which we have already given, we should go about to alledge that there never was a Prince to whom the Latins gave the Name of Neptune for having signalized himself by Sea. Saint Augustin (1), after Varro, gives the Name of Salacia to the Wife of Neptune, and 'tis easy to see the Reason. We must own, however, that the Poets often take Neptune for the Sea itself (2). But 'tis easy to distinguish what is really historical from what is but merely fictitious; as that charming Description of Neptune's Retinue which we have in Virgil (a), where he represents this God in his Chariot, whose Wheels hardly touched the Waves, accompanied by all the Divinities of the Sea, by Tritons and Dolphins, before

(1) De civit. Dei. (2) Ovid Loc. cit. Eurip. in Cyclop. Orph. in Argon, &c.

(a) Jungit equos curru genitor, spumantiaque addit
Fræna feris, manibusque omnes effundit habenas;
Cæruleo per summa levis rotat æquora curru:
Subsident undæ, humidumque sub axe tonanti
Sternitur æquor aquis, fugiunt vasto æthere nimbi.
Tum variæ comitum facies, immania cete,
Et senior Glauci chorus; Inousque Palæmon,
'Tritonesque citi, Phorcique exercitus omnis.
Læva tenent Thetis & Melite, Panopœaque Virgo, Nesæe, Spæioque, Theseiaque, Cymodoceque.

Æn. L. 5. in fine.

The Archbishop of Cambray in his Telemachus has finely imitated this Passage.

fore whom he says the Waves subside, and by their silent Submission acknowledge the Presence of their Lord. In like Manner, what Homer had said long before the Latin Poet of the Equipage of the same God, when he makes him come forth from his liquid Palace, riding in a Chariot drawn by brazen-footed Horses (1). But what shall we say to the other Fictions that have been broached in relation to this God. What is the Meaning, for Example, of their telling us that he had built the Walls of Troy, that when Laomedon, who had employed him, would not pay him his Wages, the God ravaged the Plains of Troy, and sent a Monster to devour Hesione the Daughter of that King? As I am fully to explain this Fable in the History of Hercules who rescued Hesione, I shall only briefly observe at present, that the Walls of Troy were so well built, and the Moles that they had raised there to defend them from the Inundations of the Sea, so strong, that they gave out, by a natural enough Hyperbole, that the God of the Sea himself had built them: But as nothing is Proof against the Injuries of Time, and Storms, these Works having been afterwards demolished, they fabled that Neptune had revenged himself on the Perfidiousness of Laomedon, who had actually employed the Money which he had found in the Temple of that God, in raising these Moles, and had not again refunded it (2).

Neptune has the Trident given him, for which the Mythologists assign several Reasons. 'Tis, say some of them, to figure by its three Points, the Quality of the three Sorts of Waters that are upon the Earth; those of the Sea that are salt; those of the Fountains of sweet Water; and those of the Ponds that partake a little of both (3); or to allude to Neptune's threefold Power over the Sea, which he troubles, asswages, and preserves (4). For my Part, without hunting after Mysteries, I am persuaded that that the Trident was a kind of Scepter which the Kings of old made use of.

(1) H. L. 3. (2) See the History of Hercules and that of Laomedon, V. 6. (3) V. Nat. L. 2. C. 2. (4) Id. ibid.

It now remains that I should speak of Neptune's Metamorphoses ; but all I have to say of them is, that they are certain Allegories under which his Intrigues lie concealed ; Thus when we are told that he transformed Theophane into a Sheep (1), that he metamorphosed himself into a Horse to seduce Ceres, and into a Dolphin for Melantbo, we may suppose this God, or those who took his Name afterwards, carried off those Princesses either upon Horses, or in Ships that bore for Ensigns those Animals.

We find on Medals, and other Monuments of Antiquity now extant, Neptune represented in different Manners ; but commonly under the Figure of a Man in Years, drawn in a Shell by two Sea-horses, holding in one Hand his Trident, and in the other a Dolphin. Pausanias (2) says the Trezenians worshipped him under the Title of King ; and he adds, the Coin of Trezene represented on one Side a Trident, and on the other a Minerva's Head. Accordingly we find in Goltzius two Medals, one that has a Trident, the other a Minerva, with the Epithet of πολις, or Protectress of the City.

Antiquity gives several Names to Neptune, besides these which we have already explained ; and as many of them contribute greatly to let us into the Knowledge of this God, 'tis necessary to insist upon them a little. The Name of Asphalion, or of Asphaleion, for it is found written in this last Manner upon a Medal of the Rhodians, which signifies firm, stable, immoveable, and answers to the Stabilitor of the Romans, was given him, according to Strabo (3), upon occasion of a new Island that appeared in the Sea. The Rhodians, then very powerful, having landed there, built a Temple in honour of Neptune Asphalion, and he had very soon several others. If we may credit the antient Greek Scholiast upon Aristophanes, there was one of them upon the Cape of Tenarus

(1) Hyg. Fab. 183. (2) In Corinth. (3) L. 1.

Tenarus in Laconia; and according to Pausanias (1), another near the Port of Patras: This Surname, in short, was perfectly agreeable to this God; because as he was thought to have the Power of shaking the Earth, so he had likewise that of establishing it (a); which makes Macrobius say (2), that the Gods had often opposite Titles, with respect to one and the same Thing in their Dependence, and that as Neptune had the Name of Enosifthon, which denoted his Power to shake the Earth, so he had that of Asphalion, to teach us that he had also Power to establish and support it; accordingly they seldom failed to offer Sacrifices to him in great Storms and Earthquakes.

The Ionians, as we are told by Herodotus, called this God Heliconian, and assembled with a great Concurrence of neighbouring People upon the Promontory of Mycale, to offer Sacrifice to him (3); they gave him the Name of King, from the Adventure which he had with Minerva, about the Territory of Trezene. For Jupiter having ordered, that they should have it in Common, he took the Name of King thereof, and Minerva that of Polyas, as we learn from Pausanias (4), as he took that of Prosclystus, from another Contest which he had with Juno, about the Country of Argos. In resentment that Jupiter had adjudged it to that Goddess, he laid all the Country under Water; but Juno having supplicated him to stop the Inundation, he yielded to her request, and upon this he got the Epithet now mentioned, which signifies, to flow out, effluere; because he had made the Waters of the Rivers that overflowed the Country to retire. A Temple was also built to him under this Name.

(1) In Achaicis. (2) Sat. 1. L. 1.

(a) Servius upon that Passage where Virgil says of Neptune,

Neptunus muros, magnoque emota tridenti

Fundamenta quatit ————— says the Foundations of the Earth were under the Power and Dominion of Neptune.

(3) L. 1. C. 48. (4) In Corinth.

Name. The Surname of Trident-bearer has no difficulty in it, that of μυήτρος, was in Allusion to the Noise of the Sea, which resembles the bellowing of a Bull: For this Reason, say the Mythologists, that Animal was sacrificed to him; and he himself was called Ταύρος or Ταύρεος, and the Festivals that were celebrated in Honour of him, were called Ταυρεία. But the two most pompous Epithets were those mentioned by Pausanias, (1) Lord of the Earth, which was an Inscription on one of his Statues in Lucania; and that of Soter, or the Saviour, which, according to Herodotus (2), was given him, probably by some of those who believed he had saved them from some great Danger. In fine, this God had several other Names, from the Places where he was peculiarly honoured, as those of Tenarius, from the Promontory of that Name in Lucania. Onchestius, from the City of Onchestus; Isthmius, from the Isthmus of Corinth, where he had a magnificent Temple, whereof Pausanias gives the Description (3); Heliconius from Helicon, &c. The Romans gave him that of Consus, answering to Hippius, which we have explained: Hence the Name of the Festivals called Consualia, celebrated in Honour of him, during the Circensian Games.

As the Adventures we have now been relating, and several others that we find in Pausanias, gave almost always Occasion to the raising of a Temple to Neptune, and to particular Festivals, so he was one of the most highly adored Gods of the Pagan World: For besides the Lybians who reckoned him their great Divinity, there were in Greece and Italy, especially in the maritime Places, a great Number of Temples raised in Honour of him, as also Festivals and Games; particularly those of the Isthmus of Corinth, and those of the Circus at Rome were especially consecrated to him under the Name of Hippius. One of the Exercises there being Horse-races.

The Romans too had so great Veneration for this God, that besides the Festivals which they celebrated ed in Honour of him on the first of July, and which was appointed to that Day in their Calendar, by these Words, D. Neptuni Ludi, the whole Month of February was consecrated to him, either because the half of it was destined among them to Purifications, whence its Name was derived (1), those Purifications being chiefly performed by Water, the Element over which this God presided; or perhaps to supplicate him to be propitious to the Sailors previously to their setting out to Sea at the beginning of Spring. The greatest Singularity in them was, that as Neptune was believed to have formed the first Horse, the Horses and Mules, covered with Flowers, ceased from all Labour during the Festivals of this God, and enjoyed Rest which none durst disturb.

(1) In Lacon. (2) L. 7. (3) In Corinth.

Besides the ordinary Victims, namely the Horse and the Bull, sacrificed to this God, and the Libations that were made in Honour of him, as we are told by Herodotus (2), the Aruspices offered to him particularly the Gall of the Victim, the Bitterness of that Entrail having an Affinity with the Sea-water.

It would be in vain to attempt to mention all the Temples that were consecrated to him, but I cannot choose but take Notice, that there was one among the Atlantides, wherein he was represented in a Chariot drawn by four winged Horses, whereof he was holding the Reins; and his Statue was so large, that it touched the Roof of the Temple, tho' very high; this is what we learn from Plato, in his long Discourse upon the Island Atlantis (3). Pliny (4) makes mention of the Temple he had among the Carians, and Herodotus (5) of another, which the Pasideans had consecrated to him. The same Author speaks also of a brass Statue seven Cubits high, or ten Foot and a half, which he had near the Isthmus of Corinth.

Pausanias (6), who in that full Description he gives of the Stadium of Olympia, says, there was near the Goal

(1) From the Word Februaire, to expiate or purify. (2) L. 7.
(3) In his Critias. (4) L. 31. (5) L. 7. (6) In Eliac.

Goal the Figure of a Genius whom he calls Teraxippus, being placed there to frighten the Horses, informs us at the same Time, that before they passed it, they failed not to invoke Neptune Hippius, and to supplicate him, that the Horses which drew the Chariots, might not be maimed therein. (a)

I have already said, that to Neptune were attributed Earthquakes and other extraordinary Motions either by Sea or Land ; I add farther, that this God was also reckoned the Author of any considerable Changes in the Courses of Floods and Rivers ; accordingly the Thessalians, whose Country had been overflowed, when the Waters withdrew gave out, that it was Neptune had formed the Canal into which the Waters had withdrawn : “And surely, says Herodotus, “ (1) Upon this Occasion their Opinion is just ; for “ all those who reckon this God to be the Author “ of Earthquakes, and take the Formation of Gulfs
 “ to be his Work, will have no Difficulty to be“ lieve, that Neptune had made the Canal when they “ came to see it.” For the same Reason he was accounted the tutelary God of Walls and their Foundations, which he was thought to overturn when he pleased. Accordingly Virgil represents him with the Trident in his Hand, destroying the Walls of Troy, and shaking their Foundations. (b)

As several Gallantries are laid to Neptune's Charge, besides those mentioned in this Chapter, we are particularly told that, in order to succeed in his Amours, he had frequently metamorphosed himself : Arachne in the fine Work which she drew in the Presence of Minerva, there drew the History of all his Transformations ; accordingly she had represented, says Ovid (2), Neptune metamorphosed into a Bull, in {a} You may consult upon this Article Diomysius Halicarnassensis, L. 2. who recites the different Ways they had of speaking of this Genius.

(1) L. 17.

(b) *Neptunus muros, magnoque emota tridenti
 Fundamenta quatit.* Æn. L. 2.

(2) Met. L. 6.

in the Intrigue which he had with one of the Daughters of Eolus ; under the Form of the River Enipus, in his Amours with Iphimedia, the Wife of the Giant Aloeus, by whom he had the two Aloides, Ephialtes and Otus ; under that of a Ram, when he wanted to seduce Bisaltis ; under that of a Horse to delude Ceres, who had metamorphosed herself into a Mare, to avoid his Pursuits. Lastly she gave him the Figure of a Bird, in the Intrigue which he had with Medusa ; and of a Dolphin in that with Melanthe (a).

After what I have said as to the manner of representing Neptune, and the Picture given of him by Virgil, I would have nothing to add with regard to the Statues, Medals, and Bas-Reliefs of him, which Time has preserved to us in very great Numbers, were it not that some of these Monuments remind us of some particular Passages of his History, or in that of the Princes who had these Figures engraved. Sometimes we find him upon these Monuments standing, sometimes sitting upon the Waves of the Sea ; frequently in a Chariot drawn by two or four Horses ; sometimes they are common Horses, sometimes Sea-horses, that have the upper Parts of that Animal, while their lower Parts terminate in a Fish's Tail, as almost all the Sea Monsters ; only once with winged Horses, as he is represented upon an Intaglio published by Beger, who justly reckons this is the Atlantick Neptune mentioned by Plato. In all these Attitudes is this God urging on his Horses, and gives them loose Reins ; which Virgil has so happily expressed in this Verse ; Flectit equos, curruque volans dat lora secundo (1). Neptune crowned by Victory in Maffei, denotes the Gratitude of the Person who reckoned himself indebted to him for a naval Battle ; holding his Right-foot upon a Globe, as he is in a Medal of Augustus, and in another of Titus, he informs

L 1

(a) The Reader knows, from what I have said on the Sources of Fables, how to judge of these various Transformations, and therefore I shall add nothing here.

(1) Æn. L. 1.

forms us that these Emperors were equally Masters of Sea and Land. Seated upon a smooth Sea (a), with two Dolphins swimming upon the Surface of the Waves, and having a Prow of a Ship near him, loaded with Grains or Pearls, he denotes the Plenty which is procured by successful Navigation. When he appears sitting upon a troubled Sea (b), with the Trident planted before him; and a monstrous Bird with a Dragon's Head and Wings, without Feathers, like a Bat, that seems making an Effort to fall upon him, while Neptune remains calm and undisturbed, even negligently turning away his Head, all this is to figure that this God equally triumphs over Storms and Sea-monsters. Upon a Medal published by Beger, where Victory appears upon the Prow of a Ship, sounding the Trumpet, while Neptune on the Reverse, in Posture of a Combatant, is darting his Trident to put his Enemies to Flight, he represents to us, as is well remarked by that Antiquary, the great Victory of Demetrius Poliorcetes over Ptolomeus, which Plutarch describes. Lastly, a Bas-relief of very great Beauty (c), represents to us Neptune carrying off a young Virgin, whom he bears upon his Sea-horses. Cupid, to whom this God has yielded up his Trident, makes use of it to animate his Horses, whereof one is holding the Tail of a Dolphin in his Mouth. Two young Virgins appear upon the Shore, supplicating Neptune to give them back their Companion. The Mythologists, who speak so much of the Amours of this God, and of his various Metamorphoses, say nothing, as far as I know, of this Rape.

But we must not confound Neptune with Taras his Son, who appears upon the Medals of the Tarentines with the Symbols of his Father. The City of Tarentum in Italy, which the Greeks name Taras, owed its its Original to the Son of this God, who had laid its Foundations. The Tarentines, in Gratitude, represented him upon their Medals (1), under the Figure of a Sea-god, mounted on a Dolphin, and commonly holding his Father's Trident in his Hand: I say commonly, for sometimes he has in its Stead Hercules's Club, the Symbol of Strength; or an Owl, to represent Minerva the Protectress of the Tarentines; or a Crown, in Allusion to his Conquests; or the Cornucopia, to signify the Richness of the Country, where he had built the City Tarentum; or, in fine, a Pot with two Handles, and a Cluster of Grapes with Bacchus's Thyrsus, the Symbol of the Plenty of Wine among the Tarentines.

(a) A Figure published by Maffei.

(b) A Figure published by Montfaucon in his Travels to Italy.

(c) Admir. Rom.

C H A P. V.

Nereus, the Nereids, Doris and Triton.

NEREUS, whom all the Antients reckon among the Sea-gods, was, according to Hesiod (2), the Son of Oceanus and Tethys. Apollodorus (3) gives him Oceanus for his Father, and Terra for his Mother, and other Mythologists make him the Son of Neptune. Hesiod highly celebrates this Nereus, who was, according to him, a mild and peaceful old Man, a Lover of Justice and Moderation. The Antients have enquired into the Reason why this Poet, as well as the Author of a Hymn which is ascribed to Orpheus, have run out upon the Praise of this Sea-god. John the Deacon gives a Reason for it as ridiculous as false; 'tis, says he, because Seamen, who have always present Death before their Eyes, are commonly good People; but unluckily it is quite the contrary. The good Deacon, as M. Le Clerc remarks, had never seen either Seamen or Sailors, and speaks of them just as we do of the Inhabitants of the Moon. That learned Critick

L 1 2 there-

(1) See Bezer, Treasure of Brandebourg. (2) Theogon.
(3) L. 1.

therefore has Recourse to the Phenician Language, in which the Words, Nabae, Noae, whence the Name of Nereus was derived, signify to shine, to give Light, which, as it relates to Man, imports to know, to have Understanding, to be wise (a).

Be that as it will, all agree with Hesiod that he married his Sister Doris, and that he had by her the fifty Nereids whose Names are these, Proto, Eucrate, Sco, Amphitrite, Eudore, Tbetis, Galene, Glauce, Cymolthee, Speo, Tbalia, Melite, Eulimene, Agave, Pasubee, Erato, Eunice, Doto, Pherusa, Dynamene, Nesee, Aetee, Protemedee, Doris, Panope, Galatea, Hippothoe, Hipporoe, Cymodoce, Cymatolege, Amphitrite, Cymo, Etone, Halimede, Glaucanome, Pontoporia, Liagore, Evagere, Laomedee, Polynome, Antonome, Lysianassa, Eetarne, Psamathe, Menippe, Nyso, Eupompe, Themisto, Pronoe, Nemertes. In this List taken from Hesiod, Amphitrite occurs twice, there being two Nereids of that Name, which differ only in Quantity.

Homer (1) gives their Names with some Variation, and reckons only Thirty two of them; the rest, says he, having remained in the Bottom of the Sea; Glauce, Tbalia, Cymodoce, Nesee, Spio, Tboa, Helia, Cymothoe, Aetee, Limnoria, Melita, Jera, Amphithoe, Agave, Doto, Proto, Pherusa, Dynamene, Dexamene, Amphinome, Callianira, Doris, Panope, Galatea, Nemertis, Apsudes, Callianasse, Clymene, Janira, Janesse, Mære, Orithyia, Amathia. These Names, in short, almost all derived from the Greek, agree perfectly to Divinities of the Sea, since they express the Waves, the Billows, the Trumpets, the Calms, the Roads, the Isles, the Ports, &c.

All Antiquity agrees, that Nereus excelled in the Art of Prediction. He foretold Paris the War which the Rape of Helen would bring upon his Country (2); and he informed Hercules where to find the golden golden Apples that Eurystheus ordered him to go in quest of. He attempted, 'tis said, to transform himself into various Shapes, that he might not be obliged to make that Discovery to the Grecian Prince ; but he held him fast till he had resumed his pristine Form. We learn from Apollodorus, that Nereus commonly resided in the Egean Sea (1), where he was encircled with Nereids, who diverted him with their Songs and Dances (2). Accordingly Pausanias (3) takes the old Man who was worshipped by the Gylbeates, and who, according to them, had his Palace in the Sea, to have been no other but Nereus ; and he cites, in proof of it, these Verses in Homer.

(a) See M. Le Clerc's Note upon the 233d Verse of Hesiod's Theogony.

(1) Il. L. 18. (2) Il. L. 6.

Ye Sister Nereids ! to your Deeps descend, Haste, and our Father's sacred Seat attend.
Pope's Iliad. 18. 177.

'Tis evident that there is a great deal of Physiology intermixed with this Fable, the Poets having frequently taken Nereus for the Water itself, as his Name imports. Hesychius accordingly derives it from νερὸς, which signifies flowing ; I am, however, of Opinion, that the Ground of the Fable exhibits to us some antient Prince of this Name who became famous by Sea, and improved Navigation so much, that People came from all Parts to consult him in dangerous Voyages. These pretended Metamorphoses, and the various Shapes which he assumed to get rid of those who came to consult him, are but so many Symbols figuring that he was crafty and artful, wise and prudent, like Proteus, whom we shall speak of by and by. Some Authors however (4) were of Opinion that Nereus had been the Inventor of Hydromancy, or of the Science of Prediction by Means of Water, and that this is the Reason of representing him as a great Soothsayer ; and perhaps this is the Reason for ranking him among the Gods of the Sea. M. Le Clerc confirms this Sentiment (1) by a happy Conjecture, deriving the Name of Nereus from the Hebrew, in which Language it signifies videns ; and this is what made him be reckoned by all the Antients a Man skilled in the Art of Prediction, which Horace thus expresses ;

L 1 3 this

(1) L. 4. Argo. (2) Orpheus Hym. in Nereid. (3) In La-co. (4) V. Nat. Com.

Ut cerneret sera Nereus fata (2).

Thus for understanding this Fable, we must distinguish two Nereus's, the one poetical, the fabulous Stories of whom are only founded upon the Etymology of his Name ; the other real, whose History has been disguised with poetical Images.

But what are we to think of the Nereids his Daughters ? Are we to look upon them as metaphorical Personages, as their Names signify, or as real Persons ? I grant, 1. That the Nereids, whom Hesiod and Homer name, are mostly but poetical Beings ; but think some of them had a real Existence, such as Cassiope the Mother of Andromede, Psammathé the Mother of Phoce, who, according to Pausanias, having gone into the Country in the Neighbourhood of Parnassus, gave her Name to it ; and accordingly that Country has since been called Phocis ; Thetis the Mother of Achilles, and some others. But, 2. It must also be owned, that the Name of Nereids was given to Princesses who inhabited either in some Islands, or upon the Sea-coasts, or who became famous for the Establishment of Commerce and Navigation. It was transferred afterwards not only to some poetical Personages, who owe their Existence only to Etymologies conform to the Qualities implied in their Names, but even to certain Fishes that have the upper Part of their Bodies much like that of Women,

Pliny

(1) Upon Hesiod. (2) Od. 10. L. 1.

Pliny says, in the Time of Tiberius, there was seen upon the Sea-shore a Nereid such as the Poets represent them (a), and that an Ambassador from Gaul had told Augustus, that upon the Sea-coasts had been seen several dead Nereids. Albertus Magnus (b), and some others, frequently speak of such like Prodigies.

The same Account was given of the Tritons, which the Poets represent as Monsters, having the Half of their Bodies human, and the other half Fish, with Shell-trumpets in their Hands, whereby they make the Shore to resound (c). When this Name was used in the Singular, it denoted that one of the Tritons, who always preceded Neptune, whose Arrival he proclaimed by the Sound of his Shell, and was therefore taken for the Trumpeter of that God. Hesiod, who has given his Genealogy, says he was the Son of Neptune and Amphitrite; Virgil and Ovid give a Description of him (d). Pliny tells us, that a Message came to inform Tiberius (e) that one of them had been seen near Lisbon, the Sound of whose Shell-trumpet had been heard, and his Form the same as is commonly represented. The Fishers have often caught Fishes pretty much resembling what we are told of the Tritons, and perhaps upon such Relations have been invented the poetical Fables of those Feasts which they gave the

L 1 4 good

(a) Spectata in eodem littore Nereis humana effigie, Plin. L. 9. C. 5.

(b) See his Discourse of Animals, and Pausanias in Arcad.

(c) See the Description Virgil gives of a Triton speaking of Auletes, Æneid. L. 10.

Huc venit immanis Triton, & cærulea concha
Exterrens freta : cui laterum tenuis hispida nanti
Frons hominem præsert, in Pristin definit alvus.

(d) Cæruleum Tritona vocat, conchaque sonanti
Inspirare jubet, fluctusque & flumina signo
Jam revocare dato, &c.

Ovid. Met. L. 10.

(e) Tiberio nunciatum est visum & auditum canentem concha Tritonem qua noscitur forma, Plin. Loc. Cit.

good Nereus, where Triton, Neptune's Trumpeter, walked upon the Sea with his Azure Chariot and Horses. Macrobius observes, that the Statues of Triton used to be placed upon the Top of Saturn's Temple.

The antient Monuments, as well as Medals (a), accord, in representing the Nereids as young Women riding upon Dolphins, or upon Sea-horses, holding commonly in one Hand Neptune's Trident, and in the other a Dolphin, and sometimes a Victory and a Crown. However, we find them sometimes half Women, half Fishes, conformable to this Verse ;

Desinit in piscem mulier formosa superne (1).

Such as we see them upon a Medal of Marseilles, and upon some others.

As for the Tritons, they are always represented half Men and half Fishes ; their Hair is like that of the Ranunculus, a Sea-plant, the rest of the Body appears to be covered with Scales ; they have Fins under the Ears, a large Mouth, Teeth of wild Beasts, blue Eyes, their Hands and Fingers covered with Scales, and Fins instead of Feet upon the Breast and Belly. But be it Caprice of the Artist, or some Mystery which we know not, we find some of them upon Monuments that hardly resemble the Description now given in any one Thing. Such is that which was represented upon a Freeze found in Burgundy. It has the Head and whole Body of a Man, without so much as one Scale to be seen, except on the Thighs, which terminate in two long Fishes Tails. He bears a Cloak upon one Arm, and a Shell in the Right-hand. He has by him a Monster, and a Sea-dog lying squat on the Ground. But not to insist on this, most of these Sea Divinities were worshipped in Greece ; Pausanias, in particular, says (2) the Nereids had sacred Groves and Altars in several

(a) As may be seen in Beger, Treasure of Brandeburg.

(1) Hor. Art. Poet. (2) In Corinth, several Places, especially upon the Sea-shores; Wit-ness, says he, the Nereid Doto, who had a celebrated Temple at Gabala.

C H A P. VI.

P R O T E U S.

NOTHING is more celebrated than this Sea-God, and the two greatest Poets of Antiquity have vied with one another in drawing his Character. Homer (1) in the Discourse of Menelaus to Telemachus, makes him give an Account, how, when he had lost himself near a little Island belonging to Egypt, Eidoëa, the Daughter of Proteus appeared to him, and advised him to go and consult her Father, to learn from him his Destiny, giving him however to know that he could not gain his End, without binding him while he was asleep, and holding him fast that he might not escape, whatever Figure he assumed, till he had revealed to him his Adventures. Menelaus takes with him three of his Companions, who surprize Proteus asleep, fall upon him, and without being affrighted at seeing him transformed into a Lion, a Dragon, a Leopard, a Boar, Water, Trees, &c. still hold him fast in their Arms, till being returned to his former State, they loose him, and then he informs Menelaus of what detained him in Egypt, and at the same Time what he was to do, in order to arrive happily in his own Country.

Virgil, who only changes the personages, but in the main has faithfully copied his Model, tells us, how Aristæus, upon the Loss of his Bees, went to consult his Mother Cyrene, who thus addresses him.

*In the Carpathian Bottom makes abode
The Shepherd of the Seas, a Prophet, and a God;
High o'er the Main in watry Pomp he rides,
His azure Carr and finny Coursers guides:*

Proteus

(1) Odyss.

Proteus his Name : To his Pallenian Port,
I see from far the weary God resort.
Him, not alone, we River Gods adore,
But aged Nereus bearkens to his Lore.
With sure Foresight, and with unerring Doom,
He sees what is, and was, and is to come.
This Neptune gave him, when he gave to keep His scaly Flock that graze the wat'ry Deep.
Implore his Aid, for Proteus only knows
The secret Cause, and Cure of all thy Woes.
But first the wily Wizzard must be caught,
For unconstrain'd he nothing tells for Naught ;
Nor is with Pray'rs, or Bribes, or Flatt'ry bought.

Surprize him first, and with hard Fetters bind ;
Then all his Frauds will vanish into Wind.
I will myself conduct thee on thy Way,
When next the southing Sun inflames the Day :
When the dry Herbage thirsts for Dew in vain,
And Sheep, in Shades, avoid the parching Plain.
Then will I lead thee to his secret Seat ;
When weary with his Toyl, and scorch'd with Heat ;
The wayward Sire frequents his cool Retreat.

His Eyes with heavy Slumber overcast ;
With Force invade his Limbs, and bind him fast :
Thus surely bound, yet be not over bold,
The slipp'ry God will try to loose his Hold :
And various Forms assume, to cheat thy Sight ;
And with vain Images of Beasts affright.
With foamy Tusks he seems a bristly Boar,
Or imitates the Lion's angry Roar ;
Breaks out in crackling Flames to shun thy Snares,
A Dragon hisses, or a Tyger stares :
Or with a Wile, thy Caution to betray,
In fleeting Streams attempts to slide away.
But thou, the more he varies Forms, beware,
To strain his Fetters with a stricter Care :
Till tiring all his Arts, he turns agen
To his true Shape, in which he first was seen.

Dryden's Virg. Georg. 4.

Aristæus exactly executed the Order of his Mother, and learned from Proteus the Manner of repairing his Swarms. As the Fable of Proteus is really built upon an historical Bottom, let us see what may have given rise to it ; though 'tis not easy to be explained, and the Authors who have attempted it, vary as much about it, as Proteus himself. First, the Greeks who would have all the Gods and great Men born among them, alledged, that Proteus was from Pallene in Thessaly ; but that the Cruelty of his Children had compelled him to leave it and retire into Egypt, and upon this feigned that Neptune had saved him ; as we read in Lycophron (1). They added, that he returned some Time after ; and this is the Tradition followed by Virgil, since he says :

. Patriamque revisit Pallenem.

The two Sons of Proteus called Polygonus and Telegonus, put all thole to Death who came to lodge with them, after having vanquished them at Wrestling ; Hercules after Proteus's Departure, rid the Earth of those two Tyrants.

Servius confirms all that we have now said (a) ; but this Allegation of the Greeks is a mere Chimera, Proteus having been King of Egypt, as we shall prove in the sequel.

Madam Dacier saw very plainly that this Fable in Homer was historical, her Words are to this Effect
in

(1) In Cassandra.

(a) Carpathos, inquit, Insula est contra Ægyptum, a qua vicinum Pelagus Carpathium appellatum est. Hic aliquando regnavit Proteus, relicta Pallene civitate Thessalia, ad quam tamen reversus est postea : quod ostendit (Virgilius) hoc loco dicens. Patriamque revisit Pallenem. Hoc ideo dicit, quia Proteus antequam in Ægyptum commigraret, Thraciæ fuit Incola, ubi habuit Uxorem, ex qua filios Telegonum & Polygonum, qui cum advenas secum luctari adigerent & excruciant, ad postremum ab Hercule victi, & interempti patris animum perculerunt ; quapropter tædio presentium rerum solum vertere coactus, Ægyptum petiit.

in her Remarks upon the fourth Book of the Odyssey.
 “ The Question is, says she, to find out the Reason
 “ of this Fiction, and what induced Homer to ima“ gine a Sea God capable of all those Changes:
 “ For we must not think it is a mere Fable, and “ that the Poet had no other Aim but to figure “ thereby Matter which undergoes all Sorts of “ Changes, or to give an Emblem of Friendship, “ which ought never to be firmly depended upon “ till it has been tried under all Shapes. These are “ but vain Subtilties, and shallow Dreams ; for as “ Strabo has it, ’tis not Homer’s Way to affix to any “ Truth those prodigious Fables. He has applied Fable “ to certain Facts, to give additional Charms to his “ Narration, as a Goldsmith adds Gold to Silver.
 “ Fully to unravel the wonderful Mystery of this “ Fiction, we must first find out the Truth which is “ the Foundation of it, and then we shall easily see
 “ the Fiction under which he has disguised it accord“ ing to his Custom.”

Let us then separate the Truth from the Fiction.
 First of all, History informs us that there was at Memphis a King named Proteus, who succeeded to Pheron, this is the first Truth : The second, which is no less certain, is, that Egypt was the Country of the most skilful Enchanters who wrought the greatest Prodigies. We see in Scripture that Pharaoh’s Magicians imitated a Part of Moses’s Miracles ; that by their Enchantment they changed a Rod into a Serpent, as that great Servant of God had done ; that they converted Water into Blood, and covered the whole Land of Egypt with Frogs, as he did. ’Tis therefore probable that Menelaus, being at Canopus, went to consult one of these Enchanters, who dealt in Prediction : And this is the Foundation Homer had to build his Fable upon, which he applied next to a known Name, Proteus, of whom he makes a Sea God, gives him Sea Monsters for his Guides, and imputes to him all those Changes, in Allusion to all the Prodigies wrought by the Enchanters. Here then is

is the Truth, and the Fable which serves for a Veil to it, plainly unraveled. Eustathius tells us, that some of the Antients were of Opinion, that Proteus was a Wonder-worker ; and I am surprized that this Light did not guide him to the Source of this Truth. It will perhaps be said, that the Magicians we read of in Scripture, wrought those Prodigies upon external Objects, and that Proteus performed his upon himself: But besides that Fable does not always deliver Truths, such as it found them, is it to be doubted, that those Magicians who did so surprizing Things out of themselves, would also perform upon their own Persons, Things no less wonderful, and exhibit themselves under various Shapes, very apt to raise Astonishment? Since among the Greeks, who to be sure would have been but Novices in the Art to the Egyptians, some were found who wrought Prodigies upon themselves of this Nature. Eustathius quotes the Example of Callisthenes the Physician, who, whenever he had a mind, appeared all on Fire, and shewed himself under other Forms, which astonished the Spectators.

There are some Authors who alledge, that Proteus was a skilful Orator, who could easily make those who conversed with him alter their Sentiments. Lucian asserts, that he was a Comedian extremely supple, a perfect Scaramouche, who turned himself, as we may say, into all Sorts of Shapes. Heraclides of Pontus alledges, the Fable of Proteus comprehends the Mystery of the Formation of the World ; and his Changes that were designed to teach us, that Matter was capable of receiving all Sorts of Forms ; and that Eidotea, who advises to bind her Father, is Divine Providence, which fixes this Matter to certain Subjects. Others will have it, that Proteus signifies Truth, which lies concealed from those who don't apply themselves to the Study of it.

But the most probable Opinion, and what is most common among the Antients, and among the rest,
Homer

Homēr (1), Heròdotus (2), Diodorus Siculus (3), Clemens Alexandrinus (4), Lycophron (5), Isacius and several others, is, that Proteus was an ancient King of Egypt, who kept his Court at Memphis, and who reigned about the Time of the Trojan War. What Herodotus in particular says of him is to this Effect ; and though the Passage I am going to quote from him be somewhat long, yet I thought it deserved to be given entire. “ Pheron, King of Egypt had for “ his Successor an Inhabitant of Memphis, called in “ the Greek Language Proteus, of whom we see a “ Temple at this Day in Memphis, which is very “ fine and magnificently adorned. It is situated by
“ the Temple of Vulcan, to the South : The Pheni“ cians from Tyrus dwell in the Neighbourhood, “ and from thence the Place is called the Field of “ the Tyrians. There is in this Temple of Proteus a “ Chapel dedicated to Venus, surnamed the Stranger, “ whom I conjecture to be Helen, the Daughter of “ Tyndarus, because I have heard that Helen was for “ some Time Proteus’s Guest, and that she had the “ Name of the foreign Venus. For there is no “ other Part of the Temple that is consecrated to “ her under that Name. And indeed when I asked
“ the Priests what they thought of Helen, they told “ me, as Paris Alexander was returning to his own “ Country, after having carried her off from Sparta,
“ he was driven by Storm upon the Coasts of Egypt,
“ and seeing the Tempest still continue, he was “ forced to land there at the Mouth of the Nile
“ which is called Canopick, where he made some “ Stay. There was upon the shore a Temple to “ Hercules, which is there at this Day, whether if “ any Slave retires, to whatever Person he belongs,
“ and takes on the holy Signs that are there, put-“ ing himself under the Protection of that God, he “ is not allowed to be taken, and this Privilege has “ even remained unviolable to our Time : The Slaves

(1) Odyss. L. 4. (2) L. 2. (3) L. 1. (4) Strom. 5.
(5) In his Cassandra.

“ Slaves of Paris having heard of the Freedom that “ was to be found in this Téple, instantly return“ ed thither, and falling down upon their Knees
 “ before that God, began to accuse their Master,
 “ and to divulge the Rape of Helen, and the Injury
 “ which he had done to Menelaus. They made “ their Complaints in Presence of the Priests and “ Governor of that Mouth of the Nile, named Tho- “ nis, who having heard them out, dispatched a “ Message to Memphis to bear this News to Proteus, “ which was delivered in these Terms. There has “ just arrived a Foreigner of the Race of Teucer, “ who has committed an unheard of Crime in Greece.
 “ he has seduced the Wife of his Host: He has “ carried her off, and with her a vast deal of Riches.
 “ Contrary Winds have driven him upon your “ Coasts, whether shall we let him go with Impu“ nity, or shall we spoil him of what he has brought “ with him? Immediately Proteus ordered the Go“ vernour to seize upon this Man; he accordingly “ obeyed, and brought him before Proteus; who, af“ ter he had reproached him bitterly, banished him “ from his Presence; however, being unwilling to “ put him to Death, lest he should have violated the “ Law of Hospitality, he ordered him to depart out “ of his Dominions within three Days, and detained
 “ Helen to give her back to her Husband.”

Diodorus Siculus allows also that Proteus, whom he names Cetes, was King of Egypt; and asserts at the same Time, that whatever the Greeks fabled of his various Metamorphoses, the Egyptians said of their King Cetes; but he differs from Herodotus, in two Points: 1. In saying that he ascended the Throne after an Interregnum of 150 Years, whereas Herodotus makes him to have reigned immediately after Phero. 2. In making him to have been present at the War of Troy, which has induced some Moderns to say, that he was the same with Tithonus, the Father of Memnon.

However that be, what may have given Rise to the Metamorphoses in Virgil and Homer, I take to be this. Proteus was a wise and eloquent Prince; and his Precaution whereby he evaded every Danger, might serve him instead of the prophetick Gift which is ascribed to him; for according to Cicero, Foresight is a Prophecy. As it was very difficult to learn his Secrets, there was no great Impropriety in saying, there was no coming at the Knowledge of them but by binding him. He was besides exceeding stately, and seldom appeared in publick: No body was permitted to come in his Way; there were but a few of the great Lords, whom Homer allegorically calls the large Fishes, φῶνες, who durst accompany him. It was commonly at Noon when he went out of his Palace, which the same Poet calls his Cave: He used to walk along the Sea-Coast for the Benefit of the cool North-wind, covered perhaps with an Umbrello, which he calls a Cloud. Sometimes he appeared in the midst of his Soldiers, as a Shepherd in the midst of his Flocks: He knew their Number and their Names, and frequently reviewed them. Hence the same Poet says, he counted his Flocks regularly every Day about the Hour of Noon. His being quick and lively even to Excess, might justify the Expression of being all Fire; and then from his absolute Command of his Passions, he appeared in a Moment after more smooth and pliant than Water. Would it not seem that our two Poets designed by all these Strokes to give an allegorical Description of a King, wise and provident, artful and insinuating, and not of a Sea Monster, or a Camellion, that changed Form and Figure? Nothing is more usual in the Poets, and even in Scripture, than these Symbolical Descriptions that figure the Character of a Person under Terms of Obscurity. Thus the Prophet Isaiah considers Nebuchadnezzar as the Morning Star; and Jacob, his Son Judah as a Lion (1), &c. which would never bear to be understood literally.

In

(1) Genesis 49.

In like Manner, by this maritime Race, whom Virgil, after Homer, calls Gens humida ponti, 'tis evident those Poets designed the Egyptians who lie near the Sea ; and by those Sea-calves, turpes Phocas, the Satrapes of Egypt ; and if they call them Neptune's Flocks, 'tis because a King ought to be the Father and Pastor of his Subjects. Again, it is in the same Sense that they call Proteus the Son of Neptune, because he was powerful by Sea, and Master of Carpathia ; whence he himself came to be accounted afterwards a Sea-god. Perhaps too the equivocal Meaning of the Word Cetes, a Name he went under, according to Diodorus, or rather Ketiu, as he is named by Perizonius, the Import whereof is a Whale or great Fish, served to propagate this Fable ; and what wonderfully confirms these Conjectures, Homer, who is the Author of it, had learned it from the Egyptians, who often covered their Histories with ingenious Veils of Allegory and Fiction.

In the mean Time, if we take Diodorus Siculus's Account, there will be less Mystery under it than we may imagine, since, according to him, this Fable was hatched among the Greeks, and was invented from a Custom that prevailed among the Kings of Egypt to wear upon their Heads as a Badge of their Strength and Power, the Skin of a Lion, or of a Bull, or of a Dragon ; sometimes even Branches of Trees, Fire, and rich Perfumes ; these Ornaments giving them a Figure in the Eyes of their Subjects, and striking them with a superstitious Awe.

Proteus left a Son named Remphis, who succeeded him. As for himself, he was ranked among the Gods ; and we have just now seen what Herodotus says of his Temple. We shall conclude with some critical Reflections of our Literati. M. Fourmont (a) alledges the Greeks formed the Name of Proteus, which they gave to this King, from Phrao or Phro, of which they made Prot, with the final eus ; an

M m

Etymology

(a) Critical Reflections upon the History of antient Nations, L. 3. C. 10.

Etymology no doubt preferable to that of Perizonius, who says that Prince got the Name of Proteus, only because he was chosen after an Anarchy. The late Hectius, who has run the Parallel between Moses and almost all the Pagan Gods (1), has not failed to compare him to Proteus, maintaining that this Fable is founded upon what the Scripture says of Moses's Rod. But with that learned Prelate's good Leave, Proteus, whom all Antiquity agrees to have lived in the Time of the Trojan War, is posterior by near 240 Years to the Legislator of the Hebrews.

C H A P. VII.

Phorcys, Saron, Portunus, Matuta, Glaucus and Egeon.

PHIORCIS, or Phorcus, another Sea-god, was, if we may believe Hesiod (2), the Son of Ponius and Terra, and had by his Wife Ceto, the Graie, whose Hairs were white at the Moment of their Birth (3); a physical Generation, intimating that the Waves whiten when they are ruffled. Homer (4) speaks of the Cave where Phorcys dwelt, upon which Perphyry has made a learned Commentary, but which is reduced to some mysterious and abstracted Notions of Physiology. Varro is the only Author who has reduced to History what those Poets say; and he contends, that Phorcys was a King of Corfica. As he lost his Life, and a Part of his Army in a naval Battle against Atlas, those who survived this Overthrow, gave out that he had been transformed into a Sea-god.

Saron was looked upon as the particular God of the Sailors, and the Greeks, for that Reason, gave him a Name from an Arm of the Sea which is near Corinth,

(1) Dem. Evang. Pro. 4. (2) In Theog. (3) See the History of Perseus and the Gorgons, V. 6. (4) Odyss. L. 13.

Corinth, or from the Saronick Gulf. This is what Aristides gives us to understand, when he says, For they don't always dwell in the Sea like Glaucus, Anthedon, and Saron. 'Tis farther probable, that this Saron is the same whom Pausanias speaks of (1), and who was King of Corinth. “ Althepus, says he, succeeded Saron: The latter, as we are told, built a Temple to Diana Saronis in a Place where the Waters of the Sea form a Morass; accordingly they call it the Phebæan Morass. This Prince was passionately fond of hunting. One Day, as he was in Chase of a Stag, he pursued it to the Sea-coast, the Stag having thrown himself in to swim, he plunged in after him, and in the Keeness of his Pursuit, was carried insensibly on till he found himself in the deep Sea, where his Strength being exhausted, he, unable to struggle longer with the Waves, was drowned. His Body was brought to the sacred Grove of Diana, near this Morass, and buried in the Court of the Temple: This Adventure was the Cause of changing the Name of the Morass, which is now called the Saronick Morass.”

Portunus, if we may believe Servius, presided over the Sea-ports, as his Name sufficiently intimates. His Story is very noted, and his first Name was Melicertus. Por'unus, or Palemon, and Ino or Matuta, his Mother.

Athamas his Father, King of Thebes in Beotia, having turned delirious, slew one of his Sons named Leræbus, and Ino the Mother of this young Prince, with her other Son Melicertus, threw herself with him into the Sea: They were both of them changed into Sea-gods; Melicertus under the Name of Palemon, and Ino under that of Leucothoe (2). The Foundation of this Story is true, and I gave a full Explanation in the seventh Volume of the other Adventures of this Family.

The Greeks had no sooner performed the Apotheosis of Ino and Melicertus, than they founded a religious ous Worship to them, which was received in several Countries. Melicertus especially was worshipped in the Island of Tenedos, where Superstition was carried the Length of offering to him their Children in Sacrifice. At Corinth Glaucus instituted the Isthmian Games in honour of him, which being interrupted some Time after, were re-established by Theseus in honour of Neptune.

(1) In Corinth. (2) Ovid. Met. L. 4. Hygin, &c.

Pausanias tells us (1), that in the Temple which the Corinthians had consecrated to Neptune, were three Altars; one for this God, the other for Leucothoe, and the third for Palemon: There was also, adds the same Author, a low Chapel, the Descent to which was by a secret Stair, and there Palemon was said to lie concealed, and whoever made a false Oath in this Place, be he Citizen or Stranger, was instantly punished for his Perjury.

Leucothoe was also worshipped at Rome, and there she had a Temple, whither the Roman Ladies came and offered their Vows for their Brothers Children, not daring to pray the Goddess for their own, because she had been too unhappy in Children. This is what we learn from Ovid (a). Female Slaves were not permitted to enter into this Temple, or if they were found there, they were beat unmercifully.

As the Nations that received the Worship of strange Gods frequently changed their Names, so Ino, whom the Greeks named Leucothoe, was called Matuta by the Romans; and Melicertus, whom the former worshipped under the Name of Palemon, was known at Rome under that of Poriummus. We have no Figure of this God; but Boissart has preserved one to us of Matuta, under whom we find the Words, Mat. Lug.

Tho' Homer considers Egeon only as a Giant, Ovid however says he was one of the Sea-gods. According

(1) In Corinth. C. 2.

(a) Non tamen hanc pro stirpe sua pia mater adoret:
Ipsa parura felix visa fuisse parens.

ing to Hesiod (2), he was the Son of Cælus and Terra. Eumelus, another antient Poet, in his Poem of the Titanoinachy, makes him the Son of Pontus and Terre, and says he dwelt in the Sea, whence he aided the Titans. Conon asserts that Neptune vanquished him, and threw him headlong into the Sea. This is mostly all we know of Egeon.

Among the Sea-gods were likewise ranked Scylla and Charybdis; but what I am to say of them in the History of Ulysses (1) makes it superfluous for me to speak of them here.

Glaucus, if we believe Servius (a), was a famous Fisherman of the Town of Anthedon in Beotia, who having laid upon the Grass the Fishes which he had caught, perceived them to recover their Life and Motion, and throw themselves into the Sea. He made no question but there was a peculiar Virtue in some of those Herbs; he tasted thereof, and was transformed into a Sea-god. Thus Ovid and Ausonius relate the Fiction; but History lets us know that it had no other Foundation but the peculiar Skill of this famous Fisher, as we learn from Strabo (3). Philostratus, in one of his Pictures, having regard only to the Fictions of the Poets, thus paints Glaucus. His Beard, says he, is moist and white, and his Hair waves upon his Shoulders. His Eye-brows are so thick, and so near one another, that they seem to make but one. His Arms are made fit for swimming, and his Breast is covered with a Sea-weed. The rest of his Body terminates in a Fish, whose Tail is crooked as far as the Reins.

Antiquity acknowledges three Glaucus's; the one the Son of Minos, another the Son of Hippolochus,
M m 3 who

(1) Theog. (2) V. 7.

(a) Piscator fuit de Anthedone civitate, qui cum capcos pisces posuisset in littore, & illi, recepto spiritu, rursus mare petiissent, sensit quarundam herbarum potentiam, quibus conversus est in Deum marinum, Serv. in 1 Georg.

(3) Geog. L. 11.

who is mentioned in the Iliad, a third surnamed the Pontick: This Plurality of Names has introduced a great deal of Confusion into the Genealogy of the Glaucus now in question. Some Authors give him Polybus for his Father, others make him the Son of Phorbas, others, in fine, of Neptune. What we may conclude to be more certain, is, that he was a skilful Fisher, and, at the same Time, a very fine Swimmer. As he used to remain a long Time under Water, he would needs have it believed, for the Sake of a Name, that he was then enjoying Inter-course with the Sea-gods. However, notwithstanding his Skill in swimming, he happened to be drowned, as we learn from Palephatus (1); and to do Honour to his Memory, he was said to be transformed into a Sea-god. The City Ambedon paid him a religious Worship, erected Temples to him, and offered him Sacrifices. Ovid's Manner of relating this Fiction is very singular, and I don't remember to have read any thing like it in the Antients. The Poets in after Times vented likewise a great Number of Fictions about him; some say it was he who ravished Ariadne in the Island of Naxos, where Theseus left her, and that Bacchus, by way of Punishment, tied him to a Vine-tree, as we may see in Athenæus (2). According to Diodorus Siculus (3), it was he appeared to the Argonauts under the Figure of a Sea-god, when Orpheus, upon occasion of a Tempest, made a solemn Vow to the Samothracian Gods. He even foretold them, as we have it in Apollonius Rhodius, that Hercules and the two Tyndaride, Caster and Pollux, should one Day be advanced to divine Honours. They add further, that in the Combat between Inoas and the Tyrrhenians, he joined with the Argonauts, and was the only one not wounded. Euripides (4), and after him Pausanias, tell us that he was Nereus's Interpreter, and had the Gift of Prophecy. If we may credit Nicander, it was

(1) L. 2. C. 28. (2) L. 7. C. 12. (3) L. 4. (4) In his Orestes.

was from him that Apollo himself learned the Art of Prediction. In fine Strabo, herein followed by Philostratus in his Picture of Glaucus, will have it that he was transformed into a Triton, and the Portraiture of him given by the last of these Authors, perfectly resembles the Description of that Kind of Monster. From all these Fictions, we may conclude that Glaucus having been drowned, came to be worshipped as a Sea-god. The Place where he perished became famous, and Pausanias speaking of the City of Anthedon in Beotia, remarks that there was in that City what was called Glaucus's Leap; that is to say, the Place whence he had thrown himself into the Sea.

C H A P. VIII.

Of the Nymphs, Dryads, Hamadryads, Napææ, Oreades, &c.

TH O' some of the Divinities named in the Title to this Chapter, are in the Class of terrestrial Gods, such as the Dryads, the Hamadryads, the Oreades, &c. however, as most of them owe their Origin to the Water, I judged it proper not to separate them, but range them all among the Gods of the Sea.

The Nymphs in general were among the Pagans the Gods of the Mountains, Woods, Fountains, and Rivers; for which Reason they got several Names. Those whose Abode was on the dry Land, had the Name of Nymphs in general. The Guardians of the Rivers and Fountains were called Naiads. Those who inhabited the Pools and Marshes were termed Limniades. Those who presided over the Groves, Napææ. Those who delighted in the Woods, Dryads; or Hamadryads, if they were attached to some particular Tree; and these last lived and died with the Tree. Such as were over the Mountains, were named Oreades (a); and those, in short, who dwelt in the Sea, Nereids. A Kind of Sacrifice was wont to be offered to them of Milk, Oil, and Honey; and sometimes the Sacrifice was a Goat.

'Tis not easy to say, what was the Original of those Fables that have been delivered about Nymphs; for there is no possibility of making all that the Poets say of them mere Allegory. I can never persuade myself, that they meant no more by those Symbols, than to give us an Idea of the Properties of Water and fluid Bodies, which are the Principles of the Generation of Trees and Plants, and all because the Word Nymph comes perhaps from Lympha, which signifies Water; nor can I believe this to be Hesiod's Reason for making them spring from the Sea-foam like Venus; and of their being called the Mothers of the Rivers, the Daughters of the watry Element or of the Ocean, and the rest (b). Therefore I take the Idea of Nymphs to have come from an ancient Opinion that the Souls of the Dead wandered about the Tombs where their Bodies were interred, or in the Places which they had frequented during their Abode in this World; this is the Sentiment of Porphyry (1). What makes very much for this Opinion is a Remark of Meursius, that the Greek Word Nymphē is no other than the Phœnician Word Nephas, which imports Soul; and he adds that this Opinion, as well as many others of those Times, took its Rise from the Phœnicians.

For

(2) All these Names, in Greek, intimated the Places where they resided, see Noël le Comte, L. 5. & 12. They had also several other Names, as Ionides, Ismenides, and a hundred others, which they derived either from the Places of their Birth, or rather from the Places where they were adored, as they are explained by Pausanias and Strabo.

(b) The Learned give several Derivations of this Name, some derive it from the Hebrew Word Nouph, stillare, whence the Greeks have made their Napææ. See F. Thomassin, Lect. des Poëtes, c. 2. l. 7.

(1) De Antir. Nymph. p. 25.

For our better understanding this Notion, we are to know, that before the Syſtem of the Elifian Fields and Tartarus, an Opinion not much older among the Greeks than Orpheus and Homer, the common Belief was, either that the Souls hovered about the Tombs, or haunted the Gardens and delightful Groves, which they had frequented during their Union with the Body. Hence theſe Places came to be the Objects even of religious Veneration; where it was uſual to invoke the Shades that were believed there to haunt; to propitiate them by Vows and Sacrifices, that they might vouchſafe to watch over the Flocks and Houſes. This is the original of the ancient Cuſtom of ſacrificing under green Trees, where the wandering Ghoſts were thought to take great Delight; a Cuſtom formerly obſerved by the antient Gauls or Celts, who ſacrificed under the Oaks, in the Celtick Language called Deru; whence came the Name of Dryads, and Hamadryads, or of thoſe who inhabited the Woods and Trees.

But what ſtill greatly confirms this Opinion is, that the Stars and higher Parts of the Universe were believed to be ſo many animated Beings (a); and this Notion was afterwards extended likewise to the Earth, the Groves, the Mountains, the Rivers, to all which tutelar Dieties were aſſigned. This is the Original of thoſe Divinities; but it muſt be owned, that in later Ages Women of all Sorts, from the Lady of Diſtinction to the ſimple Shepherdſſes (b), who had been in any Adventure (c), were denominated Nymphs. Thus our Poets, faithful Copiers of the Reveries of the Antients, frequently give the
Name

(a) See what we have ſaid under the ſeventh Source of Fables, V. 1. B. 1.

(b) This, we doubt not, is the Reaſon why Homer gives the Names of Nymphs to Phaetusa and Lampetia, who kept the Flocks of the Sun in Sicily.

(c) According to Servius, the Number of the Nymphs was reduced to 200. Hefiod reckons 300 of them, and I ſuppoſe it was indefinite, conſidering the Number of Perſons who got the Name of Nymphs.

Name Nymph to the illustrious Women, who enter into the Subjects of their Poems. In fine, we may add what Diodorus says (1), that the Wives of the Atlantides were commonly called Nymphs; which inclines me to think that this was the Country where the Opinion of the Existence of those Goddesses took its Rise, because the Place where the Souls of Heroes were said to dwell after Death, was in the delightful Gardens of Mauritania Tingitana, or near Mount Atlas.

The Pagans did not indeed believe these pretended Divinities to be immortal; but they were supposed to be very long-lived (2): Hesiod makes them live several thousand Years (3). Plutarch has determined their Number to be 9720 Years (a).

If you ask the Meaning of those many Metamorphoses of Persons transformed to Nymphs, Dryads, &c. I reckon when some Princess was carried off at Hunting, or perhaps perished in the Woods, the ordinary Resource of Flatterers was to say Diana, or some other friendly Divinity, had transformed her into a Nymph. The same Report was spread of those who out of Melancholy retired into the Woods, there to deplore their Misfortunes; for then if they died near some Fountain, it was usual to say, they were transformed into Nymphs, and upon this some Poem was composed wherein the Fountain was called after the Name of the Princess; as it happened to the pretended Egeria, that celebrated Nymph whom Numa Pompilius went to consult in the Forest of Aricia. That Prince, in order to persuade the Roman People of the Divinity of that religious Worship which he had a Design to establish, gave out that all the Ceremonies of it were dictated to him by a Nymph, with whom he feigned to have Intercourse under the Name Egeria. After the Death of their
King

(1) L. 3. (2) Pausan. (3) Theogo.

(a) In his Treatise of the Cessation of Oracles, where he reasons pitifully upon this Subject, however People may be willing to turn it to Allegory.

King, the Romans went in Search of this pretended Nymph, and having found nothing but a Fountain in the Place whether Numa used to retire, and where probably he was wont to perform some Hydromancy, as St. Augustin alledges, they imagined that the Nymph had been transformed into a Fountain. From this Example we may judge of all the other Fables that have been delivered about the Nymphs or Naiads.

We shall say nothing of the fine Description that Homer gives of the Grotto of the Nymphs; nor of those Verses where Horace represents to us Bacchus instructing the Nymphs (a): For the Reader would not be satisfied with the Allegories which some Authors make out of them, and far less with the impertinent Obscenity which a stoick Philosopher with all the Air of Gravity and Seriousness has thrown out upon the Occasion (i). But to omit nothing of Moment upon the Subject, I shall here subjoin a List of Nymphs and Naiads: Their Names in an alphabetical Order are these:

Acasta	Calypso	Doxo
Adma	Casinaria	Drymo
Ægeria	Cerceis	Dynamne
Ægle	Clio	Electra
Agatete	Clotho	Ephyre
Agave	Clymene	Erece
Amathia	Clytia	Eudore
Amphithoë	Corasice	Europa
Amphinome	Creseis	Eurybia
Amphitas	Cydippe	Eurymene
Amphyro	Cymodusa	Galatæa
Arethusa	Cymothoë	Galaxaura
Asia	Deiopcia	Glaucis
Atté	Dianaste	Halia
Bersé	Dioné	Hippo
Calianaste	Doris	Hyale
Calliroë	Dosithæa	Jacra
		Janira

(a) Vidi Bacchum docentem Nymphas.

(i) La Moine le Poëte in his Hexam. rust.

Janira	Nise	Sangaris
Janthé	Ocyroe	Spio
Idothæa	Opis	Styx
Idyia	Orithya	Syrinx
Laodicé	Panope	Thalessa
Lara	Panopea	Thalia
Leontademe	Pasitboé	Thero
Ligea	Peloris	Thespia
Limneria	Persa	Thetis
Lyceste	Perseis	Thoé
Lycerias	Petrea	Thyca
Marcia	Pherusa	Thyella
Melantho	Phcloé	Thisbé
Melite	Phyllidocé	Thorebia
Meloboris	Pitho	Thyche
Memnesthe	Plexaura	Thyro
Metis	Plione	Uranca
Minestra	Polydora	Xanto
Minopene	Proto	Zeuxo
Memeritis	Prymno	Zexo
Neso	Rhœdea
Nisæa	Sagaritis

We may remark by the by that some of these Nymphs are named twice, according to the different Manner in which the Poets, from whom Beger has taken this List, pronounced their Names ; and of others, we may observe, are the same with some the Muses.

CHAP. IX.

Of Eolus and the Winds.

EOLUS is also reckoned amongst the Gods of the Sea, because he was believed to be the God of Winds and Storms. This Prince, the Son of Hippotus, and whose Merit ranked him among the Sons of Jupiter, lived in the Time of the Trojan War, and reigned, if we may believe Servius and Varro, over the Islands which were first called Vulcanian, and afterwards got the Name of Eolian.
These

These Islands seven in Number, lie between Sicily and Italy. on the Side of the Promontory of Pelorus, as we are told by Diodorus and Pliny. Homer speaks only of one, which he calls Eolia, though there is none of them that goes by that Name, but he calls it from the Name of its King Eolus : It was undoubtedly that of Lipara, where there are a great many Vulcanos ; whence Aristotle, speaking of this Island, says, it appears bright in the Night Time by Fires. Strabo is of the same Opinion, and this is the Reason why they sometimes placed here Vulcan's Forges ; a fable founded upon the Name which the Phœnicians gave to that Island : Those first Voyagers having landed there, and seeing the Fires which broke forth from it, named it, as Bochart has remarked, Nibaras or Nebras, which signifies a Flambeau, a lighted Fire.

'Twas in these Islands that Eolus reigned when Ulysses arrived there. That Prince was renowned for Wisdom and Prudence, and Hospitality to Strangers ; he was ready to assist them with friendly advice as to the Dangers of Navigation (1). He applied himself especially to observe the Winds, by viewing the Smoak which arose from the Caves of Lipara, as Pliny remarks : He even carried these his Observations so far, by the Help of a little Astronomy (2), and by considering the ebbing and flowing of the Sea, as we are told by Strabo (3), that he frequently foretold what Wind would blow for some Days ; a Thing not impossible to be foreseen, when one finds, after long Experience of the Climate, that the Wind which prevails one Day, generally continues for some Days after. As he lived at a Time when Navigation was very imperfect, and when it was very difficult for them, if they once departed a little from the Coast, to return thither and escape the Storm, hence they had frequent Recourse to him, to know what Winds should blow while they were to be at Sea. Several Persons were the better for his Advice ;

(1) Diod. Sic. l. 5. (2) Ch. 1. (3) L. 8.

Advice ; and his Reputation went so far, that he was looked upon as the King of the Winds, their Lord and Superintendant (a).

The Poets afterwards disguise, this History by their Fictions. Homer, instead of saying simply that Ulysses, who had consulted that Prince, by not giving Credit to his Counsels, and staying out at Sea longer than he ought to have done, had suffered a violent Storm which destroyed his Fleet in the View of Ithaca, says in a figurative Manner, that Eolus had shut up the Winds in a Bag of Goats Leather, and had given them to Ulysses, with express Order not to meddle with it till a certain Day. He adds that the Companions of Ulysses, seeing him fast asleep, opened the Bag, imagining it contained his Treasures ; and that in a Moment the Winds issued out with Fury, and raised that horrid Storm in which they all perished. Virgil again has borrowed his ideas from the Greek Poet and further embellished the Subject. He says (1), Juno having a mind to keep Eneas from Italy, where she knew a Settlement was promised him by the Fates, repaired to Eolus into the Islands where he kept the Winds shut up in a deep Cavern (b), that she entreated him to raise a Storm to drive Eneas from Italy, and so forth. In like Manner the other Poets speak of him : some of them said, before Eolus took upon him the Direction of the Winds, they made a terrible Devastation upon the Earth ; that they had separated Sicily from the firm Land ;
that

(a) — Hic vasto Rex Æolus antro
Luctantes ventos, tempestateque sonoras
Imperio premit, ac vinclis & carcere fœnat.

Virg. Æn. l. i.

Homer says much the same.

(1) En. l. i.

(b) Seneca rallies Virgil for having shut up the Winds in a Cave, since they are only Winds by their impetuous Motion ; but this Criticism falls to the Ground of itself, since the Winds are in a Cave, much after the Manner of the Air in the Eolipike, whence it only wants to vent itself with Impetuosity ; so that this is but a Question about a Word.

that a Tempest of old had opened that famous Inlet of the Ocean into the Mediterranean, which we call the Streights of Gibraltar, &c.

We must not however imagine that this Circumstance of the Winds shut up in a Bag contains some hidden Mystery : The Mythologists indeed (a) have made several Discoveries therein about the Nature of the Winds, which would be admirable if the Authors of this Fable had ever thought of them. We may reckon Homer in this Fiction is alluding to some antient Custom, like that which is still used in Lapland, where you meet with several Seamen who sell the Winds to those that embark, and promise for a certain Sum of Money, to imprison those that might molest their Voyage. 'Tis probable that the Antients had some such Practice among them ; which had given Rise to this Fiction of Winds shut up in a Bag.

Eratoſthenes had not considered this Circumstance of the Fable in so serious a Light, when he said, he would undertake to shew all the Places which Ulyſſes had seen in his Voyages, when any one would find out the Person who had sewed up the Bag wherein the Winds were inclosed. This is a Piece of facetious Rallery, but the Force of it is quite broke by Polybius, who maintains, as has been several Times said of Fables in general, that the Substance of Ulyſſes's Voyage is true ; but that Homer had interspersed them with Poetical Fictions and physical Allegories. I take this, for Example, to be the Case as to what the Poet says of the twelve Children of Eolus, six Sons and six Daughters, who were married to one another : For if we understand not this Article literally, as Diodorus has done (1), we may suppose he meant the twelve principal Winds, that often unite their Forces together in Hurricanes.

But now that we are upon the Chapter of Winds, we shall remark, that Pagan Superstition went the length length of adoring them as Divinities : Sacrifices were offered to them upon undertaking a Voyage, as we learn from several Authors (a). Ovid mentions the Temple which Scipio erected to the Tempests : Augustus, according to Seneca (1), built a Temple in the Gauls to the Wind Cyrcius ; and Virgil says, Eneas sacrificed to the Zephirs a white Sheep : Pecudem Zephyris felicibus albam ; where 'tis proper to remark that the Greeks, in the Worship which they paid to the Winds, and in the Fable of Eolus, whom they made their Sovereign, had only imitated the oriental Nations, especially the Persians, who, according to Herodotus (2), ascribed a religious Worship to those blustering Divinities ; and to this Custom the Author of the Book of Wisdom is alluding, when he reckons among the Divinities of the Gentiles, the Air and the Winds : Aut ventum, aut celum aerem deos putaverint (3) ; and that at a Time when probably the Fables of the Greeks upon this Subject had not yet passed into the East.

(a) See Natal. Hist. of Eolus.

(1) L. 5.

To return to the History of Eolus, 'tis not amiss that we explain a Circumstance which Homer relates (4) of the Island of Lipara, where he reigned. That Poet says the Palace of Eolus resounded daily with Acclamations of Joy, and that there harmonious Sounds were to be heard : For 'tis probable that this is founded upon the Wonders that were reported concerning that Island. In one of the seven Islands of Eolus, says Aristotle (5), we are told that there is a Tomb concerning which strange Prodigies are related — We are assured that a Noise of Drums and Cymbals is there to be heard together with loud Acclamations, &c. 'Tis easy to see that what had given Rise to this, is, the Noise made by the Fire pent up in the Caverns of that Island ; and consequently Homer alludes to the antient Name of the Island, which was called the

(a) Tres Eryci vitulos, & tempestatibus agnam
Cedere - - - jubet. En. l. 3.

(1) Qu. nat. l. 5. c. 17. (2) L. 1. (3) Wild. c. 3.

(4) Odyss. l. 10. (5) Lib. de Incredibil.

Meligornis, as we learn from Callimachus (1). Diana, says he, went in quest of the Cyclops, and found them in the Island of Lipara (this is the Name it has at present; but then it was called Meligornis) &c. Borchart has very well remarked (2), that this subterraneous Noise, which we have been now speaking of, had given Occasion to call the Island by this last Name, since in the Phenician Language, Meloginin, or Menagginin, signifies the Island of those who play upon Instruments. The same Author derives also very happily from the same Language the Origin of the Name Eolus, and of this whole Fable, which had, no doubt, been written by the Phenicians; and 'tis probable that the Greeks finding in it the Word Aol, which, in that Language, like Aella in Greek, signifies a Storm; and having perhaps read in the same Annals the Word Aolin, that is to say, the King of Winds and Storms, formed thereof, after Homer, the proper Name of a Man whom they called Eolus.

But with Deference to the Authors of these Conjectures, I cannot be of their Mind. The Prince, whose History I have now given, was really named Eolus, and descended from the antient King of this Name, who was the Son of Deucalion, whose Descendants, after having given many Kings to Greece, sent several Colonies into the Lesser Asia, whose Coasts they peopled, and passed from thence into Italy; and of this last Transmigration Diodorus Siculus thus speaks (3); Mimas, the Son of Eolus, reigned in a Part of Thessaly: His Son Hippotus, who succeeded him, was Father to Eolus II. and he again of Arne, who gave her Name to the Capital of his Kingdom. This Princess having suffered her Gallant to debauch her, was sold by her Father to a Merchant of Metapontus, who brought her into Italy, where she was delivered in a little Time after of two Sons, who were adopted by their Master. Having after this been guilty of Murder, they were ba-

N n

nished

(1) Hymn to Diana. (2) Chap. L. 4. (3) L. 1.

nished from Metapontus. Eolus repaired to Liparus, the Son of Auson, who reigned over the Liparian Islands, whose Daughter he married, and succeeded him after his Death. Eolus had several Children: Astiochus the eldest reigned over the same Islands which were called Eolian, from the Name of their Father. Jocastes settled in the Confines of Rheggio; Xuthus, Androcleus, Pheremon and Agathyrsus, reigned in several Parts of Sicily, and their Descendants dwelt there till a Colony was sent thither by the Dorians. All these Circumstances we learn from Diodorus Siculus (1), Strabo (2) and Eustathius (3).

The Winds, as we have said, were also created Divinities; and tho' Antiquity has transmitted to us little or nothing about the Worship was paid to them, we learn however from Pausanias (4), "That " at the Foot of a Mountain, near Asopus, was to " be seen an Altar consecrated to the Winds, to " whom, says he, on a certain Night of the Year,
 " a Priest offers Sacrifices, and there about four " Trenches performs some secret Ceremonies of " an odd Nature, in order to appease their Fury.
 " The same Priest during the Ceremony sings some " magical Verses, which, they say, Medea made " use of in her Inchantments." There were also discovered some Years ago, near Nettuno in Italy, an Altar consecrated to the same Divinities, with this Inscription; Ara Ventorum. Herodotus (5) and Strabo assure us, that the antient Persians sacrificed to the Winds *, and consequently it cannot be doubted that they were looked upon as Divinities, since Sacrifice is the least ambiguous Mark of the Kind of Worship called Latria. Vitruvius speaks of that celebrated Tower of the Winds which was at Athens, whereof M. Spon, who discovered it, has given a Draught, and has described it in the second Volume of his Travels thro Greece (6). On this Tower were
 to

(1) L. 5. (2) L. 1. (3) Upon the seventh of the Odyss-
sey. (4) In Corinth. (5) L. 1. * ἀνέμους. (6) 1 P.
 i. 76.

to be seen the eight principal Winds represented with their Names; but nothing can be concluded from this Monument for the Worship paid to the Winds; Vitruvius speaks of it only as a singular Piece of Architecture.

This is the Substance of what may be inferred from the few Monuments we have extant, concerning the Manner of representing the Winds. Upon the Tower which we have been speaking of, the eight principal ones are represented like young Men with Wings, whereof one seems to be blowing, the other to be pouring Water from a Pitcher, &c. In a Manuscript of M. de Peyresc, preserved in the Library of S. Victor, is to be seen a Bas-relief representing some Divinities, with the Signs of the Zodiac, and a Wind blowing with a Satyr's Ears, and two Wings upon the Forehead like Mercury. In fine, the Wind which was by the Altar of Nettuno, is blowing into a Shell-trumpet much after the Manner of a Triton.

CHAP. X.

Of the Sirens.

WE all know that the Poets represent the Sirens as beautiful Women, who inhabited steep Rocks upon the Sea-shore, whither having allured Passengers by the Sweetness of their Musick, they put them to Death. Some will have them to be the Daughters of the River Achelous, and of the Nymph Calliope; others alledge that they sprang from the Blood of the Wound which Hercules gave the God of that River, by pulling out one of his Horns. Their Number is not determined. Homer reckons only two of them, others allow five; namely, Leucosia, Ligia, Parthenope, Aglaophon and Mopse; others, in short, admit only the three first of these now mentioned (1).

N n 2

Several

(1) Serv. in L. 5. Æn.

Several Fables are delivered about them : Ovid says they accompanied Proserpine when she was carried off, and that the Gods granted them Wings to go in quest of that Princess (a). 'Tis added, that in despair of hearing any Account of her, they settled at length upon those Rocks, where their Employment was to destroy those whom they allured thither.

Homer (1), who places the Sirens in the midst of a Meadow drenched in Blood from the Carnage of those whom they had destroyed (b), tells us Fate had permitted them to reign till some Person should over-reach them ; that the wise Ulysses was he who accomplished their Destiny, having escaped their Snares by stopping the Ears of his Companions with Wax, and causing himself to be fastened to the Mast of his Ship ; which, he adds, plunged them into such Despair, that they drowned themselves in the Sea, where they were transformed into Fishes from the Waste downward. With regard to these two Opinions of Homer and Virgil, to mention it by the By, a Question arose some Years ago, whether the Sirens were considered by the Poets as Fishes, or as Fowls. An illustrious Prelate (2) thought to decide the Matter by saying, before their Metamorphosis, that is to say, before they threw themselves into the Sea, they were looked upon as Fowls, because of the Wings which the Gods had given them ;

(a) An quia cum legeret flores Proserpina vernos,
De numero comitum missæ Sirenes eratis?
Quam postquam toto frustra quæstistis in orbe,
Proinus ut vestram sentirent æquora curam,
Posse super fluctus alarum insistere remis
Optastis ; facilesque Deos habuistis, & artus
Vidistis vestros subitis flavescere pennis.

Met. L. 6.

(1) Odyss. L. 11.

(b) Virgil places them on Rocks surrounded with dead Men's Bones.

Jamque adeo scopulos Sirenium adducta subibat,
Difficiles quondam, multorumque ossibus albos.

Æn. L. 5.

(2) Hactenus.

them ; but that they are to be reckoned from that Time among the Divinities of the Sea.

He ought to have added, that we are to consider the Sirens in three Periods of Time. First, they were beautiful Virgins, Nymphs who had nothing monstrous ; thus they were when they accompanied Proserpine, and gathered Flowers with her in the Meadows of Enna :

- - *Cum legeret flores Proserpina vernos,
De numero comitum mistæ Sirenes eratis.*

And that after having sought for that Princess by Land without finding her, they demanded Wings from the Gods to fly over the Seas :

*Protinus ut vestram sentirent æquora curam,
Posse super fluctus alarum insistere remis
Optastis ;*

Which was accordingly granted them :

- - - *Facilesque Deos habuistis, & artus
Vidistis vestros subitis flavescere pennis :*

From that Time we are to consider them as Fowls with Virgins Faces :

- - - Cum virginis ora geratis.

Lastly, From the Moment that they threw themselves into the Sea, in despair for Ulysses's having got the better of them, we are to consider them as Fishes and Divinities of the Sea.

However, not to dissemble, I am of Opinion that Huetius was mistaken, and that Antiquity never looked upon the Sirens to be Fishes ; neither Homer, who describes them only under the the Figure of voluptuous Women ; nor Virgil, nor Servius his Commentator; nor Ovid, who thus describes them:

- - - - Vobis, Acheloides, unde
Pluma, pedesque avium, cum virginis ora geratis?

Nor any other of the Antients, that I know of, had ever that Idea of them; and when Homer says, Despair for having been baffled by Ulysses, induced them to drown themselves in the Sea, he speaks nothing of their Metamorphosis into Fishes: 'Twas the Painters, the Sculptors, and the Relations of Travellers concerning the Siren-fish, that gave a Handle to represent the poetical Sirens under that Figure. We likewise find them upon antient Medals, with the Feet of a Cock or of a Sparrow (a), and of several other Figures (b).

If, after all these Disquisitions, we would trace this Fable to its Source, Servius will inform us that it derived its Origin from certain Princesses who reigned of old upon the Coasts of the Tuscan Sea, near Pelorus and Capreae, or in three small Islands of Sicily, which Aristotle calls the Isles of the Sirens. These petty Queens were very debauched, and by their Charms allured Strangers, who were ruined in their Court by Pleasure and Prodigality. This is, no doubt, the Foundation of all that Homer says of the Sirens (1), that they bewitch those who are so imprudent as to come near them and listen to their Songs; that they detain them in a capacious Meadow, where nothing is to be seen but Heaps of Bones and Carcasses which lie withering in the Sun. None that visit them once, adds the Poet, ever return to receive the Embraces and joyful Congratulations of their Wives and Children; all who doat upon their Charms are doomed to perish.

What

(a) See the Treatise upon this Subject by the Abbé Nicaise.

(b) Ovid: L. 5. Elean: L. 7. Servius in Æneid. Vossius de Idol. L. 3. and the Abbé Nicaise, loc. cit.

(1) Odyss. L. 12.

What Solomon says (1) of the Miseries to which those are exposed who abandon themselves to sensual Pleasure, exceedingly justifies the Idea given us of the Sirens by the Greek Poet, and by Virgil's Commentator. “ Those foolish Women, says the wise King, call Passengers who go right on their Way. “ Who so is simple, say they, let him turn in hither: Stolen Waters (that is stolen Pleasures) are sweet; and Bread eaten in secret is most pleasant: “ The Fools know not that Giants are there, and “ that her Guests are in the Depths of Hell.”

However natural the Explication is which Servius gives of the Fable of the Sirens, there are Authors of Opinion that it has no other Foundation but the equivocal Meaning of the Greek Word Syrein, which signifies to draw to oneself, or Syra, a Chain; or, according to Bochart, from the Hebrew Word Sir, which imports a Song, or Hymn, whence has been composed the Name of Sirens, as you would say singing Women.

May not I alledge, in order to reconcile these Authors, that there were really lewd Princesses who dwelt upon the Sea-coasts, and who gave Rise to all these Fables; but that the Name of Sirens was only given them in latter Times, because they who found in the ancient Language the Word Sir, or Syrein, which marked their Character, took it for their Name? And when it is said that they were the Daughters of the River Achelous, the Meaning is, that the Isle of Taphos, whence those Virgins are said to have departed when they came and settled at Carpæ, is at the Mouth of that River.

As to the Time when they lived, Ovid informs us it was in the Time of Proserpine, and that they accompanied that Princess in the Meadows of Mount Etna, where here Rape was committed. Homer makes them live in the Time of Ulysses, after the War of Troy; and I reckon these various Opinions may be reconciled by saying that they lived not all at the same Time, but after one another ; that their Reign continued to the Time of Ulysses, who perhaps put to Death the last Princess of that Island. We need not be surpris'd that the Poets have put together, in one continued Relation, all that concerned the Sirens: This is not the first Time that they have brought nearer, or removed farther, by many Ages, the Events of fabulous Times ; and this I take to be a better Solution, than to say that Homer, by the magnificent Fable of the Sirens, had no other View but merely to teach us that his Heroe avoided the Charms of Pleasure, he whom he makes to stay seven Years with Calypso, and to be captivated with Circe's Charms. I must not however omit the Opinion of an antient Author (1) who takes the Fable of the Sirens to have arisen from what was observed near the Promontories either of Sorentum, or Capræ, where was heard a Kind of harmonious Noise occasioned by the breaking of the Waves against the Rocks, among which they are pent up, by Means whereof, Passengers were drawn in thither, and sometimes suffered Shipwreck ; where we may observe, that this Circumstance contributed perhaps not a little to embellish the Fable ; at least such a Kind of Harmony, tho' much more disagreeable, contributed to that of Charybdis and Scylla, as shall be said elsewhere (2).

(1) Prov. C. 9.

BUT what shall we say to the Relations of Fishers, informing us that they have sometimes found Sirens in the Sea much like those Pictures of them which the Painters give, and which they have brought to the Courts of Princes ? As to that I answer, that sometimes Monsters have been found in the Sea, that had a Figure pretty much resembling that of a Woman, with a Fish's Tail, but very black and covered with Scales, which yet bore no Resemblance either to the Sirens or Tritons of the Poets ;

(1) Archip. V. Nat. L. 5. (2) History of Ulysses.

Poets; and we may reckon all these pretended Monsters, Satyrs, Nymphs, Sirens, &c. wherewith the Relations of Travellers are full, never to have existed but in what Rabelais calls the Country of Tapistry.

If I be farther asked what the holy Man Job understood (a), by saying he mourned for his Affliction with the Voice of Sirens? I presume he had an Eye to certain Birds, which, according to Pliny, (1) lulled Passengers asleep by the Sweetness of their Musick; and as these Birds frequented the Desarts, the Holy Man designed to express by them the doleful Solitude to which he was reduced: Sicut passer solitarius in tecto.

Some of the Scripture Interpreters are of Opinion that the Prophet Isaiab (2) had also the Sirens in his Eye, when he foretels that Jerusalem should be inhabited by Monsters that were to have the upper Part of their Body like a beautiful Woman, and the Feet and Tail of an Afs; at least it was this Notion had given a Handle to the antient Architect who built the Church of Notre-Dame at Paris, to have engraved upon one of the Porticoes a Siren with the Body of a Woman, and the Feet and Tail of that Animal. (3). The Septuagint, I own, and after them S. Jerom, have translated the Word Tanin which the Prophet has made use of, by that of Sirens; but 'tis plain Isaiab designed in that Place only to figure the Solitude to which Jerusalem was one Day to be reduced, by foretelling that the very Monsters should lodge there; nor has he any Allusion to the Fable of the Sirens, any more than the Prophet Jeremiab to the Lamiæ (b), who are

(a) Factus sum frater Sirenum, & sodalis passerum. Job cap. 30. v. 29

(1) L. 10. c. 49. (2) C. 3. v. ult. (3) Nicaise Loc. cit.

(b) Philostatus in vita Apol. says the Lamiæ had the Face as it were of a Woman, and a very white Neck, which they exposed are said to have displayed their Bosoms to Passengers, to entice and devour them, and were really a Kind of Dragons that lay concealed in Bushes, where they devoured the Passengers that came near them.

posed to Passengers in order to attract and then devour them. The Name of Lamia is thought to come from Lamor, which signifies a Rose-tree, or from laniare, to devour; or rather from the Arabick Word Lanama, which, according to Bochart, signifies the same Thing. There was once a Lamia Jupiter's Mistress, whose Children Juno destroyed: She turned so delirious, as to destroy all that came in her Way.

MYTHOLOGY and FABLES

Explain'd by

HISTORY.

BOOK III.

Of the Gods of the Earth.

THE antient Pagan World was not content with filling Heaven and the Sea with Gods and Goddeses, they also peopled the Earth with them. The Earth itself was a Divinity, and all its Parts had their particular Deities ; thus the Woods had their Dryads, their Hama-dryads, their Satyrs, &c. the Mountains their Oreades ; the Corns, the Gardens, the Fields, a Multitude of particular Gods who presided over them, and watched for the Preservation of the Fruits ; the Houses, their Lares and Penates, and each of these Gods had his proper Functions, his Honours and Worship. 'Tis true, most of these Divinities were only physical Beings, which owed their Original to Fear or Necessity ; it cannot however be denied that some of them may be reckoned animated Gods : These were illustrious Men, who distinguished themselves, either in the Culture of the Fields and Gardens, or
by

by some useful Invention in Husbandry, for which they received Deification.

Farther those Gods of the Earth and of the Country were not all of the Number of those whom Ovid calls the Commonalty of the Gods, some of them were of the first Order. Varro, who invokes them in the Beginning of his Work of the Country Life, says, there were twelve of them, whom he calls Consentes, different from those twelve great Gods of Counsel, whom we have spoke of in the first Volume. First Jupiter and Terra, the one the Father and the other the Mother. 2. The Sun and Moon, that are so much regarded in Seed-time, and that have a great Influence upon the Fruits of the Field, and upon the Harvest. 3. Ceres and Bacchus, whose Productions are so necessary to Life. 4. Robigus and Flora that prevent what is pernicious to the Earth, and make them flourish and ripen in Season. 5. Minerva and Venus, of whom one had the Care of the Olives, and the other of the Gardens. 6. The Water and Bonus-Eventus, because without Water the Earth remains parched, and has no good Success in its Productions, either produces no Harvest at all, or but a bad one.

Virgil in the Beginning of his Georgicks, makes much the same Invocation, and seems to have copied Varro :

*Lights of the World! Ye brightest Orbs on high !
That lead the sliding Year around the Sky :
Bacchus and fostering Ceres, heav'nly Pair,
If for Chaonian Mast the joining Ear
First did the Earth by your kind Gift produce,
And mix'd with crystal Streams the Cluster's Juice ;
And you blest Powers, still present to the Swain,
Hither ye Fawns, and you the Dryad train,
Your Gifts I sing : And Thou* whose Trident's Force
First clave the Earth, and raised the neighing Horse :
And thou the Guardian of the Sylvan Toil,† Whose full three hundred Steers graze Cæa's Isle :*

* Neptune. † Aristæus.

And

And Pan, if thy Arcadia be thy Care,
 Hither thou Guardian of the Flock repair :
 Minerva, for by you the Olives flow ;
 And you, fair Youth, the Founder of the Plough ;||
 And you, Sylvanus, with your Cypress Bough. }
 Come all ye Gods, and Goddesses that bear
 The suppliant Swain, and make the Fields your Care :
 You who the Bloom of seedless Fruits sustain,
 And you who on the sown send down the kindly Rain, &c.
 Essay on the Georgicks.

Such is the general Idea we are to have of the Gods of the Earth : Let us begin with the Genius who was thought to animate it.

C H A P. I. D E M O G O R G O N.

WE have Reason to place Demogorgon at the Head of the terrestrial Divinities, since he was the Genius of the Earth, as his Name imports (a). Boccace, in his Genealogy of the Gods (1), speaks of him upon the Authority of Theodotion, who had himself copied Prenapides, and what he says of him amounts to this. Demogorgon was a slovenly old Man, overgrown with Filth, pale and disfigured, who had his Dwelling in the Heart of the Earth. His Companions were Eternity and Chaos ; growing weary, they add, of this dismal Solitude, he made a little boul to sit upon, and having raised himself into the Air, encompassed the Earth, and so formed the Heavens. Having accidentally passed over the Acroceraunian (b) Mountains, he fetched from || Triptolemus.

(a) This Name is composed of two Greek Words, Δαίμων and γῆρας ; Genius or Intelligence of the Earth.

(1) L. 1.

(b) A Word signifying Thunder-struck. The Top of these Mountains sometimes sent forth Flames ; which is sufficient for explaining the Circumstances of the Fable.

from thence the burning Matter, which he sent to Heaven to enlighten the World, and thus formed the Sun, which he gave in Marriage to the Earth, whence were born Tartarus and the Night, &c.

The Authors now quoted give Demogorgon several Children, and Boccace has deduced their Genealogy. The first of his Children was jarring Discord. Demogorgon, said Pronapides, vexed in the Bottom of his Cave with the Pains that Chaos felt, opened her Womb and took from thence Discord, who left the Bottom of the Earth, to come and dwell upon the Surface. In like Manner he took from thence Pan, who is his second Son, and then the three Parce, Clotbo, Lachesis, and Atropos; next Heaven, Pitbo, and the Earth, who was his eighth Child. The Earth thereafter had several other Children, whose Father was not known; namely the Night, Tartarus, Pharce, Tages, and Antæus. The ninth of Demogorgon's Children was Erebus who had a numerous Offspring; but I am ashamed to relate such wild Dreams.

'Tis easy to conceive that this is only a physical Fable, a particular Theogony, under Mask whereof the Antients have wrapped up in a very gross Manner the Mystery of the Creation of the World, which they had learned from some lame Tradition. This or something like it I take to be the Manner in which this Fable was introduced. The Arcadians seeing the Earth of itself bring forth Flowers and Fruits, form Fountains, Streams, and Rivers; send forth frequently Fire and Flames, and liable to Convulsions, imagined that she was animated, and gave the Name of Demogorgon to the Divinity that presided over her. So great was their Veneration for this terrible Name, that it was not allowable to mention it; and we may reckon what Lucan (1) and Statius (2) say of the God whom 'tis not lawful to name, is to be explained of Demogorgon.

'Tis

'Tis probable the Philosophers meant no more by this Divinity, than that vegetative Principle which gives Life to the Plants (a) ; but the vulgar fancied it was a real God who resided in the Bowels of the Earth, to whom they offered Sacrifices, especially in Arcadia. We must not forget however what was the Opinion of some Authors, that Demogorgon had been a Magician so skilful in his Art, that he had Ghosts and aerial Spirits under his Command, made them absolutely subject to his Will, and severely punished those of them who did not execute his Orders.

C H A P. II.

Of the Earth adored under different Names.

THE Earth was one of the chief and most antient Divinities of the Pagan World, and there were few idolatrous Nations that did not pay her a religious Worship : What is more singular in this Case, the Philosophers were, or at least affected to be of the same way of thinking with the Populace. Plato, in his Timæus and de Legibus, says, the World, the Heavens, the Stars, and the Earth are so many Divinities ; Heraclides of Pontus, his Disciple, not to mention others, reckons the Earth also among the Gods, as to which you may consult Cicero in his first Book of the Nature of the Gods. The Earth we know had several Names : The most antient of all is that of Titæa mentioned by Sancho-niathon, Diodorus, and several other Antients. This Name, as has been said in the History of the Titan Princes who were her Sons, signifies Clay, or Earth, and consequently was very suitable to her, as well as that of Uranus to her Husband, which signified Heaven : And as the Pagans know nothing next to the

(a) Spiritus intus alit, totamque infusa per artus
Mens agitat molem.

Virg. Georg. l. 2.

the Chaos, older than the Heavens and the Earth, we may conclude that these were their two first Divinities. Another Name of the Earth was that of Rhea, the Wife of Chronus or Saturn, a younger Goddess by one Generation than Titæa, though frequently confounded with Diana, Ceres, and Proserpine, with this Distinction however, that Diana was taken for the upper Hemisphere of the Earth, and Proserpine, as also the God Tellumo, who was reckoned the same with Pluto, for the lower Hemisphere; lastly Ops & Tellus, Vesta, Bona-Dea, Cybele, the Great-Mother, were also other Names given to the Earth (a). Having said enough of the first of these Divinities, it only remains that we exhibit the antient Mythology relating to the others.

Varro, in St. Augustin (1), accounts for these different Names, and explains the Mystery of them. “ They believe, says he, that Tellus is the same “ with the Goddess Ops,[†] because she is improved by Labour (2); the Great-Mother, because she produces Aliments; Proserpine, because the Corns spring out of her Womb; Vesta, because she is cloathed with Herbs and Turf:
“ Thus it is they reduce several Goddesses to this one, and not without Foundation. She is also “ called, says the same Author, the Mother of the Gods: The Drum, which is given her, figures the Globe of the Earth, the Turrets she wears upon her Head, represent her Cities; the Seats with which she is surrounded, denote that she alone, while all Things are in Motion about her, remains fixed and immoveable. The Eunuch-Priests who serve her, point out that no more is “ needful for obtaining Grains and Seeds, but to “ cultivate

(a) We have three Hymns under Orpheus’s Name in Honour of the Earth, one under the Name of Rhea, the other under that of Mother of the Gods, and the third under her proper Name of Earth.

(1) De Civ. Dei, l. 7. c. 24. (2) Ops ab Operé.

“ cultivate the Earth, because all is to be found in “ her Womb. Their tossing and tumbling one an“ other before her, is to shew those who cultivate
 “ the Earth not to be idle, since they have al“ ways something to do. The Sound of Cymbals “ denotes the Noise that the Utenfils of Agriculture “ make ; and they are of Brass, because these U“ tenfils of old were made of that Metal before “ Iron was found out. The Lion unchained and “ tame, represents that there is no Ground so wild
 “ and barren, but may be subdued and cultivated.”

The Romans and other People of Latium sacrificed to the Earth, in the different Seasons of the Year. First, on the 24th of January, that she might give Growth to the Grains, and the other Fruits which she bears ; and the Festivals celebrated on that Occasion, were called the Holydays of the Seed- time, Feriæ sementinæ. The second Festival that was celebrated to her Honour, and in which she was invoked to receive from the Sun a moderate Heat, and favourable Rays for the Preservation of the Fruits, was called the Festival of Joy ; at least this is what I take to be the proper rendring of the Name of Hilaria that was given it : This was celebrated the eighth of the Kalends of April *, at which Time the Days, as Macrobius remarks (a), begin to be longer than the Nights.

Cælius Rhodiginus (1) reckons this Festival was celebrated in Honour of Pan ; but herein he is contradicted by all Antiquity, which attests that it was consecrated to the Earth, under the Name of Great Mother of the Gods. I might alledge in Proof of it, the Testimony of Numbers of Authors ; but I shall only name Herodian, who positively asserts
 O o it,

* 25th of March.

(a) Celebratur lætitiæ exordium ad octavum Kalendas Aprilis, quem diem Hilaria appellant, quo primum tempore sol longio-rem diem nocte protendit. Macro. Satur. l. 1. c. 21.

(1) Ant. 6. c. 16.

it (a), and in this has been followed by Lylio Gyraldi, Casaubon, Petavius, Lacerda, Lazius, Struck, Meursius, Gronovius, and several others.

The third Festival, which was celebrated the first Day of May in honour of the Earth under the Name of the good Goddess, was called Damium, from a Name of that Goddess whom they surnamed DAMIA, as we learn from Festus: Dea quoque ista Δαμία appellabatur. The Criticks are perplexed about the Signification of this Name, and assign several Etymologies of it; but Cicero lets us know the true one (b).

When the Time allotted for the Celebration of this Festival was come, the Vestals repaired to the House of the High-priest to offer a Sacrifice to the good Goddess, the mysterious Divinity to whose Name the Men were Strangers, it being communicated only to Women. This Sacrifice, instituted for the Preservation and Prosperity of the Roman People, was performed with great Apparatus, and wonderful Circumspection. They were at great Expences in adorning the House where the Festival was celebrated, and as the Night-time was devoted to this Ceremony, the Apartments were illuminated with a vast Number of Lights. The principal Care

was

(a) Veris initio, statō solemnique die pompam Matrī Deūm Romani celebrant. In ea, quæ apud quemque sunt divitiarum præcipua Supellexque pleraque imperatoria, materiæ aut artis spectandæ, præferri ante Deam solent. Passimque omnibus ludendi licentia permissa, sic ut personas inducant quas cuique libitum, nullamque non magistratum quoque imaginem, prout cujusque studium, representent: Sic ut non temere falsos a veris dignoscas.

(b) Δάμιον is a Word of the Dorick Dialect, and is put for Δημιόν, that is to say, Δημόσιον, publick. Paulus and his Followers have taken this Expression for an Antiphrasis, as if it signified that nothing was less publick than this Festival, which was celebrated in private by the Women; whereas the true Reason of the Name, is, that this Sacrifice was offered to the good Goddess for the Publick; thus Cicero understands it, Harusp. Resp. c. 17. Sacrificium bonæ Dæ per Virgines Vestales pro populo, seu salute populi Romani fiebat, & in ea Domo in qua erat imperium.

was to admit to the Solemnity none but Women, to debar from thence all the Men, even the Master of the House himself, his Sons, and all his Male-slaves. Superstition proceeded so far as to block up the Windows thro' which Passengers might possibly perceive so secret Mysteries, and even to draw Curtains over the Pictures that represented Men or Male Animals.

The same Veil which hid from us the Mysteries of Ceres Eleusis, has also left us in the Dark as to the secret Worship that was observed during the Festival consecrated to the good Goddesses. 'Tis not possible to speak with Certainty of the Name of this Divinity, and of the Homages that were paid to her. Even the Roman Historians own their Ignorance as to this Point, and what some of them have said of it amounts only to Conjecture. Macrobius attributes the Title of good Goddesses to Cybele, or to the Earth, because she being the Source of all Blessings, supplies our Necessities. Plutarch seems to confound her with Flora, another Sort of Divinity, whom we shall speak of in this Book. Varro alledges she was the Wife of Faunus, and that her Modesty and chaste Deportment procured her divine Honours. She was so chaste, adds this antient Author, that she never looked upon another Man but her own Husband. For this Reason Women only were admitted to the solemn Sacrifice that was celebrated every Year in honour of her Memory. Popular Superstition went even so far as to persuade themselves that the Goddesses would strike with Blindness every Man who should presume to cast an Eye upon the Mysteries that were the Objects of the Ceremony.

The Place where this nocturnal Festival was celebrated was adorned with Flowers and various Foliages; Myrtle however was excepted, either because, according to the fabulous Tradition delivered by Plutarch, Faunus employed the Branches of that Shrub to punish the Intemperance of his Wife, who had drunk Wine contrary to the Custom of those Times, or because the Myrtle is consecrated to Venus an unchaste Goddess, whose Worship did not correspond with that of a Goddess acknowledged by the Romans to be the Standard of conjugal Chastity.

Tho' most Moderns have been of Opinion that the Celebration of this mystical Sacrifice was restricted to the High-priest's House, yet we have a Proof of the contrary in Cicero's Discourse upon the Responses of the Aruspices. He says, the Place prescribed for this Solemnity, could be no where else but in the House of the first Magistrates, who, by Prerogative annexed to their Offices, had what he calls Imperium, that is, an absolute Authority, and the Privilege of the Auspices. Now this Privilege belonged only to the Consuls and Priests : The same is confirmed by Dion (1) ; and Plutarch informs us, that in the Time of Cataline's Conspiracy, the Roman Ladies celebrated the Festival of the good Goddess in the House of Cicero, who was then Consul.

This Festival, as I said, was celebrated the first of May, which is only to be understood from the Time of the Reformation of the Kalendar by Julius Cæsar ; for before that Time, it fell in the Month of December, as is easy to prove from Cicero's second Letter to Atticus (2) ; 'tis dated the first of January, and there Cicero mentions Clodius's outrageous Attempt against those Mysteries, as a recent Piece of News. The Kalendars that followed the Julian Reformation, fixed this Festival to the first Day of May.

We may add that the Greeks had also their good Goddess, and as little known as that of the Romans, by reason of the Care taken to conceal the infamous Rites that accompanied her Mysteries.

As to the Adventure of Clodius, who introduced himself in Disguise into the House of Cæsar, at the Time of celebrating the Festival of the good Goddess, which obliged that Dictator to repudiate his Wife

(1) L. 57. (2) L. 1.

Wife Pompeia, we say nothing of it farther, it being a Fact so universally known.

In fine, the fourth Festival in honour of the Earth, was called Opalia, from Ops, one of the Names of that Goddess. Antiently it was celebrated the fourteenth of the Kalends of January *, the same Day with the Saturnalia, which has induced Suidas to think that this last Festival was celebrated both in honour of Saturn and of the Mother of the Gods ; wherein he is certainly mistaken, since, at the Time of the Reformation of the Kalendar, the Saturnalia passed to the sixteenth † of the Kalends of January, while the Opalia continued to be celebrated on the fourteenth.

'Tis not well known under what Figure the Romans represented the Earth ; probably it was under that of a Woman ; but what particular Symbols distinguished her from other Goddeſſes, is what we are ignorant of. For tho' ſhe was often confounded with Cybele, and the others whom we have named, yet ſhe had a proper Image, and a peculiar Worſhip. We ſee her ſometimes represented under the Figure of a Globe.

CHAP. III.

Of Cybele, or the Mother of the Gods.

SO many Particularities are told concerning this Goddess, that tho' she is the same with the Earth, yet we thought she required a particular Chapter. I shall first present you with her History as we have it in Diodorus Siculus (1).

“ The Phrygians say, they had once a King “ named Meon (a), who reigned also over Ly-
 O o 3 dia ;

* 19th of December. † 17th of December.

(1) L. 3. C. 30.

(a) This Meon, whom Xanthus, in Diomysius of Halicarnassus, calls Manes, was probably the first King of Lydia; accordingly we “ dia ; this Prince married a Wife named Dindy- “ me (a), by whom he had a Daughter. Having no “ Mind that she should be brought up, he exposed “ her upon Mount Cybele : The Gods, however, “ permitted her to be suckled by She-leopards and “ other savage Animals. Some Shepherdesses of the “ Place having discovered the Infant, carried her “ home with them, and called her Cybele from the “ Place where they had found her. She being “ grown up, surpassed her Companions not only in “ Beauty and Wisdom, but also in Genius and In“ vention : For she found out a Flute composed of “ several Stops, and she was the first who intro“ duced into Conforts Timbrels and Drums. She “ cured, by Purifications and Musick, the Diseases “ incident to Children and Cattle. As she had saved

 “ many Children, and used frequently to hug them
 “ in her Arms, hence she was unanimously called, “ Mother in the Mountain. The chief of her Fa“ vourites was Marfyas the Phrygian, a Man esteem“ ed both for natural and moral Endowments (b).

“ Cybele, now become marriageable, fell in love
 “ with a Youth of the Country, called first Atys, “ then Papas. Her Relations found her out at the “ Time of her having had secret Commerce “ with him, and being with Child to him. They “ conducted her, by Accident, to the Court of the “ King her Father. The Prince believed her at first
 “ to be a Virgin ; but having discovered the con“ trary, he put Atys to Death, and the Shepherdesses we are told that he was the Son of Jupiter ; for in the Stile of ancient Authors, the Beginning of the historical Times of every Nation is described as the Beginning of Mankind, and when the Succession of Kings ceases to be known, they make the Earth to be inhabited by the Gods, from some one of whom the first King is always descended. This Meon, or Menes, gave his Name to the Memians.

. (a) Xantus gives Meon to Wife Callirhoe the Daughter of Oce- anus, or the Ocean.

(b) See what has been said of this Marfyas in the History of Apollon.

“ ses who had found and nursed his Daughter, and “ ordered their Bodies to lie unburied. Cybele, trans“ ported with Passion for the young Atys, and in “ Anguish for the Disaster of her Nurses, turned “ delirious, running thro’ the Country, beating “ Drums and shrieking aloud. Marsyas pitying her “ unhappy Fate, on account of Friendship that was “ formerly between them, thought fit to follow
 “ her: They arrived together at Nyssa where Bac- “ chus resided, and there they found Apollo.

“ ’Tis said that Apollo, after he had consecrated “ in the Cave of Bacchus, his Lyre and Marsyas’s “ Pipes, grew enamoured of Cybele, and accompa“ nied her in her Ramblings as far as the Hyperbore-
 “ an Mountains. About that Time the Phrygians
 “ were afflicted with cruel Distempers, and the “ Earth no longer produced Fruit. Having de“ manded of the Oracle a Remedy to their Cala“ mities, ’tis said they were ordered to inter the Bo“ dy of Atys, and to honour Cybele as a Goddess:
 “ But the Body of Atys being intirely consumed by “ Time, they represented it by a Figure, before “ which they made great Lamentations, to appease
 “ the Wrath of him whom they had unjustly put “ to Death, a Ceremony which they have reserved “ to this Day. They instituted in honour of Cybe- “ le annual Sacrifices, on the same Altars which she “ had formerly erected: At length they built to “ her a stately Temple in the City Pessinus in Phry- “ gia, and there founded Festivals.”

The Author, whom I have been copying, whose Work was composed of different Pieces which he had collected, either by reading, or in his Travels, after having spoke thus of Cybele in the third Book, delivers a quite different Tradition of her in the fifth. “ By the Commerce, says he, which Jupiter “ had with Electra, one of the Daughters of Atlas, “ were born Dardanus, Jasion, and Harmonia: She “ having espoused Cadmus, when in quest of Euro- “ pa he had gone as far as Samothrace, the Gods

“ vouchsafed to be present at the nuptial Feast;
 “ several of them made Presents to the married Cou“ ple, and all the other Gods approved the Mar“ riage by Acclamations of Joy. As for Jasion, “ ’tis said that he espoused Cybele, and had by that “ Goddess a Son named Corybas; but not long after “ having been deified, Cybele and Corybas retired in-
 “ to Asia, whether they introduced the Mysteries of “ the Mother of the Gods. Cybele after this mar“ ried the first Olympus, by whom she became the “ Mother of Alæa, to whom she gave her own “ Name Cybele. Corybas again had matched with “ Thebe the Daughter of Cilix, and gave the Name
 “ of Corybantes to those Enthusiasts who celebrated
 “ the Mysteries of the Goddesses.”

Arnobius says, Atys was a Youth who kept Flocks, and that Cybele, even in her old Age, became ena-moured of him (a); and notwithstanding her being a Queen, he still received her with Disdain; whence Tertullian says Cybele had sighed for an ungrateful
 Youth (b). Midas, the King of Pessinus, continues Arnobius, seeing the high-spiritedness of the young Shepherd, conceived great Hope of him, and designed his Daughter for him in Marriage; but dreading the Jealousy of the amorous Queen, had the Precaution to order the City-gates to be shut on the Day of celebrating the Marriage. Cybele ap-prized that a young Rival was going to take away her Gallant, run, like one frantick, to Pessinus, and having got the Gates broke open, or obliged the Guards to allow her Access, which the Fable expresses by saying she had burst them open with a Bounce of her Head, she entered into the City with her Troops, made great Havock in it, and having at last found Atys hid behind a Pine, she served him in
 the

(a) Contra decus ætatis, illa Pessinuntia Dindymene in bubulei unius amplexu flagitiosâ appetitione gestire, Lib. 4. adversus gentes.

(b) Cybela Pastorem suspirat fastidiosam, Apoll. C. 15.

the same Way as Cælus had been by his Son (a). Agdistis, for this was the Name of Cybele's Rival, not being able to survive the Disgrace of her Lover, killed herself thro' desperate Grief, Servius (1), Tatian (2), Lactantius, and S. Augustin, relate somewhat differently the Story of Cybele and Atys; but still it appears to turn upon the Amours of an old Queen for a young Man who slighted her. Some Authors alledge the whole of it has no other Foundation, but that the young Atys being Priest of Cybele, kept not the Vow of Chastity which he had made to her, whereupon he punished himself in that cruel Manner; and that the Circumstances of his being transformed by the Goddess into a Pine-tree was only added, because that Tree was consecrated to her. But 'tis more probable, as Vossius remarks (3), that it refers to a true History; and the Difference which occurs upon this Subject among Authors, ought not to remove us from this Opinion, since it is hardly possible to find Uniformity in so antient Histories.

Catullus, who has composed a little Poem upon the Amours of Cybele and Atys, informs us only that this young Prince having quitted the Place of his Nativity, retired into the Woods of Phrygia, where having castrated himself through some Transport of Rage, Cybele took him into the Number of her Priests: Others of the Antients say, that being beloved by Cybele, he punished himself in that Manner, for having been moved by the Charms of the beautiful Sangaris; or rather we reckon that Cybele, being now old when she fell in Love with this young Atis, gave him some Potion to force his Love, and

(a) Minutius Felix alludes to this Story, when he says: Cybele Pyndimene, pudet dicere, adulterum suum infelicitè implicitum, quoniam ipsa deformis erat & vetula, ut multorum Deum matrem, ad stuprum illicere not poterat, exsecuit: Ut Deum scilicet faceret Eunuchum. In Octav.

(1) Upon the 9th Eneid. (2) Contra Gentes. (3) De Orig. Idol. l. 1. c. 10.

and that this Potion being too violent, drove the Youth to perform that unnatural Operation upon himself.

'Tis probable that all these Stories are founded upon the Plurality of Persons who bore the Name of Cybele. The first I take to be the same with Titæa, Cælus's Wife, whose Name imports the Earth. The second is the same with Rhea, the Sister and Wife of Saturn: The third a Princess of Phrygia, who lived in the Time of Marsyas, whose History has been filled up with the Adventures of the others, because they had dwelt in Phrygia where the Titan Princes kept their Court (a). This is the Country where the Worship of our Goddess was established: The Priests in after-Times perplexed her History, and gave her the Name of Cybele, from a Mountain in Phrygia. Others derive this Name from the Hebrew Word which imports to bring forth with Sorrow, and pretend that the Tradition of Eve, condemned to the Pains of Childbearing, is couched under this Fable. Circumstances quite inexplicable were added to it: They gave out that Nana by touching a Pomegranate, or an Almond-Tree which had sprung from the Blood of Agdistis, whom Bacchus had sacrificed to his Resentment, had conceived Atys, and therewith they intermix Obscenities which contain the most abominable Mysteries of the Pagan Theology, as Arnobius reproaches them (1).

The Worship of Cybele became famous, especially in Phrygia; her Festivals there were solemnized with great Uproar: The Priests making the Din of their Tabrets to resound, and striking their Bucklers with Spears, danced and made several strange Contortions with their Heads and whole Body, whence they got the Name of Corybantes: With these they mingled Skrieks and Howlings to deplore the Death of Atys, to whose Punishment those wretched Priests voluntarily voluntarily submitted. They were called Galli, and the High Priest Archigallus, as has been said in the first Volume (1). We know not exactly what was the Original of the Name : 'Tis not probably, as S. Jerom alledges (2), because none but Gauls were taken to be Priests of Cybele, and that they were thus treated for having been the Authors of burning Rome ; nor yet because the first Priest of that Goddess was called Gallus (3) ; but rather, as Ovid (4) and Festus insinuate, from the River Gallus, near which these Priests inflicted upon themselves the Punishment we are speaking of, to fulfil the Law which Cybele had prescribed to them. The Effect of the Water of that River was to throw them into Fits of Enthusiasm ; Qui bibit, inde furit, as Ovid has it. It was for the same Reason that they honoured the Pine-Tree, near which Atys had been castrated ; crowned its Branches, and covered the Trunk with Wool, because the Goddess had thus covered the Body of her dead Lover, hoping to restore him to Life ; that they abstained from eating Bread, because Cybele had observed a long Fast in Token of her deep Distress (5). In short, all their other Ceremonies seemed to be nothing else but a Memorial of the Story which I have related ; but because the Fable of Cybele, historical in its Original, became afterwards of a physical Nature, that Goddess being taken for the Earth, hence her Worship came to be blended with several Circumstances that had a Relation thereto.

(a) See Don Pizron Antiq. of the Language of the Celtæ.

(1) Adv. Gentes.

And indeed the Antients have always confounded Cybele with the Earth, who was therefore called the Mother of the Gods, since 'tis she gives Birth to all things ; but they gave other Names to this Goddess which it is necessary to take Notice of. That of Rhea comes from the Verb ρεειν, to flow, because of the Showers that fructify the Earth ; or rather rather from the Word ἔρα, Terra, by a simple Transposition of Letters ; and this Word again derives its Original from the Hebrew, erets, which has the same Signification. She was likewise termed Vesta, quia floribus vestiebatur ; or Maia, which signifies Mother or Nurse ; γῆ μήτηρ, that is Mother Earth. The Name of Pessinuntian Goddess, was taken from a City of that Name, where she was peculiarly worshipped, as those of Berecynthia (a), of Dindymene, and some others, from Places that went by those Names. That of Idæa, from Mount Ida in Phrygia, whereon she had a Temple, which Claudian describes with a great deal of Elegance (1).

1) B. 3. (2) In cap. 4. Hose. (3) Steph. upon the Word Gallus. (4) Fas. l. 4. (5) V. Arnob. l. 5.

The Romans celebrated an annual Festival, wherein Combats were intermixed in Honour of Cybele, under the Name of Idæan ; and that they might not recede from the Ceremonies practised in the Temple which we now have, been speaking of, they used the Ministration of a Phrygian Priestess. That of Metragyrte, which was given her by the Greeks, signified that she was the Great Mother ; as Pessithea (b), imported that she was the Mother of all the Gods. She was also called Portophoros, Turret-Bearer, because she was always represented with Turrets upon her Head (c). Valerius Flaccus gives her the Surname of Mygdonia, which is taken from a Place of that Name in Phrygia, where she was worshipped (d), as also that of Andirine : For Strabo (2) informs us, that near to Andira was a Temple consecrated to the Mother of the Gods, surnamed for that Reason Andirine : The same Author farther remarks that this Goddess was called Adporina, from a wild and steep Mountain,

(a) Berecynthus erat castellum Phrygiæ juxta Sangarium fluvium, ubi mater Deum colebatur. Servius.

(1) De raptu Proserp.

(b) As much as to say, πᾶσι θεοῖς μήτηρ.

(c) The Latins rendered this Denomination by that of Turrita, or Turrigera.

(d) Mygdoniæ Pan justa ferens sævissima Matris. Val. Flac. L. 6.

(2) L. 15.

Mountain, that was near Pergamus, where she had also a Temple that went by the same Name. Arrian is the only Author I know who gives Cybele the Epithet of Phasiana : 'Tis in his Periplus of the Euxine Sea, where he says, in going up to the Phasis, was to be seen on the right, the Figure of a Goddess holding in one Hand a Drum, with Lions under her Throne, like the Cybele or Rhea of Athens, the Work of Phidias.

She was represented as a Woman of a strong robust Make, ready to be delivered, to figure the Fruitfulness of the Earth: All the rest of her Equipage alluded to the same. The Keys which she held in her Hand, intimated that the Earth comprehends in her Womb during the Winter, the Seeds of all Fruits. Her Crown of Oak, was a Memorial that Men of old had fed upon the Fruits of that Tree. Her Temples were round, to figure the Roundness of the Earth: She was crowned with Turrets, in Allusion to the Cities that are upon it: In her Chariots were Lions couchant and tame, to intimate that even the most uncultivated Lands, are capable of being made fertile: If she was sitting, it was to denote her great Repose (a). The Sound of the Drums and Spears, carried an Allusion to the Tools of Brass that were employed in labouring the Ground before the Invention of Iron.

The Worship of the Earth is very antient, and 'tis not in Phrygia that we are to seek for the Original of it, since it was not received in Europe till the Time of Cadmus, who introduced it thither; and it was Dardanus, contemporary with that Founder of the Colony, that after the Death of his Brother Jasion repaired with Cybele his Sister-in-Law, and Corybas his Nephew into Phrygia, whether they introduced the Mysteries of the Goddess Earth, or of the Mother of the Gods. Cybele derived her Name to this Goddess, and Corybas made her Priests to to be called Corybantes. This is the Reason why Cybele herself came in Proceſs of Time to be reckon- ed the Mother of the Gods.

(a) All this is taken from St. Augustin, L. 7. de Civ. Dei, C. 24.

Though Dionysius of Halicarnassus (1) is not quite agreed with Diodorus, ſince he alledges that Dardanus founded only the Samothracian Myſteries which Chryſes his Spouſe had learned in Arcadia, and that it was only their Son Idæus introduced into Phrygia thoſe of the Mother of the Gods : Yet we ſtill ſee at what Time thoſe Myſteries were introduced thither, by knowing the Time when thoſe Perſons lived (2). If we may believe Lucian (3), there are a great many Proofs that the Syrian Goddeſs is the ſame with Rhea, ſince the one as well as the other has her Lions, Tabrets, Eunuch-Prieſts, and her Head crowned with Turrets. Macrobius alledges, the Goddeſs Atergatis of the Syrians was among that People the Symbol of the Earth (a). Here then is the Worſhip of the Earth already eſtabliſhed in Syria : But the People of that Country were not the real Founders of it, but had borrowed it from the Egyptians who honoured the Earth under the Name of Isis. This is what we learn from Servius (4), and from Iſidorus after him : Isis Lingua Ægyptiorum eſt Terra. Macrobius and ſeveral other Authors, ſay the ſame, and Herodotus grants Isis to be the ſame with Ceres, a Divinity always confounded with the Earth ; and this is the Reason why the Egyptians made Uſe of Tabrets and other ſuch like Inſtruments in the Feaſts of Cybele, as Auſonius has it :

Iſiacos agitant Mareotica ſiſtra tumultus.

What I have ſaid here is not inconſiſtent with the Hiſtory of Isis I have given elſewhere, ſince the

(1) L. 1. (2) See in the VIth Vol. the Hiſtory of Cadmus.

(3) De Dea Syria.

(a) Affyrii Deo Adad nomen dederunt : ſubjungunt ei Deam Adargatim, Solem Terramque intelligentes. Saturn. L. 1. c. 23.

(1) In 8. Æn.

the same Divinities were frequently the Symbols of several different Things: This no Doubt is the Origin of the Worship of the Earth, which was propagated with the other Egyptian Ceremonies, first to Syria and Phœnicia, then into Phrygia, which is a Part of Asia Minor, from thence into Greece, and last of all into Italy: This is the common Course of the Fables and Idolatry. But to say something more positive as to the particular Worship of Cybele, 'tis proper to remark, that it having been established even in the Time of her Father Meon, according to Diodorus Siculus, and of the Appearance of her Statue at Pessinus, reckoned in one of the Epochs of the Chronicle of Paros, to have been in the 257th Year before the taking of Troy, and some Years after the Arrival of Cadmus and Danaus into Greece, it will follow that the Reign of Meon and the Commencement of the Mysteries of Cybele falls towards the Year 1580 before the Christian Æra.

The Romans distinguished themselves no less than the Phrygians by the Worship of this Divinity. That People, directed by some of the Sibylline Verses, sent a famous Embassy to Phrygia, to bring the Statue of that Goddess, which was of a black Stone, and they received it with a great deal of Pomp and Solemnity. Grave Authors tell us, that the Ship upon its Return having stopped at the Mouth of the Tyber, so as none were able to move it forward, they were obliged to consult the Sibylline Oracle; and were informed, that a Virgin was to introduce it into the Port. Then Claudia (She of the Vestals whose Reputation was the most dubious) looking upon this as a fine Opportunity for proving her Virtue, which had only been suspected from her too free Behaviour, joyned with her great Care about Dress, invoked the Goddess aloud by Prayer; and having fastened her Girdle to the Ship, she brought it forward without Resistance; by which she gained universal Admiration. Tertullian, I know, attributes
this

this Event to the Devil ; while others think the cunning Vestal took Advantage of the Wind which then began to blow ; but I may say without any Danger of outraging venerable Antiquity, that Claudia was either very presumptuous or very superstitious to tempt the Goddess in that Manner.

The Romans never failed once a Year to wash the Shrine of this Goddess in the River Almon, as we learn from several Authors (a). Ammianus Marcellinus says, this Ceremony was performed on the sixth of the Kalends of *April ; and Herodian, in the History of the Emperor Commodus, adds that unbounded Licentiousness reigned in the Feasts of this Goddess ; Passimque omnibus ludendi licentia permissa, &c. This Author says farther, that they used to carry about at that Solemnity their most sumptuous Moveables and Plate.

C H A P. IV.

Of Vesta and the Vestals.

TO speak of this Goddess with some Accuracy, we are to remark, that as they distinguished two Vestas, the one was reckoned the Symbol of the Earth, and the other of the Fire ; and their Worship was somewhat different. After what we have said of Cybele, we have nothing to add to the History of Vesta taken for the Earth ; we shall only consider what relates to this Goddess as representing the Fire. Her Worship consisted chiefly in preserving the Fire which was consecrated to her. The Romans had Virgins set apart for this Employment whom they termed Vestals : Eneas is thought to have been the Founder of this Order in Italy, which Numa Pompilius re-established afterwards. They chose for Vestals young Virgins between the Age of fix

(a) Lucan, l. 1. Ov. 4. Fast. Val. Flaccus, l. 1.

* 27th of March.

himself into the midst of the Flames, when the Temple of the Vestals was on Fire, and those timorous Priestesses fled; by which he was honoured with a Statue in the Capitol, with a glorious Inscription. This Temple was built by Numa, Romulus never having dared, whatever Devotion he had for the Goddesses, to erect one for Fear of renewing the Memory of his Mother's Crime, and of authorising by her Example the Licentiousness of other Vestals; contenting himself, as we learn from Dionysius Halicarnassensis, with building small Chapels to Vesta in each Tribe.

'Tis agreed, that the Worship of the Goddess Vesta, and of Fire, was brought into Italy by Eneas and the other Trojans who landed there; but the Phrygians themselves had received it from the eastern Nations. The Chaldeans had a high Veneration for the Fire, which they accounted a Divinity: There was, in the Province of Babylon, a City consecrated to this Usage, which was called the City of Ur, or of Fire. The Persians were yet more superstitious in this Respect than the Chaldeans: They had Temples which they called Pyræa, Fire-temples, set apart solely for the Preservation of the sacred Fire, as has been said in the History of the Persian Gods (1), where we have shewn that the Worship of the Fire had made its Way into the most distant Countries, and even as far as Peru, and other Countries of America. We have only to add here, 1. That it was not only in Temples and in the Pyræa that the sacred Fire was preserved, since every private Person was obliged to maintain it at the Gate of his House; and hence, if we may believe Ovid (2), came the Name of Vestibule. Virgil gives us to understand, that Æneas, before he left his Father's Palace, had removed the Fire from the sacred Hearth (a). 2. That the Name of Vesta is synonymous with that of Fire, called by the

(1) V. 3. B. 8. (2) Fast 1. 6.

(a) Æternumque Adytis effert penetralibus ignem. Æn. 1. 2.

the Greeks Esta (a), by the Chaldeans and the antient Persians Avesta. This, if we may rely upon the learned M. Hyde, was, doubtless, what induced the famous Zoroaster to call his Book, where the Worship of the Fire was explained, by the Name Avesta, as much as to say, The Preservation of the Fire (1).

We have been very cursory in the History of the Vestals; such as desire a more circumstantiate Account of them may read the Treatise of Justus Lipsius, and what is published upon this Subject by the Abbé Nadal.

Such were the Divinities who represented the Earth in general; but vast Numbers of others were introduced, tho' of a lower Rank, for each of its Parts. There were some for the Fields, and for the Stones that bounded them; for the Gardens and Orchards; for the Woods and Groves; for the Mountains and Hills; for the Flocks and their Keepers; for the Oxen and the Horses; for the Corns and the Harvests; for the Cities and Villages; for the High-ways and Cross-ways; for the Houses, &c. as shall be shewn in the following Chapters.

C H A P. V.

Of the God Terminus.

IF the Boundaries which separate the Fields had always been kept sacred, Laws and Religion needed not to have lent their Assistance against those who encroached upon them. The golden Age, whereof the Poets speak so much, that happy Time when all Goods were common, was but a Period of short Duration; and the same Covetousness which led Men to appropriate some Things to themselves, tempted them very soon to usurp what belonged to others;

P p 2

(a) Esta. unde Vesta, mutata aspiratione, in V. Kossius:

(1) De Rel. Vet. Pers.

others: Hence the Origine of those Boundaries which the Laws obliged every particular to fix to the Ground he possessed. If we may credit Virgil, Ceres herself, that famous Legislatress, who did so much Honour to the Culture of the Fields and to Tillage, was the first that founded the Law binding every one to bound his Grounds : Partiri limite campum. Plutarch traces not the Custom of Land-marks so high, at least with regard to the Romans, since he expressly says, that before Numa Pompilius, the Fields and Possessions that were in the Extent of that Peoples Territory, had no determined Limits, either by Trees, or Stones, or by any other Mark that can distinguish their Extent. But 'tis neither in the Greek nor Latin Authors we are to seek for the Institution of antient Usages. That of bounding the Fields appears to have been established from the earliest Ages, and I am apt to think the Egyptians were the first Founders thereof. As the Nile, by its periodical Inundations, confounded their Lands, they applied themselves to Geometry, whereof they are reckoned the Inventors, that after the Disorder occasioned by the Inundation, every one might have his own assigned to him : But as this Way of surveying the Fields of every individual was tedious and troublesome, 'tis probable that a more easy Method was instituted instead of it, by placing Boundaries that would hold out against the Disorders of their River. M. de Boze, Secretary to the Academy of Belles Lettres, who has made a learned Dissertation upon the God Terminus (1), which I shall make good use of in this Chapter, observes that the Egyptians received from the Hebrews the Custom of bounding the Fields, and that Moses (2) does not appoint his People to set Bounds to their Lands, since the Thing was settled every where; but only forbids them to encroach upon them.

However,

(1) Mem. de l'Acad. T. i. P. 50. (2) Deut. C. 19.

However, as the Laws established for the Security of the Land-marks, were not a sufficient Curb to Avarice, Numa persuaded the People that there was a God the Protector of the Land-marks, and Avenger of Incroachments. He even built a Temple to him upon the Terpeian Mount, and regulated the Ceremonies thereof. To make the Supposition more probable, he made this new God to be represented under the Form of a Stone or Stock, as we learn from Tibullus (1) and Ovid (2); and if we may believe Lactantius (a), that Stone was the same which Saturn had swallowed instead of Jupiter. The God Terminus, however, was represented afterwards with a human Body, placed upon a pyramidical Land-mark.

The Feast of this God was called from his Name Terminalis, and was celebrated about the End of February, on the sixth of the Kalends of March. On that Day publick and private Sacrifices were offered to him, but without any Effusion of Blood; the whole Ceremony consisted in Libations of Wine, Milk, Offerings of Fruits, and some Cakes of new Meal. The publick Sacrifices were offered in the Temples, and the others upon the Land-marks; the two Parties whose Lands touched one another, having on each Side adorned the Boundary with a Garland, offered to it their Gifts, as we are told by Ovid (b). Then they anointed it with Oil prepared upon the very Spot, and thus concluded the Festival. But this primitive Simplicity lasted not long; they forgot Numa's Law forbidding any animated Thing to be offered to the God Protector of the Marches, whose Worship was to be wholly rural, and in after

P p 3

Times

(1) Eleg. L. 1. (2) Fast. L. 2.

(a) This Stone was called by the Latins Aladir, and Bætyle, by the Greeks. See what has been said of it in the first Volume.

* 24th of February.

(b) Te duo, diversâ Domini de parte, coronant, Binaque ferta tibi, binaque liba ferunt.

Times they sacrificed to him Lambs and young Pigs, whereon the two Families of those who sacrificed feasted near the March, where they sung the Praises of the Divinity in whose Name they assembled,

*Conveniunt, celebrantque dapes vicina supplex,
Et cantant laudes, Termine sancte, tuas* (1).

The Event, which I am going to relate, brought a great deal of Credit to the God Terminus, and, to be sure, did not a little promote this Worship. Tarquin the Proud, designing to build upon the Capital the Temple which Tarquin the elder had vowed to Jupiter, it was necessary to displace the Statues, and to pull down the Chapels that were there. All the Gods resigned their Places without Resistance ; only the God Terminus made good his, in spite of all the Efforts that were used to remove him, and they were obliged, after all, to let him alone ; thus he remained in the same Temple that was built in that Place.

Such is the Origin of the God Terminus ; we must not, however, dissemble that there was a God Protector of the Marches before Numa : This was Jupiter himself under the Name of Jupiter Terminalis, whom several very antient Authors confound with the God Terminus. Dionysius Halicarnassens (2) says it was even to Jupiter Terminalis that Numa consecrated the Land-marks ; and if we trace higher, we shall find in Greece the same God Protector of the Boundaries, under the Name of Jupiter Homorius, or Horius, as he is called by Polybius (3) ; and 'tis certain that the Greeks and Romans worshipped Jupiter Terminalis under the Form of a Stone, and that upon this Stone the most solemn Oaths were taken, according to the Form, Jovem Lapidem Jurare, which we have taken notice of in the first Volume. It was impossible to make the Marches to be kept with more Awe than by supposing the Sovereign of the Gods to be the Protector of their Privileges.
with

(1) Ovid ibid. (2) L. 1. (3) L. 2.

C H A P. VI.

The History of Flora, Pomona, Vertumnus and Priapus, the Gods of the Gardens and Orchards.

IF we may believe Lactantius, Flora was a Prostitute, who having gained much Substance, made the Roman People her Heirs, and left a considerable Sum for celebrating every Year the Day of her Nativity by a solemn Festival, and Games called from her Name Floralia. But, continues that learned Father, the Shame both of the Inheritance, and of such a Festival, inclined the Senate to put that Courtesan into the Number of the Gods, and to feign that she was the Goddess of Flowers. Ovid (1), to give an Air of Truth to this Fable, says Flora was a Nymph called Chloris, who being married to the Zephyr, received from her Spouse the Dominion over all the Flowers.

Some Criticks, among whom are Vossius and Bayle (2), finding no such Account in the Antients, have fallen foul upon Lactantius; and the last makes no Scruple to say that he had borrowed the Help of Falshood, and that no other Father of the Church, nor any of the Antients had said any Thing like it. But if 'tis true that Minutius Felix, Arnobius and St. Augustin, among the Fathers of the Church; Plutarch, Macrobius, and an antient Scholiast on Juvenal among profane Authors, speak much the same Way with Lactantius; the Censure of those two Criticks will fall to the Ground of itself. Now Minutius Felix says (a) Acca Laurentia and Flora were two famous Courtezans, whom the

P p. 4

Romans.

(1) Fast. L. 4. (2) Crit. Dict. on the Art. of Flora.

(a) Acca Laurentia & Flora Meretrices propudiosæ, inter mcelos Romanorum, & Deos computandæ.

Romans had deified. Arnobius gives Flora the same Epithet of Courtezan (1): As to St. Augustin, what Answer can be given to the Questions which he puts to the Pagans, namely, Who then was this Mother Flora? What Sort of Goddess was she, since she derives all her Fame only from her Lewdness, if she was not a lewd Strumpet, such as Lactantius represents her (2)? The same holy Doctor observes in another Place (3), that the Obscenities practised at the Floral Games, were expressive of the Character of the Person who had given Rise to them.

Plutarch relates, tho' somewhat differently, the same Story with Lactantius. A Priest of Hercules, says he, thought fit to game one Day with the Hero, on condition that he who won should regal the other: After this Agreement he threw the Dice for himself, and then for Hercules, who won. To fulfil his Promise, he prepared a sumptuous Entertainment; and, according to the detestable Custom of those Times, he brought into the Temple one of the greatest Beauties of the Town, named Laurentia, there to pass the Night. The Author adds, that she pleased the God, who appeared to her, and told her, that the first Person she would meet at going out of the Temple, should make her happy, and load her with Presents. Tartutius, a Man of Wealth, and powerful, was the Person whom she first met, and who became so desperately in love with her, that having died some Time after, he left her his immense Riches. She increased then still more by the infamous Trade she carried on for several Years; and when she saw herself at the Point of Death, she named the Roman Senate her Heir, who gratefully acknowledged her Favour. Her Name was inrolled in the Kalendar, and Feasts were instituted to her Honour.

Macrobius, in his Saturnalia, tells much the same Adventure, and says it happened under the Reign of

(1) Advers. Gent. L. 3. (2) L. 1. De Const. Evang. C. 35.
(3) L. 2. De Civ. Dei, C. 27.

of Ancus Martius. The antient Scholiast upon Juvenal, who lived not long after Constantine, speaking of the Floral Games, says they had been instituted by Flora, and that they were full of Obscenities (a). What Regard is now to be had to the Decisions of so bold a Critick as M. Bayle, tho' he has often no better Foundation to rely upon.

'Tis true, however, that Varro (1) says the Worship of Flora was instituted at Rome by Tatius Romulus's Collegue; and hence, 'tis certain, that she was honoured among the Sabines before the Foundation of Rome, and consequently some Ages before the Time which Lactantius speaks of. 'Tis further true, that Pliny (2) speaks of a Statue of this Goddess, by the Hand of Praxiteles, which proves that her Worship was famous in Greece, whence it was propagated to Italy, long before Romulus, who adopted it when he entred into an Association with Tatius and the Sabines. Lastly, we learn from Justin (3), that the Phoceans, who built Marseilles, worshipped the same Goddess.

To reconcile Opinions so contrary, may we not suppose that in Reality Flora was more antient than Acca Laurentia; but that the latter having nominated the Roman People her Heirs, was confounded with the Goddess Flora. Accordingly it was common to join with the more antient Gods modern Personages whom they deified, and to blend their Worship together. Thus it was, to use no other Examples, that Romulus was confounded with Quirinus, worshipped long before him by the Sabines.

But to proceed. As the Name of Laurentia still kept up the Remembrance of her infamous Character, it was changed to that of Flora; but this Change however did not abolish the Memory of her Debaucheries; great Care was even taken to renew the Floral

(a) Hi ludi a Flora meretrice instituti sunt, in honorem Floræ Deæ quæ floribus præest: Ludi sunt impudici. Ad Satyr. 6. v. 246.

(1) De Ling. La. L. 4. (2) L. 36. C. 4. (3) L. 43.

ral Games, where were committed a thousand Acts of Obscenity, suitable to the Goddess in whose Honour they were instituted.

We must not omit to take notice that some Authors confound this Laurentia with her who nursed Romulus and Remus; but they ought to be distinguished. 'Tis true both of them were honoured with a Festival, but those Festivals were celebrated at different Times. That of Remus and Romulus's Nurse happened in the Month of December; that of the Courtezan in the Month of April. In this last Games were joined with the Feast, and were called the Floral Games; no such Thing is said of the other; the Courtezan had the Name of Tarentia, or Tarrulia; the Nurse of the Princes had no other Name but that of Acca Laurentia.

The Floral Games, if we may credit Pliny, were instituted in the Year 513, or 514, according to the Correction of Father Hardouin; but we may presume that this Historian speaks of the Re-establishment of these Games, interrupted for several Years for Reasons which we know not, since 'tis agreed, as has been said at the Beginning of this Article, upon the Authority of Varro, that they had commenced in Romulus's Time. Those who are for understanding literally what Pliny says, are authorized by a Silver Medal of the Family Servilia, on which we read this Legend: Floralia Primus, as if the Sense was, Servilius was the first who celebrated the Floral Games; since, upon Supposition of the Interruption I have mentioned, the Sense of the Legend is natural, as if it actually set forth, that after a long Interruption, Servilius was the first who appointed the Celebration of the Floral Games in his Edileship.

We learn from the Antients that even before this Re-establishment they were not regularly celebrated every Year, but only when the bad State of the Air threatened or raised an Apprehension of Famine, or when the Sibylline Books so ordained; for they never failed.

failed to consult them upon those Occasions. It was not till the Year of Rome 580 that they begun to be celebrated regularly, and still so continued till they were entirely laid aside. As to what remains, the Disorders committed at the Celebration of those Games were so shocking, that Cato, who thought to have been Witness to them, withdrew before they were exhibited to the People, who highly commended him for his Discretion. After this Manner is the Story told by Valerius Maximus and Seneca the Philosopher. Cato having gone to the Celebration of the Floral Games, the People full of Deference to a Person so grave and of so rigid Virtue, durst not ask the Women to prostitute themselves publickly, according to Custom. Favonius his Friend having informed him of the Regard they had to him, he thought fit to retire, that he might not interrupt the Feast, nor at the same Time stain his venerable Character by viewing the Disorders that were committed at this Spectacle. The People perceiving this Complaisance, gave Cato a thousand Applauses. But would not this wise Roman have done better, either not to have appeared at these Games, or to have staid there, since his Presence was a Restraint upon their Licentiousness? This is much what Martial thought. “Why, says he, making an Apostrophe to Cato “did you appear at the Games, since you knew “their Licentiousness? Came you to the Theatre “just to go away again (a)?

Pomona, if we may believe the Latin Pomona & Poet, was a beautiful Nymph, to whose Vertumnus. Conquest all the rural Gods put in their Claim. Her Skill in cultivating Gardens, especially Fruit Trees, as well as her Beauty and Charms, had inspired them with Love to her. Vertumnus especially

(a) Cur in Theatrum, Cato severe, venisti?
An ideo tantum veneras ut Exires?

ly (1) sought to please her, and to have Opportunity of seeing her often, he assumed various Figures.

At last having one Day metamorphosed himself into an old Woman, he found a Way to enter into Conversation with her ; and after having bestowed a thousand Praises upon her Charms and her Talents for the Country Life, he told her so many fatal Adventures of those who like her were obstinately averse to Love, and shewed Disdain towards their Lovers, that at length he made an Impression upon her Heart, and became her Spouse.

'Tis probable enough, 1. That this Fiction, which Ovid relates so fully (2), is nothing but a mere Romance without any Foundation ; 2. That this Fable took its Rise in the Latin Country, there being no Traces of it to be found among the Greeks or other Nations. I must not however dissemble that there are Authors of Opinion, it has a Relation to some fair one who loved the Country Life, and especially applied herself to the Culture of Fruit-Trees, whence she acquired afterwards divine Honour ; for in those Ages of Darknes, no more was necessary to raise one to the Honour of Divinity than to have excelled in some useful human Art. She accordingly participated therein, and at Rome had her Temple and Altar. Her Priests had the Name of Flamen Pomonalis, and offered Sacrifices to her for the Preservation of the Fruits of the Earth, as we learn from Festus, who in this has only copied Varro.

As for Vertumnus, whose Name comes from Vertere, to change, to turn, he is thought to have been the Symbol of the Year and its Variations*. This is probably probably what Ovid designs to intimate by all the Metamorphoses which he attributes to him, which are nothing at Bottom but the various Changes that happen in the different Seasons of the Year. Thus when that Poet tells us, that this God assumed successively the Figure of a Ploughman, that of a Reaper, of a Vine-dresser, and lastly that of an old Woman, 'tis to denote the Spring, the Summer, the Autumn, and the Winter. There are Authors, and a good many of them too, who take Vertumnus to be the same in the main with Janus; which amounts to what we have been now saying, since both Janus and Vertumnus figured the Year and its Revolutions. Others, in short, alledge that he was an antient King of Etruria, who by the Care he had taken in improving Fruits and Gardens, had acquired divine Honours; and in Proof of it they cite Propertius who makes this God say: I am an Etrurian by Birth, nor do I repent that I have left a Country where War and Fightings reign. It is true I am not followed by the Crowd, nor have I a Temple of polished Ivory; but I am satisfied that I see the Roman Forum (a).

(1) Ovid. Met. l. 14. (2) Loc. Cit.

* To illustrate what our Author here says of Vertumnus, the Symbol of the beautiful revolving Year, I shall subjoin a few inimitable Lines from Tibullus, who compares the graceful Sulpitia to that God.

Propertius, in this whole Elegy where he makes this God speak, brings him in relating his Metamorphoses, at least with as much Elegance and more Brevity than Ovid does: But from all that this God says of himself, we cannot conclude that he had reigned

Illam, quidquid agit, quoquo vestigia movet,
Componit furtim, subsequiturque decor.
Seu solvit crines; fufis decet esse capillis:
Seu comptis, comptis est veneranda comis.
Urit, seu Tyriâ voluit procedere pallâ:
Urit, seu niveâ candida veste venit.
Talis in æterno felix Vertumnus Olympo
Mille habet ornatus, mille decenter habet.

Tib. l. 4. Eleg. 2. 13.

(a) Tuscus ego, Tuscis orior; nec pœnitet inter
Prælia, Volscinos deseruisse focos.
Nec me turba juvat, nec Templo lætor eburno,
Român timeris est posse videre forum.

Eleg. l. 4.

reigned over the Tuscans. It only follows from it that he had received divine Honours from that People, and that his Worship passed to Rome where he enjoyed the same Privilege.

We learn from Varro that the Feast of Vertumnus, named Vertumnalia, was celebrated in the Month of October.

Vertumnus was not only considered at Rome as a rural Divinity; but also as the God of Merchants, and he as well as Mercury (a) had a Temple and a Statue in the Forum. This is what Horace alludes to, where addressing his Book, he says, Me-thinks, my Book! you often turn your Eye towards Vertumnus and Janus. That is, you are longing to be handsomely bound, and exposed to Sale.

Vertumnum Janumque, Liber, spectare videris, &c.

Time has preserved to us some Representations of Pomona, which we meet with in Patin, Beger, and upon some Intaglios. There the Goddess appears under the Figure of a young Person, sometimes sitting on a great Basket full of Fruits, or having upon her Head Apples and Bunches of Apple-Trees; sometimes with a Bill in one Hand, and a Bough in the other; such in short as she is described by Ovid, who says that this Goddess, one of the most diligent and active Hamadryads, cultivated with a great deal of Care and Industry the Gardens and Fruit-Trees, especially the Apple-Trees, whence she had got the Name of Pomona.

We have also some Statues of Vertumnus: He is to be seen in Beger under the Figure of a young Man with a Crown of Herbs of different Kinds, and a Habit which only covers half his Body; holding in his left Hand Fruits, and in his Right a Cornu-

(a) The Scholiast upon Horace derives from thence the Name of Vertumnus, Deus est Præses Vertendarum rerum, hoc est vendendarum & emendarum.

Cornu-Copia. In another Image taken from a Manuscript of M. de Peyresc, which is at present in the Library of St. Victor, this God appears entirely cloathed, with a Beard, wearing over his Habit the Skin of some Animal, upon one of whose Folds are Fruits of several Sorts.

At Rome, in the Street called Vicus Tuscus, was a Statue of Vertumnus, whereof Cicero thus speaks (1), on Occasion of Verres's Avarice : Who is there but has traced thy Avarice all along the Way that leads from Vertumnus's Statue to the great Circus ?

Ovid and Propertius, I said, have described the various Transformations of this God, who sometimes assumed the Figure of a Reaper or Mower, sometimes of a Vine-dresser, or Ploughman ; sometimes that of a Fisher, or of a Soldier, &c. However he is never exhibited to us under these Disguises, at least Time has destroyed all the Monuments whereon he was so exhibited.

We may take Notice before we finish Vulturna. this Chapter, that the Tuscans owned another rural Divinity, under the Name of Voltumna, or Vulturna. Thus Livy, in more Places of his History than one, speaks of the Temple that she had near the Lake Ciminius, where the People debated their Affairs.

Priapus among the Romans was also the Priapus. God of the Gardens, and there was none of them whether Orchards or mere Parterres, but had one or more of his Statues. I have proved in the first Volume, that Priapus was the same with Belphegor, that Idol of Iniquity mentioned by S. Jerom ; that his Worship had been brought into Lampsacus, a Town in Asia Minor, upon the Coasts of the Hellepont, and that from thence it passed into Greece and Italy. It now remains to set forth the Mythology of the Greeks and Romans in Relation to this God. But we are first to observe that in all Probability it was very late before he was known by either either of these two People; since Hesiod and Homer say nothing of him.

(1) In Ver. 1.

Though Authors are not unanimous as to Priapus's Father and Mother, since some of the Antients assert that he was the Son of a Nymph named Naias, or according to others Chione, yet most Authors are pretty well agreed that he was the Son of Bacchus and of Venus. Juno, they add, being jealous of that Goddess, wrought so by her Enchantments that she made her Child quite monstrous and deformed. Thus Venus had no sooner brought him into the World, than she removed him out of her Sight, and gave him to be educated at Lampsacus, whence this God has ever since born the Name of Lampsacenus. Having afterwards become the Dread of Husbands, he was banished that Town; but the Inhabitants afflicted with a secret Distemper, recalled him, and from that Time he was made the Object of publick Veneration; a Temple was built to him, and Sacrifices instituted to his Honour.

'Tis easy to see, that under this Fiction is wrapped up the History of the Propagation of the Worship of this God from Egypt to Lampsacus; and that the Observation I have made from Herodotus, that the Birth of a God in a Country means only the Introduction of his Worship into that same Country, ought especially to take Place here. Accordingly, he was given out to be the Son of that Bacchus or Dionysius who made the Conquest of the Indies, who was the same with Osiris, and there is no Doubt but the Venus who is given him for his Mother, is the same with Isis. This Egyptian Queen, as has been said, had introduced after the Death of her Husband the infamous Ceremony of the Phallus. This is the whole Mystery of Priapus, who was represented in so obscene a Manner. I must be excused from enlarging farther upon the Obscenities that accompanied the Worship of this God, to whom they sacrificed an Ass. Saint Augustin had Reasons for revealing them which subsist no more; and I shall only

only add that Boissart has given a Print of a Bas-Relief which represents the principal Feast of Priapus. 'Tis celebrated by Women, the Chief of whom, who is probably the Priestess, anoints the Statue of the God, while others are presenting to him Baskets full of Fruits, and Vases full of Wine, as to the God of the Gardens and of the Country. We see others of them in the Attitudes of Dancers, playing upon an Instrument not unlike a Hoop. There are two of them playing upon the Flute, another holds a Sistrum, a new Argument that it was an Egyptian Ceremony; another cloathed like a Bacchanal, carries a Child on her Shoulders. There are some others taken up in sacrificing the Afs which was offered to him. The Victim bound about the Middle with a large Fillet, has already got the Mortal Blow, and its Blood flows copiously into a Basen. In fine, you see by the Priestess who performs the Function of the Sacrifier, a Case with several Knives.

The Statues of Priapus, I said, were in every Garden; add to this that Boissart has given a Print of one of them with this Inscription:

Hortorum custodi, vigili, conservatori propâginis villicorum (1).

C H A P. VII.

Of Pales and some other rural Divinities.

PALES was properly the Divinity of Shepherds, the tutelar Deity and Protectress of the Flocks. The Feast that was celebrated to her on the 21st of April, was called Palilia, or Parilia. The whole Ceremony consisted in burning great Heaps of Straw, and leaping over them (a). No Animals were killed

Q q there,

(1) Boissart.

(a) *Moxque per ardentis stipulæ crepitantis acervos,
Trajicias celeri strenua membra pede.*

there, and the Purifications were performed with the Smoak of Horses Blood, and with the Ashes of a Calf that had been taken out of an immolated Cow, or with the Ashes of Beans. The Flocks were also purified with the Smoak of Sulphur, of the Olive, the Pine, the Laurel and Rosemary: Then after the Shepherd had leaped around the Bonfire of Straw now mentioned, they offered in Sacrifice Milk, Cheese, boiled Wine, and Cakes of Millet: A Festival truly pastoral and rustick, and such as was fuitable to the Goddesses of Shepherds and Flocks.

As Romulus laid the first Foundations of Rome on the 21st of April, which Day was thence consecrated to Pales, he made this Festival, which was celebrated in Honour of that Princess, to serve for Commemorating the founding of his new City: Thus they were always since that Time confounded one with another. 'Tis true, Manilius says (a), Rome was begun to be built in Autumn, under the Sign of the Ballance, and his Authority for a Fact of this Nature, ought to be the greater, that he was a skilful Astronomer; but as the Irregularity of the Months and Seasons was occasioned by the Deficiency of the antient Kalendar, after it came to be reformed, the Festival of the Foundation of Rome, with that of Pales, was restricted to the 21st of April.

Anna Pe-
renna. The Latins owned likewise another rural Divinity, whom they named Anna Perenna, reckoned by some Authors the same with the Sister of Dido, so celebrated in the fourth Book of the Eneid, and who retired into the Country of the Laurentines, where Eneas received her. But being afraid that Levinia would take away her Life, she threw herself into the River Numicus, whereof she became one of the Nymphs. Others think she was the Moon itself that had taken the Name of Anna, from the Year, ab anno, because the Year consisted sisted then of Lunar Months. But the most common Opinion is that she was an honest Country Woman; that brought the Romans some Cakes when they had made the Secession to the Aventine Mount, who in Gratitude would have her Name to be perpetually honoured; and thus it is a perennitate cultus, that she got the Surname of Perenna. I reckon her among the rural Deities, upon the Authority of Varro who places her in the same Rank with Pales, Ceres, &c. (a). Her Feast was celebrated with Solemnity on the Ides * of March, upon the Banks of the Tyber, during which the People gave great Demonstrations of Joy, as we may see in the Verses quoted from Ovid (b): There they drank plentifully, there they danced, and the pretty Girls sung Verses wherein no great Regard was had to Modesty. But withal they alluded to a piece of Gallantry, which Ovid relates in the same Passage. Anna, says he, having been received to Heaven, Mars, who was in Love with Minerva, begged that the new Goddess would assist him in carrying on his Amours; she having a warm Heart to the God of War, promises to do as he desired, and came one Day to let him know that Minerva had at last consented to marry him; and putting on a Habit like that of the Goddess, kept the Assignment; but her

(a) Hesperiam sua libra tenet quâ condita Roma.

Q q 2

Disguise

(a) Varro, in his Satyre Menippea, had inserted those two Verses, which Aulus Gellius L. 13. c. 21. has preserved to us, and which Louis Carrio in his Commentary upon Antiquities, Leſt. Prim. says we ought to read thus.

Ted, Anna Perenna, Panda, te Lato, Pales;
Nerienes & Minerva, Fortuna ac Ceres.

* 15th of March.

(b) Idibus est Annæ festum geniale Perennæ
Non procul a ripis advena Tybri tuis:
Plebs venit ac virides passim disjecta per herbās
Potat, & accumbit cum pare quisque sua.
Sub Jove pars durat, pauci tentoria ponunt,
Sunt quibus e ramis frondea facta casa est.

Ov. Fast. L. 3. v. 423.

Disguise was detected ; and exposed her to the Laughter and Indignation of the God (a).

As Pales was the Goddess of the Flocks and their Shepherds, so Bubona, or Burona, was the Goddess of the Oxen and Cowherds (1). They sacrificed to her in a rural Manner, and invoked her for the Health of their Oxen.

Mellona. Mellona, another rural Deity took Care of the Bees, and Honey their Production (2).

For the same Purpose they used likewise to invoke Aristæus, the same who is the Subject of that fine Episode in the fourth Georgick, which Virgil has embellished with all the Ornaments of Poetry. 'Tis thought that this Aristæus, to whom Virgil gives for his Mother the Nymph Cyrene, was King of Arcadia, and that he applied himself to the Care of Bees, which he knew how to repair when lost. What the Poet now quoted says of him, upon Occasion of a Disease which had destroyed all his Swarms, that he had Recourse to his Mother, who dwelt in a profound Grotto at the Source of the Peneus, and that she sent him back to the wise Proteus; as also the Manner in which that God informs him how to repair his Loss, are only so many ingenious Fictions under which is couched the great Art which that Prince had in preserving and renewing his Bees. Be that as it will, Aristæus was ranked among the Demi-Gods, and received Honours peculiar to them.

Scia and Segecia, or Segeſta, were two other Divinities, who took Care of the Corns, and were honoured by the Labourers with a particular Worship ; with this Difference, that the former watched over the Grains

(a) *Ludit amatorem charæ nova Dea Minervæ,
Nec res hac Veneri gratior ulla fuit.
Inde joci veteres obscænaque dicta feruntur,
Et jurat hanc magno verba dedisse Deo.*

Idem ibid.

(1) Augus. de Civ. Dei. l. 6. (2) Id. ib.

Grains while they were yet lodged in the Earth, and the second in the Time of Harvest; as Tutilina, or Tutelina, had the Care of them when they were in the Granary (1). Turnebus thinks this was the Goddess, whose Name it was not lawful to utter, the same whom Pliny mentions (2). Macrobius tells us (3), that those who invoked this Divinity, abstained from all Work on the Day they sacrificed to her. She had a Chapel upon the Aventine Mount, and a Statue in the Circus. Some Authors give the same Goddess the Name of Titulina; and Scaliger, upon the Authority of Varro, says, an Altar was consecrated to her upon Mount Aventine, as to a Divinity the Protectress of the Roman People.

Robigus, whose Name is derived from the Robigus. Latin Word Robigo, or Rubigo, which signifies Rust, was another Divinity whom they invoked for the Preservation of the Corns, which he was believed to keep from blasting; there was a Feast in Honour of this God, which was called Robigalia. Varro speaks of it frequently in his fifth Book of the Latin Tongue, as also in that concerning Agriculture. Though all other Authors have looked upon him as a God, St. Augustin makes this Divinity a Goddess, whom he calls Robigo (4).

Bonus Eventus, Good Success, was also Bonus Even- honoured by Antiquity with a particular tus. Worship. Pliny (5) tells us, that the Statue of this God had been made by Euphranor, holding a Cup in his right Hand, and in the Left an Ear of Corn and a Poppy. The same Author says farther that Praxiteles had also made a Statue of the same God in the Capitol: And Varro, who makes Mention of this Divinity (6), reckons him among the great Gods of the Country People. Several Persons are of Opinion at this very Day, that some Ruins of a Temple, which is to be seen at Rome between the Church of

Q q 3. Minerva

(1) Id. ib. L. 4. (2) L. 18. c. 1. (3) Sat. L. 1. c. 16.
(4) De Civ. Dei. L. 4. c. 21. (5) L. 35. (6) L. 1. De re Rust.

Minerva and that of St. Eustachius, are the Remains of the Temple that was consecrated to this God (1).

Populonia. Populonia, whose Name is derived from Populatio, Pillage, Plunder, was also among the rural Divinities; Prayers and Sacrifices were offered to her, to hinder the Hail and Thunder from laying waste the Fields.

'Twas no doubt for the same Reason they Worshiped another Divinity under the Name of Lightning (2); and the Worship paid to him was that he might preserve the Blessings of the Field.

Pilumnus and Pilumnus and Picumnus, according to Picumnus.

Servius, were two Brother-Gods, of whom the last had invented the Method of manuring the Land, whence he was surnamed Sterquilinius; and Pilumnus that of grinding the Corn, for which Reason he was particularly worshipped by the Millers. Nonius Marcellus says Pilumnus and Picumnus presided over Marriage-Auspices, and in Support of his Opinion he quotes a Passage from Varro (3), who says, if the Child who was taken into the Hands of the Midwife, was likely to be long-lived, she laid it upon the Ground to conjecture if it would be of an upright Stature; and that Beds were set up in the Temple for the Gods Pilumnus and Picumnus, Divinities who presided over Marriage.

Sterculius. Sterculius was one of the Surnames given to Saturn, because he was the first that had laid Dung upon Lands to make them fertile (4).

Hippona. Hippona was the Goddess of Horses and Grooms (a).

Jugatinus. The God Jugatinus presided over Eminences and Mountains, and the Goddess Collina over Hills. St. Augustin names her Collatina; but perhaps he is mistaken in giving her this Name.

Vallonia,

(1) Lyſſo Giraldi. (2) Aug. de Civ. Dei. L. 6. c. 10. Senec. L. de Superſt. (3) L. 2. de vita Pop. Rom. (4) Macrobian. Sat. L. 1. c. 7.

(a) Plut. in Parall. Apul. 1. 3. de Aſin. aur. Tertull. in Apol. Fulgent de obſcur. vocibus, &c.

Vallonia, according to that Father, was the Goddess of the Valleys.

Rufina, who was so denominated from the Word Rus, the Country, presided over the Fields, according to the same Doctor Lylio Giraldi tells us, this Goddess was called by some Authors Rutina.

Some Passages taken from the fourth Book of Saint Augustin de civitate Dei, inform us of several other of those Country Divinities, and the bare naming of them will be sufficient to let us know the Offices to which they were destined. The Romans, says he, had a Goddess Fruētuseia, whom they invoked to obtain a good Harvest : A God Spinofus, to pluck up the Thorns from the Fields ; a Goddess Niella, to save the Corn from Mildew. They had Proserpine to preside over the budding of the Corns ; a God Nodotus, for the Knots of the Stalk : The Goddess Volutina, for the Coat that covers the Ear : Patelena, for the Ear which begins to open : Hostilina, when the Beard of the Ear and the Ear itself were of an equal Length (a). Lacturtia, when the Grain was in Milk : Materna, when it was ripe ; and Runcina when it was reaping.

We may observe, 1. That almost all the Gods had their stated Festivals, which were celebrated in the Seasons when their Aid was thought to be needed, and in the same Places over which they were believed to preside, as may be seen in Ovid's Fasts, and in the Roman Kalendar framed by Rosinus (1). 2. That almost all these Gods derived their Original from the Latins, as their Names sufficiently intimate, nor is any thing to be found relating to them in the Writings of the Greeks.

(a) The antient Romans said lofure, instead of æquare to equal.

(1) Ant. Rom. L. 4.

C H A P. VIII.

Of the Satyrs, Fauns, Ægipans, &c.

AMONG the rural Deities, the Satyrs and others who are specified in this Title, were the most celebrated: They were so many Gods, or rather Demi-gods, whom the Pagans imagined to dwell in the Forests or Mountains, and whom they represented as little Men very hairy, with Horns in their Heads, Goats Feet, and a Tail dangling behind. They were named indifferently, either Pans, or Ægipans, or Satyrs, or Sileni; with this sole Difference, that the Sileni were Satyrs advanced in Years, if we may credit Pausanias (1) and Servius (2).

The Poet Nonnus says (3), the Satyrs were the Offspring of Mercury and the Nymph Yphime; and Memnon in Photius asserts that they derived their Original from Bacchus and the Naiad Nicæa, the Daughter of Sangar, whom he had intoxicated, by turning into Wine the Water of a Fountain where she usually drank; but these are but fabulous Births.

Some Authors have taken the Satyrs for real Men; and St. Jerom too was of this Opinion. Albertus Magnus, and Picus of Mirandola, who followed him, speak of two Kinds of Men, Satyrs, and not Satyrs: But 'tis more probable that the Introduction of Satyrs into the poetical World, was owing to large Monkeys being seen sometimes in the Woods, pretty much resembling Men; or perhaps to the Appearance of Barbarians, resembling Monkeys at a Distance: This is the Opinion of Pliny (a), who takes the Satyrs, as we do, for a Kind of Monkeys; and this Author asserts, that in a Mountain of the

(1) In Attic. (2) In 6. Æn. (3) Fourteenth of his Dionys.

(a) Efferaior Cynocephalis natura, sicut mitissima Satyris, & Scingibus. Hist. L. 9. c. 54.

the Indies are to be found four-footed Satyrs, whom you would take at a Distance for Men. These Sorts of Monkeys had frequently affrighted the Shepherds, and sometimes pursued the Shepherdesses; and this is possibly what gave Rise to so many Fables about their amorous Complexion. If we add to this, that Shepherds covered with Goats Skins, or some Priests of Bacchus, frequently counterfeited Satyrs to seduce the innocent Shepherdesses, I reckon we shall have the true Key to this Fable. Hence the Opinion spread that the Woods were full of these mischievous Divinities: The Shepherdesses trembled for their Honour, and the Shepherds for their Flocks; for which Reason they sought to appease them by Sacrifices, and by the Offerings of the First-fruits, or of the Firstlings of the Flocks. Some Songs were composed which the Shepherds sung in the Forests, where they endeavoured, by invoking them, to recommend themselves to their Favour. The Poets having got into their Hands the amusing Subject, invented a thousand Tales. The Painters too contributed to propagate those Fables, by painting Pan and the Satyrs like Men.

Such was the Origin of these rural Divinities, such was the Ground of their Worship, and of the Sacrifices that were offered to them. I am not ignorant, however, that great Men have been of the contrary Opinion, and that they have humanized the Fauns and Satyrs; but it must also be owned, that most Authors are not scrupulous enough to examine into the Subjects which they treat of, but are often Slaves to Prejudices: 'Tis enough that some very knowing Man of Reputation has advanced such an Opinion, to make them subject their Reason to the Yoke of his Authority. Besides, People choose rather to give themselves no Trouble about painful Researches, than by strict and serious Examination to shun being led into Error by Prejudices which they have blindly adopted.

But it will be said, how shall we answer St. Jerom when he tells us (1), that St. Anthony going to visit St. Paul the Hermit, met first a Hippocentaur, and then a Satyr, such as the Poets and Painters represent them; and that being interrogated, he replied, that this was one of those mortal Creatures who inhabit the Desarts, and whom the blind Pagan World called Fauns or Satyrs: He made him a Present too of Fruit, which is thought to be Dates. If Respect for St. Jerom will not allow us, with a modern Author (2), to treat this Account as a Fable, we may at least answer that it was some Devil had appeared to the good Saint. And indeed he was accustomed to see of them often under different Shapes, as we are told by the Writers of his Life: We may add farther what Cardinal Baronius alleges, that this pretended Satyr, as well as others, might have been a Monkey whom God permitted to speak, as formerly he did Balaam's Ass.

Should it be again objected what Pausanias says (3) of one Euphemus, who having been driven by Storm with his Ship upon the Coasts of a desert Island, saw a Sort of wild Men make up to him, all hairy, with Tails behind their Backs, almost as long as those of Horses, who attempted to seize upon their Wives with so much Fury, that they had much ado to rescue them; which made that Place be called the Isle of Satyrs. That Ptolomy (4) says there are three Isles in the Indian Sea beyond the Ganges, inhabited by Satyrs; and that Pomponius Mela adds (5), there are, beyond Mauritania, in the Atlantick Ocean, Isles where no Body is to be seen in the Day-time, but by Night great Fires are there observed, a confused Sound of Flutes and Drums heard, and that it is commonly thought these Isles are inhabited by Satyrs: That Pomponius, in short, only copied the Relation of the famous Hanno the Cartha-

(1) Life of St. Paul Hermit. (2) Majus Hist. of Animals.
 (3) In Atticis. (4) Geogr. l. 7. (5) Geogr. l. 7.

Carthaginian General, who had been in those Islands; what Plutarch (1) relates, that in the Time of Sylla was found in Epirus a Satyr, such as the Poets represent them, who framed some Voice resembling the bleating of a Goat, and which no Body could explain. That the Arch-duke Philip, according to Albertus Magnus (2), brought two of them to Genoa in the Year 1598, when he made his Entry thither; the same Author adding, that two of them were taken in the Forests of Saxony, the one a Male, and the other a Female; that the Female being dead, the Male was tamed, and was even taught to articulate some Words.

To all this I would answer, that admitting these several Facts, to which perhaps not a few Objections might be made, we may very well apply to them those Kinds of Monkeys which we have spoke of from Pliny (3). What Pomponius Mela says is not hard to be explained. When Hanno went to those Isles, which are thought to lie about the Island of S. Thomas on the the Coasts of Guinea, or rather near those of Cape Verd, the Inhabitants affrighted, hid themselves in the Day-time in Caverns, and lighted Fires by Night, and uttered a wild roaring Sound to terrify the Strangers, and force them to leave their Island; which Stratagem accordingly succeeded.

'Tis still easier to answer what may be urged against me from that Satyr which passed the Rubicon in Presence of Cæsar and his whole Army; it was nothing but a Stratagem of that famous General. Cæsar seeing the Scruples which his Soldiers had to pass that River, dressed up one of them secretly like a Satyr, to persuade the rest, that since a Divinity had shewed them the Way, they both might, and ought to pass it too. Just so, when Diodorus says (4) Bacchus, that is to say Osiris, for of him he speaks in this Passage, was accompanied in his Conquest of
the

(1) De Sylla. (2) Treatise of Animals. (3) Loc. Cit.
(4) L. 1.

the Indies with a Number of Satyrs ; the Meaning is, that some of that Conqueror's Soldiers disguised themselves like Satyrs, to strike a Terror into the People whom they wanted to subdue ; or else, that he led with him those large Sort of Apes that are found in Africa, to divert himself, or to shew Tricks to the Soldiers in their own Drefs ; or, as some Authors have thought, he had some wild Ethiopians brought him, all hairy, as some are among those Barbarians, to divert and amuse him : For that good Prince was a great Lover of Mirth, if we may credit the forecited Author (a), and had no liking to fight ; having undertaken that Expedition only to teach the barbarous Nations Agriculture, and to perform such beneficent Services to Mankind as raised him to divine Honours. We may add, that never were such Discoveries made as within these two Ages past, and amongst all these nothing resembling Satyrs has been found, except the Monkeys we have been speaking of.

After all, if we may believe Bochart (1), the Original of Satyrs comes from the Hebrew Word Sair, which signifies a Devil under the Shape of a Goat ; and this is the Reason, according to him, of their being represented as a Sort of Goats, dancing and frisking in a lascivious Manner (b). We may confirm our Opinion as to the Nature of the Satyrs, by what is related in an Account of the East Indies (c) ; where we are told, that in the Island of Ceylon are to be found Satyrs or Bavianes, whom the Indians call Orangs, that is, Wild Men. They are much of the same

(a) Dum in Æthiopia versatur, gens Satyrorum ei adducitur, quos pilos in lumbis habere ferunt. Diod. l. 1.

(1) Chan. l. 1. c. 12.

(b) The Rabbins render the Word Hircus by that of Satyr, and Sair by that of Goat or Devil ; and by the Word Heteb, the Devil of the South, and by the Creatures overgrown with Hair, mentioned in Ishiah, they understand the Satyrs inhabiting the Deserts. Bochart. Loc. Cit.

(c) Seuter's Voyage to the Indies. Vol. 2.

same Figure with other Men, have the Back all covered with Hair, flat Noses, and a rough Aspect: They are robust, nimble, and fierce. The Way to take them is with Gins, and they tame so well, as to be taught to walk upon their Feet, or rather upon their Hind-legs. These Satyrs, adds the Author, are very serviceable to their Masters: They wash the Glasses, fill their Liquor, turn the Spit, and sweep the House. Another Traveller (1) says, while he was at Angola, one of those wild Men was slain at Manicongo, whose Body was all bristling with Hair, his Nose flat, wide Nostrils, and a Tail at his Back. He was taken in a Tree, where they found him with his Mate and his young one, which both saved themselves. Daper, in his Account of Africa, speaks of another Kind of Monkey which bears a yet greater Resemblance to Man. These Animals being dispersed through the Woods, with which the whole Earth was overgrown, had, doubtless, given occasion to take those Sort of Monkeys or Monsters for a Species of Men: I am not at all surpris'd at it, since they bear a much greater Resemblance to the Caffres and Hottentots, who inhabit the Extremities of Africa, than these do to other Men: And we should have had much less Reason to be surpris'd if the latter had been taken for real Satyrs, than that the Monkeys before mentioned have been accounted real Men. But so much for this Subject. Let us now say something of Faunus and Sylvanus, who have always been reckoned rural Deities, and the Fathers of the Fauns and Satyrs.

CHAP.

(1) Vandenbrouk Tome 4.

C H A P. IX.

Of Faunus and Sylvanus.

FAUNUS, as Virgil tells us (1), was the Son of Picus, of whom we shall speak afterwards, and the fourth King of Italy. He lived while Pandion reigned at Athens, about Thirteen hundred Years before the Christian Era, or about an hundred and twenty Years before the Trojan War, or a little later, if we may believe Dionysius Halicarnassensis; that is, in the Time of Evander and Hercules. The same Author adds, that he was a Prince of very great Bravery as well as Wisdom; which probably made it be given out that he was the Son of Mars (2). Lactantius informs us that he was very religious. Eusebius is of the same Mind with those two Authors, when he places Faunus in the Catalogue of the Latin Kings. As he applied himself, during his Reign, to Agriculture, he was ranked after his Death among the rural Deities, and was represented with all the Equipage of the Satyrs. It was even asserted that he delivered Oracles; but this Fable is only founded upon the Etymology of his Name; for Phonein in Greek, and Fari in Latin, whereof it is compounded, signify to speak; and it was perhaps for the same Reason that they called his Wife Fauna, as you would say Fatidica, Prophetess. She was a Person of great Chastity, as we learn from Varro (3); and Lactantius, who copied him, says she carried Modesty and Reserve so far, that she never would see another Man but her own Husband. She was wont to make Predictions to the Women, as Faunus did to the Men. So many good Qualifications raised her after Death to Divine Honours, and she was called the Good Goddess. The Women offered Sacrifices to her in Places where no Access was permitted to the

(1) Æn. 7. (2) Ovid 2 Fast. (3) In Lactan. L. 1.

the Men. I know Plutarch (1) and Arnobius speak not so favourably of Fauna, as Lactantius and Varro, and that those Authors alledge she was a little given to Wine : But would ever Men have deified a Person who was addicted to a Vice so indecent in her Sex ? Those who are for reducing the Fables to Allegory, are not wanting to tell us here that Faunus and Fatua are but two feigned Personages, under whose Names the Pagans adored the Earth, and that they were known only in Italy, because Evander brought from Arcadia the Worship of these Divinities. But the express Testimonies of Varro and Dionysius Halicarnassensis, of Plutarch and Lactantius, are to be more regarded than those Allegorists who have fallen into this Error, only for not knowing that one and the same Person in the Pagan Theology was a natural and an animated Deity (a) ; which, however, is the Key to most Fables.

Sylvanus, according to some Authors, was the Son of Faunus, or, according to Plutarch, of Valerius and Valeria his Daughter. Eliau and Probus give him a yet more scandalous Original ; but we must not shock modest Ears with the fabulous Stories which Antiquity has left upon this Subject. The Author of the Original of the Romans, such is the Uncertainty as to these Matters, says Sylvanus, instead of being the Son of Faunus, was the same God with him ; and others confound him with Pan, or Egipan, if we may believe Plutarch : Which agrees with what Pliny tell us, that the Egipans were the same with the Sylvans. The Monuments we have now remaining, represent him sometimes as a Satyr, and sometimes too with the half of the Body of a Goat ; sometimes with a Form quite human, almost always with a Branch of Cypress, and that for the Love of the young Cyparissus who was transformed into that Tree. The Pine-Apple, a pruning Knife, which he

(1) Q. Q. Rom.

(a) See what has been said upon this above, Vol. 2. B. 4.

he holds in his Hand, a Crown coarsely made, and a Dog, are the common Embellishments of the Figures of this rural Deity, where he sometimes appears naked, sometimes covered with a rustick Garb which reaches down to his Knees.

As Sylvanus was highly honoured, especially in Italy, we see frequently upon these same Images, Altars, Priests, Players upon the Flute, and the Victim that was most commonly offered to him, namely the Hog.

A Monument consecrated to this God, by one named Laches, gives him the Epithet of Littoralis; whence we learn that he was also worshipped upon the Sea Shores.

The Priests of this God constituted one of the principal Colleges of Rome, and were in great Reputation: Which was a sufficient Evidence of the Fame of his Worship. When the Romans were Masters of the Gauls, they had undoubtedly brought thither the Worship of this God, and founded a College of Priests like that at Rome, since there was found some Years ago at St. Maur-les-Fossees, near Paris, where their Foundation had been, a Stone whereon was an Inscription which Montfaucon communicated to the Academy of the Belles-Lettres, mentioning the College of Priests of the God Sylvanus.

Faunus, I said, was the Son of Picus, and I shall set before you the Succession of those antient Abo-ri-gines who reigned in Italy before the Trojan War, according to the Learned, especially Ryckius (1). The first of those Kings was called Stercès; Fanus who succeeded him, though a Foreigner, is the second, Picus the Son of Stercès the third, and Faunus the Son of Picus the fourth. I wave the rest, of whom I shall have Occasion to speak in the sixth Volume.

Picus

(1) Dissert. de primis Italiz Colonis. Can. Chro.

Picus was an accomplished Prince, of distinguished Talents. Ovid (1) gives a charming Description of this Prince, and of his lovely Wife Canens. Having died in the Chace before he came to an advanced Age, and his Body not being found, they fabled that he was transformed into a Wood-pecker, a Bird whose Name in Latin is the same with his; and, to give some Credibility to the Fable, it was added, that this Transformation was brought about by Circe. She met him, says the Poet now quoted, in a Wood whither she had come to gather Herbs for her magical Operations: In a Trice she was fired with Love to the Boy; and finding him insensible, she struck him with her Wand, and instantly his Body was overgrown with Feathers, and he disappeared, &c.

This Fable, Servius alledges (2), has no other Foundation, but that Picus, who valued himself upon his prophetick Gift, made use of a Wood-pecker which he had tamed: Augur fuit Picus, & domui habuit Picum, per quem futura noscebat. We may add, that the Identity of the Name of this Prince and that of the Wood-pecker, contributed not a little to the Fable of the Transformation. Be that as it will, Picus was worshipped after his Death, and taken into the Number of the Gods Indigetes.

Canens, forlorn for the Loss of a Husband whom she tenderly loved, retired into a Desert, where she did not long survive him; and, by reason of her Name, was given out to be transformed into a Voice.

Notwithstanding the Authority of Servius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and several other Antients, who all look upon Picus as a real Personage, and a King of the Aborigines, there are several Authors who contend that there never was a King of this Name in Italy; and Gerard Vossius (3) will have it that this

R r

whole

(1) Met. L. 14. (2) Upon the seventh Book of the Æneid.

(3) Orig. & Progres. Idol. L. 1. C. 12.

whole Fable has no other Foundation, but that antiently in the Country of the Sabines was an Oracle of Mars, for which a Wood-pecker was employed. Bochart (1), who always finds a Key to the Fables in the Phenician Language, says this is only founded upon the Word Picca, which imports a Soothfayer, and that from the Resemblance between this Name and that of Picus, they had feigned a King who had the Gift of Prediction. In fine, there are learned Men who maintain that Picus is the same with Jupiter, worshipped by the antient Aborigines under the Symbol of a Wood-pecker, a Bird of great Use in the Auguries. For my Part, I believe we may very well rely upon the Antients I have cited, especially upon Dionysius Halicarnassensis, an Author well versed in the Antiquities of Italy, and assert, with them, that Picus reigned there after Janus, and had Faunus for his Successor.

C H A P. X.

Of Silenus and Midas.

THOUGH in general the old Satyrs were called Sileni, as we have said after Pausanias (2), there was one, however, to whom this Name was appropriated by way of Eminence, and who had no other. As this is one of the most celebrated Personages in Antiquity, a vast many Things have been said of him, some of them true, and others of them mere Fictions; but Fictions whose Sense is not always inexplicable.

Eliau (3) alledges that Silenus was born of a Nymph, and that tho' he was not of the Number of the Gods, he was however of a superior Nature to that of Man; 'tis probable that he had no other Argument for it but what he had taken from Hesiod, who says in general (4), that all the Satyrs had Nymphs

(1) Chan. L. 1. (2) In Att. (3) Var. Hist. L. 3. C. 12. (4) Theog.

Nymphs to their Mothers. Silenus was born at Malea, or at least he was brought up there, according to the Testimony of Pindar, who thus speaks ; Silenus, that incomparable Dancer, whom a Citizen of Malea, the happy Spouse of fair Nais, had the good Fortune to educate. The Inhabitants of Pyrrica, a Town of Laconia (1), gave out that Silenus having quitted Malea, had retired to them ; and they shewed a Well that they believed he had sunk, without which they would have been intirely destitute of Water.

Lucian (2) gives this Description of Silenus : He was of a middle Size, fat and plump ; thus he actually is represented upon Medals and other Monuments which we have remaining (3). A Servant, in one of Plautus's Comedies, gives a Picture of his Master very like this which we have now seen (4) ; and I am very much mistaken if the Author is not making a waggish Allusion to Silenus, whom the Master perhaps resembled a little, as well as Socrates, according to the Representation of him upon Intaglios. Silenus was also represented riding upon an Ass, almost always drunk, and hardly able to support himself ; Titubantem annisque meroque (5), as Ovid speaks. 'Twas in this Plight that he followed Bacchus, whose Foster-father and inseparable Companion he was, and to whom, according to Diodorus Siculus (6), he communicated a Part of his Knowledge. Upon all the Antiques that represent him, he has still the Air of a drunken Man dozing over his Wine ; and when Virgil in one of his Eclogues describes him, it is like a Man gorged with Wine as usual.

Inflatum besterno venas ut semper Iaccho.

Such was the common Idea they had of this Personage, such the Pictures were made of him. Antient

R r 2

(1) Paus. in Lacon. (2) In the Counsel of the Gods. (3) See Beger Treasure of Brandebourg, and Montfaucon Ant. V. 4.
(4) Plaut. in Rud. (5) Met. L. 5. (6) L. 3.

tient Authors, however, very worthy of Credit, had much more favourable Sentiments of him. Silenus, according to them, was a profound Philosopher, whose Wisdom was equal to his Knowledge; and this Drunkenness that has been so much talk'd of, was nothing but a mystical Drunkenness, which signified that he was profoundly immersed in Speculation. Theopompus of Chios, brings him in holding Conversation with Midas, which is related by Elian (1), about an Island situated beyond all the Seas, where were, among others, two Cities, the one called the Peaceful City, the other the Warlike. The Inhabitants of the former, free from all Care and Anxiety, led happy Days, and lived for several Ages; while those of the latter, always in Arms against their Neighbours, almost all died in War. 'Tis not known what Country Silenus had in his Eye: Was it the fortunate Islands, which are thought to be the Canaries, or that celebrated Atlantick Island, of which Plato has said so much; or, in fine, was it the Hyperboreans, who, according to the Antients, led a Life like that of the Inhabitants of this peaceful City? These are Questions I shall not stay to resolve (a).

Cicero, Plutarch, and many others, had formed the same Idea of Silenus, and always looked upon him as a very ingenious Man, and a great Philosopher. Virgil, in his second Eclogue, puts in his Mouth the Principles of the Epicurean Philosophy, about the Formation of the World, and the Beings that compose it: Namque canebat uti, &c.

To proceed: The Adventure which brought Silenus into the Hands of Midas is singular, and gave Rise to many Fables which I shall explain. That Prince, informed of the rare Talents of Silenus, had been long desirous of conversing with him. Bacchus, who had quitted Thrace, where the Bacchantes had had torn in Pieces the unhappy Pentheus, had come to Lydia to the Confines of Mount Tmolus, where grew excellent Wine. Silenus, who was rambling thro' that Country, mounted upon his Ass, stop'd frequently near a Fountain to sleep out his Wine, and to repose himself after his Fatigue. This appeared a favourable Opportunity to Midas: He threw Wine into the Fountain, and placed some Peasants in ambuscade. Silenus drunk one Day of the Wine to Excess, and the Peasants seeing him drunk, fell upon him, bound him with Garlands of Flowers, and thus led him to the King. This Prince, who was himself initiated into the Mysteries of Bacchus, received Silenus with great Marks of Respect; and after having celebrated the Orgies with him ten Days and ten Nights successively, and heard him discourse upon several Subjects, returned him to Bacchus. The God, overjoyed to see again his Foster-father, whose Absence had given him a great Deal of Uneasiness, bid Midas demand of him any Thing he pleased. Midas, who was excessively covetous, ask'd the Power of turning into Gold whatever he should touch, which was accordingly granted him. But the Present soon became destructive to him who had so eagerly wished for it. At first he was charmed with the Experiments he made; he touched a Branch, Stones, Ears of Corn, all became Gold; but then, when he was preparing for Dinner, and was going to wash his Hands, the Water underwent the same Change: In fine, the Bread, the Wine, the Meat that was served up to him, became Gold as soon as he put forth his Hand and touched them; and he was ready to starve amidst all his Riches, when addressing himself to the same God to be delivered from so inconvenient a Power, Bacchus ordered him to wash his Hands in the Pactolus, which he did; and losing that fatal Virtue, he communicated it to the River, which, from that Time, rolls a golden Sand.

(1) Var Hist. L. 3. C. 13.

(a) See for the Hyperboreans, the Dissertation of Abbé Gedoye, and another of my own. Mémoires de l'Académie des belles Lettres, T. 7.

Thus the Greeks took Pleasure in perverting History into ingenious Fables ; I say History, for this is a true one ; and tho' I have already spoke at some Length of Midas in the History of Apollo, yet the Connection which it has with that of Silenus, obliges me to return to it, and the more willingly, that I had omitted to explain some Circumstances, at least shall explain them here in a Manner which to me appears more satisfactory. Midas, according to all the Antients, was King of that Part of Lydia and Phrygia where the Pactolus runs. Herodotus (1), who says he reigned after his Father Gordius, adds, that he sent large Presents to the Temple of Delphos, and among others a golden Chain of an inestimable Value. The same Author speaks elsewhere (2) of the Gardens of this Prince, where grew Roses exceeding beautiful without Culture, and these are the Gardens where Silenus was believed to have been taken. Midas, frugal to Avarice, reigned over a very rich Country, and made considerable Sums by the Sale of his Corns, his Wines, and his Cattle. This, no doubt, is what made them say that he turned into Gold whatever he touched, even the Bread, the Wine, and Meat that was served up to him. His Avarice changed its Object, and having learned that the Pactolus run Gold-dust, he abandoned the Care of the Country, and employed his Subjects in gathering the Gold of that River, which brought him in a new Store : This again is the Foundation of the Fiction of his having communicated to the Pactolus his aurifick Virtue.

Amidst so many different Objects of Care, Midas did not abandon the Affairs of Religion, and he made so many Innovations in that of the Lydians, that he was reckoned, according to Justin (3), a second Numa. We are even told, that in order to bring about these Revolutions, he made use of the Stratagem which was afterwards so serviceable to that King of Rome : For as he gave out that he learned

(1) L. 1. C. 14. (2) L. 8. C. 138. (3) L. 2. C. 7.

learned from the Nymph Egeria, whatever he acted in Matters of Religion, so Midas said he was instructed by Silenus in the new Mysteries which he designed to establish, especially in those of the Orgies; for this Prince, who possessed excellent Vineyards, was very much devoted to Bacchus. Some Authors (a) are even of Opinion, that having found, near the Fountain before mentioned, some Satyr, that is, some Animal resembling an Ape, he had given this out to be Silenus, the Foster-father and Companion of Bacchus, whom he interrogated about all his Projects, much the same Way as they say Sertorius interrogated his tame Hind; but to speak more accurately, it was really Silenus himself who communicated to him a Part of his Knowledge, since he lived at the same Time with him, and was his Neighbour, as shall be said in the Sequel.

As Midas had his Spies every where, whom he questioned and listened to with Attention; hence it was said, that he heard, at a great Distance, that he had long Ears, as we say of a powerful King, that he has long Arms; and this again is the Origin of the Fable that gave him Asses Ears; a more natural Explication than what we have already given of the same Fiction (1).

We may conclude from all that has been said, that Midas was a powerful Prince, and that Silenus, whom he made so good use of, was a profound Philosopher, who assisted him with his Counsels, in founding his Laws and religious Ceremonies. Perhaps too he was said to be somewhat addicted to drinking, and consequently reckoned Bacchus's Foster-father and inseparable Companion, only because he had introduced into Lydia the Orgies and the other Festivals of that God. Since I am now upon the Explanation of the Fables that have been broached in relation.

R r 4

(a) See the Notes of Abraham Gronovius upon the eighteenth Chapter of the third Book of Eliau.

(1) History of Apello.

lation to him, I think I have found out a Key to that which represented him always riding upon an Afs, from a Passage in Diogenes Laertius, who, in comparing Aristotle to Silenus, says the first was always on Horseback, and the second had only an Afs to ride upon: The Meaning of which undoubtedly is, that he made only slow, but sure Advances in Philosophy; whereas the other moved at a quick Pace, and made a Trip now and then. That of the Afs's Ears, according to Tertullian (1), informs us that he was endued with great Intelligence. In fine, Ieffus (2) explains that of the Fountain of Wine, which we mentioned, by saying it signifies only the Desire that Midas had to get Silenus into his Possession, who, according to him, was King of Caria, and actually became a great Friend to Midas.

Some Authors again, confound Silenus with Marsyas, that celebrated Player upon the Flute, whom we have spoken of in the History of Apollo, who flcad him alive. What may give some Probability to this Opinion, is, that Marsyas is represented as a Satyr, as may be seen in the Figures of him (3): Now the Sileni were old Satyrs, as has been said; but what fully determines in Favour of this Opinion, is, that Herodotus speaking of Marsyas, calls him Silenus (4). Hence the Chronology perfectly agrees, and it will be no longer any Wonder that Midas had such a high Esteem for Silenus, since it was for having decided in his Favour against Apollo, that he had Afses Ears given him by that God.

After this I shall only relate what Bochart says with respect to Silenus, as one of those learned Conjectures wherewith they who are Masters of the Languages, are upon all Occasions making a Parade. The Antients, says he, by the Fable of Silenus, give us to understand that they had some Knowledge of the Messiah, since the Name of this Satyr comes comes from Silo, which almost all the Interpreters understand of Jesus Christ (1).

(1) L. 2. De Anima. (2) Le Idol, L. 2. (3) Moitfauc. Ast. v. 1. (4) L. 7. c. 26.

Silenus was worshipped after his Death as a Demi-God, and received the Honours due to Heroes, independently even of Bacchus. This is the Remark of Pausanias (2), who, speaking of the Temple which Silenus had in Elis, expresses himself thus, There you will see likewise a Temple of Silenus, but a Temple which is appropriated and peculiar to himself, while Bacchus has no Share in the Honour of it.

C H A P. XI.

Of the Gods Lares.

I Shall finish the History of the terrestrial Gods with that of the Lares and Penates, who were the Guardians and Protectors of Families, and of the Goods of the Country.

We have seen in the second Volume (3) that every Man and Woman had their particular Genius: There was one also for every House, for every City, and in general for the whole Country, and while those of Men and Women retained the Name of Genii, those of Houses were called Lares, and those of Cities and particular Places Penates, though 'tis true however, that the two last were often confounded with one another.

As the Gods of Paganism, whatever Order they were of, never wanted a Genealogy, the Lares, according to Ovid (4), were the Sons of Mercury and Lara the Daughter of Almon. The indiscreet Lara having let Juno into the Secret of Jupiter's Gallantries, that God cut out her Tongue, and ordered Mercury to carry her to Hell. The dismal State she was in had not quite effaced all her Charms; her Conductor fell in Love with her, and had by her her Twins who were called Lares(a), who, in process of Time became the Guardians of the Streets and Ways.

(1) Chan. L. 2. c. 18. (2) In Eliacis. (3) L. 5. (4) Fast. I. 2.

Inscriptions favour the Opinion of Ovid, since we find some of them with these Words : Lar vialis, the Lar of the Highway.

In the mean Time as nothing is worse vouched than the Genealogies of the Pagan Gods, there are Authors who give Laronda for the Mother of the Lares; but may not they be the same Person under two Names like to one another? I shall not say so of another Mother of those Gods, who is named Mania: Confounding the Lares with the Manes. The Lares, according to Varro (1) were the same with the Manes; accordingly we are told that they were the Sons of Mania. Festus agrees in this with that learned Roman. At the Feasts, says he, called Compitalia, were placed in the Cross-streets upon Posts, Figures of Men and Women, because this Feast was thought to be celebrated in Honour of the Gods, called Lares. But another Proof that these Gods were the same with the Manes, is that these were also named Larvæ, whence the Masks of the Antients had taken their Names.

Servius also comes in to support this Opinion, when upon the fifth Eneid he refers the Original of the Lares to the antient Custom of burying the Dead in Houses, who were afterwards their Domestick Gods, for the Lares in that Case were evidently the same with the Manes.

But the Lares were not only Guardians of the Streets and Ways; they extended their Care likewise to the Fields, for which I am warranted by Tibullus:

Vos

(a) Fitque gravis, geminosque parit, qui compita Servant;
Et vigilant nostrâ semper in Æde Lares.

Fast. l. 2.

(1) De Ling. Lat.

*Vos quoque felicitis quondam, nunc pauperis agri
Custodes, fertis munera vestra Lares* (1).

As Dogs are usually the Guardians of Houses and even of Fields, we need not be surprized at Plautus's saying the Lares were represented under the Figure of those Animals (2); at least it is certain that they were clad in their Skins. We may remark here that when Children came to the Age when they laid aside the Bulla, they hung it at the Neck of the Lares, and the Slaves who received their Liberty, did the same with their Chains. Petronius, who always makes so agreeable an Use of antient Fiction, says, the Youth having entered into Trimalcion's Banqueting-Hall, clad in white Tunicks, placed the Gods Lares upon the Table, adorned with Bullæ.

As antient Paganism had provided Gods for all, so there were Lares also appointed for Ships, which to be sure had as much Need of them as Houses, and these were called Lares of the Sea, Lares Marini. The Question is whether these were different from the Gods Pataici mentioned in the third Volume, which were set upon the Prows of Ships to be their Patrons and Guardians? I am of Opinion they were not, since there are Authors who take these Lares to have been Neptune, Tethys, and Glaukus: And what more powerful and faithful Guardians could they have given to their Ships?

The most common Place of the Household-Gods, as we have it in St. Jerom, was behind the Door; and it was believed that they banished from thence every thing pernicious, especially the Lemures, Genii who were only capable of doing Mischief.

The Obligations which every one thought he owed to the Lares, induced their Votaries to make frequent Libations to them, and they even went the Length of Sacrifices: This at least is what may be be gathered from an antient Marble, published by Boissard, and dedicated by C. Sempronius Piso, to the Gods Lares of the Emperors (1), since besides the two Figures, the one of a young Man, the other of a Man more in Years, you see there a flaming Altar, with the Prefericula, a Vase, and a Patera, &c. Besides all this, the Statues of the Lares were adorned with Flowers and Garlands; Fruits were offered to them, they were kept clean and neat, and in short, a very particular Care was taken of them. There was also, at least in great Houses, one of the Domesticks set apart for the Service of those Gods; and Suetonius (2) informs us, that Domitian had a Valet de Chambre of this Kind. 'Tis proper however to observe that sometimes they lost all due Respect for these Gods, as upon certain Occasions when Grief for the Death of some beloved Object prevails over every other Consideration, and in that Case they even threw them out at the Window, as Suetonius tells us in the History of Caligula's Life*.

(1) Eleg. 25. (2) In Aul.

The Name of Grondiles, which was sometimes given to the Lares, owed its Rise to Romulus, who called them so, in Honour of the Sow that had brought forth at one Litter thirty Pigs; and from the Squeaking of these little Animals was this Name derived.

Besides the Names now mentioned, they had likewise others. Thus those were called Lares publici, who had Care of the publick Buildings; Familiares, those of private Houses; Viales, those of the Highways; Compitales, those of the Cross-ways, &c.

As we ought not to rely a great deal upon the Romans as to the Original of their Gods, I shall close this Article by observing that the Word Lar comes from the Tuscan Word Lars, or Larte, which signifies, Leader, or Conductor.

C H A P.

(1) Laribus Augg. C. Sempronius Piso. (2) In Domit.

* Upon the Death of Germanicus.

C H A P. XII.

Of the Gods Penates.

THOUGH 'tis true that the Penates were sometimes confounded with the Lares and Genii, 'tis certain however that they were oftner distinguished from one another; and their Distinction is very well observed in Coriolanus's Farewel to his Mother, to whom, according to Dionysius Halicarnasseus (1), he says, Adieu, ye Penates, ye paternal Lares, and ye Genii of this Place.

First we must not imagine, that the Penates formed a different Class of Divinities, since on the contrary they were chosen from each of them. Sometimes it was Jupiter, oftner Vesta, and so others, according to the Devotion of the Persons who made Choice of them. Nigidius, an antient Author cited by Arnobius (2), distinguishes four Sorts of Penates. The first are of the Class of Jupiter, that is, chosen from among the celestial Gods. The second from that of Neptune, or from the Sea-Gods. The third from those of Pluto's Class, or from among the infernal Gods. The last, might be taken indifferently from the Class of all the deified Men. It must be owned however that by the Penates were usually understood those of the Samothracians; though we grant at the same Time that it was optional to every one to choose those whom he had a mind: Accordingly we have antient Inscriptions that make mention of the Penates and Lares of all Sorts, even of the living Emperors. It was likewise permitted to place their Ancestors among those Gods; and this is what most frequently happened.

The Romans, according to Dionysius Halicarnasseus (3) gave the Name of Penates promiscuously to all their Gods; “ But those who have translated this
Greek

(1) Ant. L. 8. (2) Advers. Gent. (3) L. 10.

“ Greek Word, have called them, some Paternal “ Gods, others Original Gods : Others again the Gods
 “ of Possession : Some, the secret Gods or concealed “ Gods ; lastly, the tutelar Gods, whereby it would “ seem that each designed to express some parti“ cular Property of these Gods, though at Bottom
 “ they all mean the same thing.”

Antiently it was not allowable to have those private Gods, nor to address any Worship to them ; but at last, not only was the Introduction of them tolerated, but it was even authorized by the secular Powers.

There was even one of the Laws of the twelve Tables, ordering the religious Celebration of Sacrifices to the Penates, and the uninterrupted Continuation of them in Families, in the same Manner they had been established by the Heads of those Families. 'Tis farther known, that when any one passed into another Family, the Magistrate took Care to provide for the Worship of the Gods whom the adopted Person had relinquished.

If we would now trace the Original of the Penates, I take it to have arisen from a vulgar Opinion, that the Manes of their Ancestors took Pleasure after Death to dwell in their Houses, where they were even frequently interred, if we may believe Servius (a), and where their Pictures used to be preserved in the Places of greatest Respect. For after having considered them under the Notion of illustrious Persons, they came by Degrees to pay them Respect and Homage ; then they implored their Assistance, and lastly founded to them a worship and religious Ceremonies. The Passage of the Book of Wisdom already cited, Vol. I. which speaks of the Death of a Child, beloved by his Parents, whose Worship was at last established in the Family, is a convincing Proof of this. Thus I am of Opinion that of old

(a) Upon these Words of the Eneid, l. 6.

old the Penates were only the Manes of their Ancestors, as St. Augustin proves (1) from the Authority of Apuleius and Photinus; but that in after times they associated with them all the other Gods without Distinction.

The Statues of the Gods Penates were made not of Wax only, as some Authors pretend, but indifferently of all Sorts of Materials, even Silver itself. They were consecrated in the most secret Place, which was called the Lararium, Penetralia. There Altars were erected to them, Lamps kept burning, and Symbols added, all of them expressive of Vigilance, among others the Dog, whose Skin these Statues wore upon their Shoulders, as well as the Lares, or had the Figure of them under their Feet (a). Apuleius comprehends all the Sacrifices of the Lares and Penates in three Words, Thure, mero, & aliquando victimis; Incense, Wine, and sometimes Victims. There were for that Purpose Altars, such as may be seen in M. Baudelot's Work, intitled, the Utility of Voyages (2). On the Evening before their Feasts great Pains were taken to rub the Statues with Balm and Wax to make them fine and glistering, and capable of receiving the Impression of the Vows that were made to them. This Wax formed a Crust all over, which covered the Matter whereof the Statues were made; and this no doubt is what had deceived the Authors, I mentioned, who took them to be only made of Wax.

Antiently Children were offered to them in Sacrifice, but Brutus, he who expelled the Tarquins, changed this barbarous Sacrifice, into one more natural, and from that Time nothing was offered to them but Wine, Incense, Fruits, and sometimes bloody Victims, Lambs, Sheep, &c: as we see in Horace,
who

(1) De Civ. Dei, L. 9. c. 11.

(a) See the Harpocrates of Couper, and the Utility of Voyages by M. Baudelot.

(2) P. 262.

who inviting his Mistress to come and assist at the Sacrifice, which he was preparing in his Family in Honour of the Genius, takes Notice to her of the Preparation he had made for it (a). Tibullus in like Manner speaks of the Sacrifice of a Sheep which he offered up to the rural Gods the Lares. Their Statues were likewise crowned with Festoons, Garlick, and Poppy, and several little Ceremonies were added thereto which it is needless to recite. 'Tis proper only to remark that in the publick Sacrifices offered to the Penates, they sacrificed to them a Sow, as has been said in the Article of the Lares, from Varro and Propertius (b), and this Custom is thought to have been introduced by Enneas. It was in Time of the Saturnalia, that they celebrated the Festival of the Lares and Penates, and there was a Day besides in each Month set apart for worshipping these domestick Gods. Zeal went even sometimes so far as to worship some of them every Day, and even several Times in the same Day, as Suetonius and Tacitus prove from the Example of Nero, who neglected all the other Gods for the Sake of a favourite Penate.

As not only private Persons had each his Gods-Manes or Penates, but every People chose of them for the Preservation of the State, there was at Rome a Temple consecrated to the Domestick Gods, and there was set apart for them a Holyday which was celebrated

(a) Ridet argento Domus ; ara castis
Vincta verbenis, avet immolato
Spargier agno.

(b) Lib. 4. El. 1. Martial. 14. says also :

Iste tibi faciet bona Saturnalia porcus,
Inter spumantes ilice partus apros.

Or as Horace has it, Sat. L. 1. Sat. 3.

- - - - - Immolet aquis
Illic porcum Laribus.

celebrated with a great deal of Solemnity, the second * of the Kalends of January. To this were added the Games called Compitales, as much as to of the Cross-streets; because the Penates presided over them.

In fine, so great Respect was paid to the Penates, that no important Enterprize was undertaken without consulting them: Their Figures were even sometimes carried about in Journeys, as we learn from Apuleius: Wherever I go, says he, I always carry with me in my Journey the Figure of some God. And Cicero, it seems, was afraid of fatiguing his favourite Minerva, when upon setting out for his Exile; he went in a solemn Manner and consecrated her in the Capitol.

The Figure of the Gods Penates was sometimes the single Representation of some God; Genius; Heroe, or Demi-god, or lastly of some famous Ancestor: Frequently they were Pantheons; that is, such as were charged with the Symbols of several Divinities. Of these we find several in Spon, Couper, and particularly in Baudelot's Utility of Voyages.

As Man is naturally curious, and anxious about Futurity, 'tis probable that among the Penates there were some who delivered Oracles. We know that no important Business was done without consulting the Oracle, but as the Places to which they had to repair for that Purpose were sometimes remote; as great Apparatus and Expences was necessary in order to consult them, it was more convenient for every Man to have one in his own House, which he consulted at least for all domestic Affairs. 'Tis true, I have not found any positive Authority, to inform us of this Fact; but frequently a Medal, and Intaglio, lets us know many Things which we should otherwise have been ignorant of. Cupponi, the honourary Correspondent ſpondent of the Academy of the Belles-Lettres, ſent in 1733. to M. de Boze the Print of an antique Intaglio, a Cornelian, which repreſents an Altar whercon is a Head, or rather, a Mask ; by the Side, and almoſt behind, is the Figure of a Man ſtooping down, with his Head inclined, as it were to liſten. Upon the fore-part is a Woman ſtanding, and at the Foot of the Altar, a little Animal. The Explication given of it in the ninth Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy, perfectly agrees to one of the Gods Penates, who delivered Oracles. The Mask repreſents either the God Pan or Sylvanus, or ſome other of that Claſs : The Man who is in a liſtning Poſture, is expecting his Reſponſe : The Woman who is ſtanding, ſeems to come for Inſight either into ſome Dream, or ſome other Affair which diſturbs her : The little Animal, which may be taken for a Dog, or for a young Kid, is the Victim deſtined for the Sacrifice. All this may be ſeen at more Length in the Place which I have mentioned.

S f

* Last Day of December.

'Tis agreed that there was no idolatrous Nation, where Superſtition for the Gods Penates was carried farther than among the Romans, though almoſt all Nations held them in great Veneration (a), as the Greeks, the Egyptians, the Phœnicians, and Chaldeans. 'Tis probable that this Worſhip had been brought to Rome by the Phrygians. Virgil informs us that Æneas took great Care to bring with him the Penates (b) ; according to the Order he had received from the Fates by the Mouth of Heſter. (c).

Theſe Phrygian Gods, adopted with great Reverence by the Romans, who were fond of nothing ſo much as of being thought to be deſcended from Æneas and

(a) Et toto quippe mundo, & locis omnibus, omnium vocibus, fortuna ſola invocatur. Plin. l. 1.

(b) Ilum in Italiam portans, victosque Penates. Æn. l. 1.

(c) Sacra, ſuosque tibi commendat Troja Penates :

Hos cape fatorum Comites, his mœnia quære. Ibid.

and his Mother Venus, were placed in a Temple near the Forum. Here is the Description given of them by Dionysius Halicarnassens (1). “ They, “ were, says he, two Men sitting, each of them “ armed with a Pike, and the Sculpture of them “ was very antient. We have also, adds this Au- “ thor, several other Statues of these Gods in old “ Temples, which are all in a military Garb.”

The sacred Fire or Vesta, which Eneas likewise brought with him, was undoubtedly the most distinguished of the Gods Penates (a), since after that Hector had recommended these Gods to him, he himself approaches the sacred Hearth, and removed from thence the Fillets of Vesta, and the Fire that was there burning. If we may believe Varro cited by Macrobius (2), Dardanus had first brought these Phrygian Penates into the Island Samothrace, and Eneas transferred them thereafter from Troy into Latium.

I shall only add farther that the Idols which Jacob brought from the House of Laban his Father-in-Law, and which the Scripture calls by the Name of Theraphim, were Gods Penates, whose Worship was propagated afterwards into Phrygia, thence into Greece and Italy; this, without all Controversy, is their true Original.

We may add in the last Place, that it was probably believed in the Pagan World, that Houses were not sufficiently guarded by the Lares and Penates, since they had also other Gods to take Care of the Gates, the Keys and Hinges, for which I refer to what hath been said of them, when we were upon the Progress of Idolatry (3).

(1) L. 1.

(a) Sic ait, & manibus vittas, Vestamque potentem
Æternumque adytis effert penetralibus ignem.

Æn. L. 2.

(2) Sat. L. 3. c. 4. (3) Vol. I. B. 3.

THE MYTHOLOGY
AND FABLES
OF THE
ANCIENTS,

Explained from
HISTORY.

By the Abbé BANIER,
Member of the ROYAL ACADEMY of INSCRIPTIONS and BELLES-LETTRES.

V O L. III.

Translated from the Original FRENCH.

Containing; among other Curious Things,

- | | |
|--|--|
| I. The Notions of the Egyptians , and of the Greek Poets and Philosophers, concerning a Future State. | IV. Of the Virtues , Vices , and Passions that were deified. |
| II. A particular Description of the Poetical Hell and Elysian
Fields . | V. Of the German and Gallic
Divinities, and those of Great
Britain . |
| III. The History of the Judges of
Hell, and of the Infernal Gods. | VI. The History of the Heroic
Age, and of the celebrated
Heroes of Antiquity. |
-

L O N D O N:

Printed for A. MILLAR, at Buchanan's-Head, against
St. Clement's-Church in the Strand: M: DCC: XL.

CONTENTS

OF THE

THIRD VOLUME.

BOOK IV.

Of the Infernal Gods.

CHAP. I. What Sentiments the Egyptians had about the State of the Soul after Death,	Pag. 2
Chap. II. The Sentiments of the Greek Philosophers upon the same Subject,	6
CHAP. III. The Sentiments of the Poets,	8
CHAP. IV. A particular Description of Hell according to the Poets,	16
CHAP. V. That what the Greeks delivered on the Subject of the infernal Regions and Elysian Fields, was borrowed from the Egyptian Usages already mentioned,	26
CHAP. VI. Of Charon and Cerberus,	28
CHAP. VII. Of the Infernal Rivers,	34
CHAP. VIII. Other Particularities of the System of the Poetical Hell,	38
CHAP. IX. Of the Judges of Hell,	41
CHAP. X. Of the Infernal Gods, Pluto, Ceres, Proserpine, and Cottytto,	42
CHAP. XI. Of the Eleusinian Mysteries and other Feasts of Ceres,	61
CHAP. XII. Plutus, the God of Riches,	70
CHAP. XIII. The Furies,	73
CHAP. XIV. The Parcæ, Fate, and the Destinies,	82
CHAP.

C O N T E N T S.

CHAP. XV. Nemesis, or the Nemeses, and Adraſtea,	92
CHAP. XVI. Of the Dii Manes,	94
CHAP. XVII. Of the Divinities of the Night, Sleep, and Death,	96
CHAP. XVIII. Of the Worſhip paid to the In- fernal Gods,	102
CHAP. XIX. The Hiſtory of thoſe whom the Poets have placed in Tartarus,	103
The Giants and the Titans,	ibid.
Sifyphus,	104
Tityus,	107
Phlegyas,	109
Tantalus,	111
The Danaids,	115
The two Aloides,	116

B O O K V.

Of ſome other Gods adored by the Greeks and Romans.

CHAP. I. Of ſome Beings, and particularly of the Virtues that were raiſed to Divini- ties	121
CHAP. II. Of Evil Beings, of Paſſions, and Vices that were advanced to Divinities,	139
CHAP. III. Of Good and Bad Fortune,	147
CHAP. IV. Of the Gods of Feaſts and Revels, Momus and Comus,	152
CHAP. V. Of the Gods of Medicine and Health, Eſculapius, Hygieia, Theleſphorus, Jaſo, Pa- nacæa, &c.	154
CHAP. VI. Of certain Gods peculiar to the Greeks, and ſome People in Aſia Minor and the Iſles,	168

CHAP.

C O N T E N T S.

CHAP. VII. Of some Gods peculiar to the Ro-	182
mans,
CHAP. VIII. The Continuation of the same Sub-
ject,	192
CHAP. IX. Of some Gods peculiar to Italy,	206

P A R T S E C O N D.

Of the Gods of other European Nations, those especially of the Gauls and Germans.

B O O K VI.

Of the Gods of the Gauls.

CHAP. I. Of the Religion of the Gauls,	212
CHAP. II. Of the Temples of the Gauls,	221
CHAP. III. Of the Ministers of Religion among
the Gauls, and especially of the Druids,	225
The Maxims of the Druids,	242
CHAP. IV. Of the Druidesses,	243
CHAP. V. Of some Gallic Superstitions,	246
CHAP. VI. Of the Bas-reliefs dug up in the
Choir of the Cathedral at Paris,	250
CHAP. VII. Of the Gods of the Gauls whom
Cæsar names,	268
CHAP. VIII. Of some other Gallic Gods: Of
Pennius, Abellio, Dolichenus, and Mithras,	274
CHAP. IX. Of other Gods worshipped in the
Gauls: Berecinthia, Saturn, Pluto, Proserpine,
and Bacchus,	276
CHAP. X. Ceres, Proserpine, Diana, and the
Moon, Isis and Telephorus,	281
CHAP. XI. Other Gallic Divinities, deified Ci-
ties, &c.	285
CHAP,

C O N T E N T S.

CHAP. XII.	Of the Mother-Goddeses,	291
CHAP. XIII.	Of the Religion of the Inhabitants of Great-Britain,	301
CHAP. XIV.	Of the Religion of the antient Iberians and Spaniards,	302

B O O K VII.

Of the Religion of the antient Germans, and some other Northern Nations.

CHAP. I.	Superstitions of the antient People of Germany,	315
CHAP. II.	Of Irminful, the God of the Saxons,	320
CHAP. III.	Of the Goddess Nehalennia,	323
CHAP. IV.	Isis, worshipped by the Suevi,	325
CHAP. V.	Tuiston,	328
CHAP. VI.	Of some other Divinities of the Germans, and neighbouring Nations,	330
CHAP. VII.	Of some Heroes of the antient Germans, and of Cities consecrated to the Gods,	332

V O L U M E VI.*

A Preliminary,	336
-----------------------	-----

P A R T F I R S T.

Containing the History of the fabulous Age.

B O O K I.

Preliminaries to the History of Greece.

CHAP. I.	Of the Chronology of the antient Greeks,	341
----------	---	-----

* Of the Original in 12:ro.

CHAP.

C O N T E N T S.

CHAP. II.	The Duration of the Heroic Age,	345
CHAP. III.	The State of antient Greece,	347
CHAP. IV.	Of the first Inhabitants of Greece,	348
CHAP. V.	The History of the first Kingdoms founded in Greece, by the Colonies that arrived there,	356
ART. I.	The Kingdom of Argos founded by Inachus,	357
ART. II.	The Kingdom of Sicyon, founded by Egialeus,	358
ART. III.	The Arrival of Danaus in Greece,	363
ART. IV.	The Deluge of Ogyges,	368
ART. V.	The Kingdom of Athens founded by Cecrops,	372
ART. VI.	The Arrival of Deucalion in Greece,	378
ART. VII.	The Deluge of Deucalion,	379
ART. VIII.	The Posterity of Deucalion,	388
CHAP. VI.	The Arrival of Lelex in Greece,	398
CHAP. VII.	The Colony of Cadmus settled in Greece,	391
CHAP. VIII.	The Arrival of Pelops in Greece,	422

B O O K II.

Of the H E R O E S.

CHAP. I.	The Original of the Name of Heroe, and what kind of Worship was paid to them who acquired it,	424
CHAP. II.	At what Time and in what Manner the Practise of worshipping Heroes was intro- duced into Greece, &c.	428
		CHAP.

C O N T E N T S.

CHAP. III.	The Names of the Heroes and Heroins worshipped in Greece,	429
CHAP. IV.	The History of Perseus, Andromeda, the Gorgons, &c.	435
CHAP. V.	The Explanation of the Fable of Medusa and the Gorgons,	437
CHAP. VI.	The History of Bellerophon,	467
CHAP. VII.	An Examination into the Time when Bellerophon and Perseus lived,	477
CHAP. VIII.	The History of the two Minos's, and of the War of the Second against the Athenians, with the Adventures of the Minotaur, of Dedalus, Theseus, &c.	482
CHAP. IX.	The History of Phedra and Hippolitus,	516
CHAP. X.	The History of Dedalus, and of the Labyrinth of Crete,	519
CHAP. XI.	The War of the Centaurs and Lapithæ: Ixion and Pirithous,	525
CHAP. XII.	Wherein we examine, if Chiron made a Kalendar for the Argonauts,	541
CHAP. XIII.	The Continuation of the History of Pirithous,	544

MYTHO-

MYTHOLOGY and FABLES

Explain'd by

HISTORY.

BOOK IV.*

Of the Infernal Gods.

IN order to give some tolerable Account of Hell and the Elysian Fields, such as the Greeks conceived of them, I shall examine, 1. What Sentiments the Egyptians had of the human Soul, and of the State it was in after its Separation from the Body. 2. Shew that the Greeks had derived from the Ceremonies performed by that People at Funerals, all their Notions about the State of Souls after Death; and particularly their Ideas of the Infernal Regions and Elysian Fields. 3. Give an exact Description of these two Mansions, founded upon the Works of the Antients, especially upon Homer and Virgil. 4. Speak of the Gods who presided over the Infernal Regions. Lastly, Of Persons of greater Distinction who were said to have been doomed to Tartarus for the Expiation of their Crimes.

VOL. III.

B

CHAP.

* Here begins Vol. 5 of the Original.

C H A P. I.

What Sentiments the Egyptians had about the State of the Soul after Death.

IF there is any Point wherein the Pagan Theology deviates less than another from the Light of Nature, it is this which relates to the State of Souls after Death, and to the Sentence pronounced upon them in the other World, since it supposes the Knowledge of the Immortality of the Soul.

This Article, 'tis true, had been so distorted by Fables ridiculous and absurd, that even Children did not believe them, as Juvenal has it; but then it is as true, that the Ground-work thereof was good, and served for a Curb to Lust and Licentiousness.

'Tis certain, in the first Place, that this Part of the Creed of the Greeks was derived to them from Egypt; and, for Proof of it, I shall quote what Diodorus Siculus tells us of the Egyptian Customs on this Head, and then compare it with what we find in the most antient Poets, and the Ceremonies observed by the Greeks.

The Author now named, after he has told us (1) that according to the Egyptians themselves, Orpheus had introduced into Greece the whole Fable of the Infernal Regions, adds; “ The Punishments of the “ Wicked in Tartarus, the Mansions of the Blessed in “ the Elysian Fields, and some other such Notions, “ are evidently borrowed from the Funeral Rites of “ the Egyptians. Mercury, the Conductor of Souls
 “ among the Greeks, was formed on the Model of a “ Man, to whom the antient Egyptians used to com“ mit the Care of Apis's dead Body to carry it to “ another, who received it under a Mask with three “ Heads like those of Cerberus. Orpheus having com“ municated the Knowledge of this Ceremony to “ Greece, Homer applies it in these Verses of the “ Odysssey:

Cyl-

(1) L. i. c. 36.

*Cyllenius now to Pluto's dreary Reign Conveys the Dead, a lamentable Train !
The golden Wand that causes Sleep to fly,
Or in soft Slumbers seals the wakeful Eye ;
That drives the Ghosts to Realms of Night or Day, Points out the long, uncomfortable Way.*

The Poet subjoins a little after :

*And now they reach'd the Earth's remotest Ends,
And now the Gates where Evening Sol descends,
And Leuca's Rock, and Ocean's utmost Streams,
And now pervade the dusky Land of Dreams,
And rest at last, where Souls unbodied dwell
In ever flowering Meads of Asphodel.
The empty Forms of Men inhabit there, Impassive Semblance, Images of Air !*

Pope's Odyss. 24. v. 1. & 15.

“ Now the Ocean is the Nile itself, to which the “ Egyptians, in their Language, give a Name of the “ same Import with that of the Ocean. The Gates “ of the Sun are the City of Heliopolis ; and those “ happy Plains, said to be the Mansion of the just “ Dead, are literally nothing else but the delightful “ Fields that are on the Confines of the Lake Acheru- “ sia near Memphis, which are diversified with Fields
“ and Ponds, covered with Corn or Lotus. 'Tis “ not without Foundation that the Dead are said to “ dwell there ; for there it is that most of the Egyp- “ tian Funerals end, when having transported their “ Bodies over the Nile and the Lake Acherusia, they “ are at last deposited in Tombs which are ranged un“ der Ground in this Plain.

“ The Ceremonies used in Egypt at this very Day, “ are conformable to all that the Greeks say of the In“ fernal Regions ; such as the Boat which transports
“ the Bodies, the Piece of Money that must be given “ the Ferry-man, whose Name is Charon in the Egyp- “ tian Language ; the Temple of the gloomy Hecate “ placed at the Entrance of Hell ; the Gates of Co-“ Cytus and Lethe set upon brazen Hinges ; the other “ Gates, which are those of Truth ; the Image or “ Justice without the Head. Thus it is as to all the “ rest, which appear to be nothing but an exact Co“ py of those Funeral Obsequies, such as they are ac“ tually performed. In the City Acanthus, which is “ beyond the Nile, on the Side of Libya, about six “ Score Stadia from Memphis, there is a Cask full of “ Holes, into which three hundred and sixty Priests “ daily pour Water from the Nile. Not far from “ thence, the Fable of the Ass (1) is really executed

 “ in a publick Assembly, where a Man twists a long “ Cord of Rushes, which is untwisted at the same “ Time by People that are behind him.”

The same Author, after having described the Egyptian
 Manner of embalming their Dead, thus goes on ;
 “ When the Body is to be interred, the Day is first “ intimated to the Judges, then to the Family and “ Friends of the deceased. This Intimation is given “ by mentioning the Person’s Name, and by say“ ing, He is going to pass the Lake. Immediate“ ly forty Judges assemble, and seat themselves in a “ Tribunal in form of a Semi-circle, placed on the “ other Side of the Lake. Artificers, appointed for “ this Purpose, place upon the Lake a Boat which “ they have built, which is guided by a Pilot, whom “ the Egyptians name Charon in their Language. We “ are told, that Orpheus being in Egypt, and having “ seen this Ceremony, founded upon it the Fable of
 “ the Infernal Regions, adding some Circumstances “ to what he had there seen practised ; we shall “ speak of them very soon at more Length. Before
 “ the Coffin is put into this Boat, the Law permits all
 “ to come and table their Complaints against the “ Dead. If any one convicts him of having led a “ bad Life, the Judges pass Sentence, and deprive “ the Dead of his destined Burial. But if he who “ enters the Accusation fails in the Proof, he incurs “ severe Penalties. When no Accuser happens, or “ when

(1) See Erasm. Adag. Chil. 1. Cent. 3. 83.

“ when those who have appeared are themselves con“ victed of Calumny, all the Relations lay aside their “ Mourning, praise the Deceased, without mention“ ing however his Pedigree like the Greeks, because “ all the Egyptians think themselves equally noble.
 “ They begin his Encomium from his Education ;
 “ then, running over the several Periods of his Life,
 “ they extol his Piety, his Justice, his Courage, and “ pray the Infernal Gods to receive him into the “ Mansions of the Blessed. The whole Audience ap“ plauds the Funeral Oration ; join new Encomiums
 “ with it, and congratulate the Dead in being entered “ upon a peaceful and glorious Immortality.”

The same Diodorus, after having told us that their Ancestors were sometimes kept in their Houses all embalmed, that by seeing them they might preserve the Memory of their good Actions, adds, that they also preserved there the dead Bodies of those who had been denied Burial for Crimes or Debt ; and that sometimes their Descendants, grown rich or powerful, discharged their Debts, or insisted on their Justification, and procured for them an honourable Burial. For the Egyptians, continues he, have always been religiously observant of putting particular Honour upon their Dead. They frequently pledge their Bodies for their Debts ; and those who don't relieve them are infamous while they live, and deprived of Burial after their Decease.

Porphyry (1) has preserved to us the Prayer, or rather the Absolution, which the Egyptian Priests gave the Kinsmen of the Deceased, and he had taken it from Euphantus an Author now lost.

“ O Sun, thou first Divinity ! and ye celestial “ Gods ! from whom Men have derived Life, vouch“ safe to receive me this Day into your holy Taber“ nacles. I have endeavoured to the best of my “ Power to render my Life acceptable to you. I “ have demeaned myself with the highest Veneration “ towards the Gods whom I was acquainted with in “ my Infancy ; I never failed in my Duty to those
 “ who

“ who gave me being, nor in natural Affection to the “ Womb that bore me. My Hands are pure from “ my Neighbour’s Blood ; I maintained an inviolable “ Regard to Truth and Fidelity ; and may I not ap“ peal to the Silence of Men, who have nothing to “ lay to my Charge, as a sure Testimony of my In“ tegrity ? If however any personal and secret Fault
 “ have escaped me, whether in eating or drinking, “ these Entrails bear the Blame.” Then the Relations produced the Entrails of the Deceased, and they were forthwith thrown into the Lake.

“ The Greeks, remarks the same Diodorus, by their “ Fables and Fictions, have corrupted the true Notions “ of the Recompense of the Good and the Punish“ ment of the Wicked ; and thereby have exposed “ to the Ridicule of Libertines one of the most power“ ful Motives to induce Men to live well.”

C H A P. II.

The Sentiments of the Greek Philosophers upon the same Subject.

PLATO is he of the Philosophers who has reasoned most upon the Soul, and the State of departed Spirits ; but it must be owned that his System, as well as that of all the rest, is ill supported and full of Inconsistencies : When once we are out of the right Way, every Advance we make but leads us the farther astray. When a Man dies, according to this Philosopher, his Soul goes into a Place which he calls Divine, and is there judged. If the Person’s Life was conformable to the light of Reason, he is ushered in to a higher Apartment, where he enjoys Pleasure and Prosperity of all Kinds in the Society of the Gods :
 The Souls of bad Men sink into a noisome Abyss, there to dwell with thick Darkness, and to suffer all Sorts of Misery. Then this Philosopher gives a Description of Hell, of the Elysian Fields, and speaks of the Rivers in those Places, the Judges, the Furies, &c.
 much like Homer, whose Notions he copied.

Socrates

Socrates his Master was of the same way of thinking with himself. That Philosopher distinguished a threefold State of Souls departed. Those who had neither distinguished Merit nor enormous Vices, inhabited on the Confines of Acherusia, where being purified by the Waters of the Lake, they received the Reward of the few Virtues they had practised. The Souls of the Wicked wandered about their Tombs, where they were tormented in different Ways. After which having drunk of the Water of Lethe, they entered into new Bodies, more or less honourable, according to their Merit. Lastly the Souls of the Good went immediately into the Elysian Fields.

Pythagoras believed that the Soul, upon its immediate Separation from the Body, was conducted by Mercury into a Place of the purest Air, where were the Elysian Fields, called by Virgil the Aerial Regions, Aerios campos. There it was, said Pythagoras, that the Souls of Philosophers, of all others the best, became like unto the Gods, while those of the Wicked were tormented by the Furies without Intermission: But both the one and the other, after a certain Space of Time, which he calls the Time of Purifications, returned to the Earth to animate new Bodies. He was the first in Europe, to mention it by the by, that taught, at least publickly, the Doctrine of the Metempsychosis, or of the Transmigration of Souls into new Bodies, which Doctrine he had learned from the Egyptians, among whom he had travelled. I say, he taught this Doctrine; for indeed long before him, Orpheus and Homer, who had also borrowed it from the same People, had spoke of it in their Works.

The Egyptians then are to be reckoned the Founders of this Opinion, which afterwards was diffused on one Hand thro' Europe, whither Melampus, Orpheus, Homer and others introduced it; and which in like manner penetrated into the Center of India, where it made such wonderful Progress that it prevails there at this Day. What I have advanced with Relation to this Opinion is expressly asserted by Herodotus (1). The Egyptians, says he, are the first who believed the Immortality of the Soul; and the same People are to be reckoned the first Inventors of the Transmigration of Souls. Their Priests, says he, teach that the Soul does not die with the Body, but is received by Amenthes. This Amenthes was a Place under Ground, much like the Hell of the Greek Poets. Plutarch (2), who says this Word imports, that which gives, and that which receives, adds that it was a Place in the Center of the Earth, the common Receptacle of departed Souls. As this Gulf received them, so it gave them back in like Manner; and when they came out of it, they were united to new Bodies; first to those of terrestrial Animals, then to those of Fishes and Sea-Monsters, then to those of Birds, and after a Circulation of three thousand Years from one of those Bodies into another (3), they returned to re-animate human Bodies whence they departed, again to begin the same Revolution: And thus they were immortal. To this Opinion, says Herodotus, was owing the Care which the Egyptians took to embalm their dead Bodies at an infinite Expence, as well as those stately Tombs whereon they bestowed such vast Sums; while they neglected their Houses, which they looked upon as no better than Inns, or Tabernacles not worthy their Regard: Which makes Diodorus Siculus say; that the Egyptians were less curious to build Houses for the Living, than Tombs for the Dead.

C H A P. III.

The Sentiments of the Poets.

THE Poets, though usually transported with an Enthusiastick Warmth which is not always guided by Reason, have however delivered much the same Sentiments with the Philosophers about the State of Souls after Death; but each of them having followed his own Caprice, 'tis no Wonder that we find in their Works so many peculiar Notions. And indeed, though they they agree in general, that the Soul goes either to Elysium or Tartarus, yet they are far from being unanimous as to the Situation of those two Mansions.

(1) L. 2. (2) De Is. & Osir. (3) Herod. loc. cit.

Some place the Elysian Fields in the middle Region of the Air; some in the Moon, others in the Sun; others, in fine, in the Centre of the Earth adjoining to Tartarus itself. The most common Opinion is that they lay in one of the Isles of the Ocean, called the Fortunate Islands, which are reckoned to be the Canaries. But it is a Question whether in those antient Times they had any Knowledge of Islands so remote from the Continent. And therefore 'tis better to say, that according to them the Mansion of the Blessed was in the charming Country of Betica (a); whether the Phœnicians had travelled from the earliest Times. This Country was delicious, watered with Rivers, Streams, and Fountains. There were charming Plains, Woods, and enchanted Groves, Mountains containing Mines of Gold and Silver, and a fertile Soil yielding all the Necessaries of Life in Abundance: This is the Representation given of it by all the Antients; and consequently no Place more proper to furnish the Poets with their charming Descriptions of the Regions of the Blessed.

Farther the Tartessus, which was in this Province, is undoubtedly the Tartarus of the Poets; this at least is the Sentiment of the learned Bochart. And if we add that this Country is at the Extremity of the old World, since the Antients knew nothing beyond it, but believed that the Sun went every Evening to Bed in the Ocean, and gave no more Light to the World till the next Day, 'tis evident they would be ready to think it a Region covered with eternal Darkness.

The same Poets differ no less among themselves with respect to the infernal Regions. All that we can gather from the Theogony of Hesiod is, that this Place which he always calls Tartarus, was a Prison where the Titans were lodged with Saturn himself; that this Prison was kept by I know not what Sort of

(a) The present Andalusia in the Extremity of Spain towards Cadix.

of Being, called Campe, whom Jupiter, become Lord of the World, placed under the Custody of Giants with an hundred Hands.

Homer (1) had more distinct Notions as to this Region of the Dead ; and according to him all the Souls were conducted thither by Mercury : He even settles the Place where it was, namely in the Country of the Cimmerians, People buried in eternal Darkness, at the Extremity of the Ocean, where Styx, Phlegeton, and the other Rivers of Hell rolled their Waves. The Antients were very much puzzled to determine what Country the Poet had in his Eye. Some will have him to mean the Confines of Cadiz, or Betice, that Country being at the Extremity of the Ocean, where the Sun dips in his Waves, and where consequently must be that Darkness he speaks of. Some think the Poet, who has always been reckoned an excellent Geographer, designed thereby the Inhabitants of the Northern Regions, even those who for whole Months are deprived of the Light of the Sun. Others are of Opinion he must be understood to mean the People who dwell at the Extremity of the Euxine Sea, where was the Country of the Cimmerians, and Strabo favours this Opinion, when, speaking of Homer, he says : “ That “ Poet knew the Cimmerians of the Bosphorus, who in“ habit towards the North, in Regions always over-“ spread with thick Clouds ; and he could not be “ a Stranger to them, for it was about the Time of “ his Birth, or not many Years before, that these “ Cimmerians made Inroads as far as Ionia.” This Poet therefore had some Knowledge of the Cimmerians of the Bosphorus, and by a poetical License, he has transplanted them to the Coasts of Italy, as he has done the Cyaneæ or Symplegades, which are Rocks at the Mouth of the Euxine Sea.

M. le Clerc (2) thinks Homer had an Eye to the The-ssprotians and those of Epirus, who being continually at work in the Mines, were really buried in Darkness. Farther 'tis in Epirus, that those Rivers were which
that

(1) Odyss. l. 10, & 11.

(2) Biblio. Univ.

that Poet describes, as shall be said hereafter. But 'tis evident we are not to go so far in Search of the Cimmerians whom Homer speaks of; they were really upon the Western Coasts of Italy, near Baïæ and Puteoli; and my Reason for it is, that Ulysses arrives there the same Day that he takes his Leave of Circe. The Description which he gives of this Country is, according to Strabo, very conformable to Geography; and if the Poet adds that this Region was at the Extremities of the Ocean, it is by a Licence which Poetry justifies.

Here is what Circe says to Ulysses affrighted at the Proposal she had made him of going down to Hell, to consult Tiresias's Ghost:

*Thy fated Road (the magick Pow'r reply'd)
Divine Ulysses! Asks no mortal Guide.
Rear but the Mast, the spacious Sail display,
The northern Winds shall wing thee on thy Way.
Soon shalt thou reach old Ocean's utmost Ends,
Where to the Main the shelving Shore descends;
The barren Trees of Proserpine's black Woods,
Poplars and Willows trembling o'er the Floods:
There fix thy Vessel in the lonely Bay,
And enter there the Kingdom void of Day:
Where Phlegeton's loud Torrents rushing down,
Hiss in the flaming Gulf of Acheron;
And where slow rolling from the Stygian Bed,
Cocytus' lamentable Waters spread, &c.*

Pope's Odyss. B. 10. v. 598.

Ulysses encouraged by this Account of the Voyage, sets Sail in the Morning, and in the Evening of the same Day arrives in the Place which the Goddess had described to him. 'Tis therefore evident that the Ocean is put there only to give a greater Air of the Marvellous to that Heroe's Voyage. Accordingly Strabo positively says: That the Cimmerians of Homer are upon the Coasts of Italy is a certain Fact; the Antients, adds he, placed Homer's Necromancy near the Lake

Lake Avernus (a). There the Rivers were which he speaks of in the Passage now quoted. Servius who agrees with him (1), at the same Time accounts for what may have given the Poet a Handle to say that Country was covered with Darkness. “Near to Baiæ, “says that learned Commentator, is a low and gloomy “Vale, surrounded on all Sides with high Mountains, “which shut out the Light of the Sun either rising “or setting.” And if we add that here is the Lake Avernus, whose exhalations were formerly mortal, that the Country was full of Sulphur and Bitumen, it will justify Homer in having there placed the Entry to Pluto’s Kingdom.

Pliny adds further, that besides the Acherusian Lake, the Avernus and the parched plains of the Phlegræans, there was of old in that Place a City called Cimmerium (b).

Bochart (2), to mention it by the by, is then very probably in the right in saying, that the Word Cimmerian comes from the Phœnician Word Cimmir, dark, or rather the Blackness of Darkness; but I reckon he is mistaken in placing the Cimmerians in Homer upon the Coast of Provence; for how could Ulysses have arrived there the same Day that he set out from the Circean Promontory?

Be that as it will, Virgil (3) has followed Homer’s Notion, in placing with him, though without any Disguise, the Mouth of Hell upon the same Coast, and near the Lake Avernus, as we shall see by and by. But the other Poets don’t agree with the two whose Authorities we have now quoted, since some of them place the Entrance of Hell at the Promontory of Tenarus, where was the Cave whence, according to the Fable,

(a) They gave the Name of Homer’s Necromancy to the eleventh Book of the Odyssey, because the Subject of it is the calling up of Tiresias’s Ghost.

(1) Upon the 6th Æn.

(b) Avernus lacus, juxta quem Cimmerium oppidum quondam: Dein Puteoli, postque Phlegræi campi, Acherusia palus, &c. Pliny, L. 3. c. 6.

(2) Chap. L. 1. c. 33.

(3) En, L. 6.

Fable, Hercules had dragged Cerberus when he went down to Hell. Others reckon that this Place was in Thesprotia, and Lucan (1) is the only one as I know, who has removed the Entrance of Hell to the Banks of the Euphrates.

We are further to remark that the Poets distinguish three Sorts of things in Man, his Body, his Soul, his Ghost or Phantom (2). Virgil making Æneas invoke the Manes of his Father Anchises before he celebrates his Anniversary, says :

*Salvete recepti
Nequicquam cineres, animæque umbræque paternæ* (3).

And Dido dying makes this Reflection :

Et nunc magna mei sub terras ibit imago (4).

Lucretius is yet more exprefs as to this Article :

*Esse Acherusia templa,
Quo neque permaneant animæ, neque corpora nostra,
Sed quædam simulacra, modis pallentia miris* (5).

The Latin Poets now quoted have only copied Homer upon the Article in Question. That Poet speaking of Hell in the eleventh Book of the Odyſſey ſays, Proſerpine had granted Tireſias the Priviledge of retaining all his Underſtanding after Death ; that even in that diſmal State he had Eyes ſo penetrating, as to ſee into the Secrets of Futurity, while the other Dead were in Compariſon of him but Shades and vain Phantoms. But the ſame Tireſias addreſſing Ulyſſes, fully unfolds this Piece of Mythology : “ Such, ſays “ he, is the Condition of all Mortals when Life quits “ the Body ; no more are they fenced with Sinews, “ or cloathed with Fleſh and Bones ; the groſs corpo- “ real Frame becomes Fuel for the Flames when it “ is relinquished by the Spirit ; and as for the Soul “ that ſubtil aerial Vehicle it flies away like a Dream.” Here very plainly are the three Things I am ſpeaking of.

(1) De Bel. Civ. (2) See what has been ſaid upon this before. (3) En. l. 5. (4) En. l. 4. (5) Lucr. l. 1.

of. The material and terrestrial Body, which is reduced to Ashes upon the Funeral-Pile: The Spirit, that is, the spiritual Part of the Soul which returns to Heaven, the Place of its Original; and the Soul, that is, the subtil aerial Substance which cloaths the Body, flies away like a Dream. 'Tis this last that goes down to the infernal Regions, and is called the Phantom or Image.

If we would trace this Opinion to its Source, we shall find it also to be derived from the Egyptians, who believed the Souls to be composed of a subtil and luminous Body, and of what we call Spirit: The subtil Body is the material part of the Soul; and the Understanding, φρόνησις, is the spiritual part. After Death, that is, after the Separation of the terrestrial Body from the Soul, there is another Separation of the two parts of this Soul. The subtil Body, which is the Phantom, the Image of the terrestrial Body, goes to the infernal Regions; and the Understanding, the Spirit, which is the spiritual Part, ascends to Heaven. Thus, according to this Theology, the Souls of Men, or rather their Shades, quædam simulachra, were in the infernal Regions separate from their Intellect; and these were mere Phantoms, Images, that bore even the Marks of the terrestrial Body; unless they had received the Privilege of preserving with them their intellectual Part, as Homer says of the Soothsayer Tiresias.

It was therefore a settled Doctrine of Theology in those Times of Darkness, that after Death the material Body was resolved into Ashes; that the Spirit θυμός and φρόνησις, the spiritual part of the Soul, returned to Heaven; and the Soul, that is, the subtil Substance which was as it were a Covering to the Body, its Phantom, its Image, went down to the infernal Regions.

The Poets are not unanimous as to the Time that Souls were to dwell in Hell, or in the Elysian Fields: Anchises seems to insinuate to his Son Eneas, that the latter after a Revolution of a thousand Years, drank
of

of the Water of Lethe, and then went into other Bodies, following in some Measure the Opinion of the Metempsychosis, as has been said :

*Has omnes, ubi mille rotam volvère per annos,
Lethæum ad fluvium Deus evocat agmine magno ;
Scilicet immemores, supera ut convexa revisant
Rursus, & incipiant in corpora velle reverti. (1)*

The Case was otherwise with those who were condemned to Tartarus, they being doomed to dwell there for ever. Virgil says of the unhappy Theseus, “ there he is fixed eternally to remain :”

————— Sedet æterumque sedebit Infelix Theseus.

And the other Poets assert the same of Ixion, Tantalus, the Titans, and all the other Criminals, though their Systems are hardly consistent as to this Article. But 'tis proper to remark that Pythagoras and his Disciples seem to have limited the Time of those Pains to a thousand Years ; this at least is the Term fixed to the Expiations mentioned by Plato in his Republic ; and in this he seems to have followed the Opinion of those Philosophers, as well as Virgil, not to mention others, when he says : Mille rotam volvère per annos.

As to those who were neither in Tartarus nor in the Elysian Fields, but in the vast Forests that lay before these two Places, such as Dido, Deiphobus, and the rest whom Æneas met, after a certain Time of Purgation and Suffering, they were sent into the Elysian Fields :

*Quisque suos patimur manes, exinde per amplum
Mittimur Elysium, & pauci læta arva tenemus, (2)*

And this again is what makes Deiphobus say to the Sibyl :

————— *Ne sævi, magna sacerdos,
Discedam, explebo numerum, reddarque tenebris. Id. Ib.*

CHAP.

(1) Virgil, Æn. 1. 6.

(2) Virgil, ibid.

C H A P: IV.

A particular Description of Hell according to the Poets.

OF all the Poets who have mentioned Hell, and the Pains that are there endured; I shall cite only Homer, Virgil, and Pindar, because they have drawn together all that profane Antiquity taught on this Subject; but before I come to Particulars, I shall observe that if Virgil, the faithful Copier of Homer, is often inferior to him in other Things, yet in this to me he appears far to surpass him, and much more Claudian, Silius Italicus, and the rest.

Circè, after having taught Ulysses the Way to Hell, as we have said in the former Chapter, thus continues to address him ;

*First draw thy Faulchion, and on ev'ry Side
Trench the black Earth a Cubit long and wide :
To all the Shades around Libations pour,
And o'er th' ingredients strow the hallow'd Flour.
New Wine and Milk, with Honey temper'd, bring;
And living Water from the crystal Spring.
Then the wan Shades and feeble Ghosts implore;
With promis'd Off'rings on thy native Shore ;
A barren Cow, the stateliest of the Isle;
And, heap'd with various Wealth, a blazing Pile :
These to the rest ; but to the Seer must bleed
A sable Ram, the Pride of all thy Breed.
These solemn Vows and holy Off'rings paid
To all the phantom Nations of the Dead ;
Be next thy Care the sable Sheep to place
Full o'er the Pit, and bell-ward turn their Face :
But from th' infernal Rite thine Eye withdraw,
And back to Ocean glance with rev'rend Awe.
Sudden shall skim along the dusky Glades
Thine airy Shoals and visionary Shades.
Then give Command the sacrifice to haste,
Let the flec'd Victims in the Flames be cast,*

And

*And sacred Vows and mystic Songs apply'd
To gristy Pluto, and his gloomy Bride.
Wide o'er the Pool thy Faulchion wav'd around,
Shall drive the Spectres from forbidden Ground:
The sacred Draught shall all the Dead forbear,
Till awful from the Shades arise the Seer.
Let him oraculous, the End, the Way,
The Turns of all thy future Fate display,
Thy Pilgrimage to come, and Remnant of the Day.* }
Pope's Odyss. B. XI. V. 14.

Ulysses literally obeys what Circe had prescribed to him: The Shades thirsting after the Blood of the Victims, come and suck it up; Ulysses repels them with his Sword, and after having learned from Tiresias what was to be his Fate, he retires. Such is the Description Homer gives of Hell. 'Tis true; in order to make something of so slender a Fiction, which, after all, is but a mere Piece of Conjurat[i]on, he makes the Ghosts recite their Adventures, which are often very interesting.

Tho' Pindar seems to have taken Homer for his Model, yet he departs from his Original, and pursues other Notions than those of that antient Poet. First, he makes two different Kingdoms of that subterranean Region, and sets over each of them a particular Monarch. Pluto, according to him, is the Governor of Hell, and Saturn the Sovereign of the Elysian Fields, where he reigns with his Wife Rhea, and has Rhadamanthus for his Assessor, whom all the other Poets place in the Empire of Pluto. Herein this Poet conforms to Hesiod (1), who says, that the Souls of Heroes went to dwell in happy Regions near the Ocean, at the Extremities of the Earth, where Saturn reigned. Then, following the Ideas of the Pythagoreans, Pindar lays down three Sorts of Transmigrations of Souls, partly in this World, partly in the other, telling us, that such as in those three States preserved their Souls always pure, arrived at last at the august Palace of Saturn. The three Revolutions which Socra- tes makes the Souls of Philosophers perform before their Return to the Place of their Original, have a great Affinity with the three Lives this Poet assigns for his Heroes before they are placed in the Elysian Fields, upon which it is proper to make two Remarks.

First, that Pindar supposes it was equally possible to practise Virtue, and perform meritorious Actions in Hell, as in this World. Secondly, that he seems to fix the Residence of the Blessed in the Elysian Fields for ever; whence, however, according to Virgil, and the other Poets, they were to depart after a certain Period of Time, having drunk the Water of Oblivion; and this Period was usually limited to a thousand Years.

But in order to set this whole Doctrine in one and the same Point of View, 'tis necessary to quote the whole Passage from this Poet, which is as follows.

“ After Death, the incorrigible Souls of the Wicked are delivered over to dreadful Punishments;
 “ and in the Kingdom of Pluto, there is a Judge who “ examines Crimes committed in this earthly Empire “ of Jupiter, and pronounces a final Sentence with “ inflexible Severity.

“ There the Just lead a Life exempt from all Sorts “ of Pain. They enjoy one eternal Day without “ Night; a pure Sun enlightens them continually.
 “ They are not obliged to employ the Labour of “ their Hands in ransacking Sea and Land to relieve “ the pitiful Necessities of Life. Those who were “ strictly conscientious in keeping their Oaths, converse with the venerable Divinities of those subterraneous Mansions, and taste Pleasures without Alloy, “ while those who loved Perjury, suffer Torments,
 “ the very Sight whereof is horrid and dreadful.

“ But those who after spending three Lives upon “ Earth, and in the Infernal Regions, have been so “ happy as to preserve their Souls always pure in those “ several States, as they have trod in the Paths which “ Jupiter had marked out to them, so they arrive at
 “ the

“ the majestick Palace of Saturn. Gentle Zephyrs, “ which rise from the Sea, fan this charming Island,
 “ the eternal Mansion of the Blessed. There are to “ be seen gaudy Flowers shining all around, whose “ Brightness vies with the burnished Gold. Some “ spring out of the Ground, others hang in Clusters
 “ on the Trees, while others bestrow the Waters.
 “ With these they make Crowns and Garlands to deck “ their Arms and Heads. The whole Kingdom is “ governed by the just Decrees of Rhadamanthus, who “ sits for ever upon a Tribunal with Saturn, Rhea's “ Spouse, and Father of the Gods. The Throne of “ the Goddess is elevated above all the rest.”

I said Pindar had taken Homer for his Model; here is the Passage in that Poet which he had in his Eye. It is in the fourth Book of the Odysssey, where Proteus thus bespeaks Menelaus;

*Elysium shall be thine; the blissful Plains
 Of utmost Earth, where Rhadamanthus reigns,
 Joys ever young, unmix'd with Pain or Fear,
 Fill the wide Circle of th' eternal Year:
 Stern Winter smiles on that auspicious Clime:
 The Fields are florid with unfading Prime:
 From the bleak Pole no Winds inclement blow,
 Mold the round Hail, or flake the fleecy Snow;
 But from the breezy Deep, the Blest inhale
 The fragrant Murmurs of the western Gale.*

Pope's Odyss. B. IV. V. 765.

We may remark, before we are done with the Doctrine of Pindar concerning the State of Souls after Death, that what he says of Saturn reigning in the Elysian Fields, is a Notion taken from Hesiod; tho' the other Poets, in the celebrated Division of the World among the three Brothers, had no Regard to this God whom his Son Jupiter had dethroned, and plunged headlong into the Depth of Tartarus, whose Empire fell to Pluto by an Article of that Partition. 'Tis true the Fable also supposes that Prince, after his Expulsion, to have retired into Italy, where he reigned with Janus, and that the Time of his Reign was reckoned the golden Age. 'Tis probably this Circumstance that Pindar had in his View, when he represents the Continuation of a Reign which was too short upon Earth for the Happiness of Men, and makes it eternal with respect to those who had practised Virtue, while they sojourned in this World.

Virgil, after having made Æneas offer Sacrifices to the Manes, and fortified him with the golden Bough, a sure Pass-port for Admission into the Kingdom of Pluto, gives him a Sibyl for his Guide, after which he thus begins the Description of the Mansions of the Dead;

*Deep, deep, a Cavern lies, devoid of Light,
All rough with Rocks, and horrible to Sight;
The gaping Gulph inclos'd with sable Floods,
And the brown Horrors of surrounding Woods.
From her black Jaws such baleful Vapours rise,
Blot the bright day, and blast the golden Skies,
That not a Bird can stretch her Pinions there
Through the thick Poisons and incumber'd Air:
O'ertook by Death her flagging Pinions cease,
And hence Aornus was it call'd by Greece.
Hither the Priestess four black Heifers led,
Between their Horns the hallow'd Wine she shed;
From their high Front the top-most Hairs she drew,
And in the Flames the first Oblations threw. &c.*

Pit's Æneid. VI. 332.

After the Sacrifice she plunged herself first into the Gulf which leads to the Kingdom of Pluto, and Æneas follows her with firm and resolute Steps through a dark and solitary Grove.

*At Hell's dread Mouth a thousand Monsters wait;
Grief weeps, and Vengeance bellows in the Gate:
Beside Want, low Fear, and Famine's lawless Rage,
And pale Disease, and slow repining Age;
Fierce, formidable Fiends! the Portal keep;
With Pain, Toil, Death, and Death's Half-brother Sleep.*

There

*There Joys embitter'd with Remorse appear;
 Daughters of Guilt! here Storms destructive War.
 Mad Discord there her snaky Tresses tore;
 Here, stretch'd on Iron Beds, the Furies roar.
 Full in the Midst a spreading Elm display'd
 His aged Arms, and cast a mighty Shade.
 Each trembling Leaf with some light Vision teems,
 And heaves impregnated with airy Dreams.
 With double Forms each Scylla took her Place
 In Hell's dark Entrance, with the Centaur's Race;
 And close by Lerna's hissing Monster, stands
 BRIAREUS dreadful with a hundred Hands.
 There stern GERYON raged; and, all around,
 Fierce Harpies scream'd, and direful GORGONS frown'd.
 Ibid. 385.*

Upon their Exit from the Cave they find a Way which leads through obscure Woods to the River Acheron: Thither the Souls of those who are to pass over to the other Side flock together from all Hands; but as none are permitted to enter Charon's Boat, till they have received the Honours of Burial (a), those who have been deprived of it are forced to wander an hundred Years upon those dreary Banks (b). Charon seeing a Man approach him in Armour, gives him to know, that none but the Souls of the Dead are to pass over the River; but soothed with the Sight of the golden Bough which the Sibyl shews him, he receives them both into his Boat, and ferries them over to the other Shore. No sooner are they passed this fatal River than they find another dreadful one which serves as a Gate to the Kingdom of Pluto; it is kept by Cerberus the Dog with the three Heads; and the Sibyl having laid him asleep by a Composition of Honey and Poppies, they get over this Passage and enter Pluto's Realms.

C 3

Upon

(a) *Nec ripas datur horrendas, nec rauca fluenta
 Transportare, priusquam sedibus ossa quierunt.*

(b) Centum errant annos, volitantque hæc littora circum.

Upon their Arrival in this dismal Mansion, they find the Souls of those who died before they came to the Use of Reason ; next of Persons who were unjustly condemned to Death, and of such as had taken away their own Lives. Here presents to their View a Grove of Myrtles, which serves for a Retreat to those whom amorous Despair had bereaved of the Light of Life. Leaving this Grove, they come to the Quarter of Heroes, who died with their Arms in their Hands. Adjoining to this is a Sort of Apartment which borders on one Side upon Tartarus, and on the other upon the Elysian Fields : Here it is that Minos, Eacus, and Rhadamanthus administer Justice ; the latter judges the Asiatics, and the others the Europeans, and Minos decides the Differences that arise from the Judgments of his Brethren, the Judge from whom lies no Appeal, and upon the Sentence of this impartial Judge some are sent to the Elysian Fields, others are condemned to Tartarus.

Tartarus is a hideous Prison of a terrible Depth, surrounded with the miry Bogs of Cocytus, and of the River Phlegeton, which rolls Torrents of Flames all around : Three Rows of Walls with brazen Gates, render the Place inaccessible. Typhoea, the most hellish of the three Furies, watches at the Gate, and hinders any from going out. Rhadamanthus extorts from his wretched Prisoners a Confession of their most secret Crimes, and then delivers them over to the three Furies, to be punished according to their Demerits ; these Goddesses are always ready to exert their Fury upon those miserable Victims : Frightful Serpents which they hold in their Hands, are the Whips with which they lash them. In this hideous Mansion are confined those of distinguished Wickedness, whose very Crimes have made them famous ; The proud Titans whom Jupiter thunderstruck, when they attempted to besiege the Gods of Olympus, are in the deepest Part of Tartarus. The two Aloides, Ephialtes and Otus, whom Neptune had by Hiphimedia the Wife of of the Giant Alous, suffer there a Punishment proportioned to their Crimes.

In this dreadful Mansion is also lodged the mad Sal-moneus, who attempted to imitate Jupiter's Thunders : The daring Tityus, who presumed to make Love to Latona, and whom Apollo transfix'd with his Arrows, is there condemned to horrible Torments : A cruel Vulture is continually preying upon his Liver, which grows again as fast as it is devoured. The presumptuous Ixion who boasted that he had lain with Juno, is there doomed to turn eternally a Wheel incircled with Serpents. Theseus, who attempted to carry off Proserpine for his Friend Pirithous, sits for ever upon a Stone whence he cannot possibly stir. Tantalus, for having designed to put a Cheat upon the Gods, and to serve up to them at Table the Members of his own Son Pelops, there pines away with the most outrageous Hunger amidst Plenty of Meats which fly from him as soon as he approaches them. The Danaids, those unhappy Daughters of Danaus, who murdered their own Husbands, are there condemned eternally to pour Water into a Cask full of Holes. There Sisyphus, for revealing the Secrets of the Gods, rolls a huge Stone to the Top of a Mountain, whence it continually tumbles down again. Oedipus, who slew his Father Laius, and married his Mother Jocasta ; his wretched Sons Etheocles and Polynices, who waged War upon one another, and were slain by each others Hands in the fatal Combat ; Atreus, Thyestes, Egistus, Clytemnestra, and all the other signal Offenders, suffer there Torments proportioned to their Crimes.

Such is the Description which the Poets give of their Hell : But if they have invented so frightful a Place for the Punishment of the Wicked, they have not been wanting in Return to give us a charming Representation of the Mansion of the Blessed.

On the Right of Tartarus is the Way that leads to the Elysian Fields, those happy Isles where the Souls of such as have lived virtuously in this World enjoy profound Peace and Tranquillity, accompanied with the most innocent refined Pleasures: Let us imagine to ourselves enchanted Places abounding with every Thing conducive to Happiness; Bowers for ever Green, charming Meadows, with Fountains and Streams gliding gently through them, the Air healthful, temperate, and serene; Birds eternally warbling in delightful Groves, a perpetual Spring with other Suns and other Stars (a). These and the like are the Images under which the Poets (i) paint the Regions of Bliss; those happy Isles, the Kingdom of Adrastus, as they sometimes call it; in a Word, the Elysian Fields. But as the Descriptions which they give of them, were only the Fruit of their own Imaginations, every one of them represents the Pleasures and Employments of the Place conformable to his own Inclinations. Tibullus, voluptuous and prone to the Charms of Love, makes it to abound with Mirth and all sensual Pleasures (b).

Virgil, more chaste, admits nothing there but innocent Sports, and Employments worthy Heroes who are the Inhabitants; and herein he has copied Homer. In the Greek Poet, the Ghost of Achilles wages War with the wild Beasts, and in the Latin Poet the Trojan Heroes exercise themselves in managing Horses, or in handling Arms. Some Poets have added the Pleasures of good Cheer, describe Elysium as a Place of continual Feasting, while nothing, they say, is so sorry and mean as the Entertainments Hecate gives her Guests in Hell. Which proves, to mention it by the by, that the Part of Man which inhabited those Regions, was corporeal, since it could not subsist without Nourishment.

If we trace Virgil's Ideas with Attention, we shall find that he divides into seven Apartments the Topographical

(a) *Largior hic campos æther & lumine vestit
Purpureo; solemque suum, sua sidera norunt.* Æn. 6. 640.

(i) Homer, Virgil, Pindar, Claudian, Catullus, &c.

(b) Hic choreæ, cantusque vigent - - - -

Ac juvenum series teneris immista puellis

Ludit, & assidue prælia miscet amor.

L. 1. 3. 637

Topographical Description he gives of the Mansion of Ghosts. The first is that of Infants that die so soon as they are born. (a)

*Now, as they enter'd, doleful Screams they bear ;
And tender Cries of Infants pierce their Ear :
Just new to Life, by too severe a Doom, Snatch'd from the Cradle to the silent Tomb !*

Ibid. 592.

The second was possessed by those who had been charged with false Accusations, and unjustly condemned to Death (b). In the third were those whom cruel Destiny had forced to chuse a voluntary Death ; who, innocent as they were, seeing themselves overwhelmed with the Miseries of Life, had conceived an Aversion to it, and set their Souls at Liberty from their Bodies, as from an oppressive Load (c). The fourth, which we may call the Fields of Tears or Mourning, where is a Forrest of Myrtles cut into divers Walks, is the Mansion of those who in their Life-time had experienced the Hardships of unpitied Love (d). There is the unhappy Phedra, who killed herself for the Disdain of young Hippolytus, who was insensible to her Passion. Procris, whose Life the unfortunate Cephalus took away with the Dart which she had given him ; Eriphyle, Evadne, Laodamia, Pasiphae, Dido, Ceneus, who from a Girl had been transformed into a Boy, and by the Order of Destiny had again recovered his former State. The fifth was destined to the Heroes (e). There were Tydeus, Adrastus, Parthenopeus, and several others. The sixth Apartment was the frightful Prison of Tartarus, where are the noted Offenders whom I shall speak of afterwards, together with the Parcæ, the

(a) *Continuo auditæ voces, vagitus & ingens,
Infantumque animæ flentes in limine primo.* Æn. l. 6.

(b) Hos juxta falso damnati crimine mortis.

(c) *Proxima deinde tenent mæsti loca, qui sibi letum
Insontes peperere manu, &c.*

(d) Hic quos durus amor crudeli tabe peredit.

(e) - - - - - *Jamque arva tenebant
Ultima, quæ bello clari secreta frequentant.*

the Furies; &c. In fine, the last was the Mansion of the Blessed, or the Elysian Fields.

These several Mansions were not divided at random. Minos, who held the fatal Urn, summoned the Ghosts before him, took Information of their Crimes, examined their Lives, weighed the Merit of their Actions, and appointed each of them to his proper Place of Abode (1).

Such were the Fables which the antient Poets delivered with respect to the Mansions of Souls departed; a System embellished indeed with Ideas which were the Offspring of fertile Imagination; but whose Groundwork was derived from the Egyptian Customs, as we shall presently see.

C H A P. V.

That what the Greeks delivered on the Subject of the Infernal Regions and Elysian Fields, was borrowed from the Egyptian Usages already mentioned.

NOTWITHSTANDING all the Fables added by the Greeks to the Egyptian System, yet 'tis easy to see it to be the Foundation of all that they have delivered upon this Subject; and though Diodorus has said so, I judge it however necessary to consider this Article somewhat more particularly. First of all the Charon of the Greeks, that rough and stern Ferryman whom Virgil paints so well, is the same with that of Egypt. He of the Greeks is upon the Cocytus, waiting to transport the Ghosts to the other Side of the River: The Egyptian had his fixed Residence upon the Banks of the Lake Querron, or Acherusia. That of the Greek Poets rigidly exacted a Duty for the Passage; that of the Egyptians was so regular and exact therein, that they tell us he would not dispense with a King's Son. The infernal Lake was formed by a River which conveyed its Waters thither: That of Querron was an Efflux of the Nile. The first nine Times surrounded the Kingdom of the Dead, as we have it in

(1) Virg. Æn. 6. 431.

in Virgil: Novies Styx interfusa, &c. The Nile formed in Egypt a vast Number of Canals.

The different Mansions which Virgil describes in the infernal Regions, especially that of Tartarus, a gloomy Dungeon, placed in the Center of the Earth, are founded upon the different Cells and Windings of the Labyrinth, chiefly those which, according to Herodotus and the other Antients, were under Ground. The sacred Crocodiles which the Egyptians nourished in those subterraneous Places, had given the Idea of those Monsters that were said to be in the Kingdom of Pluto, and in the Avenues that lead thither.

Homer (1) says, the Entry to the infernal Regions was upon the Banks of the Ocean. The Nile is called by the same Poet $\Omega' \kappa \epsilon \alpha \nu \acute{o} \varsigma$. The Idea of those Gates of the Sun so much celebrated by the Poets, is founded only upon what the Greeks had heard of the City Helopolis. That of the Judges Eacus, Minos, and Rhadamanthus, is evidently founded upon what we have quoted from Diodorus, concerning that severe Scrutiny which was made by the Egyptian Priests into the Lives and Actions of the Dead. Those of the infernal Rivers, are derived from the Lake Acherusia or Querron, and served to form the Acheron of the Poets; Achou-Cherron, as M. Fourmont remarks (2), signifying the Fenny Places of Charon. Cerberus, according to the same Academick, took his Name from an Egyptian King, named Chebres, or Kebron. In like Manner the Name of Tartarus comes from Dardarot, which in Egyptian signifies an eternal Habitation. Beyond the Lake Querron, were delightful Woods, a charming Grove, and a Temple consecrated to black Hecate, with two Marshes, Cocytus and Lethe: Near this Place was likewise a City named Acanthus, where a Priest, from we know not what Principle of Religion, poured every Day Water from the Nile into a Vessel full of Holes. Hence the Elysian Fields, the Rivers of Oblivion, the Cocytus, and the Punishment of the Dancids. Mercury, with his Caduceus in his Hand, whom whom Homer makes the Conductor of Souls into Hell, is only a Copy of those who in Egypt had the Care of funeral Obsequies, and conducted their pompous Processions.

(1) Il. l. 10, & 11.

(2) Mem. de l'Acad. T. 1. p. 9.

Lastly, the Ades of the Greeks is the same with the Amenthes of the Egyptians, mentioned by Plutarch (1), that subterranean Apartment, whither the Souls of the Dead went, and whence they returned (a). Add to this that the Styx, another infernal River, was likewise in Egypt. This accordingly is what we are told by Servius, who cites in Proof of it, a Work of Seneca, intitled : Of the Egyptian Ceremonies, which Time has destroyed. “ Isis, said he, having found
“ the dissipated Members of Osiris, whom Typhon had “ murdered, chose a Place for their Interment near “ a Marsh not very accessible, beyond which was an “ Island which there was no landing upon ; and this “ Marsh was called Styx, because it inspired with Melancholy those who looked upon it.”

But to prove yet more clearly what has been now advanced, I shall follow Virgil Step by Step, and enter into a Detail which I hope will not seem quite superfluous.

CHAP. VI.

Of Charon and Cerberus.

THE Idea of the Ferry-man Charon is derived, as Diodorus remarks, from the Signification of the Word in the Egyptian Language, which imports a Boatman, Portitor ; thus of an appellative Noun, the Poet makes the Name of a Divinity.

Jam senior, sed cruda DEI viridisque senectus ;

To whom they have given the Charge of transporting Souls in a Boat over the River Acheron : They have preserved to him the same Character with that of the

(1) De Is. & Osir.

(a) This, according to Plutarch, is the Etymology of the Word Amenthes, which imports, Boat which gives and receives.

the Egyptians, making him, like the other, rough, cholerick, morose, avaritious. A Proof of which is his Manner of receiving Æneas, and the small Regard he has to the Words of that Hero, till he has seen the golden Bow.

*Mortal ! whoe'er thou art, in Arms array'd,
Stand off, approach not ; but at Distance say,
Why to these Waters dar'st thou bend thy Way ?
These are the Realms of Sleep, the dreadful Coasts
Of sable Night, and airy gliding Ghosts. (a)*

Ibid. 539.

This Character they drew from what they had learned by Tradition of the Charon of Egypt, as shall be said presently : But as they would needs in every Thing be thought Originals, they invented several Fables upon this Occasion ; they composed a Genealogy for this God, and made him the Son of Erebus, and the Night, worthy Parents of the Boatman of Hell. They give him a fullen and crabbed Humour, without any Respect either to Dignity, Goods, or Riches ; and yet how his Name comes to denote Joy and Gayety⁽¹⁾, I know not, unless it be by way of Contrary.

The Poets have amused themselves in giving different Descriptions of Charon, but none of them has come near the inimitable Virgil.

*Lord of the Flood, imperious Charon stands ;
But rough, begrim'd, and dreadful he appear'd ;
Rude and neglected hung his Length of Beard ;
All patch'd and knotted flutters his Attire ;
His wrathful Eyeballs glare with sanguine Fire.
Tho' old, still unimpair'd by Years he stood,
And hoary Vigour bless'd the surly God.*

Himself

(a) *Quisquis es, armatus qui nostra ad littora tendis,
Fare age quid venias, jam istinc & comprime gressus :
Hic locus umbrarum est, &c.* Æn. 6. 388.

(1) Nat. l. 3.

*Himself still ply'd the Oars, his Canvas spread,
And in his sable Bark convey'd the Dead (a).*

Ibid. 418.

As Charon was believed to carry none over gratis, hence was established the Custom of placing under the Tongue of the Deceased a piece of Money, which the Latins call Nautis, and the Greeks Δανάη, for the Freight (b). This Custom they likewise derived from the Egyptians, who gave something to him who transported the Dead over the Lake Acherusia. There is even an antient Tradition in the Country, setting forth, that Charon therein exercised a petty Tyranny, exacting that Capitation even from the Sons of Kings. Accordingly Lucian assures us, that the Custom of putting an Obulus into the Mouth of the Dead, to pay their Fare, was universal among the Greeks and Romans; and we know none who dispensed with it but the Hermonians, because they thought themselves so near Hell, that they reckoned there was no Necessity for their paying any thing for their Passage (c): But we may add that Charon lost nothing thereby; for if that People did not pay him his Dues, the Athenians were so superstitious as to believe that they were obliged to give something more for their Kings, in order to distinguish them from the Herd of vulgar Souls; accordingly they put into their Mouths no less than three pieces of Gold (1). When Charon was forced to carry over any living Person, he was first to have a Sight of the golden Bough, which we shall speak of afterwards; and because Hercules was admitted without this Passport, when he went to deliver Alcestes, Charon, as we learn from Servius after Orpheus, was put in Prison for a Year, though he had received him with Reluctance and by Constraint.

Accordingly he complains to Æneas.

Know

(a) *Portitor has horrendus equas & flumina servat,
Horribili squalore Charon, cui plurima mento
Canities inculta jacet, &c.*

(b) See Lucian's Dial. of the Dead, Diodorus, l. 1.

(c) Lyllo Girald. Synt. de Diis Inferiis, Nat. l. 3. after Strabo.

(1) Nat. l. 3.

*Know I repent I led PIRITHOUS o'er,
With mighty THESEUS, to the farther Shore ;
That great ALCIDES past the Stygian Floods ;
Tho' these were Heroes, and the Sons of Gods.*

Ibid. 546.

But we are farther to know that they were not contented with this piece of Money ; and in order to make their Passage the more sure, they put into the Coffin of the Defunct an Attestation of his Life and Morals (1). This was a kind of Pass, the Form whereof is preserved by an Author : “ I undersigned “ Anicius Sextus, the Pontiff, attest that such a one
“ was a Person of a good Life and Conversation :
“ Let his Manes rest in Peace (a).” Whereby it appears that to make this Attestation the better received in the other World, the Pontiff himself was in Use to write it. The Muscovites at this very Day practise the same Custom which came from Egypt, where an Encomium was pronounced upon the Defunct by the Border of the Lake, to keep the Judges from being prepossessed by his Accusers, as we have it in Diodorus Siculus.

Some Authors believe that Charon was a King of Egypt, and confound him with some Prince or other, whose Name has an Affinity to his, as has been said in the preceeding Chapter : But an Arabian Author (b) has gone farther, believing that Charon was Moses's Uncle or Cousin-German : And as he was at first in the Party of his Relation, he made his Laws and Ordinances strictly observed ; and he again in Return taught him Chymistry and the Secret of the great Work, which Charon made so good Use of, that in a little Time he accumulated great Riches thereby, as is believed at this Day in Egypt, according to several Relations (2). Vossius in his Treatise of Idolatry, alleges

(1) Eust. in Hom. and the Scholiast on Pindar.

(a) Ego Sextus Anicius Pontifex, testor hunc honeste vixisse : manes ejus inveniant requiem. Fab. Cel. l. 3. ant.

(b) Murtadi in his Egypt. See the Translation of it by Vattier.

(2) See the third Voyage of Paul Lucas, V. 3.

ledges that the Word Charon comes from the Hebrew, and signifies Wrath, because he is the Minister of the Wrath and Vengeance of the Gods; and is at the same Time persuaded that he is the same with the infernal Mercury, whose Function, as has been said elsewhere, was to conduct Souls to Hell. But I hold for the Charon of Egypt, the Model of that of the Greeks, whose Name, according to Diodorus, signifies a Ferryman. Mahomet speaks also of a Charon (1), who was overwhelmed by the Earth, at the Prayer of Moses; but 'tis probable that he confounded Charon with Coré, who was swallowed up for having murmured against the Legislator.

Let us say something now of Cerberus, that famous Keeper of the infernal Regions, the Idea whereof was likewise derived from Egypt, where Burial-places were kept by Mastive Dogs; but what I am going to relate of the Serpent of Tenarus, served to embellish his Story.

Cerberus. The profound Cave of Tenarus was once inhabited by a frightful Serpent, or a kind of Dragon, which ravaged the Confines of that Promontory (2); and as this Cave was reckoned the Gate of Hell, hence they took Occasion to say that the Dragon was the Porter of those dreary Mansions: And this is the Original of Cerberus, who was called the Dog of Hell (3), though it was nothing but a Serpent. Homer is the first who gave him that Appellation. 'Tis true, in After-times Cerberus was reckoned a Dog with three Heads, but they never got rid altogether of the Idea of the Serpent of Tenarus: Thus instead of Hair, his Neck was said to be encompassed with Snakes (a); and the three Heads and three Tongues were given him only because the voluble Motion of Serpents Tongues seems to make three of them; or because their Tongue is somewhat

(1) Alcoran. c. 28. (2) Pausan. in Lacon. (3) Nat. l. 5.

(a) Cui vates horrere videns jam colla colubris.

Virg. Æn. 6.

Quamvis furiale centum muniant angues caput.

Hor. Od. 1. 3.

somewhat like a barbed Javelin (a). We may add that the History of Aidoneus, who had his Mines watched by mastive Dogs, may also have given Rise to the Fable of Cerberus : And as Hercules, passing through Epirus, delivered Theseus, and carried off perhaps one of those Mastives, hence the Fable of his having chained Cerberus (1).

But the most common Opinion derives the Origin of the Fable from Hercules's having by the Command of Eurystheus visited the Cave of Tenarus in Search of the Serpent that there made his abode, and brought him bound to the King of Mycenæ ; and the additional Circumstance of Cerberus's passing through Thessaly, and vomiting up a venomous Juice, which poisoned its Herbs, was owing to there having been many poisonous Plants in that Country : Which also had given Occasion to all the Fables of the Sorceresses there, who were said by their Enchantments to bring down the Moon to the Earth. We must not omit that Hesiod makes Cerberus the Son of Typhon and Echidna. Some Authors derive his Name from the Greek Word Κρεόσυρος, Carnivorous, or Voracious Flesh-eater (2).

Pausanias speaks thus (3) of the Promontory of Tenarus and the Fable of Cerberus. “ About fifty Stadia from Teuthrones you have the Promontory of Tenarus, which juts out considerably into the Sea, and under which there are two Ports. Upon this Promontory is a Temple to Neptune in Form of a Grotto, and at the Entrance a Statue of that God. Some Greek Poets have imagined it was through this that Hercules carried off Pluto's Dog; but besides that there is no subterranean Passage in this Grotto, 'tis not probable that a God should hold his Empire under Ground, nor that our Souls should repair thither after Death. Hecateus

VOL. III.

D

“ teus

(a) Cui sunt tres linguæ, tergeminiisque caput.

Tibull.

- - - - - Sordidum tabo caput

Lambunt colubræ ; viperis horrent jubæ,

Longeque torta sibilat cauda draco.

Sen. in Her. Fur.

(1) See the History of Hercules. (2) Bochart, l. 8. (3) In Diacon. c. 25.

“ teus of Miletus had a rational enough Notion of
 “ it, when he said that this Place of Tenarus served “ for a Den to a formidable Serpent, which was called “ the Dog of Hell, because whoever was stung by “ him instantly died ; and he alledges, that Hercules “ carried this Serpent to Eurystheus. Homer, who is “ the first that mentioned the Dog of Hell which “ Hercules dragged after him, distinguishes him by “ no proper Name, nor describes him, though he does
 “ the Chimera : But the succeeding Poets, who “ called this Dog Cerberus, gave him three Heads,
 “ and make a great Monster of him ; though Ho- “ mer by the Dog of Hell, might as well understand
 “ a Dragon, as one of those domestic Animals.”

C H A P. VII.

Of the Infernal Rivers.

ACHERON is a River in Epirus, or rather in Thesprotia, which takes its Rise from the Lake Acherusia (a), and discharges itself near Ambracia, otherwise called Larta, into the Adriatic Gulf.

The

(a) Strabo, l. 7. Though Plato, in Phæd. says, it enters into Acherusia. However Titus Livius, l. 8. calls the Place where this River, after having received the Waters of some other Brooks, disembogues itself into the Sea, the Thesprotic Gulf : But as the Passage in that Author speaks particularly of the Course of this River, we must quote it here. He is speaking of Alexander King of Epirus, to whom Acheron was to be fatal : Accito a Tarentinis in Italiam, data dictio erat, cavere Acherusiam aquam, Pandosiamque urbem ; ibi fatis ejus terminum dari : eoque ocyus transmisit in Italiam, ut quam maxime procul abesset urbe Pandosia in Epiro, & Acheronte amne, quem ex Molosside fluentem, in stagna inferna accipit Thesprotius sinus. From this Passage it appears that Acheron took its Rise from Molossis, that it run through Epirus, near the City Pandosia, and communicated its Name to the Gulf of the Sea where it discharges itself.

Pliny, l. 4. c. 1. says, Acheron disembogues itself into the Lake of Ambracia : However Thucydides tells us it runs into the Lake Acherusia ; now this Lake and that Gulf are very remote from one another. the Antients are of a contrary Opinion to Pliny ; therefore we ought to quit this Author, as well as Martianus Capella, and Martin del Rio upon Seneca, who have followed him. See Grant-Menil, Græc. Ant.

The Water of this River is bitter and unwholesome (1), and this is partly the Reason why they have made an infernal River of it; it remains actually a long Time hid under Ground, and rises up again at a very great Distance from the Place where it goes out of Sight. Its Name had also contributed to this Fable, for it imports Anguish or an howling Noise: Perhaps too Orpheus gave this Lake, and afterwards the River, the Name of the Lake Acherusia, which he had seen near Memphis, when he accommodated to Greece the Ideas which he had borrowed from Egypt with respect to the Dead. Several Fables were afterwards added to what we have now been relating; they gave out that Acheron was the Son of Ceres, or of Titan and Terra; that the Fear he had of the Giants made him lie concealed for some Time, and even go down to Hell to screen himself from their Fury. Some Authors have alledged, that Jupiter had cast him into Hell, because his Water served to quench the Thirst of the Titans: A Fable founded upon the Circumstance of this River's running a long Time under the Earth, which was the Mother of the Titans. They add that Acheron was Father to that Ascalaphus who was changed into an Owl, as shall be said in the History of Proserpine (2); that there was a King of Epirus named Acheron, who gave his Name to that River.

Be that as it will, we must not forget to take Notice that there was another River of this Name in the Country of the Bruttians, near Pandesia, which gave Rise to a fatal Ambiguity (3). The Oracle of Dodona, as we have it in Titus Livius, in the Passage we have quoted, having warned Alexander the King of the Molossians to fly Acheron, that Prince thinking it meant the Acheron which was in Thesprotia, would not go far away from the Place where he was, and was slain there. There is also another River of the Name near Tenarus in Laconia.

The Cocytus is another River in Epirus, or rather in Thesprotia, which empties itself together with the Pyriphlegeton, into the Lake Acherusia, and whose Name signifies Sighs, Groans; and that of Pyriphlegeton, Burning (1): These Etymologies, and the Neighbourhood of those Rivers to Acheron, made them be reckoned among the Rivers in Hell. Here I embrace the Opinion of Mr. Samson, who gives the Cocytus that Course, without alledging however any Authority for it. I know no Historian who gives Cocytus the Name of a River (a). Pausanias calls it only ὕδωρ ἀτεσπέλατον; which makes me believe that it was rather a Fen of muddy Water than a River.
Cocytus.
D 2 gether

(1) Pauf. in Lac. (2) Antrostius in sea navigatione. (3) Strabo l. 6.

Styx. The Styx is in Arcadia. 'Tis properly a Fountain that flows from a Rock, and then forms a Stream that continues a long Time buried under Ground: Its Water is Mortal, and this Quality, according to Pausanias (2), is what gave a Handle to the Poets to make it a River or a Lake in Hell: I shall take the following Description of it from him.

Hard by a City of Arcadia, named Nonacris, is a very high Precipice, whence distils Water that falls into the River Cratis. This Water is mortal to Men and other Animals: It breaks in Pieces earthen and porcelain Vessels, and all others, except those made of a Horses Hoof. Upon this Idea a Fable has been composed; the Styx has been animated, made the Daughter of the Ocean (3), and Wife of one Pallas or Piras (4). We are told that she was the Mother of Hydra, &c. Her Name was so terrible, that the most inviolable Oath was to swear by Styx, and the Gods themselves were very religious in keeping it (b). Those of them who perjured themselves after taking this Oath, were very severely punished. Jupiter ordered Iris to set before them a Cup full of poisonous Water of this Fountain, and he banished them from his Table and Conversation for a Year: He even deprived them of their Divinity for nine Years, as if it had

(1) φλεγω, urs.

(a) See the antient Map of Greece by Strabo, and Grant-Ménil in his Græcia, p. 204.

(2) L. 8. 18. (3) Hesiod in Theog. (4) Pausan. loc. cit.

(b) Di cujus jurare timent & fallere numen. Virg. Æn. l. 6.

had been an Office whose Functions he suspended. The Reason given by the Mythologists why the Gods were so religious as to this Article, is, that Victory, who was believed to be the Daughter of Styx, as has been said in the History of Jupiter, had assisted the Gods against the Giants, which had obliged that God, in Gratitude, to pass a Decree that the Oath by Styx should be inviolable. But this again is only another Fable, founded upon the antient Custom of using the Water of Styx for the Tryal of the Guilty and the Innocent, much after the Manner of the Jews, as to their Water of Jealousy. To conclude, when the Gods swore by Styx, they were to have one Hand upon the Earth, and the other upon the Sea, as Homer remarks (1).

'Tis easy to see that two Things conduced to make them place these Rivers in Hell; first, that they were almost all in Epirus, which was reckoned, upon Account of Aidoneus, the Kingdom of Pluto. Secondly, The Etymology of their Names; Acheron signifies the Extreme *, whereby was denoted that those who came into this Country to work at the Mines, almost all died there: Cocytus imports Howling; Styx, the Water of Silence †; Pyriphlegeton, Burning. In general, all the Waters that had any bad Quality were reckoned Rivers of Hell, as in Italy the Lake Avernus near Puzzoli (a), and Lethe or the River of Oblivion, which was in Africa. And thus it was that the Greeks would needs ascribe to their own Country what really belonged to Egypt.

D 3

CHAP.

(1) Iliad 14.

* Others derive the Name from A & χαῖρα, as you would say, Sad or Joyless. To which Milton alludes, Par. lost, B. XI. 578.

Sad Acheron, of Sorrow, black and deep.

† Or ἀπο τῆς στυγῆς, Hateful. So Milton, ib. v. 577.

Abhorred Styx, the Flood of deadly Hate.

(a) The Sulphur and Bitumen which are in great Quantities near the Avernus, had so corrupted its Water, that Virgil says, the Birds perished by flying over it, unless they mounted very high. 'Tis even this Circumstance that gave the Name of that Lake, for Avernus, in Greek Ἀΰρες, signifies without Birds.

C H A P. VIII.

Other Particularities of the System of the Poetical Hell.

THE first was their imagining that the Ghosts whose Bodies remained without Burial, wandered for a hundred Years upon the Banks of the Cocytus, before they were admitted into Charon's Boat (a). These Egyptian Customs may have given Rise to this Notion. First, when the Priests refused the Passage over the Acherusian Lake to the Body of any one, because he had not paid his Debts, the Relations kept it at Home till they were in a Condition to discharge the Debt. Another of their Customs was, that in transporting any dead Body over the Lake, if it happened to fall into it, and was not recovered, funeral Obsequies were performed to it after a hundred Years were expired, at the Expence of the Publick, as we learn from Servius (b).

I don't find any thing in the Egyptian Antiquities that has an Affinity to the golden Bough which the Sibyl tells Æneas is necessary as a Passport, when he was to visit the infernal Regions. This Bough had been plucked from Hecate's or Proserpine's Grove :

*A mighty Tree, that bears a golden Bough,
Grows in a Vale surrounded with a Grove,
And sacred to the Queen of Stygian Jove.
Her neather World no Mortals can behold,
Till from the Bole they strip the blooming Gold.
The mighty Queen requires this Gift alone,
And claims the shining Wonder for her own.
One pluck'd away, a second Branch you see Shoot forth in Gold, and glitter thro' the Tree.
Go then ; with Care erect thy searching Eyes,
And in proud Triumph seize the glorious Prize.*

Thy

(a) Centum errant annos, volitantque hæc littora circum, &c. Virg. l. 6.

(b) Si quis in fluvio pereat, nec ejus inveniatur cadaver, post centum annos ultima persolvuntur officia. Hinc extractum, centum errant annos, &c. Servius, in 6. Æn.

*Thy purpos'd Journey if the Fates allow,
Free to thy Touch shall bend the costly Bough.
If not, the Tree will mortal Strength disdain;
And Steel shall hew the glitt'ring Branch in vain.*

Ibid. 196.

Servius, who was desirous to trace the Original of this Fable (1), pretends that it is taken from a Ceremony, which Orestes upon his Return from Tauris founded in the Worship of Diana. That Heroe, after having deposited in a Temple the Statue of Diana, which he had stolen at Thoas, appointed this Temple and the Grove surrounding it, to be an inviolable Place of Refuge. In the Middle of this Grove was a Tree, from whose Approach all were debarred by a Priest of that Goddess; and if any Criminal, who had fled to this Place for Refuge, could pluck off a Branch of it, he was allowed to fight with the Priest; and if he overcame him, to take his Place.

The learned Jesuit, La Cerda, adopts what is said by this antient Commentator on Virgil: But it must be owned that if this be the Original of the golden Bough, 'tis a very remote one. I am therefore rather inclined to think that this Notion is the Product of poetical Imagination; and that however they borrowed from the Egyptians the greatest Part of what they have fabled about the Mansions of the other World; yet they also added some Circumstances for which they had no Model.

We are not to think the same Way of the two Gates, through which was the Passage from the infernal Regions, the one of Horn, the other of Ivory, since this Fable came from Egypt, as has been observed in the fifth Chapter; after this Manner are they described by the Poets: (2)

*Immur'd within the silent Bow'r of Sleep,
Two Portals firm the various Phantoms keep:
Of Iv'ry one; whence flit to mock the Brain,
Of winged Lies a light fantastick Train:*

D 4

The

(1) In 6. Æn. (2) Odyss. 19.

*The Gate oppos'd pellucid Valves adorn,
And Columns fair incas'd with polish'd Horn :
Where Images of Truth for Passage wait,
With visions manifest of future Fate.*

Pope's Odyss. XIX. 657.

Virgil also describes these two Gates ; and by making his Heroe pass through that of Ivory, destroys at one Stroke, and very preposterously methinks, all that he had advanced in one of the finest Books of his Poem. These are mere Imaginations as well as the Reflexions of the Commentators on Virgil and Homer ; not excepting Madam Dacier herself, who will have it that the transparent Horn figures Dreams that come from the Air, and the Ivory, which is an opaque Body, those that proceed from the Earth. That the latter coming from terrestrial Vapours are false, while the others coming from the Air and Heaven, are true. The Passage of Scripture which she applies on this Occasion, does not seem designed for explaining such Reveries (a). Here it may be asked what was the Foundation of those Journeys to the infernal Regions, performed by most of the fabulous Heroes. What gave Rise to them I take to have been the Conjunction of Euridice's Ghost by Orpheus. He being very deeply affected with the Death of his Spouse, of whom he was bereaved by a fatal Accident, went into Theſprozie, where was an Oracle of the Dead, and this Expedition was disguised in the Poem composed upon that Subject, under the Image of a Journey to Hell. Homer who imitated that antient Poet, makes Ulysses likewise descend thither to consult Tiresias's Ghost ; this pretended Journey, as has been already noticed, has all the Air of a Piece of Conjunction. Fable set forth in like Manner that Theseus and Pyrrhus had undertaken the same Journey to carry off Proserpine ; as also Hercules who had delivered Theseus, whom Pluto detained Prisoner, and carried off Cerberus with him, Bacchus too, too was made to descend thither, to consult his Mother Semele : Pindarus sends Perseus the same Way ; and Virgil gives Æneas the Sibyl of Cuma to conduct him to Hell. Lastly, Herodotus tells us, that Rampsinibus King of Egypt, had visited the Place where the Greeks said Hell was, that he had played there at Dice with Ceres, and sometimes had won, sometimes lost ; and that the Goddess had dismissed him with a valuable Present (a).

(a) 'Tis said in the Ecclesiasticus, Nisi ab altissimo emissa fuerit visitatio, ne dederis in illis cor tuum : Unless Dreams come from God, give no Heed to them.

C H A P. IX.

Of the Judges of Hell.

IT was also from the Egyptians that the Greeks borrowed their Notion of the infernal Judges, as we have observed from Diodorus Siculus. However, if we would take their Word for it, this Fable was very antient among them, as we see in several Places of Plato (1). According to antient Tradition, said they, we learn that there was at all Times a Law established, that Men after this Life should be judged, in order to be rewarded or punished as their Actions were good or bad. Under the Reign of Saturn, and in the first Years of the Reign of Jupiter, this Sentence was pronounced immediately before Death ; which gave Occasion to flagrant Iniquities. Princes who had been unjust and cruel, appearing before their Judges with all the Pomp and Apparatus of their Power, and producing Witnesses who deposed in their Favour, because they dreaded their Wrath while they were yet in Life, the Judges, dazzled by this Pageantry, and seduced by those false Testimonies, declared the Princes innocent, and made them pass into the happy Mansion of the Just. The same thing we may say in Proportion as to the Virtuous, who were poor and unsupported, Calumny pursued them even to the last Tribunal, and

(a) L. 2. c. 122. Gronovius translates the Greek Word Χειρομακτον χρυσεον by Mantile aureum, which in English signifies a Cloath or Napkin of Gold, or rather wrought with Gold.

(1) In Gorgia, p. 523. In Axiop. p. 371.

and found a Way to get them condemned as flagitious in the other World. The Fable adds that upon the reiterated Complaints that were laid before Jupiter, and the strong Remonstrances that were made to him, he changed the Form of those Judgments. The Time was fixed to the very Moment after Death. Rhadamanthus and Eacus, the two Sons of Jupiter, were appointed the Judges, the first for the Asiatics, the other for the Europeans; and over them Minos to give a final Decision in dark and dubious Cases. Their Tribunal was erected in a Place called the Field of Truth, because there falshood and Calumny had no Access. There a Prince, so soon as he had expired, stood forth to View stripped of all his showy Grandeur, in his own proper Colours, without Guard or Attendance, quite speechless, and trembling for himself after he had made the whole Earth to tremble. If he was found guilty of Vices capable of being expiated, he was confined to Tartarus only for a Time, with Assurance to be set at Liberty so soon as he was sufficiently purified.

Minos, Eacus, and Rhadamanthus, were therefore the three Personages who for their strict Probity were chosen to be the Judges in Hell. This would be the proper Place to give their History, but I shall have a more natural Occasion to speak of them elsewhere in the History of Greece, where they will have a large Part to act (1).

C H A P. X.

Of the Infernal Gods, Pluto, Ceres, Proserpine, and Cottytto.*

PLU^TO, the Son of Saturn and Rhea, or Ops, was the youngest of the three Titan Brothers, who escaped the Cruelty of their Father. We have already said that in the Division of the World Hell was his Lot, that is, Italy, and afterwards Spain. To the Arguments

(1) In the sixth Vol.

* Though Ceres is of the Number of the terrestrial Divinities, yet we join her History with that of Pluto, because of the Connection between them, and to avoid Repetitions.

ments already offered to prove that these are the two Countries designed by the Greeks, when they gave that Prince Hell for his Lot, I shall add what Diodorus Siculus says, namely, that this Fable arose from his being the first who founded the Custom of burying the Dead, of transferring them into Sepulchres, and of bestowing other Honours upon them, which before him had been neglected. But what Probability is there that Duties so natural would be overlooked till the Time of Pluto? 'Tis therefore much more probable that he was reckoned the King of Hell, because he lived in a very low Country in respect of Greece, where Jupiter had fixed his Empire; and the following are the true Foundations of a History which has been so much disguised.

Pluto having retired to the Extremity of Spain, applied himself greatly to carry on the working of the Gold and Silver Mines, which were very common, especially on the Side of Cadiz, where he fixed his Residence (a). Upon which 'tis proper to remark, that though Spain is not reckoned at this Day a Country fertile in Mines, yet the Antients speak of it to us as a Country where were many Mines of Gold and Silver: They tell us even by a kind of Hyperbole, that its Mountains and Hills were almost all Mountains of Gold (1); that nigh to Tartesus was a Mountain of Silver (2). Aristotle informs us that the first Phœnicians who landed there, found so great a Quantity of Gold and Silver, that they made their Anchors of those precious Metals. The Author of the Book of the Maccabees (3) speaking of the Romans, says that they, by the Conquest of Spain, made themselves Masters of the Mines of Gold and Silver that were in that

(a) Betica where Pluto settled, was that Province which we now call Andalusia; and the River Betis, now called Guadaluquivir, gave that Name to it. This River formed of old at its Mouth a small Island called Tartesus, with a City of that Name; this was the Tartessus of the Antients, whence Tartarus was formed.

(1) Possidonius. (2) Avienus. (3) L. 1. c. 8.

that Country (a). Silius the Poet calls Spain a Country fertile in Gold (b).

This doubtless is what obliged Pluto, who was ingenious in that kind of Work, to fix his Residence about Tartesus; and this is also what made him pass for the God of Riches, and go under the Name of Pluto (c), instead of that of Agefilaus which he had before; which has frequently made him be confounded with Plutus the God of Riches, whom we shall speak of in the following Chapter.

Farther, the Situation of Pluto's Kingdom, which was a very low Country in respect of Greece, made him pass for the God of Hell. Besides as he continually employed Labourers in the Mines, who are obliged to rake a far Way into the Bowels of the Earth, and in a Manner, as far as Hell and the gloomy Mansions of the Manes, in Search of hid Treasures (d), hence he was said to dwell in the Center of the Earth. Add to this that they who work in the Mines, commonly die there: Pluto was therefore reckoned the King of the Dead; and the very Name which he bore, Ades, signified Death, Destruction (e).

Moreover the Ocean, upon whose Coast he reign'd, was accounted a Place overspread with Darkness; and this, I reckon, is the Foundation of all the Fables that were invented afterwards concerning Pluto and his Realms of Darkness. 'Tis probable, for Example, that the famous Tartarus, that Place so noted in Pluto's Empire, comes from Tartesus which is near Cadiz (f): The River Lethe comes, not improbably, from the Guadelethe

(a) Et quanta fuerunt in regione Hispaniæ, & quot in potestatem redegerunt metalla argenti & auri quæ illic sunt.

(b) - - - - - Jam terra cedit Ibera,
Auriferis tandem Phenix depulsus ab oris.

(c) Dicitur esse Pluto, ἀπὸ τῆς πλῆτης, hoc est, a divitiis, quæ ex terræ eruuntur visceribus.

(d) In sede manium opes quærimus, nos ad inferos agunt.
Plin. l. 32. c. 1.

(e) It seems to be formed from the Phœnician Word Ed, or Aid, exitium.

(f) See Strabo & Don Pexron's Antiquity of the Celtæ.

Guadelethe which runs over-against that City; and the Lake Avernus from the Word Abarona, importing, at the Extremities; a Name given to that Lake which is near the Ocean; accordingly Pluto was specially worshipped at Cadis under the Name of Death, as Philostratus remarks (a). As to which there can be no Doubt, since the Phœnicians, whose Language was established at Cadis with the Colonies that Hercules had planted there, called Pluto Muth, their Name for Death (b).

Add to this, that all the Names given to him in the several Countries where he was worshipped, have a Reference to this Title, God of the Dead. The Latins called him Sumanus (c), the Sabines, Soranus, a Word which has Affinity to that of Coffin; others Orcus or Argus (d) or Februus (e). The Keys that were put into his Hand instead of a Scepter, signified that this God had the Keys of a Kingdom whence there is no Return: The Sacrifice of black Sheep that were offered him, and other Things of that Nature, allude to the same. This God had several other Names, Jupiter Stygius, Agésilauus, Agésander, because he passed for a Leader of People and Colonies, Ἀγεσιλαός, Leader of People, Ἀγεσάνδρως, of Men; Πλῆτος, rich upon Account of the Mines; Dis or Ades, a terra, sub terra ejus regnum; Dis-pater or Diespiter. I said they offered black Victims to Pluto, to which I add that he had this in common with all the infernal Divinities. Ditches were Dug about the Altars, and the principal Ceremony consisted in pouring in thither the Blood of the Victims, as if it had been necessary for it to penetrate to the Kingdom of that God. Again whatever was of bad Presage was especially consecrated to him, for which Reason the Romans dedicated to him the second Month of the Year, and the second Day of the same Month; and that because, according to

(a) Soli hominum festis cantibus Mortem celebrant, says he of the People of Cadis.

(b) Bochart, Chan. l. i. c. 34. After Sanchoniathon.

(c) As much as to say, God of the Manes.

(d) Quasi urgeret interitum.

(e) From an old Latin Word Februo, purgo, lustro.

to a Principle diffused through Italy from the Time of Pythagoras, the Number two was of all Numbers the most unlucky, designing the bad Principle, and consequently Disorder and Confusion. Plato (1), the divine Plato, tinctured with the Doctrine of Pythagoras, compared this Number to Diana always barren, and consequently despised.

We have few Monuments of Pluto; but in those which Time has preserved, he is represented with his Scepter or Batton with two Points, to distinguish it from Neptune's Trident which had three. We find him likewise seated upon a Throne, holding a Scepter or a Spear in his left Hand, and with the Right giving Cerberus a Soap. Sometimes he has the Calathus upon his Head, because Serapis whose Symbol the Calathus is, was the same among the Egyptians, as Pluto among the Greeks (a).

Pluto, though retired to the utmost Extremity of Spain, had Intelligence of the Beauty of Proserpine, the Daughter of Ceres Queen of Sicily, and resolved, according to a Custom very common in those Times, to commit a Rape upon her; perhaps too having demanded her in Marriage, this young Princess would not quit her Mother, for a Climate that was looked upon as the Extremity of the World; other Princesses had probably been of the same way of Thinking, and this doubtless is what had given the Poets a Handle to say (b) that this God had complained heavily that though the Brother of Jupiter, and the richest Prince in the World, yet no body would marry him; thus he resolved to carry off Proserpine the Daughter of Ceres.

Dio (c), this was Ceres's Name, was Queen of Sicily (a),

(1) In Timeo.

(a) Plutarch in Is. & Os. Heraclides, Porphyry, &c.

(b) Dux Erebi quondam timidus exarsit in iras

Prælia moturus superis, quod solus egeret

Connubiis, sterileſque diu consumeret annos.

Claud. de raptu Proſerp. l. i.

(c) See the sixth Volume of the Biblioth. Universelle, where M. le Clerc explains this Fable after Theodotius and other Antients, Eusebius, &c.

ly (a). The Reign of this Princess was famed for the Care she took in teaching her People the Art of Agriculture; she also established several laws concerning Policy (1) and the Property of Lands, that every one might reap what he sowed without any Molestation (b): Hence this Queen came to be looked upon as the Goddess of Corn and of the Earth. 'Tis proper to remark however that Ceres taught Agriculture only to the Greeks; the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and several other People, exercised it a long Time before. 'Tis even very probable that this Art had not been quite unknown in Sicily and Greece till the Time of Ceres, and that it was only improved by that famous Queen.

In the mean Time Pluto terrified, even in the Bottom of Hell, by the Earthquakes in Sicily, occasioned by the Efforts which Typhæus used, to shake off the cumbersome Load of Mount Etna, under which he was buried, resolved to visit that Country, to see if there was not some Chasm made that penetrated even into his Kingdom, fearing that the affrighted Ghosts might see the Light of Day; and after having examined all narrowly, he stopped upon Mount Eryx.

Ceres had her ordinary Residence in a delightful Place in Sicily called Enna (c), which signifies charming Fountain (2), where were beautiful Meadows watered with perpetual Springs (d). Her only Daughter, who was called Pherephata, which imports Plentiful Fruit, was walking one Day in those charming Meadows, gathering Flowers with some Virgins of her Retinue, and the Sirens who accompanied them: Pluto saw her, fell in Love with her, carried her off, and in an Instant mounting his Chariot drawn by four Horses, pursued his Way directly to Hell, notwithstanding

(a) There was another Ceres, the Daughter of Cælus. Boccace, Lib. Gen. Deor.

(1) Porphy. l. 4. de Abs. §. 22.

(b) What Virgil calls, Partiri limite campum.

(c) Cic. in Verr. Diod. l. 5. Ovid. Fast. l. 4. & Met. l. 5. and others.

(2) Bochart, Chan. l. 1. c. 28.

(d) Violis aliisque florum generibus viridans. Diod. loc. cit.

withstanding the wise Remonstrances of Minerva, who endeavoured in vain to dissuade him from this Design. Arrived near Syracuse, he found a Lake near which was the Nymph Cyane, who after having reproached him for this Violence, was going to stop his Chariot; but Pluto with a Blow of his Scepter, opens to himself a Way which leads him to Hell. The Nymph abandoned to despair melts into Tears, and is transformed into Water.

Mean Time Ceres apprized of what had befallen her Daughter, run over Sea and Land in quest of her; and when she had travelled all the Day long, she lighted a Torch to continue her Search by Night. One Day as she was quite spent with Fatigue, and found no Fountain to quench her Thirst, she came and knocked at the Door of a Hut, whence came out an old Woman, named Baubo, of whom she asked some Drink. The good Woman having presented her with a Draught, the Goddess swallowed it so greedily, that a young Child who was in the Cottage fell a laughing; and Ceres provoked with the Indiscretion, threw upon the Child what remained in the Vase, and forthwith he was transformed into a Lizard. Ceres, upon her Departure, came near the Lake of Syracuse, and perceiving her Daughter's Veil floating upon the Water, she judged her Ravishers must have made their Escape that Way. But she could have got no farther Information of them (Cyane, who could have given her Intelligence, having lost the Use of Speech since her Metamorphosis) had it not been for Arethusa, a Fountain-Nymph of the same Name, whose Waters, coming from Elis into Sicily, glide under the Bottom of the Sea, and in the Confines of Styx. This Nymph informed the afflicted Goddess that she had seen Proserpine, and that she had been ravished by Pluto; adding, as an Abatement to her Grief, that her Daughter was a Queen and Spouse to the God of Hell. She entreated her at the same Time not to carry farther her Resentment against the Earth, become barren since the Goddess had denied to it her precious Gifts, for it was not guilty of the Rape of her Daughter.
the

Upon this Intelligence Ceres mounts her Chariot, traverses the immense Regions of the Air; and arriving at Olympus, casts herself down at the Foot of Jupiter's Throne, and demands of him her Daughter, who was also his. Jupiter having let her know that Pluto was not a disadvantageous Match for Proserpine, assures her however that she should be given back to her, if she had kept a strict Abstinence since she had been in Hell; but that if she had ate the least Thing, Destiny opposed her Return.

Proserpine walking in the Gardens of the Elysian Fields, had plucked a Pomegranate; whereof she had ate some Grains, Ascalaphus who was the only one that had seen her, made his Court thereby to his Master, and all that Jupiter could do, was to order Proserpine to remain six Months of the Year with her Husband, and other six Months with her Mother.

The Indiscretion of Ascalaphus cost him dear, since Proserpine, by sprinkling him with the Water of Styx, transformed him into an Owl.

In the mean Time Ceres, satisfied with Jupiter's Decision, bethought her how to repair the calamitous Effects occasioned by Famine and Barrenness. As Attica had been more distressed by it than other Countries, she went to Eleusis, where after having informed Trip- tolemus of all that concerned Agriculture, she lent him her Chariot, and ordered him to travel through the whole Earth to teach its Inhabitants so necessary an Art. Trip- tolemus having traversed Europe and Asia, arrived in Scythia at the Court of Lyncus. This Tyrant, jealous of the Preference which the Goddess had given to that Prince, designed to assassinate him; but just as he was going to pierce his Heart, he was transformed into a Lynx, an Animal which is the Symbol of Cruelty.

Thus Ovid, and after him Claudian, in his fine Poem upon the Rape of Proserpine, relate this Adventure; and what is singular in it, the Historians agree with the Poets, at least in the Main. Strabo (1) mentions the Meadows of Enna where Proserpine was carried off; and Cicero, who seems to take the Fact for granted, has left us a Description of this Place equally elegant and ornamented (2) Diodorus says in several Places that Sicily, of all the Countries in the Earth, had been most honoured by Ceres's Favours, and that there the Goddess had fixed her ordinary Residence. But as this Author must have been very well informed in the Antiquities of his own Country, and as he seems to have read the Writers who went before him, I think fit to copy all that he says upon this Subject. “The Sicilians, says he (3), hold by Tradition from “their Ancestors, that their Island is consecrated “to Ceres and her Daughter Proserpine; some Poets “have written, continues he, that at the Marriage “of Pluto with that Princess, Jupiter gave them “Sicily for a Nuptial Present; and the Historians, “who are accounted the most faithful, say it was “in Sicily that Ceres and Proserpine shewed themselves to Men for the first Time, and that this “Island is the first in the World where Corn grew.” Homer, the most celebrated of the Poets, has followed this Tradition, when he says, speaking of Sicily:

*The Soil untill'd a ready Harvest yields,
With Wheat and Barley wave the golden Fields,
Spontaneous Wines from weighty Clusters pour,
And Jove descends in each prolific Show'r.*

Pope's Odyss. 9. 123.

“Accordingly we see still in the Leontine Territory and several other Places of Sicily, wild Wheat “springing up of itself.”

This Author proceeds to give the Description of the Fields of Enna where Proserpine was carried off; and relates all the other Circumstances of this Fable in the Manner as we have now given them. He adds too that the Syracusans have a Custom of offering Oblations every Year, each according to his Abilities, near

(1) L. 7. (2) Verr. sixth. (3) L. 5. c. 2.

near the Fountain Cyane, which Pluto made to spring up, when in that Place he opened a Way to himself with a Blow of his Trident, and that after those private Sacrifices they make a publick Offering of Bulls, whose Blood they shed over the same Fountain.

As Attica, says the same Author, was the Country most honoured with Ceres's Favours next to Sicily, the Athenians instituted in Honour of her, not only Sacrifices, but also the Eleusinian Mysteries, which became venerable for their Sanctity and Antiquity.

Again, the Sicilians, continues he, besides the annual Sacrifices which they performed at the Fountain Cyane, instituted Feasts in Honour of Ceres and Proserpine; and they celebrated them in a Manner suitable to a People on whom those Goddesses had conferred so many distinguishing Marks of Respect. These Feasts they place in different Seasons of the Year, in Allusion to the different Appearances of the Corn. The Rape of Proserpine is celebrated towards the Time of the Harvest, and the Search of Ceres, in Seed Time. The Latter lasts six Days, with splendid and magnificent Apparatus. 'Tis also usual, while this Feast continues, to mix in Conversation some loose and wanton Expressions, because by such Talk Ceres had been diverted from her Affliction for the Loss of her Daughter.

After this Detail, Diodorus cites, in Confirmation of it, the Authority of antient Poets, especially that of Carcinus, who had often been Witness at Syracuse to the Devotion with which the Sicilians celebrated the Feasts we have been speaking of.

Besides the Cultivation of Corn, Ceres, as we are told by the same Historian, had given Laws to the Sicilians; and it was for that Reason she had the Name of Thesmophoros given her by the People. It was not possible, Diodorus judiciously observes, that she could have made Men two finer Presents than to supply them with the Necessaries of Life, and to teach them to live virtuously (a).

E 2

Notwith-

(a) Other Places of Diodorus, where he repeats the same thing, we have waved.

Notwithstanding all these Testimonies, most Mythologists look upon the Rape of Proserpine to be only an Allegory which has an obvious Relation to Agriculture. Thus, according to them, the Division which Jupiter makes of the Time that this Goddess was to stay with her Husband and her Mother, means no more, but that the Grain, after having lodged six Months in the Earth, appears upon its Surface, grows up, and ripens. And as Sanchoniathon informs us that Proserpine, Saturn's Daughter, died very young, so the Fable may also be allegorized by saying, she was ravished by Pluto, only because the Name of that God among the Phœnicians is Muth, which signifies Death. However, ingenious Authors, relying upon the Authority of Diodorus Siculus, refer this Event to History; and as Don Pezron and M. le Clerc have supported it with most Probability, I shall quote what they say.

Pluto, says the former of those Authors (1), though retired to the Extremity of Spain, which fell to his Lot, yet had Information of the Beauty of Proserpine his Niece (a), and having sent one of his Captains into Sicily, who found her with few Attendants, had her carried off without Resistance, and put her into a Chariot, which carried her to the Borders of the Sea, near Syracuse, where she was embarked and conducted into Spain. As we ascribe to the commanding Officer what is done by his Orders, so it was said that Pluto himself carried her off. We may farther add that he used Violence, because after Proposals of Marriage with her, Ceres had given him a Denial; and hereby would be verified what we are told by the Poets, namely, that this God had often complained, that, though Jupiter's Brother, and the richest Prince of the World, he had not been able to find a proper Match (b), as has been already said.

Besides,

(1) Ant. of the Language of the Celtæ.

(a) She was the Daughter of Ceres and of Jupiter his Brother, accordingly Virgil says, Castâ licet patrui servet Proserpina limen. Æn. l. 6.

(b) Dux Erebi quondam tumidas exarsit in iras.

Besides, Rapes were very common in those Times, especially when the Parents refused the Person who was courted for Marriage.

M. le Clerc (1), who has explained this Fable perfectly well, alledges that it was not Pluto carried off Proserpine, but Aidoneus the King of Epirus, or Orcus King of the Molossi. As Aidoneus employed Labourers in the Mines, and as in the Way to his Country it was necessary to pass a River named Acheron, hence this Prince was often confounded with Pluto. Epirus, which was a very low Country with Respect to the rest of Greece, was taken for Hell itself, and we know that Theseus's Travels, and after him those of Hercules into that Country, were looked upon as Journeys to Hell.

These things premised, that Author proves that Ceres or Dio reigned in Sicily at the same Time that Aidoneus governed Epirus. The Reign of that Princess was renowned for the Care she took to teach her People Agriculture. She also founded Policy, and settled the Property of Lands, that every one might reap what he sowed without any Molestation.

However ingenious this Explication of M. le Clerc's is, I cannot persuade myself that the Rape of Proserpine can be ascribed to Aidoneus King of Epirus, since that Prince lived only in the Time of Theseus and Pyrrhous, that is, about fifty Years before the Siege of Troy, whereas the Titan Prince, who went under the Name of Pluto, reigned several Ages before. Is it probable that Ceres was the first who taught Sicily and Greece the Art of Agriculture, only in the Time of Hercules and Theseus? Did they live then upon Acorns and wild Herbs? And had not Greece learned, from the Time of Lycaon and Phoroneus, to substitute more solid food in Place of that which they had in common with the Beasts.

M. le Clerc, I know, distinguishes two Aidoneus's; the one cotemporary with Theseus, and the other with Abraham or Isaac; and he says it was in the Time of the former that Proserpine was ravished ; but besides that these two Princes resemble one another too much not to be the same, we may truly say it is but a Question about a Name, and that he calls that Prince Aidoneus to whom others give the Name of Pluto.

E 3 the

(1) Bib. Univ. Tom. 6.

But not to insist, 'tis not improbable that those two Explications are no better themselves than two new Fables. Is it to be imagined that Ceres, when she was in Quest of her Daughter who was ravished from her, established her own Worship among the Athenians ; that Erechtheus would admit of Feasts which she herself had founded in her own Life-time ; and that Triptolemus, whose Father reigned in that Time in Eleusis, was Priest to a Woman who was not able to find out her own Daughter.

I know several Chronologists, and particularly the celebrated Sir Isaac Newton, relying upon the Authority of Greek Writers, endeavour to fix the Time when Ceres lived ; that they determine the Date of her Expedition from Sicily to Athens ; speak of the Year of her Death, and of the Worship that was paid her not long after. But notwithstanding these Authorities, I am persuaded that we are not to seek in Greece for any other Ceres than the Iris of the Egyptians, nor for other Mysteries than those of that Goddess. We are unquestionably certain that almost all the Gods of the Greeks and their Worship, came from the eastern Countries, and especially from Egypt, with the Colonies that had peopled Greece at different Times ; and if there are any of them about whose Transportation we may be certain, it is Bacchus or Osiris, and Ceres or Isis : What therefore had given Rise to the Fable is this. Greece was infested with a severe Famine under the Reign of Erechtheus, as we learn from Diodorus Siculus (1) ; Ovid too gives a beautiful and ample Description of this Famine. The Athenians, whose Soil was not very fertile, were more distressed by it than their Neighbours. Erechtheus thought fit to send to Egypt in quest of Corn, and those whom he had sent sent brought, besides the Corn that was sold to them, the Worship and Ceremonies of the Divinities who presided over Agriculture.

(1) L. 18.

The Calamity which they had lately suffered, and the Dread they had of being again overtaken with the same, made them embrace, without Opposition, the Mysteries of a Goddess who was thought to have Power to secure them from it. Triptolemus at the same Time received that Worship into Eleusis. He himself would needs be the first Priest of Ceres or Isis, and as he lived in Plenty himself, he took Care to assist his Neighbours by teaching them the Mysteries which he had now learned. Sicily had embraced the Mysteries of that Goddess some Time before, and this was the Reason of its being given out that Ceres had come from Sicily to Athens. They added that her Daughter had been ravished, because the Corns and Fruits, which her Name designs, had ceased for some Time to yield Subsistence. Again it was said that Pluto had carried her away to Hell, because the same Fruits had remained all that Time as it were buried in the Center of the Earth; in fine, that Jupiter had decided the Quarrel between Ceres and Pluto, because they saw the Earth again covered with new Harvests. Here is the Foundation of this Fable; the Introduction of the Mysteries of Ceres into Sicily and Greece. Nor is what I advance without Proof, since Herodotus positively says that the Thesmophoria, one of the principal Feasts of Ceres, were introduced thither by the Daughters of Danaus.

Some famous Poet, whose Name is defaced in the XIV. Æra of the Arundel Marbles, celebrated this Event in a Poem, as we are told in that Æra: And 'tis proper to remark, 1. That this Poem, which Ovid had undoubtedly read, was composed ten Years after the Arrival of Ceres. 2. That the Author of the Chronicle of these Marbles considers the Rape of Proserpine as a Fable, together with Ceres's Travels, and the other Circumstances intermixed with this Event; which undoubtedly imports that the Poet, whom he speaks of in that Place, had extremely disguised guised the History of the Translation of Ceres's Worship into Attica.

If however there are learned Men who, with Diodorus Siculus, are inclined to maintain that there really was a Ceres in Sicily, who gave Laws of Agriculture, we may for their Satisfaction suppose that she, having lost her Daughter, and come to Attica in Quest of her, taught Triptolemus the Mysteries of Isis, and that the Greeks having put herself afterwards among the Gods, her Worship came to be confounded with that of the Goddess of the Egyptians.

In the Treaty which Ceres made with Pluto, Jupiter granted her the Return of her Daughter, on Condition that she had ate nothing since her Arrival in Hell. Ascalaphus having informed that he had seen her eat six Kernels of a Pomegranate, which she had gathered in the Gardens of Hell, the Decree was reversed, and Jupiter ordered Proserpine to be six Months in Hell and six Months with her Mother ; or, as we have it in Apollodorus (1), nine Months with Ceres and three Months with Pluto. That Princess, to be revenged upon Ascalaphus for his Indiscretion, metamorphosed him into an Owl.

Ascalaphus, say they who maintain that Proserpine was really stole away by Pluto, was one of that Prince's Courtiers, who having advised his Master to the Rape of Proserpine, did all in his Power to defeat Ceres's Negotiations, and hinder her Daughter from being given back. Proserpine afterwards put him to Death, and this is what gave Rise to the Fable : The pernicious Counsels which he had given his Master were the Cause of his Death. His Transformation into an Owl is only a Metaphor, representing to us an odious Person ; unless you will chuse rather to say, that this Fable was published only to figure to us that he kept himself always hid in Pluto's Mines, whereof he was the Overseer, and where he died. 'Tis probable that he was crushed to Death by the Fall of some Rock ; which gave the Poets a Handle to feign that that Proserpine had covered him with a huge Stone, as may be seen in Apollodorus (1), who will have 'it that he was punished in that Manner by Ceres herself. The Name of Ascalaphus imports one who breaks Stones in Pieces, and this Name was probably given him to denote his Office. Some Authors contend that he was transformed into a kind of Lizard, which the Greeks call Ascalabos, and no doubt 'tis the Similitude of Names that gave them a Hint to say so.

(1) L. 1.

Ovid adds, that the Nymph Cyane reproaching Pluto for the Violence he offered to Proserpine, was changed by that God into a Fountain; a Circumstance which I take to have no other Foundation but that it was near that Fountain which runs in the Confines of Syracuse, that Pluto's Emissaries embarked. What the same Poet adds, that a Virgin named Menta, whom Proserpine changed into a Plant which still bears her Name, and which the Greeks call Hedyosmos, because of its fine Smell, probably means that that Queen, not being able to bear a Rival to share her Husbands Affection, put her to Death. The Resemblance of Names made those who wrote this History of that Court to invent the Transformation.

In the same Place there is also Mention made of the Syrens who accompanied Proserpine at the Time she was carried off. But that I may not be obliged to make Repetitions I refer to what I have said of them in the History of the Sea Gods (2). All I shall say now is, that Ovid feigned that the Syrens, who accompanied Proserpine when she was carried away, obtained from the Gods to become Birds, that they might go in Quest of her, probably because the Syrens, who inhabited upon the Coasts of Italy, pretty near Sicily, having learnt the Misfortune which had befallen that Princess, fitted out a Ship with Sails to go in Search of her.

The Fable of the Fountain Arethusa, and of the Amours of the River Alpheus her Lover, who crossed so many Countries to visit his Mistress, is founded, according

(1) Loc. cit. (2) B. I. c. 102

according to the learned Bochart (1), only upon a Quibble in the Language of the first Inhabitants of Sicily. The Phenicians who settled there, having found that Fountain encompassed with Willows, called it Alpbaga, which signifies the Fountain of Willows; others gave it the Name of Arith, which signifies a Stream. The Greeks, who arrived there some Time after, not understanding the Meaning of these two Words, and calling to Mind their Alpheus which runs in Elis, imagined that because the Fountain and the River had nearly the same Name, Alpheus must needs have passed through the Sea all the Way to Sicily, near the Fountain Arethusa. The Notion appeared ingenious to some of the Wits of that Age, who thereupon composed the Romance of the Amours of the River-God and the Nymph Arethusa. Most of the antient Historians have been deluded by this Fable, since they have seriously advanced that the River Alpheus passed through the Sea, and came into Sicily to flow near the Fountain Arethusa. This Fable must even have been well supported, since the Oracle of Delphos ordering Archias to go and plant a Colony of Corinthians at Syracuse, the Priestess expressed herself in these Terms: Go into that Isle where the River Alpheus mingles his Waters with those of the beautiful Arethusa. Pausanias (2), who reckons the Story of the Amours of Alpheus and Arethusa a Fable, influenced by the Authority of so exprels an Oracle, dares not deny but that River runs through the Sea, though he does not see the Possibility of the Thing.

As the famous Triptolemus, Son of Ceres and Neera, was one of those who gave Ceres the best Entertainment when she arrived in Attica, hence they fabled that this Goddess had taught him the Art of Agriculture, and sent him in her Chariot, drawn by winged Dragons, to propagate through all the World an Art so necessary to Mankind. They add, that she had nursed him with her own Milk; a strong Expression to intimate to us the Care which she had taken to form that Prince's Education. They even went so far as to say,

(1) Chan. l. 1. c. 18.(2) In Eliac.

say, that Ceres put him into the Fire by Night to purify him, and took him out of it every Morning ; metaphorical Expressions setting forth that this Prince, in order to be initiated into the Mysteries of Isis, passed through all the Trials that were used on that Occasion. All these mysterious Fables, as well as the Arrival of Ceres in Attica, which is so finely represented upon a Marble Tomb ingeniously explained by M. de Boze in a Dissertation published in the fourth Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of the Belles-Lettres ; all these Fables, I say, have no other Foundation but the Introduction of the Worship of Ceres into Greece, and especially into Attica, as we have already proved. Triptolemus, who reigned there, came to Eleusis by Sea, as we learn from Philochorus, to carry Corn into different Countries, where at the same Time he taught the Mysteries of Ceres, whereof he himself was Priest. Before he set out, he had sowed Corn in a Field of Attica named Raria, as we learn from the tenth Æra of the Arundel Marbles. This without Doubt is the Key and Resolution of all these Fables ; for certainly it refers to the Time when the Worship of Ceres, then so antient in Egypt, was received in Greece, and not to that of Agriculture, which had been known there long before ; unless we chuse to understand it of a new Method of cultivating the Ground, which the Greeks learned in their Travels to Egypt, and put in Practice at that Time. The Marbles now quoted, fix this Date under the Reign of Erechtheus ; that is, according to the Commentators on those Marbles, 1426 Years before Jesus Christ, 280 or thereby before the Trojan War (1).

But here a Difficulty occurs, which I believe has never been hitherto taken Notice of ; namely that the Arundel Marbles, which point out the three Dates of those Events, don't range them as other Authors who speak of them. In the first of those Æras, which is the twelfth, they make Ceres come into Attica : In the

(1) We shall see in the sixth Volume that we must bring this Date 100 Years nearer.

the thirteenth they say Triptolemus began to sow Corn in the Fields of Eleusis; and 'tis only in the fourteenth that Mention is made of the Rape of Proserpine, and according to this antient Monument, so much to be regarded for many Characters of Truth, the Arrival of Ceres at Athens, precedes the Rape of her Daughter 10 Years : I am sorry that the learned Commentators who have examined this Monument, have taken no Notice of this.

The Hazard which Triptolemus run in his Travels undoubtedly gave Rise to the Fable of Lyncus, whose Cruelty they have figured by transforming him into a Lynx. Triptolemus happily escaped the Hands of that Tyrant, who jealous of his Reputation, had a mind to put him to Death. The Fable of Triptolemus's being drawn in a Chariot by winged Dragons, is taken from an Ambiguity in the Phœnician Language, whereof the Word used in this History signifies either winged Dragons, or a Ship adorned with Iron Beaks, as we are told by Bochart (1), and after him by M. le Clerc. However I am inclined to the Opinion of Philochorus, cited by Eusebius, who says, that this Ship was taken for a flying Dragon, because it had upon its Prow the Figure of a Dragon.

Though I am persuaded that the Fables now explained, have no other Foundation but the Introduction of Ceres's Worship into Greece, yet 'tis proper to quote here what we learn from a Fragment of Stobæus (2), where it is said that Erechtheus, who was at War with the Eleusmians, learned from the Oracle that he should be victorious if he sacrificed his Daughter Proserpine; which, if true, may have given Rise to the Fable.

Another Fragment, which is Homer's, cited by Pausanias (3), teaches us the Names of the first Greeks, who were initiated into the Mysteries of Ceres. These were, according to that Poet, Triptolemus, Celeus, Eumolpus, and Diocles. S. Clemens Alexandrinus (4) names them Baubon, Disaules, Eubuleus, Eumolpus, and Triptolemus. I am apt to suspect it was Eumolpus himself, or Museus his his Father, that compos'd the Poem we have mentioned in Honour of Ceres, and this is the Opinion of Strabo and Pausanias. This Eumolpus being the Hierophantes of the Eleusinian Mysteries, was in so great Reputation that he made War upon Erechtheus. The two Generals were slain in the Battle, and it was agreed that the Erechthidæ should be Kings of Athens, and the Eumolpidæ content themselves with the Dignity of Hierophantes.

(1) Hier. l. 3. c. 14. (2) Serm. 38. (3) In Corinth. (4) In Proem.

After having explained all the Fables that have any Connection with the History of Ceres, I am next to speak of the Mysteries that were instituted in Honour of her.

C H A P: XI.

Of the Eleusinian Mysteries, and other Feasts of Ceres.

I Am not to enlarge much upon a Subject which Meursius has thoroughly canvass'd, of whose Works we have an excellent Abstract by M. le Clerc; but because I might be censured if I said nothing of a Particular which has so much Connection with the History of Ceres and Proserpine, I shall give a brief Account of the Eleusinian Mysteries. And what I am to say of them shall be reduced to three Heads. First, I shall treat of the Festivals, then of the Initiated, lastly, of the Priests that celebrated them.

The Sicilians, in Gratitude for the Obligations they lay under to this Goddess, founded Feasts and Mysteries to perpetuate the Memory of her good Services. The Time of the Year marked out the Reason of their Institution, since they were celebrated a little before Harvest in Honour of Proserpine, and in Seed-time in Honour of Dio. Both of their Feasts were celebrated with a great deal of Solemnity; and Diodorus Siculus informs us that in the Latter, which lasted six Days, they represented Mens antient Manner of living before the Invention of Agriculture.

The Inhabitants of Attica, gratefully affected with the Services of Ceres, as well as the Sicilians, distinguished

ed themselves also by Feasts instituted to her Honour. The former was called Proerosia, because it was celebrated before sowing and tilling; and the Goddess was termed Proerosia, according to the Custom of the Antients who gave their Gods as many Names as they had Feasts and Temples.

The second, which was celebrated at Athens some Time after, namely, about the Middle of October, was named Thesmophoria, that is, the Feast of the Legislatress; it was instituted by Triptolemus: But some Egyptian Ceremonies, afterwards added that had a Reference to Orpheus and the Danaids, made some Antients say, that it was a Feast of Isis and Osiris, propagated from Egypt to Greece. This Feast lasted five Days at Athens, and two Women born of lawful Wedlock were chosen every Day to preside therein; and they took Care to have Sacrifices offered according to their Means, by the Hands of a Priest named Stephanophorus, or Crowned. They set out from Athens to Eleusis, when they performed Sacrifices on the second of the Month Pyanepsion, which answers in part to our October; and that Day was called Anodos, that is, the Ascent, because they went up to Eleusis. The same Women bore upon their Heads the Books of the Laws of Dio, and sung Hymns to her Honour. When they arrived, they lived very reserved, remote from the Company of Men, and appeared in a modest Habit, and without Crowns upon their Heads; abstaining especially from eating Pomegranates, whose Fruit had been so fatal to the Goddess: They even fasted the third Day, which they passed in the Temple of Ceres, sitting at the Feet of her Altars. Then they rallied one another to provoke mutual Laughter, as Beubo had done to Ceres, when she came into her Hut.

Last of all, they performed Sacrifices in secret, the Ceremonies whereof were not allowed to be divulged. The Feast ended with a Sacrifice named Zemia, that is, of Atonement, being designed to expiate the Faults they had committed during the Solemnity.

The

The third Feast was celebrated in the Month of December, and was called Alca, from the Word Alos which signifies, a Barn Floor, because that was the Time when they used to thresh the Corn, and to be in the Barns. But the most solemn was that which was celebrated at Eleusis, in the Month of August; it was named by Way of Excellence, the Mysteries. By whom this Festival was instituted is not agreed. Some Authors would have it to have been by Erechtheus, others by Museus, or Eumolpus, or Orpheus (a). These Things had given Rise to its Institution; the Invention of Agriculture, the Laws of Ceres, and the other Adventures which befel her at Eleusis; and the Memory of all these was kept up by particular Ceremonies (a). Thus this Solemnity comprehended the Motives of all the rest.

The Eleusinian Mysteries were of two Sorts, the Greater and the Lesser; one Qualification requisite to both was to be able to keep a great Secret. Though Tripotlemus had appointed that no Stranger should be capable of being initiated into the great Mysteries, yet Hercules, to whom they durst refuse nothing, demanded to be admitted to them, and upon his Account other Ceremonies were instituted, which they called the Lesser Mysteries, and these were celebrated afterwards at Agra near Athens. Those who were ambitious of being admitted to them, repaired to this Place in the Month of November, sacrificed to Jupiter, and kept the Skins of the Victims to lay under their Feet when they were purified upon the Banks of the River Ilissus. We know not exactly what Sort of Ceremonies were made Use of in those Purifications; only that Salt was there employed, Leaves of the Laurel-Tree, Barley and Crowns of Flowers, Sea-Water and River-Water: He who performed the Ceremony was called Udranos, because he poured Water upon

(a) It was in the Month Boedromion, which answers in part to our Month of August.

(b) See Meusius in his Treatise of the Eleusinian Mysteries, and M. le Clerc, Bibl. Univ. Tom. 6.

upon the Candidates for the Mysteries. It was also necessary, during that whole Time, to keep strictly chaste; and, last of all, to sacrifice a Sow with young. These lesser Mysteries served as a Preparation for the greater ones, which were celebrated at Eleusis; and by their Means Persons were initiated into the secret Ceremonies of Ceres. After having passed thro' a good many Trials, the Person was Mystes, that is, qualified for being very soon initiated into the greater Mysteries, and to become Epoetes, or the Witness of the most secret Mysteries, which was not procured till after five Years Probation; during which, he might enter into the Vestible of the Temple, but not into the Sanctuary: And even when he was Epoetes, and enjoyed that Privilege, there were still many Things, the Knowledge whereof was reserved to the Priests alone.

When one was initiated, he was introduced by Night into the Temple, after having his Hands washed at the Entry, and a Crown of Myrtle put upon him. Then was opened a little Box wherein were the Laws of Ceres, and the Ceremonies of her Mysteries; and after having given him these to read, he was made to transcribe them. A slight Repast, in memory of that which the Goddess had got from Baubo, succeeded this Ceremony; after which, the Mystes entered into the Sanctuary, over which the Priest drew the Veil, and then all was in Darkness in the twinkling of an Eye. A bright Light succeeded, and exhibited to View the Statue of Ceres magnificently adorned; and while they were attentive in considering it, the Light again disappeared, and all was once more wrapped up in profound Darkness. The Peals of Thunder that were heard, the Lightnings that flashed from all Hands, the Thunder that broke in the midst of the Sanctuary, and a thousand monstrous figures that appeared on all Sides, filled the Initiated with Horror and Consternation; but the next Moment a Calm succeeded, and there appeared in broad Daylight a charming Meadow, where all came to dance and make merry together.

'Tis

'Tis probable that this Meadow was in a Place inclosed with Walls behind the Sanctuary of the Temple, which they opened all of a sudden when the Day-light was let in ; and this Scene appeared the more agreeable, that it succeeded a Night when nothing but doleful and hideous Objects were to be seen. There it was that amidst Jollity and Mirth all the Secrets of the Mysteries were revealed ; there, according to some Authors, the most unbounded Licentiousness reigned ; the Myllos was there exhibited, which the Sicilians bore about in the Feasts of Ceres, and Tertullian adds the Phallus of the Egyptians. But after all, we know not well what passed there, these Mysteries having been long kept an impenetrable Secret ; and had it not been for some Libertines who got themselves initiated in order to divulge them, they had never been brought to Light. This much is true, that the greatest Modesty, and even a pretty severe Chastity was exacted from the Mystæ and Women who presided over the Feasts of this Goddess. The Purifications and Oblations that were there practised, would make one imagine they were not so dissolute as some Authors have alledged ; unless we will say that the Abuses which the Fathers of the Church speak of were not in the primitive Institution, but had only crept into them afterwards. The Night being spent in these Ceremonies, the Priest dismissed the Assembly with some barbarous Words, which shews that they had been instituted by People who spoke another Language (a), namely by the Egyptians, and in a Word that they were the same, as has been already said, with the Mysteries of Isis, but to which the Greeks had, in Process of Time, added a great many Ceremonies of their own.

After having spoke of the Initiated, we must, before we be done, say something of the Ministers who officiated in these Festivals. The first was a Hierophantes, or a Mystagogos, that is, a Man who shews the Sacred Things^(a), and the Initiated were not permitted to mention his Name to the Profane. This Hierophantes was to be an Athenian of the Family of the Eu-molpidae, of a certain Age, with other Qualifications prescribed by the Laws, and was especially to keep a perpetual Continence. The second was a Daduchus or Torch-bearer. The third a Sacred Herald. The fourth a Minister of the Altar; this was a young Man who put up Prayers in Behalf of the Assembly, and was subject to the superior Ministers. Besides these four Ministers there were two Prophets to do Sacrifice, and five Delegates, to see that all Things were performed in Order; the first was called the King, and the other four Epimeletes.

Vol. III. F the

(a) These Words were Conx and Om pax, which M. le Clerc takes to signify, to watch and do no Evil.

The Feast of Initiation lasted nine Days; the first was called Agyrmos, or Day of the Assembly; and it was taken up in the Ceremonies I have been speaking of. On the second, the Mystæ were sent to the Sea to bathe themselves. On the third was sacrificed a Barbel with Flower and Cakes. On the fourth Oxen were yoked in a Chariot whose Wheels were made like Drums. The Women walked along with the Chariot, crying Heil, Mother Dio! and bearing little Boxes in which were Cakes, Wool, Pomegranates, and Poppies. None of the Profane durst look upon this Chariot; and whoever happened to be at the Windows were obliged to withdraw. On the fifth they walked the Streets all Night long, in Imitation of the Search which Ceres had made for her Daughter. On the sixth they carried from Eleusis to Athens a large Statue of a young Man, crowned with Myrtle, and bearing in his right Hand a Torch; him they called Jacchos, a Name which M. le Clerc derives from the Phœnician Eaach, an Interjection of Joy and Transport. And indeed this Statue was accompanied with loud Exclamations of Joy and with Dancing; and 'tis very probable that it represented some of those who accompanied Ceres in her Affliction. On the seventh were celebrated the Gymnic Games, where the Combatants were naked : These were the most antient Games of Greece, instituted in Memory of the Invention of Tillage. The eight Day was employed in initiating those on whom the Ceremony had not hitherto been performed. This Day was termed Epidauria, because Esculapius had arrived on that Day from Epidaurus to be initiated ; a Favour which they were very willing to grant him. The Ninth was employed in filling two Vessels with Water, after which they were emptied in pronouncing some Words, whereby it seems they supplicated the Goddess for Rain, to fructify the Earth (1), and that Day was termed Plemenchœ, a Word importing an earthen Vessel flat at Bottom.

were

(a) He was likewise sometimes called Prophet.

These were the greatest Mysteries of Greece, into which every body was desirous to be initiated : The whole represented the History of Ceres, her Laws, and the Care she had taken of Agriculture. Secrecy was therein especially enjoined with great Strictness, not so much to hide their Abominations, as because the Initiated were thereby let into the Secret History of Ceres and her Daughter, which was necessary to be concealed from the Public, lest had it been known that these two Goddesses had only been mortal Women, their Worship should have become contemptible ; which is the Opinion of M. le Clerc after Meursius and some of the Antients. This Opinion is favoured by Cicero (2), while he insinuates that it was the Humanity of Ceres and her Daughter, their Places of Interment, and several other Things of that Nature, that they concealed with so much Care. In the mean Time 'tis proper to remark that the Initiated were allowed to converse together upon these Things, which made the Secret the less uneasy to them.

Lastly, before I conclude the History of Ceres, it remains that I describe the Manner of representing her, and what Victims were offered to her. Ceres appears commonly upon antient Monuments like a Woman with a very big Belly, crowned with Ears of Corn, and holding in her Hand a Branch of Poppy : A Circumstance alluding to what we are told by some of the Antients, that upon Ceres's Arrival in Greece, some Grains of Poppy were given her to dispose her to Sleep, which she had not enjoyed since the Rape of her Daughter, besides that this Plant is very fertile. To her the first Fruits were offered, and her usual Victim was the Sow, because that Animal is very pernicious to Corn-fields. At her Sacrifices they did not use Crowns of Flowers, but of Myrtle or Narcissus's to figure the Mourning-dress she had wore since Proserpine's unlucky Adventure ; and the Sicilians, in imitation of their Queen, run up and down in the Night Time with Torches in their Hands ; this was one of the principal Ceremonies of their Feasts, as has been already said.
F 2 of

(1) M. le Clerc, loc. cit. (2) Tusc. Quæst. l. 1. c. 13.

As to what remains, though it be neither necessary nor possible to explain all the Circumstances of these Fables, I should be glad however that some body would favour us with some Conjectures about them. We are told that while Ceres was in Quest of her Daughter, Neptune meeting her fell in Love with her ; that the Goddess having concealed herself under the Form of a Mare, the God of the Sea transformed himself into a Horse to seduce her, with which she was so highly offended, that after having washed herself in a River, she returned into a Cave and there lay concealed. In the mean Time Famine and Pestilence beginning to ravage the whole Earth during the Absence of the Goddess, the Gods made search for her every where, without being able to get any Information of her, till Pan keeping his Flocks discovered her, and apprized Jupiter of it : He sent the fatal Sisters, who by their Prayers brought her from her Retreat. This Cave was in Sicily, and there was to be seen a Statue of Ceres clad in Black, with a Horses Head, holding a Pigeon in one Hand and a Dolphin in the other. The Sicilians called her the black Ceres, or the Erinnyes, because the Outrages offered her by Neptune had turned her frantic and furious.

ed

The Mythologists, I know, will discover in this Fable several pretty Allegories; happy he who shall light upon the true one. In the mean Time, I offer it as a Conjecture of my own, that possibly they had no other View in this whole Fiction, but to signify that Ceres, in Quest of her Daughter over Sea and Land, suffered some Insult from a Pirate, whose Ship bore the Figure of a Horse; which Story they veiled under the mysterious Fable now related.

I joyn Cotytto with Proserpine, several Mythologists being of Opinion that this was only a Sirname of that Goddess, founded upon the Resemblance between the Mysteries of Ceres and Proserpine, and those which the Athenians celebrated in Honour of Cotytto. 'Tis true, a great many Obscenities were committed in both; but that is not enough to persuade us that Cotytto was only the Sirname of Proserpine. I take them to have been two Goddesses quite distinct from one another; this at least is the Opinion of Strabo (1), who says, that Cotytto was a Goddess worshipped in Thrace; and Synefius, in his Epistles, agrees with Strabo.

The Priests of Cotytto had the Name of Baptæ, and were justly looked upon as the vilest of Men, upon Account of the obscene Rites with which they defiled themselves without any Check or Controul. And to be sure they must have carried Debauchery very far, since Juvenal, who paints them to the Life with one Stroke, says, they tired out their Goddess Cotytto, though she was the Goddess of Lewdness.

Cecropiam soliti Baptæ lassare Cotytto (2)

The Athenians had received from the Thracians the Mysteries of this filthy Deity, which were called Cotyttea, and they celebrated them with a great deal of Solemnity; but in a Secret and mysterious Manner, as we are told by Juvenal. Eupolis had composed a Co.

F 3

(1) L. 10.

(2) Sat. 2.

a Comedy intituled Cotyto, where he rallied those Mysteries, and particularly Alcibiades who participated in them; which cost that Poet his Life.

If we may believe the antient Scholiast upon Juvenal, 'tis these Mysteries and the Obscenities therein committed that Canidia speaks of in Horace (1).

Inultus ut tu viseris Cotyttia Vulgata, sacrum liberi Cupidinis.

And do you still hope for Impunity, after having exposed the Mysteries of the Goddess Cotyto, and divulged those Rites that are sacred to the Freedoms of Love?

CHAP. XII.

Plutus the God of Riches.

AS we rake into the very Bosom of Hell, says Pliny, in Search of Riches, and are led thereby to the gloomy Kingdom of the Dead, 'tis not without Reason that Pluto has been ranked among the Gods of the infernal Regions. And would to God! exclaims the Poet Timocréon (a), by way of Apostrophe to this God, you had always remained in those gloomy Mansions, and had never been seen either by Sea or Land.

Some Antients, from the near Resemblance between their Names, have taken Plutus and Pluto for one and the same God; but the greatest Part have always distinguished them. All are agreed with Hesiod that the latter was the Son of Chronos or Saturn and Rhea; now the same Poet asserts (2) that Plutus owed his Original to Ceres and Jasion. Ceres, says he, having had Commerce with the Heroe Jasion, had a Son by him named Plutus, whom she brought forth in the Island of Crete, and who was very powerful by Sea and Land.

I am not ignorant that the old Scholiast upon Hesiod, followed herein by several other Authors, allegorizes

(1) Canid. Respons. Epod. Od. 18.

(a) See Lysio Giraldis. Synt. 6. who has quoted the Fragment of this antient Greek Poet.

(2) Theog. in fine.

rizes this Genealogy of Plutus, and that in this Light nothing could be more just than to make him the Son of Ceres and Jasion, whose whole Life had been applied to Agriculture, since 'tis by Means of this that substantial Riches are acquired.

Diodorus Siculus (1), who is of the same Opinion with this antient Scholiast, gives Plutus another Extraction; Jasion, says he, dwelt in the Island of Samothrace, while his Brother Dardanus went and settled upon the Coast of Troas, received there Cadmus, and gave him in Marriage his Sister Harmonia; for, says this Author, the Greek Mythologists are mistaken when they assert that she was the Sister of Mars. The Gods, adds Diodorus, vouchsafed to attend the Celebration of this Marriage, and this was the first Time they were present at such a Ceremony. Each of them came thither with his Present, and Ceres, who loved Jasion dearly, brought Corn for hers. And hence, according to him, is the Source of this Fable. Jasion, continues he in the same Passage, afterwards espoused Cybele, and was ranked among the Gods.

Dionysius Halicarnassens, an Author no less accurate than well instructed in the Greek and Roman Antiquities, thus speaks of this Personage (2): Jupiter having married Electra, Daughter of Atlas, had two Sons by her, Dardanus and Jasus. The latter was not married: But Dardanus espoused Chrysa the Daughter of Pallas, by whom he had Idæus and Dimas who succeeded him; but a particular Deluge in Arcadia where they reigned, having obliged Jasus and Dardanus to depart thence, they went in Quest of Adventures elsewhere. Dardanus became at last the Head of the Colony, his Brother Jasus being crushed to Death by Thunder, for having made an Attempt upon the Honour of Ceres. Homer gives the same Account of Jasion's Death, as well as Hermippus in Hyginus (3).

That there was such a Person as Jasion is therefore a Thing not be doubted: And since he was a Man of Wealth and Power, which made him pass for a

F 4 Lover

(1) L. 5. (2) Ant. l. 1. c. 53. (3) Cælo Poet. in Artophyl.

Lover of Ceres, may we not reduce to History this whole Fiction, and say it was his Son whom they called the God of Riches? It will be objected that there ought to be some Authority brought in Proof of his having had a Son who was called Plutus; but if that will do the Business, Authority is not wanting. Hyginus, in the Passage already quoted, adds the Testimony of an antient Historian of the City of Gnosſus in the Island of Crete, named Petellides, who positively asserts it. “ To Ceres and Jafion, says that “ antient Historian, were born two Sons Philomelus and “ Plutus, who had but little Favour for one another.
 “ The latter, who was extremely rich, imparted no “ Share of his Substance to his Brother, who being “ fore reduced, sold the small Estate he had, bought
 “ two Oxen with the Price, and set about the culti“ vating of the Ground, and was the first that applied “ himself to Agriculture. His Mother Ceres, after “ having admired the Art which her Son had invent“ ed, placed him among the Stars, where he forms
 “ the Bootes; or the Arctophylax.” Here then, according to the Authority of an antient Historian, whom Hyginus does not contradict, is a Son of Jafion, named Plutus, a very rich Man; and who consequently may be the God of Riches adored by the Greeks (a).

This Plutus, the God of Riches, whoever he was, having been observed to dispense his Favours very unequally, was therefore given out to be blind, as well as Love; Aristophanes in his Plutus, adds that he was lame, because whenever he had a Mind to enrich the Good, he came to them but very slowly; and when he came to favour them, he was said to be very

(a) Ex his (id est Cerere & Jafione) ut Petellides Gnosſius historiarum ſcriptor demonstrat, nascuntur filii duo Philomelus & Plutus, quos negant inter se conveniſſe: Nam Plutum qui ditior fuerit, nihil fratri ſuo de bonis conceſſiſſe: Philomelum autem neceſſario adductum, quodcumque habuerit, vendidiſſe, ex eo boves duos emiſſe, & ipſum primum plauſtrum fabricatum eſſe. Itaque arando & colendo agros, ex eo ſe aluiſſe. Cujus matrem inventum miratam, ut arantem eum inter ſidera conſtituiſſe, & Bootem appellaiſſe. Hygin. Cæl. Poet. Aſtr. in Arctophy.

very clear sighted, and to have good Eyes. We know in what Manner this comic Poet rallies the Athenians with respect to this God, and how, when the good Cbremylus had restored his Sight to him, he puts him in the Place of Jupiter; and makes him to be the only God whom they invoked.

Pindar, Aristophanes, and Lucian, tell us, that Plutus was a dastardly God, whence Erasmus has taken Occasion to make one of his Proverbs; but Plutus vindicates himself from that Imputation, in the Comedy which I have cited, and says that as Thieves and Robbers never could catch him, that is, never could make themselves Masters of great Riches, hence they constructed his Precaution and Foresight to be Cowardice.

Saint Jerome, followed by several Ecclesiastic Writers, alledges that the Syriac or Chaldaic Word Mammona, was the same with the Plutus of the Greeks; 'tis true indeed that Word signifies Riches, and in the Books of Genesis and Job, Matbmon is taken for Treasures; but this, as I take it, is no Proof that the Syrians and Chaldeans had made a God of Riches.

C H A P. XIII.

The F U R I E S.

IF the Pagans have justly been reproached for embracing a licentious Theology, according to which the Gods themselves had given Examples of the greatest Irregularities, we ought at least to do them Justice as to some Articles wherein they had consulted clearer Reason: Such, among others, is that of the Furies appointed for chastising those in the other World who had led an irregular Life in this. Though I have given a particular Dissertation upon this Subject, printed in the Memoirs of the Academy of the Belles-Lettres (1), yet I cannot chuse but give an Abstract of it here.

When we trace out the Origin of the Pagan Gods, we are obliged to have Recourse to the Poets who have

(1) Tom. 7i

have given their Genealogy; but we soon perceive that they had no other Guides but a confused Tradition, which left them at entire Liberty to choose the Opinion which they thought the most mysterious. Accordingly Apollodorus (1) says, the Furies had been formed in the Sea from the Blood which issued from the Wound that Saturn had given his Father Cælus. Hesiod who makes them younger by one Generation (2), gives the Earth for their Mother, who conceived them from the Blood of Saturn; But the same Poet in another Work (3), so precarious were the Principles of Theology which he followed, asserts that those very Goddesses were the Daughters of Discord; and to give a higher Proof of his Exactness, he adds that they were born the fifth Day of the Moon, a Sentiment which Virgil has followed in his Georgicks (4); thus assigning to a Day which the Pythagoreans thought sacred to Justice, the Birth of Goddesses who were to inflict it with the utmost Rigor.

Lycophron (4) and Eschyles (5) will have it that the Furies were the Daughters of Night and Acheron. The Author of a Hymn addressed to the Eumenides asserts that they owed their Birth to Pluto and Proserpine; Sophocles (6) makes them spring from the Earth and Darkness; and Epimenides says, they were the Sisters of Venus and the Parcæ, and the Daughters of Saturn and Evonymus. Had I a mind here to make an Ostentation of Learning, I might expatiate upon what is advanced by Mythologists and Commentators as to the different Originals now assigned: But it requires no great Penetration to find out, that the Poets in this followed the Traditions of their own Times and Countries; or that each had given to those Divinities such Parents as seemed to suit best with their Character; and that having nothing plausible nor certain

to

(1) L. 1. (2) Theog. l. 1. (3) Opera & Dies.

(4) Ipsa dies alios, alio dedit ordine luna

Felices operum: quintam fuge, pallidus Orcus, Eumenidesque satæ.

(4) In Alex. (5) In Eumenid. (6) In Oedip.

to deliver to us upon this Subject, they had a mind to give their Genealogies at least an Air of Mystery which People durst not always dive into. I reckon we must go farther back to find out the true Original of the Divinities now in Question.

It was a general Opinion that after this Life there were Places allotted for the Punishment of the Wicked and the Reward of the Good; and no Doubt upon this Idea were formed the Elysian Fields and Hell: And as there were Judges there appointed for rendering to every one the Justice he deserved, so the Furies were imagined to be their Ministers, and to execute the Sentences which they passed upon the Wicked. It is likewise possible (for after all Idolatry followed true Religion too near not to have preserved some of its Truths) it is possible I say, that a confused Knowledge of the Fall of the Angels and their Punishment, had given Rise to the Introduction of Furies, who are themselves Devils appointed to be the Tormentors of the Guilty; and this I am apt to think was the true Original of these Divinities; this is what made them be invented by those who embraced this natural Notion, that there were to be Rewards and Punishments after this Life. For though this Truth has been disfigured by the absurd Fables that have been intermixed with it, 'tis easy however to distinguish the Substance of the Opinion from the Veils they were obliged to draw over it, to render it the more familiar.

We ought to judge thus favourably for the Sake of the Philosophers, who doubtless had sounder Ideas than the People, and not say with Lucretius, that whatever had been delivered about the infernal Regions had a Reference only to this Life (a).

If the Antients varied as to the Original of the Furies, they have not been more unanimous as to their Number; at first it would seem they admitted only three three of them, Tisiphone, Megea, and Alecto ; and these Names which import, Rage, Slaughter, Envy, &c. were perfectly applicable to them (a). Ausonius makes it even a kind of Axiom (1), there are three Gorgons, three Harpies, and three Destinies. Euripides reckons the Goddess Lyssa among the Furies, because she inspired Rage and Fury, whence her Name was derived. Juno in that Poet orders Iris to conduct her armed with Serpents to Hercules, to infuse into him that Madness to which he owed the Loss of his Life. Plutarch (2) allows of but one Fury, whom he calls Adrasta, the Daughter of Jupiter and Necessity; it was she, according to that Author, who was the sole Minister of the Vengeance of the Gods.

(a) Atque ea nimirum quaecunque Acheronte profundo Proditæ sunt esse; in vita sunt omnia nobis.

From the Manner in which Virgil paints the Harpies, it appears that he takes them into the Number of the Furies : He even calls them by that Name when making Celeno speak, he says (3), ———— Vobis Furiarum ego maxima pando.

In fine, the Goddess Nemesis, or the Nemeses, for they reckoned more than one of them, are also to be taken into the Number of the Furies. They have all their Characters ; Daughters of the Night and the Ocean, they were appointed to examine into Mens Actions, for the Punishment of the Bad and the Reward of the Good.

Besides these three particular Names, the Antients gave other general ones to those three Goddesses. The Latins called them Furies, because of the Fury they inspired ; and the Greeks Erynides, as much as to say ἐρις νῆς, contentio mentis ; or because, as Pausanias remarks, ἐριννυειν signifies to fall into Fury. The Sicyonians, as we are told by the same Author, called them γέμνας θεάς, the venerable Goddesses, and the Athenians

(a) Tisiphone, quasi τίσις ἢ φόνος, Megea comes from μεγαίρω, or from μεγάλη ἔρις, great Contention: and Alecto from α, & λήγω, Refract and Unrelenting. See Phurnutus.

(1) Gryph. Num. ternarii. (2) De Sex. Num. Vind. (3) Æn. l. 111. 252.

Athenians μαρία (1). In fine, after that Orestes had appeased them by Sacrifices, they got the Name of Eumenides, or Benevolent; for I am not of Lylio Gyraldi's Opinion, that they were so called by the Rule of contrary, quod minime sunt benevolæ (2). The very Occasion of their getting this Name is a Refutation of that Etymology. The Greek and Latin Poets frequently give the Furies Epithets denoting either their Character or their Habit, or the Serpents which they wore instead of Hair, or the Places where they were worshipped: Thus Ovid (3) calls them the Goddesses of Palestine, when he speaks of the Fury with which they inspired Atys.

'Tis not difficult, after what I have now said, to find out what were the Functions of the Furies. Antiquity has always looked upon them as the Ministers of the Vengeance of the Gods, and as stern and inexorable Goddesses, whose sole Employment was to punish Vice, not only in the infernal Regions, but even in this Life, pursuing the Guilty incessantly with Stings that gave them no Rest, and with dreadful Visions, which often frightened them out of their Senses. I should be obliged to copy almost all the Poets, especially Euripides, Sophocles, and Seneca, were I to relate all that they say of the frantic Disorders of those whom they tormented. We know with what lively Strokes Virgil paints the Disorder occasioned by one of those Furies in the Court of Latinus. What Tisiphone did to Etheocles and Polynices, is unknown to none who have read Statius (4). Ovid represents with the same Vivacity the whole Havock caused at Thebes by the Fury whom Juno had sent to take Revenge upon Athamas (5); and all that Isis suffered from another Fury, whom the same Goddess had stirred up to persecute her. But of all whom those implacable Goddesses tormented, no Body was a more conspicuous Example of their Vengeance than the unhappy Orestes, and the Theatres of Greece frequently resounded

(1) In Arcad. & in Att.
(4) Thebaid. (5) Met. l. 4.

(2) Synt. 6.

(3) Fast. l. 6.

resounded with the Shrieks of that Parricide, whom they pursued with so much Fury.

The Furies were employed not only in punishing the Guilty, but also in chastising Men by Diseases, by War, and the other Strokes of celestial Wrath. Virgil however seems to have distributed these several Functions among the three Furies, so that Tisiphone was employed for contagious Distempers (1), while Alecto's Functions particularly related to the Disorders of War (2). According to this Idea, Statius has called her the Mother of War (3). In fine, when any Person was to be put to Death, Megea was she whom the Gods commonly made use of.

Cicero has reduced to a very judicious Moral all the different Functions of the Furies. “ We need not “ have Recourse, says he, to Furies armed with flaming Brands to be the Tormenters of the Wicked.
“ The Stings and Remorses of a guilty Conscience
“ are the only Furies designed by the Poets.” They figure, no doubt, the Testimony of an evil Conscience, that gnawing Worm which incessantly preys upon the Guilty, of which Nero himself complained that he never could get rid, as we are told by Suetonius (4).

Goddeffes so awful commanded particular Homage. In short, so great was the Veneration paid to them, that People durst hardly mention their Names, as Euripides tells us in his Orestes, or cast their Eyes upon their Temples. If we may believe Sophocles (5), it was accounted an Act of Impiety what Oedipus did, when going to Athens as a Suppliant, he retired into a Grove that was consecrated to them in the Village of Colone, and he was obliged, before he departed, to appease them by Sacrifice, whereof this Poet, and Theocritus, in his Pharmaceutria, have left us the Description. The Inhabitants of Colone enjoined him to pour out Fountain-water, which was to be drawn in Vessels whose Handles were covered with the Wool of a young Lamb. After which, turning himself towards the East,

(1) Georg. 1. 3. (2) Eneid. 1. 7. (3) Theb. 1. 4.
(4) In Nero. (5) In Oedip. Epicolon.

East, he performed a Libation with Oxyerat *, and threw upon the Earth at three Times nine Olive-branches. He was especially prohibited to mix Wine in the Sacrifice.

The Furies had Temples in several Places of Greece. The Sicyonians, if we may believe Pausanias (1), sacrificed to them yearly upon the Day of their Festival, Ewes big with Lamb, and offered to them Crowns and Garlands of Flowers, especially of Narcissus, according to Sophocles and Phurnutus, a Plant beloved by the infernal Deities, upon account of the Misfortune that had befallen the young Prince of that Name (a). They had likewise a Temple in Achaia in the City of Corynaeum, with very small wooden Statues (2). This Place was so fatal to those who were guilty of any Crimes that, so soon as they entered into it, they were seized with a sudden Fury, which deprived them of their Reason, so much were they disordered by the Presence of those Goddeesses, joined with the Reflection upon their Crimes. These Examples must needs have happened even more than once, since it was found necessary, as Pausanias says, to debar all from entering thither. The same Author adds, that in the Statues of these Goddeesses themselves was nothing either very singular or curious, but that in the Vestible were several others in Marble of an exquisite Workmanship, representing Women who were taken for the Priestesses of these Goddeesses. This is the only Passage, as far as I know, where the Furies are said to have had Priestesses, since we find elsewhere that their Ministers were Men, whom the Inhabitants of Tilphosa in Arcadia, named Hesichides. Demosthenes owns that he himself had been the Priest of those Goddeesses (3), in the Temple which Orestes had built them

* A Composition of Water and Vinegar.

(1) In Arcad.

(a) Eusebius upon the first Book of the Iliad says, the Reason why they offered the Narcissus to the Furies, was owing to the Etymology of the Word νάρκνυ, torpere. Quia Furiae torporem immittebant sceleratis.

(2) Idem. in Acha. (3) Orat. in Midiam.

them near the Areopagus (1). We are told, that Perilas, Uncle to Clytemnestra, summoned that unfortunate Prince before that severe Tribunal (2); and that his Cause having been tried very strictly, and the Suffrages of the Judges found equal, Minerva added hers, whereby he was acquitted; that is to say, Wisdom and Equity at length got the better of the Intrigues and Interest of a Party. All who appeared before those Judges, were obliged to offer a Sacrifice in the same Temple, and to swear upon the Altar of the Furies, that they were ready to tell the Truth.

But of all the Temples dedicated to those Divinities, there was none of them, next to that of the Areopagus, more noted than that which the same Orestes built in Arcadia. It was in that Part of the Peloponnesus that the Furies (3) appeared to him for the first Time, which threw him into such a Fit of Madness, that he ate his own Finger. Having retired from thence to a Field named Até, the same Goddesses again appeared to him in white Robes, and a milder Aspect, which again composed his Mind. Orestes erected a Temple in each of those Places, and offered to the black Furies expiatory Sacrifices to appease the Manes of his Mother, and to the white Furies a Sacrifice of Thanksgiving. It was upon this Occasion, to mention it by the By, that the Furies got the Name of Eumenides. We may add, that the Temples of the Furies were a secure Sanctuary for those who retired thither. Pausanias remarks (4) that, after the Death of Codrus, the Dorians, who were guilty of it, would all have been punished with Death by the Judges of the Areopagus, had they not avoided it by flying for Refuge to the Temple of these Goddesses.

Tho' the Worship of the Furies did not make so great Progress in Italy as in Greece, yet the Romans were far from neglecting them; and we learn from Varro (5) and Cicero, that the Goddess Furina, whom the latter takes to be the same with the Furies, had a Temple

(1) Pausan. in Attic. (2) Idem in Arcad. (3) Near Megalopolis. (4) In Achaic. (5) Lib. 5. de ling. lat.

Temple at Rome in the fourteenth Region; and a sacred Grove; and that the Day of her Festival, which was called the Furinalia, was marked in the Kalendar and in the Fast, the sixth before the Kalends of September.

Besides the Narcissus, they used likewise in their Sacrifices Branches of Cedar, of Alder, Hawthorn, Saffron and Juniper; they sacrificed to them Sheep and Turtle-doves, as we learn from Eliau (1), and they used in their Sacrifices the same Ceremonies with those of other infernal Deities.

The Author of the Poem of the Argonauts, gives a fine Description of one of those Sacrifices, which Medea offered for Jason before his Combat with the Dragon that kept the golden Fleece, wherein she invokes the Furies. First, she makes three Trenches, into which she pours the Blood of the Victims, pronouncing some Words to call up those Divinities: Then she raises a Pile of Cypress, Alder, Juniper, and Thorn, upon which she burns the black Sheep which she had killed; and after several Libations of sweet Wine and other Liquors composed of Honey, as being most proper to sweeten the fullen Humour of these Goddesses, she believed that she had at length made them propitious to her Lover.

Pausanias remarks (2), that in the earlier Times the Statues of these Goddesses had nothing different from those of other Divinities, and that the Poet Æschiles, in one of his Tragedies, was the first who represented them with that hideous Air, and those Serpents that made them so dreadful, that the first Representation of his Play proved fatal to many of the Spectators. The Description of the Furies given by this Poet was followed; and it passed from the Theatre to the Temples: Henceforth they came to be represented no otherwise but with a grim Aspect and a frightful Mien, with Attire black and bloody, having, instead of Hair, Serpents wreathed about their Heads, a burning Torch in one Hand, and a Whip

G

of

(1) De Animal. l. 10. c. 46. (2) In Arcad.

of Scorpions in the other, and for their Attendants, Terror, Rage, Paleness and Death. Thus seated around Pluto's Throne, whose Prime Ministers they were, they waited his Orders with an Impatience that marked out all the Fury they were possessed of.

We have now but few antique Figures of these Goddesses; only we see on an Abraxas published by M. Chifflet, their three Heads, with Serpents hanging from a Tree, and around, the Word Iao; and on a Lamp of Licetti, which represents a dead Man lying upon a Bed, the Heads of two Furies, with a horrible Countenance. Besides these, we have two Greek Medals, the one belonging to the King's Cabinet, struck under the young Gordian by the Inhabitants of Lyrba, a Town in Asia Minor; and the other by those of Mastaura, a City of Lycia, where they are represented with Serpents, Keys, lighted Torches, and Daggers in their Hands, without any Thing frightful in their Looks; those of the first of these two Medals, have each a Calathus upon her Head, and those of the second, Leaves or Plants, and their Hair as usual. But to supply the Want of Marbles and Bronze, the Poets, especially Virgil (1), have left us in their Works Pictures of these Goddesses which represent their Character to the Life.

C H A P. XIV.

The Parcæ, Fate, and the Destinies.

THERE were no Divinities in the Pagan World who had a more absolute Power than the Parcæ. Mistresses of Human Lot, they regulated its Destinies: Whatever came to pass in the World was subject to their Empire; and we would be mistaken should we imagine that their Functions were confined to the spinning out of our Days, since I shall make it appear that the Movements of the celestial Spheres, and the Combination of the Principles which form the World, were also under their Jurisdiction; for the Philosophers, phers, as well as the Poets, have spoke of the Power of these Goddesses, and they have vied with one another in treating a Subject wherein Physiology had almost as great a Share as moralizing (a).

(1) En. l. 1.

To observe some Method in this Article, I shall first enquire into the Original of the Parcæ: Then I shall speak of their Employments: In the third place of their Number, and the different Names that were given them; and I shall conclude with the History of their Worship, and with some Pictures of them left us by the Historians and Poets.

Varro says (1), that as these Goddesses presided over the Birth of Men, they took their general Name from partus, Birth. Parca, says he, that is parta; or as other Authors say, à parturiendo, which comes to the same. Servius on the contrary asserts (2), that they were so called only by an Antiphrasis, because they spare no body, quod nemini parcant, in the same Way as the Furies were termed Eumenides. 'Tis needless here to cite a great Number of Authors who have treated of the Original of these Goddesses, since after all we would learn nothing from them but the various Etymologies of a Name which the Latins gave to Divinities, the Knowledge of whom they had borrowed from the Theology of the Greeks. I know not if the Reader will be better satisfied when I tell him, that the Greeks called the Parcæ μοῖραι, a Word derived from the Verb μεῖρω, divido, to divide: For though this Name informs us, that these Goddesses were so called, because they regulated the Events of human Life, and divided our Destinies; yet it still remains to be shewn by what Train of Principles they came to be admitted into the System of Pagan Morality.

If we trace their Origin next in the Poets, we shall find in them such a Diversity of Sentiments as is not likely to be very satisfying. Hesiod says, in the Beginning of his Theogony, that they were the Daughters of Night and Erebus, wherein he was followed by Orpheus, or at least by him who composed the Hymn upon the Parcæ: And 'tis obvious that these two Poets designed thereby to point out the impenetrable Obscurity of our Lot, as Horace has it (1): But the same Hesiod, as if he had forgot at the End of his Theogony what he had said at the Beginning, will have it that these Goddesses owed their Birth to Jupiter and Themis, the Daughter of Cælus, wherein he has been followed by Apollodorus (2); Lycophron, who does not always agree with the Author of the Theogony, asserts (3), that the Parcæ were Daughters of the Sea.
G 2 likely

(a) See my Dissertation upon the Parcæ, Mem. of the Acad. of the Belles-Lettres, tom. 5.

(1) De Orig. Ling. Lat. apud Aul. Gell. l. 3. c. 16. (2) Upon the fourth Eclogue of Virgil.

Those Moderns who are of Opinion, and not without Reason, that the Greeks had derived from the Phenicians the greater Part of their Theology, search for the Origin of the Parcæ in the Language of that People, with which Greece came to be acquainted by different Colonies; and if we will believe the learned Bochart (4), they were invented from some Expressions like those used by Job (5) and Isaiab (6), when they say, My Days are cut off more swiftly than the Thread by the Weaver. The Time of my Abode upon Earth is come to an End. God cuts short the Thread of my Life. M. le Clerc (7), who had so often successfully followed the Notions of the Author now quoted, drops him here, and says the Name of the Parcæ comes from the Hebrew Parach, which signifies to cut the Thread: Hinc, says he, Parca Dea quæ filum rumpit. But he had not considered that the Greeks, who were acquainted with these Goddesses before the Latins, never called them by that Word. But whatever be in this, I am of opinion that they are the Offspring of Philosophy. The Philosophers, who sought out a Method of reconciling the absolute Power of the Supreme Being with human Liberty, were divided among themselves.

Some

(1) L. 3. Od. 39. (2) Bibl. l. 1. (3) In Alex. v. 44.
 (4) Chan. l. 1. (5) Job vii. 6. (6) Is. xxxviii. 12. (7) Notes upon Hesiod.

Some absolutely denied a Providence, as the Epicureans; and to save Liberty they pretended that the Destiny Fatum was only a chimerical Divinity: Others established Providence upon the Ruin of Liberty; and not daring to rob the first Principle of the Knowledge and Care of Futurity, which they saw could not subsist if we were Masters of our own Actions, they concluded that all came to pass in the World by an inevitable Necessity, and thereupon formed their Fatum. Each of these two Consequences appeared just to their respective Sects.

Fate being a blind Divinity, who regulated all Things by a Power whose Effects he neither could foresee nor prevent, it was necessary to give him Ministers to execute his Orders, and thus they imagined the three Parcæ. Cicero (1), after the Philosopher Chrysippus, will have it that they themselves were this fatal Necessity that governs us, and which the Greeks call εἰμαρμένη; and this, no doubt, is the true Original of the Goddesses now in question. The Antients, to mention it by the by, had a pretty singular Notion of their Fate, who was, according to them, a Divinity to whom all others were subjected. The Heavens, the Earth, Hell and the Sea were under his Empire, and nothing could reverse what he had decreed; or to speak more justly, he himself was that fatal Necessity according to which all Things happened in the World. Jupiter in vain had a Mind to save Patroclus; he must examine his Destiny which he does not know. He takes the Scales, weighs it, and the Side that determined the Death of this Heroe being the heaviest, he is obliged to abandon him to his Destiny. How inevitable soever the Decrees of this blind Divinity were, Homer however says, they were once like to have fallen short of being put in Execution; so far were they from having clear and consistent Ideas as to this Subject.

These Destinies, in short, were written from all Eternity in a Place where the Gods went to consult them; and Ovid (1) tells us, that Jupiter went thither with Venus to look into those of Julius Cæsar. This Poet subjoins, that those of the Kings were engraved on Diamond.

G 3 and

(1) De Nat. Deor. l. 1.

But passing that, as the whole Destiny of Men, which was thought to be subject to the Power of the Parcæ, respected either the Time of their Nativity, or of their Life or Death; Clotbo, the youngest of the three Sisters, presided over the Moment when we come into the World, and held the Distaff; Lachesis spun all the Events of our Life; and Atropos, the eldest of the three, cut the Thread with Scizars, and thus put a Period to it, according to this antient Verse.

Clotbo colum retinet, Lachesis net, & Atropos occat.

The three most usual Names of these Goddesses, had a plain Allusion to their Offices: The first is derived from κλωθεῖν, to spin, the second from λαχεῖν, to measure out by Lot, and the last from ἀτρεπτον, irreversible; or which comes to the same thing in the main, Clotbo, as Fulgentius alledges, signifies Evocation, to denote that this Goddess over-rules the Moment of our Birth; Lachesis signifies Lot, because 'tis she that regulates our Destinies; and Atropos, without Order and without Law, to teach us that this Destiny is with-held by no Consideration, when the Hour of our Death is once come, and that she owns no other Law but that which Fate imposes upon her (2).

According to this Idea, the Poets have described in different Manners this Ministration of the Parcæ; sometimes they exhort them to spin out happy Days, for those who are to be the Favourites of Destiny (3); sometimes they tell us that they prescribe the Time we are to continue upon Earth, as Homer says upon Occasion of the Stay that Ulysses was to make with the Nymph Calypso (4); and Ovid speaking of the fatal Brand to which Meleager's Destiny was annexed nexed (1): Sometimes they tell us, that they reveal a Part of our Destinies, concealing the rest in impenetrable Obscurity (2): That they make Use of the Subserviency of Men, to take away the Lives of those whose Destinies are accomplished, as Virgil observes, speaking of Halesus. If we may believe the same Poets, they are present at the Moment of our Birth, and sometimes even appear in the Apartment of Women in Child-bed, as Ovid and Hyginus say of Meleager (3), and Catullus of Achilles, &c. they preside over the Return of those who, having gone down to Pluto's Kingdom, had obtain'd Permission from the Gods to revisit the Earth, such as Ceres, Bacchus, Hercules, Æneas, Theseus, and some other Heroes. They are the absolute Mistresses of all that lives in the World, as we are told by Claudian (4). In fine, 'tis they that dispense as they please, all the Good and Evil that befall us, according to Hesiod (5).

(1) Met. l. 15. (2) Fulg. Myth. l. 1. (3) Catullus in the Epith. of Thetis and Peleus. (4) Odyf. l. 1.

These are the Functions which the Poets assign to the Goddesses we are now upon; but the Mythologists had peculiar Notions about them, which it is proper to unfold. Martianus Capella reckons the Parcæ the Ministers of Fate; or to use his Words, they were his Secretaries, and the Keepers of his Archives; Librariæ, archivique custodes. He adds, that one dictated the Orders of her Master, another wrote them down with great Exactness, and the last executed them by spinning out our Destinies; unam loqui, alteram scribere, tertiam nere. Other Mythologists are not quite agreed as to the Ministration of the Parcæ: Fulgentius contends, that they served under Pluto's Orders (6); accordingly we see Claudian represents these Goddesses at the Feet of the God of Hell, to dissuade him from making War upon his Brother Jupiter (7). Phurnutus on the contrary pretends, that they were the Ministers of Jupiter; and since this God, according to the Testimony of Pausanias (8), bore the Name of μοῖρα.

G 4

γῆτις,

(1) Met. l. 8. (2) En. l. 3. (3) Met. l. 8. (4) De raptu Proserp. l. 1. (5) Hym. in Parc. (6) Myth. loc. cit. (7) De rapt. Proserp. (8) In Eliac.

ἡγήτης, or Conductor of the Parcæ, we may very well reckon him their Sovereign: But we may reconcile these two Authors, by saying that this was Stygian Jupiter, the same with Pluto. But whatever be in that, the Opinion most generally followed by the Antients is, that the Parcæ served under the Orders of Fate, to whom the other Gods and Jupiter himself were subject.

The Philosophers again give the Parcæ Functions quite different from these now mentioned. Aristotle says that Clotbo presided over the present Time, Lachesis over the future, and Atropos over the past; and Plato is so fanciful and romantic upon this Subject, that I am afraid his Imagination has a little outrun his Judgment. Sometimes he represents these Goddesses in the midst of the celestial Spheres, with white Robes spangled with Stars, wearing Crowns upon their Heads, and seated upon Thrones refulgent with Light, where they attune their Voices to the Songs of the Sirens: There, says he, Lachesis sung past Events (1); Clotbo those which the present Moment brings forth; and Atropos such as still lye hid in the Womb of Futurity. Sometimes he imagines an Adamantine Spindle, one End of it touching the Earth, while the other is lost in the Clouds: Necessity high enthroned upon an Altar, holds this Spindle between her Knees, and the three Parcæ which are at the Foot of the Altar, turn it with their Hands. Plutarch (a) delivers a Philosophy upon the same Subject not much less subtle. Atropos, according to him, placed in the Sphere of the Sun, sheds down upon the Earth the first Principles of Life; Clotbo, who has her Residence in the Sphere of the Moon, forms the Stamina that infold the eternal Seeds; and Lachesis, whose Abode is upon Earth, presides over the Destinies that govern us.

After what I have now said, one would be apt to think that the Parcæ were three in Number, and that they

(1) Plato de Rep. l. 10.

(a) Treatise of the Face of the Moon, and in the Demon of Socrates.

they had no other Names but those which I have given them so often ; and yet the Antients, as we shall see, varied as much about these two Articles as those we have been now upon. Their general Names in the Greek Authors, are μοῖρα, αἴσα, κῆρ, εἰμαρμενη. The first had a manifest Relation to their Measuring out our Destinies together. The second, according to Lyllo Gyraldi (1), denoted either the Darkness in which Futurity is involved, or rather the Eternity of the Divine Decrees, as is explained by Aristotle, or the Author of the Treatise de mundo, which is attributed to that Philosopher : The two last again were fatal Necessity itself, by which all Things are conducted. The particular Names given by Hesiod to these three Divinities, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos (2), had a manifest Allusion to their Functions, as has been already said.

Pausanias names other three Parcæ, very different from those now mentioned : The first, and the most antient of all, was Venus Urania (3) ; it was she rather than Clotho, that presided over Man's Birth, according to the antient Doctrine of the Pagan Theology, that Love, the uniting Principle of the Universe, was the eldest of all the Gods. The second was Fortune (4), and in proof of his Sentiment he quotes Pindar's Authority. In fine, Ilithia was the third, according to the Testimony of Olenus of Lycia, who in Pausanias gives her the Epithet of Spinsteress Εὐλινον.

Proserpine, or Stygian Juno, who, according to the best Authors of Antiquity, often disputes with Atropos the Office of cutting the Thread of our Destiny, as has been said elsewhere, is also to be taken into the Number of the Parcæ.

If we consider the absolute Power the Parcæ were supposed to have over all our Destinies, we would think they must needs have had the most solemn Worship : And yet we find little or nothing upon this Subject in the Writings of the Antients ; the reason probably

(1) Hist. Deor. Synt. 6. (2) In Theogon. (3) In Att.
(4) In Eliac.

bably is, that being accounted inexorable Goddesses whom it was impossible to mitigate, it was judged unnecessary to be at any Trouble and Expence about their Worship. All that we learn from Pausanias, is, that they had some Temples in Greece, and Statues in several Places. The Lacedemonians, as we are told by the same Author, had built them one in the same City of Sparta, near Orestes's Tomb, and the Sicyonians another, which was dedicated to them, in a sacred Grove (1), where they bestowed the same Worship upon them as upon the Furies; that is, if we may believe Menander, a very antient Author, they offered up to them every Year black Sheep, in a Sacrifice where the Priests, among other Ceremonies, were obliged to wear Crowns of Flowers. The same Pausanias says (2), that in the City of Olympia, there was an Altar consecrated to Jupiter the Director of the Parcæ, near which those Goddesses had another; and he adds farther, that in a Temple of Apollo at Delphos (3), were the Statues of two Parcæ by that of Jupiter, who was in Place of the third; and that at Megara the Statue of the same God, made by Theoscomus, bore upon its Head those of the three Goddesses. Further we learn from the same Author (4), that among the other Figures represented upon Cypselus's Chest, was to be seen that of a kind of Monster with a wild and savage Air, great Tusks and crooked Hands, which was known to be a Parca from the Inscription upon it.

'Tis easy to see from all that I have now said, and from the Description of these Goddesses given by Catullus (5), in what Manner they were represented; but notwithstanding all these, we have not any antique Figure of them remaining; those which we find in Cartari, and some other Authors, being only done from the Descriptions given of them by the Poets and Philosophers. However, the Figure of one of the Parcæ is thought to be represented upon a Medal which

(1) In Corinth. (2) In Eliac. l. 1. (3) Idem in Phocicis.
 (4) In Eliac. c. 1. (5) In Epithal. Pelei & Thetidis.

which Patin has inserted in his Treasure; but the Antiquaries are not agreed about it.

As to what remains, the Manner in which the Antients represented these Goddesses, contained certain Mysteries which 'tis proper to explain. They were usually figured like three Women of great Age, with Chaplets made of big Locks of white Wool, interwoven with Flowers of Narcissus: A white Robe covered their whole Body, and Fillets of the same Colour bound their Chaplets, as Catullus has it (1). One held the Distaff, another the Spindle, the third the Scissars to cut the Thread, at the Hour of Death, which Virgil calls the Day of the Parcæ.

According to other Authors, the Habits of these three Goddesses did not resemble one another. Clotho, clad in a Robe of different Colours, wore upon her Head a Crown of seven Stars, and held in her Hand a Distaff which reached from Heaven to Earth. Lachesis's Robe was spangled with numberless Stars, and she had by her a great Quantity of Spindles; Atropos was cloathed in Black, Scissars in her Hand, with a Number of Clews of Thread larger or smaller, according to the Length and Shortness of their Lives whose Destinies they contained.

The great Age of the Parcæ figured no Doubt the Eternity of the Divine Decrees. The Distaff and the Spindle signified that it belonged to them to regulate their Course; and that figurative Thread, the Insignificancy of human Life which is so slender and precarious. Lycophron adds that they were lame, to signify, as Eustathius remarks, the Inequality of Events in Life, and that mixed State of Good and Evil which we experience by Turns. If they had Wings, as we are told by the Author of a Hymn to Mercury, which is ascribed to Homer, it was in Allusion to the Rapidity of Time, which flies apace, and passes away like a Dream. The Crowns which they wore upon their Heads, bespoke their absolute Power over the Universe, the Events whereof were under their Direction; and the horrid

(1) Loc. cit.

horrid Cave, where Orpheus says (1) they dwelt, was an Emblem of the Obscurity that covers our Destinies. That horrid Mien which Pausanias gives to (2) that one of the three Parcæ who was near the Tomb of Etbeocles and Polynices; these great Tusks and crooked Hands which made her more terrible than the fiercest of wild Beasts; all this denoted that nothing could be imagined more dreadful, than the Destinies of those two unfortunate Brothers, and that their Days had been spun by the most terrible of the Parcæ. In fine, if the Philosophers placed them in the celestial Spheres, where they accompanied with their Voices the Songs of the Sirens or of the Muses, it was to intimate to us that they regulated that admirable Harmony wherein consist the Order and Arrangement of the Universe.

C H A P. XV.

Nemesis, or the Nemeses, and Adrastea.

TH^O Mythologists are not agreed as to the Class wherein the Goddess Nemesis is to be ranked, I am of Opinion however, that what suits her best is that of the infernal Gods.

And indeed the Ideas they had of her was that of a Divinity who watches for the Punishment of the Guilty, not only in this World, which she surveyed with vast Concern to find them out for Correction, but also in the other, where she chastises them with the utmost Rigour. And for this Reason she was represented with Wings, sometimes too with a Helm and a Wheel, to set forth that she pursued the Guilty by Sea and Land. Daughter of Justice, she was, if we may believe Ammianus Marcellinus, appointed to avenge Impiety, and at the same Time to recompense virtuous Actions (a).

Such is the Idea which Antiquity gives us of this Divinity; this is even what has led some Authors to confound her with the three Parcæ, or to make her a fourth.

(1) Hymn. in Parcas. (2) In Eliacis.

(a) Ulrix facinorum, bonorumque Præmiatrix, Amm. l. 14.

fourth. Accordingly Phurnutus says, that Nemesis and Adraſtea were ranked among the Goddeſſes : The former, ſaid he, corrected the Injuſtice of Deſtiny, and the ſecond was the Miniſter of Divine Vengeance ; but this Author, to mention it by the Way, is miſtaken in making Nemesis and Adraſtea two Divinities, ſince the laſt is but a Sirname of Nemesis, when Adraſtea raiſed an Altar to her. Thus he ought not to have divided their Functions : Nemesis in correcting the Injuſtice of Chance or Fate, was the Miniſter of Divine Vengeance.

Several among the Antients, and many Moderns, take Nemesis to be the ſame with Leda, the Mother of Caſtor and Pollux, who got that Name after her Deification ; but the moſt common Opinion is, that Nemesis herſelf was the Mother of thoſe two Heroes whom ſhe had by Jupiter, and that Leda was only their Nurſe.

Others, and not a few, confound Nemesis with Fortune, and think the Wheel which uſually accompanies her Statues, can ſignify nothing elſe ; but I reckon I have given the true ſignification of thoſe two Symbols. 'Tis true however that her Name is allowed to ſignify the Force or Power of Fortune, Vis Fortuneæ.

But not to inſiſt on that, Nemesis was worſhipped in ſeveral Places, as well in Greece as Italy, even in the Capitol itſelf ; and according to P. Viſtor ſhe had a Temple at Rome ; but no where was her Worſhip more pompous than at Rhamnus, a Town of Attica, where ſhe had a Statue ten Cubits high, of a ſingle Stone, and ſo exquisitely beautiful, that it was nothing ſhort of Phidias's fineſt Works. Ageracritus his Scholar, who, according to Pliny (a), had deſigned it for a Venus, ſeeing one preferred to it, which was done by Alcamenes another Scholar of the ſame Maſter, ſold his to the Rhamnufians, on Condition that they would only take it for a Statue of Nemesis (1), whence ſhe got the Name

(a) Pauſanias in his Atticks differs from Pliny, and will have this Statue to have been the Work of Phidias himſelf ; others give it to the Statuary Diodorus.

(1) L. 36.

Name of Rhamnusia. Antiently the Statues of Nemesis were without Wings, as we learn from Pausanias (1), and the Inhabitants of Smyrna were the first who gave her any ; however, we find none of them at present either upon the Statues or Medals of this Goddess.

In the Title of this Chapter I have put Nemesis or Nemeses, because Pausanias speaks of them in the plural Number, upon Occasion of the Fact which I am going to relate. “ As Alexander the Great, says that “ Author (2) was hunting on Mount Pagus, he fell “ asleep under a Plane-tree near the Temple of the “ Nemeses, when those Goddesses appeared to him, “ and commanded him to build a City on that Spot “ of Ground, and to transport thither the antient “ City of Smyrna : Which he accordingly executed, “ for he is the Founder of that City as it is at this “ Day.” We must not forget that the Romans, before they set out for War, offered up a Sacrifice to Nemesis, as we learn from Pomponius Lætus, probably taking that Goddess for Fortune, who ought to accompany and favour Warriors.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the DII MANES.

THOUGH the Function of the Gods called Manes was to take Care of the Tombs, where they were thought to make their Abode, we rank them however in the Class of the infernal Gods, because it was their Business also to take Care of the Ghosts of those whose dead Bodies they watched over in their Burial Places, and Pluto was their Master : This is the very Reason why that God had the Name of Summanus, as much as to say Summus Manium, The Sovereign of the Manes, as we have it in Martinus Capella (a).

The Antients had not a very clear Idea of the Manes, since they gave their Name also to the Shades of

(1) Lec. cit. (2) L. 7.

(a) Manes Corpori humano Præsules attributi sunt, qui sub Plutonis potestate sunt ; qui ideo summanus dicitur, quasi summus Manium.

of the Dead : They were often confounded with the Lares, sometimes with the Lemures.

What Mythology teaches us of more Certainty about them, is, that the Gods Manes were Genii appointed to take Care of Burying-Places, and of the Ghosts that were thought to wander about their Tombs.

Some Antients give the Goddess Mania for the Mother of the Manes ; but their true Original is to be referred to a prevailing Opinion that the World was full of Genii, as has been said in the first Volume (1) ; that there were of them both for the Living and the Dead ; that the one were good and the other bad, and that the former were called Familiar Lares, and the latter Lemures, or Larvæ. Thus when Virgil says, Quisque suos patimur Manes, 'tis, according to Servius, as if he had said, We have each of us our Genius (2).

A Passage in Apuleius, with respect to the Demon of Socrates, explains this whole Mythology. “ The “ Genius, says he, is the Soul of Man disengaged “ and set at Liberty from the Bonds whereby it is “ united to the Body. I find in the antient Latin Lan- “ guage it was named at that Time Lemur. Of these “ Lemures, they whose Province it is to take Care of “ those who inhabit the Houses where they themselves “ had dwelt, who are gentle and peaceful, are called fa- “ miliar Lares. Those on the contrary, who for the “ Punishment of their bad Lives, have no fixed Re“ sidence, but are condemned to wander up and down, “ raising panic Terrors in the Good, whom they “ seek to disturb, and inflicting real Evils upon the “ Wicked, are named Larvæ ; and both the one and “ the other, whether Lares or Larvæ, go under the “ Name of Dii Manes, and the Designation of Gods “ is added to them by way of Honour : Honoris
“ gratia Dei vocabulum additum est.”

I know not what Virtue was in the Noise and clashing of Brass and Iron ; but Lucian and Agatharcides, cited by Photius, assure us (3), that it was so insupportable to the Manes, that it put them to Flight.

Thus

(1) B. 4. (2) En. 6. (3) Phil. Pseud.

Thus it was also as to the Ghosts that were in the infernal Regions ; accordingly Circe, in Homer (1), recommends to Ulysses, when he has offered a Sacrifice to the Gods who preside there, and poured out the Blood of the Victims into a Ditch, to take his Sword in his Hand to keep off the Ghosts who would come to suck up the Blood, which they exceedingly thirsted after. Virgil, who always copies the Greek Poet, says in like Manner, that Æneas, upon his Arrival in Hell, took his Sword to defend himself against the same Ghosts who were fluttering about him. But it seems he was going to fall on them in good Earnest, and had a Mind to try a fencing Bout, when the Sibyl let him know that his Thrusts would be useless, because they were nothing but vain Phantoms, on whom Steel could make no Impression (a).

But, not to insist on this, Fear, at least as much as Esteem, made People have an extreme Veneration for these Gods, and they never failed to recommend to them the Dead : Hence the usual Form which we find upon the antient Tombs, D. M. Diis Manibus. Hence also those frequent Libations that were performed there, the Object whereof was not only the Ghosts of the Dead, but also the Gods Manes, by whom they were guarded. The Augurs likewise honoured those Gods with a particular Worship, and never failed to invoke them, because they took them to be the Authors of whatever Good and Evil befel us (b).

C H A P. XVII.

Of the Divinities of the Night, Sleep, and Death.

WE take also into the Number of the infernal Gods, Night, Sleep, and Death.

Night, according to Hesiod (2), was Daughter of Chaos ; and since they made a Divinity of her, they could

(1) Odyss. l. 11.

(a) Et, ni docta comes tenues sine corpore vitas, &c. Æn. l. 6. 292.

(b) As they derived the Name Manes from Manare, they accordingly believed that Good and Evil proceeded from these Gods, Manabant.

(2) Theog.

could not but reckon her the first and eldest of all, since 'tis so far true that Darkness preceded Light, and in the Beginning overspread the Face of the Deep: Et tenebræ erant super faciem abyssi (1). Accordingly, the Author who goes under Orpheus's Name, says she was the Mother of the Gods and Men. The Poets, who came after those now cited, have rivaled one another in painting this Divinity. Theocritus makes her appear mounted upon a Chariot, preceded by the Stars of the Firmament. Others give her Wings, to figure the Rapidity of her Course; but he who has given the most ingenious Description of her is Euripides, who represents this Goddess muffled up in a large black Vail bespangled with Stars, in her Chariot coursing the vast Circuit of the Heavens; and this Manner of figuring her has been followed by the Painters and Statuaries. Sometimes, however, we find her without her Chariot, with her Veil spangled with Stars fluttering in the Wind, while she approaches the Earth, to extinguish the Torch which she has in her Hand, as is to be seen in a fine Draught taken from a Manuscript in the King's Library, which Montfaucon has given in his Paleography; which proves that this Manner of painting Night was practised down to the Middle Age, and was still in use in the tenth Century.

As Night was only a physical Divinity, or, to speak more justly, was a Nonentity, since Darkness is but the bare Privation of Light, the Poets gave her Children of the same Kind, whom she was said to have had by Erebus (2); namely, Fear, Sorrow, Envy, Labour, Destiny, Old-age, Love, Death, Darkness, Misery, the Parcæ, the Hesperides, Dreams, or Sleep itself. We may add, before we close this Article, that the Antients confounded Night with Diana, in so far as she represented the Moon, and painted both of them in the same Manner; or, which comes to the same, with the God Lunus, who, according to Spartian (3), was worshipped at Carræ, a City of Mesopotamia, whither the Emperor Caracalla undertook an Expedition in order

VOL. III.

H

(1) Gen. 1. v. 2. (2) Cic. 1 3. de Nat. Deor. (3) In Comm.

order to worship that God. Mr. Maffei has given a Print of Lunus's Statue, where he is represented with the Phrygian Bonnet arched before ; and we find him upon Medals standing in a military Habit, with a Pike in his Right-hand, and in his Left a Victory, with a Cock at his Feet, whose crowing by Night intimates the returning of the Dawn.

Noctulius again was another God of the Night ; but he is known only from an Inscription found at Brest, upon a Statue which represents that God under the Figure of a young Man habited much like Atys, extinguishing his Torch, and having at his Feet an Owl, a Bird of the Night.

We say nothing here of the Moon, the principal Goddess of the Night, having said enough of her in the Article of Diana, who, in some Respects, was the Moon itself.

Of Sleep, and his Children.*

I shall begin this Article with a proper Remark. The Invocations made to Sleep might have, and actually had, two quite different Senses. When he was invoked for the Dead, as we see in the Forms that sometimes occur upon the Tombs of the Antients, such as this, Æternali Somno, and the like, the Sleep of Death was meant ; but on all other Occasions, Sleep taken in its natural Signification, whom they addressed, in order to enjoy that peaceful undisturbed Repose which he bestows.

Sleep, according to Hesiod (1), was the Son of Night, and Brother of Death. Homer speaking of this God, says (2), This is Sleep, who is said to be the Brother of Death. Virgil, who never loses Sight of his Original, says the same Thing, & consanguineus Lethi sopor. And sure they could never have given him a more apposite Title, since he is the very Image of Death. The Author of a Hymn, which passes under Orpheus's Name, calls Sleep the King of Gods and Men, and of every Thing that breathes upon the Earth. The Lacedemonians, * Called by the Greeks ὕπνος.

(1) Theogon. (2) Il. l. 14.

nians, as we are told by Pausanias, relying upon Homer's Authority, joined in their Temples the Representation of Sleep with that of Death. “ We see, “ says that Author (1), upon one of the Faces of “ Cypselus's Chest, a Woman bearing two Children “ in her Arms, the one white, and the other black ; “ the one asleep, and the other seeming to sleep ; and “ both of them with their Feet misshapen. The In- “ scription makes them known ; but, abstracting “ from the Inscription, who can doubt but that the “ one of these Children is Sleep, and the other Death, “ and the Woman who holds them, Night ? ”

What Pausanias says, lets us know that Sleep was represented as an Infant ; and this is undeniably proved by a fine Marble of an excellent Taste, which we have now extant. 'Tis a Child buried in profound Sleep, with some Poppies in his Hand, and reclining his Head. Near him is a great Vase, full, no doubt, of some narcotick or soporiferous Liquor. The same Author (2) speaks of a Statue that was in a Temple of Æsculapius, which had only the Head ; but as he seldom remembers what he has said, or what he has to say, he does not let us know whether it was the Head of a Child, or that of a Man. As we have another Statue of Sleep under the Figure of a winged Infant, 'tis probable that this was the only Manner of representing this God.

Philostratus, in the Picture of Amphiaraus, paints Sleep under the Figure of a Man cloathed in a black Robe, and another white one above, with a drowsy downcast Eye, and in one Hand holding the Horn, thro' which he sends true Dreams ; where it is proper to remark, that the Antients distinguished two Sorts of Dreams ; the true ones ; that is, those which exhibited Things real ; and false Dreams, which were mere Illusions. The former were contained in an ordinary Horn, the second in an Ivory one : Hence the two Gates of Sleep mentioned by Homer and Virgil (a).

H 2

The

(1) In Eliac. c. 18. (2) In Corinth.

(a) Sunt geminae somni portæ, &c. Æn. l. 6.

The Poets make frequent Mention of Poppies which this God holds in his Horn, and which he sheds upon weary Mortals. Ovid is fuller than any other upon the Article of Sleep; 'tis in the Place where he says (1), that Juno, tired with the fruitless Vows which Alcyone was incessantly putting up to her for her Husband, who had perished in Shipwreck, sends Iris to the Palace of Sleep, to order him to inform that unhappy fond Spouse of her Husband's Death. Nothing is more elegant than the Description the Poet gives of the Palace of this God, and of the Dreams that surround him; but I refer to the Author himself, whom we would be obliged to copy Word for Word, if we would lose nothing of so charming a Description.

Dreams passed for the Children of Sleep; the Poet now quoted, names three of them; Morpheus, who excelled most in assuming the Gate, the Mien, the Air, and tone of Voice of those whom he is to represent; and this Dream is only for Men: Phobetor, the second, assumes the Similitude of wild Beasts, Birds, and Serpents. The third, called Phantasia, transforms himself into Earth, into Rock, River, and every inanimate Thing; but these three Dreams were delegated only to the Palaces of Kings and great Ones: There were Numbers of others for the Populace. Further, these three Names agree to what the Poet says of the three Dreams; the first signifying Form and Shape, which that Dream imitated; the second has much the same Signification; and the third is derived from Phantoms which are formed in the Imagination.

Homer places the Mansion of Sleep in the Island of Lemnos, and there it is accordingly that Juno comes in quest of the drowsy God to lull Jupiter asleep. The other Poets, among whom is Ovid (2), fix the Residence of this God in the Country of the Cimmerians, as nothing agrees better to Sleep than a Country overspread with eternal Darkness. Virgil makes (3) the Habitation of Sleep and Dreams to be in an old Ash-tree, that grew at the Mouth of Hell.

In

(1) Met. l. 11. (2) Loc. cit. (3) Æn. l. 6.

In fine, the Greeks acknowledged a Goddess of Sleep called Brizo, a Name importing to sleep; and another which they termed Brimo.

Of DEATH.

As we have observed from Homer that Sleep was the Brother of Death, which is itself the deep eternal Sleep, we shall add here a Word or two upon that Divinity; for the Greeks reckoned Death among their Gods. Their Poets, as well as the Latins, and Virgil among others (1), gives him that Title. We know nothing about the Worship that was paid him; we only learn, that the Lacedemonians honoured him as a Divinity, and had, as Pausanius tells us (2), one of his Statues near that of his Brother Sleep. We have just now given a Description from that Author of the Statue of Night, bearing in her Arms her two Sons, Death and Sleep.

Nænia, the Goddess of Funerals, had a Worship better established, and History makes mention of a Chapel which she had at Rome, without the Walls of the City. It was especially at the Funerals of old Men, if we may believe Varro, whose Testimony is quoted by St. Augustine (3), that double Honours were paid to this Goddess; and from the same Divinity were derived the Names of those mournful Ditties that were sung at Funerals. This Goddess, in short, who is little known but from Arnobius, the only Antient, of those whose Writings are extant, that speaks of her, was never employed but in the Agonies of the Patient. Then it was they began to invoke her.

Such are the Gods who are said by Mythologists to preside over the infernal Regions. Of the same Number they reckon Jupiter Stygius and Juno Stygia; but I have proved elsewhere, that in this Acceptation they were the same with Pluto and Proserpine. Eiber and Hecate, who, at Bottom, are no other than the Sun and Moon, when upon their Descent to the lower Hemisphere, they went, according to popular Belief, to enlighten the Kingdom of Ghosts; also Mercury; but

H 3

this

(1) Æn. l. 2. (2) In Lacon. (3) De Civ. Dei. l. 5.

this God only conducted the Souls thither, then returned to Heaven his ordinary Mansion.

Lastly, to omit nothing of Importance upon this Subject, it remains that I speak of the Worship that was paid to the infernal Gods, and of those signal Offenders, who were believed to be condemned to dwell eternally in Tartarus.

C H A P. XVIII.

Of the Worship paid to the Infernal Gods.

BESIDES what I have said in the preceding Chapters of the Worship and Honours that were paid to each of the Infernal Gods, I shall here add a few Remarks that relate to them all in general. The first is, that no Altars were erected to them, these being reserved for the celestial Gods, but only Ditches were made for receiving the Blood of the Victims. Secondly, that those Victims were to be black, to distinguish them from those offered to the celestial Gods. Thirdly, that the Priests in their Sacrifices only had their Heads covered. Fourthly, that when Sacrifice was offered to the Infernal Gods, the Priest, in reciting the Prayers prescribed by the Ritual, kissed his Hand, and turned it towards the Earth, whereas he had it lifted up when he addressed those Prayers to the Gods of Heaven, and with his Hand touched the Earth itself when he sacrificed to her. Hence, in the fifth Place, the Distinction of Gods, into superior Gods, Superi, and inferior Gods, so noted among the Antients to point out those of Heaven and those of Hell. It was even a received Axiom, that the living were above, Superi, with respect to the Dead; as those of Heaven are in Relation to Men, which Macrobius thus expresses (1): Sicut Dii nobis, ita nos defunctis Superi habemur.

A sixth Remark is, that Pluto, and all the other Infernal Gods, were generally hated, as we read in Homer (2); the Reason whereof was, that those Gods passed for inflexible, inflexible, and were so little moved by the Prayers of Men, that they hardly deigned to lend an Ear to them. Euripides adds, that this was the very Reason why neither Temples nor Altars were erected to them, nor any Hymns composed to their Honour. The same Gods were accounted so ferocious and unsocial, that they always lived by themselves, and had but very little Commerce with others, as we are told by the same Poet (1). Not but that some Worship was paid them; but besides their being rarely addressed, it was not to ask Favours of them, as of the other Gods, but only with a View to appease them, and prevent their doing Mischief; tho', at the same Time, the Votary had no great Prospect of Success.

(1) Somn. Scip. l. i. c. 3. (2) Il. l. 9. v. 158.

A last Remark is, that the Infernal Gods were so many Sovereigns in their gloomy Region, as those of Heaven were in theirs, and the latter, tho' more honoured, had not, however, any Jurisdiction over the former; the Division once made, the three Brothers became absolutely independent of one another. When Juno brought Æolus to raise that Storm which did so much Damage to Æneas's Fleet (2), Neptune gave him roundly to understand that he was Master.

C H A P. XIX.

The History of those whom the Poets have placed in Tartarus.

The GIANTS and the Titans.

WE may easily judge in the first Place, that they would not fail to lodge there the Giants and Titans, for having declared War upon the Gods. The very History of the Titans, which we have given from Euhemerus and other Antients, sets forth, that Jupiter, after their Defeat, had imprisoned some of them under Mount Etna, which was reckoned one of the Vents of Hell, others in Tartarus itself. There accordingly was confined Egean, Parphyrion, and the rest; but of them we have said enough in the History of the Gods.

H 4

The

(1) Hecuba. (2) Æn. l. 1.

The same Poets represent in these doleful Mansions, several other Personages, famous in fabulous History.

S I S Y P H U S.

Among the illustrious Wretches that were lodged in Tartarus was Sisyphus, condemned to roll up a huge Rock to the Top of a Mountain, whence it quickly came tumbling down again by its own Weight ; and this sad and painful Task left him not a Moment's Repose. The Name of this Prince is very famous in the ancient History of Greece. Illustrious by Birth, he derived his Origin from Eolus, being descended from him in a right Line. After the Retreat, or if you please, the Flight of Medea, who from the Return of the Argonauts, had reigned ten Years at Corinth (1), Sisyphus ascended the Throne, to whom she had destined it, and who had a Title to it by Birth-right ; and if we reckon the two Years that intervened between Jason's Return to Colchos, whither he carried Medea, before they were obliged to retire to Corinth, it will be about twelve Years after the Conquest of the Golden Fleece, that Sisyphus began to reign. Now, as we know the Date of the Expedition of the Argonauts (2), we can consequently determine that of the Reign of this Prince ; that is to say, he reigned twenty-four or twenty-five Years before the War of Troy ; how many Years his Reign lasted we cannot say, but we know he lived to a very great Age.

Ennelus (3), an ancient Poet, who had wrote the History of Corinth, after having said that Sisyphus mounted the Throne in room of Medea, gave the Series of that Prince's Descendants, down to the Conquest of Corinth by the Heracleidae, and that Genealogy began with Ornytion, the youngest of Sisyphus's Children, and was carried down to Doridas and Hyathincidas, who were the two last, and who reign'd at Corinth at the Time of the Return of the Heracleidae into the Peloponnesus, that is, 80 Years after the taking of Troy.

(1) Apoll. l. 1. (2) See that History in Vol. vi. (3) Pausan. in Corinth.

Troy. To Pausanias we are indebted for this Fragment of Eumelus's History : In the mean time, Paulmier de Grant-Menil is persuaded, that the Poet whose Sentiment is delivered by Pausanias, is mistaken in making Sisyphus contemporary with Jason. Sisyphus, says he, who reigned at Corinth, was the Son of Eolus, and Brother of Cretheus, Jason's Grand-father, and consequently older than that Prince. This learned Critic relies upon Euripides's Medea, wherein it appears that Sisyphus was dead when Jason came to Corinth, since Creon was then reigning there. But may we not say, in order to reconcile those two Opinions, that there were two Sisyphus's, the one Eolus's Son, and the other his Descendant ; that the former had no Successor of his Family, and that Medea, when she quitted the Throne of Corinth, had raised to it Sisyphus II. to whom it belonged ? For in short the Genealogy of Sisyphus given by Eumelus, appears to be very consistent ; and it is no rare Thing, especially in those ancient Times, for two Princes of the same Name to be confounded together ; and when the Heirs of the first have not reigned, yet the Crown has afterwards returned to his Family. But what clearly proves my Assertion, Pausanias, who in his Travels to Corinth had spoke of Sisyphus, who was contemporary with Jason and Medea, makes mention of another who was Brother-german to Athamas, who, after the fatal Death of his Children, adopted his Grand-nephews, Coronus and Haliartus, the Sons of Thersander, and Grandsons to Sisyphus. Now Athamas, the Father of Phryxus, who had retired into Colchis, lived before the Expedition of the Argonauts, who took Arms only to recover his Succession.

Sisyphus, I said, lived to great Age, and upon this Article the Antients broached two Fables. According to Pherecides, who published the first, this Prince was said to have chained up Death, whom he confined till Mars delivered him at the Request of Pluto, whose Kingdom was become desolate, by Reason of Men's not dying as usual. The second intimated, that Sisyphus Sisyphus had actually died young, but had obtained Permission from the Gods of Hell to return to the World, to go and punish his Wife for having too well obeyed him (a); but that having once repassed the Cocytus, he had no Mind to return into the infernal Regions.

These two Fictions, no doubt, intimate to us obscurely, that Sisyphus recovered from some Sickneſs that was thought to be mortal, and that having recovered his Health after he was believed to be dead, he lived thereafter to an extreme old age. It was for that Reason, they tell us, that Pluto condemned him inceſſantly to roll that enormous Rock which I have mentioned at the Beginning of this Article; as if they had a mind thereby to let us know, that no Efforts of Man can avail to ſtop the rapid Career of the Days that are allotted to him, nor retard the fatal Period preſcribed to human Life: Or rather, to leave us the Emblem of an ambitious Prince, who had long revolved in his Mind Schemes that were never put in Execution.

Pausanias, however, aſſigns another Cauſe of this Prince's Punishment, and ſays, that he ſuffers in Hell for having let Aſopus know the Place where Jupiter had hid Egina, of whom that God was enamoured.

Sisyphus, we are told, was a Man of great Cunning and (a) Sisyphus, according to the Fable, returns from Hell. Thus the Story is related by Noël le Comte, after Demetrius upon Pindar's Olympiads. “ Others maintain that Sisyphus was condemned to roll

“ his Stone in Hell, for having perfidiously cheated the ſubterra“ nean Demons, telling us that after Death he went down to the “ infernal Regions, and there played one of his Tricks upon Plu-
“ to: Being at the Point of Death, he commanded his Wife to “ throw out his Body into the publick Place without Burial; which “ ſhe having done, he aſk'd Leave of Pluto to go and chaſtiſe his “ Wife, who had ſhewed ſo little Regard to him, promiſing to re“ turn ſoon. But having obtained his Requeſt upon this Condition, “ ſo ſoon as he had breathed the Air of this World he was reſolved “ to return no more to the other, till Mercury graſping him by the “ Throat, brought him back thither, putting in Execution the “ ſaid Decree of the Gods againſt him. Others again will have it,
“ that it was for offering Violence to his Niece Tyrro.” Trad. de Jean de Mont-Ljard.

and Policy. He married Anticlea, Daughter of Autolychus, by whom he had a Daughter of the same Name, who was married to Laertes, Ulysses's Father. Autolychus, who thought himself at least as crafty as Sisyphus, stole some of his Oxen, and having mixed them with his own, hoped thereby to conceal his Theft ; but Sisyphus, who had mark'd all his Oxen under the Foot, had no Difficulty to know them again. This Artifice struck Autolychus, who having conceived a high Opinion of Sisyphus, gave him his Daughter in Marriage.

Pausanias (1) relates another Passage of Sisyphus's Life, which I ought not to omit ; from it we learn his Piety to Melicerta. That Author, speaking of the Confines of Cremion, where Theseus had defeated a Robber surnamed Pytocampes, says there was hard by an Altar to Melicerta : For it was asserted that a Dolphin had taken him out of the Sea when he was drown'd, and had brought him to that Place. Sisyphus finding him exposed upon the Shore, had him interred, and instituted in his Honour the Isthmian Games. It was in the same Isthmus of Corinth, as we are told by the same Author, that Sisyphus himself was interred ; but his Monument was known but to few Persons.

T I T Y U S.

Homer in two Places of his Odyssey (2) makes mention of Tityus : The first is, where Alcinous tells Ulysses that Rhadamanthus had once gone to the Island of Eubæa, with a Design to see there Tityus : The second is, where speaking of the Ghosts which Ulysses found in Hell, he makes him say :

*There Tityus large and long, in Fetters bound, O'erspreads nine Acres of infernal Ground ;
Two rav'nous Vultures, furious for their Food,
Scream o'er the Fiend, and riot in his Blood,
Incessant gore the Liver in his Breast,
Th' immortal Liver grows, and gives th' immortal Feast.
For as o'er Panope's enamel'd Plains
Latona journey'd to the Pythian Fanes,*

With

(1) In Corinth. (2) L. 7. & l. 11.

*With haughty Love th'audacious Monster strove,
To force the Goddess, and to rival Jove.*

POPE'S Odys. B. 11. v. 709.

Strabo accordingly alledges, that this Tityus was a Tyrant of Panope, a Town in Phocis, not far from Delphos, who for his Oppressions drew upon himself the Indignation of the People, and was equally odious to Gods and Men.

The Fables which Antiquity published in relation to him are easy to be explained. The first, which makes him the Son of the Earth, has no other Foundation but the Name of this Tyrant, which imports Earth or Clay; or if you please, it derives its Origin from another Fiction, importing that Jupiter being enamoured of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenos, she had been obliged, in order to evade Juno's Jealousy, to conceal herself in the Bowels of the Earth, where she was delivered of Tityus. The second, importing that he was a Giant whose Body covered nine Acres of Ground, had no other Foundation, as we are told by Pausanias (1), but that the Place of his Burial, which was near Panope, contained precisely a like Quantity of Ground, which Homer, who probably had that Tomb in his Eye, had expressed poetically.

The third is, that Apollo, by his Arrows, had rid the Earth of this Monster, because he had probably died young, or by a violent Death, all violent or untimely Deaths being attributed to that God, as we have had Occasion to notice oftner than once. The fourth and last, that he was incessantly prey'd upon in Hell by two Vultures, is explained by Lucretius (2), when he says that the true Tityus is he whose Heart is consumed by Love, that Passion being commonly accompanied with the most cutting Anxieties and Cares.

We may however suppose, either that Tityus's Tyranny did not last through the whole Course of his Life, but that towards the End of his Reign he repaired the Evils which he had done at the Beginning, or that the Inhabitants of Eubœa had not the same Idea.

(1) In Phoc. (2) De rer. nat. l. 3.

Idea of him with those of Panope, since Strabo (1) says, that in Eubæa was still to be seen in his Time, a Cave named Elara, from the Name of his Mother, and a Chapel where Tityus had a religious Worship paid to him. But does not Strabo, in saying he reigned at Panope, contradict Homer, who makes Rhadamanthus travel to Eubæa, there to see Tityus? Madam Dacier has endeavoured to reconcile this Contradiction, by saying, that Elara being delivered of Tityus, sent him to Eubæa to screen him from the Jealousy of her Rival ; that he was there educated, and that during his Youth Rhadamanthus came to see him ; that Tityus came afterwards to Panope, where he reigned ; and that the Eubæans, who had taken Care of his Education, had consecrated to him the Chapel which we have now mentioned.

P H L E G Y A S.

We find also in Tartarus the unfortunate Phlegyas, who is there under the eternal Apprehension of the Fall of a Rock that hangs over his Head. His Crime was, that he burnt the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, because he believed his Daughter had been debauched by that God (a) ; probably some Priest being in love with her, had assumed the Habit and Equipage of that God. Phlegyas is the Preacher in those sorrowful Mansions, as we are told by Virgil (b),

*There Phlegyas feels unutterable Woe,
And roars incessant thro' the Shades below ;
Be just, ye Mortals ! by these Torments aw'd,
These dreadful Torments, not to scorn a God.*

PITT'S Æn. vi. 860.

An useless Sermon, since it is delivered to those who are

(1) In loc. cit.

(a) Phlegyas autem, Ixionis pater, habuit Coronidem filiam, quam Apollo vitiavit, unde suscepit Æsculapium : quod pater dolens incendit Apollinis Templum, & ejus sagittis est ad inferos trusus.
Servius in l. vi. Æneid.

(b) Phlegyasque miserrimus omnes

Admonet, & magna testatur voce per umbras

Discite justitiam moniti, & non temnere Divos. Æn. l. vi.

are no longer capable to practise such excellent Precepts of Morality.

Statius adds, that poor Pblegyas was pining away for Hunger under the insupportable Load of a hideous Rock. A very painful Situation for a Preacher, and doubtless it will not be easy to justify Virgil for making him cry so loud while he is fasting, and has so enormous a Weight upon his Breast.

As Pausanias, of all the Antients, has enlarged most upon the History of Pblegyas, I shall recite all that he says of him (1). Eteocles having died without Sons, the Descendants of Halmus took Possession of his Dominions, for he had only two Daughters, Chryfogenia and Cbryse. The latter, by an Intrigue with Mars, had a Son called Pblegyas, who afterwards possessed the Throne of his Grandfather by the Mother's Side, and changed the Name of the Country called Andreis into that of Pblegyas, which it has ever since retained. This Prince having built a Town after his own Name, peopled it with a Body of the bravest Men whom he could draw together from all Parts of Greece; and of this Medley was formed an audacious People who pretended to make a separate Community; and thus having made a Separation from the Orchomenians, had no other Aim but to aggrandize themselves upon the Ruin of their Neighbours. They carried their Audaciousness so far as to march against Delphos, and attempt to pillage the Temple of Apollo. Philamman came to the Relief of the Inhabitants of this City with a select Band of Argives; but he and his Men were slain in a Battle which was fought under the Walls of Delphos. This Victory encreased the Courage and Audaciousness of the Pblegaeans; accordingly Homer represents them as a very warlike People. 'Tis in that Place of the Iliad where the Poet speaks of Mars, and Terror, which is the Offspring of that God; he puts the Pblegaeans in the same Rank for Valour. The Fire of Heaven, says Pausanias, Pestilence and continual Earthquakes exterminated that Nation at last.

Those

(1) In Corinth. c. 26. in Beot. c. 36.

Those who saved themselves, passed into Phocis, and were never more heard of.

Phlegyas, adds the same Author (1), made an Expedition to the Peloponnesus, apparently out of Curiosity, but in Effect to spy out the Country in Person, and to see if the Inhabitants were numerous and warlike. For this Prince was the greatest Warrior in his Time; wherever he came he laid waste the Country, and always carried off a great deal of Booty. He had but one Daughter, who having suffered herself to be debauched by a Priest of Apollo, became Mother to Esculapius, as we shall see in the following Book (2).

Phlegyas having died without Sons, Chryses his Nephew, by his Sister-in-Law, succeeded him. The two Fables blended with this History, the one that he was the Son of Mars, the other that he was punished in Tartarus, are easy to be explained. His singular Valour no Doubt made them give him Mars for his Father; and besides they never failed to palm upon some God the Intrigues of Ladies of the Rank of Chryse his Mother: His Enterprize against Delphos is undoubtedly what made him be accounted an Atheist. The Kind of Punishment inflicted upon him, is nothing but a poetical Figure to which probably his ambitious and restless Spirit gave a Handle. However, if we may credit S. Augustin (3), who had picked up several of the antient Traditions of Greece, it was not Phlegyas but Danaus that burnt the Temple of Delphos.

T A N T A L U S.

Tantalus was the Son of Tmolus, King of Lydia in the Lesser Asia. Tzetzes informs us (4) from all the Antients that this was a Prince religious to Extremity, and that he carried Superstition so far as to offer to the Gods human Sacrifices; which made him be looked upon as impious, and induced the Poets to condemn him to the Punishment which we are going to speak of. In

(1) In Corinth. (2) See the History of this God, B. 5.
(3) De Civ. Dei, l. 18. c. 12. (4) Hist. 10. c. 5.

In the mean Time Ovid and Hyginus (a) make him to have incurred this Punishment for revealing the Secrets of the Gods, whose High Priest he was, that is, for disclosing the Myſteries of their Worſhip; a Thing prohibited with the utmoſt Rigour.

Pausanias, in the Deſcription of a Picture of Polygnotes (1), ſpeaks of a ſacrilegious Theft committed by Tantalus, and of an Oath he made, adding, that his Accomplice on that Occaſion was Pandarus. This Theft is a Point of Mythology not much known: And indeed the common Opinion is, that Tantalus ſuffers in Hell for having ſerved up to the Gods the Members of his Son Pelops, as we have already ſaid; but Pindar, and after him Didymus, informs us that this Prince, admitted to the Table of the Gods, ſtole the Nectar and Ambroſia to give away to Mortals. The Scholiaſt on Pindar has followed another Tradition, from what Lucian alledged, that Tantalus had ſtole a Dog which Jupiter had committed to him to guard his Temple in Crete. Jupiter having asked him what was become of the Dog, he answered that he knew nothing of the Matter; and this they will have to be the Theft and the falſe Oath we mentioned.

Pausanias, I ſaid, advanced, that Pandarus had been Tantalus's Accomplice in that Crime, and in his Perjury: Pandarus, according to this Author, was of Miletus, and if we may credit Homer, the Gods took away his Life, perhaps as a Punishment for his Sacrilege. Penelope, in whose Mouth the Poet puts this Piece of Hiſtory, adds, that the Daughters of Pandarus being Orphans, Venus herſelf took Care of their Education, and that the other Goddeſſes heaped Favours upon them; that Juno gave them Wiſdom and Beauty, Diana added the Advantage of Shape and Stature;
Minerva

(a) Quarit aquas in aquis, &c.

- - - - - Hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Jupiter concedere Tantalo ſua conſilia ſolitus erat, & ad epulum Deorum admittere, quæ Tantalus ad homines renunciavit, ob idque dicitur in inferis in aqua media parte corporis ſtare. Hygin. Fab. 82.

(1) In Phoc.

Minerva taught them all Sorts of Works fuitable to Women ; that when they were marriageable, Venus re-ascended Heaven to supplicate Jupiter to grant them a happy Match, and that during this Absence of the Goddess, the Harpies carried off these Princesses, and delivered them to the Furies.

The Sense of this Fable, which I never read but in Homer, is, that these Virgins having lost their Father in their Youth, their Tutors took great Care of their Education, and that they died when they were upon the Point of being married. Thus it is that the most simple Facts have always been transmitted to us under the Mask of Fiction.

As to Tantalus, Ovid tells us, that the Gods having gone to visit that Prince, he had a Mind to try if they knew hidden Things, and thereby to judge of their Divinity ; that for this Effect he served up to them the Body of young Pelops his Son, mixed with other Meat ; that Ceres finding it an excellent Dish, ate up a Shoulder, and that Jupiter, who discovered Tantalus's barbarous Curiosity, had restored the young Prince to Life, giving him an Ivory Shoulder instead of that which had been eaten, and flung Tantalus Headlong to Hell ; where seated, according to Homer, in the Midst of a sumptuous Banquet, he no sooner puts forth his Hand to the Food than it flies from him, and in like Manner the Water when he offers to drink. However, in the Picture by Polygnotus which we have mentioned, this Prince was represented in a dreadful Fright upon Account of a huge Rock that hangs over him, and threatens every Moment to fall.

Pausanias says the Painter had borrowed this Idea from Archilochus's Poems, but that he knows not whether Archilochus was the Inventor thereof, or if he had taken it from some other Poet : In that Case, Tantalus and Phlegyas would have suffered the same Punishment.

'Tis pretty probable that this Fable of Tantalus's being set in the midst of Meat and Drink without being able to taste thereof, is a Consequence of that which makes him offer to the Gods human Sacrifices ; and that the Poets, to create a greater Abhorrence to that barbarous Custom, feigned that he had offered to them his own Son, and spoke of this Sacrifice under the Notion of a Feast ; unless we would choose rather to say with Pindar (1), that what had given Rise to this Fable, is, that Neptune, that is to say, some famous Privateer, having stole away young Pelops, some one or other, in order to make Tantalus odious, published the Fable of this barbarous Repast, and added that Ceres had ate a Shoulder of Pelops, Tantalus having offered human Sacrifices to that Goddess : But I should rather think that an Adventure related by Pausanias (2), had given Rise to the Fable.

As among the other Fatalities of Troy, the City could not be taken by the Greeks, unless they had the Bones of Pelops, they therefore sent to Pisa where he was interred. The Vessel was Shipwrecked in its Return, and some Time after a Peasant found upon the Shore the Shoulder of that Prince, and hid it under the Sand. The Eleans having gone to the Temple of Delphos to consult the Oracle, in order to be delivered from the Plague, the Priestess ordered them to go and dig up the Bones of Pelops : Perhaps in Memory of this Event they made an Ivory Shoulder, which they consecrated to Ceres, and the Pelopidae bore it afterwards upon their Ensigns.

Whatever be in that, to come to something more certain, Tantalus had a long War with Tros the King of Troy, upon Account of the Rape of Ganymede his Son. This War at last obliged Pelops, after the Death of his Father Tantalus, to leave Phrygia and repair to Oenomaus whose Daughter he married ; but of him we shall speak at more length in the History of the Heroes. Tantalus lived about a hundred and thirty Years before the taking of Troy, as will be easily seen when we come to speak of the Succession of Kings of that City, from Tros to Priam. We shall continue our

(1) Olymp. (2) In Eliac.

our History and give a short Account of the Danaids and their Punishment.

The DANAIDS.

What may have given Occasion to the Punishment of the Danaids, according to Diodorus, was that Custom among the Priests of Achas, of pouring Water into a Cask full of Holes, whence Orpheus took the Hint of destining the same Punishment to the Danaids who had cut their Husbands Throats. Every body knows that Danaus, upon his Departure from Egypt with his Daughters(1), because the Oracle had foretold him that he was to be killed by one of his Sons-in-Law, retired into Greece, where he was chosen King of Argos; that the Sons of Egyptus his Brother went in quest of him, and married their Cousins; that Danaus obliged his Daughters to put their Husbands to Death, and that Hypermnestra alone saved her Husband. Danaus, as we are told by Pausanias, arraigned his Daughter Hypermnestra, in order to be condemned for her Disobedience, but the People declared her innocent; and she caused a Temple to be built in Argos itself to the Goddess Pitbo, i. e. Of Persuasion. The same Author says there was still to be seen in that City the Judgment-Hall where that Cause was tried, as well as the Tomb of that Princess and her Husband. I shall have Occasion to take Notice afterwards in what Manner Lyncæus succeeded his Brother-in-Law Danaus, and how he put him to Death.

By Way of Punishment of those Princesses, who had embrued their Hands in the Blood of their own Husbands; they were supposed to suffer in the Manner already mentioned; this is the received Opinion. In the mean Time Eusebius and some others (a); reckon what had given Rise to this Fiction, was; that they had laboured in digging Wells in Argos; where some

I 2

of

(1) See Apollod. Pauf. &c.

(a) Eusebius, Chron. l. i. says: Danaus fecit abundare aquis agros; and the Greek which is not translated by St. Jerom, adds, Ope Danaidarum. The Egyptians were skilled in the Art of conveying Water by Means of Pumps and Canals: this was the only Way of fructifying their Lands.

of them had been continually employed in drawing Water by Pumps, which is a very painful Exercise, which made those who were condemned to that Labour take Occasion to say, that the Gods, to punish those Princesses, had condemned them in Hell to fill a Vessel full of Holes.

The Tomb of those Sons of Egyptus was at Argos, according to Pausanias (1), upon the Highway that led to the Citadel. And indeed, says he, thither were their Heads carried and interred; but their Bodies remained at Lerna, where they had been slain. The Wives of those young Men, continues he, after having slain their Husbands, cut off their Heads and carried them to Danaus their Father, as a Proof at once of their Obedience and of their Obduracy. This Author, who found in Argolis many Monuments of this History, says in the 25th Chapter, speaking of the City Lyncea, there it was that Lyncæus retired, when he alone of all the fifty Brothers had escaped the Fate that threatened them all, and that from thence he had given Hypermnestra a Signal with a lighted Torch; for he had agreed with her, that so soon as he found himself secure from the Ambuscades of Danaus, he would give her Notice of it from the Top of the Citadel of Larissa, if he thought she would be quite out of Danger. In Memory of this Event the Argives celebrated every Year a Festival which they called the Feast of Torches.

I have observed in the Beginning of this Article that Diodorus says, the Priests of Achas had a Custom of drawing Water in a Vessel full of Holes: This Author assigns not the Reason of it; but I have read somewhere that it was in order to refine and purify the Water of the Nile, to be employed afterwards in Sacrifice.

The two A L O I D E S.

In fine, that I may omit nothing that relates to those noted Offenders who were doomed to Tartarus, I shall first give the Fable of the Aloides, as we have it in Apollodorus,

(1) Loc. cit. c. 24.

Apollodorus (1), then shall subjoin their History. Iphimedia, the Daughter of Triopas, having married Aloeus, fell in Love with Neptune (this was some Sea Captain) and having had frequent Interviews with her Gallant upon the Shore, she at last proved with Child, and brought him two Sons Ephialtes and Otus. These young Princes growing every Year a Cubit in Breadth, and a Yard in Height, became so insolent from seeing themselves at the Age of nine Years as big and strong as the most famous Giants, that they thought none could be an Over-match for them : Thus they attempted to dethrone Jupiter himself, and in order to make an irresistible Assault upon him they piled Mount Pelion and Ossa above Olympus. Thence those presumptuous Giants menacing the Sovereign of the Gods, had the Insolence to demand of him Juno and Diana ; and Mars offering to oppose their Enterprize, took him Prisoner and clapped him in Chains, from whence he was released by Mercury. At length, the Gods finding their Power useless against such terrible Enemies, were obliged to have Recourse to Artifice ; Diana having perceived them in a Chariot, transformed herself into a Hind, and run in directly between them. As they were going to draw their Arrows they wounded each other, and by their Death delivered the Gods from the Terror they had been under : Jupiter threw them down into the Depth of Tartarus.

Homer and Pindar say they were slain by Apollo at Naxos above Paros, and Pausanias adds (2), that their Tomb was at Anthedon in Beotia, a City upon the Banks of the Euripus.

Some hold that Ephialtes and Otus were the first who sacrificed to the Muses upon Mount Helicon, and consecrated to them that Mountain. 'Tis likewise thought that Asera was built by them. This is what we learn from Hegefinous in his Poem upon Attica, when he says, that Neptune having won the good Graces of the beautiful Asera, had by her a Son named Oecclus ; who in Concert with the Sons of Alocus built the City Afera at the Foot of the humid heliconian Mount. Nothing remarkable of the City Afera remains but a single Tower.

The Sons of Aloeus instituted the Worship of three Muses only, and the Names they gave them were Melete, Mneme, and Aæde, that is, Meditation, Memory, and Song; whence 'tis easy to judge that these Sons of Aloeus, by giving those Names to the Muses, did only personify the three Things which are subservient to the Composition of a Poem.

After the following Manner is the Adventure of those two Giants with Mars related by Homer (1).

*The mighty Mars in mortal Fetters bound,
And lodg'd in brazen Dungeons under Ground,
Full thirteen Moons imprison'd roar'd in vain;
Otus and Ephialtes held the Chain:
Perhaps had perish'd; had not Hermes' Care
Restor'd the groaning God to upper Air.*

Pope's Iliad VI. 475.

F. Hardouin (2), after his usual Way, gives a very odd Explication of this Fable. Two Princes, says he, had made a Truce. They had put up their Arms on both Sides in a good Arsenal, for the Space of a Year or more. A Declaration of War which followed, stirred up Mercury, that is the Love of Spoil, and set Mars at Liberty, or War which had only been suspended for thirteen Months; but had it not been for Eribæus and Mercury, Mars had perhaps perished, that is, the War had been entirely extinguish'd. For my own Part, without having Recourse to such Refinement, I would explain it that these two Princes having taken some famous Warrior Prisoner, kept him confined thirteen Months; at the End of which Mercury, that is, some able Trader, at the Solicitation of Eribæus, procured his Deliverance. This brazen Prison which Homer speaks of, or that Cask of the same Metal, where, according to Arnobius, his Enemies kept him shut up, means no more but that he was close confined in a strong strong and inaccessible Prison. Diodorus Siculus adds to this History, that Butes the Son of Boreas King of Thrace, having become delirious for offering to carry off the Bacchanals who were celebrating the Orgies, threw himself into a Well where he was drowned. This Event which was construed as a Punishment inflicted upon him by Bacchus for that Impiety, did not hinder his Soldiers from seizing the other Bacchanals, of whom the most considerable were Iphimedia, the Wife of Aloeus, and her Daughter Pancratis; and they returned into Strongylos with their Spoil. There they chose for their King in Butes's Stead, Agassamenus, whom they got to marry the fair Pancratis, Aloeus's Daughter. Before this Election two of the principal Thracians, named Sicelus and Ecetor, had already killed one another in contending for that Princess. As for Iphimedia, Agassamenus, or Agassamedus, gave her in Marriage to one of his Friends whom he had named his Lieutenant. In the mean Time Aloeus had sent his two Sons, Otus and Ephialtes, in quest of his Wife and his Daughter. These Princes having made a Descent upon Strongylos, vanquished the Thracians and took their City. Pancratis died some Time after; Otus and Ephialtes endeavoured to settle in that Island, and even to make themselves Masters of it, which they accordingly brought about, and changed the Name of Strongylos into that of Dia (1). After this the two Brothers having made War upon one another, and lost many Men, perished in it themselves, and after their Death received the Name and Honours of Heroes. The Thracians, for the Space of more than two hundred Years, were in Possession of that Island, when a great Famine made them quit it (a).

(1) Il. 5. (2) Apolog. d'Hom. p. 198.

I 4

We

(1) Sacred Island.

(a) I spoke before at considerable Length of the two Aloides in the History of the Giants, Book I. But as I had omitted several Particulars pretty curious, I thought fit to resume that History, and I hope I shall be forgiven this Representation as well as some others which 'tis impossible to avoid in a Work of this Nature, however great Precaution be used.

We find also in Tartarus, Oedipus, Etheocles, Polynices, Ixion, Theseus, Porphyryon, and some others, whose Crimes are well enough known ; but we shall have a more natural Occasion to speak of them in the sixth Volume.

B O O K V.

Of some other Gods adored by the Greeks and Romans.

BESIDES the Gods discoursed of in the preceding Books, the Greeks and Romans owned a great many others, whom they placed in none of the four Classes to which I have reduced the others (a). Cicero (1), after he has discoursed of the natural Gods, such as Heaven, the Earth, the Stars, &c. adds, “ Besides those there are many others who have been “ deified by the Sages of Greece and by our An“ cestors, from a Persuasion that whatever is of great “ Benefit to Mankind, is derived to them from divine “ Goodness.—— They also made a nominal God of “ any Thing of singular Virtue ; for Example Faith, “ Intelligence. These Scaurus placed not long ago in “ the Capitol among the Divinities. Faith had been “ put there before by Calatinus. You have before “ your Eyes the Temple of Virtue, and that of Honour, “ rebuilt by Marcellus, raised at first by Fabius. Shall “ I mention the Temples dedicated to Help, to Safety, “ Liberty, Concord, Victory, all which are deified, be“ cause their Natures can only be inherent in a Di“ vine

(a) The Mythologists call these Gods Axonoi, out of the Zones, that is, to speak more clearly, out of the Classes into which they ranged the others.

(1) De Nat. Deor. l. 1.

“vine Power? This in like Manner is what made “them consecrate the Names of Cupid, Pleasure,
 “Venus, &c.”

This learned Author is far from naming all the Gods of this Kind, as we shall see in the Sequel. After having fully examined their Natures, I think they may be reduced to five or six Heads. I mean to the Virtues, the Affections, and Passions of the Soul, to the Vices, the principal Actions of Life, as Marriage, Health, Diseases, Repasts, Joy; for they had Gods for eating, drinking, sleeping, &c. Let us begin with what was most rational in Paganism, I mean the Virtues which they deified.

C H A P. I.

Of some Beings, and particularly of the Virtues that were raised to Divinities.

F E L I C I T Y.

SAINTE Augustine (1) is justly surprized, that the Romans, who had introduced a great many Gods unknown to other Nations, should have been so late of taking Felicity into the Number: “For, in short, “says that learned Father of the Church, if the “Books and Ceremonies of the Pagans are true, and “Felicity be a Goddess, why did they not adore her “alone, since she was capable of bestowing all, and “making Men quickly happy? What is the Amount “of all our Desires but Prosperity? Why then were “they so long of building a Temple to her? Why “did not Romulus especially, who was desirous to “found a happy City, consecrate one to her, and “abandon for her alone the Worship of all the other “Gods, since with her nothing could fail him? Where“as, without the Favour of that Goddess, he could “never have been first made King, and then a God.
 “Why then did Romulus give the Romans for Gods, “Janus, Jupiter, Mars, Picus, Faunus, Tyberinus, Her- “cules? Why did T. Tatius add Saturn, Ops, the “Sun,

(1) De Civ. Dei, l. 4. c. 23.

“ Sun, the Moon, Vulcan, the Light, and a World of “ others, even the Goddess Cloacina, at the same Time “ that he shewed no Regard to Felicity? Why did “ Numa introduce so many Gods and Goddesses, “ without taking her into the Number? What if the “ Reason was that he could not single her out among “ such a Multitude of Divinities? Had Tullus Hostili- “ us known and adored her, he had never consecrated “ Fear and Paleness, since both of them disappeared
 “ at the Sight of Felicity.”

All the other Gods, continues he, would have yielded to Felicity, even Jupiter himself, since it was she who made him happy, by raising him to the Throne. But, adds that holy Doctor, civil Wars never happened till the Romans acknowledged that Goddess. Was it, says he, that she was offended at them; because, instead of giving her a Place among the great Gods, the Gods of Council, and of building to her the most magnificent Temple, such as might have eclipsed that of all the rest, they placed her by the Side of a Priapus, a Cloacina, &c. From this Passage it appears, that it was very late before the Romans raised Felicity to the Rank of their Divinities. It was actually above six hundred Years after the building of Rome, that Lucullus, upon his Return from the War with Mitbridates and Tigrenes, built a Temple to her. Pliny adds (1), that this General enjoined the Statuary Archefilaus to make the Statue of that Goddess, but that they both died before the Work was finished. Lepidus, General of the Cavalry, had also, according to Dion (2), dedicated a Temple to that Goddess; and this is almost all that we know about her. The Greeks likewise honoured the same Goddess under the Name of Eudaimonia and Macaria. An Oracle having informed the Athenians that they should win the Victory, if one of Hercules's Children would submit to a voluntary Death, Macaria, one of his Daughters, killed herself; the Athenians were victorious, and worshipped her who had so generously devoted herself for them, them; under the Name of Felicity, as her Name imports. But it does not appear that this Atbenian Divinity has any Relation to her whom the Romans adored under the same Name.

(1) L. 35. c. 12. (2) L. 44.

But, be that as it will, Felicity is often represented upon the Roman Medals, either under the Figure of a Woman holding in her Hand the Cornucopia, or under some other Symbol, with the Legend, Felicitas Publica, or, Felicitas Aug. Felicitas Temporum.

H O P E.

Had Hope escaped when the imprudent Epimetheus opened Pandora's Box, no Resource had been left to Man against the Calamities he labours under. But as she alone remained in the Bottom of the fatal Box, I think it no Wonder that they made a Divinity of her. Cicero (1) defines Hope the Expectation of Good, Bonorum Expectatio; a Definition conformable to that of the Apostle, Spes est futurorum bonorum; Good Things to come, whether in this Life or the next, are its Object; and 'tis probable the Pagans themselves extended it thus far. It was in the Hope of Immortality, says Cicero, that the Heroes so chearfully resigned themselves to Death. The wisest among the Heathens have shewed us what Influence Hope and Fear are capable of producing upon the Minds of those who take a near View of the future Life. What Plato says to this Purpose is admirably good (2): Know, Socrates, that when any one is at the Point of Death, anxious Doubts and Fears arise in his Mind from a Reflection on the Errors of his Life. Then 'tis that the Pains and Torments reserved for the Guilty in the other World, which he had hitherto accounted only so many ridiculous Fables, and made them the Objects of his Raillery, begin to affect, and make an Impression upon him, apprehending all these Things may be real. Thus, whether it be that his Mind is enfeebled by Age, or that having Death nearer at hand, he examines Things with greater Attention, his Soul is seized with Fear and Dread, and if he has injured any one, he sinks into Despair; while he, who has nothing to reproach approach himself with, feels that sweet Hope springing up in his Mind which Pindar calls the Nurse of Old-age. This is one of those refined Sentiments which right Reason dictated to the Philosophers, who were so wise as to consult and hearken to this sacred Guide. It was Virtue, according to Cicero, that inspired the Hope of Immortality, and that same Immortality animated Hope. There is nothing melancholy, says he, in Death, which leads to Immortality (a). So thought the wiser Heathens, and nothing could be objected to their Morality as to this Article. had they gone no farther than to consider Hope as a Virtue; but they actually made a Divinity of it. Cicero speaks of one of the Temples of this Goddess (1). Titus Livius makes Mention of that which stood in the Market for Herbs, and of another which Publius Victor erected to her in the seventh Region. M. Fullius the Cenfor consecrated another to her near the Tiber.

(1) Tusc. Quæst. l. 1. (2) De Rep. l. 5.

As to what remains, whether the Romans borrowed from the Greeks the Worship of this Goddess is what I cannot determine; but this much is certain, that the ~~latter~~ worshipped her under the Name of Elpis. Hope is represented upon some antient Monuments, but oftner upon the Medals of the Emperors, sometimes with these Words, Spes publica, spes populi Rom. &c. Sometimes with a Cornucopia, or with Flowers and Fruits, or a Bee-hive, &c. insomuch that one would take her for Ceres. All these figured the Goods that were looked for from her, and there is nothing in them that needs to surprize us. In fine, we find her often with one Hand resting upon the Altar, which M. Aurelius Pacorus had dedicated to her. As this Goddess had her Temples and Altars, 'tis not to be doubted but she had her Sacrifices too; but Antiquity gives us no Account of the Victims that were offered to her.

ETERNITY.

(a) Non est lugenda mors, quam immortalitas consequitur.
De Senect. c. 1.

(1) De Leg.

E T E R N I T Y.

As the most solid Hope is that which terminates in Eternity, the Romans made Eternity itself one of their Divinities ; but we find neither Temples nor Altars to this Goddess. She is only to be seen upon some Medals under the Figure of a Woman, with the Words, Æternitas, or Æternitas Aug. &c. holding in her Hand the Head of a radiant Sun ; and that of the Moon, or a Phenix, a Globe, or an Elephant, and some other Symbols that were thought proper to represent her. The Sun and Moon, because it was reckoned their Course would never have an End ; the Elephant, because of his long Life ; and the Phenix, because this fabulous Fowl was believed to spring out of its own Ashes, and so was in a Manner immortal. Lastly, the Globe, because 'tis a Figure without any Extremities.

T I M E.

I may add they deified likewise Time and its Parts. 'Tis true History does not inform us what Kind of Worship was paid to all the Parts of Time, as it does of some, for Example, the Hours and Seasons ; but since all those Parts had been personified, 'tis very probable that they were accounted so many Divinities. The Thing is out of doubt as to Time, who was represented by Saturn himself ; and ordinarily he was painted with Wings, to express the Rapidity with which he passes away, and a Scythe, to signify the Havock and Waste he makes. In like Manner Pausanias informs us that the Athenians adored the Seasons, and paid the same Worship to them as to Pandrosos the Daughter of Cecrops.

Time was divided into several Parts ; the Age, the Generation or Period of thirty Years, the Lustrum, or Space of five Years, the Year, the Seasons ; of these they reckoned at first but three, Summer, Autumn, and Winter, Spring being added afterwards ; the Morning, Twilight, Aurora, Noon, the Evening, the Evening-twilight, and the Night.

Each of these Parts had its particular Figure, and they were represented either like Men or Women, according according as their Name was masculine or feminine; their Images were even carried about in the Ceremonies of Religion: Thus; at the famous Procession of Ptolemy Philadelphus, appeared Penteteris; or the Lustrum, under the Figure of a tall Woman; and the Year under that of a Man of the same Stature; that is, six Foot high. I have no Design to dwell longer upon this Subject; but shall only direct the Reader to consult the first Volume of the Supplement of Montfaucon's Antiquity, where that Father has given very fine Prints of all those Parts of Time.

T H O U G H T.

The Antients made also a Divinity of Mens, that; as we are told by Varro, Lactantius, and St. Augustine after him, it might suggest to us none but what are good, and turn away those which have a Tendency to seduce and lead us into Error. Titus Livius informs us (1), that T. Ottacilius, when Prætor, had vowed to that Goddess a Temple which he built upon the Capitol, when he was created Duumvir.

P I E T Y.

As Piety, whether it have for its Object the Supreme Being, or the Poor, or one's Country, has always been respected in all human Societies, we need not wonder that the Romans made this Virtue a Divinity, and the Object of Worship. M. Attilius Glabrio built a Temple to her in the Herb-market, a second in the Place where the Woman dwelt who had nursed her Father in Prison, which is expressed to us by that of natural Affection: Pietas erga Parentes.

M E R C Y.

We learn from Pausanias (2) the Name of that Goddess, which we may render by these synonymous Terms, Indulgence, Compassion, Pity. The Life of Man, says he, is obnoxious to so many Hardships and Sufferings, that this Goddess deserves to be in the highest Esteem. All Nations of the World should offer Sacrifices to her, because they all stand mutually in need of her. All that we farther know about her,

is,

(1) L. 22. & 23. (2) In Attic.

is, that she had an Altar at Athens, which the Author now quoted calls ἐλεῖς βωμὸν. The Romans gave the Name of Asylum to the Temple which they had erected to this Goddess, as also the Greeks, as we learn from Servius and Statius (a).

VIRTUE and HONOUR.

The Philosophers, the Orators, and the Poets, had made so many, and so eloquent Encomiums upon Virtue, the only Thing that made them happy, that it would have been difficult to hinder the Admiration which they inspired for so glorious an Object from passing very soon into Adoration. Accordingly she was deified, and Antiquity has left us several Traces of the religious Worship that was paid to her, as may be seen in the fourth Book of St. Augustine de Civ. Dei. Plutarch (1) and others inform us, that Scipio, he who razed Numantia, was the first who consecrated a Temple to this Divinity. Marcellus, as we are told by the same Author (2), being designed to build a Temple of the Spoils of the Sicilians to the same Goddess, and to Honour, consulted the Pontiffs, who hindered him from it, under Pretext that one and the same Temple could not contain those two Divinities; thus he built two adjoining to one another, in such a Manner, as Cicero remarks (3), that there was no arriving at that of Honour, but by passing through that of Virtue, to teach Men that true Honour was only to be acquired by the Practice of Virtue. It was even to support this wise Maxim, that Virtue was sometimes painted with Wings, because she procured Honour and Victory to those who studied her. Plutarch furnishes us with another Remark to this Purpose; namely, that they sacrificed to Honour with the Head uncovered, it being usual to uncover at meeting those who by their Virtues have

(a) Postquam Hercules migravit e terris, nepotes ejus timentes insidias eorum quos avus afflixerat, Athenis sibi primum asylum, hoc est templum misericordiæ collocarunt, unde nullus posset abduci. Serv. in 8 Æn.

*Herculeos fama est fundasse nepotes,
Et Romulus acer asylum*

Rettulit.

(1) De For. Rom. (2) Life of Marcell. (3) L. 1. In Verrem.

have acquired Honour in the World; and we learn from Pliny that Fab. Rutilianus was the first who made a Law, that on the Ides of July the Roman Knights should march on Horseback from the Temple of Honour to the Capitol.

Virtue was usually represented under the Figure of a venerable Matron, leaning against a Pillar. We find her, however, upon some Medals of Gordian and Numerian, under the Figure of a Man with a Beard.

Marius, after the Defeat of the Cimbri, also consecrated one to these two Goddesses. Plautus, in the Prologue to his Amphitryo, names Virtue among the other Gods whom Mercury speaks of in that Place; and Lucian says Fortune used her so very ill, that she durst no longer appear before Jupiter's Throne. An ingenious Allegory, applicable to virtuous People, who are too often persecuted.

TRUTH, called by the Greeks Aletheia.

The Pagans, deprived of the Lights of Revelation, were ignorant that he, who was to come one Day for the Salvation of the World, was the Truth, and that this Truth was eternal; thus we are not to be surprized at their having believed, as Plutarch and several other Antients relate, that Truth was the Daughter of Time, or of Saturn taken for Time. Whether is it, says that judicious Author, because Saturn is Time, or because he was the justest of Men, that he has been accounted the Father of Truth? This is what he does not determine, tho' he inclines to believe that it was for his having strictly practised the Rules of Justice, that he had this Virtue given him for his Daughter. Pindar however makes Jupiter to have been her Father (1).

As Truth was reckoned the Daughter of the just Saturn, so she was the Mother of Virtue; which Genealogy shews, that Men, tho' sunk in the grossest Idolatry, followed sometimes the Lights of refined Reason. Philostratus, in the Image of Amphiaraus, represents Truth as a young Virgin, clad in a Robe, whose whiteness

(1) In Olym.

ness resembled that of the Snow. Hippocrates in one of his Letters, gives likewise her Portrait. Represent to yourself, says he, a fine Woman of a proper Stature, modestly dressed, with a thousand attractive Charms, the Lustre of her Eyes, especially, resembling that of the Stars, and you will have the just Idea of this Divinity. Laërtius has left us a Saying of Democritus, that Truth lay hid in the Bottom of a Well, so difficult it is to come at the Discovery of it.

CONCORD, PEACE, and TRANQUILLITY.

Though Concord, Peace and Tranquillity seem to present but one and the same Idea, 'tis however certain, that the Romans made three distinct Goddesses of them : The first had several Temples at Rome ; one in the Capitol, which the Dictator M. Furius Camillus had built (1), where the Senators, as Pliny tells us (2), frequently assembled to deliberate about the Affairs of the Republick. The same Author informs us, that Flavius had built a Chapel of Brass in honour of the same Goddess, of the Money raised by a Tax upon the Farmers of the Revenues. Cicero (3), Titus Livius, and some others of the Ancients, speak often of the Chapels and Altars of this Goddess, as also, of the Statue which was consecrated to her by the Cenfor Quintus Marcius, and of the Temple which was erected to her, or at least repaired by Livia, Augustus's Wife. Concord was addressed to promote a good Agreement in Families, between Spouses, Citizens, &c.

As the Power of Concord was confined, as I may say, within the City and Houses, so that of Peace was extended to all the Empire, and then she had magnificent Temples ; and that which Claudius had begun, and Vespasian finished, was little short of any in Rome. If we may believe Suetonius, Josephus, and St. Jerom, the Emperor deposited there the precious and rich Spoils of the Temple of Jerusalem. In this Temple assembled those who professed the fine Arts, to dispute about their Prerogatives, that in the Presence of the Goddess of Peace, all Heats might be banished from their Debates. Would to Heaven, says an ingenious English Mythologist (1), that our Divines would follow their Example ! Truth, perhaps, would then reveal herself to their Minds ; or if they did not always go away from their Disputes more enlightened and convinced, they would at least quit them with less Heat and fewer Prejudices. What that Author says of Religious Disputes, may be extended to all others that happen between Men of Letters, where often the foulest Language, at least ill-natured Reflexions, supply the Place of Arguments, and where Truth is less consulted than the Pleasure of exposing an Adversary to Ridicule.

(1) Plut. in Cam. Ov. Fast. (2) L. 33. c. 1. (3) Pro domo sua.

This Goddess had also in the same City an Altar, which was very much frequented. Monuments represent to us Peace under the Figure of a Woman crowned with Laurel, Olive, or Chaplets of Roses, holding in one Hand the Caduceus, and in the other Ears of Corn, the Symbol of Plenty, which she procures. Aristophanes gives her Venus and the Graces for her Companions.

Tranquillity, Quies, the happy Effect of Concord and Peace, had also her Temple at Rome, without the Porta Collina, as we learn from St. Augustin (2). “ I am surprized, says that holy Father, that when they attributed Divinity to every Thing, almost to every Movement, and built Temples within the City to the Goddesses Agerona, who incites us to Action, to the Goddesses Stimula, who makes us over-act, to Murcia, who renders us soft and indolent, as we are told by Pomponius, to the Goddesses Strenua, who inspires us with Courage ; they should not have received among them the Goddesses of Repose, but left her without the Colline Gate.” However, as they gave Orcus, the God of the Dead, the Epithet of Quietalis, to denote the Rest and peaceful State of the Shades, learned Authors will have it, that the Worship of this Goddess was the same with that of the Dead.

F A I T H.

(1) Eduardus Herbeus de Cherburi, De Rel. Gent. p. 225.

(2) De Civ. Dei l. 4. c. 16.

F A I T H.

Faith, that is, Fidelity, (for thus we are to understand the Word Fides, the Pagans not having the same Idea of it with us) was also a Divinity among the Romans; consequently it is obvious that she presided over Sincerity in Commerce, and Truth in Promises. It was by her, in short, that Security was given against Deceit and Falshood, since she was taken to witness their Engagements, and the Oath made in her Name, or that of Jupiter Fidius, who was the same, was of all Oaths the most inviolable. Nothing in Nature was more sacred than this Fidelity, as having for its Foundation Religion itself; take away, says Cicero, the Reverence that is due to the Gods, and Faith is at an End (1) Pietate adversus Deos sublatâ fidem tolli. The Temple of Faith erected by Calatius was in the Capitol, near that of Jupiter (2). Festus, upon the Authority of Agathocles, says that Æneas, upon his Arrival in Italy, also consecrated one to the same Goddess; but I am of Opinion that we ought to adhere to Dionysius Halicarnassens and Plutarch, who make the first of all to have been built by Numa Pompilius (3). That same Prince had likewise ordered the Priests, whom he set over the Worship of this Goddess, to wear white Vestments when they offered Sacrifices to her. The Antiquaries are of Opinion, that a Figure, where two Women are joining Hands, represents this Goddess, which is not improbable, since in this Manner mutual Faith is usually plighted. What induced Numa Pompilius to make Faith one of the venerable Roman Divinities, is thus related by Dionysius Halicarnassens (4).

“ In order, says he, to engage his People to mutual Fidelity and Truth in their Contracts with one another, he had Recourse to a Method which the most celebrated Legislators had not as yet contrived. He remarked, that the publick Contracts, and those made before Witnesses, were pretty regularly

K 2

“ ob-

(1) Cic. de Off. l. 3. (2) Pro Marc. (3) In Numa. (4) l. 2. c. 75.

“ observed, and that few who contracted in that “ Manner were found to violate their Promises, be“ cause Men naturally have a Regard to those in “ whose Presence they have come under Engage“ ments. He observed on the other Side, that those “ Sorts of Compacts and Treaties that were made “ without Witnesses, and depended merely upon the “ Honesty of the Parties contracting, were still more “ inviolable than the former ; whence he concluded,
 “ that by deifying Faith, he would make these Sorts
 “ of Contracts still more binding. Besides, it ap“ peared to him unreasonable, that while Divine “ Honours were paid to Justice, to Themis, Nemesis,
 “ and such like Divinities, Faith alone, the most sa“ cred Thing in the World, and at the same Time
 “ the most worthy of Veneration among Men, should “ be honoured neither in publick nor private. Big “ with so laudable a Design, he was the first who “ built a Temple to public Faith, and instituted Sa“ crifices, whereof he would have the Charges to be “ defrayed by the Publick, as was done with respect
 “ to several other Gods, in Hope that the Veneration
 “ for so fundamental a Virtue, which he propagated “ through the City in general, would insensibly com“ municate itself to each Individual.”

“ He was not mistaken in his Conjectures : Faith “ came to be so revered, and held in such religious “ Awe by the Romans, that she alone had more Force “ than Witnesses and Oaths ; insomuch, that if “ there arose any Difference among those who had “ contracted together without Witnesses, the Matter “ was referred to the Faith of the Defender, and the “ Controversy went no farther. It was the common “ Method too for Magistrates, in Cases of Intricacy,
 “ to refer the Determination to the Faith of the con“ tending Parties.”

To conclude, it was Hercules who presided over Faith given in Contracts ; and the Oath taken on those Occasions was thus conceived, Medius Fidius, as much as to say, ita me Deus Fidius adjuvet, So help me Medius,

Medius Fidius, or Hercules. Swear to me, says Plautus in one of his Comedies (1), by Medius Fidius (a).

The same Prince appointed a God to be the Guardian of the Land-marks, and the Avenger of Encroachments which one Neighbour made upon another. In fine, he made several other Regulations in Religion, as shall be said afterwards, all by the Direction of the Nymph Egeria, whom he said he went to consult in a Grove not far from Rome.

L I B E R T Y.

A People that idolized Liberty so much as the Romans did, could not choose but make a Divinity of her, and consecrate to her Temples and Altars. Accordingly this Goddess, who was invoked in order to preserve that same Liberty, which was owing to the Extinction of the Regal Power, had several of them in the City (2). Cicero makes mention of one of those Temples; Publius Victor built one upon the Aventine Mount, with a Vestible, which was called the Vestible of Liberty. The Ancients, who frequently speak of this Vestible, have not informed us to what Use it was destined. But we may suppose that the public Sales were made there as in the others. Titus Livius, speaking of the Temple which Tiberius Gracchus had consecrated to the same Goddess, says the Columns thereof were of Bronze, and that it contained several very fine Statues. When Cicero set out in his Exile, P. Clodius his Persecutor consecrated the House of that great Man to Liberty. In short, Dion informs us, that the Romans by a public Decree raised a Temple to the same Goddess in favour of Julius Cæsar: An Action very worthy of those degenerate Romans, to raise a Temple in honour of him who made them lose the Remains of that valuable

K 3

Pre

(1) Asin.

(a) Those who are persuaded, that instead of Fidius we ought to read Filius, as if the Words signify'd the Son of Jupiter, don't consider, that Ovid makes the first Syllable of this Word short, and not long, as it is in Filius.

Quærebam nonas sancto Fidiove referrem.

(2) Cic. l. 2. de Nat. Deor.

Prerogative which Marius and Sylla had still left them, and whereof, till then, they had been always jealous.

M O D E S T Y.

Modesty is a Virtue too essential to the Fair Sex, not to have been erected into a Divinity. History therefore informs, that the Romans worshipped her under the Name of Pudicitia, and this Goddess had Temples in their City, and Altars whereon Sacrifices were offered to her. But, as if the Great were to have other Gods than the Populace, there was a Distinction at Rome between the Chastity of the Patrician Ladies, and that of the Plebeians. The Origin of this Distinction is pretty singular. Thus we have it related by Titus Livius (1). Virginia, of a Patrician Family, having married a Plebeian named Volumnius, who was however afterwards Consul, her Sister looking upon this Match to be unworthy her Name, having joined with the other Matrons, would no longer suffer her to partake in the Mysteries of the Goddess of Chastity, but drove her out of the Temple. Virginia, stung with this Affront, got a Chapel raised in the long Street, the same where was the Goddess's Temple from which she was excluded, and she dedicated it to the Chastity of the Plebeian Ladies; where the Wives who were not of the Senatorian Order, convened from that Time to offer Sacrifice to that Goddess. Chastity was represented under the Figure of a Woman veil'd, or seeming to point her Right-hand or her Fore-finger to her Face, to signify that she has no Reason to blush.

O C C A S I O N.

The Greeks made also a God of Occasion, whom they named Keiros, who was said by the Poet Ion of Chios, to be the youngest of Jupiter's Sons. As his Name is Feminine in Latin, the Romans made a Goddess of him. Possidonius, and after him Ausonius, have given a charming Description, the one of the God, and the other

(1) L. 10. c. 25.

other of the Goddesses of Occasion, which the Curious may consult.

F R A U D.

Boccace, in his Genealogy of the Gods, takes Fraud also into the Number of the Pagan Divinities. She had, says he, the Looks of an honest Man, the Body of a Serpent, whose Body exhibited different Colours, while the lower Part terminated in the Tail of a Scorpion. This Author adds, that she swam in the Waters of Cocytus, and that nothing of her was to be seen but the Head. An allegorical Description of this mischievous and deceitful Divinity!

AGERONIA, or ANGERONIA and PLEASURE.

Silence, or the Art of governing the Tongue, is a Virtue perhaps greater, and more rare than is commonly thought, of which the Antients were so sensible as to make a Divinity of it. This is what the Orientals worshipped under the Name of Harpocrates, as has been said in the first Volume; and the Romans, who made her a Goddess, called her Ageronia or Angeronia. The Feast instituted in honour of her, was celebrated every Year on the 21st of December, in the Temple of the Goddess Volupta or Pleasure, where this Goddess had her Statue (1). For, to mention it here by the Way, Pleasure was also promoted to a Divinity. But what could be the Meaning of that Association of Silence with Pleasure? Was it to set forth that he who knows how to conceal his Grievs, and far more to subdue them, arrived at last at that calm and sedate State wherein the Soul seems possessed of its highest Wishes, a State wherein the wisest Philosophers made true Pleasure to consist? This is what I am not able to determine. We learn from Julius Modestus, that the Romans, afflicted with the Squinsey, had Recourse to this Goddess of Silence, and soon found Relief from her; which gave Rise to the Sacrifices that were regularly offered to her from that Time.

Monuments represent her under the Figure of a Woman, who, Harpocrates-like, holds a Finger to her

K 4

(1) Macrobian. Sat. 1. l. c. 10.

her Mouth. Sometimes her Statues are charged with Symbols, as those of that God, which Figures we call Pantbees. Thus in that published by M. Maffei, she carries upon her Head the Calathus of Serapis, and holds in her Hand Hercules's Club, while at her two Sides she has the Caps of Castor and Pollux, surmounted with the two Stars of those Gods. Numa Pompilius regulated the Worship of this Goddess under the Name of Tacita.

A I U S L O Q U U T I U S.

But as it is not practicable, nor indeed is it incumbent on us always to keep Silence, but is no less a Point of Wisdom to speak than to be silent in Season, so there was also the God of Speech, whom the Romans called Aius Loquutus.

After the following Manner was this God known at Rome. Not long before the Arrival of the Gauls in Italy, says Cicero (1), a Voice was heard which proceeded from Vesta's Grove, declaring, that if they did not rebuild the Walls of the City, it would be taken by the Enemy. The Voice was then disregarded; but when the Gauls had made themselves Masters of the City, they began to reflect upon it, and erected an Altar to the God of Speech under the Name of Aius Loquutus.

Titus Livius and Plutarch, who relate the same Story, alledge, that the Person who said he had heard the Voice, was M. Ceditius, and that no Regard was paid to it by reason of the small Authority of him who reported the Fact, but that afterwards the City, to make amends to the God who had given so seasonable Warning to the Romans, built him a Temple in the new Street. Aulus Gellius (2) speaks of the Statue of the same God.

P R O V I D E N C E.

Tho' the Antients believed Providence to be an Attribute of the Gods, as may be proved by several Medals, upon which we read Providentia Deorum, it appears, however, that they had made a particular Divi-

(1) De Div. l. 1. (2) L. 16.

Divinity thereof, whom they commonly represented under the Figure of a Woman leaning upon a Pillar, holding in her Left-hand the Cornucopia, and in the Right a Batton which she points to a Globe, at once to shew, that all Goods are derived from her, and that she extends her Care over the whole Universe. Sometimes she has other Symbols, but this Manner of representing her was the most common.

S E C U R I T Y.

Security was also deified, and worshipped by the Greeks under the Name of Asphaleia, which is of the same Import. The Inscription of Securi Dii, which we find upon an antique Monument, signifies not the Gods who are in Security, but who bestow it. The common Legends of Securitas orbis, Securitas Aug. Securitati perpetuæ, expressed the Security which the Emperor, by whose Orders they were struck, enjoyed himself, and at the same time procured to the World. Security was represented as a Woman holding her Hand over her Head.

If Security itself was not a Deity, there were at least Gods who procured it. But we know no more of them than what we learn from an Inscription, which is still to be seen at Rome in the Ursini Palace, and is conceived in these Terms: Deis Securis.

O P S.

The Goddess Ops had also a Temple at Rome: This was the Divinity of Help, as her Name intimates. To her they used to sacrifice in the Month of April a Cow with Calf, and a Hog. Macrobius (1) informs us, that those who invoked this Goddess, were wont to sit, and touch the Ground with their Hand. Philochorus was the first who dedicated in Afric an Altar to Saturn and Ops. But as this Goddess was the same with Terra, I shall say no more of her at present.

J U S T I C E and E Q U I T Y.

Tho' in general the Greeks and Romans look'd upon Themis as the Goddess of Justice, as we have said in speaking of that Goddess, yet the latter had their Justice

(1) Sat. 1. 10.

Justice and Equity besides, whom they represented upon their Medals, and on the Monuments that were consecrated to them, the one under the Figure of a Woman sitting with a Cup in one Hand, and her Scepter in the other, as may be seen on the Medals of Hadrian and Alexander Mammeus: Equity again, with a Sword in one Hand, and a Pair of Scales in the other. Farther, this Goddess was confounded with Astræa, and with Dice, Δίκη, to whom we have an Hymn under the Name of Orpheus, wherein the Author, whoever he was, destines Incense to her.

PITHO, or Persuasion and Consolation.

If the Pagans did not make a Divinity of Eloquence, they at least deified Persuasion, which is the End of it. This Goddess was called by the Greeks Pitbo, Πειθώ, and by the Latins, Suadela or Suada. Pausanias informs us, that this Goddess had a Temple at Sicyon, but that there was no Statue there nor Representation, and a Chapel at Egiale, which was built upon the following Occasion (1), Apollo and Diana having slain Python, came to Egiale to be expiated from this Bloodshed: as the Pestilence then ravaged that City, it was judged necessary to consult the Oracle, who answered, that in order to be delivered from that Calamity, Diana and Apollo must be appeased, which accordingly they executed, by sending to them seven young Men, and as many Virgins, who appeased them; and in Gratitude they built a Chapel to Persuasion. The same Author also informs, that with Persuasion they joined another Goddess named Consolation, of whom a Statue was to be seen at Athens by the Hand of Praxiteles.

O G E N U S.

All that we know about Ogenus, is, that he was the God of old Men, who were therefore called ὠγενεῖς, for which you may consult Erasmus's Adagia.

F R U I T F U L N E S S.

Fruitfulness, which the Romans deify'd, is no other but Juno, whom the Women invoked to obtain Children, and for that End submitted to a Practice equally ridi-

(1) In Corinth.

ridiculous and obscene. When they were come with this View into the Temple of the Goddess, the Priests made them strip themselves, and lashed them with a Whip made of Thongs of Goat Skin. The Medals of Lucilla represent Juno sitting upon her Throne, with her Scepter in one Hand, and one of those Whips in the other, with the Inscription Junoni Lucinae.

C L E M E N C Y.

Clemency was also ranked among the Gods, and she had a Temple, as appears from a Medal of Julius Caesar. Upon other Medals she has also her Symbols, which were a Bough, the Patera, and the Spear, but none of her Temples are now to be seen.

To conclude, I know not whether Plenty, Ubertas, Gayety, Hilaritas, Joy, Nobility, Security, Tranquillity, and some other Beings of that Nature, which we often find personified upon Medals and Intaglios, were also ranked among the Gods. But as the Antients let us know nothing concerning their Worship, make no Mention of any Temple or Altar erected to them, I shall say nothing of them here: What relates to them being the Antiquary's Province.

C H A P. II.

Of Evil Beings, of Passions, and Vices that were advanced to Divinities.

AS the Fear of Evil is stronger than the Hope of Good, it is easy to imagine that the Pagans having adored the Gods from whom they expected Blessings, would not fail to pay the same Respect to those who were capable of doing them Harm. Men, says Cicero, were so sunk in Error, that not only did they give the Name of Gods even to things pernicious, but they likewise paid religious Worship to them. Thus we see a Temple to the Fever on Mount Palatin, another to Orbona near that of the Lares, and an Altar to Ill Fortune on Mount Esquiline.

The F E V E R.

The Fever therefore was a Divinity, and we have a Monument

Monument where she is called The Holy Fever. Besides the Temple now mentioned by Cicero, Valerius Maximus (1) says, that she had others, into which they carried the Remedies used in Diseases.

O R B O N A.

Orbona again was a Goddess invoked by the Fathers and Mothers for the Preservation of their Children; and those who had lost them were under the particular Protection of this Goddess, as we learn from Arnobius (2).

T E M P E S T.

All that we know of Tempest, which was deified by the Romans, is, that Marcellus, as an Acknowledgment for having escaped a Storm with which he was overtaken at Sea, between the Islands of Corfica and Sardinia, built a Temple to her without the Porta Capena.

Impudence and Calumny, Murcia, Necessity, and Violence.

If some antient Authors did not inform us that the Greeks raised Altars to Impudence and Calumny, we should never have believed it possible for them to worship those two Vices so pernicious to Society. The Goddess of Indolence, called Murcia, had no doubt her Worship, for this is the favourite Divinity of the fair Sex; but of her, Antiquity gives us no particular Account; St. Augustin telling us only that this Goddess who hindered from Action, had her Temple in Rome.

S T R E N U A.

To the Goddess of Sloth I shall join another who was quite opposite to her, namely Strenua, who, according to the same Father, made Men to over-act. She had also a Temple in the same City. But we know nothing more about her.

We are better acquainted with Necessity and Violence, since Pausanias (3) speaks of the Temple which they had in the Citadel of Corinth, whose Entrance was prohibited to all, except to those who served the Goddesses.

F A M E.

(1) L. 11. c. 5.

(2) L. 4.

(3) In Corinth.

F A M E.

Among the Divinities who are the Subject of this Chapter, Fame had also her Place: Hesiod, who gives the Description of her, has however omitted her Genealogy. But 'tis certain that she was reckoned a Divinity, and that she had an established Worship, especially at Athens, as we learn from Pausanias (1), and a Temple, as Plutarch tells us in the Life of Camillus. No Figures nor Statues can have a stronger Expression or greater Likeness to this Goddess than is exhibited in that fine Picture of her drawn by Virgil (a). I give here the Translation of it for the Benefit of some Readers.

Now Fame, tremendous Fiend! without Delay Thro' Libyan Cities took her rapid Way.

Fame, the swift Plague, that e'ery Moment grows,
And gains new Strength and Vigour as she goes.

*First small with Fear, she swells to wondrous Size,
And stalks on Earth, and tow'rs above the Skies.*

*Whom, in her Wrath to Heav'n, the teeming Earth
Produc'd the last of her Gigantic Birth,*

A Monster huge, and dreadful to the Eye,

With rapid Feet to run, or Wings to fly.

Beneath her Plumes the various Fury bears

A thousand piercing Eyes and list'ning Ears,

And with a thousand Mouths and babbling Tongues appears.

Thund'ring by Night thro' Heav'n and Earth she flies,

No golden Slumbers seal her watchful Eyes :

On Tow'rs or Battlements she sits by Day,

And shakes whole Towns with Terror and Dismay,

Alarms the World around, and perch'd on high

Reports a Truth, or publishes a Lie, &c.

Pit's Æneid IV. 259.

Ovid gives also a very fine Picture of the same Goddess, and some other Poets have likewise exercised their poetical Genius upon the same Subject.

What

(1) In Attic.

(a) Extemplo Libyæ magnas it Fama per urbes, &c. Æn. l. 4.

What we may infer from all these is, that Fame, like all the Giants, was the Daughter of the Earth, who, to be avenged of the Gods, and of Jupiter in particular, who had thunderstruck her Children, brought forth this Monster to blaze abroad their Crimes, and make them known to all the World: For Fame spares neither Gods nor Men.

E N V Y.

Among the Passions deified by the Antients, none perhaps deserved that Honour less than Envy. But yet the Greeks had made a God of him, his Name being masculine in their Language, and the Romans a Goddess. Plutarch, who has composed a small Treatise upon this Passion, says curious enough Things upon the Subject, and the Poets have given themselves free Scope in drawing the Picture thereof. Here Ovid especially has excelled in those Verses which begin thus,

Pallor in ore sedet, maciesque in corpore toto *, &c.

*Livid and meagre were her Looks, her Eye
In foul distorted Glances turn'd awry ;
A Hoard of Gall her inward Parts possess'd,
And spread a Greenness o'er her canker'd Breast ;
Her Teeth were brown with Rust, and from her Tongue,
In dangling Drops, the stringy Poison hung.
She never smiles but when the Wretched weep,
Nor lulls her Malice with a Moment's Sleep,
Restless in Spite : While watchful to destroy,
She pines and sickens at another's Joy ;
Foe to herself, distressing and distressed,
She bears her own Tormentor in her Breast.*

Garth's Ovid. Met.

The Antients compared her to the Eel, from a Notion that this Fish bore Envy to all others.

F E A R and P A L E N E S S.

If a prudent and moderate Fear is not Wisdom itself, it is at least the Beginning and Principle thereof; but when it is only a blind Passion which disturbs the Tranquility of the Soul, without furnishing it with the Means to be cured of the Uneasiness it labours under,

* Ovid. Met. lib. 2. 775.

under, then 'tis only a vain and unavailing Terror. Such was the Fear or Dread which the Greeks had deified, and which the Romans afterwards adored like them, as also Paleness, its inseparable Companion. Men being struck with the View of Events whose Causes were unknown to them, and which infused a Terror into them against which nothing could fortify their Minds, made a Divinity of the disturbing Passion itself, from which they sought to be delivered by addressing to it Vows and Prayers. 'Tis not possible to determine the precise Time when they began to pay Adoration to those two Divinities. They are perhaps of as old a Date as the Disturbance which they create; at least they were known to the earliest Poets of Greece. Hesiod, after having told us in his Theogony that Fear was the Daughter of Mars and Venus, adds in the Description of Hercules's Buckler, that this God was thereon represented in his Chariot, accompanied with Fear and Terror. Homer (1) gives those Goddesses the same Original. Accordingly, every Time he makes the God of War appear in Fight, he gives him Fear, Terror, and Flight for his Retinue: He also places the same Divinities sometimes upon the tremendous Egis of Minerva, sometimes upon the Buckler of Agamemnon (2). Here Mars orders these two Goddesses to yoke his Chariot, to fly to avenge his Son Ascalaphus (3); there these two Goddesses (4) in the midst of Tumult and Consternation occasioned by the Combat between Heſtor and Ajax, come forth from the Grecian Ships to put the Trojans to flight.

With that he gives Command to Fear and Flight

To join his rapid Coursers for the Fight: &c.

Pope's Iliad, B. XV. 134.

A Divinity so well marked in those two Poets, and so formidable in herself, could not fail to command religious Worship. Accordingly they had Recourse to Gifts and Sacrifices, in order to appease and be delivered from her. The two Sons of Medea having been

(1) L. 4. (2) Il. l. 11. (3) Il. l. 15. (4) Il. l. 16.

been inhumanly murdered by the Corinthians, Mortality carried off many of her Children, and upon consulting the Oracle, they learned that they were to offer Sacrifices to the offended Manes of those innocent Victims to their Cruelty, and at the same Time to consecrate a Statue to Fear. In a Battle fought by Tullus Hostilius, the Albans, who had declared for him, turned their Backs and went over to the Enemy. At first the Hearts of his Men were dismayed, and all seemed to be lost, when that Prince vowed a Temple to Fear and Paleness : This Vow produced its Effect ; the Soldiers resumed their Courage, and Tullus gained a compleat Victory. This Event, which is the Æra of introducing the Worship of these two Goddesses into Rome, is marked upon two Medals of the Family of Hostilia (1). Upon the one is a Head with the Hair standing on end, the Countenance raised towards Heaven, the Mouth open, and a troubled Aspect, which are lively Figures of the Divinity whom the Medal represented. The other exhibits a meager Face greatly lengthened, the Hair laid flat, and a staring Aspect ; this is the true Portrait of Paleness which is the Effect of Fear.

The Lacedæmonians made greater Advantage of the Goddess we are now speaking of, since, according to Plutarch, they had placed her Temple by the Tribunal of the Ephori, from a Persuasion that nothing is so necessary as to inspire the Wicked with Fear of severe Chastisement.

Lastly, that Fear might want no Proof of Divinity, she was joined in Oaths with the other Gods. Æschilus informs us (1), that in the solemn Oath taken by the seven Chiefs of the Theban Expedition, in the midst of Sacrifices, all of them holding their Hands in the Blood of the Victims, swore by Fear, by the God Mars and Bellona.

Such were the Virtues, Vices, and Passions that the Greeks and Romans had raised into Divinities. We might join here some others, whose Representations we find find upon Medals, and their Descriptions in the Poets: But as we learn nothing from the Antients concerning their Worship, and have no Mention made of any Temple or Altar erected to them, we leave the Antiquaries to explain the Symbols with which they were represented. It suffices to observe in general, that as the Pagan Theology was not founded upon any certain Principle, so it easily adopted all the Gods whom different Occasions introduced.

(1) Ful. Urs. Patin, and Paillant. (2) Trag. of the Seven before Thebes.

A T E or D I S C O R D.

Among the malignant Divinities, we must not forget Ate, or Discord, that cruel Goddess, who having fought to set the Gods by the Ears, was at length banished from Olympus, and came down to this Earth, there to exert all her Fury. Homer (1) makes Agamemnon thus speak of her in excusing himself for having forced away Briseis from Achilles, in that fine Speech he makes to the Grecian Captains assembled by his Order.

*What then could I, against the Will of Heav'n ?
Not by myself but vengeful Ate driv'n ;
She, Jove's dread Daughter, fated to infest
The Race of Mortals, enter'd in my Breast.
Not in the Ground that haughty Fury treads,
But prints her lofty Footsteps on the Heads
Of mighty Men ; inflicting as she goes
Long fest'ring Wounds, inextricable Woes !
Of old, she stalk'd amid the bright Abodes ;
And Jove himself the Sire of Men and Gods,
The World's great Ruler, felt her venom'd Dart ;
Deceiv'd by Juno's Wiles, and Female Art, &c.*

Pope's Iliad, XIX. 91.

Then Agamemnon relates how Juno, by making Stelenus's Wife bring forth Euristheus before her Time, and thereby acquire a Right to command Hercules, had so provoked Jupiter, that the Sovereign of the Gods falling foul of Ate, whom he believed to have inspired Juno with that Design, seized her by the Head, and

VOL. III.

L

flung

(1) Il. 19.

flung her down from the Top of Olympus, after making an Oath that she should never again appear in the Mansions of the Gods.

*From his ambrosial Head, where perch'd she sate,
He snatch'd the Fury-Goddes of Debate,
The dread, th' irrevocable Oath he swore,
Th' immortal Seats should ne'er behold her more ;
And whirl'd her headlong down, for ever driv'n
From bright Olympus and the starry Heav'n :
Thence on the nether World the Fury fell ;
Ordain'd with Man's contentious Race to dwell.*

Ib. 125.

From this Passage it appears to have been their Opinion that Ate was the Daughter of Jupiter, that she had once been an Inhabitant of Olympus, and that for offending her Father, she had been banished from thence, and come down to dwell amongst Men.

Some Fathers of the Church, I know, believed from this Story that the Pagans had some Knowledge of the Fall of the Angels ; S. Justin even asserts that Homer had got the Substance of this Story from Egypt, and that he had read that Passage where the Prophet Isaiab speaks of the Fall of those Spirits of Disobedience ; but how could that Poet read the Writings of a Prophet who came not into the World till an hundred Years after him ?

After Homer, their great Original, have the succeeding Poets painted this Goddess in the blackest Colours. Virgil represents her followed by Bellona, having her Head entwined with Serpents :

Et scissâ gaudens vadit Discordia pallâ, Quam cum sanguineo sequitur Bellona flagello.

Æn. l. 8.

- - - - - *Et Discordia demens
Vipereum crinem vittis innexa cruentis.*

L. 6.

But none have given such a finished Description of her her as Petronius (a) in those fine Verses of his Epic Poem upon the Civil War. To this Goddess were ascribed not only Wars, but also Quarrels among private Persons, Broils and Dissentions in Houses and Families ; and we all know it was she who threw in- to the Assembly of the Gods, the fatal Apple which occasioned that famous Contest among the Goddesses, whereof the Gods declined to be Judges for Fear of involving themselves, through partial Views, in De- bates and Wranglings, which seldom fail to be the in- separable Consequences of Discord.

'Tis proper to add what Mythology teaches us con- cerning Good Fortune, to what we have said of the Gods good and bad, since she was either a good or bad Divinity, according to the Use that was made of her.

C H A P. III.

Of Good and Bad Fortune.

AS Men have always highly valued Earthly Goods, 'tis no Wonder that they adored Fortune ; Fools ! who thus instead of acknowledging an intelli- gent Providence that distributes Riches and other Goods, from Views always wise, though dark and placed beyond the Reach of human Discovery, ad- dressed their Vows to an imaginary Being, that acted without Design, and from the Impulse of unavoidable Necessity : For 'tis beyond Question that in the Pagan System, Fortune was nothing else but Destiny. Ac- cordingly she was confounded, as we shall see after- wards, with the Parcæ, who were themselves that fatal Necessity which the Poets have reasoned so much a- bout.

L 2

'Tis

(a) *Infremuere tubæ, ac scisso Discordia crine
Extulit ad superos Stygium caput : hujus in ore
Concretus sanguis, contusaque lumina flebant.
Stabant irati scabra rubigine dentes,
Tabo lingua fluens, obsessa draconibus ora,
Atque inter toto laceratam pectore vestem,
Sanguinea tremulam quatiebant lampada dextra.*

Petr. Sat.

'Tis true, Christians sometimes speak of Fortune, after the Manner of the Pagans themselves, to sacrifice to Fortune, to expect all from Fortune, to be devoted to Fortune, &c. But when they reflect and consider the Meaning of these vulgar Expressions, they refer all to divine Providence.

But to proceed, I know not whether the several Nations that acknowledged this blind and capricious Divinity, had all the same Idea of her; but 'tis certain that she was invoked from the earliest Times, since the first Time that Scripture mentions the Gods of the Pagans, it speaks of Gad, invoked by Leah; and this Gad St. Augustin takes to have been Fortune (a). But as the present Question is only about the Idea which the Greeks and Romans had of her, 'tis their Mythology on this Head I am to explain. First, it does not appear that this Goddess was antiently known to those two Nations, since Hesiod and Homer say nothing of her, and we have remarked that the latter, who uses the Word Τύχη, the Name given to this Divinity, meant thereby not Fortune, but one of the Daughters of the Ocean, the Companion of Melobosis, and of the beautiful Jante. That great Poet, as Pausanias observes (1), has expressly said that Pallas and Enyo presided over Battles, Venus over Marriage, and Diana over Child-bearing; but far from making an almighty Goddess of Fortune, as has been since done, a Divinity who exercises her Dominion over all human Things, and who brings them about as she pleases, he does not give her so much as the smallest Function.

The most antient Circumstance we know concerning this Goddess, is, that Bupalus, a great Statuary and Architect, was the first who made a Statue of her for the City Syrna, and that this ingenious Artist thought fit to represent her with the Polar Star upon her Head, holding in her left Hand the Horn of Amalthea, commonly called the Cornucopia. 'Tis beyond Doubt that by the first of these Symbols he designed to express

(a) See what is said above, Vol. I. Book 3.

(1) In Nic. c. 30.

press the Power of this Goddess over the World ; and by the second that she was the Dispenser of all Goods. After him came Pindar, continues Pausanias, who celebrated this Divinity in his Verses, and gave her the Name of Pherepolis, as you would say, the Protectress of Cities. This is nearly the Origin of the Worship of Fortune in Grcece, a modern Divinity not known before Pindar.

The Greeks erected to her in Aftertimes several Temples, and those of Corinth gave her the Surname of Acreea, because she had one in their Citadel. This Goddess had also a Chapel at Egira, with a Statue having beside it a winged Cupid, probably to signify that in Love Fortune has a greater Influence than Beauty. In that of Elis she had in her Hand the Cornucopia ; but the most suitable Symbol was that which the Beotians had given her, having represented her in a Temple of theirs holding Plutus in her Arms under the Form of an Infant ; and this, says Pausanias (1), is an ingenious enough Notion, to put the God of Riches into the Hands of Fortune, as if she had been his Nurse and his Mother. The City Smyrna in short was not the only one in Asia, where Fortune was worshipped ; the Inhabitants of Antioch held her in extreme Veneration (2), and 'tis not improbable that several other People imitated their Example ; for in general almost all Men are Votaries of Fortune ; and tho' they don't always offer Victims to her, yet they but too often sacrifice to her their Honour and Probity.

Among the Encomiums given to this Goddess by Pindar, he made her one of the Parcæ, and to have the greatest Power of them all ; whence we may conclude, that she was confounded with those inexorable Goddesses, or, to speak more accurately, with Destiny itself, that blind Divinity, who distributed Good and Evil at random : and such was the Idea the Greeks had of her.

The Romans had much the same Sentiments of her, since their most antient Fortune being that which was worshipped

L 3

(1) In Beot.

(2) Pausanias in Corinth.

worshipped at Antium, and which was confounded with the Lots, the Use whereof was so famous in that City (a), 'tis evident that they did not distinguish her from Destiny, or that Fate which the Greeks called Eimarmene.

The Romans, content at first with consulting the Lots and Fortune at Antium, adopted at last this Divinity, and established her Worship in their City, where she had afterwards a great Number of Temples. Servius Tullius was the first who built one to her, and thence we nearly see the Date of the Introduction of her Worship into Rome. This Edifice was consecrated to her under different Names; for the Romans gave her several (b): Such as those of Good Fortune, Manly, Bearded, of good Hope, Sweet, Peaceful, Virgin, Fortune of the People, &c. And she had Temples under almost all these different Names, according to Titus Livius and Plutarch; for Dionysius Halicarnassensis mentions only one which was built to her by Servius Tullius: Ancus Martius was the second who built her one under the Title of Fortuna Virilis, she had likewise another under the Name of Female Fortune, and none but the new married Persons were permitted to worship her. 'Tis probable that the Roman Ladies themselves were at the Charge of building that Edifice; accordingly it was reported that upon the finishing of it the Goddess had uttered these Words, Recte me matronæ vidistis, riteque dedicastis.

Fulcius Flaccus raised the most magnificent Temple of all to this Goddess, under the Name of the Equestrian Fortune. That which was erected to her by Q. Catulus, was dedicated to the Fortune of the Day, Fortunæ hujusce diei. If that which Nero consecrated to her was not the most magnificent, it was at least the most singular and splendid, in regard to the Materials whereof it was built. It was entirely of one Sort of Stone found in Cappadocia, called by Pliny, Phingias,
the

(a) See what is said above, Vol. I. in the Article of Divination.

(b) Fortunæ Primigeniæ, Obsequenti, Privatæ, Viscosæ, Masculæ, Barbatae, Bonæ Spei, Averruncæ, Elandæ, Plebeia, Bene Speranti, Virgini, &c.

the Marble whereof, besides its remarkable Hardness, was so white and glaring, that 'tis said when the gates were shut one saw in it clearly. This Temple was afterwards inclosed within that Emperor's golden House. The same Goddess had another in the new Street, under the Title of Fortune with Breasts, who was represented much the same Way as Diana of Ephesus, and Isis, whose Head-dress she wears upon some Figures which are still preserved. Domitian built another to Fortune of happy Arrival, Fortunæ reduci, an Expression which often occurs upon Medals, and that of Fortuna Redux.

Herbert of Cberburi, the Author of a learned Treatise upon the Religion of the Gentiles, which I have already sometimes quoted, alledges that neither the Orientals nor Greeks ever paid any Worship to Fortune, and that the Romans were her sole Votaries. But was he ignorant that the Inhabitants of Antioch had in their City a magnificent Temple to that Divinity; that those of Smyna had consecrated to her the fine Statue which Bupalus had made; and lastly, that as Pausanias tells us, Greece was full of Temples, Chapels, Statues, Bas-Reliefs, and Medals of this same Goddess? What clearer Proof can we have of religious Worship?

As to what remains, all the Monuments of Fortune now extant (1) represent her almost always under the Figure of a Woman with the Cornucopia, or a Helm, or a Wheel, or Globe; Characters either of her Power or Inconstancy. We find her also pretty often with the Symbols of Isis, especially with that odd Head-dress, which we have described in the first Volume, and these Figures are Panthees; sometimes crowned by Victory, to figure some happy Event to the Emperor who represented her so upon Medals: In fine, Spon (2) has given us a Statue consecrated by L. Aurelius Marcellinus, Augustus's Freed-man, which represents Fortune under the Figure of a Man in Years, with a Beard, holding in one Hand a Vase, and in the other an Helm, with this Inscription Fortunæ Bar-

L 4 batæ,

(1) See them in Montfaucon Ant. v. 1, (2) Miscel. Erud. Ant.

batae, To bearded Fortune. Which in short has nothing strange in it, the Pagans having often given both Sexes to their Divinities, as has been said elsewhere.

Tho' Wings were also one of the Symbols of Fortune, nothing being more expressive of the Celerity with which she heap'd good Things upon her Favou-rites, or takes them from those who possessed them; we see not, however, any Roman Figure of this Goddess with Wings; which probably has some Reference to what Plutarch tells us (1), that Fortune having quitted the Persians and Assyrians, first flew swiftly over Macedonia, saw Alexander perish; passed from thence into Syria and Egypt; at last, arriving on Mount Palatine, put off her Wings, and having thrown away her Wheel, entered into Rome, there to fix her Residence for ever.

We are intirely ignorant of the Nature of that Worship which the Romans paid to Bad Fortune; only, that they did pay Homage to her is certain, since, according to Cicero (2), she had an Altar on the Esquilin Mount. As the Inhabitants of Antium, now Nettuno, adored at the same Time two Fortunes, called Fortunæ Geminae, the Twin-Fortunes, 'tis probable that these were Good and Bad Fortune. Martial, who also says they were Sisters, adds, that they gave Oracles upon the Sea-shore (a). Suetonius calls the two Fortunes, The Lots of Antium; because it was by the Lots they were consulted.

C H A P. IV,

Of the Gods of Feasts and Revels, Momus and Comus.

C O M U S.

AS Paganism had Gods who presided over all the Actions of Life, so they could not choose but have some for Feasting and good Cheer, which many People

(1) De Fort. Rom. (2) De Nat. Deor. l. 3.

(a) Hear how that Poet bespeaks the Emperor Damitian, L. 5. Ep. 1.

*Seu tua fatidicæ discunt responsa sorores,
Pleza suburbanæ qua cubat unda freti.*

People make their most serious Employments. Comus, however, whose Office was to preside there, would hardly be known to us but in Name, had not Philostratus mentioned him in one of his Pictures (1). That Author paints this God as at the Chamber of two young Spouses, which communicates with a Hall, where are held an Entertainment and Ball, youthful, and full of Wine, his Face flushed, he sleeps upon his Feet, and reaches forward his Head, which is crowned with Roses, while his Neck is hid. He seems to lean his Left-hand upon a Stake, but Sleep makes him let go his Hold ; and as he staggers, the lighted Torch, which he holds in his Right, seems to drop out of his Hand. The young God, for fear of burning himself, seems to draw in the Left Leg to the Right, turns the Torch towards the Left, and endeavours to shun the Steams of it, by putting away his Hand from his Knees. His Head being down, you see but little of his Face, but the Light that falls upon the Rest of his Body, makes him discernible. A Picture of Fancy, as are all the Rest of this Author's ; but 'tis easy to find out by it the God of Banqueting and Jollity.

Some Mythologists derive the Name of Comus from the Word κωμαζειν, Comessari, to revel, or make merry ; but others, and possibly with more Reason, derive it from a Kind of Song, which the Antients called Comus. For as there is eating and drinking at jovial Feasts, so is there usually singing ; and as they had Songs for the different Stations of Life (a), so there were Feasts and Repasts, which were called from the Name now mentioned. Vigenere, the learned Commentator on Philostratus, has been at the Pains to explain all the Attitudes of the God now in question ; but besides that they are only the Product of Philostratus's Imagination, they are easy to be understood.

M O M U S.

As Comus was the God of good Cheer among the Greeks and Romans, so Momus, whom Hesiod makes the Son

(1) Picture of Comus.

(a) See the Diss. of M. de la Nauze upon the Songs of the Antients. Mem. of the Acad. v. 9.

Son of Night and Sleep, was taken by both for the God of Buffoonery and Jests. Satyrical to Excess, he let nothing escape him, but made even the Gods, and Jupiter himself, the Objects of his most pungent Raillery. No Body has drawn him in more true and lively Colours than Lucian; and we may see, in his Counsel of the Gods, where the Question was about expelling all Strangers, and such as had been improperly introduced into Heaven; there, I say, we may see in what Manner, and with how little Ceremony Momus speaks of them. 'Tis, in short, from this Manner of censuring the Vices and Defects of others that Momus has his Name (1). It was he who found Fault with the Gods, because, in the Formation of Man, they had not made a little Hole or Window in his Breast, that one might have seen into his Heart what were his Thoughts; tho', to say Truth, Vitruvius (2) attributes this Thought to Socrates.

C H A P. V.

Of the Gods of Medicine and Health, Esculapius, Hygieia, Thelesphorus, Jaso, Panacæa, &c.

THE Name of Esculapius, whom the Greeks called Asclepios, appears to be a foreign Name, and seems derived from the oriental Languages, as shall be said afterwards; and what confirms this Conjecture, is, that Esculapius was actually known in those Countries before he was in Greece. Cicero (3) says, there were several Persons who bore that Name. “The “ first Esculapius, says he, the God of Arcadia, who “ passes for the Inventer of the Probe and Manner of “ binding up Wounds, is the Son of Apollo. The “ second, who was slain by a Thunderbolt, and in“ terred at Cynosura, is Brother to the second Mercu- “ ry. The third, who found out the Use of Purga“ tives, and the Art of drawing Teeth, is the Son of “ Asippus and Asinoe. His Tomb is to be seen in “ Arcadia,

(1) Mōmus in Greek implies Censure. (2) Præf. l. 3. (3) De Nat. Deor. l. 3.

“Arcadia, and the Grove that is consecrated to him, “pretty near the River Lufus.” But however well acquainted Cicero is with the Religion of the Greeks and Romans, he appears to have been ignorant of that of the People from whom they learned it. Sanchoniathon, whose Work was not translated in that Author’s Time, names an Esculapius yet more antient, since he was the Son of Sydik, or, the Just, and of one of the Titanide (1). He was the eighth of his Sons, and Brother to the Cabiri. There had been, as Marsham proves, an Esculapius King of Memphis, Son of Menes, Brother to Mercury the first, who lived about two hundred Years after the Deluge, upwards of a thousand Years before the Grecian Esculapius. In fine, Eusebius (2) speaks of an Asclepius, or Esculapius, whom he surnames Tosorthrus, an Egyptian, and famous Physician, to whom other Authors ascribe the Glory of inventing Architecture, and of contributing not a little to propagate in Egypt the Use of Letters which Mercury had invented.

’Tis not therefore in Greece, but in Phœnicia and Egypt, that we are to seek for the true Esculapius. Being honoured as a God in those two Countries, his Worship passed into Greece, and was established first at Epidaurus, a City of the Peloponnesus, bordering upon the Sea, where probably some Colonies settled at first. This was a good enough Handle for the Greeks to give out that this God was a Native of Greece. But as their Mythology was founded upon very uncertain Traditions, they related his History differently; perhaps too this Confusion was owing to the Plurality of Persons who had bore this Name. In short, not to recite here all that we are told of his Parents, I adhere to the Opinion most generally received in Greece, which gave him Apollo for his Father, that is, some Priest of that God, and for his Mother Coronis, the Daughter of Phlegyas; for as to the Tradition of his having been born of Arfinoe the Daughter of Leucippus, this, according to Pausanias, (1) See the Fragment of that Author, v. 1. l. 2. (2) Chron. Dyn. 3. of the Kings of Memphis.

nias, is the least probable, and worst supported of any. And indeed Apollophanes, to oblige the Messenians, of whose Country Leucippus was, having gone to consult the Oracle at Delphos to know the Place of Esculapius's Nativity, and that of his Parents, the Oracle, or more properly Apollo himself, answered, that he was his Father, that Coronis was his Mother, and that he was born at Epidaurus.

Phlegyas, the most warlike Man of his Age, having gone, according to Pausanias (1), into the Peloponnesus, under Pretence of travelling, but in Truth to spy out the Country, had brought his Daughter with him, who, to conceal her being with Child from her Father, went to Epidaurus, where she was delivered of a Son, whom she exposed upon a Mountain, called to this Day, the Mount Tittbyon, or, of the Breast; whereas, before this Adventure, the Name it went by was Myrtion, from the Myrtles that grew there; and the Reason of this Change is, that the Child having been thus abandoned, was suckled by one of the Goats that fed in a neighbouring Wood (a), guarded by the Dog of the Flock. Aristhenes, this was the Goat-herd's Name, coming to review his Flock, found a She-goat and his Dog wanting, and, as he was seeking for them, found the Child, and was going to carry him off; but no sooner did he come up to take him, than he perceived him all resplendent with Light, which made him believe there was something divine about the Child, upon which he went home. The Voice of Fame soon published that there was a miraculous Infant born. Pausanias adds to the Story now related, that it was also reported that Coronis, at the very Time of her being with Child, suffered herself to be debauched by Ischy the Son of Eletus. It was also given out that she died in Child-bed; and on these two Circumstances has Ovid (2) founded his Fable, which imports, that Apollo having learned from a Raven the Unfaithfulness of his Mistress, had ripped up her Womb with an Arrow,

(1) In Corinth.

(a) Lactantius, Div. l. 1. says that he was suckled by a Bitch.

(2) Met. l. 2.

Arrow, taken out the Child with whom she was pregnant, and sent him to the Centaur Chiron, who took upon him the Care of his Education. The Foundation of this double Fiction is, that an Informer was reckoned a Creature of bad Omen, as was the Bird whose Name Ovid gives him, and Coronis having died in Child-bed, was therefore said to be slain by the Darts of Apollo. But it being a rare Thing to attribute to this God the untimely Deaths of Women, as has been said in his History, another Tradition set forth (1) that it was Diana herself, who, to revenge the Infidelity of his Brother's Mistress (2), took away her Life, which is very conformable to the Opinion they had of those Kinds of Death.

As the Name of Coronis in the Greek Language is the same with that of the Crow, hence another Fable arose upon this Occasion, importing, as we see in Lucian (3), that Esculapius had sprung from that Bird's Egg under the Figure of a Serpent; but the only Thing that gave Rise to this Fiction, whose Foundation is easy to be traced in the Conformity of the Name, is, 1. That the Serpent was the Symbol of Esculapius. 2. From the Story propagated by the false Alexander, whom we shall speak of in the Sequel of this Chapter.

Esculapius being removed from the Place where he had been exposed, was nursed by Trigone, who was perhaps the very Wife of the Goat-herd who had discovered him; and when he was capable of improving by the Lessons given at that Time by the famous Chiron, Phlegyas, to whom he had doubtless been returned, sent him to his School. Being, as we are told, by Diodorus Siculus, of a very quick and lively Genius, he made such Advances there, especially in the Knowledge of Simples, and in the Composition of Remedies, whereof he invented a great Number of very salutary ones, having joined, according to the Custom of those Times, Surgery with the Study of Physick, that he became at length not only a great Physician, but was was even reckoned the God and Inventer of Medicine.

(1) Pauf. loc. cit. (2) P. ibid. (3) Dial. of the false Alex.

'Tis true, the Greeks, who are not very consistent with themselves in the History of those early Ages, gave Apis, the Son of Phoroneus, the Glory of having invented that Art; but perhaps, he having left it very imperfect, Esculapius carried it to such a Degree of Perfection, as to give Occasion to say that he was the Inventer of it.

Esculapius, being contemporary with Jason and Hercules, may have had the same Master with them; and Chiron being reputed the most sufficient Man of his Time for the Education of Youth, may have very probably educated all the three. This ingenious Centaur was Master both of Astronomy, Musick, the Art of War and Physick. Thus, while Hercules applied himself to wrestling and other bodily Exercises, and Jason to the Art of War, Esculapius gave himself wholly to Physick, and therein made great Proficiency. As the Intimacies contracted between School-fellows are usually the most lasting, so Jason and Hercules, when they set out in their Expedition to Colchis, engaged Esculapius to be of the Party (a), and he did great Service to them in the Capacity of Physician. In fine, he acquired so great Reputation in his Art, that, like Hercules, and some others of his Contemporaries, he was deified after his Death, and was accounted the God of Physick. And if we may believe Pausanias, it was but a short Time after his Death that he received divine Honours. They add farther, that he formed the celestial Sign called Serpentarius. His Posterity, according to Pausanias (1), reigned in a Part of Messenia, and it was from thence that his two Sons, Machaon and Podalirius, set out for the War of Troy.

The Messenians even cited the Verses in Homer that represent Nestor comforting King Machaon wounded with an Arrow, as being his Neighbour; for both of them

(a) Clem. Alex. Strom. l. 5. See my Diss. upon the Argonauts.
Mém. of the Acad. of Bell. Lett.

(1) In Mess.

them reigned in Messenia. The same Author tells us, that at Gerania was to be seen Machaon's Tomb, and at Pheres a Temple that was also dedicated to him: For he was advanced to divine Honours, and his Worship was established in Messenia by Epithes the King of Andamia. As for Podalirius, we are ignorant of the History of the last Years of his Life. Tzetzes however informs us, upon the Authority of the Physician Soranus of Ephesus, that he had passed over to Rhodes, where probably he died.

Esculapius married Epione (1), by whom he had two Sons now mentioned, and four Daughters, Hygieia, Eglè, Panacea, and Jaso.

I am not ignorant, that some learned Men of the last Age, and of the present, will have it that there never was another Esculapius but the Egyptian and Phœnician whom we have spoke of at the Beginning of this Chapter: But this is to advance an Opinion that will not hold: The History now related is consistent in the Main, and few Accounts of that Time are so coherent, however they may be true. We actually find Esculapius in the List of the Argonauts, and 'tis very obvious that his Son might be at a War which so soon followed their Expedition. For, in short, tho' we should adopt the ingenious Conjecture of Bochart (2), followed by F. Thomassin, and other learned Men, that the Name of Esculapius, or, to speak more accurately, Asclepius, is derived from that of Kaleb, which the Hebrews gave to a Dog, and that it is composed of these two Words in the same Language, Isch-Kalibi, Vir Caninus, what will follow from it, but that there had been an Esculapius in the oriental Countries long before he was known in Greece? A Thing not denied. Let us grant what that celebrated Author alledges, that it was in Allusion to this Name of Esculapius Dogs were kept in his Temple, as we learn from Pausanias; this Circumstance only proves that it was a Remain of the Egyptian or Phœnician Tradition brought into Greece by the Colonies of Danaus and Cadmus.

We

(1) Others call his Wife Lamptia. (2) Hierof. Pens. 1. 1. 2. c. 55.

We are willing to add with M. Fourmont (1), that the Particle es or ex, which begins the Name of this God, signifies a Goat in the Language of the Phœnicians, and with a little Variation, the same Thing in Greek, and that this had given Rise to the Fable of Esculapius's being nursed by that Animal. We can also admit what is alledged by the same Author, that this God was Brother to Eliezer, who, according to him, is the same with Hermes, and that both of them were from Caleb, or of the City of the Dog, upon the Coasts of Phœnicia; and that this is the true Origin of the Name of this God, whereof Bockart had only a Glimpse, without seeing farther; provided however, we take this along with us, that this is one of those Conjectures which one has Liberty to receive or reject, according to the Weight of Argument wherewith it is supported, and which I advise the Reader to consult in that Academic's own Work. They are still of more Force than those which Huetius has drawn together (2), to prove Esculapius to have been the same with Moses. But neither the one nor the other destroy the Existence of the Greek Esculapius.

Let us therefore conclude, in order to reconcile so many different Opinions, that it is unquestionable there was one Esculapius in Phœnicia, and another in Egypt; that the Worship of the former was brought into Greece by Cadmus's Colony, and of the latter by that of Danaus, some Ages before the Trojan War (a); that this Worship was adopted by the Greeks; but that afterwards a celebrated Physician, who lived in the Time of Hercules and Jason, having obtained divine Honours, his Worship came to be confounded with that which was paid to the antient Esculapius; so that, in Process of Time, the Worship of the latter came to be quite forgot, and the new God substituted altogether in his Room.

As the Greeks always carried the Encomiums of their

(1) Refl. Crit. v. 1. p. 189. (2) Dem. Evan. p. 4.

(a) We shall give the precise Dates of the Arrival of those Colonies in the Beginning of the 4th Vol.

their great Men beyond the Truth, so in a high Hyperbole they said, that Esculapius was so expert in Medicine, that not content with Curing the Sick, he even raised the Dead (a) ; that Pluto cited him before the Tribunal of Jupiter (1), and complained to him that his Empire was considerably diminished, and was in danger at length of being entirely desolate : So that Jupiter in Wrath slew Esculapius with a Thunder-bolt. To which they added, that Apollo enraged for the Death of his Son, slew the Cyclops who forged Jupiter's Thunder, with the rest of that Fable, which I have related in the History of Apollo : A Fiction which obviously signifies only that Esculapius had carried his Art very far, and that he had cured Diseases believed to be desperate. The Worship of the Grecian Esculapius was first established at Epidaurus, the Place of his Birth, and soon after propagated through all Greece. “ That this Worship began in that Town, says Pausanias (2), can be evinced from more Proofs than “ one. For first, his Feast is celebrated with more “ Pomp and Magnificence at Epidaurus than any “ where else. In the second Place, the Athenians “ grant that this Feast was derived to them from Epidaurus, accordingly they call it Epidauria, as well “ as the Anniversary of the Day in which the Epidaurians began to worship Esculapius as a God.” He was worshipped at Epidaurus under the Figure of a Serpent, which did not hinder him however from having the Figure of a Man in his Statues. That which was of Gold and Ivory, the Work of Thrasmedes of Paros, represented this God seated on a Throne, having a Battoon in one Hand, and resting the other upon a Serpent's Head, with a Dog lying by him. Though Esculapius was generally represented bearded, there was however one of his

VOL. III.

M

Statues

(a) Ovid, as shall be said in the History of Theseus, says he raised Hyppolitus, and Julian says the same of Tyndarus.

(1) Diod. l. 4. and other Mythol. (2) In Corinth.

Statues without a Beard, as we learn from Pausanias (1).

From Epidaurus the Worship of this new God pass'd first to Athens, and several other Cities of Greece. Archias having been wounded in the Chace, came to Epidaurus (2) to implore the Assistance of Esculapius; and when he was cured, he brought his Worship to Pergamus, where this God was looked upon as the Patron and Protector of the City.

Accordingly we often find him upon the Medals of the Emperors struck at Pergamus. In a Medaillon which was made upon Occasion of the Peace between the Pergamenians and Mytelenians, this God appears with his Battoon and a Serpent, standing by a Goddess who sits, being probably Juno the Protectress of the Mytelenians. Upon another Medaillon struck at Pergamus, we see Esculapius with Fortune, to signify, no doubt, that the Prosperity of the Pergamenians was owing to the Protection of this God. We also find him upon the Medals of the Tilineans, which proves that they had likewise adopted his Worship. From Pergamus the Knowledge of him was propagated very soon to Smyrna, where a Temple was built to him upon the Sea-shore, which was still subsisting in the Time of Pausanias. The Island of Crete likewise received the same Worship, witness the Temple which he had there. From Europe and Asia it was carried into Africa, since the Inhabitants of Balonogrus in the Cyrenaium had also dedicated to him a Temple (3). These even sacrificed to him Goats, which the Epidaurians did not.

Besides the Temple built at Epidaurus in honour of Esculapius, this God had also a sacred Grove there, within the Bounds of which they neither allowed any sick Person to die, nor a Woman to lie in. Whatever was sacrificed to the God was to be consumed in the Grove, which Usage was also observed at Titana, where the same God was worshipped. His Statue by Thrasymedes, was of Gold and Ivory, like that of Olympian

(1) Loc. cit. (2) Id. ib. (3) Id. ib.

lympian Jupiter at Athens, but one half less. There Esculapius was represented upon a Throne, in the manner already mentioned. Lastly, round the Temple there were a great Number of Columns, upon which were inscribed the Names of those who were indebted to this God for their Cure.

The Inhabitants of Titana (1), who paid Homage to Esculapius, as has been said, offered to him in Sacrifice the Bull, the Lamb, and the Hog. They did not content themselves with cutting off the Thighs of the Victims, as in other Sacrifices. They roasted them entire, all but the Skins, which they burnt upon the Altars. Coronis, Esculapius's Mother, partook also of divine Honours, and had in the Temple of her Son a Statue which was transported every Year into that of Minerva. The Cock and the Serpent were also especially consecrated to the same God. Pausanias tells us, that they used to feed tame Snakes in his Temple at Epidaurus; and he is seldom represented without this Symbol, as shall be said presently. It was even alledged, that he had shewed himself under the Figure of this Reptile. Accordingly the Romans, infested with the Plague, having consulted their sacred Books, learned, that in order to be delivered from it, they were to go in quest of Esculapius at Epidaurus, as we are told by Titus Livius (2), Florus, Valerius Maximus (3), and Ovid (4). Accordingly, Ambassadors were deputed to Epidaurus, and the Priests having given them a tame Adder, which they said was Esculapius himself, they embarked with it, and arrived near the Island of the Tyber, where it came out of the Ship, and hid itself under the Reeds. It was believed that the God had chosen this Place for his Residence; and after having there built him a Temple, they lined all the Borders of the Island with a Marble Key, under the Figure of a large Ship: In this Manner was the Worship of Esculapius established at Rome, A. U. C. 462. This Event is represented on a fine Medaillon in the King's Closet, on the Reverse of an

M 2 Antonine.

(1) Id. ib. (2) L. 10. (3) L. 1. (4) Met. l. 15.

Antonine. There you see the Tyber under the usual Figure of Rivers, sitting upon the Water, holding a Bough in his left Hand. By him appears the Island of the Tyber, which Plutarch calls Mesopotamia, because it is in the Middle of that River. It has the Form of a Ship, as it actually had, and some Remains of it still appear, which have escaped the Injuries of Time and the Inundations of the River. Upon the Top of the Ship's Prow, which represents the Island, is in the Medal a wreathed Serpent, which makes Head against the Current of the River (a).

To conclude, the Reason why the Serpent is so often represented upon the Monuments of Esculapius is, that this Insect, whence he drew excellent Remedies, is of great Use in Medicine, or because it is the Symbol of Prudence, a Virtue so necessary in Physicians. Such another Adventure as that which we have now related, happened, according to Pausanias (1), to those who built the City Limera in Laconia, who sent also to seek for Esculapius. The prevailing Opinion, that this God appeared under the Figure of a Serpent, gave Rise to the Trick of one Alexander, which Lucian pleasantly relates (2).

This Adventurer having found a Way to convey one of these Insects into a Crow's Egg, and having placed it in the Foundations of a Temple which was beginning to be built in honour of Esculapius, gave out that he had there found that Egg; and having opened it in Presence of several Persons, averred to them that it was Esculapius; then having hid himself for some Time, he appeared again with a large Snake, which he had tamed; and the credulous People imagining it was the God of Physick, were zealous to consult this Impostor, who by this Trade gained a great Deal of Money.

The Sick came in Crowds into the Temples of this God to be cured of their Infirmities; there they usually spent the Night; and whenever they received there

(a) This Island is called at this Day St. Bartholomew.

(1) In Lacon. c. 23. (2) Dial. of the false Proph.

there any Ease, they left Representations of the Parts of their Bodies that had been cured.

'Tis highly probable that the Priests who minister'd in those Temples, and who commonly were able Physicians, made the Patients take Remedies, though in a secret Manner, or mix'd up some of them with such Things as the Patients were obliged to take for Sustenance, and then ascrib'd to the God the Cures, which were only owing to those Medicines. What I have here alledged is not without Foundation: We know that Apollonius Tyanæus, having passed some Years in the Temple which Esculapius had at Ægæ, a Town in Cilicia, which was one of the most celebrated, drew from thence several Pieces of Knowledge, and learned the Use of a great Number of Medicines, which he afterwards made Use of in curing the Sick, to whom he gave them for nothing; which drew Crowds after him, and gained him a great deal of Reputation.

How much soever Aristophanes in his Plutus rallies Esculapius and the other Gods, yet he shews us in what Manner the Patients used to pass the Night in his Temple in order to be cured; and there are perhaps few Pieces in Antiquity whence greater Light may be drawn as to this Article, than from that same Comedy (a).

The other Gods of Physick, and of Health which it procures, were among the Greeks, Hygieia, Thelesphorus, Ïaso, and Panacea, who were said to be the Children of Esculapius, and Meditrina. The Pergamenians, as we are told by Pausanias, upon the Faith of an Oracle worshipped Thelesphorus as a God, whom the Epidaurians, who also ascribed divine Honours to him, called Acesios, Health-giving, and the Sicyonians, Evemerion. Accordingly this God, properly speaking, was the God of those who were on the mending Hand. Hygieia also participated in the same Honours, as well as her Sisters (b) Panacea and Ïaso.

M 3

The

(a) See the Medal of the Epidaurians, quoted in Spanheim, and the 76th Page of the third Vol. of the Theatrum Græcum.

(b) These two Names have a visible Relation to Physick, the first signifying universal Remedy, the second Medela, Cure.

The Author now quoted says, that in the Temple of Esculapius at Sicyon, was a Statue of the first of these three Goddesses, almost wholly covered with a Veil, to which the Ladies of that Town dedicated their Locks; and we find her often represented upon ancient Monuments and Medals, sometimes with her Father, and frequently by herself. The Romans especially bore a high Respect to that Goddess, look'd upon her as the Saviour of the Empire, and gave her that Title upon their Medals.

I have no Design to consider all the Monuments upon which Esculapius is represented, and the other Gods of Physick, who make the Subject of this Chapter. The Reader may consult the Antiquaries: It suffices to take Notice, that Esculapius always appears under the Figure of a grave Man wrapp'd up in a Cloak, having sometimes upon his Head Serapis's Calatbus, with a Battoon in his Hand, which is commonly wreathed about with a Serpent; sometimes again with a Patera in one Hand, and the Serpent in the other; sometimes leaning upon a Pillar, round which a Serpent also twines. The Cock, an Animal consecrated to this God, whose Vigilance figures that Quality which Physicians ought to have, is sometimes at the Feet of his Statues, and he is once represented holding one of them in his Hand. Socrates, we know, when dying, says to those who stood around him in his last Moments, We owe a Cock to Esculapius, give it without Delay. Hygieia, who often accompanies her Father in the Monuments of him now remaining, appears like a young Woman, commonly holding a Serpent in one Hand, and a Patera in the other; sometimes the Serpent drinks out of the Patera; sometimes he twines about the whole Body of the Goddess. Thelesphorus is always drawn like a young Man, and with a singular Habit. 'Tis a long Robe that covers his whole Body, insomuch that the Arms are not to be seen: He has upon his Head a Kind of Cowl, so that nothing but his Face is left uncovered. This Habit is almost in every Thing like that of the Camal-

Camaldoli. This Attire contains, no Doubt, some Mystery : But whether it signified that Patients ought to be well covered, or some other Thing, is what we cannot determine. Lastly, Meditrina, whose Name comes from mederi, or medela, Cure, or, to cure, was another Goddess of Physick, whom Varro and Festus informs us to have been worshipped at Rome : The principal Ceremony of her Feast, called Meditrinalia, consisted in tasting new Wine, as a Beginning of Health ; the Pontiff of the God Mars, called Flamen Martialis, recited with a loud Voice this Form, New Wine is to be drunk, and the old as a Remedy.

SALUS, or the Goddess of HEALTH.

As Health itself is undeniably the principal Blessing of Life, after having spoke of the Gods who were worshipped in order to obtain it, I shall say a Word or two of her. The Romans, who had made a Divinity of her under the Name of Salus, conferred upon her a particular Worship. Cicero, Pliny, and others, make frequent Mention of Temples consecrated to this Goddess, and Titus Livius speaks of one which was erected to her by Junius Babulo the Censor, near one of the Gates of the City ; which, for that Reason, was called the Gate of Health, Salutaris. As the Antients speak frequently of the Augury of Health, and Cicero thus expresses himself to that Purpose, Salutem populi sacerdotes augurantur ; 'tis proper to take Notice that the Priests of that College had arrogated to themselves the sole Privilege of supplicating the Gods for the Health of every Particular, and of the whole State, as if every one could not ask it for himself. Dion (1) informs us, that the Day set apart for that Ceremony of the Augurs was very solemn ; and as it was one of the necessary Conditions, that no Army had set out from Rome during the Year, and that they were in the Enjoyment of a profound Peace, it often happened that they were a long Time before they could take the Auguries of Health.

C H A P. VI.

Of certain Gods peculiar to the Greeks, and some People in Asia Minor and the Isles.

AMONG the Gods whom I am to speak of in this Chapter, there were some topical, or such as were peculiar to certain Places; and others common, who were adored in several Places. Those were commonly called the Tutelar Gods, who were believed to take Care either of a Person, or House or City, and sometimes of a whole People, and who were honoured with a particular Worship. Servius upon that Verse where Virgil calls Apollo the Guardian of Soracte, Custos Soractis Apollo (1), observes that those topical Gods were appropriated to a particular Country. Each Country had one or two of them. Thus Astarté was the topical Divinity of the Syrians; Disares and Dionysius of the Arabians; Maraci of the Inhabitants of Minuræ in Italy; Tibilius of the People of Noticum; Deventinus of the Crustumenians; Ancharita of the Aſculans. Such again was Minerva at Athens; Juno at Samos and Carthage; Mars in Thrace; Venus at Cythera; Paphos and Amathus, &c. Faunus to the Latins; Sencus to the Sabines; Fenelles to the People of Aquilcia; Laphistius to the Archomenians; Tenes to the Inhabitants of Teredos; Vulcan at Lemnos; Bacchus at Naxos; Apollo at Delphos; among the Carians, Lagdonia; Tuiston and Velleda to the Germans; Esus to the Gauls. The Romans, as we are told by Macrobius (2), had also their tutelar Gods; and whenever they besieged a City, they were sure, according to Pliny, to call forth the Patron God of that City, by a Priest whom they brought along with them for that End, who, with some Forms, exhorted him to quit his Residence, and come into their Camp, and then into their City, where he should be honoured in another Manner than he was in that where he had chosen to reside (a).

As

(1) Æn. l. 11. (2) Satur. c. 9.

(a) See what has been said of Evocations in the first Volume.

As all these Gods are known, and as I have already spoke of them, I go on to others who are less noted.

S O S I P O L I S,

I begin with Sosipolis the God of the Eleans, whom Pausanias speaks of (1); and as he is the only one of the Antients who informs us of him, I shall copy his Account of him. This Author, after he has told us that Lucina had a Temple at Olympia, and a Priestess who ministred to her, adds, “ Sosipolis had also his, “ who is bound to strict Chastity. ’Tis she that “ makes all the necessary Purifications, and offers to “ the God, according to the Manner of the Eleans, “ a Kind of Cake knead with Honey. In the Fore- “ part of the Temple, for the Temple is double, there “ is an Altar dedicated to Lucina, and thither the “ Men have free Access; farther in, is the Place “ where Sosipolis is adored; no Body enters thither but “ the Priestess, and she too, before she exercises her “ Ministry, covers her Head and her Face with a “ white Veil. The Virgins and Matrons remain in “ the Temple of Lucina, where they sing a Hymn, and “ burn Perfumes in Honour of Sosipolis; but they “ use no Wine in their Libations. To swear by Sosipolis, is to the Eleans an inviolable Oath.

“ As for this God, continues the Author, the Eleans “ give the following Account of him. The Arcadians “ having invaded Eli, the Eleans marched a- “ gainst them; and when they were upon the Point “ of giving Battle, a Woman presented herself to “ them, having a Child upon the Breast, and told “ them, that Child would fight for them. He was “ set naked upon the Head of the Army, and pre- “ sently was seen to transform himself into a Serpent, “ a Prodigy which terrified the Enemy, and obliged “ them to fly. As by this Adventure Eli was saved, “ so they gave the Name of Sosipolis to the Child (2), “ and built him the Temple we have now mentioned, “ in that very Spot where, after transforming himself “ into a Serpent, he had disappeared. As Lucina, no “ Doubt,

(1) In Eli. (2) Saviour of the City.

“ Doubt, had presided over the Birth of this wonder“ ful Child, so they set apart for her a Part of the Edi“ fice, and of the Sacrifices that were therein offered.”

We may reasonably believe that this pretended God owes his Original to some Stratagem of the Eleans, who having exposed a Child upon the Head of their Army, and afterwards substituted in his Place a Serpent, reported the Miracle, which put the Arcadians into Consternation, and obliged them to fly, in which there is nothing at all surprizing: But what is not a little so, is, that Pausanias, the Compiler of it, who did not mind much what he had wrote before, speaks once more, and in the same Book of this God; and without reflecting, or referring to the Account he had given of him just before, says; “ At Elis is to be “ seen a Temple of Fortune, and by it a little Chapel, “ where divine Honours are paid to Sostopolis: He is “ represented from an Apparition in a Dream, under
 “ the Form of a Child with a Habit of divers Co“ lours, and sprinkled with Stars, holding in one “ Hand a Cornucopia.”

E M I T H E A.

Here again is another Divinity who was only known at Castabe, a City in Caria; namely Emithea, whose History I shall here relate as we have it from Diodorus Siculus, the more willingly that I know no other Demi-Goddes in Paganism but herself. All Greece was full of Demi-gods and Heroes, and of Temples erected to them; but as for Demi-Goddeses, they had none but the three Sisters I am going to speak of. “ There “ is, says the Author now named (1), in the City of “ Castabe (a), a Temple of Emithea, whose History is “ variously related: But the Manner most followed by “ the Inhabitants of the City is as follows. Staphilus and “ Cbrysothemis had three Daughters, Malpadia, Rboio,
 “ and Parthenia. Rboio, with whom Apollo fell in Love, “ proved with Child, and her Father perceiving it,
 “ shut her up in a Coffer, and threw her into the Sea.
 “ In

(1) L. 5. c. 33.

(a) 'Tis probably Castabala. See la Martiniere.

“ In the Interim, as the other two Sisters were one Day “ keeping their Father’s Wine, a Gift lately conferred “ upon Men, they fell asleep, and some Swine having “ broke the Vessel wherein it was contained, it was “ spilt to the last Drop. These two Daughters fearing “ their Father’s Wrath, went to the Sea Shore, and “ there threw themselves down headlong. Apollo,
 “ who interested himself in them for their Sister’s Sake, “ supported them in their Fall, and transported them “ into two several Cities: Parthenia to Bubastis, where “ she has her Temple and her Worship, and Malpa- “ dia to Castabé, where this Protection of the God “ procured her the Name of Emithea, Demi-Goddes, “ and the Veneration of all the Inhabitants of the “ Country. In Commemoration of the Wine spilt, “ Offerings are made to her of that Liquor mixed “ with Honey, and no Man who has ate Pork, or “ who has touched it, is permitted to enter into the “ Temple of Emithea. The Honours of this Tem“ ple grew in Process of Time to such a Degree, that “ not only is it in singular Veneration in the Country, “ but People even come from a great Distance to of“ fer there certain Sacrifices, and to make rich Dona“ tions. Nay more, the Persians, who are Masters “ of Asia, and who pillaged all the Temples of the “ Greeks, had a Respect for this. The very Free“ booters, who account nothing sacred, have always “ abstained from touching its Treasures, though this “ Temple being without Walls might be rifled with “ all Security. This Distinction is founded upon the “ common Interest of Mankind; for ’tis alledged
 “ that all the Sick who sleep there, are cured upon “ their awaking, and that several have been delivered “ there from strange and incurable Maladies. We are “ especially told that the Goddess is propitious to “ Women who have hard and dangerous Labour in “ Child-bearing. Accordingly her Temple is full of “ Marks of Gratitude that have been brought thither
 “ at all Times: A Depositum better secured by Re“ ligion

“ligion common to all, than it would be by Walls
“and Guards.”

P S A P H O.

Follows a topical God adored in a Part of Libya, who owes his Divinity to a Stratagem, namely Psapho, who having taught some Birds these Words ; Psapho is a great God, let them loose into the Woods, where they repeated these Words so often, that People were induced thereby to deify him after his Death. The famous Hanna, the Carthaginian General, tried the same Artifice, as we are told by Eliau, but the Birds ill-trained were no sooner let fly into the Woods than they resumed their usual Chattering (1), and thus he was baulked of his Hopes.

C A R M E L U S.

The Syrians who dwelt in the Confines of Mount Carmel, had a God named Carmelus, whom Tacitus (a) plainly distinguishes from the Mountain. This God, 'tis true, had no Temple, but there was an Altar consecrated to him. It was one of his Priests, named Basilus, foretold Vespasian that he was to be Emperor.

O G O A.

Ogoa was another God adored by the Carians, especially in the City Mylæssus : But all we know about him is this single Circumstance which we have in Pausanias (2), that the Sea, which was thought to pass under the Temple of this God, overflowed it sometimes ; but that Author says the same of the Temple of Neptune Hippius, which was near Mantineæ, and of that which the same God had in the Citadel of Athens. 'Tis probable that Ogoa was the Name which the Mylæssians gave to the God of the Sea. As for those pretended Inundations whereof one was so fatal to Epythus, the Son of Hippotous, that he lost his Sight by it, and within a few Days after his Life too (3), it was the playing of some Piece of Water-work which the Priests had

(1) Var. Hist.

(a) Est inter Judæam Syriamque Carmelus, ita vocant montem Deumque ; nec simulachrum Deo, aut Templum, sic tradidere majores : Aram tantum & reverentiam. Tac. l. 17.

(2) In Arc. (3) Id. ib.

had invented to procure greater Respect to the God whom they served.

A P H E A.

Aphea was a Divinity adored by the Eginetæ, and at the same Time by the Cretans, as we learn from the same Pausanias (1) who thus gives the History of her. In the same Island, says he, we find a Temple consecrated to the Goddess Aphea, in Honour of whom Pindar has composed an Ode for the Eginetæ. The Cretans have an antient Tradition concerning this Goddess, and pretend that Carmanor had a Son named Eubatus, and that of Jupiter and Carmis the Daughter of this Eubatus was born Britomartis, who delighting in nothing but rambling and hunting, was beloved by Diana, but to shun the Pursuits of Minos, who was desperately in Love with her, she threw herself into the Sea, and fell into Fishers Nets. Her Protectress at last put her into the Number of the Gods. The Eginetæ to whom she appeared, worshipped her from that Time under the Name of Aphea, while in Crete she goes under the Name of Dictynna, a Name derived from the Nets into which she fell. This Goddess, in short, is the same with Diana, worshipped under different Names.

Z A M O L X I S.

The Thracians and the Getes, as we learn from Herodotus (2), had also a God who was peculiar to themselves, and served them instead of all others. This was Zamolxis their great Legislator, whose History deserves a Place here. Those who inhabit along the Coasts of the Hellespont informed Herodotus that Zamolxis had been Slave to Pythagoras Son of Mnesarchus; and that after having obtained his Liberty, he acquired great Riches, and returned into his own Country. His principal View was to polish a rude People, and make them live after the Manner of the Ionians. In order to bring this about, he built a stately Palace, where he regaled all the Inhabitants of the City by Turns, insinuating to them, during the Repast,

(1) In Corinth. (2) L. 4. c. 94, & 95.

Repast, that they who lived as he did were to be immortal, and that after having payed the Tribute which all Men owe to Nature, they were to be received into a Region of Delight, where they should eternally enjoy a happy Life: All the while he had People employed in building a Chamber under Ground, and having suddenly disappeared, he shut himself up there, and lived concealed for three Years. His People mourned for him as dead, but in the Beginning of the fourth Year he shewed himself again, and this pretended Miracle struck his Countrymen so, that they were disposed to believe all that he had said to them. He was at last deified, and every one was persuaded that after Death he was going to dwell with this God. They laid before him their Exigencies, and sent to consult him every five Years. The Manner, in short, how they did it, no less cruel than odd, proves that Zamolxis at his Death had not civilized them a great deal. When they had singled out the Man who was to go and lay their Wants before the God, one was employed in holding three Javelins upright, while others held the Deputy by the Feet, and threw him up in the Air, that he might fall down upon the Points of those Weapons. If he was pierced by them, the God was thought propitious to them; and if he did not die, he was cruelly reproached, and treated as a Miscreant. Then choosing out another Deputy, they dispatched him to Zamolxis, without subjecting him to the same Trial. When the Weather was rough and boisterous, the same People let fly their Arrows against Heaven, as it were to brave him who was the Author thereof, declaring they did not believe in any other Gods but Zamolxis. Herodotus, from whom I have this Narrative, after having told us that he did not believe all the Circumstances of it, though he could not but assent to the Truth of the Story in general, adds that he was at least persuaded that Zamolxis lived long before Pythagoras.

A D R A.

A D R A M U S.

If we may give Credit to Plutarch (1), Adramus was also a God peculiar to Sicily; and the City Adrama, which bore his Name, was in a special Manner consecrated to him, though this God was likewise in high Veneration through the whole Island.

CONISALUS, ORTHONA, and TYCHON.

All that we know of Conisalus, Orthona, and Tychon, is, that they were three Divinities peculiar to the Athenians, whose Worship, as we are told by Strabo, resembled that of Priapus.

T A N A I S.

The same Author informs us that Tanais was also a Divinity peculiar to the Armenians; that the Slaves of both Sexes were consecrated to him; that even the People of better Rank offered to him their Daughters, who, so soon as they were consecrated to this God, were authorised by the Law to prostitute themselves to the first Comer, until the Time of their Marriage, and that this Conduct by no Means prevented the Addresses of Suitors.

B E S S A S.

Of all the Antients I know none but Ammianus Marcellinus (2), that makes Mention of the God Bessas, or Befas, worshipped at Abida, a City situated in the Extremity of Thebais. This God, adds the Author, delivered Oracles, and had a peculiar Worship paid him in that City, of which he was the tutelar Deity.

AUXESIA and DAMIA.

As it is the same Herodotus (3) informs us of Auxesia and Damia, whom Pausanias (4) names Lamia, possibly through an Error of the Copier, I shall set down the Account of them as we have it in that Author. The Epidaurians, whose Territory was grown barren, went to consult the Oracle of Delphos, which informed them that the Barrenness would never cease till they had consecrated two Statues to Auxesia and Damia, that those Statues were to be of Olive-Wood. As no Country in Greece but Attica cultivated those Trees, the Epidaurians rians treated with the Athenians, who granted them what they demanded, on Condition that they would come every Year and offer Sacrifice to Minerva Polias and to Erechtheus. The Statues were made, the Barrenness ceased, and the Epidaurians fulfilled their Paction. But some Time after the Eginetæ having carried off those Statues, they would no longer submit to the Necessity of going to Athens to offer the wonted Sacrifices, alledging they had fulfilled the Treaty so long as they had the Statues in their Possession, but that now they were to have Recourse to the Eginetæ. The Athenians sent to enquire at these whether they would fulfil the Condition prescribed to the Epidaurians, and upon their Refusal they prepared to carry off by Force the Statues of the two Goddesses, who being pleased with their Situation, resisted all the Efforts of the Ravishers, changed their Attitude, fell upon their Knees, and from that Time have always remained in that Posture. Herodotus adds, that he had much ado to believe this last Article, and I suppose he will find many People of his Mind.

(1) Parall. (2) L. 19. (3) L. 5. (4) Loc. cit.

As this Historian says nothing of the Origine of these two Goddesses, we must apply for that to the Trezenians, who paid them religious Worship. According to them (1) they were two young Virgins, who came from Crete to Trezene at a Time when that City was divided into two contrary Factions. They were the Victims of Sedition, and the People, who had no Respect for any thing, stoned them to Death. To make some Sort of Reparation for this Crime, they celebrated ever since an annual Festival called the Lapidation.

Z O G O N O I.

The Greeks had also a kind of Gods they called Zogonoi, as much as to say Animal-born. Proclus is he who makes Mention of them. They were believed to have Power to prolong Life : The Rivers and the running Waters were especially consecrated to them. I know not whether Jupiter was of the Number of these Gods,

(1) Pauf. in Corinth.

these Gods; since Hesychius gives him the Epithet of Zwoyónov.

P R O D O M E I.

We find also in the Mythology of the same People the Gods Prodomei, who presided over the Construction of Edifices, and were invoked before laying the Foundations. Pausanias (1) is he who informs us of them. This learned Writer speaking of the Megarians says, “ There you will see the sacred Hearth of “ the Gods called Prodomei, to whom Megareus sacri“ ficed before he laid the Foundations of the new “ Walls with which he encompassed his City.”

The Pure Gods.

The Arcadians bestowed a peculiar Worship upon the Gods named Kαθαροί, the pure Gods. Pausanias, who makes Mention of them, and says it was by them the most solemn Oaths were taken among that People, adds at the same Time that he did not know them.

A N T I T H E I.

Arnobius, I believe, is the only one who speaks of the Gods called Antithei; these were evil Genii, whom the Magicians invoked, and who were only dexterous at doing Mischief. The same Magicians also invoked the Gods called Devi, but these, according to Hesychius, were not bad Genii.

The Goddesses P O T N I A D E S.

The Greeks had also in Veneration a kind of Goddesses Potniades, so called from the City Potnia, who were capable only to inspire Madness (2); and we are told to this Purpose that there was a Well in that City of Beotia, whose Water made the Horses of the Country mad, if they drank of it (a). The Inhabitants of that City offered at a certain Season of the Year an annual Sacrifice to those Goddesses (3), and let go some sucking Pigs, which were said to be found again the following Year near Dodona. But since Pausanias, who

VOL. III.

N relates

(1) In Attic. (2) Μανιφόροι.

(a) Hesychius thinks the Name of those Goddesses was that of the Bacchantes and Menades.

(3) Pauf. in Beot.

relates it, di believes this last Circumstance himself, I reckon every Reader will be of his Mind.

T A R A X I P P U S.

Taraxippus was a mischievous Genius, whose Statue served for no other Purpose in the Stadia of Olympia, but to affright the Horses that passed by, and this God was peculiar to the Eleans (1); but of him we have spoke elsewhere.

C A B R U S.

The City Phaselis in Pamphilia had also a peculiar Deity, called Cabrus, to whom they offered little salted Fishes as a Sacrifice. Suidas, who makes an Island of this City, names this God Calabrus, and Erasmus, in the Proverb of the Sacrifices of the Phaselians, Caprus.

A L A B A N D U S.

The Inhabitants of Alabanda, a City in Caria, paid a peculiar Worship to Alabandus their Founder, and he was the first of their Divinities. His Mother was called Callirhoe; and when he had won the Prize of the Race, they gave him the Name of Alabandus; for as Stephanus says (2), the Carians call a Horse Ala, and Victory Basida. Cicero (3), who lets us know what Veneration the Alabandines had for this God, adds that Stratonicus tired of the Praises which the Carians were incessantly bestowing on their Founder, to the Neglect of Hercules, whom they would not own, answered them: Well! let Alabandus be my Enemy, but may Hercules be yours.

T E N E S.

Tenes, the Son of that Cygnus of whom we have spoke in the History of Phaeton, for having built the City Tenes in the Island which from him got the Name of Tenedos, became the great Divinity of the Inhabitants of that Island, as we learn from Cicero (4) in that Passage where he is reproaching Verres for having paid so little Respect to the most sacred Things, that he had even stole away the Statue of that God. Strabo (5), I know, treats the Account of Tenes as fabulous; but

'tis

(1) Paus. in Eliac. (2) In Alab. (3) De Nat. Deor. l. 2.
(4) In Verrem. (5) L. 14.

'tis not the less true that the People of Tenedos adored him as a God, as appears by their Medals. As to which the Reader may consult a Proverb of Erasmus (1), Servius (2); and Lylio Gyraldi.

C O R O N I S.

The Sicyonians, as we are told by Pausanias (3); had a Goddess whom they named Coronis. Lylio Gyraldi alledges this Author does not let us know whether this was the Mother of Esculapius, mentioned by Ovid; or some other; that he only says she had no Temple; and when the Season of offering Sacrifices to her was come, she was carried into that of Pallas: But this learned Mythologist doubtless had forgot that Pausanias having spoke in the same Book of Coronis Esculapius's Mother, whom Diana put to Death; as has been said in the History of that God; and then making mention of the Temple which Alexander built in Sicyon in Honour of his Grandfather Esculapius; as also of the Statue of Hygieia, and that of Coronis, there is no Doubt but that he meant it of the Mother of that God.

E V E M E R I O N.

The Sicyonians had two other Goddesses; at least a God and a Demi-God; who were peculiar to themselves, namely Evemerion and Alexanor. Pausanias (4) speaking of them lets us know, that every Day after Sun-setting, the first was worshipped as a God, and the other as a Demi-God.

A D E P H A G I A.

The Sicilians acknowledged Adephagia; the Goddess of Gluttony; and if we may believe Elian (5); she had a Temple wherein was lodged the Statue of Ceres. Cicero tells us, that they also worshipped as a Goddess the City Himera (6). We know nothing of Automatia, or Chance; but that Timoleon built her a Temple; nor of Ergane; adored as a Divinity by the Descendants of Phidias; as we learn from Pausanias; nor of the Gemetyllides;

N 2

(1) Tenedon Anspionon. (2) In AEn. 2. (3) In Corinth.
(4) In Corinth. (5) Var. Hist. l. i. c. 27. (6) In Var.

des, who, according to the same Author (1), had their Statues at Athens by that of Venus Colias.

The Good God, or the Good Genius.

They paid Adoration to another God, or rather to a Genius called Ἄγαθος Θεός, the Good God, or the Good Genius. His Temple, as Pausanias tells us (2), was on the left of the Highway that led to Mount Menalus. This God was invoked by the Drunkards, which has made him be sometimes confounded with Bacchus.

NECESSITY and VIOLENCE.

What we know of Necessity and Violence, is, that their Temple, according to Pausanias (3), was in the Citadel of Corinth.

DEUS RISUS.

Plutarch informs us (4), that Lycurgus put Laughter, Risus, into the Number of the Gods. Pausanias too makes mention of him (5), and says that some People in Thessaly celebrated his Festival with Gayety perfectly suitable to this God.

FRRIENDSHIP.

Friendship whom the Greeks name Φιλία, was a Goddess of whom the Antients take little Notice, and we know not whether she had Temples and Altars. Nor has Time preserved any Monument of her. However Lyllo Gyraldi (6) quotes a Fragment of some Hebrew Sentences translated with the Scholia, where we find these Words: “ The Romans represented Friendship as “ a young Woman, with the Head bare, clad in a “ coarse Attire, and below these Words written, Death
“ and Life, while upon her Fore-head was this Inscription, “ Summer and Winter: She had her Breast naked,
“ as far as the Seat of the Heart, where her Hand “ pointed, and these Words were inscribed, Far and “ Near ;” Symbols which figured that true Friendship never decays, that she is equally the same in all Seasons, in Presence or Absence, in Life or Death; that she exposes herself to every Danger to serve her Friend, and keeps nothing secret from him.

All

(1) In Attic. (2) In Attic. (3) In Corinth. (4) In Lycurgo.
(5) This Author calls him Γελωτός Θεός. (6) syn. 1.

F A V O U R.

All that we know of the Goddess Favour, is that Apelles had drawn an excellent Picture of her.

P R A Y E R S, Αἰταί.

Prayers, according to Hesiod (1), were Jupiter's Daughters, moaning Sisters who were repulsed oftner than they were heard. Homer, in the Speech of Phoenix to Achilles (2), gives a charming Description of them :

*Pray'rs are Jove's Daughters, of celestial Race;
Lame are their Feet, and wrinkled is their Face ;
With humble Mien and with dejected Eyes,
Constant they follow where Injustice flies :
Injustice swift, erect, and unconfin'd,
Sweeps the wide Earth, and tramples o'er Mankind, }
While Pray'rs, to heal her Wrongs, move slow behind. }
Who hears these Daughters of almighty Jove,
For him they mediate to the Throne above :
When Man rejects the humble Suit they make,
The Sire revenges for the Daughter's Sake ;
From Jove commission'd, fierce Injustice then Descends, to punish unrelenting Men.*

Pope's Iliad IX. 624.

The Mythologists give several Explications of this Allegory : But it requires no great Penetration to find out that Homer calls Prayers lame, because they come not always just after the Injury that occasions them ; that they are wrinkled and have downcast Eyes, to denote how apt Men are to defer Repentance, and how humble at last when they want to make their Peace with the offended Party.

P O V E R T Y and the A R T S.

Arrian (3) informs us that the Gadarians adored Poverty together with the Arts, which they joined in the same Worship, because Poverty is indeed the Mother of Invention. Plautus, in the Prologue to one of his Comedies (4), makes this Goddess one of the Persons in

N 3

the

(1) Theog. (2) Il. l. 9. (3) De Exp. Alex. (4) In Trim.

the Play, and says that she was the Daughter of Debauchery. Plato, as has been said elsewhere, makes Love to be her Son.

C H A P. VII.

Of some Gods peculiar to the Romans.

BEFORE we come to those Gods who were little known out of Rome, 'tis necessary to give a compendious View of the Roman Religion, and of the several Changes it underwent from Romulus to the last Pagan Emperors. I said at the Beginning of this Volume, that the Romans, after having adopted almost all the Gods of the Greeks, and of most of the Nations which they had conquered, had also filled up their Kalendar with Numbers of others that were peculiar to themselves ; and that thus the Theology of this People was of all others in the Pagan World the most encumber'd with Ceremonies and Superstition. But at the same Time, we are to remark, that all those Additions were made at different Times, and that if we consider this Religion in its Rise, it was much more simple, and more free from Superstitions than it was in latter Ages.

I begin with considering it in the Time of Romulus ; for though that Prince seems to have been taken up in little else but War, and in settling the new City, he did not, however, wholly neglect the Affairs of Religion : My Authority is Dionysius Halicarnassensis (1), who says, he rejected all the Poetical System of the Greek Theology. He found that their Fables contained Things mean, childish, and injurious to the Divinity ; that had a Tendency, in a Word, to corrupt weak and vulgar Minds. Mere Mortals, added Romulus, would even blush to be taxed with the Follies they have not scrupled to impute to their Gods ; or were they to be honour'd in such a licentious and dissolute Manner as these Gods of theirs are. Thus that Prince, much more in the Character of a Philosopher sopher than might have been expected from his Education, did accustom his new Subjects to form magnificent Ideas of the supreme Being, and to scorn all those Fictions that nurse up Ignorance, and Credulity its inseparable Companion. Hence, probably sprung that Contempt which the Romans had for the Greeks, a Contempt which suited both with the Roughness of their Manners, and their inbred Aversion to all Kind of Servitude.

(1) Ant. Rom. l. 1.

But I shall quote this ingenious Historian's own Words, were it for no more but to give a quite other Notion of Romulus than we are apt to conceive of that first King of Rome. “ I cannot sufficiently admire, “ says Dionysius, that the Characters of so extensive “ Wisdom should dwell in one Man. Romulus was “ persuaded, that the Prosperity of States depended “ upon those great Principles, whereof most Politicians take Advantage, but few know how to carry them “ into Execution. Above all Things, he said it was “ necessary to be in Friendship with the Gods, because Prosperity was the usual Result of their Favour and Protection. Thus Romulus bent all his “ Care towards the Execution of this great Scheme, “ and began with the Worship of the Gods. He “ built them Temples and Altars, set up their Statues, exposed their Images, which he adorned with “ Marks of their Power, and Symbols proper to keep “ up the Memory of their Benefits. He instituted “ Feasts in honour of each God, Sacrifices and various “ Ceremonies proportioned to the Manner in which “ they would be worshipped. He appointed public Solemnities, where all the People, laying aside “ their Work, were obliged to give Attendance : “ But that he might do nothing but in Conformity “ to the antient Usages, he consulted what was most “ sacred, and most universally received in the Religion of the Greeks. As for the Fables that are full “ of infamous Detractions, making the Gods the Authors of the most foul and enormous Crimes, he “ rejected them all with Abhorrence ; not only as fri“ volous and impertinent, but also as so many Impi-“ eties, which subjected the Gods to Passions where“ of Men ought to be ashamed. By this Means he “ accustomed the Romans never to think or speak of “ the Divinity but with Reverence, instead of believ“ ing the Gods capable of shameful Actions, with “ which some Fables have charged them.”

“ We don’t find in the Books of those Times, that “ the Sons of Cælus made their Father impotent ; that “ Saturn devoured his Children for fear that they “ should ravish his Crown from him ; that Jupiter de“ throned Saturn, and kept him confined in the Pri“ sons of Tartarus : No Mention there of the Battles
 “ of the Gods, nor of their Wounds, their Chains,
 “ and Exile : No mournful Feasts are there to be “ seen, nor doleful Ceremonies, where is nothing but “ Lamentation, shedding Tears, and disconsolate “ Mothers, complaining of the Cruelty of the Gods.
 “ As degenerate as the Romans are at present, we “ find not among them a Representation of the Co- “ rybantes : Those secret Assemblies, those nocturnal “ Ramblings of the Bacchanals, those shocking Free“ doms of both Sexes, in Places of the greatest Sancti“ ty and Veneration, are absolutely banished from “ their Manners.”

The same Historian owns, however, that in his Time they gave greater Indulgence to those Grecian Fables ; they alledge, says he ironically, that under enigmatical Figures they conceal the most surprising Wonders, and comprehend Things of a very profound Meaning. I shall not examine, continues he, whether this Opinion is founded upon good Grounds, or if they who propagate it, don’t endeavour to blindfold themselves. All I shall say here is, that every one is not able to find out that mysterious and hidden Meaning. Is it to be thought, that the Populace have a Talent of divining ? When the History of the Gods worshipped in Greece is delineated before them, they either despise them, when they see the Miseries and Weaknesses with which they are encompassed, or en-encouraged by their Example, they give Way to the greatest Irregularities. St. Augustine (1) names among the Gods adopted by Romulus, Janus, Jupiter, Mars, Picus, Faunus, Tyberinus and Hercules. Further, that Prince was assisted in what he did in favour of Religion, by the Tuscan Priests, whom he had brought to Rome and consulted, undertaking nothing in that Affair but by their Decisions.

The peaceful Numa, in the long Quiet he enjoyed during his Reign, turned all his Views towards Religion, and added to it a great Number of Ceremonies which he had learned from the Sabines, among whom he was born. As the Principles upon which he founded them were much the same with those of Pythagoras, he is reckoned by some to have been a Disciple of that Philosopher. But this is a Mistake. Pythagoras came not into Italy till about the End of the Reign of Tarquin the Proud, and consequently, 'tis more reasonable to think, that both the King and the Philosopher had taken several of their Notions from the People that inhabited Latium, which will account for the Resemblance we have now mentioned. But whatever be in that, Numa had juster Sentiments about the Divinity than those who came after him, and being himself convinced of the Existence and Necessity of an infinite and unchangeable Being, he easily brought his Subjects to the same Conviction. He even persuaded them that this Being had no corporeal Form, and that nothing was more absurd than to attempt a Representation of him by Statues or by Paintings, there being no Proportion between Things Spiritual and Material. He also prohibited them from profaning his Altars by bloody Sacrifices, adding, that nothing was more unseemly than to approach him with Hands embrued in the Blood they had been shedding. Persuaded, as we have it in Dionysius Halicarnassæus (2), that a State subsists and flourishes only by Industry and Religion, what he did in this last Article was as follows. First, he made no Alteration in the Ceremonies which Romulus had wisely instituted, adding to them

(1) De Civ. Dei, l. 4. c. 23. (2) L. 1. c. 67

them only what he thought his Predecessor had omitted. He consecrated several Places to Divinities who had not till then been the Objects of Worship, erected Altars to them, built Temples, appointed Festival Days, and established Priests to take Care of their Worship. He made Laws to point out the Duties of those Ministers, and the sacredness of their Profession, to regulate the Usage of the Ceremonies, the Practice of Expiations, and the different Sorts of Worship that were to be paid to the Gods. As Romulus appeared to him to have had something in him superior to Man, he raised a Temple to him, and ordered the Founder of Rome to be worshipped, under the Name of Quirinus, by solemn Sacrifices. The Priests named Curii, because they were to be fixed in each Curia, had the Charge of the Sacrifices of the first Order that were offered publicly in behalf of those Curiae. Those of the second Order were committed to the Priests whom the Greeks called Stephanophori, or Crown-Bearers, and the Romans, Flamines, so called from a Kind of Bonnet and fire-coloured Veil with which they covered their Heads. The Care of the Sacrifices of the third Order was given to the Celeres, created to serve the King as Life-guards; and at the same Time commissioned to offer Sacrifices on certain Days. Those of the fourth Order were committed to such of the Priests as by their Stations were Interpreters of the Signs of the Heavens, and who applied them to Purposes for which they believed them to be sent by the Gods. Those Priests were by the Romans called Augurs, from one Part of their Profession, relating to the Flight of Birds. The Vestal Virgins destined for the Preservation of the sacred Fire, composed the fifth Order in this Hierarchy. The sixth was filled up by the Salii, or the Priests of Mars, whom I have spoke of elsewhere (1). The seventh was for the Heralds at Arms, or the Peace-makers. These Ministers were chosen from the best Families, and their Priesthood was during Life. As they were sent in Time of War to bear the Words of Peace, Numa did not institute them them till he was obliged to take up Arms against the Fidenates, who had often insulted the Romans, and made vast Devastation of their Lands.

(1) Vol. 1. B. 3. and V. 3. B. 1.

The Power of these Priests was very great, if we may give Credit to the Historian from whom I have these Particulars, since neither Peace nor War could be made but by their Determination. In fine, the last Part of Numa's Regulations concerning Religion, comprehended the Sacrifices and Ceremonies that belonged to their Province who had the High-priesthood united with the sovereign Power, that is the Pontiff's. Ministers and Umpires of the most important Affairs, they gave a final Decree in all Differences that arose on Points of Religion among private Persons, Magistrates, and the Officers, who by their Priesthood took Care of the Worship of the Gods. In like Manner in all that concerned divine Service, when there was nothing written in the public Registers, nor received by public Usage, they had Power to pass new Laws, to examine into the Conduct of all those who meddled with the sacred Ministration, and especially to watch over the subaltern Ministers, that they might do nothing in their respective Functions contrary to Rule. Such were the Laws which Numa made for regulating divine Service ; not to mention a vast many more, whence he found great Assistance in inspiring the Romans with the Love of Religion and Piety.

The other Kings, Numa's Successors, being wholly engaged in War, made but few Alterations in Religion, and new Divinities were only introduced upon particular Occasions, as shall be said afterwards.

This primitive Simplicity was but of short Duration ; and Plutarch tells us, that the Romans were only seventy Years without having either Statues or Images of their Gods ; Varro however reckons near two hundred Years (a). The other Changes happened successively,

(a) St. Augustine, in his Thirty first Chapter of his fourth Book de Civ. Dei, says, that Varro computed the Space of upwards of an hundred and seventy Years, and adds these remarkable Words of that learned Roman : And if the same Thing were observed at this Day, the Worship which we pay to the Gods would be more pure and holy.

cessively, and at last led those Conquerors of the World to adore so many Gods, that Varro makes them amount to thirty thousand, and Bruxilus the Philosopher (1), to two hundred and eighty thousand, which makes Petronius say (2) Italy is now so holy, that 'tis easier to find there a God than a Man.

Not but there were now and then High Priests, or other Persons of Discernment, who made vigorous Opposition to the Introduction of new Worship; but the invincible Bias of the People towards all Novelties in Religion prevailed over the wise Vigilance of the Magistrate.

At the Beginning of Christianity (3), the Romans, in order to preserve themselves in Peace, which was the dear Purchase of so many Conquests, took it into their Heads at last to explode all Sorts of new Superstitions and foreign Divinities. They considered the Works of Art and Industry as unworthy to do Honour to Religion. They even prohibited the Oracles from being consulted, especially those of a dubious Original, and which were capable of being corrupted by Money. But at length Rome relapsed into the same Vices which she endeavoured to guard against, and with such Violence, that Titus Livius owns (4), there was no longer a Spot in the City, but was consecrated to some Divinity, nor any Day that was not distinguished by some religious Ceremony.

Seneca, in St. Augustine (5), enters into a Detail very proper to make us acquainted with the Religion of his Time, when after having spoke of the strange Gods adopted by the Romans, and the Absurdities to which they obliged those who served them, as to mangle their Flesh, to mutilate themselves, &c. “ However, “ adds he, that Madness has a limited Time; People “ may play the Fool once a Year; but go up to the “ Capitol, you shall be ashamed of the Extravagancies there daily committed, and to see Folly grown “ so public and universal. There the same Offices “ are

(1) Sat. (2) In his last Har. to the Senate. (3) Tertull. in Apol. (4) Dec. 1. l. 5. (5) De Civ. Dei, l. 6. c. 2.

“ are performed to a Statue of Stone, that would be “ done to a living Man. One tells Jupiter the Names “ of the Gods who are coming to make their Court to “ him; another informs him what ’tis a clock; one “ serves him for an Usher; another for his Perfumer.
 “ There you see Women putting on Juno’s and Mi- “ nerva’s Head-dress; and tho’ they are far from their “ Statues, and even from the Temple, they move “ their Fingers as a Milliner would do, or hold to “ them the Looking-glass. Some are praying the “ Gods to be present at the pleading of their Causes, “ laying their Petitions before them, and intrusting
 “ them with their Affairs. In the same Capitol a Buf“ foon performed daily, as if the Gods had taken “ Delight in seeing him whom Men could no longer “ endure. In fine, there you might meet with Ar“ tists of all Kinds, each of them in his own Trade
 “ at work for the Gods; but what is worse than all “ these, there are Women who never stir from “ thence, because they believe Jupiter is enamoured of “ them, without being in the least over-awed by Ju-
 “ no, who, according to the Poets, was a jealous, cho-
 “ leric, and revengeful Goddess.”

We marry the Gods, says he, in another Place, and observe therein less Decency than in the Marriages of Men, joining together Brothers and Sisters.

But let us pursue the History of this Religion. The Worship of Mithras, which was propagated to Rome in the Time of Pompey, or which had been there pretty much neglected, acquired then new Vigour, and the infamous Ceremonies with which it was loaded, were there practised with all possible Apparatus. The Egyptian Divinities, those Monsters which the Romans had so long detested, began to spread every where among them. There Isis, Osiris, Harpocrates, Anubis, Serapis, &c. had Temples, Altars, and Priests. ’Tis true they were introduced into Rome not without some Shew of Decency, since the Priests ushered in the Ceremonies peculiar to the Worship of those Gods, by asking Permission of the antient Divinities of the Commonwealth; monwealth; but this same Usage, which at Bottom was meer Farce, was soon abolished, and every Place became infected with this strange Worship, Worship the most indecent that Man, abandoned to his own Frailty, was capable of founding! Some Efforts were once more used to suppress it. Agrippa, Son-in-law to Augustus and Governor of Rome, permitted those Ceremonies to be practised only without the City, at the Distance of 500 Paces from the Walls. Tiberius did more: He banished (1) from Rome all who would not renounce the superstitious Ceremonies that were used towards those strange Gods. But whether it was that he changed his Mind afterwards; or that he did not continue to put his Decree in Execution, all the Ceremonies were renewed in the following Reigns. There were even Emperors who intruded themselves among the Priests of Isis, and partook in the Mysteries that were celebrated in Honour of her; others got themselves initiated into all the Egyptian Rites, and Magic especially suited with the Taste of Adrian, Marcus Aurelius, and others.

Last of all, the Roman Religion put on a new Face, at least among the Platonic Philosophers, who, to make it more rational and supportable, invented those intermediate Genii between the Supreme Being and Man, by whose Means their Vows and Prayers were presented to him, for which I refer to what has been said in the fourth and fifth Books of the second Volume.

Long before the wiser Romans had declaimed against that Multitude of Gods adopted among them, and against the Excesses which arose from thence; Varro, as we learn from St. Augustine (2), had observed, with respect to those Gods, so many Things, ridiculous, mean, even shocking, that he plainly shewed he had not a very favourable Idea of them. That learned Roman distinguished civil from fabulous Theology, and commonly rejected the last, tho' it was the most general, being the Religion of the People. We know what Senti-

(1) Tac. Annal. l. 5. Suet. in Tib. (2) De Civ. Dei, l. 4. c. 31. & l. 6. c. 2.

Sentiments. Cicero had of all those Gods, whom vain Superstition had made the Objects of Worship; and for this we need but read his three Books upon the Nature of the Gods. Seneca in St. Augustine (1) censures that civil Theology yet more severely than Varro had blamed the fabulous. We confine the Gods, said he, to vile and senseless Matter; we represent them under the Figure of Beasts and Fishes, and we give the Name of Gods to Things that would be Monsters if they were animated. This much as to the popular Theology; then speaking of the civil, Why then, said he, do we take the Dreams of Titus Tatius, or Romulus, or Tullus Hostilius, to be more rational? One of them has consecrated the Goddess Cloacina, the other Picus and Tyberinus, and the last, Fear and Pale-ness, two pitiful human Passions; one of them a Motion of the Soul when aghast, the other of the animal Spirits, and rather a Colour than an Indisposition.

After this Preliminary, which I thought necessary, I shall come to a particular Detail of those Gods, who I said were peculiar to the Romans. We have already spoke of some of them; such as those of Marriage, under the Head of Juno; those for the Fruits and Fields, in the History of the terrestrial Gods. But, that we may omit nothing of Moment upon this Subject, I shall also make Mention of several others, who were hardly known but by the Romans, and mostly relate to the different States of Life. First, they acknowledged a great Number for Big-bellied Women and for Children. The Goddess Partunda presided over their lying in; and Egeria, whom they invoked with great Devotion, employed all her Endeavour to procure them a happy Delivery; while the Gods called Nixii, eased the Pains of Child-bearing. Prosa averted the Danger of bringing forth, and Post-verta stood by them in hard Labour. The Child was hardly conceived, when the Gods Viturnus and Sentinus gave the one Life, and the other Sensation (2). The Goddess Nascio, or Natio, presided over the Birth,

(1) De Civ. Dei, l. 6. c. 10. (2) August. de Civ. Dei, l. 7.

Birth, and Nondina over the Ninth Day, when the Parents gave it a Name. Vagitanus (1) was invoked for the Cries and Wailings of the Child, and the Goddess Cumina (2) to take Care of the Cradle. As it was the Practice to lay down the new-born Child naked upon the Ground, as we learn from Pliny (a), Macrobius, and Seneca (b), so they implored Favour for it from the Goddess Levana, as it were to lift it up again: When it began to suck, the Goddess Rumina, or Rumia (3), as St Augustine tells us (4), presided over this Operation. When it became capable to eat and drink, the Goddesses then employed were Edufa, or Edufia, and Potina, whose Names express their Functions. When it began to speak, or rather to stutter Fabulinus, the God of Speech, was invoked; and the Goddess Paventia, to avert from them frightful Objects. In fine, when the Child was grown up to an Age fit for Education, the Gods, Statilius and Statanus, were addressed to. Ossilago strengthened their Bones, as we learn from Arnobius (c). There were also other Divinities for Marriage and its Concomitants, such as the Goddesses Virginicuris, Prema, &c. whose Functions I must be excused from explaining.

C H A P. VIII.

The Continuation of the same Subject.

FOLLOW three Divinities whom I find no where but in one Passage of Seneca, quoted by St. Augustine (5). These were the three Goddesses, Populonia,

(1) So called from the Latin Vagitus, which signifies the Cries of an Infant. (2) From Cunæ the Cradle.

(a) Omnes infantes terra nudos excipit. Plin.

(b) Natura hominem tantum nudum, & in nuda humo natali die obijcit. Senec.

Tellure cadentem

Excepi, foveique sinu. &c. Stat. in Sylv.

(3) Ruma in old Latin signified the Breast. (4) De Civ. Dei.

(c) Namque durare & solidare infantibus parvis ossa Ossilago memoratur.

(5) De Civ. Dei, l. 6. c. 2.

nia, Fulgora, and Rumina. We leave some of our Goddesses, says that Philosopher, in Celibacy, as if they had not been able to get a Match ; tho' we have made Widows of others, as Populonia, Fulgora, and Rumina, and I am not at all surprized at their not having been courted a second Time. I know as little about those Goddesses whom the Romans called Fetriæ Deæ, among whom Macrobius names Semoria, nor the Gods whom Plautus terms Patellarii Dii, and whom he seems to place in the lowest Class : Dei me omnes magni minutique, & Patellarii ; As I hope for Favour from the Gods, whether great or small, not forgetting even the Patellarii. Horace has the same Notion of them with Plautus, calling them the little Gods. It will give but little more Light to this Subject, to inform the Reader that the Learned derive this Name from the Patera, an Utensil made use of in the Sacrifices : For the Question still remains, Whether they had made a God of the Utensil itself, or what else he was ?

I shall do little more than name a Multitude of other Divinities, whose Worship was established at Rome ; such as Juturna, as much as to say, Goddess of Aid, who is said by Varro and Servius to have been invoked in any Enterprize of Danger. The Gods Novensiles, which imports Gods newly arrived. Of this Number were reckoned Hercules, Vesta, Salus, Fortune, and Faith. As the Romans received those Gods from the Sabines, they therefore called them the new Gods, for which you may consult Varro (1) and Titus Livius, who make Mention of them. The Gods called Divipotes, who were spoke of according to the same Varro, in the Books of the Augurs, and are confounded by the Learned with the Gods of Samotheace.

Lactantius informs us, that the Romans had taken into the Number of their Goddesses Caca the Sister of the celebrated Cacus, because she had given Hercules Notice of the Theft he had committed upon his Oxen ; and (2) Servius tells us, that she had a Chapel served by the Vestals themselves, who offered up Sacrifices

VOL. III.

O

(1) De Lin. Lat. (2) Upon the eighth Book of the Æneid.

crifices to her. Virgil, who in the eighth Book of his Æneid has so finely described the Adventure of Cacus, instead of speaking of his Sister, says only, that the Theft of that famous Robber was detected by Means of one of the Oxen in the Cave that fell a lowing at the Approach of those which Hercules was leading along.

Q U I E S.

Rest, Quies, a Goddess, as her Name denotes, was invoked for obtaining Repose and Tranquillity. She had a Temple without the Colline-gate, and another, according to Titus Livius (1), in the Labican-street.

MURCIA, STRENUA, and AGERONIA.

Murcia was the Goddess of Sloth, and disposed her Votaries to Indolence: Her Temple, according to Festus, was upon the Aventine Mount. We must distinguish this Goddess from Murtia, the Surname of Venus, as has been said. As Murcia disposed to Indolence, so Strenua and Ageronia, other Roman Divinities, inspired with Vigilance and Courage. The Chapel of the former, as we are told by Varro (2), was near the Via Sacra. We know the God Minutius only from Festus, who says he had a Chapel near the Gate, which from thence had its Name (a).

PELLONIA and FESSORIA.

Just so Arnobius is the only one who gives us the Knowledge of Pellonia, to whom they had Recourse to be delivered from their Enemies, and Fessoria, to preside over the Repose which was the Effect of that Deliverance after the Toils they had suffered.

N E M E S T R I N U S.

To the same Author solely are we indebted for preserving to us the Name of another God called Nemestrinus, who presided over Forests called Nemora. He was probably the Sovereign of the Dryads, Hama-dryads, Fauns, Satyrs, and other Gods Inhabitants of the Woods; as Lætantius is the only one who has taken Notice of the Goddess Faula, Hercules's Mistress.

C A T I U S.

(1) L. 4. (2) De L. Lat. L. 4.

(a) Aug. de Civ. Dei, l. 4. Minutia porta Romæ appellata, eo quod proxima esset sacello Minutii. Festus.

C A T I U S.

Catius was a God who bestowed Wit (1) ; or, if we read with others, Cautus, he made Men cautious and prudent.

Adeona and Abeona, Vacana and Numeria.

Adeona and Abeona, according to St. Augustine (2), were the Gods invoked for going and coming ; Vacana, the Goddess of Vacation, or rather of Cessation from Business, from Vacare ; and Numeria assisted in acquiring the Art of Numbers ; she was the Goddess of Arithmetick.

P O P U L O N I A and F U L G O R A.

Populonia and Fulgura, mentioned by Seneca in St. Augustine, were invoked to hinder the Devastations of Thunder and Lightning : But we are not to distinguish them from Jupiter and Juno taken for the Air, the first of whom had the Surname of Fulgur, and Juno that of Populonia, from the Havock made by Winds and Storms.

L A T E R A N U S.

The God Lateranus presided over the Hearths ; and his Name, according to Arnobius, came from the Brick, Latercula, whereof they were made.

P A N D A.

The Goddess Panda, according to the same Arnobius, was so called, because she opened the Way to the Capitol to T. Tatius.

Arculus, Forculus, Limentina, and Cardea.

The God Arculus was set over Citadels and Fortifications, as Forculus and Limentina were over the Gates of Houses, and Cardea over the Hinges of the same Gates. Ovid informs us (3) that this last Goddess was called Crana, and that Janus having offered Violence to her, would needs have her afterwards to take Care of the Gates.

V I R I P L A C A, the Appiades.

When there happened any Scuffle between Husband and Wife, they addressed Viriplaca to reconcile them ; For that Purpose Valerius Maximus tells us (4), it was usual to repair to her Temple, which was on the Palatine Mount. The Mythologists reckon this Goddess one of those whom the Romans called Appiades, of whom Ovid makes Mention in his Art of Love, and in his Cure of Love. Most of the Learned name among those Goddesses Venus, Pallas, Peace, Concord, and Vesta; but Cicero plainly distinguishes them from Pallas at least, when he says, Non solum Pallada, sed etiam Appiadas nominabo; I shall name not only Pallas, but also the Appiades (1). However that be, those Goddesses had a Temple at Rome, and they were represented on Horseback like Amazons.

O 2

usual

(1) Aug. l. 4. (2) Ib. & l. 7. (3) Fast. l. 6. (4) L. 2.

C L O A C I N A.

A Statue found accidentally in a common Sewer at Rome, gave Titus Tatius a Handle to consecrate it under the Name of Cloacina. Lactantius (2), St. Cyprien, and St. Augustine, make Mention of this Goddess, upon whose Account they have not failed to ridicule the Romans.

C R E P I T U S.

They had full as good a Handle for Ridicule from their God Crepitus, as to whom you may read a Dissertation in the Continuation of the Miscellanies of Literature by F. Desmolets. Time has preserved to us a Figure of this ridiculous Divinity, which represents a young Child in the Posture of that indecent Action, whence this God has his Name.

M E P H I T I S.

The Goddess Mephitis, or of ill Savour, naturally comes in here. Servius upon that Passage in Virgil (3), Sævamque exhalat opaca Mephitim, says that this Goddess may possibly be Juno taken for the Air, because it is by Means of the Air that bad Smells are communicated.

S A L A C E R.

The most ingenious Mythologists know not what to make of the God Salacer. Varro, who gives him the Epithet of Divus Pater, informs us only (4),
that

(1) L. 3. Epist. ad Famil. (2) De Jus, l. 1. (3) Æn. 7.
(4) De Lin. Lat. l. 4.

that this God had a Priest called Flamen Salacris.

H E R E S.

We know little more about the Goddess Heres, who received the Thanks of those who entered upon any Inheritance. Accordingly her Name imports that she was the Divinity of Heirs.

S T A T A M A T E R.

Mother, or Goddess Stata, was worshipped at Rome in the public Market-place; but as this obliged them to kindle great Fires in the Night-time, which might have occasioned some burning, every private Person contented himself with paying his Devotion to her in his own House.

R I D I C U L U S.

The God Ridiculus derived his Original from a pan- nic Fear with which Hannibal was struck when he was advancing to besiege Rome, a Terror, with which, said they, the Gods Protectors of Rome had smote him; and to eternize the Memory of this Event, which obliged the Carthaginian General to return back, they erected a Temple to the God Ridiculus, without the Porta Capena.

F E R O N I A.

Feronia, whose Name comes from the Verb Fero, to bring Relief, or from the Town Feronia, near Mount Soraacte, was, according to Servius, the Patroness of the enfranchised Slaves, who had a great many Offerings presented to her; this Goddess being in high Veneration thro' all Italy. The Grammarian now quoted, will have her to be the same with Virgin Juno, which indeed is countenanced by an antient Inscription quoted by Fabretti, and conceived in these Terms, Junoni Feron.

The Romans appropriated to this Goddess the Care of the Woods and Orchards. She had a Temple at the Foot of Mount Soraacte now mentioned, where an annual Sacrifice was offered to her; and they tell us, it was such as were filled with the Spirit of this Goddess, that walked bare-footed upon Coals without being burnt, or suffering any Harm. Horace, in one of his Satyrs (1), mentions the Homages that were paid to this Divinity, in washing the Face and Hands, according to Custom, in the sacred Fountain which flowed near her Temple.

Ora manusque tuâ lavimus, Feronia, lymphâ.

F U R I N A.

We are altogether Strangers to the Functions of the Goddess Furina, tho', if we may rely upon Cicero, she was the same with the Furies.

C A M Æ N A.

St. Augustine places also among the Roman Divinities Camena, the Goddess who presided over Songs ; but as this is an Epithet given to the Muses, it is probable that she was not distinct from them.

C A R N A.

Cerna was thought to preside over the vital Parts, and therefore they invoked her to preserve the Entrails sound. She had a Temple upon Mount Celius, where a Sacrifice was offered to her, consisting of boiled Beans and Lard.

C Æ L E S T I S B O N A D E A.

The good celestial Goddess of Africa occurs upon an Inscription ; and Fabretti, who quotes it, justly reckons that it was Juno herself, worshipped particularly at Carthage.

We know nothing of the God Favor, Favour, but that Apelles had made a fine Picture of him.

C O L L A T I N A and V A L L O N I A, &c.

Collatina, according to St. Augustine (2), was the Guardian of the Mountains, and Vallonia of the Valleys. For nothing was left upon the Earth without some tutelar Divinity. Thus Educa and Edule took Care of the Meat and Drink ; Fructulea of the Fruits ; Intercidona of those who wrought with the Hatchet, that they might not be wounded thereby ; Peta (3) over Demands ; Putia (4) over those who pruned the Trees ;

(1) L. 1. Sat. 5. (2) De Civ. Dei, l. 1. (3) From the Word Petere, to demand. (4) From Putare, to lop.

Trees; Rutina (1) and Rutor over the Fields; Sentia over good Thoughts and lawful Desires.

M A N A or M A N I A.

We must not forget another Goddess peculiar to the Romans, whom they called Mana or Mania: She presided over the Maladies of Women, and young Whelps were offered to her in Sacrifice, as we learn from Pliny; Genitæ Manæ catulo res divina fit (2). Plutarch (3) asks the Reason why these young Dogs were offered to this Goddess; but Pliny would seem to have answered this Question beforehand, when he said in the Place now quoted, that the Flesh of those Animals was reputed so pure, that it was offered to the Gods in Sacrifice (a); and that Dogs-flesh was made use of in the Repasts prepared for the Gods (b).

St. Augustine (4) calls this Goddess Mana, and the most known Mythologists confound her with that Mania the Mother of the Gods Lares, to whom Macrobius (5) says young Children were sacrificed, to make her propitious to the Family of those who offered that barbarous Sacrifice.

But if it be asked now why the Epithet of Genita was joined to this Goddess, the Answer is, that she likewise presided over the Nativity of young Children, and was among the Romans one of those Gods called Genitales, as Lucina was among the Greeks. We have in the first Volume of Tristan a Medal of the Empress Crispina, with this Legend; Genitalibus Diis.

A N C U L U S and A N C U L A.

The Romans had also among their Gods Anculus and Ancula, whom Festus makes to have been the tutelar Deities of the Servant-maids, whence no doubt their Name Ancilla is derived. For as there were Gods for every Station in Life, the Men-servants and Maid-servants must needs have had theirs.

O 4

The

(1) From Rus, the Fields. (2) L. 29. (3) Q. Q. Rom.

(a) Catulos lactentes adeo puros existimabant ad cibum, ut etiam placandis numinibus hostiarum vice uterentur, Plin. loc. cit.

(b) Et in cænis Deum etiamnum ponitur Catulina. Ibid.

(4) De Civ. Dei, l. 4. c. 11. (5) Sat. l. 1. c. 7.

The Gods of Money.

Men have always had too great an Attachment to Gold and Silver, not to have imagined Divinities who presided over the Coinage of Money. We have seen in the Article of Juno, that Authors antient and modern believed the Epithet Moneta, which was given her, denoted that she was the Goddess of Money, though this is what all are not agreed in. But besides Juno, the Romans had several other Divinities, whose Province was to watch over the Coinage of Specie. As the most antient Symbol which has been found upon Money, was some Animal, Pecus, whence it had the Name among the Latins of Pecunia; so they made a Goddess, according to St. Augustine (1), of that same Word, which they invoked in order to procure it in Abundance.

But as the Specie was coined of different Metals, especially of Gold, Silver, and Brass, and as one Divinity would have had too much ado to take Care of the different Coinages, hence a particular one was appointed for each.

Three Goddesses represented upon some Medals of the Emperor Commodus and his Successors, with a Pair of Scales, the Cornucopia, and a Heap of Money by them (a), prove that there was at least that Number, and the Antiquaries agree that they presided over the Coinage of three Metals. Besides these three Divinities, there was also Æs, or Æsculanus, for the Brass Coin.

These three Goddesses, as has been now said, had each of them for their Symbol a Pair of Scales, and some Antiquaries even think they observe these Scales to be of an unequal Bigness, as the three Metals employed in coining are of different Weights; But can one be sure of such an Observation from the small Field of a Medal?

'Tis even alledged that there was for the last Metal the Goddess Æres. The curious M. de Pyresc having examined

(1) De Civ. Dei.

(a) The ordinary Legends of these Medals are, Moneta Aug. Moneta nostræ urbis Romanæ, Moneta Jovî & Herculi Augg. Moneta sacra Augg. & C. C. &c.

examined a Medal of Petavius's Study, whereon was represented a Goddess who may be presumed to be this Æres, in regard that the Name was a little defaced, chose rather to conclude it to be Ceres; but the Balances which she holds in her Hand, ought to determine for the other Opinion. The Thing is now put out of Doubt. A Medal of the King's Cabinet, of middling Bronze *, of the Emperor Titus, presents on the Reverse a Woman standing, with the usual Habit of the Goddesses, leaning her left Hand upon the hasta pura, and holding a Balance, with these Words: Æres Augusti, S. C.

'Tis true, the Word Æres is hardly in the Analogy of the Latin Tongue, and it might be interpreted, the Coin of the Emperor. But as the Figure bears the Symbols of Divinities, the hasta pura, and the Robe called Peplum; 'tis probable that this Figure was designed to represent the Divinity, who with the God Æs or Æsculanus presided over the Coinage of Brass Money.

We even see upon a Medal of Commodus a naked Apollo, with this Legend, Apollini Monetæ: And to be sure it was but just that the God of Arts and Sciences should preside over the Beauty and Elegance of Coins.

We find also Inscriptions in Gruter's large Collection, whereby it appears that the Coiners invoked Vulcan, and 'tis easy to find out the Reason; but why did they also invoke Hercules, as is proved by other Inscriptions copied from the same Author? As to that I own myself quite at a Loss.

H E R E S.

There was also in the Roman Kalendar a Goddess for those who entered Heirs, whom they called for that Reason Heres, as has been already said. But why was this Goddess, according to Festus, called Marteia, and ranked among the Companions of Mars? I can see no other Reason for it, but that this God, more than any other, makes vacant Inheritances.

The

* The Antiquaries distinguish three Sizes of Medals, the Great, the Small, and the Middle Size.

The Goddess R O M E.

The City Rome shared also divine Honours, and she was one of the greatest Roman Divinities; and though this was not the only City which received divine Honours, since Medals make us acquainted with several others whose Deification is not to be doubted of, yet the Worship of none was either so much celebrated, or so extensive. For to her were Temples erected in several Places of the Empire, especially in Nicea, in Ephesus, Alabanda, and several other Cities. But the Romans especially signalized themselves in the Worship they paid this Goddess, who owed to them her Original. Temples, Sacrifices, annual Festivals, were all employed to do her Honour. She was become the most common Figure on Medals, where we see her often crowned with Turrets, holding in her Hand a Victory. In other respects she was drawn so like to Minerva, that she can only be distinguished from her by some particular Symbols. A fine Roman Statue represents her as a big Woman sitting upon a Rock, having Trophies of Arms at her Feet, and her Head covered with a Helmet. When she has by her a Sheep and a Goat, she figures the Peace and Tranquillity enjoyed by the Nations which she has conquered. When she is accompanied, as she is in a Figure published by M. de la Chaussée, with an old Shepherd and with the Wolf which suckled Romulus and Remus, 'tis obvious that this denotes her Original, and the Shepherd Faustulus who took Care of those two young Princes. Lastly, other Monuments exhibit to us Rome triumphant, crowned by Victory, with some other Symbols; for which I refer to the Antiquaries.

R O M U L U S.

The Romans having put their City into the Number of the Gods, we need not doubt but they would raise Romulus, the Founder of both their City and Empire, to the same Rank.

In the Year of Rome 37, on the 7th of July (1), as Romulus was haranguing his Soldiers in a Plain near the Goats

(1) Dion. Hal. l. 1. Plut. in Rom.

Goats Pond, whither the Senate had accompanied him, there arose a Storm mingled with Hail and Thunder, so terrible, that almost all retired, except the Senators, who, taking Advantage of this Consternation, tore their Prince in Pieces; and whether they had carefully concealed him, or had each of them taken one of his Members, which they concealed under their Robes, so it was that Romulus appeared no more, nor was any Vestige of this Parricide to be found. The Storm being over, those who had withdrawn returned, and asked the Senators about their King, by whom they were told that he was suddenly carried away in a fiery Whirlwind, and that Heaven had snatched him from the Earth; that in short they had Reason to console themselves under this Loss, since instead of a King, who ought indeed to be very dear to them, they would have among the Gods a Protector who was never to abandon them. The more Credulous appeared satisfied with a Story which supposed their Founder in the Rank of a God; but those of deeper Penetration beginning to murmur against the Senators, whom they suspected to have assassinated their King, they were forced to engage Julius Proculus, who passed for one of the most honest Men in the City, to speech it to the People in the following Manner, after he had by a solemn Oath taken the Gods to Witness the Truth he was going to relate: “ As I was in my Journey, says
“ he, all of a sudden Romulus presented himself to “ my View; his Stature was higher than that of other “ Men, and his Armour reflected a dazzling Light.
“ Seized with a religious Consternation, I thus address “ myself to him: Why have you then left us so soon?
“ To what wicked Suspicions have we given a Han“ dle? We are taken for the Authors of your “ Death. - - - The Gods, answered Romulus, have “ recalled me to Heaven, whence I derived my Ori“ ginal, and have given me a Place among them“ selves. - - - Go therefore, dear Proculus, and “ put my Romans in mind to study Temperance and “ the Exercises of War. - - - As for me, I shall “ always “ always be propitious to them under the Name of “ Quirinus.”

This Speech, delivered by a Man of an unblemished Character, calm'd their Minds, and their only Concern now was to do honour to the new God under the Name of Quiris or Quirinus, a Sirname of Mars, which they thought fit to bestow upon his Son (a). In honour of him they instituted the Feasts called Quirinalia, which were celebrated annually on the 17th of February, and some Time after Numa Pompilius created a High Priest, called Flamen Quirinalis, who was to be of the Patrician Order, to overlook the Worship of this God. This Institution, and the Name of Pontiff, prove the gross Mistake of those who reckon there was no other God at Rome called Quirinus but Mars, since the Priest of Mars was called Flamen Martialis. Herfília, Romulus's Wife, received the same Honour with her Husband, and was revered under the Name of Horta, or the Goddess of Youth.

The Romans, satisfied with seeing their Founder seated among the Gods, did not think of raising their other Kings, nor any of their great Men to the same Dignity for several Ages ; till at length, upon the Loss of their Liberty under Julius Cæsar, they suffered Augustus his Successor to give him Deification, spreading a Report that Venus had come, as we read in Ovid (1), into the Middle of the Senate, at the Time of that great Man's Assassination, and placed her Kinsman among the Stars. A new Star, or rather a Comet, which appeared that Year, as Suetonius tells us (2), favoured the Apotheosis, and it was easily believed to be the Mansion of the Soul of that Prince. Temples were built to him, wherein Sacrifices were offered, and his Statue has always been represented

(a) There are various Opinions about the Word Quiris or Quirinus, the Epithet of Mars: Some are of Opinion, that in the Language of the Country it signified a Spear, others, that it was the Name of an ancient God, worshipped by the Sabines; but whoever he be, Romulus took his Place, and was the new Mars of Rome.

(1) Met. l. 15. (2) In Cæs.

presented since with a Star over its Head (a). But to say the Truth, this Deification came somewhat too late ; the Times were not now so fertile in Divinities as of old.

Whatever Veneration was paid to the Grand-Nephew of Cæsar, this Deification did not fail to provoke some to rally him ; some called him the Puppet-maker (1) ; others said, he took Care to fill up the Vacancies in Heaven, which had received no new Colony for a long while. But Augustus made a Jest of those Scoffs, not doubting but he himself should one Day receive the same Honours. For the great Affair is once to establish a new Fashion. His Hope was not vain ; they did not so much as defer the Ceremony till his Death ; and, according to Appian, he was hardly of the Age of eight and twenty when he was acknowledged a tutelar God in all the Cities of the Empire. The deifying Spirit raged afterwards to such a Degree, that they gave a Place among the Gods, not only to the most wicked Emperors, as Tiberius, but also to the most stupid of them, as Claudius. Several Empreſſes had the same Honours ; and the Folly of Adrian went even so far, that he would needs have the infamous Antinous, who was drowned in the Nile, to be deemed a God, having erected in the City Antinopolis in Egypt, which he built in honour of him, a magnificent Temple, where he also founded an Oracle. But it must be owned that those new Gods and their Oracles, did not rise to great Vogue, whatever Pains were taken to advance their Credit. The Eyes of People came at Length to be opened as to an Usage equally impious and ridiculous, and we find no new Divinities since that Time. Alexander, who to be sure was as justly intitled to that Honour as any other, according to the Terms on which it was conferred, had in vain aspired to a Place among the Gods, upwards of three hundred Years before Augustus : In vain

(a) The Apotheosis of Julius Cæsar is liable to some Objections, which I have taken Notice of in my Ovid's Metamorphoses, l. 15.

(1) Plin. l. 2. c. 15.

vain did the Orator Demades use all the Force of his Eloquence to persuade the Athenians to reckon that Conqueror the thirteenth of the Great Gods. Alexander was disobeyed, and the Orator fined.

To conclude, the Romans, as superstitious in Religion as they were famous for the Wisdom of their Policy, for fear of having omitted in their Kalendar any God, whether Friend or Foe, sacrificed to the unknown Gods, as well as the Greeks, as has been said in the first Volume. Accordingly Aulus Gellius (1) tells us, that in the Time of a dreadful Earthquake, which shook the whole City of Rome, not knowing what God they should address themselves to, they sacrificed a considerable Number of Victims to him who was the Author of that severe Calamity, without knowing or giving him a Name. The fatal and ridiculous Effect of Superstition, which refusing to acknowledge the only GOD, Creator of all Things, set up new ones every Moment, and made a Collection of them from all the Countries of the World, least any should have escaped them! Such was the Origin of the unknown and anonymous Gods, which was a Kind of Supplement to the public Creed.

C H A P. IX.

Of some Gods peculiar to Italy.

AS Italy had at different Times received several Colonies, which were planted there by the Greeks and other Nations, as may be seen in the curious Dissertations composed by Theodorus Ryckius upon this Subject, those Colonies, like all others, brought with them their Gods, and the Ceremonies of their Religion. I might cite a great many particular Examples, but this is not the Place for treating of that Subject (2). I shall content my self with that of the Feasts called Lupercalia, which Evander the Arcadian had founded there. As most of these Gods were the same with those of the Nations that had planted the Colo-

(1) L. 2. (2) See Vol. 2.

Colonies there, 'tis needless to repeat here what we have said ; but there were some peculiar to each Canton, whom 'tis proper, at least, to name here. The antient *Tuscan*s had their Tages, the great Artist of the Tuscan Divination, whom we have mentioned in the Article of Divination (1). The Sabines acknowledged for their principal Divinity Semo Sangus, who is thought to be Hercules, as shall be said in the History of that Hero. The Albins paid a peculiar Worship to Jupiter, and to Æneas, whom they confounded with that God (2). Evander and Carmenta his Wife attained to divine Honours in the Place where the Colony planted by that Chief had settled ; that is, near to Mount Aventine, and the Confines. Hercules, who had passed that Way, when he was returning from Spain with Geryon's Oxen, received there the same Honours. Janus, Faunus, Picus, Canens, and some others of whom we have already spoke, became the Indigetes and Topical Gods of the Places where they had reigned.

The Inhabitants of Antium and Præneste bestowed a particular Worship upon Fortune, and for consulting her had those Lots so famous in Antiquity.

Lastly, the Inhabitants of Brescia in Italy had several Divinities who were peculiar to themselves, whereof Rossi, in his Brescian Memoirs, has given the Figures. The first of those Gods represents a Woman sitting, leaning upon an Urn, holding in her right Hand a Scepter. This Figure has the Head radiant, and crowned with Laurels, and at its Feet is to be seen a Wheel and a Compass. The Author of the Memoirs now quoted, takes this Statue for a Fortune : But not to mention here, that the Wheel was also a Symbol of Nemesis, the Scepter and the Compass agree still better to that Goddess than to Fortune. Perhaps it is Justice, to whom the Scepter and Compass are perfectly applicable. I am however of Opinion, that no other Conclusion can be drawn from this Monument, but that it represents a Divinity peculiar to the

(1) Vol. 2. B. 4. (2) See the History of Æneas, Vol. 7.

the Brescians, among whom there were others besides, which are no where else to be found.

Another Figure found in the same Country, represents a young Man wrap'd up in a Drapery which covers his whole Body, with this Inscription, Bergino M. Nonius, M. F. Senecianus, V. S. Marcus Nonius Senecianus, the Son of Marcus, of the Favian Tribe, has accomplished the Vow which he had made to Berginus: The Roman Toga which this Figure wears, induced Montfaucon to believe that it represented the same Person who had performed the Vow; which would be pretty extraordinary. 'Tis true, the Family of this Nonius Senecianus, was one of the most considerable in Brescia; and there was found in that same City, a Statue of another Nonius, with this flattering Inscription, M. Nonius, a Youth, the great Hope of the Brescians. However, I cannot persuade myself that a Man who discharges a Vow made to a Divinity, would assume the Figure of the same, upon a Monument which he has raised to that God as an Act of Thanksgiving for the Benefit which he believes he has received from him. We know nothing indeed of this Berginus, who undoubtedly was worshipped as a God by the Brescians, since he had an Altar, of which the Historian of the Antiquities of Brescia has given a Print, and a Priestess who had the Charge of his Worship. The same Author accordingly quotes an Inscription, which proves that Nonia Maxima had discharged that Priesthood. Berginus, no doubt, was some Hero of the Country. This is all that we can say of him, and his Roman Habit has nothing in it that ought to surprize us.

Tyllinus was another God whose Figure was also dug up near Brescia. His Statue, which according to Rossi was taken to Pieces in the Year 840, by Rampat Bishop of Brescia, and which had no Inscription but the Name of the God to whom it was consecrated, Tyllino, was of Iron, the Head crowned with Laurel, resting the right Foot upon a dead Scull, and holding in the left Hand an Iron Pike, terminated at the Top by a Hand open and extended, upon which is to be seen, between the Fore-finger and the Thumb, an Egg which a Serpent wreathed about the Hand was coming to bite; Symbols as obscure as mysterious, about which we learn nothing from Antiquity. Mont-faucon is of Opinion, that the Foot resting upon the dead Scull, and the Laurel, figured that Tylinus triumphed over Death, and was immortal: But whether he is in the right or not, I leave others to determine, What Antiquary or Mythologist, says one, will take upon him to explain the Import of the Serpent falling upon the Egg which is in the Hand at the Top of the Spear? Must we not own, that especially among the Topical Gods, who were hardly known but in some particular Cities that had chosen them for their Patrons, there often occur Symbols inexplicable?
to

However, I presume we may say, and that with a great deal of Probability, that this was a Mystery borrowed from the Gauls, in relation to the Egg Anguinum, of the Serpents, which those People eagerly sought after, and hastily carried off, when they had found it, lest the Insect which had formed it should look upon them, as shall be said at more Length, in the History of the Religion of that ancient People (1). The Brescians were too near the Gauls, and had too much Commerce with them not to be acquainted with this Article of their Religion.

This is what I had to say of the Gods of the Greeks, Romans, and some other People in Italy. It must not, however, be imagined, that I have exhausted the Subject. There were so many Gods known but in one single City, or at most in some little Cantons, that it would be impossible to name them all. Some too are dug up every Day, who are entirely unknown. I thought it sufficient to take Notice of those who were of some Note, and of whom the Antients have made mention.

(1) B. 6.

PART SECOND.

*Of the Gods of other European Nations,
those especially of the Gauls and Germans.*

AS the History of other Gods of Europe is far from being so interesting as that of the Gods of Greece and Rome, as it has less Connection with the Belles-Lettres; and as those Gods are often the same, under other Names, with those already spoke of, I shall therefore be much shorter in this second Part than I have been in the first. I shall endeavour, however, to give an exact Idea of those Gods, to relate whatever is most curious in relation to them, and to place under one easy Point of View what lies scattered in a vast many Authors who have spoke of them before me: Let us begin with the Gods of our Ancestors.

BOOK VI.

Of the Gods of the Gauls.

THERE are hardly any of the Antients but Cæsar, Diodorus Siculus, Mela, Strabo, and Plutarch, who have left us any Lights as to the Religion of the Gauls; and not only is what they say of them inconsiderable, but we are further to observe, that they speak of the Gods of that People con-conformably to their own Ideas ; that is to say, whenever they observed in any of those Gods, either some Attribute or Symbol resembling those of their own Divinities, they were sure to give them the same Names. Thus, according to them, such a one was Hercules, or Apollo, or Mercury ; because he had something of Affinity with their Mercury, Apollo, or Hercules ; for after all, the antient Gods of the Gauls must needs have been quite unknown to the Greeks and Romans, since Lucian (1), in one of his Dialogues, makes Mercury say, that he knows not what Course to take in inviting those Gods to the Assembly of the others, because, being unacquainted with their Language, he could neither understand them, nor make them understand him.

If, as a Supplement to the short Hints on this Subject given us by the Greeks and Romans, we should have Recourse to some Gallic Authors, we might there trace out the Origin and Foundations of their Religion : But the Druids, the sole Depositories of their Mysteries, wrote nothing, and industriously concealing from the People the Ground of their Religion, they contented themselves with instructing those who aspired at the same Dignity, whereof they were extremely jealous.

True it is, that several Monuments dug up from Time to Time, have excited the Curiosity of the Learned ; but they have only given a bare Explication of them, without attempting to dive into the Religion of the People who had erected them in Honour of their Gods. Schædus, who has composed a Treatise of the Religion of the ancient Germans, has indeed drawn together all the Passages of the Antients where that of the Gauls is made mention of ; but bating the long Commentary he has made upon those Authorities, where he almost always deviates from his Subject, he has said little or nothing upon their Religion, it not being the principal Subject of his Book. Montfaucon, who explains Antiquity by Figures, has given us the greatest Number of Figures of the Gallic Gods ; but the Reflections he has added to them are but few. Lastly, one of his learned Fellows (1), making Use of the same Figures, undertook some Years ago to give a compleat Treatise of the Religion of that People, which he published in 1727, in two Volumes in Quarto ; and we may say, that no Body before him entered so far into the Gallic Mysteries ; but it were to be wished he had observed more Order, and made fewer Repetitions.

(1) Jup. Trag.

C H A P. I.

Of the Religion of the Gauls.

IN order to give an exact Idea of the Religion of this People, we are to consider it under two different Periods of Time ; namely, before, and after the Conquest of Julius Cæsar, when the Gauls began to have any Commerce with the Romans. Not but that they were known to the Greeks and Romans long before that Prince carried the Seat of the War into the Heart of their Country, since they once became Masters of Rome itself, and on the other Side, had overrun and plundered Greece. But those sudden and transient Irruptions, instead of having settled any Commerce between those Nations, served only to make them be reckoned Barbarians, whose Power could only one Day prove fatal to them ; and the Gauls hardly ever dreamed, in those Irruptions, of informing themselves in the Religion of a People whom they only wanted to pillage, and enrich themselves by plundering their Temples and Houses. When Cæsar, after a ten Years War, had at last made himself Master of the Gauls, and that fine Country became a Roman Province, he made vast Alterations in the Religion of that People, who adopted most of the Roman Gods, and at length abandoned almost all their own antient Ceremonies, to follow those of their Conquerors.

As

(1) Don James Martin.

As Julius Cæsar had a long Time to be well acquainted with their Country, where he remained so many Years, 'tis from the Relation he gives of the Gallic War, and from some other Latin Authors, we are to seek for the History of the antient Religion of the Gauls; but, as has been already observed, those Writers say but little about it: They often contradict one another; and what is still more perplexing, they all speak of it according to their own Prejudices, and seem only to endeavour to identify the Gods of that antient People with those whom they themselves adored. The Historian Josephus even reproaches them for having spoke of a Religion wherein they neither were nor could be well informed. For the Druids wrote nothing, contenting themselves with charging their Memories, and afterwards that of their Probationers, with a prodigious Number of Verses, containing their Theology, Verses barbarous with respect to the Romans, which, to be sure, they hardly understood; and probably would have had no great Value for, though they had understood them: Add to this, that these same Druids, concealed in the Hearts of the Woods, whence they seldom came abroad, were far from being communicative: And instead of revealing their Mysteries to Strangers, they kept them hid from the Gauls themselves.

However as Cæsar, of all the Antients, has undoubtedly given most Light into the Religion of this People, it will not be disagreeable to give here all that he delivers upon the Subject. “ The Gauls, says he “ (1), are a very superstitious People. Those who are “ sick, or in any Danger, offer up Victims, or make “ Vows so to do, in performing whereof, they use
 “ the Ministration of the Druids. Being persuaded “ that there is no Way to obtain from the Gods the “ Life of a Man, but by sacrificing another in his “ Place: In the following Manner do they perform “ their publick Sacrifices. They fashion Osier Boughs “ into Human Figures of a monstrous Bigness, whose P 3 “ Cavity

(1) De Bell. Gall. 1. 6.

“ Cavity they fill up with living Men, whom they “ burn together. As they believe the Execution of “ Robbers and other Criminals to be well pleasing “ to the Gods, 'tis from among them they choose “ out their Victims, but when they fall short, they “ sacrifice innocent Persons.”

“ Of all their Gods, he to whom they pay the “ highest Veneration, and of whom they have most “ Statues, is Mercury, whom they take to be the In“ ventor of all Arts, the Guide of Travellers, and he “ who gives most Assistance in carrying on Trade,
 “ and in acquiring Riches by Means thereof: To Mer- “ cury they join other Gods, such as Apollo, Mars, “ Jupiter and Minerva, of whom they have much the “ same Sentiments with other Nations. They be“ lieve, for Example, that Apollo averts Diseases;
 “ that Minerva was the Inventress of Manufactures
 “ and other Arts; that Jupiter has for his Lot the “ Empire of Heaven; that Mars makes War; and “ therefore, when they go to Battle, they make a “ Vow to offer to him the whole Spoil. — All the “ Gauls pretend to be descended from Pluto, which “ they say they learned from the Druids.”

Cæsar is very far from having named all the Gods of the Gauls, as we shall see afterwards; he has even omitted some who are mentioned by other Historians. The Religion of this People, as we are told by Clemens Alexandrinus (1), was a Religion of Philosophers, like that of the Primitive Persians; which makes Pliny say (2), that notwithstanding the Distance of Countries, and the Impossibility of knowing one another, they practised the same Ceremonies so exactly, that one would have said they had communicated them to one another.

In the first Place, as to the Origin of this Religion, Cæsar and Tacitus contradict one another; the first alleging it came from Britain, and the second, that the Gauls, in peopling that Island, had introduced their Mysteries thither: And what would seem to make make for Tacitus is, that in all Probability the Gauls were peopled before Britain, which may be understood in general of all Islands, into which none would readily venture to pass over, till the Continent was quite peopled. However, to reconcile these two Authors, we may say that the Gauls indeed passing over into Britain, established their Religion there; but that those Islanders, who kept more at home than they, preserved it in all its Purity, while among the Gauls, who by their frequent Wars were led into Commerce with other Nations, it underwent some Alteration. Accordingly we see that in later Times, the Gallic Druids had a high Veneration for those of Britain, and often sent thither their Pupils to be by them thoroughly instructed in their own Religion.

(1) In Protrep. (2) L. 30.

But whether the Britons got their Religion from the Gauls, or whether these brought it into Britain, it will still remain a Question whence it was derived at first; and as this Point is very obscure in itself, 'tis no Wonder that we find such Diversity among those who have considered it. All are agreed however, that before the Conquest of Cæsar, the Difference between it and that of the Greeks and Romans, was too wide to have been derived from them; and the generality are of Opinion, that it came from Egypt or Phœnicia. In support of this Sentiment, they alledge,

1. Some Kind of Resemblance they find between the Worship of the Egyptians and Phœnicians, and that of the Gauls, which supposes that they, as all the other Western Nations of Europe, had received it from those two People who trafficked, especially the former, on all the Gallic Coasts, as far as Cadiz, where so many Footsteps of their antient Religion have been found.
2. The Figures of Isis, and some other Egyptian Divinities, dug up from Time to Time in Gaul, some of them even a few Years ago.

Some modern Authors (a) are persuaded that this Religion came from no other Country, but was peculiar liar to the Druids, and that they themselves were the Founders of it. But to support this Allegation, it would be necessary to prove that those who came to people this Country, were without Religion and without Worship, which is not very credible. For my Part, I am of Opinion that it was derived from the Asiatics, but that it was propagated to Gaul from the North. The Celtæ, from whom our Gauls were descended, were extremely powerful, and possessed most Part of the North of Europe, whence they spread themselves at last Southward, and took Possession of the Country which now we inhabit. Their Empire, if indeed one might give that Name to a Domination such as that of the antient Celtæ, extended from the Northern Parts of Asia Minor (a), to the Western Coasts of the Gauls : They might have learned their Religion from the Cappadocians and the Persians, their Neighbours ; and the Resemblance which this actually has to the other, led Pliny to say, that the Difference was so small, that, as has been already remarked, one would be apt to think it had been derived from thence, were it not that the Distance and Impossibility of Commerce between those two People stood in Opposition to this Notion. But this Distance does not now a-days imply the same Difficulty. The World in the Beginning, was reduced to one Family and one Belief ; and all the Worships that have spread since, are but a Corruption of the true one. Men removed by Degrees to a Distance from the Place of their Original, peopled the Earth, and in various Manners corrupted the Purity of Primitive Religion. Some came by Land towards the North, and under the Name of Scythians, Celto-Scythians, and Celtæ, peopled those vast Countries that separate us from Asia ; others more adventurous, braved the Dangers of the Ocean ; and we have a hundred Proofs to evince that, first the Phœnicians, and then the Carthaginians, penetrated to the very Extremities of the West.

P 4

(a) Don James Martin's Treatise of the Religion of the Gauls, Tom. 1.

Hence,

(a) See what has been said above in the History of the Tians. B. 1.

Hence, no doubt, that Resemblance of Worship and Religious Ceremonies between Nations, separate by so many Seas, and such a vast Tract of Land. Hence, likewise, we can account for that Affinity which has been so often traced between the Magi and the Druids: For since the Gauls and the Celtæ had received their Religion from the Persians, or at least from the People who lay near them upon the North, to whom they had communicated it, no Wonder that those Priests, or, if you please, those Philosophers, had so much Resemblance to one another. They were both of them in high Repute in their own Country, and were consulted upon all important Occasions; being the sole Ministers of Religion, all other Persons were prohibited from intermeddling with it. In fine, both of them led a very austere and very retired Life.

The Magi opposed themselves with all their Might to the Opinion which gave the Gods a human Original, and which divided them into male and female Deities; just so it was with the Druids, especially in the Beginning. Both of them governed the State, and the King never failed to advise with them in all critical Conjunctions. Their Garb being the same, namely white, at least in the Ceremonies of Religion, all Ornaments of Gold were prohibited to them. Being great Lovers of Justice, they either administered it themselves, or took Inspection of their Conduct who were vested with that Office. The Immortality of the Soul was, both in Persia and among the Gauls, an essential Article of Belief. Antiently neither the one nor the other had Temples nor Statues, and 'tis thought that this Usage was still kept up among the Gauls, even when Cæsar conquered them, and that the Temples, whereof some Remains are yet to be seen in several Places, belong only to the second Period of the Religion of the Gauls. Their only Temples therefore at first were the Woods and Forests, as shall be said in a Chapter by itself. The Persians worshipped the Fire as the Symbol of their first Divinity; the Gauls, as we are told by Polyhistor cited by Solinus, Solinus, preserved upon their Altars a perpetual Fire, and Mithras was a God equally revered by the one and by the other.

The Persians gave peculiar Worship to the Water, as has been said in the second Volume; History informs us that the Gauls paid the same Honour to that Element, as we shall see afterwards. But what we have farther to add upon this Subject, in drawing the Parallel at greater Length between the Magi and the Druids, will, I presume, fully convince the most Sceptical, that the Gauls received their Religion and Tenets from the North.

'Tis true, there were some Rites wherein those two Nations were quite different from one another; but not to repeat what has been said elsewhere, that the Religion of the Persians itself underwent several Alterations by Time, there is no Doubt but that same Religion, by being propagated from the Celtæ into Countries so remote from one another, would suffer still more considerable ones. This antient Religion of the Gauls was at first of great Purity; that People, especially the Druids, had much more just and spiritual Apprehensions of God than either the Greeks or Romans. Tacitus, Maximus Tyrius, and others inform us, that the Druids were persuaded that the supreme Being was to be worshipped no less by the silent Veneration of the Heart, than by external Sacrifices.

But that primitive Simplicity was not of long Duration, and the Gauls, even before their Subjection to the Romans, had altered their Religion so far that it could not be known. The Druids themselves, so esteemed for their Wisdom and Knowledge by all Nations that had heard of them, became devoted to Divination, Magic, and all Sorts of Superstition; and were there no more but the human Sacrifices which they offered to their Esus, Teutates, and Saturn, as we learn from Tacitus (1), Lactantius (2), and Lucian (a), an(a), a Practice which was still subsisting in the Time of Dionysius Halicarnassens, this same would be sufficient to convince us that the Religion of that People came short at length of no other in Superstition and Cruelty.

(1) De Mor. Germ. (2) Div. Inst.

I reckon the second Period of the Gallic Religion, that which elapsed from the Conquest of Julius Cæsar to the Establishment of Christianity among the Gauls. Now in that Interval the same Religion underwent several Alterations. First, it adopted most of the Gods of their Conquerors, their Vulcan, Jupiter, Hercules, Castor, and Pollux. The Monument erected in the Time of Tiberius, which we shall speak of afterwards, upon which the Names of those Gods are inscribed, as it proves this Truth, so it shews that it was not long after the Conquest of Julius Cæsar that those Gods were introduced into the Country. In short, they conformed themselves almost in every thing to the religious Rites of the Romans. They began to follow their Example in building Temples, Chapels, and in making Statues of the Gods.

But to come to a particular Detail with respect to the antient Religion of the Gauls, I believe I may assert that they had a purer Idea of their Gods than other Idolaters, since they believed it impossible to represent them under any Figure, or to confine their Majesty within Temples; and that they had preferred for the Exercise of their Religion solitary and solemn Woods, whose very Aspect inspires with something of a religious Awe.

I am persuaded too that after the Example of the Persians, from whom they had received a Part of their Tenets, they began with the Stars and Elements as the sole Objects of their Adoration. Accordingly, we shall see afterwards that they gave a particular Worship to the Sun, distinct from that of

(a) *Et quibus immitis placatur sanguine diro
Teutates, horrenique seris altaribus Esus.*

of Apello, that they paid Homage to the Moon, whom they plainly distinguished from their Diana; and that they likewise paid a religious Worship to the Earth, whom they looked upon, like other idolatrous Nations, as the Mother of Gods and Men.

The eternal Fire which they preserved in their Forests, which served them for Fire-Temples, and the Veneration which they had for Mithras, shew that they paid to that Element the same Worship with the Persians.

They had also a religious Regard for the Lakes and Marshes, which they looked upon either as so many Divinities, or at least as the Places which they made Choice of for their Residence. They even gave those Lakes, as well as Trees, the Names of some particular Divinities. The most celebrated of those Lakes was that of Toulouse, into which they threw either in Specie, or in Bars and Ingots, the Gold and Silver which they had taken from their Enemy. There was also in the Gevaudan, at the Foot of a Mountain, a great Lake consecrated to the Moon, under the Name of Elanè, where, according to Gregory of Tours, they assembled every Year from the Neighbourhood, to throw in thither the Oblations that were made to the Goddesses. Strabo (1) again speaks of a famous Lake of the Gauls, which was called the Lake of the two Ravens, because there were two Fowls of that Kind that haunted them, of which they told a thousand ridiculous Stories; but this much is certain, that in Quarrels that happened, the two Parties repaired thither, and threw each a Cake to them: He whose Cake the Ravens ate up, only nibbling at the other, gained the Cause.

To the Worship of the Lakes and Marshes the Gauls joined that of the Rivers, Floods, and Fountains, which they believed to be so many Divinities; and what has been said in the IVth Vol. of the Honours paid to the Water, belongs to this People at least as much as to any other. They sacrificed to it like

(1) L. 4.

like the other idolatrous Nations, threw Cloaths and other things into the running Waters, and drowned in the Gulphs the Horses which they had taken from their Enemies. 'Tis needless to multiply here the Testimonies of the Antients in Proof of this Proposition: They are all unanimous as to this Article, and those fine Verses are well known which Ausonius has made in Honour of the celebrated Fountain of Bordeaux, which was called Divona, or The Divine Fountain.

As the Egyptians worshipped the Nile, and the Indians the Ganges, so the Gauls had a greater Respect for the Rhine than for the other Rivers: From a Persuasion that he animated them in Battle, they depended a great deal upon his Assistance.

But what was most sacred and revered in the Religion of the Gauls, was the Woods and Forests; and the Oak was the Tree for which, of all others, they had the greatest Veneration, as we shall see in the following Chapter.

C H A P. II.

Of the Temples of the Gauls.

THE Gauls in antient Times had no other Temples but the Woods and Forests, as we have now said, nor other Statues of their Gods, nor other Altars but the Trees of those Woods: Their Woods were so sacred among them that it was not permitted to cut them down, nor to approach them but with a religious Awe, and only to adorn them with Flowers and Trophies, and hang upon them the Remains of the Victims offered to the Gods whom they represented. It was not even allowable to make Use of certain Trees, even when they had fallen down through Decay, or by any other Accident. In a Word, the Forests and Trees were their Temples, their Altars, and the Statues of their Gods. It was in the middle of those Groves that they offered Sacrifices, and kept all their religious Assemblies.

'Twas

'Twas very late before they gave into the Usage of other Pagan Nations as to this Article. Cæsar accordingly says nothing either of their Temples or of the Statues of their Gods; we have an hundred other Proofs of this Truth, and the Fact is incontestable. However, some antient Historians speak of the Temples of the Gauls, at the very Time of the Conquest of Julius Cæsar. Suetonius (1) says, that Conqueror pillaged and sacked those Temples which were full of Treasures; Strabo, to cite no other, makes Mention likewise of the Temples and Oratories of the Gauls; but we may answer that these Authors speak the Language of their Nation, and according to their own Prejudices.

The Gauls, 'tis true, had Places set apart and especially consecrated to the Worship of their Gods; which were the Places where they performed their religious Ceremonies, offered Sacrifices, &c. But those Temples, if we will call them so, were not Edifices like those of the Greeks and Romans: They were the Woods and Groves; and at Toulouse, in particular, it was the Banks of a Lake, consecrated by Religion, that served for a Temple. These were the Places where they laid up their Treasures. Thus the Author now quoted had Reason in one Sense to say; that Cæsar had pillaged their Temples; namely the Places that they used as such. 'Tis according to this Distinction we are to understand what Strabo says, that it was in their Temples the Gauls crucified the Men whom they offered up to their Gods, namely in those same Forests which served them for Temples. For suppose Edifices ever so spacious, how would those Colosses of Osier have entered into them, within which they lodged either the Criminals or Captives, and what Disorder would have been there occasioned by the Fire that consumed them?

But further, nothing is so celebrated in the History of the antient Gauls as the Woods of *Chartres, which were,

(1) In Cæf.

* Antiently of the Carnutes.

were, if I may use the Expression, the Metropolis of the Country, where they assembled from all Quarters, as well for the Ceremonies of Religion, as for Affairs of State, as shall be said at more Length in the History of the Druids; and the Forest which was near to Marseilles, where was the second College of those Priests, and the most frequented next to the Country of Chartres.

Tacitus (1), speaking of the Semnonēs, Celtæ by Original, who followed the same Religion with the Gauls, confirms what has been now said. “ Those People, “ says he, have no other Temple but a Forest, where “ they discharge all the Duties of Religion. No Bo- “ dy enters into this Wood unless he brings with him “ a Chain, as a Badge of his Dependance, and of the “ supreme Dominion which God has over him.”

’Twas not therefore till after the Romans had invaded Gaul, that they began to build Temples there, nor was the Use of them at first general. They continued, notwithstanding those new Temples, to sacrifice in the Forests, and even to make use of Trees to represent the Gods; and this Usage lasted a long Time, since Maximus Tyrius says the Statue of their Jupiter was nothing else but a very tall Oak.

This Worship paid to the Trees was very antient in this Nation, and consequently so difficult to be abolished, that notwithstanding the Canons of several Councils, and the reiterated Admonitions of Prelates, who used all their Endeavours to suppress it, it still subsisted in some Province of Gaul, long after Christianity had triumphed over Idolatry, and some Remains thereof were still to be seen in the Time of Charlemagne. Church-history makes frequent Mention of the Trees which holy Persons caused to be cut down, because they were still the Objects of public Veneration; and it informs us in particular, that St. Severus of Vienna made one be rooted up, which represented an hundred of their Gods, as appeared from the Inscription they set up in the Church that was built
in

(1) De Mor. German.

in the Place where that Tree stood. But the Gauls were so habituated at last to the Manners and Customs of their Conquerors, that they erected every where Temples in great Numbers, where were deposited the Statues which represented both the antient Gods of the Country, and those of the Romans. The Antiquaries, and especially Montfaucon, have given Figures of the Remains of several of those Temples, which may be seen in their Works: 'Tis observed, that almost all of them are of a round Figure, or octogonal, as if they had believed the Sovereigns of the World were only to be lodged in Places that resembled it in Figure.

The Learned have carefully enquired whence came that Regard the Gauls had for Trees, and especially for the Oak, which they had in so much Veneration, that it may be said to have been both their Temple and their God; and the Generality are persuaded that it took its Rise from the Oak of Mamre, under which Abraham, as we read in the Book of Genesis, invoked the Name of the LORD. And indeed it cannot be denied that this Oak became very famous; and it would be but lost Time to heap up Testimonies to prove it. In after Times they kept a Fair there, where Merchants from several neighbouring Nations assembled, with a great Concourse of People. This Oak, which the Father of the Faithful consecrated, having been so well known, 'tis probable, say they, that the Colonies which came from Syria, and the other neighbouring Provinces, to people the West, preserved the Memory of it, and made Choice of that Tree in the Places where they came to settle, preferably to all others, to celebrate there the Mysteries of their Religion. In like Manner it cannot be disowned, say they, that the Religion of the Gauls had, in its Beginnings at least, a great Deal of Affinity with that of the Jews. Porphyry laid hold on this Affinity, and improved it as a Ground of Reproach against the Christians, opposing the Antiquity of the Druids to the Novelty of the Christian Religion. But I believe it is in vain to seek for Mystery here. The Earth of old was quite covered
ed

ed with Woods; and they who came and settled in any uninhabited Country, clearing only so much of it as was necessary for sowing their Grain; were necessitated to take the Woods and Forests for celebrating their Mysteries. Besides, dark and solitary Places seem to inspire a Kind of sacred Awe, which makes them more venerable. We may judge of the old World as of the new. Now, all Relations inform us that America was but one large Forest; and the Savages, without knowing any Thing of the Oak of Mamre, performed in the Woods, and at the Roots of Trees, their religious Ceremonies.

But not to insist on this, nothing is so antient in the Pagan World, as this Respect for Woods and Forests, which served for Temples to primitive Mortals; insomuch, that even when they began to build real ones, they seldom failed to plant Groves around them. Hence, no doubt, the Origin of those sacred Groves; Luci, so universally celebrated in Antiquity, and whose Use continued so long.

At the very Time that the whole Earth was full of Temples, to take this Word in its proper Signification, not only the Poets designed them still by the Word Lucus, a Grove, but also the Historians; and which is yet stronger; the very Architects. Thus, Vitruvius speaking of the Proportions that ought to be observed in Structures of the Tuscan Order; and giving for Example the Temple of Diana Aricina, calls that Building, Aricina nemori Dianæ, The Grove of Diana.

As the Exercise of Religion was in the Hands of the Druids, 'tis necessary to give some Account of these Priests so famed in Antiquity.

C H A P. III.

*Of the Ministers of Religion among the Gauls;
and especially of the Druids:*

OUR antient Gauls had at first; as has been said; a great Deal of Religion; and as the Druids treated it in a Manner grave and serious; they had inspired a vast Veneration for it. Let us not therefore expect to find in the Religion of this antient People, those absurd and impious Fables with which that of the Greeks and Romans was stuffed, far less a lascivious Venus, an incestuous Jupiter, and those impure Mysteries which profane Authors durst not even reveal.

Tho' the Druids were the principal Ministers of the Religion of the Gauls, yet they were not the only ones, but there were different Degrees in their Hierarchy. The Antients reckon among those several Ministers the Bardi, the Eubages *, the Vates, and the Druids. The latter were the Chief, and the others only Subalterns, who assisted them in their Ministration, and in every Thing were much inferior to them. The Bards, whose Name in the Celtic Language imports, according to Festus, a Soneteer, celebrated in Verse the immortal Deeds of great Men, and commonly praised them upon musical Instruments. Their Verses were in such high Esteem, that they were sufficient to immortalize the Memory of those whom they undertook to praise; and the Bards themselves were so esteemed, that if they presented themselves when two Armies were ready to engage, or tho' the Battle was even already begun, both Parties presently laid down their Arms to hearken to what they had to propose. Besides their ordinary Employment of celebrating the Praises of their Heroes and Benefactors, they took upon them to censure the Actions of private Persons, especially when their Conduct did not correspond to their Duty.

The Sarronides instructed the Youth, and instilled into their Minds virtuous Sentiments. The Vates, or Eubages, had the Care of the Sacrifices, and applied themselves to the Contemplation of Nature; but those three Sorts of Ministers were in every Thing inferior, and subject to the Druids, who, in Process of Time, united in their Body almost all the Functions of the others, others, those especially that regarded Religion, leaving to them only the Care of other Things. The Functions of the others now named are but little known, and Diodorus Siculus even confounds the Sarronides with the Druids. But the latter were so far superior to the others, that not only were they invested by their Station with the Care of every Thing that concerned Religion, but they also had the absolute Command of those subaltern Ministers, who could not exercise their Office but by their Permission, and were obliged to withdraw whenever they appeared; unless they had Leave from them to stay.

* Thought to be derived from the Persian Word Bach, Sanctus, whose Province it was scrutari seria & sublimia Naturæ. Amian. 15. 9.

The Druids, whose Name is certainly derived from the Celtic Word Deru, signifying an Oak, which the Greeks call δρῦς, were therefore among our antient Gauls the chief Ministers of Religion. The Antients design them sometimes by other Names; but such as always express their Functions. Thus Diodorus Siculus speaks of them at considerable Length under the Name of Sarronides; others under that of Samothæi; and Diogenes Laertius (1), as also Suidas, informs us that they were also denominated Samothæi, a Name which designed their Profession of worshipping the Gods, and of being consecrated to their Service, as that of Sarronides alluded to the Oaks, near which they spent their Lives (a). In fine, the Monuments dug up in the Cathedral of Paris, to be mentioned afterwards, give them the Name of Senani, which shall be explained in its own Place.

The Origin and Antiquity of the DRUIDS.

I shall not amuse myself long in examining into the Antiquity and Origin of the Druids. Those who have enquired most narrowly into this Article, are forced to own that they have come at no Certainty about it; but must content themselves with Conjectures. Shall we say with some Authors that the Druids were descended from the antient Indian Gymnosophists? But what Traces have we left in History of any Commerce between

Q 2

(1) In Præm.

(a) See the Author of the History of the Gallic Religion, Tom. i. p. 175.

between People so remote from one another? Were they Disciples of Pythagoras, whose Doctrine has so much Affinity with that of those Gallic Priests? For, in short, it was in Italy, at Crotona, that Philosopher published his Doctrines, and the Gauls are near enough to Italy for those Doctrines to have passed to this Side of the Alps. But, 1. 'Tis much more probable that Pythagoras himself had adopted several Opinions of the Druids. 2. 'Tis not true that the Doctrine of that Philosopher has so much Affinity as is believed with that of the Druids; and as to the principal Article, that of Transmigration of Souls, which Pythagoras had fetched from Egypt, and which even in his Time was diffused over all the Indies, it does not appear, as we shall see by and by, that they had copied one another. 3. Tho' the Distance of the Gauls from Italy is not very considerable, yet the Italians had little or no Commerce with the Gauls, whom they accounted Barbarians, and only fought to defend their Frontiers against them.

As I have already proved it to be very probable that the northern Celtæ, the Fathers of our Gauls, had derived a Part of their Doctrines from the Persians, or their Neighbours, so we may presume that the Druids had formed themselves upon the Model of the Magi; and to be sure they have a more remarkable Resemblance to them than to all the other Philosophers in the World. Accordingly several of the Antients were of this Opinion, without troubling themselves to consider by what Way the Persian Religion might have penetrated into the Extremity of the West. After all, the Origin of the Druids is lost in the Darkness of Antiquity; and all that we can know, is, that the Greek Philosophers, Aristotle, Sofion, and others before them, by whom they are mentioned, for they were known in the earliest Ages, speak of them as of a wise Sort of People, very knowing in Matters of Religion, and as consummate Philosophers in Speculation. So high a Notion had they of their Knowledge, that Cicero says it was by them Mythology was invented, ed, and consequently they ought to pass for the Teachers of the Greeks and Romans.

But it will appear but too evident hereafter ; for Truth obliges me to tell their Bad as well as their Good, that all their Wisdom was but Folly, that they were addicted to Studies equally frivolous and pernicious, to Magic, to Divination, and to childish and superstitious Rites ; and what made them pass for the wisest of Men, is, that Mankind commonly admire those who are most dextrous at imposing upon them.

Of their Manner of living, their Habit, their Authority, &c.

The Druids led a very recluse and austere Life, in Appearance at least. Being shut up in the Heart of the Woods, they came seldom abroad, but confined themselves to their wild Recesses, where the whole Nation came to consult them. This austere Life of theirs struck Julius Cæsar with Admiration, even Cæsar who hardly admired any Thing but ostentatious Virtues ; and he was struck with them to such a Degree, that he could not but esteem them.

Tho' the Druids formed several Colleges in Gaul, yet that of the Country of Chartres, as we have said, was always accounted the most considerable, and the Head of that College was the High Priest of the Gauls. It was in the Woods of this Country that the great Sacrifices were offered, and all the grand Ceremonies of Religion performed. There, in short, it was that the Grandees of the Country assembled, and held the Convention of Estates.

Next to this College that of Marseilles was the most considerable, and nothing is more celebrated than the Wood where their Druids assembled. The Description given of it by Lucan, when he relates how Cæsar ordered the Trees of it to be felled, inspires one with a Kind of religious Awe and Horror (a).

Tho' the Druids, both old and young, had all one and the same Spirit, it appears however from the Monuments

Q. 3

(a) See what has been said on this Subject in the first Vol. B. 3. c. 7.

numents which represent them, that they had not all the same Kind of Garb. Whether they were permitted to follow the Mode of the Province, or if the different Habits expressed the different Degrees to which the Candidates arrived before they were Professed, is what I cannot determine. Only this much is certain, that after the Ceremony of Admission, for it was by receiving formal Admission from the Druids that the Novices became Professed, the Candidate laid down the secular Habit, and put on that of a Druid, which consisted in a Sort of Tunic that reached no farther than the Mid-leg. Further, this Habit, as well as the Robe that was under it, was open before, and the Candidate, before his Admittance, was obliged to throw it aside, lest there should be an Imposture in the Case, and the Priesthood, through Mistake, vested in a Female.

So great was their Authority, that no Affair of Importance was undertaken till they were consulted. They presided in the Estates, determined Peace or War as they pleased, punished Delinquents, and their Power sometimes went the Length of deposing the Magistrates, and even the Kings, when they did not observe the Laws of the Country. They were the first of the Nobility of whom the Commonwealth was composed, and all bowed before them. As they formed a Body distributed thro' all the Provinces of the Gauls, by Means of their Colleges, so they were entrusted with the Education of the Youth of first Quality in the Kingdom.

To them belonged the Right of creating an annual Magistrate to govern in every City, sometimes even with the Name and Authority of King, or Vergobret; who could do nothing without them, not so much as assemble his Council: So that, strictly speaking, it was they that actually reigned, and the Kings were but their Ministers, or rather Slaves.

Justice was administered only by them. Umpires in all the Differences and Interests of the Nation, they equally decided public Affairs and those of private Persons, sons, punished Crimes, and in Processes they adjudged a controverted Property to him whom they thought intitled to it: Those who refused to yield to their Decision, were anathematized; they were interdicted from all Sacrifice, and accounted profane by the rest of the Nation, none daring so much as to frequent their Company.

Their Functions.

The Druids had the Charge of the whole of Religion, which also gave them an unlimited Power. Thus Sacrifices, Offerings, Prayers, public and private; the Privilege of predicting future Events, of consulting the Gods; of giving Responses in their Names; of knowing their Attributes, their Number; of studying Nature; the Right of rejecting or establishing new Ceremonies; of seeing to the Observance of antient Laws; of making Additions to them according to Occurrences; of declaring War, and making Peace; of confirming or annulling the Election of Kings and Vergobrets; that is, those who in certain Provinces of Gaul were like the Archons of Athens, but only with an annual Power; all these were their Province.

Add to this, that by their Station they had a Dispensation from going to War, and were exempt from all Sort of Tribute, which invited a great Number of Candidates, for all were capable of Admission into their Body, of whatever Rank or Profession; and their Number would have increased still more, had it not been for the Severities of a long State of Probation, and the Necessity which the young Candidates were under of learning that prodigious Number of Verses, which contained their Maxims of Religion and political Government.

In old Times the Gallic Women enjoyed a Part of these Prerogatives, and were still in the Possession of them when Annibal passed through the Gauls, since one of the Articles of the Treaty he made with that People, bore, that if a Gaul had any Matter of Complaint against a Carthaginian, the offended Party should lay his Complaint before the General, or the Magistrate strate whom the Senate of Carthage had established in Spain; and that when a Gaul did any Injury to a Carthaginian, the Cause should be brought before the Tribunal of the Galli Women. In succeeding Ages the Druids intirely usurped that Authority; but the precise Date of that Usurpation is not known.

The Doctrine and Science of the Druids.

All the Maxims of the Druids tended to make Men wise and just, religious and valiant. The fundamental Points of their Doctrine were reduced to these three: To adore the Gods, to injure no Body, and to be brave and couragious. Pomponius Mela (1), speaking of their Philosophy, says they professed to know the Form and Magnitude of the Earth, and in general of the whole Universe; as also the Course of the Stars, and their Revolutions; and that their retired Life in the Caves and Woods, where they had their Habitation, allowed them full Time to meditate upon all these Points.

'Tis not to be doubted but the Druids, and in general the Gauls, believed the Immortality of the Soul; and it was this Persuasion made them rush upon Death, as a sure Means of attaining a more happy Life. 'Tis true they made a great Distinction between those who died a natural Death in the midst of their Friends and Relations, and those who sacrificed their Lives in the Service of their Country. The first were silently interred, without any Encomiums, or such Funeral Songs as were composed in Praise of the Dead: As for others, on the contrary, who had sacrificed themselves to the common Interest, they were believed to survive their Bodies, and to be gone to enjoy eternal Felicity in the Mansions of the Gods. In short, it was only for them that the Priests durst raise Tombs, and compose Epitaphs. But we are not to conclude from thence, that they did not believe the former to be immortal. The Doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul is not to be believed by Halves, and there are few

(1) De Sylv. Arb. l. 3.

few Philosophers who taught it more clearly than the Druids.

The Reason of their putting so much Honour upon Warriors, was owing to the Genius of that valiant Nation, and to the Value they had for those who followed the Profession of Arms. The others, according to them, having nothing that merited their Esteem, seemed to die altogether; that is, they left no Memorial of themselves. Strabo however informs us, that the Druids taught that all Things were one Day to be destroyed by Fire and Water.

This, according to some Authors, was the Doctrine of the Metempsychosis; but as Cæsar, Diodorus, Lucan, Valerius Maximus, and some others, alledge that the Druids believed it, and taught it to their Disciples, I am more inclined to be swayed by those Authors, who had better Opportunity than we to be informed in the Sentiments of those Gallic Priests, especially the first who dwelt so long among them, than by the Arguments of modern Writers, who don't appear so convincing as they pretend.

I am fully persuaded, in the first Place, that it was not from Pythagoras, and far less from his Disciples, that the Druids had learned this Doctrine, (which was known long before him in Egypt, and in almost the whole East) since they taught it in the Gauls long before the Birth of that Philosopher; but 'tis not the less true that it was a Part of theirs, tho' perhaps with some Variations: For how many Forms and Shapes did this Doctrine assume? The strongest Argument of those Authors, is, that the Antients, except those whom I have named, take no Notice of it; but besides that they speak of the Druids very superficially, were they as well informed in what concerned them, as Cæsar, not to mention others; besides, do those Authors say any Thing that destroys what the others relate to us on this Subject? 'Tis true, they tell us, especially Pomponius Mela (1), that the Gauls, in burying their Dead, or the Ashes of those whom they they burnt, put into their Tombs their Moveables, their Accounts, and the Bills of Money which they had lent, to serve them in the other World; that they even wrote Letters to their dead Friends; Customs, say they, which they never would have observed, had they not been persuaded that their Souls passed into new Bodies. But is it not well known, that the Partizans of the Doctrine of the Metempsychosis taught that it was not always immediately after Death that the Soul was introduced into a new Body; that it first went to Hell to expiate its Faults; that from thence it often passed into the Elysian Fields, where, after some Stay, as to the Duration whereof they varied a great Deal, it drunk of the Water of Lethe, which obliterated the Memory of all that had passed, and then it returned into this World to inhabit a new Body, more or less honourable, according to the Merit of its Actions. Nothing is more celebrated among the Antients than those Expiations, whereof Virgil, as has been said, in speaking of the infernal Regions (1), fixes the Time to a thousand Years. 'Twas therefore to be of Use to them in this Interval, that the Gauls put Cloaths, Moveables, and Bills, into the Tombs of their Dead, and Letters, which they had full Time to deliver to those to whom they were addressed.

(1) De Situ Orbis, l. 3.

What Valerius Maximus says, that the Gauls frequently lent Money to be payed in the other World, makes as little against the Belief of Transmigration; to this we may apply the same Answer, and say, that in that Case the Money would serve the Lender against the Time of his Expiation; that negative Proofs and Inferences, however they may appear necessary, are weak against the positive Proofs of contemporary Authors of good Credit.

Such were the Sciences and Doctrines which the Druids endeavoured to inculcate upon their Candidates, whose Time of Probation was very long. When any of those Candidates had a more happy Genius for Speculative Sciences than their Companions, the Masters sent

(1) B. 6.

sent them into Great Britain, for their Improvement and further Advances : For the Druids of that Island were accounted the most accomplished of all ; whether it was that their being less taken up than the Gauls, gave them more Time to Study, or for the Reasons we have given above. Notwithstanding this Distinction, they maintained regular Correspondence together, and consulted one another upon all important Emergencies.

As the Druids wrote nothing, and all their Knowledge was digested into Verses, they obliged their Novices to learn them by Heart, and these Verses were so numerous, that sometimes fifteen or twenty Years were necessary to learn them. Julius Cæsar, who relates this Fact, gives two Reasons for it : The first is, that the Doctrine of the Druids, might not be known to any, and that it might appear the more mysterious ; the second is, that the young People who were obliged to learn those Verses, might be the more careful to improve their Memory.

Their Superstitions.

Besides the Study of Religion and Philosophy, the Druids also applied themselves to Medicine ; but they owed all their Reputation in this to the Notion People had of their knowing perfectly the Influence of the Stars, and that they had Insight into Futurity : For as every Thing in Man has a Mixture of Good and Evil, so those Sages who were so much revered, addicted themselves to Astrology, Divination, and Magic ; Sciences so much to the Taste of the People, that though always deluded, yet they never recover from their Prejudices. The Druids, 'tis true, made some Use of Botany ; but they mixed with it so many superstitious Rites, that it is easy to see they were no great Proficients therein. And indeed what Notion are we to have of the Knowledge of those pretended Sages, when we consider what Pliny tells us (1), that they taught, and accordingly they practised, that in order to gather the Plant called Selago, which is thought to be

(1) L. 24. c. 11.

be the Black Hellebore, a Knife was not to be used, and that it was to be plucked up with the right Hand, which was to be covered with a Part of the Robe, then to be conveyed secretly into the left Hand, as if it had been stole; and lastly, that a necessary Preparation for it was, to be clad in white, to be bare-footed, and to offer before-hand a Sacrifice of Bread and Wine.

As the Druids were especially conceited of the pretended Virtues of Vervein, that Plant so much in use in magical Operations; we find they never gathered or employed it without mixing with it many superstitious Rites. In the first Place they said (1), it was to be gathered at the Rising of the Dog-Star, and that at break of Day, before the Sun was up, and after offering an expiatory Sacrifice to the Earth, wherein Fruits and Honey were employed. And then what Virtue did they not ascribe to that Plant? By rubbing themselves with it they obtained every Thing they desired; it banished Fevers, cured all Sorts of Maladies, and which is more, reconciled the Hearts of those that were at Enmity; in fine, being sprinkled by way of Asperision upon their Guests, it had Virtue to make those who were touched with it more gay and better pleased than the rest; as if the bare Persuasion of the Influence of the Plant had not been sufficient to produce such an Effect.

We may also reckon among the Superstitions of the Druids, the Opinion they maintained, that at the Death of great Men there always happened some considerable Change in Nature, and that their Souls hardly ever failed to raise Storms, extraordinary Winds and Tempests; that they produced the dreadful Noise of Thunder, the menacing Flashes of Lightning, and fiery Meteors that infected the Air, and caused epidemical Distempers. Plutarch, in his Treatise of the Cessation of Oracles, makes them reason on this Subject in a Way that will convince but few. The Soul of great Men, say they, is as a Candle, which while it burns produces only good Effects, but being extinguished raises an offensive Smell. Were there any Truth

(1) Plin. l. 25.

Truth in this Reasoning, the Souls of the Wicked ought to occasion the greatest Evils.

'Tis true, and we ought to observe it by the way, that sometimes great Men have been flattered with the Notion, that Nature went out of its ordinary Course to do them Honour; and they have not been all so rational as Cardinal Mazarin, who being told that the Comet which appeared some Days before his Death was undoubtedly a happy Prognostic for him, said in a laughing Way, "The Comet did him a great deal of Honour." We might also rank among their Superstitions what they affected to think as to those miserable Victims which they offered up to their Gods, did I not reckon this rather an Effect of their Policy than Persuasion. They made them believe that this Sacrifice had a purifying Virtue, to divest them of all that was mortal in their Natures, and to raise them to a Conformity with the Gods.

Another Superstition of those pretended Sages, regards the Egg which they called Anguinum, produced, as they say, from the Slime of Serpents, which in great Numbers meet together for Copulation at a certain Season of the Year. So soon as this Egg was formed, the Druids gave out that upon the Hissing of the Serpents, it rose up into the Air, and that, in order to preserve its Virtue, it was necessary to catch it before it fell again to the Ground, then mount on Horseback and get away as fast as possible, because the Serpents, jealous of their Production, would be sure to pursue the Person who carried it off, till some River stopped their Pursuit.

When any one was so happy as to get one of these Eggs, and catch it in the Air on a certain Day of the Moon, an Experiment was made with it by throwing it into Water, encompassed with a small Circle of Gold; and in order to be reckoned genuine, it was to swim upon the Surface.

If the Experiment succeeded, which probably never failed by some secret Means or other we know not, the Druids, present at this Ceremony, declared, that it had had the Virtue of making a Person gain his Cause in all Pleas he might have, and that by its Means he would obtain free Access to the King. Pliny (1), who asserts what will easily find Credit, that this whole Management was but a Piece of vain Superstition, informs us that the Emperor Claudius put to Death a Roman Knight in Dauphiny, merely upon Account of his carrying in his Bosom one of those Eggs, with a View to gain a Process which he had depending.

The Ceremony of catching this mysterious Egg is thought to be represented upon the Monuments dug up in the Cathedral of Paris, which we shall examine afterwards: This at least is certain that it occurs upon a Tomb, a Print whereof is given by Montfaucon (2), upon which you see two Serpents, one of them holding an Egg in its Mouth, which the other fashions with its Slime.

The Druids were also very much addicted to Magic, and to all the Delusions that accompany it: They were willing to have it believed that it was in their Power to transform themselves into different Figures; to walk through the Air when they had a mind, and to perform all the ridiculous Things which the most expert Magicians pretend to. But of all their Superstitions, the most cruel was that which led them to sacrifice human Victims to some of their Gods; a barbarous Custom which lasted a long Time among them, and was with great Difficulty abolished.

In vain have some Authors alledged that we are imposed upon as to this Article, and that the Romans themselves were deceived, taking for real Sacrifices the Death that was inflicted upon Criminals. But nothing is more certain than what I here advance: All Antiquity gives Testimony to it, and it would be superstitious to heap up Authorities to prove it. In vain did the Roman Emperors endeavour by bloody Edicts, to banish so barbarous a Custom; it still continued, at least in some Provinces of the Gauls, until the entire Destruction of Druidism.

The

(1) Loc. cit. (2) Ant. Tom. 2.

The Ceremony of the Mistletoe of Oak.

Of all the Ceremonies that were performed by the Druids, the most solemn was that of gathering the Mistletoe, which they believed the Gods had brought down from Heaven for the Felicity of Men (a). The Mistletoe, which the Latins call Viscum, is a parasitical Plant, which is not produced by the Tree to which it adheres; Quod non sua seminat arbor, as it is in Virgil, who has given a fine Description of it, comparing it to the Golden Bough (b).

*As when bleak Winter binds the frozen Skies,
Push'd from the Oak her foreign Honours * rise;
The lofty Trunk th'adopted Branches crown,
Grac'd with a yellow Offspring not her own:
So with bright Beams, all beauteous to behold,
Glow'd on the dusky Trees the blooming Gold;
The blooming Gold, by e'ery Breath inclin'd,
Flam'd as it wav'd, and tinkled in the Wind.*

Pitt's Æn. VI. 290.

This Plant, which is not to be found upon the Surface of the Earth, grows upon Oaks, upon Apple-trees, Pear-trees, Plum-trees, the Beech-tree, and others: 'Tis commonly thought that the Thrushes, which are greedy of the Mistletoe Seed, after eating of it to Excess, throw out some of it upon the Trees which they frequent, and that this Seed, being fat and viscous, takes Root there, and puts forth a Tuft green and yellowish, which rises to no great Height, but does a great deal of Harm to the Trees upon which it ingrafts itself. The Fruits of this Shrub are oval Berries, soft, fat, and covered with a very delicate Membrane of a Silver Colour, which contains a viscous Substance. For this Mistletoe, especially when it grows upon the Oak, the Druids had an infinite Value; and

as

(a) Pliny, l. 16. c. 44. gives a full Description of this Ceremony, much the same with what we have here.

(b) *Quale solet sylvis brumali frigore viscum,
Fronde virere nova, quod non sua seminat arbor,
Et croceo fœtu teretes circumdare ramos.* Æn. l. 6.

* The Mistletoe.

as they had a small Skill in Botany, they undoubtedly knew that it was a specific against the Epilepsy, and that it is also of Use in the Apoplexy and Vertigos. They also extracted from it a Water which they reckoned a sovereign Remedy against all Sorts of Maladies. But as Superstition entered into all the Practices of those Priests, (for there had been nothing extraordinary in employing a medicinal Plant) at first they had no Value for any but that which grows upon the Oak, believing as Pliny says (1), that God had made a particular Choice of this Tree to bear that Plant. They therefore sought after it with great Assiduity in the Forests which they inhabited; and as it was then probably less common upon Oak than it is now, they blessed themselves, when after immense Labour they had the good Luck to meet with some Plants of it, as if they had really found a Treasure. However, the Time of gathering it was not indifferent, it was in the Month of December alone, which among them was a holy Month, and on the sixth Day of the Moon, that it was allowable to pluck it.

They assembled therefore for this Ceremony, which was performed with vast Parade, and marched in Procession to the Place where this precious Plant had been discovered. The Soothsayers went foremost, singing Hymns and Songs in Honour of the Gods. Next came a Herald, with a Rod in his Hand, who was followed by three Druids, bearing the Things necessary for the Sacrifice. Last of all, appeared the Chief of those Priests cloathed in a white Robe, and followed by a Crowd of People. When they were come up to the Place appointed, the Chief of the Druids got up upon the Oak, and cut the Mistletoe with a golden Sickle. The Druids received it with great Reverence into the Sagum, or a white Cassock. Then followed the Sacrifice of two white Bulls, to which succeeded a Feast, and Prayers were put up to the Gods, as Pliny tells us, to make this Plant a Mean of communicating Prosperity to those who should partake of it. On the first

(1) Loc. cit.

first Day of the Year, after having blessed and consecrated the Misseltoe, they distributed it to the People, promising and wishing them a happy Year. The Form made Use of for that Purpose, has been very long preserved by these Words, The New Year to Misseltoe.

As nothing is more difficult to root out than Customs founded on Superstition, they have still the same Cry in Picardy, adding Plant, Plant, when they wish for a plenteous and fruitful Year. In Burgundy and other Provinces; the Children; that have a Custom on the first Day of the Year of asking their New Year's Gift, make Use of the same Cry. There was even established in several Places, a Quest; or Kind of Begging on the first Day of the Year, where they made Use of the same Phrase, The New Year to Misseltoe; in asking People to give Alms.

Though Pliny gives a pretty full Account of this Ceremony, yet he has said nothing of the Place where it was performed; but the Author of the History of the Religion of the Gauls is of Opinion, that it was in the Country of Chartres: 1mo, Because, according to the Naturalist now quoted; it was performed during the Assembly of the Estates General; now 'tis known, that this is the Country where those Meetings were held, and that once a Year. 2do; Because the Ceremony in question having been the most solemn of all, 'tis very probable that it was performed in the great College which was at Chartres. 3tio; As Cæsar observes that the Gauls repaired thither with a vast Concourse at that Time, so 'tis probable that they improved that Conjuncture, to make those who were then upon the Place, Partakers of the most sacred of their Ceremonies.

As to what remains, I know not what was the Foundation of the religious Respect which the Druids had for the Number Six; but 'tis certain that they preferred it to all others. 'Twas on the sixth Day of the Moon that they performed their principal Acts of Religion; that they begun the Year; they went six of them in Number to gather the Misseltoe; and among the Monuments now extant, we often find the same Number of them.

The Maxims of the Druids.

The Druids not writing any Thing, as has been said, Tradition has preserved to us few or none of the many Maxims contained in that vast Number of Verses which they made their Pupils learn; however, Gollut (1) has collected for us some, which I shall quote from him, without laying more Stress upon them than they deserve, being persuaded that they have been only taken from the Accounts we have of their Doctrine in Antiquity.

The first Maxim. 'Tis necessary to be taught in the Groves by the sacred Priests.

2. The Misseltoe ought to be gathered with great Respect, and if possible, at the sixth Moon; a Golden Sickle is to be used for that Purpose.

3. Every Thing that is born, derives its Origin from Heaven.

4. The Secret of Sciences is not to be committed to Writing, but to the Memory.

5. Great Care must be taken of the Education of Children.

6. The Misseltoe beat to Powder, makes Women fruitful.

7. The Disobedient ought to be removed from Sacrifices.

8. Souls are immortal.

9. Souls pass into other Bodies after the Death of those which they have animated.

10. If the World perishes, it will be by Fire or Water.

11. On extraordinary Occasions, a Man must be sacrificed. According as the Body falls, or according as it moves when fallen; according as the Blood flows, or according to the Opening of the Wound, shall future Events be predicted.

12. The Prisoners of War are to be slain upon the Altars,

(1) Mem. of Franche Comté.

tars, or to be shut up within Apartments of Osier, to be burnt alive to the Honour of the Gods.

13. Foreign Commerce must not be permitted.

14. He who comes last to the Assembly of the Estates, is to be punished with Death.

15. Children are to be educated to the Age of fourteen Years, at a Distance from their Fathers and Mothers.

16. Money lent in this World, shall be repaid to Creditors in the next.

17. There is another World; and they who kill themselves to accompany their Friends thither, shall live there with them.

18. The Letters given to the Dying, or thrown into the Funeral Pile of the Dead, are faithfully delivered in the other World.

19. The Moon cures all, as her Name in Celtic implies.

20. Let the Disobedient be cast out; let them have no Justice done them; let them be received into no Company, nor admitted into any Office.

21. All Heads of Families are Kings in their own Houses: They have Power of Life and Death over their Wives, their Children and Slaves.

C H A P. IV.

Of the Druidesses.

THOSE who have read Cæsar's Commentaries, Tacitus, and some others of the Antients; know what Regard the Germans and Gauls had for their Wives. Those of the Druids especially, shared the Authority with their Husbands, though with some Dependance; and intermeddled, like them, not only in Political Affairs, but also in those of Religion. As there were in the Gauls, even from the Time of the Conquest of the Romans, Temples into which all Men were denied Access, in them the Druidesses presided, and regulated all that belonged to the Sacrifices, and other Ceremonies of Religion: All this, however, is to be understood, Regard being had to different Times.

We may distinguish three Sorts of Druideſſes : The firſt lived in Celibacy, as thoſe of the Iſland of Sain ; others, though married (1), dwelt regularly in the Temples which they ſerved, except one Day of the Year, when they were permitted to have an Interview with their Huſbands. Laſtly, the Druideſſes of the third Order lived conſtantly with their Huſbands, and took Care of the private Affairs of their Family.

We may divide them again into two Claſſes : In the firſt were the Prieſteſſes, while thoſe who were but Miniſters under the Orders of the firſt, compoſed the ſecond.

As nothing gives more Reputation than the pretended Knowledge of Futurity, ſo we may judge of that of thoſe Prieſteſſes, who were believed to be poſſeſſed of that Gift in an eminent Degree (2). Accordingly this Reputation was not confined within the Gauls : It was alſo diffuſed through foreign Countries. People came from all Quarters to conſult them with great Confidence, and their Deciſions were reckoned Oracles. The Emperors themſelves (3), when they were Maſters of the Gauls, did not diſdain to conſult them ; and tho' 'tis certain that they were not the only ones, Hiſtory however informs us only of their Conſultations, as if thoſe of private Perſons had not deſerved to be tranſmitted down to Poſterity.

True it is, as has been ſaid in the preceeding Chapter, the Druids took upon them the ſame Profeſſion ; but whether their Wives were more expert in it, that is, knew better how to deceive, they had abandoned it almoſt wholly to them.

I may add, that the Druideſſes were eſtabliſhed in almoſt all the Iſlands that are upon the Gallic Coaſts, and upon thoſe that lie near England ; yet ſo, that
in

(1) See Don James Martin, tom. 1. p. 206. (2) See Tacitus, l. 4. Dion. &c. (3) Lamprid. Vopifcus, &c.

in those where Druids were, there were no Druidesses, and these again possessed the others.

Further, all those Islands were consecrated to some particular Divinity, whose Name they bore. The Ministers of either Sex performed there the same Functions as in the rest of Gaul. 'Tis thought too, that they applied themselves more particularly there than elsewhere to Magical Operations; and it was an Opinion spread through all the Gauls, that they, as Masters of the Winds, raised Storms and Tempests when they had a Mind.

I said before, that only such Predictions of the Druidesses have been preserved as were addressed to the Emperors. I shall give here three or four pretty remarkable ones. Alexander Severus setting out on that Expedition, which was the last of his Life, one of his Priestesses came up to him, and said: My Lord, don't hope for Victory, and be on your Guard against your own Soldiers. Accordingly that Prince was assassinated in that same Campaign.

The Emperor Aurelian intending to consult some of them, to know if the Empire would be long in his Family, they answered him simply, that the Family of Claudius was to be one Day the most illustrious; and indeed that of Aurelian did not subsist long.

Dioclesian, when he was but an Officer in the Gauls, was amusing himself one Day in casting up his Accounts, when his Hostess, who was a famous Druidess, thus addressed him, In Truth, Sir, you are too covetous. Well, replied Dioclesian, I shall be liberal when I come to be Emperor. You shall be so, answered the Hostess hastily, when you have slain a Boar (1), cùm Aprum occideris. Dioclesian, struck with this Answer, applied himself from that Time a great deal to the Killing of those Animals, without arriving, however, at the Empire; but at last, bethinking himself that the equivocal Latin Word Aper, which signifies a Boar, might refer to Aper, Numerian's Father-in-law, he put him to Death, and so became Emperor.

R 3

In

(1) Vopiscus in Numer.

In fine, to conclude what relates to those Ministers of the Religion of the Gauls, 'tis proper briefly to examine at what Time they were abolished. Suetonius (1), Aurelius Victor, and Seneca, maintain that it was under the Empire of Claudius, which is absolutely false, since we find they still subsisted a long Time after ; and 'tis probable that they mean only the Human Sacrifices, from the Use whereof they were absolutely prohibited by that Emperor, and this is the most natural Sense can be put upon the Words of the former of these three Authors (a).

Tiberius had passed a Decree against them, but it was no better executed than that of Augustus had been. Adrian too made an Edict to abolish the Human Sacrifices that were offered up to Mithras and Jupiter ; but this Edict had no more Relation to the Druids than to the other Priests of the Empire. The Druids were still subsisting in the Time of Eusebius of Cesarea, who reproaches the Gauls with these Sacrifices of theirs, as also in the Time of Ausonius, who praises some of them who were his Contemporaries. Lastly, there were of them still remaining, at least in the Country of Chartres, to the middle of the fifth Century ; and 'tis probable that their Order was not quite abolished till Christianity had triumphed fully in the Gauls over the Superstition of the Pagan World, which happened but late, at least in some Provinces.

C H A P. V.

Of some Gallic Superstitions.

THE abolishing of the Druids did not draw after it that of the Superstitions which they had diffused through all Gaul : They had taken so deep Root there, that the Introduction of Christianity itself was not able to stop the detestable Practice. That of the first of January, which consisted in covering themselves with the Skins of several Animals, and in running

(1) In Claudio.

(a) Druidarum Religionem apud Gallos dire immanitatis, & tantum civibus sub Augusto interdictam, penitus abolevit. Suet. ibid.

ning thus through the Streets, lasted to the seventh Century of the Christian Æra, in spite of all the Efforts of the Bishops, the Prohibitions of the Fathers, and the Canons of Councils, which tended to abolish them. This abominable Rite, at least in its Beginnings, is what was called Cervoles and Vetula (a). There, to the Disgrace of Nature, you might have seen People transform themselves into Beasts, counterfeited in their mad Rambles the Stag, the Fawn, the Deer, and other Animals. But in vain was it to remonstrate against that Usage, they still went on in their usual Way, and with much ado were those ridiculous Masquerades at length abolished.

The Worship of some Divinities that were peculiar, and dearer than others to our antient Gauls, continued even a good Time after the Establishment of Christianity, especially that of Diana or Arduina, to be spoke of afterwards, she whom that People, passionately fond of Hunting, took for their Protectress. Not long ago, there was discovered a small Statue (1), thought to represent that Goddess, and which probably was the Household God, or particular Genius of some famous Hunter. This Idol represents a Woman half covered with a Kind of Cuirass, in one Hand holding a Bow unbent, and having a Dog near her.

The abominable Practice of Magic and Enchantments subsisted likewise a long Time. As it was brought into Vogue by the Druideesses, the Women, after the Extinction of those Priestesses, continued to observe their Rites, and hence it is obvious how difficult it must have been to abolish them. Those Women actually believed they went to nocturnal Witch-Meetings, and that Diana furnished them by Night with Vehicles to carry them swiftly through the Air; and 'tis well known how long that fond Credulity lasted, if indeed it may be said to be abolished even yet among some Women of the meaner Sort. When

R 4

the

(a) See the Ninth Letter of M. le Beuf, in the Work intitled, Diverse Writings, &c. T. 1. p. 280.

(1) Id. ib.

the Masquerade we have been speaking of came to be destroyed, the Feasts of the first of January did not entirely cease : They only changed the Object, and instead of running about under the Skins of Beasts, as used to be done formerly, they introduced the Custom of telling Fortunes on that Day, and of employing for that Purpose several superstitious Rites of Magic and Divination. 'Tis not to be doubted, in short, but all those Magical Rites, as well as the Notions of Sabbath, and the Nocturnal Expeditions, are derived from our antient Gauls, and from the Druideſſes who had practiſed them firſt.

Another very ſingular Piece of Superſtition was that which the Gauls practiſed towards the Rhine : When they ſuſpected the Fidelity of their Wives, they obliged them to expoſe upon the River the Children which they doubted to be theirs, and if they were ſwallowed up in the Stream, the Wife was puniſhed with Death as an Adultereſs : If, on the contrary, they floated above, and came back to their Mother, who followed them along the Bank, the Huſband, perſuaded of her Chaſtity, reſtored to her his Confidence and Love. The Emperor Julian, from whom we learn this Fact, ſays this River-God, by his Diſcernment, avenged the Injury that was offered to the Marriage-Bed.

Again, another Superſtition, at leaſt as barbarous : Before they conſulted about the Affairs of State, thoſe People, as we are told by Strabo and Diadorus Siculus, pierced a Man behind with a Poinard, and drew their Omens from the Manner in which he fell, and from the Form of the Wound.

The Gauls, addicted to the Science of Auguries, particularly by the Flight and chirping of Birds, as much, at leaſt, as the Greeks and Romans, conſulted likewise the Entrails of Victims, and were in general ſo infatuated with every Sort of Divination, that they paid an infinite Deal of Reſpect to all who profeſſed to know and foretel future Events. Different Councils held in the Gauls, a Treatiſe by S. Eloi, and the Authors

Authors of Ecclesiastic History, inform us of several other Sorts of Superstitions practised by our antient Gauls, and which lasted most of them a very long Time after they had embraced Christianity ; for in short nothing in the World is so difficult to be abolished as those Sorts of Customs.

We see by those Authorities that they still consulted the Auguries, that they were attentive to observe the Flight of Birds ; the lucky and unlucky Days ; the Days of the Moon ; that they still masqued on the first of January, and continued to practise a part of the Fooleries which we have spoke of ; that they observed the Solstices, from thence drew Omens, and at that Time sung loose Sonnets ; that they still invoked the Names of some Pagan Divinities ; celebrated the Days of the Dedication of Cities ; went with lighted Tapers to the Land-Marks as it were to do Honour there to the God Terminus ; practised several Sorts of Lustrations ; cast Charms upon the Herbs and Fruits ; swore by the Names and Surnames of the Sun and Moon, which were called the Lord and Lady : That in Diseases they put less Faith in the Physicians than in Spells, Talismans, &c.

Though the Gauls did not carry superstitious Rites in Funerals so far as several other idolatrous Nations, yet they did not fail to perform some pretty singular ones upon that Occasion. Thus, for Instance, they put the Arms and Bucklers of the Dead into their Tombs, as also several other Utensils which they thought would be of Use to them in the other World, a Circumstance which was discovered upon opening some of those Monuments. They were even wont to intrust the Dead with Letters for their deceased Relations. But as these Particulars belong more to the Antiquary than the Mythologist, I content myself with observing that in all Appearance the Tombs, and Inscriptions engraved upon them, are not of greater Antiquity than the Conquest of the Romans, since these practised the same Superstitions with those.

We see in those of the Gauls as well as in those of their

their Conquerors, the ordinary Form, D. M. to the Gods Manes, Diis Inferis, to the infernal Gods; and there, in short, we find the celebrated Form sub Ascia, which has and still continues to rack the Brains of the Learned, who have attempted to explain it, and who all of them almost contradict one another.

After having spoke of the Religion of the Gauls, of their Ministers and Superstitions, 'tis Time to give the History of their Gods. I shall begin with those who are upon the Monuments dug up in the Cathedral of Paris, where we find some who were unknown to the Roman Historians. Several Authors, 'tis true, have already explained those Monuments; but I reckon a compendious History of this Discovery, and of the Works that have been composed upon this Subject, joined with some new Reflections, will not be displeasing to my Readers.

C H A P. VI.

Of the Bas-reliefs dug up in the Choir of the Cathedral at Paris.

WHILE Lewis XIV. to execute the Vow of Lewis XIII. was setting about the building of the magnificent Altar of the Cathedral at Paris, it was found necessary to change the Burial-Place of the Archbishops, and in raking up the Earth there was discovered a Wall (1) near three Foot thick, and a little deeper, another Wall, which was partly formed of Stones, upon which were perceived Letters and Figures; Those Stones were quickly taken up, and it was judged that the Figures engraven upon them, represented Gallic Divinities, and that they had antiently served for a Base to some Altar. Whatever Injuries they had suffered, both by Time and by the Workmen, who, to adapt them to the Wall where they were employed, had made no Scruple to cut and deface them, and sometimes even to divide them; yet the Discovery of them made a great Noise, and invited our Anti-quaries, quaries, who came to examine them. From their examining to the making of Dissertations upon them but a short Time intervened. M. Baudelot, Member of the Academy of the Belles-Lettres, had those Bas-reliefs engraved, and together with their Figures published a Dissertation in order to explain them. M. Moreau, Member of the same Academy, soon followed his Brother, and happened to be as different from him in the Figures as in the Explications of them, which he published in his Turn. But it must be owned that those two Dissertations betray a little the Precipitancy of their Authors to bring them to Light. F. Daniel too made a Dissertation on the Subject, which is printed in the Memoirs of Trevoux for that same Year: But that learned Writer, who might, if he had pleased, have cast a great Light upon this Monument, applied himself only to clear up what concerned the Company of Watermen, or rather of Traders, who had erected it. M. Leibnitz, not to mention other Foreigners, having entered the Lists, vigorously attacked the Dissertation of M. Baudelot. Montfaucon, without entering into a Detail of Particulars, contented himself with giving Draughts of those Monuments in his Antiquity explained (1), with all possible Exactness. F. Lobineau having no mind to leave his History of Paris without so considerable an Ornament, got also Prints of the same Bas-reliefs, and joined to them his own Conjectures. In fine, Don James Martin, in his History of the Religion of the Gauls, published the same Figures with Explications, which, in my Opinion, are of all others the most satisfying: The Conjectures of others, though often not very well founded, yet open and enlarge their Minds, and sometimes carry them farther than those had arrived who went before them in the same Enquiry. As this Monument is of great Value, and makes us acquainted with Gallic Gods, who are mentioned by no History, I thought proper to set out with it, and begin the History of the Gallic Religion with the Explication of this Monument.

(1) March 16, 1711.

Those

(1) Vol. I.

Those Stones which are now deposited in one of the Halls of the Academy of the Belles-Lettres, exhibit first an Inscription conceived in these Terms :

TIB. CÆSARE.
AUG. JOVI OPTUM.
MAXIMO ARAM
NAUTÆ PARISIACI
PUBLICE POSUERUNT.

Under the Reign of Tiberius Cæsar, the Society of Watermen, or of Traffickers upon the River, erected this Altar to Jupiter, supremely good and great (a).

The Stones which compose the four Faces of this Altar exhibit, 1. Some armed Gauls, (they were always so) and these are probably some of the leading Men in this Dedication. 2. Some Druids without Arms, distinguishable by their Garb ; they having the Direction of whatever concerned Religion, as has been already said. 3. Figures of several Divinities, among whom are named, Eurises, Senani, Veilo, Volcanus, Jovis, Esus, Tarnes, Trigaranus, Castor, Pollux, Cernunos, and the last Letters of the Name of another God, OS. The Oak so venerated by the Antients, as well as the Misseltoe that was sometimes found upon it, appear upon two of those Stones ; namely upon that where is Esus, and upon that where is the Bull: The whole very roughly engraved, and exceedingly damaged.

E U R I S E S.

First of all presents the Stone upon which, as I have remarked, are represented several Gauls armed with Spears and Bucklers ; and the foremost of them wears a Circle, the Matter whereof we cannot know : These unquestionably are the principal Traders who attend the Dedication that is carried on at their Expence. Upon this Stone is inscribed the Word Eurises, it must needs therefore express their general Name. Now this Word, as is fully proved by the learned Benedictine, whom whom I have named above, is of Celtic Original, and composed of Gier, Good Luck, and Reiser, Waterman. The Greeks, adds he, have a Word like it, composed of the same Letters, and that has the same Signification; namely, that of εὐπεῖρος, and signifies one who has the Waves favourable to him. Now, we know that T. was often put for S. and that so commonly, that Lucian in his Dialogue of the Judgment of the Vowels, introduces the last of these two Letters, complaining that the other had banished him from all Words. These People in Arms, who first offer themselves after the Inscription of the Dedication, are therefore the Leaders of the Enterprize. The Arms which they bear, denote, what is true, that the Gauls never were present at the Performance of any Act of Religion, nor in the Management of any public Affair, but in Arms, which they seldom or never laid aside. The great Circle which one of those Gauls wears, was a Crown, or a kind of Diadem for Jupiter, to whom the Altar was consecrated.

(a) The Authors whom I have cited. vary a little in the Translation of this Inscription ; but this here is the true Sense of it.

Upon the Face of the Stone which follows that of the Traders on the Seine, we see again other Men, but different from the former, in regard that instead of Arms they are clad in a grave and majestic Habit, having Crowns upon their Heads. These unquestionably are Druids; and tho' their Garb, different from that of the other Gauls, did not prove it, yet we have now seen that they were the sole Ministers of Religion, or at least, that the others whom we have mentioned after some Antients, as the Bards, &c. were intirely subject to them. They must needs therefore have been present at this solemn Dedication, and 'tis by no Means surprizing to find them there.

The Words Senani Veilo, that are at the Foot of the same Stone, ought then to design them; but it must be owned that they are hard to be explained. M. Baudelot says, that the Word Senani is the same with Se-quani, and likewise denotes the Watermen; but what Appearance is there, that after having designed them by the Word Eurises, which is above them, they would

would again design the same Thing in using the Word Senani, which is upon the Face where are the Men without Arms? 'Tis therefore the Druids that are designed by this Word, and I readily embrace the Opinion of the Author whom I have now quoted, who says that the Word is the same with Seniones, the old Men; a Term apposite to those Ministers of Religion, for whom the Gauls had so much Veneration. The same Author thinks, that from this Word had been formed Senatus and Senatores; the Curious may read his Proofs of it in the Work itself of that learned Benedictine. I also adopt his Conjecture as to the Word Veilo, which, according to him, was the Name which the Gauls gave to the Misseltoe of Oak which we have spoke so much of in the third Chapter: And what proves it, is, that the Greeks expressed in the proper Sense, Glass, and in the figurative, what is bright and shining by the Word ὑελος. Now the Misseltoe has these two Qualities, as we have said from the Description given of it by Virgil, who compares it to the golden Bough.

If I be asked why the Misseltoe is named in this Ceremony, I answer, that it was in so great Veneration among the Gauls, that not content with distributing it to the People, and extracting from it a salutary Water, they undoubtedly mixed it in all their religious Rites. This barbarous Word, 'tis true, is joined to that of Senani, upon a Face where this Plant does not appear, but besides that, we are certain of its being represented upon two Places of the same Monument, namely, upon the Side where is Efus, who appears to hold a Branch of it in his Hand, and upon that where is the Bull, Tervos Trigaranus, it may also be very probably upon that where the Word Veilo is written, the Stone being very much damaged.

'Tis also owing to the bad Condition the Stone is now in, that it is hard to say how many Druids were designed upon the Face in question. M. Baudelot sees six of them, others cannot find so many. But is this only Prejudice, or had M. Baudelot really better Eyes than the other Antiquaries who have explained this Monument? This is what I cannot decide. It would indeed be very lucky, if six of them could be found there; that Number, as has been said in the preceding Chapter, being sacred among the Gauls.
the

V U L C A N.

Vulcan, who appears upon the second Row of Stones, is drawn quite in the Roman Manner, with a Habit which reaches only to the Knees, a Bonnet upon his Head, holding in one Hand his Hammer, and in the other his Pincers. We must not, however, imagine, that the Gauls had received the Worship of that God only from their Conquerors: They paid Adoration to him 150 Years before Julius Cæsar had entered into the Gauls. Plutarch accordingly informs us (1), that those People having declared War upon the Romans, their King, Viridomarus, made a Vow to consecrate to that God all the Arms he could take from them. The Success, 'tis true, did not answer his Desires, since his Army was put to the Rout, and himself slain by the Consul; but 'tis not the less true that they then acknowledged that God in Gaul. Their Skill in working Metals, the Art of tinning over so curiously the Vessels of Copper, that they were apt to be mistaken for Silver, as we are told by Pliny; and that of Varnish and enamelling, which they applied to Gold and Silver; all these had made them adopt the God of Smiths, though we could not know by what Way they came to be acquainted with him.

We may remark, in finishing this Article, that the Gallic God Volcanus, who is known to us only by an Inscription found at Nantz, and by a Manuscript, is not Belenus, as several learned Men pretend, but Vulcan: As to which you may see, in the History of the Religion of the Gauls, Tom. 11. the Proofs thereof given by the Author.

C A S T O R and P O L L U X.

Upon the two first Faces of the third Row of Stones are Castor and Pollux, with their usual Habit and Bonnet;

(1) In Marcello.

net, holding in the right Hand a Pike, and their left resting upon a Horse's Head: Hence 'tis plain that these two Heroes were worshipped in the Gauls; but are they there; in a Dedication made by the Watermen, as the Gods who favoured Navigation? This is what cannot be thought, since the Horses that accompany them; have no Relation thereto; and it would rather be in Quality of Wrestlers that they are here represented, the Gauls having chose them to preside over the Exercises and Games that were to accompany this Dedication. But whatever be in this, we know not whether their Worship had passed into the Gauls only since the Conquest of the Romans, or if they had received it before. I should be much inclined to think, that the Knowledge of those Gods, originally of Greece, had come to them from that Country, and that it was by such of the Gauls as had escaped the Dangers to which their Army was exposed under Brennus, the Knowledge of them and their Worship was brought into Gaul. This Conjecture is at least as plausible as that of Authors who alledge that the Gauls had known the Argonauts, who are said by Timæus and Apollonius Rhodius to have reembarked upon the Tanais, and so to have entered the Ocean; whence passing through the Straits of Cadiz, they had coasted along the Gauls, and that our two Heroes, who then made themselves known to that People, were deify'd by them. Is there in all this the finallest Degree of Probability, and is not the Return of the Argonauts by the Ocean a meer Chimera (1)?

Reinesius quotes (2) an Inscription found at Seissel, in Bugey, which begins with these Words, Deo Vintio Polluci, and proves that this God was worshipped at Vence, which was called Vintium or Vincium; but I refer to the seventh Volume what I have to say of those two Dioscuri.

E S U S.

It appears that the great Divinity of the Gauls was Esus; his Name is also written with an Aspiration

(1) See the Hist. of the Argon. V. 7. (2) P. 209.

tion Hesus. As the Antients give us but little Account of this God (1), the Learned have framed several Conjectures about him ; but they all agree that he was the God of War ; and I am the more inclined to embrace their Opinion, that I find so little Probability in that of others. However, the Author of the History of the Gallic Religion gives us a quite other Idea of this God. He takes him to have been among that People the Supreme Being, the Unknown God, adding, that they adored him with high Veneration, though they had not any Figure of him, unless he was represented by the Oak, that Tree so respected by the Druids, and in general by all the Gauls. It was in the Woods, continues he, and at the Feet of Oaks that they offered Sacrifices, and addressed their Vows and Prayers to him. It must be owned, that he supports his Opinion by happy Conjectures, and by Etymologies that are no less so (a) ; but though it were true, as he says, that the Word Efus in Gallic, and Æsar in the Tuscan Language, signify God, would this prove that it signified the God, by Way of Eminence, the Sovereign of Gods, the Unknown God ? As Etymologies and Conjectures are no Proofs, the Author, besides, not only recedes from the most generally received Opinion, but, which is still more considerable, from the Idea which the Antients give us of Efus, whom they reckon a cruel and savage God, who could only be appeased by the Sacrifice of human Victims ; an Idea which agrees better to the God of War, than to a Being spiritual, invisible, and superior to all others (b).

Again, is it not more natural to believe that the Gauls, a courageous Warlike Nation, worshipped the God of Battles ? And we find none among them but Efus, to whom this Title can be applied. Besides, is not their offering to him the Prisoners of War, preferably

VOL. III.

S

ferably

(1) Lucan. Pharf. l. 1. Lactan. Div. Inst. l. 2.

(a) See the 254 and 255 Pages of the 1st Vol. of the Hist. of the Religion of the Gauls.

(b) Et quibus immitis placatur sanguine diro, Teutates, horrensque feris altaribus Efus. Luc. Phar. l. 5.

ferably to other human Victims, a Proof that it was to thank and pay him Homage for the Advantages they had obtained in War.

We may add farther, that the Celts, if they were not Scythians themselves, had at least dwelt in their Neighbourhood: For it must be owned that their great, and I may say their sole God, was the God of War (1), whom they represented by a Sword.

In fine, it is certain that Efus had Statues, since we find him represented upon one of the Bas-Reliefs of the Cathedral of Paris, with his Name underneath, while it is not possible to mark the Time when he had none: For, though the Author whom I have cited, alledges that it was very late before they began to represent him, and that this Custom was quite new in the Time of Tiberius, the Druids having hindered it as long as it was in their Power, yet 'tis obvious that this is but a Conjecture without any Foundation, and that this Date for the Introduction of Statues of this God, is only assigned, because no Room was left to doubt of his having them from that Time. His Figure, 'tis true, exhibits nothing that suits with the God of War, since he there appears like a young Man, with naked Shoulders, and one Hand lifted up, wherein, probably, was an Instrument which Time has defaced, ready to give a Blow to the Oak which is near him; but what can be concluded from one single Figure, considering the different Manners in which the Pagans represented their Gods? I know the Antiquaries, who have explained this Monument, will have it that this God is in action to cut the Mistletoe: But what Inconveniency is there in saying, that as he was the great Divinity of the Gauls, so to him was attributed the most sacred Function of their Religion, and that thereby was intended to denote, that the chief of the Druids, to whom alone it belonged to gather it, was only to be reckoned the Instrument which Efus made Use of to communicate to Men a Plant which had so many Virtues, and which which he himself had brought down from Heaven for their Benefit?

(1) See the 3d Vol.

But waving that, Eſus, or Mars, was one of the greatest Gods of the Gauls, and him they honoured with peculiar Worship. When they were upon the Point of giving Battle, they vowed to offer up to him not only all the Spoils and Horſes which they ſhould win from the Enemy, but alſo all the Captives; and nothing was more faithfully put in Execution than this Promise. For no ſooner was the Battle over, than they ſacrificed to him all the Horſes, and gathered into a Heap the Arms and Spoils, which they conſecrated to him, and which no Body durſt touch. If any one was convicted of having applied to his own Uſe any Part of thoſe Spoils, he was condemned to loſe his Life, and ſuffered Death without Mercy. As to the Captives, the Manner of paying their Vow was not uniform, contenting themſelves ſometimes with offering up the Choice of them, that is, the young and the moſt handſome, and killing the reſt with their Arrows; while, upon other Occaſions, they ſacrificed them all, without Diſtinction of Age or Birth. Their Devotion for this God, or rather their Fury, was ſometimes carried to ſuch Exceſs, as to ſacrifice to him their Wives and Children. This, at leaſt, is what happened, according to Juſtin (1), in the Expedition which they made into Aſia, when ready to fight againſt Antigonuſ, King of Macedonia, having conſulted the Entrails of the Victims, and finding nothing there but fatal Prefages, they took on the barbarous Reſolution to cut the Throats of their Wives and Children. So great was their Rage, according to the judicious Remark of that Hiſtorian, “ That they did not ſpare even what the Enemies “ themſelves would have ſpared, turning againſt the “ Mothers and their tender Children, thoſe very “ Arms which they ought to have taken up in their “ Defence.”

The laſt Figure of the ſecond Row of thoſe Stones
S 2 dug

(1) L. 26. c. 2.

dug up in the Cathedral of Paris, represents a Bull in the midst of a Wood with three Cranes, whereof one is upon his Head, the other in the Middle of his Body, and the third upon his Back, with this Inscription: Taurus Trigeranus, The Bull with three Cranes. 'Tis certain that those Birds are Cranes, since in the ancient Language of the Celtæ, Taro signifies a Bull, Tri, three, and Geran, a Crane. The Greeks themselves expressed the same Thing by these Words, Ταῦρος τριγεράνος: Here, however, is a Mystery of the Gallic Religion not easy to be explained. As the Bull is joined with the other Gods of that People, and is in the same Compartment with Vulcan, Jupiter and Esus, it would seem that the Gauls paid a religious Worship to that Animal. But this is not a bare Conjecture: Gregory of Tours (1), after having told us, that our Forefathers had made Divinities of the Forests, the Waters, the Birds, and Animals, adds: "Alas! had they been but capable to comprehend
 " what dreadful Vengeance God inflicted upon the " Jews for the Crime they were guilty of in wor-
 " shipping the Golden Calf!" which certainly intimates, that the Bull was included in the Number of the Animals which they adored. That the Bull appears upon this Monument, in a Place where Trees rise around him, is a further Proof that he was one of their Gods, since it was in the Groves, which served the Gauls of old for Temples, that their Mysteries were celebrated. Lastly, Plutarch (2), speaking of the Treaty which that terrible Army of Barbarians, composed of Teutons, Cimbres, &c. (that is, of Celtæ, for this was their generical Name) which was designed to go and besiege Rome, made with the Romans, says, they swore to the Observation of it by their Brazen Bull, which they probably carried about in their Armies, since Catulus, after having defeated them, made one of them be carried to his House as a glorious Spoil, and the most certain Mark of his Victory.

As for the Cranes that are upon the sacred Bulls, I judge

(1) Hist. l. 2. c. 10. (2) In Mario.

judge it sufficient to observe, that since the Gauls bore them upon their Ensigns, as the Romans did the Eagles, 'tis no Wonder that they intermixed them with the Mysteries of their Religion, and paid a Kind of Veneration to them.

C E R N U N N O S.

Upon the third Face of the first Stone of those Monuments, appears a Gallic Divinity, represented under the Figure of a Man, who has upon his Head, by the Side of the Ears, Horns intermingled with Rings, pretty like those of a young Stag, with the Inscription, Cernunnos. The late M. de Matour had another Figure not unlike to a Gallic God, which was naked, that is, with no other cloathing but a small Drapery upon the left Shoulder, which is wrapped about the Arm, whose Horns were wreathed towards the Root, and terminated in two Crescents (1); and M. de Chazelles had another entirely cloathed, whose Horns had several Branches, much like a Palm: This Figure bore upon the Arm a little Animal which resembled a Kid or a Lamb.

'Tis no Rarity to meet with horned Gods in Paganism: Such was Jupiter Ammon, Pan, the Fauns, the Satyrs, &c. But this Gallic God is known under the Name of Cernunnos, only since the Discovery of the Bas-relief of Notre-Dame Church. Thus we need not be surprized if the Learned, both in France and Germany, who have attempted to explain these Monuments, differ so much from one another with respect to this God; the two most probable Sentiments upon this Subject, are that of the Author of the History of the Religion of the Gauls, and that of M. Eccart. The former takes Cernunnos to have been a rural God, who among our antient Gauls presided over Hunting, as Alces, or Alcis, according to Tacitus, was the God of the same Exercise in the Province of antient Germany, which was possessed by the Nabaruchi. The strongest Argument which he brings in Support of his Opinion, is, that the Horns of Cernunnos, the

(1) See Montf. Ant. v. i.

Diadem which he wears upon one of his Figures, and the Animal which he holds in his Hand upon that of M. de Chazelles, are all Characters of a God of Hunting, as is justified by several Figures of Diana, the Goddess of the same Exercise among the Greeks and Romans, where we find all these Symbols. M. Eccart thinks this God represents Bacchus, or Dionysius, an Opinion which wants not Probability ; but after all, can he flatter himself that he has discovered what was the settled Opinion the Gauls had concerning a God who is so little known even at present ?

To conclude, the Name of Cernunnos is composed of two Celtic Words, whereof the first Cern, imports a Horn, and the second Yna, or Ona, a Spear.

The last Face of the third Row of Stones presents the Bust of a naked Man, holding a kind of Club in the right Hand, which is lifted up as if he was going to strike a Serpent that is opposite to him, and is rearing itself against him. The Inscription above is almost quite effaced, and it is read differently. M. Baudelot has decyphered in it only these two Letters, OS, and Don James Martin finds Seni ri os. As the Man's Figure is unquestionably Hercules, who was highly adored in the Gauls under the Name of Ogmios, or Ogmios (a), so I am persuaded that the two Letters now mentioned are the last Letters of the Name of that God ; the rest being almost quite defaced, one may find there whatever he fancies. The Serpent which seems to be rearing itself against Hercules, is probably either one of those which that Heroe slew when in the Cradle (1), or one of the Heads of the Hydra of Lerna, the rest either not having been added, or else being defaced, as is the greatest Part of the Bas-relief.

That Hercules travelled into the Gauls, that he had Children there, and that he was there honoured with peculiar Worship, are Truths attested by all Antiquity,

(a) This Name is derived from the Celtic, which was the Language of the Gauls.

(1) See the Hist. of Hercules Vol. VI.

quity, and it will not be expected, I presume, that I should make a vain Show of Erudition to prove them : But the Question is whether this was Alcides the Greek Hercules, or the Egyptian Hercules, or another ? For, as we shall see in the sixth Volume of this Mythology, there were a great Number of them : This is what I take not upon me to determine. I shall only observe that the Gauls had a quite different Idea of this God from what the Greeks conceived of him, since they figured him otherwise than the others did, and reckoned him, not a Subduer of Monsters, and a Redresser of Wrongs, but the God of Eloquence, and of an Eloquence so sweet, and at the same Time so persuasive, that there was no Possibility of resisting it.

Lucian (1), who had travelled into the Gauls, has left us a Picture of this God, which is very proper to give us a just Notion of him. “ The Gauls, says “ he, call Hercules in their Language Ogmios, and re- “ present him in a Manner altogether extraordinary. “ He is a decrepit old Man, almost bald, and the “ few Hairs he has are all gray : Sun-burnt and “ wrinkled, like our old Sailors, he was taken for “ Charon ; but yet if one considers his Lion’s Skin, “ his Club which he has in his right Hand, his Qui- “ ver and his Bow which he has in his Left, he has “ all the Air of Hercules. What is most singular “ therein is, that he draws along with him a Mul- “ titude of Persons whom he holds fastened by the “ Ears. Their Chains are of Gold and Amber ; “ and though they are very fine and slender, yet “ it does not appear that any one of those who are “ fastened to them, makes the smallest Effort to “ break them, or to extricate himself from them : “ On the contrary, all those who are chained, in the “ height of good Humour follow their Leader with “ so much Eagerness, that the Chains are slack, and “ don’t appear to draw. The two Hands of Hercu- “ les being, as has been said, intangled, the Painter

(1) Dial. intitled, Of the twice-accused.

“ not knowing where to fasten the Extremity of the “ Chains, made a Hole in his Tongue, and to that “ they are fastened in the Figure.”

From this Picture 'tis easy to perceive that the Gauls looked upon Hercules as a God of Eloquence, and the Thing is past Doubt. However, the Author of the History of the Religion of the Gauls, will have this Figure to have been Mercury, who, according to him, was the God of Eloquence among that People, and by Consequence not to be Hercules.

But besides that all who have spoke of the Gallic Hercules, give him this Celtic Name ; and Lucian, who appears to be well informed, says, Ogmios was very knowable by his Club, his Bow, and his Lion's Skin : What a Gallic Philosopher said to him leaves no Room to doubt of it. For when Lucian was expressing his Surprize at a Figure so extraordinary, a Philosopher of that Country, as he says himself, accosted him, and bespoke him in this Manner: Your Astonishment will cease so soon as I have explained to you the whole Mystery. We Gauls are of a quite different Opinion from the Greeks, who make Mercury the God of Eloquence: According to us 'tis Hercules, because he surpasses Mercury in Strength. We paint him advanced in Years, because Eloquence never shews itself more lively and animated than in the Mouths of old Men. The Connection which there is between the Ear and the Tongue, justifies the Picture we make of this old Man, who with his Tongue draws Men, held fast by the Ear.

In several Places of the Gauls, in Germany, and Countries still more northerly, there have been found Figures of Hercules, with Surnames pretty singular, whereof I shall say a Word or two.

HERCULES MAGUSAN or MACUSAN.

Hercules was hardly known under the Name of Magusan, but by some Medals struck under the Reign of the Emperor Commodus, when in 1514 there was discovered upon the Sea-coast at West-Capello, a Town in Zeland, in the Island of Talbeven (1), a very

(1) See Keisler's Ant. Celt. p. 200.

a very large Statue, which represents a Man of a middle Age, very strong and robust, with Symbols not well known. The Drapery, which covers only his back Parts, forms upon his Head a Kind of Kerchief, which, falling down upon the left Shoulder, divides itself and reaches to the Feet. The Man represented holds in his right Hand a Dolphin, and in his Left a Kind of Scepter which terminates at the upper End in two Grains. On the Right of the Statue is a square Altar whence Flames arise, and on its left a small Sea-Monster, which is not known. I doubt if ever Hercules would have been known under a Figure so fantastical and so remote from that of the Greeks and Romans, had it not been for the Inscription which bears these Words:

*Herculi Maguzano, M. T. Primis uis Tertius. V.
S. L. M.*

Marcus Primus, or Primillus has paid the Vow which he had made to Hercules Maguzanus.

The Jesuits at Brussels have at the Entrance to their Library an Inscription where is also mentioned a Vow made to Hercules Maguzan; and as the same Name occurs upon some Medals of Posthumius, Herculi Maguzano, on which that Heroe is represented with his Club in one Hand, and a Bow in the other, with a Kind of Skin upon his Arms, there is no Doubt of his having been worshipped in the Gauls, in Germany, and in some other more northern Countries.

The Learned are puzzled in explaining the Surname of Maguzan, given to Hercules: The Author of the History of the Religion of the Gauls, takes it to be derived from the Celtic, and that it may possibly design Posthumius himself, who struck the Medals in Honour of that God (1). But as upon another Medal struck by the same Emperor in Honour of Duisanian Hercules, the Heroe appears with the same Attributes, and as the Surname Duisaniensis which is given him, is that of a Place named Duiz, 'tis very probable probable that Maguzan is also a local Name, tho' we know no Place so called.

(1) Tom. II. p. 26, & seq.

As for the odd Symbols that accompany the Hercules of Zeland, we need not be much at a Loss about them ; Islanders having given to the Hercules whom they worshipped, Attributes suitable to a God of the Sea. And indeed, had it not been for the Name that is in the Inscription, I would be inclined to take the Figure for a Neptune, though his Sceptre has but two Forks, since sometimes that of Pluto had three, though it ought to have but two. Besides, every Country frequently varied as to the Symbols of their Gods. The Maguzan Hercules's, represented upon the Medals of Posthumius, have preserved the Attributes of their God better, though they carry an Air of the Time when they were struck.

The Gauls and Germans gave other Surnames to Hercules. Upon a Statue of Bronze found at Strasbourg, since brought into France, that God bears the Name of Krutsanam, which imports a valiant Man ; and upon an Altar found in Lorraine, and represented in F. Calmet, that God is named Sascan or Hercules of the Rocks (1).

JUPITER, or TARANIS.

That Jupiter was known and worshipped by the Gauls, is a Thing not to be doubted : For, besides that Cæsar puts him among the Gods of that Nation, he is represented in the Bas-Reliefs of Paris with the Word Jovis, which is his true Name, since the Celtæ, as has been already said in the History of the Titans, called him Iou, or the Youth. Mount Iou in the Alps, called by the Latins, Mons Jovis, which was consecrated to him, and still bears the same Name, proves both that this God was held in Veneration in the Gauls, and that Iou, whereof Jovis is the Genitive, was his true Name. The Day of the Week that went by his Name, Dies Jovis, is still pronounced in all the southern Provinces of France, Di-Jov. But whether was this God known to the Gauls only from the Time of the Roman

(1) Hist. of Lorraine.

man Conquest, or in antient Times? As to this, Opinions are divided: For my Part, I am persuaded that the Gauls worshipped this God before the Romans; and since the Titans had conquered the Gauls, and penetrated into the Heart of Spain, as has been said in their History, 'tis more probable, that so soon as that celebrated Conqueror was deified, he was worshipped in all the Bounds of his Empire. The Gauls gave him the Name Taranis, as we are told by Lucian, and offered to him human Sacrifices as they did to Esus. We have already said elsewhere (1), that the Surname of Taranis answered to that of Jupiter the Thunderer among the Romans; which proves that they both looked upon him as the God who had Thunder and Lightning at his Command (a). However, that warlike Nation did not reckon Jupiter or Taranis the first of their Gods, Esus or Mars was their first and greatest Divinity.

In the mean Time we may suppose, as the Author of the History of the Religion of the Gauls remarks (2), that from what Time the Romans became Masters of the Gauls, the Worship of Esus gradually diminished, and that no later than the Time of Tiberius, Jupiter was become the first God of the Gauls.

As for the Statues of the Jupiter of that People, the Antiquaries justly look upon them as Monuments that did not begin to appear till they were conquered by the Romans; for in antient Times they represented that God only under the Form of an unpolished Oak not cut; whereas the Statues that are transmitted to us resemble pretty much those of the Romans both in Taste and in their Symbols. In that which is upon one of the Stones of Notre Dame at Paris; this God has his Bosom and Right-arm naked, holding a Pike in his Left-hand, and the Right was probably armed with the Thunderbolt, which Time has defaced, or which the Workmen have broke. Another Figure of

(1) History of Jupiter, l. 1.

(a) The Word Taranis is Celtic in its Original, and comes from Taran, which in that Language signifies Thunder, or to thunder.

(2) Tom. I. l. 2. c. 2.

of the same God; which was formerly at Mount Iou, represented him slightly covered with a Cloak, which reached down from his left Shoulder, having the Arms extended, with a radiant Crown, and the Thunderbolt in the Right-hand. Time has preserved to us some others; but they have nothing singular in them (a).

C H A P. VII.

Of the Gods of the Gauls whom Cæsar names.

WE have already observed, that a Conqueror, embarrassed with a thousand Cares, has but little Time to inform himself about the Religion of the People whom he subdues; consequently 'tis no Wonder, 1. Tho' Julius Cæsar names but five of the Gællic Gods, having known neither those whom we have mentioned in the preceding Chapter, nor those whom we are to speak of in the Sequel. 2. Tho' he says that Mercury was their principal Divinity, since 'tis certain that it was Eſus. However, here are the five whom he names (1), Mercury, Apollo, Mars, Jupiter, and Minerva.

The Gauls, says he, pay the highest Worship to their God Mercury, of whom they have a great Number of Statues, and make him the Inventor of all Arts, the God of Traders and Merchants (b). Cæsar does not say that the Gauls gave this God another Name; whereas I am apt to believe, that antiently they knew him not under the Name of Mercury, but under that of Teutates; but as he saw the Resemblance between the latter and the Mercury of the Romans, he gave him the same Name as they did, without troubling himself about the Name which he had in the Country. For, in short, 'tis certain that the Gauls called called this God Teutates, as we are told by Lucan (1), and that they sacrificed to him human Victims, as well as to Efus. Lactantius (2) speaks of him in the same Way as the Poet whom I have now quoted: The Gauls, says he, propitiated their God Teutates by the Effusion of human Blood. Minutius Felix (3) says the same, as do all who have made Mention of this God.

(a) See Montf. Antiq. v. 1. and The Hist. of the Religion of the Gauls, v. 1. l. 2. c. 8.

(1) De Bell. Gall. l. 6.

(b) Deum maxime Mercurium colunt; cujus sunt plurima simulachra: Hæc omnium inventorem artium ferunt. De Bell. Gall. l. 6.

As the Spaniards likewise worshipped Teutates, whose Name is plainly derived from Tbot, who was the Mercury of the Egyptians, and of some other neighbouring Nations, I am persuaded that those had the Knowledge of him from the Carthaginians, and that they communicated it to the Gauls; for the Religion of those two People had a great Deal of Affinity, as we shall see hereafter.

It will, no Doubt, be objected, that most of the Figures of Mercury that have been dug up at different Times, resemble those of the Greeks and Romans, and bear the same Symbols, and consequently that it was from them, and not from the Egyptians or Carthaginians, that the Gauls received the Knowledge of him. But I answer, we must have Recourse to the two Periods of Time I have distinguished in the Religion of these People. In the first, they knew Mercury only under the Name of Teutates, and represented him in several Manners, all of them pretty singular, as may be seen in Montfaucon (4), who has given the Figures of a great many of them. In the second, namely, when they were subject to the Romans, they adjusted their own Idea of this God to that which their Conquerors had of him, and represented him in the same Manner with them. This Distinction will often be necessary, as we shall see in the Thread of our Discourse. Besides, as the Greeks, Romans, and Gauls, had all received from Egypt the first Knowledge of this God, tho' by different Colonies, they must both have conceived much the same Idea of him, since

(1) Pharf. l. 1. (2) Div. Inst. l. 1. c. 21. (3) Ch. 30.
(4) Ant. Exp. Vol. I. Part 2.

since the Egyptians themselves accounted him the Inventer of Letters, of Arts, &c.

B E L E N U S, or A P O L L O.

The same Cæsar, when he says the Gauls worshipped Apollo, adds, that they had much the same Sentiments of that God with other Nations, believing him to be the God who removed Diseases; Eandem fere quam reliquæ gentes habent opinionem, Apollinem morbos depellere (1). The Gauls worshipped this God under the Name of Belenus, as is asserted by almost all the Antients, tho' Cæsar says nothing of it. M. Della Torrè, Bishop of Hadria, has made a learned Dissertation upon Belenus, wherein he proves that this God had been highly adored at Aquileia in Friuli, as appears from a great Number of Inscriptions found in that City, and quoted by Gruter and Reinesius. From Aquileia, according to that learned Prelate, the Worship of Belenus was introduced among the People of Noricum, pretty near to Aquileia, as he proves from Tertullian (2), who says in his Apologetic, Every People, every City has its tutelar God; the Syrians, Astarté; the Arabians, Disares; the People of Noricum, Belenus, &c. This same Worship, continues he, after having been received in several other Countries, passed at last into the Gauls, where Belenus became one of the great Divinities of that People (a); but of all the Provinces of the Gauls, there was none where he was more worshipped than in Auvergne (3) where his Name was a little changed, since upon an Inscription quoted by Gabriel Simeoni, he is called Bellinus; and in Aquitania, or in Britany, as may be proved by the Authority of Ausonius (4), who being of Bordeaux, was very capable to know the Gods and Religion of that Province.

The

(1) Loc. cit. (2) Apol. c. 24.

(a) Reinesius does not make the Worship of Belenus to have been propagated in the same Order. He pretends, on the Contrary, that it was brought by the Gauls into Aquileia; but his Sentiment is overthrown by M. della Torrè.

(3) See La descript. de la Limagne d'Auvergne. (4) De Prof. Burd. Car. 4 & 10.

The Gauls communicated the Knowledge of Belenus to the Inhabitants of Great Britain, who worshipped him, as we are told by Selden (1), under the Name of Belertucades. Monfieur de Valois, in his Account of the Gauls, finds also in several other Provinces of those People, Vestiges of the Worship of Belenus; and neither he nor the Bishop of Hadria, nor the other Authors, make any Doubt of his being the same with the Apollo whom Cæsar speaks of, as is confirmed by the Inscriptions, which usually join the Name of Belenus to that of Apollo, Apollini Beleno.

If it be now asked, whence came the Worship of Belenus to Aquileia, and from thence to the other Countries we have named, and what is the Signification of the Name, I answer, that the Name may come from Βέλος, an Arrow, or with Vossius (2), that it was propagated from Syria or Phenicia, and that it is the same with Bel, or Beelsemen, that is to say, the Sun. The Author now cited is not alone in this Opinion, Bochart (3), Selden (4), Reinesius, Spon (5), in a Word, all the Mythologists agree to it, so that to quote Testimonies would be needless.

Though the Authority of the Authors now named be of very great Weight to prove Belenus to be the Bel of the Syrians, yet the Bishop of Hadria does not side with them, but opens a new Opinion. He proves, in the first Place, the Distinction between the Sun and Apollo, upon the same Principles which I have made Use of in speaking of the Sun (6), whence he proves, that Belenus was indeed the same with Apollo; but that he was quite distinct from the Sun: The Inscriptions designing Apollo Belenus, but never Sol Belenus; and by Consequence, he could not be the Bel of the Syrians, who in Truth was the Sun, and not Apollo, nor be derived from that Part of the East, where anciently they knew only the Apollo of the Greeks.

After having demonstrated this Article, the learned
Pre-

(1) De Diis Syr. Synt. 2. c. 1. (2) De Orig. & Progr. Idol. l. 2. c. 17. (3) Geog. Sacr. Part 1. c. 14. (4) De Diis Syr. Syn. 2. c. 7. (5) Misc. Sect. 4. Art. 1. (6) B. 1.

Prelate is of Opinion, that Belenus is the same with Helenus the Son of Priam; the Change of the Aspiration into the Consonant B, being a very small Affair. Antenor, says he, having set out from Troy with Pyrrhus, both of them consulted Helenus, who, as every Body knows, practised the Art of Prediction; and as he let each of those Leaders know the Course of their Adventures, Antenor having crossed the Adriatic (for Pyrrhus settled in the Western Parts of Greece, which from thence got his Name) came into the Eastern Parts of Italy, pretty near Aquileia, and made Helenus be worshipped as a God, who had Insight into Futurity, which was the Reason of confounding him afterwards with Apollo. From that Part of Italy, the Worship of Helenus passed into the Gauls, as has been said; or perhaps, adds the Author whose Sentiment I am delivering, some of the Trojans who accompanied Antenor, left him at the Time of his crossing the Adriatic Gulf, came and settled in the Gauls, and there established the Worship of this new God.

But to proceed, we are ignorant of the Nature of that Worship which the Gauls paid to Belenus; and no Author has said that human Victims were offered to him, as to Esus and Teutates. Ausonius (1) speaks of his Priests; but as to the Sacrifices that were offered to him, he gives us no Information; all that he says upon the Subject amounting only to this: That Atius, of the Race of the Druids, was over the Service of the Temple of Belenus, and that he had the Surname of Patera; for this was the Name given to the Ministers of Apollo by those who were initiated into the Mysteries (a); and in another Place he makes mention of an old Man named Phæbitius, a Druid, who had been Sacristan of the Temple of the same God; but from all these one may even conclude, that

(1) Loc. cit.

(a) Sic ministros nuncupant

Apollinares mystici. Auson. loc. cit.

Non reticebo senum, nomine Phæbitium,

Qui Beleni Æditus, nil opus inde tulit. Id. ibid.

that the Belenus of the Gauls, as I said at first, was the Apollo mentioned by Cæsar.

Besides the Inscriptions that make Mention of Belenus, and which are very numerous, we find also in the Gauls, some Monuments of this God. The most curious one is undoubtedly that radiant Head, with a large open Mouth, so long preserved in the Castle of Polignac, a Print whereof was given, for the first Time, by Gabriel Simeoni. It represents Apollo delivering Oracles, as he is thought to have done from a Temple which he had at Polignac, a Name derived from that of Apollo himself.

The third God of the Gauls, whom Cæsar names, is Mars; but as he, among them, was the same with Hesus, I shall add nothing to what I have said of him in the preceding Chapter.

M I N E R V A.

Cæsar, in the last Place, names Minerva among the Divinities of the Gauls; but we learn nothing concerning her from Antiquity, whether they had got the Worship of her from the Egyptians by the Phœnicians, or by the Carthaginians, who trafficked upon their Coasts; or if they only received it after the Romans became Masters of their Country; and what Idea they had of this Goddess, all these are Questions which we cannot now determine. What we know is, that this Goddess was called in the Gauls, Belisana, and that she was reckoned the Inventress of Arts.

The Antiquaries think they observe upon Cussi's Pillar the Gallic Minerva. The Helmet she wears is ornamented with a Tuft of Feathers, and the Goddess is leaning upon the Trunk of a Tree, clad in a Tunic without Sleeves, over which is the Robe named Peplum, which covers her Body. She has her Feet across, and her Head reclining upon her right Hand. Her Attitude is that of a Person in profound Meditation: Bating this, she has no Resemblance to the Greek and Roman Figures of this Goddess, and has not the Egis, like them.

To conclude, as among the Figures that are represented sented upon the Pillar I have now mentioned, the last is that of a Man who has his Hands bound, with a sad and dejected Air, seeming to wait till the Druid come to give the deadly Blow, and who is undoubtedly the Prisoner whom they were going to sacrifice, it follows, that it was not only to Esus and Teutates human Sacrifices were offered, but also to the other Gods, and particularly to Minerva, who is upon this Monument.

C H A P. VIII.

Of some other Gallic Gods : Of Peninus, Abellio, Dolichenius and Mithras.

WE have seen in the preceding Chapter, that the Gauls worshipped Apollo under the Name of Belenus, and that this God was not the Sun; however, they paid religious Worship to that Luminary, though under other Names. First the Penini, Inhabitants of the Alps, owned for the Sun the God Peninus or Penin, whence that Chain of Mountains derived its Name, as we learn from Titus Livius (a). Guichenon, in his History of Savoy (1), has preserved to us the Inscription that was upon the Pedestal of a fine Statue that represented this God under the Figure of a young Man naked, which was conceived in these Terms, L. Lucilius Deo Penino Optimo Maximo donum dedit.

We must not however dissemble what we are told by Cato and Servius (2), that this was not a God, but a Goddess, whom the one calls Penina, and the other Apenina; but both the Figure and the Inscription inform us of the contrary. The Historian of Savoy subjoins these Words: Upon the Mountain of Little Saint Bernard, which belongs to the Valley of Aoste, is a Pillar of Marble fourteen Foot high, dedicated formerly to the God Peninus, upon which was a Carbuncle, called Peninus's

(a) Neque Mehercule montibus his ab transitu Pœnorum nomen inditum, sed ab eo quem, in summo sacrorum vertice, Penninum montani appellant. Dec 3. l. 11. n. 38.

(1) Tom. 1. (2) In 3 Æn.

Peninus's Eye. The Statue of that God was afterwards carried off, and that of Jupiter put in its Place, and then the Carbuncle was called Jupiter's Eye. 'Tis certain, however, that notwithstanding this Change, the Worship of Peninus was not abolished; and the Mountaineers continued to pay Adoration to him.

The Learned are at a Loss to find out what God this Peninus was. It would appear at first Sight that he was Jupiter himself, as the Epithets of Optimus Maximus seem to insinuate: But the Author of the History of the Religion of the Gauls, proves solidly (i) that he was the Sun, and that the Eye which we have been speaking of was the same with the Eye of Osiris, who in Egypt represented the Sun, as I have proved in his History; but not to dwell longer upon this Article, I refer to the Author whom I have quoted.

A B E L L I O.

In the Country of the Cominges, they adored the God Abellio, as appears from three Inscriptions quoted by Gruter. That Antiquary, followed herein by Reinesius, is persuaded that this God was the same with Belenus, worshipped through all Gaul, and the last pretends even to derive the Name of Abellio from that of Belenus.

D O L I C H E N I U S.

In digging the Port of Marseilles (2); was found a Groupe of Marble eleven or twelve Foot high, which represented the God Dolichenus standing upon a Bull; below which was an Eagle displayed. Charles Patin got this fine Marble engraved, and then the learned Spon adorned with it his curious Miscellanies of Antiquity. As the Figure of the God is in compleat Armour, he was taken at first for the God Mars. The Author of the History of the Gallic Religion, is persuaded, that it is the Sun, or at least Jupiter Sol; but I hold to the Sentiment of Spon, who takes it to be Jupiter himself: And he relies upon an Inscription consecrated to that God, with this Surname, Jovi Optimo Maximo Dolicheno, &c.

T 2

The

(1) V. i. p. 404. & seq. (2) In 1658.

The Name of Dolichenus came from Asia, and particularly from the Province of Comagena, where, according to Stephanus, particular Worship was paid to Jupiter Dolicheus, whence the Inhabitants themselves were denominated Dolichenians : But I refer to what I have said of this God in the History of Jupiter.

M I T H R A S.

That the Persian God Mithras was worshipped in the Gauls, is an uncontested Fact. A Figure of this God found at Lyons, and designed first by Gabriel Simeoni (1), and then by Spon (2), and F. Menestrier (3), upon which is the Inscription, Deo invicto Mithræ Secundinus dat, proves it sufficiently.

When Simeoni got the Print of this Figure, it had the Head of a Woman, and that Head is not now upon it, which perplexes the Antiquaries: For in short, say they, Mithras was a Male God, and not a Goddess, and the Inscription so designs him : But not to mention here, that they may mistake for a Woman's Face that of a young Man, who never waxes old, whereby the Sun was represented ; 'tis certain that among the Persians, as I have proved by the Authority of Herodotus, Mithras likewise represented the Moon : Thus the Gauls might have figured him like a Woman. But I have discoursed so fully of this God in the third Volume (4), that I have nothing here to add, only would have it remarked, that his Worship had passed into the Gauls in the Manner as I have said at the Beginning of that Book.

C H A P. IX.

Of other Gods worshipped in the Gauls : Berecynthia, Saturn, Pluto, Proserpine and Bacchus.

SAINTE Gregory of Tours (5) informs us, that our Gauls worshipped Cybele, whom they called Berecynthia, from the Name of Mount Berecynthus in Phrygia, where she was said to be born ; adding, that their Ido-

(1) Descrip. de la Limagne d'Auvergne. (2) Recher. des Ant. de Lyon. (3) Hist. of Lyons. (4) L. 7. (5) In Vita S. Simpl.

Idolatry towards this Goddess was continued down even to the fourth Century. One Day, says that Writer, as they were leading Berecynthia through the Fields and Vineyards, in a Chariot drawn by Oxen, for the Preservation of the Fruits of the Earth, and as the Multitude that followed sung and danced before that Idol, S. Simplicius, affected with the Blindness of that idolatrous Herd, having prayed and made the Sign of the Cross, the Statue fell to the Ground, and the Oxen remained immoveable. They offered Victims, and beat the Oxen to make them go forward; but all their Efforts being in vain, there were some of them abandoned that foolish Superstition for ever, and embraced the Christian Religion. The Acts of S. Symphorian, published by Don Ruinart, confirm one Part of the Recital of Gregory of Tours, since we there read, that on a Day consecrated to the Feast of that Goddess, her Statue was drawn by Oxen: But besides these two Authorities, our Antiquaries think they discover the Ceremony which the Gauls practised in honour of this Goddess, upon a Coin quoted by Bouteroue, which on one Side represents a Chariot drawn by two Oxen, whereon is a Goddess standing.

But we must observe, that this Coin, which is thought to be that of the Inhabitants of Evreux, exhibits only one Part of the Chariot, namely that where the Goddess is.

As the Romans celebrated such another Feast in honour of this Divinity, 'tis probable that it was from them the Gauls learned the Worship of Cybele. Ammianus Marcellinus (1) tells us, that Julian the Emperor, when he was going to Persia, having arrived at Callinice a City in Syria, on the sixth Day before the Kalends of April, or the twenty seventh of March, a Day on which they celebrated the Feast in question, stop'd there to perform the Ceremony after the Manner of the Romans, who carried about in Procession the Statue of the Mother of the Gods in a Chariot, and went and washed her in the River Almon (a). This Feast, mark'd in the Roman Kalendar, and mentioned also by Ovid in his Fasts, was called Lavatio.

T 3 went

(1) L. 23.

Vibius Sequester (1), speaking of the Brook Almon, says that it was the Custom to wash therein every Year on the sixth of the Kalends of April, the Statue of the Mother of the Gods. The Poet Prudentius, who also gives a Description of this Feast, observes, That all the People of Quality in Rome attended the Ceremony bare-footed ; and others inform us, that it was frequented by the whole Neighbourhood. Upon their Return, the Procession re-entered Rome, surrounded with burning Torches, and Tapers. As every People retained or rejected what they pleased of foreign Ceremonies which they adopted, so it does not appear that the Gauls had retained this of washing the Statue of their Berecynthia.

But be that as it will, this Ceremony, practised by the Romans, and then by the Gauls, was derived, like all the rest, from the Egyptians, who, as we read in Clemens Alexandrinus (2), carried about in their Processions, which they termed νομασίαις, the golden Statues of their Gods, two Dogs, an Hawk and an Ibis.

We may observe, that in the Year 1689, there was found in the Garden of M. Berrier at the Depth of two Fathoms, under the Ruins of an old Tower, a fine Head of Cybele. This Figure, whose Face is bigger than the Life, was taken at first for that of Isis, a Goddess peculiarly worshipped at Paris, as shall be said afterwards ; but 'tis more probable that it is Cybele, though those two Goddesses were often confounded with one another.

There has been another dug up since at the Foot of Montmartre, which is of Bronze : The Face thereof is smaller than that of the other now mentioned, and the Turret upon its Head somewhat different. Such are the Monuments and Authorities that prove our antient Gauls to have paid religious Worship to Cybele.

S A

(a) Almon Romæ ubi Mater Deorum Sexto Kal. Apr. Lavatur.

(1) De Flumin. (2) Strom. l. 5.

S A T U R N.

There is no Doubt but the Gauls, after having worshipped Gods unknown to the Greeks and Romans, as has been shewn, adopted afterwards a great Part of the Gods of those two Nations, and at the same Time many of their Fables; of which the following is a very plain Example. Plutarch (1) makes one Demetrius say, that having visited a certain Island in the Neighbourhood of England, he was told that Saturn was in another Island not far off, buried in deep Sleep which served for Chains to him, where Briareus was his Keeper. 'Tis easy to see the Affinity this Fiction has to what we have related in the History of the Titans: But yet I am persuaded that it was not immediately from the Greeks or Romans, but from the Carthaginians that the Gauls had received the Worship of Saturn. The Reason whereof is very obvious, since these as well as those offered up to him human Sacrifices; whereas when the Romans had conquered the Gauls, this impious and barbarous Custom had been for a long Time abolished among those Conquerors.

That the Gauls offered such Victims to Saturn is a certain Fact: Dionysius Halicarnesseus (2) says so expressly; and St. Augustine (3) informs us not only that Varro was of this Opinion; but also that he believed they offered in Sacrifice full-grown Men, while the Carthaginians, who had adopted the Worship paid by the Phœnicians to Moloch, the same as Saturn, sacrificed to him only Children.

PLUTO and other Infernal Gods.

Cæsar in his Commentaries (4) tells us that they pretended to be all descended from Pluto: Gallis se omnes a Dite patre progenitos prædicant; and consequently one might expect in the History of their Religion to meet with several Vestiges of the Worship they paid to this God: And yet we find little or nothing of it. An Inscription upon the Frontispiece of a Temple, quoted by Gruter (5), but whose Antiquity is contro-

T 4. verted:

(1) Treat. of the Cess. of Oracles. (2) L. 1. (3) De Civ. Dei. l. 7. (4) L. 6. (5) P. 112.

verted : A dubious Statue upon the Pillar of Cussi, and an Expression in S. Eloy, who lived about the End of the seventh Century, and which names Pluto among the other Gods of Gaul ; these are all the Proofs of his having been worshipped by that Nation.

As for Proserpine, whom they reckoned their Mother, Strabo (1) informs us, that she had a Temple in the Gauls, served after the Manner of the Somothracians.

An Inscription found at Nismes, and another at Metz, prove that they also paid religious Worship to the Parcæ, and to Erebus. Lastly a third, dug up in the Forest of Bellesme, explained by the late M. Baudelot, and conceived in these Terms,

D I I S I N F E R I S
V E N E R I
M A R T I E T
M E R C U R I O
S A C R U M.

informs us, that they reckoned these three among the infernal Divinities. 'Tis easy to see the Reason why they put Venus there, especially in confounding her with Libitina, Venus Libitinaea infera, the Antients informing us, that at funeral Obsequies the same Victims used to be offered to her as to Pluto, Proserpine, and the other infernal Gods.

As for Mars, I don't know that ever the Greeks and Romans reckoned him of the Order of the infernal Gods. Perhaps our antient Gauls might design thereby to point out to us, that so bloody a Deity, who was continually peopling Pluto's Kingdom, had a good Title to a Place among the Gods of Hell.

As to Mercury, there is no Manner of Difficulty : That God, who was sometimes in Olympus, sometimes in the Regions of the Dead, whither he conducted Souls, was equally a celestial and infernal God.

B A C C H U S.

Bacchus was peculiarly worshipped in the Gauls, as is

(1) L. 4.

is proved by several Monuments found in different Places : But he was so especially in a little Island situated at the Mouth of the Loire ; and as his Temple (a) was served by Women, who celebrated the Orgies there, much the same Way as in Greece, 'tis probable that it was from the *Oriental*s they had both received his Worship. Strabo (1), who speaks of this Island and of the Worship therein paid to Bacchus, adds that the Women whom I have now mentioned, took off every Year and put on again on the same Day the Roof of this Edifice, and that before the Sun was set ; and that in the same Space of Time they celebrated the Orgies, and were agitated with that fanatic Fury which seized them ; and that if any one of them, by a Thrust from the rest, or by any other Accident, let fall the Load which she was carrying, either in taking off or putting on the Roof, her Companions fell upon her, and tore her in Pieces ; a Madness unknown to the Greeks ! Which proves that every Country added or retrenched something in the Worship they had received from other People.

Several Antiquaries take the Bacchus of the Gauls to have been the same with Cernunnos, whom we have mentioned above, in regard that both of them had Horns ; but as other Gods had them too, this I presume is no Reason for confounding them together.

C H A P. X.

Ceres, Proserpine, Diana, and the Moon, Isis and Telephorus.

IT sometimes happens that when Authorities fail, Recourse is had to some Monuments discovered in a Country, to prove that the Gods represented by them had been worshipped there ; though 'tis possible that those Monuments brought from some other Place, may have been there collected upon the Fall of Houses or Temples,

(a) This was at best but a very small Chapel, as appears from what follows.

(1) L. 4.

Temples, when they had been deposited either through Design or otherwise; this is what we are to think of Ceres worshipped in the Gauls. Montfaucon, in the second Volume of his Antiquity explained, has given a Print of an Altar, upon one of the Faces of which is a Ceres with a Torch in each Hand, a Symbol that alludes, as has been said in her History, to the Pains she had been at in searching for her Daughter, whom Pluto had carried off.

'Tis true, in a small Island near the Coasts of Great Britain, there was a Temple to Ceres and Proserpine, and the Worship of those two Divinities, as we are told by Artemidorus, cited by Strabo (1), had a Mixture of the Ceremonies of that which was paid them by the Semotbracians; but as in antient Times the Gauls had no Temples, we are from thence to conclude, that they had not the Knowledge of those two Divinities till the Conquest of the Romans.

D I A N A.

Diana was highly adored in the Gauls, especially in the Forest of Ardenne, whence she got the Name of Arduina, under which she was known to those People. This Forest, very spacious of old, was consecrated to her, and was properly her Temple. Accordingly, says the Author of the Gallic Religion (2), we may judge of the Antiquity of the Worship of Diana in the Gauls, from the Antientness of her Name; for it is not to be doubted but that the Celtic Name Arduina, a Word compounded of Ar and Duen, which imports, black, gloomy, and is therefore applicable to Forests, is derived from the Forest which the Romans called Arduenna: Now 'tis certain that she had this Name long before the Romans were Masters of Gaul. Though after their Arrival the Gauls had accommodated their Ideas of their Gods to those of the Conquerors, yet the Worship which they paid to this Goddess was long kept up, and she still retained the same Name; those too who left the Gauls, and went and settled elsewhere, still preserved it to her; so faithful were they

to.

(1) Geogr. l. 4. (2) T. II. l. 4. p. 44.

to their antient Customs, as to observe them religiously even in the midst of Strangers; and this is confirmed by some Inscriptions found in Italy, where Diana is always named Arduina.

As to what remains, the Gauls, in the main, had much the same Sentiments of their Diana as the Greeks and Romans, and reckoned her a chaste and Virgin-Goddes, who made Hunting her whole Study. As nothing is harder to abolish than antient religious Customs, the Worship of Arduina continued in the Ardennes, and in the neighbouring Countries upon the Rhine, even a good Time after Christianity got Footing, when several Saints, Bishops, or Religious, found the greatest Difficulty imaginable to abolish it.

The M O O N.

Though Antiquity has often confounded Diana with the Moon, as I have proved in the History of the celestial Gods, yet 'tis certain, that they were more frequently distinguished; and whether the Gauls had received Part of their Religion from the Persians, or from some other Oriental Nations, they distinguished, like them, those two Divinities. The Author of the History of the Gallic Religion, proves by a great Number of Testimonies (1), that the Worship of the Moon was diffused all over Gaul; and that I may not copy him, I refer the Reader to the Book itself.

It was this Goddes, according to him, that was particularly worshipped in the Island of Sain, situated upon the South-Coast of the Lower Britany, opposite to the Province of Cornouaille; though M. de Valois (2) will have it to be Mercury that was worshipped in that small Island. 'Tis true, Pomponius Mela (3), who speaks of the Oracle that was in that Isle, does not name the Divinity who delivered it; but there are so many Proofs of its having been the Moon, that there is no standing out against the Opinion of the learned Benedictine, whom I have named. Further, this Oracle was served by young Virgins: They were nine in Number, though at first they were but six, Those

(1) T. II. l. 4. (2) Account of the Gauls. (3) L. 3. c. 6.

Those Virgins, Druidesses by Profession, vowed inviolable Chastity to the Goddess whom they served, and lived much after the Manner of the Roman Vestals.

If we may rely upon the Authors who have given Account of them, they were often consulted, especially for Navigation, and it was firmly believed that good or bad Weather depended upon them, and that the Winds and Tempests were at their Disposal. The Notion that prevailed of their being able, when they pleased, to mount up in the Air, disappear or become visible as they had a mind, contributed not a little to the great Reputation they had acquired. Nothing was so much talked off as their nocturnal Assemblies, the Prodiges they wrought : In a Word, they were looked upon as real Witches who kept their Sabbaths. Nothing is more celebrated among the Antients than those pretended Sorceresses of the Island of Sain, whom they designed by the Name of Gallicæ.

Farther, they were also named Senæ, either from their being at first only six in Number, or because this Name was originally Celtic, and signified, respectable, venerable. From this Name was the Island which they inhabited called Sain.

I S I S.

Though I am very far from giving into the Notion of most Authors of the Antiquities of Paris, who alledge that the Name of this Island comes from Isis, para Isidos, yet it is certain, this Goddess was highly adored in the Gauls. Her Statue, which was formerly in the Church of S. Germain des Prez, and which Cardinal Briçonnet, who was the Abbot thereof, caused to be demolished and reduced to Ashes ; an Inscription found at Soissons ; the City of Melun, which upon receiving the Worship of this Goddess, changed its Name from Melodunum into that of Iseas, or Isea ; the Town of Issi, near Paris, whose Name seems evidently derived from that of Isis ; the Statue dug up in the Ground of M. Berrier, which resembles that of Isis, as much as Cybele's, if indeed Isis and Cybele were not one and the same Divinity ; in fine, the Worship.

ship of this Goddess established in Germany (1), chiefly among the Suevi, whose Religion had so much Affinity to that of the Gauls, whose Original was the same with theirs: All these are undeniable Proofs that Isis was worshipped in the Gauls (a).

If a Medal of the Segusians, which is thought to have been struck before Cæsar's Arrival in the Gauls, and which on one Side represents the capital City of that People, and on the other a Hercules with a small Figure, covered from Head to Foot; if, I say, this Child is Telephorus, as some Authors believe, this will be a Proof that the Gauls paid some Worship to that God of Health; and I am the more willing to give him a Place here, that Isis was also taken for a Goddess who presided over Health, under the Name of Isis Medica, as has been said in her History.

C H A P. XI.

Other Gallic Divinities, deified Cities, &c.

UPON the Gate of the Hotel-Dieu of Clermont in Auvergne, was formerly a very singular Figure, representing a Gallic Divinity, whereof Gabriel Simeoni has given a Print in his Histoire de la Limagne d'Auvergne. This Figure is a Woman's Head, with Wings displayed above, and two large Scales that rise out of the Place where are the Ears; this Head is encompassed with two Serpents, whose Tails lose themselves in the two Wings.

Simeoni seeing these two Serpents, took the Head for that of Medusa; and 'tis indeed that of a young and beautiful Person, as that Gorgon was before her Crime had provoked the Indignation of Minerva, who transformed her fine Hair into Serpents; but here the Head has its Hair in very good Order, and the Serpents don't seem to make a Part of it.

The Author of the History of the Gallic Religion,
who

(1) See the subsequent Book.

(a) We shall enquire, in speaking of the Religion of the antient Germans, whence they might have received the Worship of that Goddess.

who gives the Name of Onuava to the Divinity whom this Head represents, is persuaded that it is the Venus Celestis, or the Derceto of the Phœnicians, who, Diodorus Siculus tells us, was worshipped at Ascalon, under a Figure which had a Woman's Head, and the rest of its Body terminating in a Fish (1). That Author adds, that as this Figure is only a Bust, the rest of the Body could not be there represented; but that the Scales which we have mentioned, give us plainly to understand what it would have been, had the Figure been represented at full Length. Then, having Recourse to what Antiquity informs us concerning Oannes, Oen, and other Sea Monsters (a), the lower Part of whose Body was a Fish's Tail, and concerning Serpents that were acknowledged for Divinities in several Places, he displays a great Deal of Erudition.

Mercel, in his History of France, takes this Figure to have been a Hieroglyphic, and a lively Expression of the Mysteries of Belenus, one of the great Gallic Divinities. For my Part, I am persuaded that this Head is neither Medusa, for the Reason I have given, nor yet Derceto; for 'tis a mere Conjecture, and quite without Foundation, to alledge that the rest of the Body would have been represented like a Fish, had it been drawn at full Length: No more than a Head was designed, nor indeed would any more have been proper; it is a full Expression of what it was intended to represent; nor yet is it Belenus, whom I have proved to have been distinguished from the Sun, not only among the Greeks and Romans, but also among our ancient Gauls: But I am of Opinion that it is the Sun himself; for besides one's being inclined to judge thus at first Sight from his Youthfulness and radiant Air, his Wings sufficiently express the Rapidity of his Course, and the Serpents that twine themselves about his Head, plainly denote that he moves round the World in an oblique Circle. May we not farther presume,

(1) See Vol. 1. B. 7.

(a) See what has been said of them in the third Book of the first Volume.

sume, that the two Scales that are in Form of Fins, point out to us that this Luminary surveys the Sea as well as the Land ?

Our antient Gauls adored several other Divinities, as the Sulevæ, the Commodevæ, the Dufii, the Sylvatics, &c. whom we shall speak of in the Article of the Mother-Goddeses, as also several other Gods and rural Demi-Gods, not unlike the Fauns and Satyrs of the Greeks and Romans. Lastly, other Genii, whom they believed to frequent Houses, and to love the Commerce of Women. These last were called among them Dufii. St. Augustine (1), speaking of those Genii, compares them for their Incontinence to the Sylvans, Fauns, and Satyrs, and even goes the Length of asserting, that after the Testimony concerning those Spirits given by Persons worthy of Credit, it would be Impudence to deny that there are some Demons that court the Company of Women. These Dufii, whom Isidorus of Seville (2), says the Gauls named les Velus Pilefi, from their being overgrown with Hair, were those pretended Incubi and Sucubi, who in every Thing resembled the Ephialtes of the Greeks.

I have no Mind to enlarge upon this Subject, nor upon all the Reveries of a Sect of Mystics, which is founded only upon these and the like fantastical Notions. I shall only say, that never was Opinion more general, nor of longer Duration, than that which admitted those Spirits of whom the World was believed to be full, as has been already remarked.

Some Antiquaries pretend that the God Syleianus, known only by an Inscription found at Feurs in the Forest, was one of those Dufii, or Pilefi, whom we have mentioned. But 'tis more probable that this is the God Sylvanus, who, as I said in the Article of the terrestrial Gods, was worshipped in the Gauls, where was a College of his Priests, as at Rome, and in several other Places.

Deified Cities.

The Gauls, once subjected to the Romans, adopted
not

(1) De Civ. Dei. l. 15. (2) Orig. l. 8.

not only several of their Divinities, as we have remarked more than once, but they also, like them, deified their Cities. Thus they ranked among their Goddesses the antient City of the Edui, which Cæsar and Strabo call Bibraëte, and which is thought to be Autun, tho' M. de Valois (1) will have it to be another City; but as the Inscription that speaks of this Goddess, and begins with these Words, Deæ Bibraëti, &c. was found (2) at Autun itself, in the Bottom of a Well filled up Time immemorial, 'tis probable that Bibraëte and Autun were the same Town.

Another Inscription dug up at Vaison, conceived in these Terms,

M A R T I
E T V A S I O N I T A C I T U S.

confirms that this City had also received the Honour of Deification, as well as that of Perigueux, Nismes, and several others.

Besides these deified Cities, the Gauls acknowledged Genii, who took Care of each particular Province and Canton, as is proved by the Inscription quoted by the learned Father Sirmond in his Notes upon Sydonius Apollinaris; Genio Arvernorum Sex. Orcius Suavis Æduus.

But to lay open the Foundation of this Part of the Pagan Mythology, we must make two Reflections. The first is, what I have from the Author of the History of the Gallic Religion (3), that as for the Deification of Cities, we are to know that the Intention of the Authors of those Deifications was to consecrate every City to a certain Divinity, whose Name was sometimes the Name of the City itself, as we see in the Inscriptions of Bibraëte, Vaison, Nismes, &c. and sometimes it was different.

The Foundation of the Worship that they afterwards paid to those Cities, or rather to the Genius who protected them, and became their tutelar Divinity, was

(1) Not. des Gaules upon the Word Augustodunum. (2) In 1619.
(3) Vol. 11. l. 4. p. 206.

was to engage them to take Care of them, to defend them against Enemies, and to remove from them all Evils with which they might be distressed; such as epidemical Distempers, and other Calamities.

The second, which I have already made upon another Occasion, is, that the Names of those tutelar Genii were kept secret; lest coming to be known, they should be conjured away; and at last be forced to abandon the Cities that were committed to their Charge, to pass into others; where a more solemn Worship was promised them.

Besides the tutelar Gods I have been now speaking of, there were few Cities in the Gauls but had one for whom they had a singular Veneration; witness several Inscriptions quoted by Gruter, Reinesius, and Spon.

But I must not forget the Goddess Tutela worshipped at Bordeaux, where she had a magnificent Temple, if indeed it was a particular Divinity; for this Name appears to be rather a generical Name than an appellative. Learned Antiquaries take her to have been a Divinity peculiar to Sailors and Merchants who trafficked upon the Rivers, in regard it was a common Practice to put upon their Ships the Figures of certain Gods who gave Names to them; and were called by the Antients Tutela Navis, The Tutelar Divinity of the Ship, as has been said, when we were upon the Gods Pataici (1); but 'tis more natural to think that this Tutela was the Patroness of the City Bordeaux, as what we have now read seems to prove.

Be that as it will, this Goddess had a Temple in that City; which is called at this Day the Pillars of Tutela. It was an oblong Peristyle, each Face of which was supported by eight Columns, and the two Extremities by six. Each of those Columns was so high, that it rose above the highest Edifices of the City. Lewis XIV ordered the arched Roofs of this Temple to be demolished, which Time had already damaged, in order to form the Glacis which is before the Château Trompette.

VOL. III.

U

I shall

(r) Vol. I. R. 7.

I shall say nothing of some other Gods of the Gauls, whose Names occur upon Inscriptions, since Antiquity gives us no Information about them. Such is the God Lebeven, in Honour of whom Domesticus, the Son of Rufus, paid the Vow which he had made to him, as appears by an Inscription found at St. Bertrand, the Capital of the Country of Cominges. Keisler, I know, alledges that he was a Sea-god, but upon what Foundation I know not ; for I have not heard whether he has published the Dissertation upon this God which he had promised (1).

Another Inscription found in the same Country names Boccus, whom Gruter, who has quoted it, takes to be a God ; but this is all he lets us know about him ; or about Bacurdus, whose Name is read in an Inscription of Cologne (2) ; or about the propitious Gods, propitiis Deis, who are mentioned upon another Inscription of Narbonne. Whether these were particular Gods, or all the beneficent Deities in general, is what I cannot determine.

The Reader will be little wiser when I have named the Goddesses Aventia, whose Name appears upon some Inscriptions found in the Swiss Cantons, and Movistargus, whose Name occurs upon another Inscription dug up at Alise in Burgundy ; and tho' it may give him a little more Light concerning the Gods called Aghoni, to know that they were worshipped in Gascony, and that Hesychius reckons they presided over the public Games and Combats ; yet I should but lose Time, and my Reader's Patience, to insist on a Verjugodamnus worshipped at Amiens, or in that Neighbourhood, where was found the Inscription quoted by Ducange (3), a Dulovius who was worshipped at Vaison in the Venaissin County ; and therefore I choose rather to proceed to Divinities more known, as are the Mother-Goddesses, of whom I have deferred the Account till now, because they belong equally to the Gauls, the Spanish, the Inhabitants of Great Britain, and the Germans ; the Inscriptions that make Mention of them, having been dug up in these several Countries.

(1) Gruter, p. 1174. (2) Id. f. 86. (3) Diff. sur les Mer. du
Emp. r. 54.

C H A P. XII.

Of the Mother-Goddeffes.

IN this Chapter I am to examine who were the Mother-Goddeffes in the Pagan World, their Number, their Functions, what Sort of Worship was paid to them, in what Countries they were adored; and lastly, what was their Original.

Among the Monuments we have now remaining of those Goddeffes, there are some Bas-reliefs, and a vast many Inscriptions (a). The first of the Bas-reliefs is at Metz upon the Frontispiece of an antient Temple. There we see three Figures of Women standing, two of them holding Fruits like Pine-apples in their Hands; the third seems to have some of them wrapped up in her Robe, with this Inscription :

Those of the Street, or of the Village of Peace, have consecrated to the Mothers this Monument of the Glory of the imperial House.

The second is at Lyons, upon the Gate of the Church of Aisnay (1). It represents likewise three Women, but in a sitting Posture, with much the same Air, and the same Draperies as those on the Monument of Metz. She in the Middle holds in her Hand a Cornucopia, with Fruits in her Lap; the other two hold an Apple in each Hand; the Inscription bears, Matribus Augusti.

The third is at Munster-Eilden, in the Dutchy of Juliers (2). There we see also three Goddeffes sitting, whose Laps are full of Fruits, with this Inscription :

Tiberius Claudius Maternus has discharged his Vow to the Mothers or Matrons of Valchlendorf.

At the Bottom of the Bas-reliefs is to be seen a U 2
Priest

(a) See Spon, Gruter, Reinesius, the Treatise upon the Religion of the antient Gauls, and my Dissertation upon the Mother-Goddeffes, printed in the seventh Volume of the Academy of the Belles Lettres.

(1) Menest. Hist. cons. de Lyon. (2) Gruter, p. 91.

Priest and Priestess, accompanied with a Camillus or Minister.

The fourth and last was found in a Town of Zealand (1), and it represents three Goddesses sitting, by whom is a Priestess standing, while the Camillus, who accompanies her, is pouring a Liquor upon the Altar, whose Sides are charged with Cornucopias.

From these Monuments and Inscriptions the Learned have delivered their Conjectures with respect to those Goddesses. F. Menestrier (2) was of Opinion at first that they were but three in Number, and that they denoted the three Gauls: But he had not considered that the three Gauls are represented by three Mens Heads, as may be seen upon a Medal of Galba, with these Words, Tres Galliae. Accordingly that Author quit- ted this Notion afterwards.

M. Keisler has made a Dissertation some Years ago, to prove that the Mother-Goddesses were the Wives of the Druids, who were in high Veneration among the antient Gauls; and he chiefly relies upon Cæsar's calling them Metres Familias, and upon Plutarch's giving them the Epithet of Sacred: But we may ask this Author, why the Gauls had deified only three of those Priestesses? Were they not all equally consecrated to the Worship of the Gods? Did they not all profess to have the Gift of Prediction? And did not their Ministration render them all equally respected?

Other Authors (3) have contented themselves with saying that the Mothers were rural Divinities, honoured in the Gauls and in Germany by the Country People; as if their Worship had not been known in the Cities: For, were there no more but the Monuments of Metz and Lyons, it would still be certain that celebrated Cities worshipped those Goddesses.

Lastly, Bochart, and after him F. Menestrier, would have those three Goddesses to be the Parcæ; and this Opinion, which those two Authors had not well examined, has been supported with a great Deal of Erudition dition by the Author of the History of the Religion of the antient Gauls.

(1) Keisler Diff. (2) Hist. Conf. de Lyon. (3) Cherrier's Hist. of Dauphiny.

All these Antiquaries agree in two Things. The first is, that the Mother-Goddeses were only known in the Gauls and Germany, since, say they, we hardly find either Inscriptions or Monuments of them out of these two Countries. 2. That their Worship is of no great Antiquity, since the most antient Inscription now extant, goes no higher than the Time of Septimius Severus.

For my Part, I am of Opinion that these three Goddeses derived their Original neither from the Gauls nor Germans, and that their Worship is much more antient than is commonly believed. In support of these two Propositions, I am first to speak of the several Countries where Traces are to be found of the Worship of those Goddeses; and, in the second Place, trace their History to its Original. The Proof of the first Proposition will not be difficult. 'Tis certain, in the first Place, that they were known in Spain; for Proof of which we have three Inscriptions: One found at Gironne, the other in Arragon, and a third in Galicia. There have been three of them discovered in England *. Here then, without going further, is the Worship of those Goddeses established in Spain and England. It will not be objected, that these two Nations had received it immediately from the Germans and Gauls; for this will be a begging of the Question; and it might be alledged with as much Probability, that the Spaniards had the Knowledge of these three Goddeses from the Phœnicians, who had travelled into Spain before ever the Gauls had penetrated thither. At least, it is very probable that both had received them from the Romans, and other People in Italy, among whom we find a World of such Inscriptions in Honour of the Sulevæ, the Mothers, the Matrons, the Junones, and the like Divinities. But the Romans themselves were not the first who worshipped these Goddeses: They had learned from the Greeks, to whom those Divinities were not unknown, to pay them religious Worship; and this is what has been little considered by those who have treated this Subject: For, not to mention their Mother Plastene; who, according to Pausanias (1), had a Temple upon Mount Sypilus; Spon (2) has preserved to us a Greek Inscription of the Mother-Goddesses, ΑΦΗ, ΜΑΤΡΑΣΙ, ΚΑΙ ΔΙΟΣ ΚΟΡΟΙΣ; that is, To Mars, to the Mothers, and to the Discuri.

* Selden.

The Greeks received most of their Divinities from the Egyptians and Phœnicians, by the Colonies that came and settled in their Country. Those Colonies, before they arrived in Greece, had left Traces of their Religion in the Islands thro' which they passed; and if in some of those Islands we find the Knowledge of the Mother-Goddesses, 'tis not to be doubted but that their Worship is originally from Phœnicia. A Passage of Plutarch, in his Life of Marcellus, evidently proves that they were very well known, and peculiarly worshipped in Sicily, and that they had got the Knowledge of them from the Cretans, a Phœnician Colony. I make use of M. Dacier's Translation.

“ There is in Sicily a City called Enguia, which is of “ very great Antiquity, and especially famed for the “ Appearance of the Goddesses whom they call Mo- “ thers, ὡς καλεῖται Μητέρας. We are assured that their “ Temple was founded by the Cretans. There are “ to be seen in it great Spears and Helmets of Brass, “ whereof some bear the Name of Merion, others
 “ that of Ulysses, who had consecrated them to those “ Goddesses.” Then Plutarch tells us, that this City favouring the Carthaginians, Nicias, one of the chief Citizens, who was for the Romans, finding they had a Design to deliver him up to the Enemy, thought of a singular Stratagem to extricate himself. He began by talking dishonourably of those Mother-Goddesses and their pretended Appearances; then, as the People were one Day assembled, he feigned all of a sudden to be delirious and frantick, crying out with all his Might,

(1) In Eliac. (2) C. 13. p. 156.

Might, that he saw those Goddesses ready to take Vengeance upon him. He fell a running about, and while all made Way for him, he by this Means got out of the City, and repaired to a Place where his Wife and his whole Family were waiting for him.

From this Passage it appears that the Phœnicians were Worshippers of the Mother-Goddesses, and that from the earliest Times; for, since it was they, according to Plutarch, had built the Temple of Enguia in Honour of these Goddesses, we may conclude that they had a high Veneration for their Persons. Farther, it would seem to have been a prevailing Opinion that they terrified People by their Apparitions; and this perhaps is the Reason why Theocritus (1), speaking of the three Nymphs, whom he names Eunica, Malis, and Nicæa, who were probably the same with the Mother-Goddesses, says they were a Terror to the Country People.

To what we have now quoted, Diodorus Siculus adds that Merion, after the Siege of Troy, having gone to Sicily with some Cretans, built there a Temple in Honour of these Goddesses, which was afterwards in high Veneration. We are told, continues this Historian, that it was from Crete where these Goddesses were exceedingly revered, and from Enguia, that their Worship had been brought into Sicily. The mythological Historians, adds the same Author, relate that it was by those Goddesses Jupiter of old had been nursed, without the Knowledge of his Father Saturn; and that in Recompence for this Piece of Service that God had given them a Place in Heaven, where they form the Constellation of the great Bear; and the Poet Aratus has followed this Tradition in his Poem called Phænomena. We could not pass over in Silence, continues he, the high Honour which the Devotion of People has conferred upon these Goddesses: For not only the Inhabitants of Enguia, but also their Neighbours, offer to them costly Sacrifices, and pay them extraordinary Honours. Several Cities were even enjoined by the Oracles of Apollo to give them Homage, with a Promise of long Life, and all Kinds of Prosperity to their Inhabitants in so doing. In fine, their Worship came to be so much in Vogue, that in the Time of Diodorus's writing his History, the Inhabitants of the Country continued to bring them numerous Oblations of Gold and Silver, and but a few Years before had erected to them a Temple, distinguished not only for its Grandeur, but also for the Elegance of its Architecture. This Temple became extremely opulent, since among its Revenues were reckoned three thousand Oxen, and a vast Extent of Ground.

U 4 the

(1) Idyl. 13. v. 44.

Phœnicia therefore is the Country whence the Worship of the Mother-Goddesses had derived its Original; and this is also the Opinion of Selden (1), tho' he confounds them with Astarte, who, according to him, was the Mother of all the Gods. The Syrians multiplied their Astartè, and made several of them, whom they named A'saptai, whence other People formed their Cybele, their Vesta, and the Mother-Goddesses. Thus it was from the eastern Nations that the Knowledge of these Goddesses came; and since in the Greek Inscription of them now remaining, and in one of those from England, they are joined with Mars and the Discuri, or the Sons of Jupiter, we cannot doubt of their Antiquity.

But if we would trace back to the first Original of these Goddesses, we should perhaps find it in the ancient Tradition, which held that the World was stored with beneficent or malignant Genii. Never was Tradition more universal. To this is owing the Original of Elves and their Dens, of Sylphs, Gnomes, and all the wild Notions invented by the Cabala.

In fine, to assign another Original, which will belong more particularly to some of the Mother-Goddesses, 'tis very probable that the Germans and Gauls, who had a peculiar Respect and Veneration for their Women, ranked among them, after the Example of other Nations from whom they had received their Religion,

(1) De Diis Syr. Synt. 2.

gion, those who had distinguished themselves either by their Valour, or by the Invention of some useful Art, or by excelling therein. Thus the Egyptians had their Isis, the Africans their Minerva Tritonia, the Phœnicians their Derceto, the Greeks their Mother Plastena; lastly, the Allemands their Velleda (1); for the Name of their Mother-Goddesses has not been transmitted down to us.

As to what remains, we know nothing very particular concerning the Worship that was paid to those Goddesses. No Doubt it was the same with that of other rural Divinities; and we may very well conjecture, from their carrying on the Bas-reliefs we have now extant, Flowers and Fruits in their Hands, that these were the Matter of the Sacrifices that was offered to them, as well as to the other rural Deities. Honey and Milk were Ingredients in the Oblations that were made them. We may conclude too, from the Bas-reliefs of Zeland, that there were Priests consecrated to them, and that the Liquor which the Minister pours out upon the Altar, consists of Milk or Wine.

They sacrificed to them also the Hog. This is what appears in the Bas-reliefs of Rome, upon which are represented Ministers killing one of those Victims, to offer it to the Goddesses, who are there named Sulvæ and Campestres, and were the same with the Mother-Goddesses or Matrons. We may remark, by the Way, that the Hog was sacrificed to Bacchus, and to the rural Divinities, because that Animal makes great Devastation in the Fields, Gardens, and Vineyards; and for the same Reason the Sow used to be sacrificed to Ceres.

The Gauls, who paid particular Worship to the Mother-Goddesses, built for them little Chapels, which were termed Cancelli, brought thither their Offerings, lighted small Tapers in them, and after pronouncing some mystical Words over Bread and certain Herbs, they withdrew those Offerings from the Chapel, and went and hid them either in a hollow Path, or in the Trunks

(1) Cæsar. Com. l. 6.

Trunks of some Trees, believing that by so doing they secured their Flocks from contagious Distempers, and even from Death itself. To this Rite they joined several other Pieces of Superstition, whereof a particular Account may be seen in the old Acts of our Kings, known by the Name of Capitularies, and in the antient Rituals where they are prohibited.

These are the more probable Conjectures I had to offer upon a Subject not much minded by other Mythologists. 'Tis surprizing that those who have given ample and learned Treatises upon the Pagan Gods, as Gerard Vossius, and even those who had given particular ones upon the Divinities of the Gauls and Germans, have not examined more narrowly into this Subject. For we are to make no Account of what is said of it by Schoedius, who barely copies the few Hints upon it offered by Selden.

From the whole we conclude, 1. That the Mother-Goddesses were Divinities common to several Nations, and that the Names which they bear in Inscriptions, were the Names of the Places where they were worshipped. Thus those wherein we read Matribus Gallicis, denoted the Mother-goddesses of Gallicia: And accordingly the Monument upon which is this Inscription, was found at Corona, a City in Gallicia. The Mothers of Vaccelli are those of an old Town in antient Germany, which Gruter names Vachlendorf. The Rumaneæ, those who were worshipped at Rhumaneim in the Country of Juliers; and so of others.

2. That the Goddesses were peculiarly worshipped in the Gauls and in Germany, since in these two Countries were found most of the Monuments now extant; but that it is a Mistake to alledge, that among these two People they had their Original; since they were known in several other Places.

3. That they presided over the Fields and the Fruits of the Earth; whereof the Cornucopia which they bear upon Monuments, and the Fruits that were offered to them in Sacrifice, are convincing Proofs. It cannot however be denied, whatever some Antiquaries may may say, that they were worshipped in the Cities, as appears from the Monument of Lyons, and from some others, as has been said.

4. That their Worship was not limited to rural Things, since they were invoked not only for the Health of the Emperors and their Families, but also for that of private Persons : In Proof of which I shall offer two Examples. The first is taken from an Inscription found in Pannonia, to this Effect : T. Pompilianus Tribune of the Soldiers of the first Legion Minervia, has discharged his Vow by offering an Altar and a Table to the Matrons of Offen, and to the Mothers of Pannonia and Dalmatia, which Vow he had made for the Preservation of the Emperor Sept. Severus, and his whole Family. The other Inscription which relates to private Persons, is conceived in these Terms : Julius Regulus, Soldier of the sixth Legion the Antonian, cheerfully pays the Vow which he had made to the Mother-Goddesses, for himself and his Family.

5. That I had Reason to alledge that the Mother-Goddesses were often confounded with the particular Genii of each Place, or with the Junones, who were the Genii of the Women ; with the Sulevæ, the Commodevæ, the Matrons, the Silvaticæ, and other such rural Divinities. Of all the Examples I might bring in Proof of this last Proposition, I shall single out but two : Others are to be found in Gruter, Reinesius, Spon, and the other Antiquaries. These I take from the Inscriptions of the Gabians, whereof the one cited by Stephen Brœlman (1) in his History of Cologne, is conceived in these Terms : Matronis Gabiabus. The other which we find in Gruter, Page 91, bears, Junonibus Gabiabus : Whereby it evidently appears, that the Junones, the Genii, and such like Divinities, were the same with the Mother-Goddesses. It appears likewise from all that I have said, that their Worship was not confined to the Gauls and Germans alone, since it was as antient as that of the other Pagan Divinities ; and that their true Original is to be traced in Phœnicia, whence

(1) Specim. Hist. Agrip.

whence came most of the Gods known in the West.

6. Lastly, that the Mother-Goddesses were served by Priestesses, and that their Priesthood was called Sacer Matratus, as you would say, The sacred Order of the Mother. Upon an Inscription found not long ago near Cologne, upon an Altar dedicated to the Goddesses Semele and her Sisters, we find the Regina Materna who had the Oversight of the Worship of those Goddesses, is designed Priestess of the Ladies or Mother-Goddesses of the Place, and that she herself had erected that Monument in Acknowledgment of the Honour done her in being invested with that Priesthood. Regina Materna ob honorem sacri Matratus aram posuit. Hence we may conclude, that the Daughters of Cadmus, Semele, Autonoe, Ino, and Agave, were looked upon in the Gauls and Germany as Mother-Goddesses, since Regina Materna, who values herself on being Priestess of these Goddesses, was one of the Daughters of Cadmus; for the Reasoning of the Author of a Dissertation upon this Inscription, published in the Memoirs of Trevoux, July, 1738, to me appears just. I suppose, says the Author, that the Sacer Matratus implied the Right of Sacerdotal Dignity or of Priesthood to the Goddesses, to whom the Altar in Question is dedicated; and as this was to Semele and her Sisters, and as this Materna is there said to be Mother born, and further to be honoured with the sacred Dignity of the Matratus, 'tis natural to conclude from hence that the same Dignity was what concerned the Worship of Semele and her Sisters, who consequently must needs have been Mother-Goddesses of the Canton where the Inscription was dug up.

But whatever be in that, 'tis certain from the Discovery of this Monument, that the Worship of the Daughters of Cadmus had been propagated to the Gauls and into Germany, and that we are to reckon those four Goddesses among those who were there the Objects of Adoration.

CHAP.

C H A P. XIII.

Of the Religion of the Inhabitants of Great Britain.

I Shall not insist long upon the Religion of that People, because it was almost entirely like that of our Gauls; the Divinities, Worship, and Priesthood the same.

Tacitus (1) expressly says, that the Angles had the same Superstitions with the Gauls, as also the same Fierceness in Battle, and much the same Language. Cæsar (2) had the same Opinion with Tacitus, and the other Historians differ from them but little. In the Beginning of this Book we have seen that the Druids were equally respected in Britain as in the Gauls; that among both they were Ministers of Religion, and that those of the former were even accounted more knowing and intelligent than those of the Gauls, who sent their Students to be instructed by them in the more profound Mysteries. The Angles, as well as the Gauls, had other subaltern Ministers, the Bards, and the Eubages, who had the same Functions among both: It has been also remarked, that the same Britons, as well as the Gauls, paid a particular Worship to the Mother-Goddeses, and that their Monuments had been dug up among them, as well as in the Gauls.

We may add farther, that according to Cambden and Seldon (3), their God Balatucadua was the same with the Belenus or Apollo of our Gauls, and that both Nations paid him the same Worship; that they both worshipped Dis, or Pluto, and Samothes. In fine, to compleat the Parallel, Tacitus (4), and Dion Cassius (5), tell us that they both offered to their Gods human Sacrifices.

'Tis proper however to observe, 1. That as England was invaded by different Nations, especially by the Picts and Saxons, not to mention others, 'tis very probable that those Conquerors introduced thither the Know-

(1) In Agric. c. 11. (2) De Bell. Gall. l. 6. (3) De Diis Syr. Syn. 2. c. 3. (4) Loc. cit. (5) L. 6c.

Knowledge of some of their Gods: And of this Number perhaps was their Andate, the Goddess of Victory, to whom they paid particular Worship.

I observe, in the second Place, that we are here to apply the same Distinction which we had Recourse to in the History of the Religion of the Gauls, namely, that we must have Respect to the Period of Time; and that the Religion of the Angles could not but assume a new Shape, upon their being conquered by the Romans, who undoubtedly also introduced among them the Knowledge of several of their Gods.

3. That as it is certain the Phœnicians from the earliest Times had great Commerce with Britain, whence they exported every Year a vast Quantity of Tin, they perhaps had left them the Knowledge of some of their Gods. I say perhaps, because no Vestiges thereof have been found in the Country; besides, it is not usual for Merchants to talk about Subjects of Religion with those among whom they come only to trade, and in whose Ports they only spend as much Time as is necessary for making up their Cargoes. This accounts for our being so little acquainted with the Gods of that People, to whom we should have been yet greater Strangers had it not been for their Nearness to the Gauls, whose Religion is better known to us.

C H A P. XIV.

Of the Religion of the antient Iberians or Spaniards.

IT is not, I think, to be doubted that the antient Spaniards received their Religion first from the Phœnicians, and then from the Carthaginians. 'Tis certain, as the late M. Huet, Bishop of Avranches, has proved in his learned Treatise of the Commerce of the Antients, that both those Nations had great Commerce with the Spaniards, especially with those who inhabited Betica, the present Andalusia, where they came principally to traffic in Gold, which was then very common in that Country. This being supposed, it appears evident, that both those Nations would teach them a Part of their Religion, and introduce among them the Worship of some of their Divinities. The Fact at least is certain as to the Phœnician Hercules, he who is said to have raised upon the Borders of the Ocean those famous Pillars, to shew that this was the Extremity of the known World, and that there was no passing farther. This Hercules accordingly, was highly adored afterwards in the Country, and Antiquity makes mention more than once of the famous Temple which he had at Gades, or Cadiz. And yet, either for Want of antient Historians, or for Want of Curiosity on the Part of the Inhabitants, there are few Countries in the World whose Religion is less known to us than that of the antient Spaniards. The Historians, especially Mariana, who make Spain to have been peopled by a Colony planted by Tubal, about an hundred and thirty one Years after the Deluge, vent nothing but Fables, no less gross than ill matched.
it

Not but that some antient Monuments have been dug up in that Country from Time to Time; but most of them have been quite mangled, and all we can draw from them is mere Conjecture almost quite destitute of Proofs. Several of them have been dug up in different Places, with Hercules's Name upon them: Which proves that the Worship of that God had passed from Cadiz, where it was first established, into the neighbouring Provinces.

We also read upon a good many more that are to be seen in Gruter and Reinesius, the Name of Endovellicus joined with that of Hercules, and sometimes by itself; and most of those Monuments have been dug up near the City Oscæ, the present Villa Viciosa. No body doubts but this Endovellicus was a God peculiar to Spain: But whether he was the same with Hercules, as some Authors alledge, or a different Person, is not easy to determine. However, as in one of those Inscriptions we read

HER-

HERCULI P.

ENDOVELL.

TOLET. V. V.

DEIS TUTELARIBUS.

It would seem that these two Gods were distinguished in Spain; for if they had been the same, we should have had Tutelary God, and not Gods in the Plural.

As we know not what Sort of God this was whom they worshipped in Spain, the only Country where his Name has been found, the Learned have given themselves Scope, and vented several Conjectures on this Subject. Some are of Opinion, that it was the God Mars, who was worshipped in Spain, as we shall see afterwards: Others have alledged, that he was the Cupid of the antient Iberians, or Hercules himself, both their Names being found in one of those Inscriptions; but not to dwell on this, I refer the Curious to the Dissertation of Reinesius, to that of an Allemand, who takes the Name of Ludovicus Alphonse, and lastly, to that of M. Freret, whereof a Copy is printed in the Historical Part of the third Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of the Belles-Lettres (1).

We also learn from the Antients, that the Spaniards worshipped Pluto, or rather Muth, or Death, as did the Phœnicians (a). And those who admit the History of the Titans, in the Manner as I have given it, will find no Difficulty to believe that they worshipped this Prince in the Country which fell to his Lot, and where he ended his Days.

Mercury, or Teutates, was a God very much revered among the Spaniards, as he was among the Gauls. Titus Livius (2) tells us there was at new Carthage an Eminence, which was called Mercury Teutates; and I doubt not, as I have already said, but that the Spaniards had received the Knowledge of this God immediately from the Phœnicians or Carthaginians, and afterwards communicated it to the Gauls; but whether the former offered to him human Sacrifices, as these did;

(1) P. 191.

(a) See the Fragment of Sanchoniathon, Vol 1. B. 2.

(2) Dec. 4. l. 6. c. 44.

did, is not known. 'Tis however very probable that both of them gave him the same Worship, since it was derived to them in the same Way. Besides, we learn from Strabo (1), that the Lusitanians, now the Portuguese, a People in Spain, offered to their Gods the Captives whom they had taken in War ; and as that Author gives a pretty circumstantiate Account of this Matter, I shall quote what he says upon it. “ The Lusitanians, says he, frequently offer Sacrifices, “ and carefully consider the Entrails of the Victim, “ without however making any Incision upon them. “ They observe with the same Attention the Veins, “ especially those of the Sides, and make Use of the “ same Entrails in Divination, by touching them “ with the Hand. To the same Use they apply those “ of the Captives whom they have offered in Sacri- “ fice, after having covered their dead Carcases with “ Callocks. After they have cut out their Entrails, “ the Soothsayer draws the Omen from the Carcase “ itself ; then cutting off their Hands, they conse- “ crate them to their Gods.”

That People worshipped likewise the God Mars, as we are told by the same Author (2), and to him they sacrificed Goats, Horses, and their Captives. They offered also, after the Manner of the Greeks, Hecatombs upon certain Occasions. What was singular herein, the Inhabitants of Cadiz represented this God like Apollo, or rather the Sun, having his Head encircled with Rays, from a Belief that the Heat of the Blood and violent Motion of the Spirits, which, according to them, formed Warriors, were immediately produced by the Sun.

Strabo does not inform us what Name they gave to the God of War ; but as Macrobius says, the Accitani-ans, another People of Spain, paid also a particular Worship to the same God, whom they called Neton (a), 'tis very probable that the Lusitanians gave him the same Name.

VOL. III.

X

The

(1) L. 7. p. 106. (2) Ibid.

(a) Simulachrum Martis radiis ornatum magna religione colbant, Neton vocantes. Sat. l. 6. c. 19.

The Celtiberians, as we are told by Strabo, and those who inhabited towards the northern Parts of Spain, worshipped an anonymous God, a God unknown ; and the Worship which they paid to him, consisted in assembling together, each with his own Family, at the full Moon, to dance all Night by the Gates of their Houses.

This is nearly what we know as to the Religion of the antient Spaniards, or Iberians ; but as they had received several of their Gods from the Gauls, as well as communicated to them the Knowledge of some of theirs, hence the Religions of both People bore a considerable Resemblance to one another : However, we nowhere find that the Spaniards had Druids, and consequently their Priesthood was different from that of the Gauls.

B O O K VII.

Of the Religion of the antient Germans, and some other Northern Nations.

WITHOUT entering into the Question debated among the Learned, whether the Gauls peopled Germany, as some are of Opinion, or rather, if it was not the Germans who first came from the North, that gradually extended themselves to the South, and spread over Gaul and Spain, which I reckon more probable ; 'tis at least certain that both these Nations were Celtæ, and had the same Original. Hence that Conformity in Religion, which is so remarkable, that they worshipped almost all the same Gods. Neither of them had any other Temples but the sacred Groves, for which they had a high Veneration ; nor other Statues of their Gods, but the Trees,

Trees, reckoning it derogatory to the Divinity to represent him in any Manner whatsoever, which is to be understood of both only with Regard to their Primitive Religion. These Groves bore also the Names of the Gods to whom they were consecrated. This Conformity in Religion will make it superfluous for us to dwell long upon that of the antient Germans, to which we may apply a Part of what we have said upon that of the Gauls.

However, as every People takes a Liberty to make what Innovations they think proper in the Religion of their Forefathers, frequently introducing new Gods in the Place of the old ones; and as they seldom fail to adopt those of the Countries which they come to inhabit, so we shall find some Difference between the Religion of the Gauls and that of the Germans.

The Priesthood accordingly was not the same: For the Germans had not Druids like the Gauls and Inhabitants of Great Britain, tho' each of the three Nations had a great Respect for their Priests. Those of the Germans, according to Tacitus (1), had great Credit, and they alone were permitted to chastise any one, to bind and beat him; and, for the most Part, it was not to punish the Person whom they dealt with, for Faults he had committed, nor was it in Obedience to the Orders of their Superiors, but, said they, because such was the Pleasure of the Gods. Again, it was their Province to remove from the sacred Groves the Representations of their Gods, which they carried into the Field of Battle: What those Representations of their Gods were, the Author does not say; he only assures us, that they had no Statues, so that it seems difficult to reconcile the two Passages which I am going to cite: Effigies & signa (Deorum) extracta lucis in praelium ferunt Cæterum nec cobiberi parietibus Deos, neque in ullam humani oris speciem assimilari, ex magnitudine cælestium arbitrantur. They were probably

X 2

some

(1) De Mor. German.

some rough Symbols, such as the Sword, by which the Scythians represented the God Mars (a).

Bating these Particulars, the two Religions bore a great Resemblance to one another. As Julius Cæsar of all the Antients has given the fullest Account of the Religion of the Gauls, so Tacitus is he who has enlarged most upon that of the Germans. For whether it was that Cæsar did not sufficiently know that People, or that not having conquered them, he was the more indifferent about studying their Manners and Religion ; or lastly, that from his Time to Tacitus, the Religion and Manners of that antient People had undergone many Changes, the first only says : “ The Germans own no other Gods but those “ whom they see, and from whom they derive some “ sensible Benefit, the Sun, Vulcan, and the Moon :
“ As to others, they have not so much as heard of
“ their Names (b).” Tacitus, in his Book intitled De Moribus Germanorum, and in several Places of his History, is very full and particular upon this Subject ; and I cannot do better than lay together here the whole of what he delivers, with the Addition of some short Reflexions.

In the first Place he says, in the Beginning of that Book, the Germans acknowledged a God Tuiston, who derived his Original from the Earth, and had a Son named Mannus, of whom that People was descended: This Mannus had three Sons, who gave their Names to the Ingævones, the Herminones, and the Istævones, to whom were also joined the Marsi, the Gambrivii, the Suevi, and the Vandals. As the Germans wrote nothing,

(a) The Custom of carrying the Images of the Gods to War, was established among several Nations in Allemania, such as the Cimbres, the Ambrons, the Germans, and, to comprehend almost all, the Celts; whence the Author of the History of the Gallie Religion, Tom. 1. p. 7. concludes, that they had learned this Custom from the Philistines, who in like Manner carried their Gods to War, or even from the Hebrews, who had frequently in their Camp the Ark of the Covenant.

(b) Germani Deorum numero eos solos ducunt quos cernunt, & quorum opibus aperte juvantur, Solem, Vulcanum, Lunam. De Bell. Gall. l. 6.

thing, any more than the Gauls, it was in Verses got by Heart that those ancient Genealogies were contained.

The Alleman Authors, and Schoedius in particular, who has composed a very learned Treatise upon the German Gods, have tortured themselves in explaining those Genealogies, alledging, that they discovered in the Words quoted by Tacitus, Terms of the Teutonic Language, which is not without Foundation. For my Part, I am apt to think that Tuiston, as to his Original, was quite unknown, and that this is the Reason why he was said to be the Son of the Earth. As for his Son Mannus, it signifies, in the Language of the Country, a Man. As the same Tacitus tells us, that an Ambassador of the Tencteri, a German Nation near the Rhine, gave Thanks to the Gods of the Country, and particularly to Mars, Chief among them, in regard that those of Cologne were re-united to the Germanic Body, we may consequently conclude, that Mars was the first and principal God of that warlike Nation ; and Vossius (1) thinks he was among the Germanians the same with the Sun : But Tacitus says, in another Place, that Mercury was their chief God ; Deorum Maximum Mercurium colunt, and that they offered to him human Sacrifices. A remote People, in the Extremities of Germany, says the same Author (2), worship Cybele in a singular Manner, since their Worship consists in carrying, in the Feasts of that Goddess, the Figures of Boars ; which serve instead of Arms Offensive and Defensive, to those who carry them, and shelter them from every Danger, even in the Midst of Fire and Slaughter.

Tacitus, in this Place, undoubtedly speaks conformably to the Ideas of the Romans : We may however presume, that this Nation paid particular Worship to the Earth, reckoned by all Idolaters the common Mother of Gods and Men. Those Barbarians were probably much addicted to Hunting, and lived upon the Boars they slew, these Animals being common in

X 3

the

(1) De Orig. & Prog. Idol. l. 2. c. 15. (2) De Mor. German.

the Forests, and accordingly offered of them to her in Sacrifices ; for the Victims were always taken from such Things as were for Food.

“ A Part of the Suevi, says he again, sacrifice to “ Isis : How they came to adopt that foreign Divi“ nity is what I know not : Only the Figure of a Gal“ ley, under which they represent her, shews that she “ had been brought to them from some other Place.
 “ The same People, continues he, worship the Earth, “ whom they call Herta, and Cybele the Mother of “ the Gods. They are persuaded from the Greatness “ of the heavenly Objects, that the Gods are not to “ be fashioned into a Resemblance of human Figures,
 “ nor confined within Walls ; and therefore, instead “ of Temples, they consecrate to them Groves and “ Woods, and give the Names of their Gods to those “ secret and recluse Places, to which they hardly dare
 “ to lift up their Eyes, so great is the Veneration
 “ they have for them.”

“ They are more observant than any other Nation,
 “ of the Flight of Birds, and make Use of Lots, in “ which they put great Faith, though their Manner
 “ of taking them is very simple. They cut down a “ Branch of a Fruit Tree, and then divide it into se“ veral small Parts, on each of which they put a par“ ticular Mark, and then throw them all at random “ upon a white Vestment. If the Consultation is “ public, he who presides is the chief Priest of the “ Nation ; if private, it is the Master of the Family, “ who, after putting up a Prayer to the Gods, and “ raising his Eyes to Heaven, takes up the Twigs “ three Times, and interprets them according to the “ Marks with which they are distinguished. If they “ are not favourable, they consult no more for that “ Day ; if, on the contrary, they prognosticate good,
 “ they likewise have Recourse to the Auspices, which “ they take from the Chirping and Flight of Birds,
 “ and from Horses, which are maintained at the pub“ lic Charge in those Sacred Groves. The Colour
 “ of these Horses is white ; and they are never em“ ployed

“ ployed in any Work. The Priest, with the King,
 “ or the Head of the Nation, yoke them in a sacred “ Chariot, go along with them, and observe their “ snorting and neighing ; and there is no Omen on “ which they lay greater Strefs than upon that which “ they take in this Way (a).”

“ They have also another Sort of Omen, to which “ they have Recourse in Time of War, in order to “ know the Event. For this Effect, they endeavour
 “ by all Means to get one of the Enemy into their “ Hands, whom they match in a Duel with one of “ their own Party ; and they believe the general Ad“ vantage will be on his Side who gains the Victory
 “ in the single Combat.”

“ The Suevi, continues the same Author, assembled “ together by their Deputies, at a certain Season of “ the Year, in a Wood, which the Religion of the “ Country had consecrated, and ushered in the hor“ rid Ceremonies by putting a Man to Death. Stata “ tempore in sylvam,

“ Auguriis patrum & prisca formidine sacram,

“ omnes ejusdem sanguinis populi legationibus coeunt, cæ- “ soque publice homine celebrant barbari ritus horrendæ “ primordia.”

To proceed, Hercules, according to the same Author, was one of the great Gods of the Germans, and to him, as also to Mars, they offered animal Sacrifices:
Herculem ac Martem concisis animalibus placant.

The Naharvali, another German Nation, had a consecrated Grove, whose Priest was dressed like a Woman. The Romans believed that the Gods worshipped therein were Castor and Pollux, in regard they were Brothers, and both young ; but in their Country this God was named Alcis (b), and no Statue of him

X 4

was

(a) Almost all the Nations of the World have given into this Superstition mentioned here by Tacitus, each of them employing therein particular Rites of their own.

(b) Apud Naharvalos antiquæ religionis lucus ostenditur : Præ- fidet sacerdos muliebri ornatu. Sed Deos interpretatione Romana was to be seen. The Roman Historians, in short, had no other Foundation for their Opinion but a Tradition, that the Argonauts, in their Return from Colchis, had embarked again upon certain Rivers, as shall be said in their History (1), and entered into the northern Seas. Probably it was also from the long Wanderings of Ulysses they came to say that there were Vestiges of his having been in the same Countries, and that certain Honours were paid to him ; but the Historian himself who relates this Fact, seems to give no Credit to it.
Castorem

Though the Germans had no Druids, as has been said, yet it was in the sacred Groves they kept the Representations of their Gods, like the Gauls ; and they were not permitted to place them elsewhere. In the same Grove did both of them offer their Sacrifices, and of all Trees the Oak was most respected by each Nation : No Sacrifice was offered, either in the Gauls or in Germany, till they had first covered the Altar with Leaves and Branches of that Tree. The Greeks, to mention it by the Way, did the same ; Apollonius Rhodius (2), speaking of the solemn Sacrifice offered by the Argonauts before their setting out, says, after raising an Altar upon the Sea-shore, they covered it with Branches and Leaves of the Oak.

I might carry on the Parallel between the Religion of those two People to a greater Length ; but I shall only instance in two other very plain similar Characters. The first is, that in their Religious Assemblies, as well as in those that were merely Civil, both of them appeared in Arms. The second is, that unhappy Conformity in human Sacrifices, which both of them offered up to their Gods. Some modern Authors, I know, will have it, that those two Nations did not really sacrifice Men to their Gods ; that the Ground of the Mistake is, that they actually did put to Death their Castorem Pollucemque memorant. Ejus numinis nomen, Alcis. Nulla simulachra, nullum peregrinæ superstitionis vestigium. Ut fratres tamen, ut juvenes venerantur. De Mor. Germ. Num. 43.

(1) B. vi. (2) Argon. l. i.

there Captives shut up in those large Machines which, as we said, they made Use of upon that Occasion; but that this barbarous Custom was not a Sacrifice: A mere Allegation which all Antiquity flies in the Face of; for not only Cæsar, but Tacitus, Strabo, Lucan, and many others declare the Fact so peremptorily, that it is not possible to clear our Ancestors from the Imputation. Had I a mind to make a vain Ostentation of Erudition, I might quote all the Passages of those antient Authors, but the Thing is too well known, and at the same Time too certain, to need to be insisted upon at greater Length: Let us return to our antient Germans.

Tacitus, having spoke of their Gods, goes on to mention several religious Customs that prevailed among them. One of the most singular is what, according to this Historian, was practised in Honour of Cybele, or the Earth, who was called in the Country Herta, in an Island of the Ocean inhabited by the Germans: and though I have mentioned it in the first Volume, yet I judge it proper to quote here the entire Passage of this Author.

“ In an Island of the Ocean is a sacred Grove, in “ the midst whereof a covered Chariot is religiously “ preserved, which none are permitted to touch but
 “ the Priests; and he alone knows the precise Time
 “ when the Divinity of the Place vouchsafes her Pre“ sence therein. Then that Minister yokes in the “ Chariot two Heifers, puts them forward, and accom“ panies them with profound Veneration. In every “ Place which the Divinity deigns to visit, nothing is “ to be seen but Festivals and Rejoicing: War ceases,
 “ they lay down their Arms, and this is the only Pe“ riod that they enjoy Peace and Quiet; which con“ tinues no longer than till the Priest, perceiving the “ Goddess to grow sick of the Society of Mortals, leads “ her back to the sacred Grove, where the Chariot, the “ Vail with which it was overspread, and the Goddess “ herself, if you will take their Word for it, are plunged “ into a secret Lake, into which the Ministers throw “ themselves in after her. Hence arises among that “ People

“ People a religious Terror, and a holy ignorant Admiration of what those may be supposed to see who thus resolutely perish.”

To these Passages touching the Religion of the antient Germans, Tacitus adds others with respect to their Manners, which are not to my Purpose. I only single out that of their Women, commonly as handsome and pretty as they are chaste and virtuous. The Germans, says he, have a vast Value and Respect for their Women, in whom they think they discern something heavenly and divine. They impart to them the Knowledge of their most secret and most important Affairs; and often even intrust them with the Care thereof, as well as with the Administration of what concerns the public Good. However, they don't go so far, continues he, as to account them Divinities.

From all that I have drawn together from Cæsar and Tacitus, for the other Antients, Strabo, Mela, and in a Word, all those who speak of this antient People, are quite silent as to their Religion, it appears, 1. That the Germans, especially in the earlier Times, worshipped the Stars and Elements, the Sun, the Moon, the Earth, that is the physical Beings that were the first Gods of all idolatrous Nations. 2. That they wrote nothing, contenting themselves with learning by Heart whatever concerned Religion and the Worship of the Gods. 3. That their only Temples, as well as those of the Gauls, were the Woods, which they hardly durst look upon, so great was their Veneration for those sacred Places. 4. That they were forbid to picture and make Images of their Gods; and yet that the former had certain Representations of those same Gods, which they carried to the Field of Battle, though we know not what those symbolical Representations were. 5. That in their Sacrifices they offered up Victims and Animals, as all other idolatrous Nations. 6. That they offered human Sacrifices, especially to Mercury, and in the Assemblies I have mentioned. 7. That their principal Divinities were the Sun, the Moon, Mercury, or rather Teutates, Vulcan, Tuiston the Son

Son of the Earth, that is an unknown God, Mars, or the God of War, Cybele, or rather the Earth, Isis, Hercules, Alcis, or Castor and Pollux, &c. 8. That they were much addicted to the Science of Augury, to Divination, and other Superstitions that were peculiar to themselves. Lastly, that they had a high Veneration for their Priests, who had a vast Influence over them.

This is the Amount of all that the Antients knew concerning the Religion of the Germans; which is not surprizing, those People being very little known to them, and not being subdued till very late; whence I think one may conclude, with a great deal of Reason, that they preserved their primitive Religion longer than the Gauls, who were subject to the Romans long before them. However, as they were at last subdued in their Turn, there is the highest Probability that they adopted afterwards a Part of the Religion of their Conquerors.

As the Gods whom I have now named are pretty well known, and as I have spoke of them before, it will not be expected I should imitate the Conduct of Elias Shædius, who after quoting most of the Passages which I have given, makes a Commentary upon each of them at great Length; goes as far as Syria and Egypt to trace out the Origin of most of those Gods, and without Judgment or Discernment gives a Display of his Erudition often very preposterously.

I should even have confined myself to what I have now said of the Religion of the antient Germans, had not Time preserved to us some Monuments that exhibit Gods whom neither Cæsar nor Tacitus knew: Of these I shall discourse at some Length in the rest of this Book, after having spoke of the Superstitions of that antient People.

C H A P. I.

Superstitions of the antient People of Germany.

ONE of the most antient Superstitions of the Germans, and at the same Time the most general, since it was also common to the Swedes and Danes, is that of the Alrunæ, upon which a modern Author has lately published a small Treatise (a). This Superstition consisted in having in their Houses small Figures about the Height of half a Foot, or at most a Foot, and very rarely a Foot and a half, representing some Magicians; and these Figures they believed to have so great Virtues, as to have at their Disposal the Lives and Fortunes of Men. These small Figures were made, and are made at this Day (for the Superstition still continues among the Populace) of the Roots of the toughest Plants, especially of the Mandrake, and they gave them the Figure of a Woman, rarely of a Man; they dressed them immediately, and kept them laid up in some secret Place, whence they were never taken out but to be consulted. Figures of them may be seen in Keisler's Celtic Antiquities; for the Author now cited has given none. Lambecius, in his Catalogue of the Imperial Library, has given others that are all rough and overgrown with Hair.
of

I suppose it would be but losing Time to insist on all the fabulous Stories that have been and still are delivered about the Origin of these little Figures, which are thought to be formed of a Plant that grows under the Gibbet from the Urine that drops from a Man who had been unjustly hanged. The Root of this Plant, we are told, entirely resembles a Man; as is said, though without Foundation, of the Mandrake. To pull it up is an Enterprize of Danger; for when one forces it, they say, to leave the Soil where it is born, it raises such a loud Cry, as to kill the Man who plucks it. To prevent this Accident, he stops up his Ears close with Wax, as Ulysses did, that he might not hear the fatal Song of the Sirens; then he fastens the Plant to the Tail of a black Dog, and by presenting to that Animal a Piece of Meat or Bread, makes him strain to jump up, by which Motion he draws with him the fatal Root, and drops down dead with the Noise that it makes. I am

(a) G O T I F R. Christ. R O T H I I
De imagunculis Germanorum magicis, quas ALRUNAS vo-cant, &c.

HELMSTADII, 1737, in Octavo,

I am ashamed to relate such impertinent Stuff; the Story however may have its Use, and mortify the Pride of Man, by shewing him into what Absurdity and Extravagance weak and criminal Curiosity may be carried.

As the Occasion to which the Growth of these Al-runæ was owing made them very rare, they fell upon a Way to find other Originals to them; but for the most Part they are nothing but Roots which they polish, to which they adapt Members, Hair, &c. to fashion them to such a Resemblance as they desire.

When one has the good Luck to have such Figures in his House or about him, he reckons himself happy, he is no longer apprehensive of Danger, but expects from thence all Sorts of Blessings, especially Health, for 'tis chiefly to that Purpose they are employed. They steep them in Water to procure Fruitfulness to barren Women, and a happy Delivery to those who are pregnant. Diseases the most obstinate to Remedies, even those of Cattle and Flocks, don't hold out against this pretended Specific. Let a Judge be ever so adverse to a Party, he changes his Mind in his Favour, if he has about him one of those Figures; but which is still more wonderful, it discloses all the Secrets of Futurity, and that either by a Motion of the Head, or even by expressing itself in a Manner very intelligible to the happy Persons who have it in their Possession.

We will not be surprized after this, at their esteeming them the most considerable of their Household Gods or Lares; at their paying religious Duties to them, and even at their being fain to purchase them at a vast Price rather than be without them; for the Quacks made a publick Traffick of them. The Duties which I now mentioned, consisted in changing their Cloaths every new Moon; in putting into the small Chest wherein they were inclosed, Silk and Wool for them to lie soft upon; in washing them every Saturday with Wine and Water, and in giving them at every Meal a Mess of Drink and Meat, otherwise wife they would cry, we are told, like Children who suffer Thirst or Hunger.

The Learned have not spared their Labour in searching into the Origin of so antient an Usage in Allemannia, which they trace back to the very Time of their first Idolatry ; though in later Times they added to the Rite a great many Superstitions unknown to the Simplicity of the antient Germans.

Some of these Authors think the Rise of those little Figures is owing to the Similitude which the first People made of the Ark of the Covenant ; and as they believed that Moses had inclosed therein Figures that were not known, though their Virtue was such that the Ark brought Prosperity to all the Places where it rested, as to the House of Obed-Edom; they made those little Images, which they kept handsomly inclosed in little Chests. Others, who don't trace their Original so far back, derive it from the Use which the Greeks made of the Mandrake. The Author who gives Occasion for this Article, takes these Figures to have been more probably the Work of German Women, who were accounted to have the Gift of Prediction, and were called Alrunæ (a). Upon this Principle, he reckons these little Images to have been so many Household Gods, or Lares, who took Care of Houses and of the Persons who dwelt in them. But in that Case we must conclude, that they were not so antient as he pretends, since, according to Tacitus, the Germans in the earliest Ages had no Images, no human Figures of their Gods, but represented them only by some Symbols.

Be that as it will, this Superstition so often condemned by Councils, continues at this Day among that People, as has been already remarked, so difficult is it to extirpate Error that has been perpetuated from Age to Age.

Tacitus also informs us, that the Germans formerly believed that the Gods sometimes appeared under a human man Figure, and conversed with Men, joined in their Affairs, and even deigned to partake of the Food that they set before them. The same Author, followed herein by Gregory of Tours, says of these People, that in Honour of their Gods they had stated Festival-Days, during which they prepared for them Feasts of whatever they had rare and exquisite in its Kind; that they divided the Dishes of Meat, and after leaving a Part thereof for the Gods, the Guests that were invited to the Feast ate up the rest; a Custom which has a great Resemblance to the Leëtisternia of the Greeks and Romans, whereof we have given some Account in the Article of Sacrifices (1).

(a) A Word composed of all, omnis, universus, and Runa, mysterium.

As they too had an Opinion, as well as the other Pagans, that the Souls of the Dead, cloathed with an aerial Body, delighted either in the Tombs, or in wandering about, they took Care to supply them with Meat and Drink; a Custom which the Germans probably had received from the Scythians, who practised it of old, as we are told by Herodotus (2). Hence those Pots, those Vases, those Knives, and so many other Utensils which are daily discovered in the antient Tombs of the Germans, Gauls, and some other People.

A superstitious Custom still more remarkable was that which the antient Germans practised at their Meals, where, as a Bond of inviolable Friendship, they drew Blood from themselves, and drunk all of it one after another (3). I shall add farther, as a Superstition peculiar to them, that when they burnt their Dead, they threw into the Pile Letters which they wrote to their Friends in the other World, a Custom which was common to them with the Gauls.

In fine, the last Superstition of this People, upon which I shall also insist a little, was Divination, to which they were religiously devoted. The Women were the Persons who dealt in it, and there was no Sorcery nor hellish Art which they had not Recourse to for the Knowledge of future Events, which they made public fic Profession of, foretelling to those who came to consult them. The Opinion which prevailed of their having an Insight into Futurity, was one of the chief Causes of that high Veneration and vast Regard, which, as was said from Tacitus, the Germans had for their Women; and the Reason why that Historian says something divine was thought to be discerned in them, was undoubtedly from the Intercourse they were imagined to have with the Gods, who disclosed to them what was to come. The Death of those Women did not put a Period to the Respect that was paid to them; on the contrary it encreased it; and from mere civil Respect, raised them to the Honour of Adoration. Most of them after Death were reckoned Divinities, and had the same Worship paid them with the other Gods. 'Tis true Tacitus names among those deified Women none but Velleda; but no Doubt there were others. The Authors of the Country are even persuaded that the Mother-Goddesses, of whom I have discoursed in the preceding Book, and of whom several Monuments have been discovered in many Provinces of Germany, were no other but those soothsaying Women, who, after their Apotheosis, were invoked for the Health of private Persons, and of the Emperors.

(1) Vol. II. B. 4. (2) L. 7. (3) Athen. I. 1. c. 11.

C H A P. II.

Of Irminful, the God of the Saxons.

C*Harlemagne*, in one of his Expeditions into Saxony, having, in the Year 772, taken the Fortrefs of Eresbourg, destroyed the Temple of Irminful, and the Idoi of that God. The Learned, and particularly Abbé Vertot (a), have made Dissertations upon this Saxon Divinity, of whom Schædius had said something before (1).

In that Part of antient Germany inhabited by the Westphalian Saxons, near the River Dimelia, was a high high Mountain, upon which stood the Temple of this God, in the Middle of the Citadel now mentioned. This Edifice, as we are told by Meibonius (1), was equally esteemed for the Elegance of its Architecture, as for the Veneration of the People who had enriched it with their Offerings, which Charlemagne knew how to make good Use of, drawing from it vast Sums of Gold and Silver. The Statue of the God was placed upon a Column of exquisite Work, holding in one Hand a Standard whereon was pictured a Rose, and in the other a Pair of Scales. The first of those two Symbols denotes the unfading Honour that is acquired by true Valour; the second the Uncertainty of Victory which depends sometimes upon a mere nothing, as the least Trifle is capable of turning the Scale when the Balance is in Equilibrio. The Figure of a Bear which Irminful wore upon his Breast, and that of a Lion upon his Buckler, intimated the Necessity of Strength, Courage and Address in all great Enterprizes.

(a) See the historical Part of the fifth Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of the Belles-Lettres, p. 188.

(1) De Diis Germ. Syn. 3. c. 1.

Thus the Statue is described by Kransius, and the Figures belonging to it explained, but without citing any Authority, which makes the Description to be considered by some as a mere Imagination. The antient Germans, according to Tacitus, had no Statues of their Gods; 'tis therefore, say they, without Foundation that the German Author mentions that of Irminful, which the Abbé d'Esperb, who lived in the thirteenth Century, says was nothing but a bare Trunk of a Tree. But may we not excuse Kransius, by saying, that from the Time of Tacitus to that of Charlemagne, the Religion of the antient Germans had undergone various Changes, and that those People, once subdued, embraced, like others, the Usages and Customs of the Conquerors? An undeniable Proof of those Changes is, that Tacitus likewise says the Germans had no other Temples but the Woods; and yet we learn from History, that in the Time of Charlemagne Irminful had a Temple upon the Top of a Hill, which that Emperor demolished.

But to proceed : The Learned are divided about this God. According to some it was Mercury or Hercules, as his very Name seems to insinuate. Eresburg, according to others, being also named Marsburg, which signifies the Fort of Mars, we may very readily believe that the antient Saxons, a warlike People, worshipped the God of War, as did the Scythians and other Northern Nations. Wernerus Rosevincius took this Figure for a Panthéan Figure, representing at the same Time Mars, Mercury, Apollo, and Hercules. Some Authors take this God to be the same with Arminius, the General of the Cherusci, who, after he had defeated three of Varus's Legions, and obliged that General to fall upon his own Sword (1), was esteemed the Deliverer of his Country, and became its tutelar God. Such is the Opinion of Schædus, which is followed by Vertot.

Irminsul had his Priests and Priestesses, who had each their different Functions. At the Feasts which were celebrated in his Honour, the Nobility made their Appearance on Horseback (2) in compleat Armour, and after a Cavalcade which they made round the Column whereon the Idol stood, they alighted, knelt down, and offered Gifts to the Priests, who, according to Meibomius, were chosen from among the most considerable of the Nation. On this Occasion they examined into the Conduct of those who had served in the last War, and the Priests punished such as had not done their Duty, by beating them with Rods. This severe Discipline they carried so far, as even to put to Death those Generals who had lost the Battle through bad Conduct.

Chaleimagne, Master of Eresbourg, demolished the Temple of this false God, built a Chapel upon its Ruins, and buried the Statue with the Column that supported it. Being afterwards dug up by Louis le Debonnaire, it was transported to Hildesheim, and from that Time the Memorial of the Destruction of that Idol, has

(1) Vell. Paterc. (2) Aventinus Ann. Boior.

has been celebrated every Year in that City, on the Eve of the Sunday called Lætare *.

C H A P. III.

Of the Goddess Nehalennia.

THIS Goddess, worshipped in the northern Parts of Germany, was quite unknown, till on the fifth of January 1646, an East-wind blowing violently towards Zeland, the Sea-coast became dry near Doefburg, in the Island of Valchren, and thereupon were perceived the Ruins of Houses that had been formerly under Water. Among those Ruins were Altars, Vases, Urns, and Statues, and among the rest several that represented the Goddess Nehalennia, with Inscriptions bearing her Name. These Treasures of Antiquity were very soon made known to the Curious; and Urcé, in his History of the Counts of Flanders (1), has given the Figures of fourteen of their Statues, all of them bearing the Name of this Goddess, one only excepted. Montfaucon has not neglected them; and you may find several of them in his Antiquity explained.

Don James Martin (2) has been at the Pains to give us all the Attitudes in which this Goddess is represented upon those several Statues, sometimes sitting, sometimes standing; an Air always youthful, and a Habit that covers her from Head to Foot, are her general Characteristics; and the Symbols that surround her are usually a Cornucopia, Fruits which she carries in her Lap, a Basket, a Dog, &c.

As one Discovery commonly makes Way for others, M. Keisler (3) says, that upon a careful Examination of the Idols that are still in Zeland, some were observed to have all the Air of Nehalennia, tho' it was never once suspected before. This at least is certain, that this Goddess was known in other Places

Y 2

besides

* Fourth Sunday of Lent.

(1) T. 1. p. 52. (2) Hist. of the Religion of the Gau's, V. 2. c. 17. (3) Antiq. Septenti.

besides that Province, since Gruter (i) quotes an Inscription found elsewhere, which is consecrated to this Divinity by Eriattius the Son of Jucundus: Deæ Nebal. Eriattius Jucundi pro se & suis votum solvit libens merito: For there is no Doubt but this is the Name of Nebalennia contracted. But tho' we should not agree to this, 'tis however certain that this Goddess was worshipped in England, since an Inscription has been found there that bears her Name at full Length. Some too will have it, that an Image in Mosaic, dug up at Nismes, represents her; but this is a Thing very far from being certain.

The Authors whom I have cited in this Chapter are mostly agreed that this Goddess was the Moon, or rather the New-moon; but all Things well considered and examined, I am of Opinion that she was one of those Mother-Goddesses described at the End of the preceding Book. The Fruits, the Cornucopia, the Dog, in a Word, all the Symbols that accompany her, have a much greater Relation to a rural Deity, as the Mothers were, than to the Moon, with which certainly they have no Affinity. Monuments of those Goddesses have been found in France, England, Italy, and Germany; no Wonder then that some of them have been found in Zeland; for, as I have proved, their Worship was very extensive.

I had forgot to take Notice that Neptune is three Times joined with the Figure of Nebalennia, which gives Ground to believe that this Goddess was also invoked for Navigation; and this is confirmed by the Inscription of England which I have mentioned, wherein Secundus Sylvanus declares that he has fulfilled the Vow he had made to this Goddess for his Success in carrying on his Trade in Chalk.

C H A P.

C H A P. IV.

Isis, worshipped by the Suevi.

OF all the Divinities of the Pagan World, perhaps there is not any one whose Worship was more generally adopted than that of Isis. Not as if the various Nations which embraced her Worship, adored her always under that Name, but in Effect she was still the same, whether she was taken for the Earth, for Cybele, for Diana, or for the Moon, &c. Hence those thousand Names she was said to bear. Tacitus, who informs us that her Worship had been propagated even to the Suevi, a People distinguished amongst the antient Germans, owns, that he does not comprehend how it had passed into so remote a Country (a), and we may add, with which they had so little Commerce.

What appeared difficult to the Roman Historian, may seem so to us too ; but such Difficulties do but stimulate the Curiosity of the Learned, and give them Room especially for displaying their Penetration. Accordingly, how many Conjectures have been offered as to the Manner in which those remote People might have come to the Knowledge of Isis ? If this Goddess, says Vossius (1), is Eve, as in Fact she is, since her Name comes from the Hebrew Ischa, which imports Woman by way of Eminence, where is the Difficulty to account for her being worshipped by so many Nations that knew her Name by Tradition ? Why, says Cluverius, might not the Worship of Isis, known thro' all Asia, have been propagated to the Extremity of Germany with the Colonies that settled there ? The Suevi, according to Don Pezron, having come from Asia, had, no Doubt, embraced the Religion of that People. If Osiris, in those great Expeditions which Diodorus and other Antients make him undertake, take,

Y 3

(a) Pars Suevorum & Isidi sacrificat ; unde causa & origo peregrino sacro, parum comperi. De Morib. Germanar.

(1) De orig. & progr. Idol.

take, penetrated to the very Source of the Danube, according to the Opinion of M. Huet (1), might not Gratitude have determined the People of that Country which he had visited, to deify him and his Spouse Isis, as well as other Countries where he had been, whence his Worship was even propagated throughout all Germany, the Gauls, and Spain? 'Tis true the Name of Osiris was unknown to the People whom I have now named, but they were no Strangers to Belenus, and the Sun, who were the same with that antient King of Egypt.

Tho' none of these Conjectures want Probability, for I take no Notice of that of Aventinus, who, in his Annals of the Boii, asserts, against the Authority of all the Antients, that Isis accompanied her Husband in his Expeditions, and travelled with him into Almania, to see Suerus who reigned there at that Time; yet I am rather inclined to think the Worship of this Goddess might have been propagated to Germany, either by Means of Sesostris, who certainly penetrated not only into Colchis, where, according to Herodotus, he left a Colony, but even into Thrace, where he left another under the Conduct of Mars, as we learn from Diodorus; or rather by Means of the Gauls, who sent Colonies into Germany, and had themselves received the Worship of that Goddess, either from the Phœnicians, who, in their Way to Cadiz, had often stopt upon the Coasts of the Gauls, if they were not even peopled by them, as Bockart maintains; or else from the Carthaginians, who, for a long Time, had Commerce with the Gauls, and introduced among them the Worship of Saturn and some other Divinities, as has been already said.

This last Opinion I take to be the most probable, and the Figure of a Galley, under which they worshipped this Goddess (2), proves that her Worship had been brought by Sea first immediately into the Gauls, then to them with the Gallic Colonies.

Farther,

(1) Demon p. 4.

(2) Signum ipsum Isis in modum Liburnæ figuratum. Tacit. ibid.

Farther, we need not be surprized that the Suevi represented this Goddess under the Figure of a Ship, since, as Tacitus observes, the antient Germans were not permitted to picture their Gods under a human Figure (a); yet they were allowed to have other Representations of them, as has been said. They took the Ship for the Symbol of Isis, to signify in what Manner her Worship had been introduced into the West: For I look upon as mere Conjecture, no wise probable, what some Authors alledge, that as the heavenly Bodies, those first Divinities, were believed to be carried forward in their Career in Vehicles like Ships; so Isis, taken physically for the Moon, must needs have had hers, assigning this, according to their Principle, as the Reason why the Suevi represented her under the Figure of a Ship.

The antient Germans, to be sure, were not so well skilled in Mythology as to give into this Refinement. I should rather think it was the Fable which imports that this Goddess had not only laid down Rules for Navigation, but improved that Art even to the Invention of Sails, which made Sailors put themselves under her Protection, and consecrate little Ships to her upon their Return from their Voyages, and deposite them in the Temples, it being certain that the Egyptians paid a religious Veneration to the Ship of Isis, as we learn from Lactantius the Mythologist (b); Circumstances too publick not to be known to those who embraced her Worship; I should rather be inclined, I say, to think that this is what induced the Suevi to choose a Ship for the Symbol of this Goddess rather than any other, they not being permitted to represent her under a human Figure.

To conclude, as we know not what Kind of Worship the Suevi paid this Goddess, Tacitus only saying that they offered up Sacrifices to her, all Conjectures here would be to no Purpose, and we must be content

Y 4

to

(a) Cæterum nec cohiberi parietibus Deos, nec in ullam humani oris speciem assimilari ex magnitudine cœlestium arbitrantur. Ibid.

(b) Iſidis navigium Ægyptus colit. Laët. l. 1. c. 2.

to know as little about this Matter as the Roman Historian.

C H A P. V. T U I S T O N.

AMONG the Gods of the antient Germans, Tacitus names Tuiston, the Son of the Earth, whose Descendants, by his Son Man, or Mannus, peopled a great Part of the Country (1). The Allemand Authors make no doubt but this Tuiston, who passed for the Son of the Earth, only because his Original was not known, had arrived in Germany from the first Ages. Schædus (2) is even of Opinion, that he was one of the Sons of Noah, and that he had introduced into Germany the Knowledge of the true God, and the Religion of that Patriarch.

He does not stop there ; but asserts, that it was he who communicated to that Country the Use of Writing and the Alphabet, a long Time before Cadmus had made the same Present to the Greeks. In fine, if we may believe him, he is the true Father of the antient Germans ; he governed them, gave them Laws, established their religious Ceremonies, and acquired so much Veneration among his new People, that he was deified after his Death ; which we may presume, says he, for he dares not affirm it, not to have happened till after a long Life. After having thus given his Opinion, Schædus quotes a long Passage from Josephus about the long Life of the Patriarchs, so lavish is this Author of his Learning. As Tuiston, says he, saw that nothing was capable of keeping his People within Bounds, he digested the Laws which he gave them into Verses, which they were obliged to sing both in Public and Private, that each having them always present to his Mind, it might not be possible to forget them.

Mannus succeeded his Father, and had three Sons, from whom, says Tacitus, descended three Nations,
the

(1) De Mor. Germ. (2) De Dñis Germ. passim.

the Ingævones, the Herminones, and the Istævones (a). He adds, many taking Advantage of the free Scope left to Imagination by a History of such Antiquity, assert that this God had other three Sons, whence descended the Marsii, the Gambrivii, the Suevi and the Vandali (b). In short, if Etymologies be sufficient to prove the Descent of those People from the Grandsons of Tuiston, the German Authors, and those of the neighbouring Countries will give us enough of them. They pretend too, that in all those Names are Traces of the Teutonic Language ; and to say the Truth, some of their Conjectures are not quite without Foundation.

One of the principal Ceremonies of the Worship paid by the antient People of Germany to their Founder, and his Son Mannus, was to sing his Praises in Verse, which Tacitus says were very antient: Celebrant carminibus antiquis Tuistonem Deum, terra editum, & filium Mannum, originem gentis conditoresque (1).

As the Germans had the same Original with the Gauls, and were Celtæ as well as they, the Learned are persuaded that Tuiston, the Founder of the German Nation, was the same with Pluto, the Father of the Gauls ; and indeed there is a Passage in Cæsar that puts this Conjecture out of Doubt. “ The Druids, “ says he, give out that the Gauls are come from Dis “ or Pluto, who after his Death was worshipped by “ both Nations as their Father and Founder, by the “ Gauls under the Name of Pluto, and by the Germans “ under that of Tuiston, and both of them erected “ Statues to him in the Woods (c). ”

CHAP.

(a) Manno tres filios assignant, quorum nominibus proximi Oceano Ingævones medii Herminones, cæteri Istævones vocantur. Idem, loc. cit.

(b) Quidam vero licentia vetustatis plures Deo ortos, pluresque gentis appellationes. Marsios, Gambriyios, Suevos Vandalos affirmant, eaque vera & antiqua nomina. Id. ibid.

(1) Id. ibid.

(c) Gallos se omnes a Dite Patre prognatos predicare, idque a Druidibus proditum dicere: Quem defunctum, tanquam familiæ patrem utriusque populi, Germani sub nomine Tuistonis, Galli sub nomine Ditis honorarunt, statuasque in lucis erexerunt. De Bell. Gall. l. 6.

C H A P. VI.

Of some other Divinities of the Germans, and neighbouring Nations.

SAmuel Grosser, in his History of Lusatia, has given the Figures of some Divinities of that Country, from whom Montfaucon has taken them in the second Volume of his Antiquity explained.: Schædius had undoubtedly seen the like Figures, since he makes mention of all those Gods (1). Most of their Statues are very singular, as well as the Symbols that accompany them; but one Glance of the Eye is better than the most minute Descriptions. Their Names bear no Manner of Resemblance to those of the other Gods of the Pagan World, and 'tis no easy Matter to find out their Significations.

C H R O D O.

The first of these Figures, which bears the Name of Chrodo * (2), represents an old Man bare-headed, resting his Feet upon a large Fish. He is covered with a Robe that leaves nothing exposed but his Feet, and is girt about with a Scarf. In his left Hand he holds a Wheel, and in the right a Basket full of Fruits and Flowers. As this Statue, with its Pedestal, was found in the Fort of Harsbourg, formerly called Salzburg, Henninius (3) and Grosser take it to be a Saturn; but if it be so, the Mythology of the Saxons must have been quite different from that of the Greeks and Romans, who never represented that God with such Symbols.

P R O A O.

The second is the God Proao, who holds in one Hand a Pike, wrap'd about with a Kind of Flag, and in the other a Scutcheon not unlike to ours. Grosser

(1) De Diis German.

* The same with the Saxon God Seater, from whom our Saturday is named.

(2) Ant. expl. T. 2. p. 184. (3) Remarks upon the Epistles of Tollus.

ser alledges, that this God presided over Courts of Justice, as also over the public Market, that every Thing might be sold there with Equity.

T R I G L A.

The third represents the Goddess Trigla with her three Heads; this undoubtedly was Diana Trivia, or Hecate: Tria Virginis ora.

P O R E V I T H.

Porevith, who is represented by the fourth Statue, is a very singular Idol. She has five Heads, and a sixth upon her Breast, much like that which Minerva bore upon her Egis; and round the Pedestal which supports the Statue of this Goddess, is a great Heap of Swords, Spears, Poinards, and other Arms; which makes some of the Antients think she had the Charge of the Spoils that were taken from the Enemy.

S U A N T O V I T H.

Suantovith, who is the fifth Statue, has four Heads, and is clad in a Cuirass. Grosser says, that he was the Sun, or Apollo, the principal Divinity of Lusatia; but we may also take him for Mars.

R O D I G A S T.

The sixth Figure is Rodigast, which bears an Ox's Head upon the Breast, an Eagle upon its Head, and holds a Pike in the left Hand.

S I W A.

The Goddess Siwa is represented in the seventh Statue; she is naked, her Hair falls down behind as far as her Knees, and in one Hand she holds a Bunch of Grapes, and in the other an Apple. She is taken for Venus, or for the Goddess of Health. For my Part, if the Figure be right designed, I reckon she is a rural Divinity, the Pomona of Lusatia.

F L Y A S.

The eighth is the Goddess Flyas; and she is represented in three Manners so different, that were it not for the same Name that occurs upon the three Statues, we should be at a Loss to know them to be the same Divinity. For in one she appears as a Man covered with a great Cloak, bearing partly upon her Head,
and

and partly upon her Shoulder, a Lion whose Feet she supports with her left Hand, while in her Right she holds a burning Torch. Upon the second she appears under the Form of a Skeleton, half covered with a Cloak, with the Lion and the Torch. Lastly, upon the third, like a Man deformed, sitting upon a Chair, the Head crown'd, the Feet monstrous, and the burning Torch in the left Hand.

L A T O B I U S.

To conclude, we find in Grosser Inscriptions dug up in Carintbia, whereon is Mention made of the God Latobius; and by these same Inscriptions, it appears that he was invoked as a God of Health: He was the Esculapius of the Carintbians. Another Inscription of the same Country makes mention of Epone. Two others found in Swisserland mention the Goddess Aventice; but of these and some other Gyddesses we know nothing but the Names.

C H A P. VII.

Of some Heroes of the antient Germans, and Cities consecrated to the Gods.

EVERY Country having had its Heroes and great Men, who were promoted to divine Honours by their Fellow-citizens, we may well suppose that such would not be wanting in Warlike Germany. She had first Hercules; for in what Country is not he to be found? and we have seen that Tacitus reckons him among the principal Divinities of the antient Germans. This Hercules, we are told, was called Allemannus: He was King of the Boii, who always reckoned him the Father and Founder of their Nation. If we may rely on Aventinus (1), he is the last King of Germany that Berosus mentions. We know not in what Period of Time he lived; but we are told by Eusebius and St. Jerom, that he is the most antient Hercules of all. Be that as it will, this Prince was truly heroical and courageous, and had therefore taken

(1) Annal. Boio, l. 12.

ken the Lion for his Symbol, wherein he hath been imitated by several Kings of the Country. His Subjects deified him after his Death, look'd upon him as the God of War, and invoked him always from that Time, before they gave Battle, making the Army resound his Praises, which they sung with great Solemnity.

The other German Nations had also each of them their Heroes: Irminful was the Heroe of the Saxons; Radagaisus of the Heruli. This is that warlike Radagaisus who invaded Italy with a formidable Army, and was defeated by Stilicon. Bastin King of the Franks is reckoned among the Heroes, and was promoted to divine Honours after his Death.

Among the Cities of Allemannia consecrated to some particular Divinity, is reckoned Hambourg, which is thought to have been consecrated to Jupiter Hammon; Maspurg, or the Town of Mars, as also Aresbourg. Lunebourg plainly bears the Name of the Moon.

Besides these Cities which were called after the Names of the Gods that had been taken for their Protectors, there were others, as also particular Provinces, where some God was chosen preferably to others: Thus the Naharvales, as has been said from Tacitus, gave particular worship to Castor and Pollux; the Suevi to Isis, the Boii to Hercules. Venus was especially worshipped at Magdebourg; Trigla or Diana Triformis among the Vandals, who in honour of her bred up a black Horse, which the Priests, to whose Care he was committed, led forth to the Field of Battle, to prognosticate by his Means. The same People paid divine Honours to Belbuch, and to Zeomebuch, whom they looked upon as the good and bad Genii; for the Names of those two Genii signify, the one the white God, the other the black God.

In short, as these People with other Pagan Nations, had their particular and topical Gods, so they had common ones who were worshipped in all the Country, such as the Sun, and those others whom Cæsar and Tacitus mention.

But

But it would be a Loss of Time and an Abuse of the Patience of my Reader, to lead them farther into the Northern Countries. Here therefore I shall close my Researches : For in short, what would we find in those remote Northern Countries, but an Idolatry which has a modern Aspect, and had come in the Place of the more antient System, and for the Sake of which those People seem to have abandoned the Gods of their Fathers; that is, the Stars and Elements, which were the general and universal Objects of Worship to all the Pagans, devoting themselves to nothing but foolish Superstitions, to that odious Magic whereof they make public Profession, to all Sorts of Charms and Enchantments; some of them, as those who inhabit the Coasts of Norway, even pretending to have the Winds at their Disposal, to be able to with-hold them when they have a mind from raising Storms and Tempests ; and even selling them to Sea-faring People, more credulous to be sure than those who carry on that public Commerce.

Should we next take a Survey of the immense Coast inhabited by the three Sorts of Laplanders and Siberians, we should see People who fancy themselves eternally infested by evil Genii, always endeavouring to blast their Hopes in Hunting and Fishing, to bewitch their Children, and to disturb the sad Repose which they enjoy in their Grotts and Dens ; and who are therefore always striving by Prayers and Sacrifices to appease their Malice and render them propitious : In a Word, who have no other Oracle nor other God but the Spirit of Darkness and Delusion.

Lastly, if we enter into those vast Plains possessed by the several Tartarian Nations, we shall there find either the Populace groaning under the Weight of an Idolatry equally gross and ridiculous, or Pretenders to more Discernment who follow the Dreams of their Bonzes and of the great Lama ; an Idolatry which leads us back to the Article of the Theogonies of the several Nations of the Earth, which I have treated treated fully enough at the Beginning of this Mythology (1); and in fine, which leads us to that Truth attested by the sacred Books, omnes Dii Gentium Dæmonia.

'Tis true, there are dug up from Time to Time Idols in those vast Climates, and Mantfaucon received a considerable Number of them from M. Chamaquer, Librarian to the late Czar Peter the Great, whereof he has given the Figures in his Antiquity explained, but he has thought fit to give no Explanation of them. For what could one make of those Figures which are more fantastical than the Monsters of whom Old Egypt glorified herself, dug up in a Country where the most profound Ignorance reigns; what could one make of them, I say, but offer some random Conjecture without Foundation, and without any certain Rule to direct our Conduct?

However, if there are any curious to be more particularly acquainted with the Idolatry of those People in the Extremities of the North, 'tis but reasonable I should direct them to what Authors they are to have Recourse. For the People of Sweden and the adjacent Countries, they may read the Volume of Rudbekius's Atlantic, intitled Manheim, guarding however against the systematic Spirit that prevails too much in that Work. For the other Northern Antiquities, I refer to the Works composed upon that Subject by the ingenious M. Keisler, Meibonius, and others. For the Gods of Iseland and the adjacent Islands, the Mythology in 4to by Snorron-Sturl or Sturleton, reprinted by Resenius in 1665. For the Laplanders, Scheffers Lapponia, not forgetting the Historians of those several Countries. But whoever has this Curiosity may be assured before hand, that he will meet with nothing in those Works but the History of a Religion extremely gross, without either Principles, System, or Connection; and People groaning under the Tyranny of the Spirit of Darknes, who as to them is not yet in Chains: In short that he will find find nothing therein to lead him back to true and valuable Antiquity, and to the Understanding of any Author of the better Ages; which were the principal Motives that induced me to undertake this Mythology.

(1) Vol. I. B. 2.

A P R E L I M I N A R Y.*

HAVING in the former Volumes given the History of the Pagan Gods, and explained the Fables wherewith it was embellished, I am in this Volume to treat of the Heroes or Demi-Gods, towards whom Superstition had also established a religious Worship, though subordinate to that of the Gods; and as the Egyptians, according to Herodotus, knew neither Heroes nor Demi-Gods, and consequently had no Worship that referred to them, Heroism having properly taken its Rise in Greece; 'tis in the History of that Country we must trace its Original.

But before I go farther, 'tis proper to reflect on the celebrated Division which Varro made of antient Times, preserved to us by Censorinus; for the Work of that learned Roman wherein it was inserted is now lost. “ In antient History, says Censorinus (1), we “ are to distinguish three Periods of Time. The first “ comprehends whatever passed from the Beginning “ of the World to the first Deluge, and this Period “ is called obscure, or unknowen, ἄδηλον. The second “ contains a Series of Events from that Deluge to the “ Olympiads; and as in this we meet with Numbers
 “ of

* Here begins Vol. VI. of the Original.

(1) De Die Nat. c. 25.

“ of Fables, it has therefore got the Name of fabulous, μυθικόν. Lastly, the third Period of Time
 “ from the Olympiads, being more known and cer“ tain, goes under the Name of historical, ιστορικόν (a).

For the better understanding of this Division, I shall subjoin a few Reflections upon it. One is, that by that first Deluge whereof Varro makes mention, the Greeks understood that which happened under Ogyges; for they knew nothing of their own History prior to the Reign of that Prince. A second is, that as the History of the Gods related to the unknown Times, so that of the Heroes or Demi-Gods belongs to the fabulous Age, which was therefore known also by the Name of the Age of Heroes. The third Observation which I have already made in the Preface to this Work, is, that this Division respects Greece alone, Asia having had its Kings, established Monarchies, and a consistent History in those very Times which the Greeks called unknown, and when they had not so much as the Use of Letters. It has been objected, that in order to give some Probability to this Reflection, I ought to prove that Varro was a Stranger to the Antiquities of the People of Asia; but the Fact proves itself, and there needs no more but this simple Dilemma to demonstrate it. Either Varro was acquainted with those Antiquities, or not; if he was not acquainted with them, I had good Reason to say that Division related only to Greece; if he was acquainted with them, then he could not give the general Appellation of the unknown Times to those which were not unknown with respect to the Asiatics.

From what has been now said it appears that what remains to be the Subject of this Mythology is the

VOL. III.

Z

Heroic

(a) Varro tria discrimina temporum esse tradit, primum ab hominum principio ad cataclysmum priorem, quod propter ignorantiam, vocatur ἀδύνητον. Secundum a cataclysmo priore ad Olympiadem primam, quod, quia in illo multa fabulosa referantur, μυθικόν nominatur. Tertium, a prima Olympiade ad nos, quod dicitur ιστορικόν, quia res in eo gestæ veris historiis continentur. Cens. loc. cit.

Heroic or fabulous Age. Here consequently disappears that dark Period of Time in which the Gods lived, and at the same Time a new Field presents itself, less difficult to be filled up, and more entertaining than the former. Not but there are Fables here in great Plenty; but they are less absurd and easier to be explained, than those wherewith it was thought proper to set off the History of the Gods. From this Age, fabulous as it is, there arises a faint historical Light, which serves to unvail its Fictions. Here we meet with Tombs that by coherent Traditions recall the Memory of the great Men whose Ashes they contain. There, a heroic Monument, where annual Ceremonies exhibit to our View the History of him in whose Honour it had been raised. Sometimes again we have Games celebrated at set Times, and mostly instituted by those Heroes themselves, to eternize their Memory. By these Means I have been furnished with better Helps for this last Part of my Work: Accordingly this Volume will contain more History, and fewer Disquisitions than the former.

That I may keep to some Order therein, I divide it into two Parts: The first will contain all that has a Relation to the Greek History during the fabulous Age to the Return of the Heraclidæ; and the second, the Explanation of such Fables as stand by themselves, and are not connected with the Incidents I shall have before mentioned: Being careful however to insist less upon those which Ovid has collected in his Metamorphoses, and whereof I have given the Explication along with my Translation of that Work, than upon those that are in Hyginus, Antoninus, Liberalis, Conon, Palephatus, and some other Mythologists.

PART FIRST.

Containing the History of the fabulous Age.

BEFORE I enter into the Detail of this History, I am to consider some preliminary Questions that prepare the Way for our better understanding of it.

BOOK I.

Preliminaries to the History of Greece.

IN the first Place I examine, 1. What was the Chronology of the antient Greeks, and their Manner of computing Time. 2. How long the Heroic Age continued. 3. The State of antient Greece. 4. The History of its first Inhabitants and their Manner of living. 5. Lastly, that of the Colonies who came and settled among them, and at what Time they arrived.

Nor let the Reader imagine, that this Part of the Greek History, because it is traced from so remote a Period of Time, will be the less entertaining and instructive ; for first we have a natural Curiosity to be acquainted with the Original of a People who have acted a great Part on the Theatre of the World, and whom we have seen from the smallest Beginnings, rise by Degrees, form several Monarchies, and especially signalize themselves by cultivating Arts and Sciences, and by carrying Poetry and Eloquence, Architecture and Statuary, to the highest Pitch of Perfection fection they were capable of, so as to have left us imitable Models in all these Kinds. Secondly, 'tis in this Part of their History that we see the Greeks pass from a State of Barbarity wherein they were plunged, to a more social Life, and quitting their Dens, the Cavities of Trees, and the other wild Places which they had by Way of Retreat, to come and live under the Conduct of one of their own Number, who was somewhat more polished than the rest, first in Cottages, then in Villages and Cities. Thirdly, 'tis within this Space of Time that the several Colonies of civilized People arrived in Greece, who brought thither Arts and Sciences, Laws and the Worship of the Gods; founded therein Cities, where they gathered those into one Body, who were yet dispersed through the Fields, and formed them into several Kingdoms.

Follow next in Order, but still in the same Interval, those celebrated Heroes of Antiquity, Perseus, Bellerophon, Hercules, Theseus, Castor and Pollux, Ajax, Achilles, and the rest, whose immortal Atchievements have been sung by the greatest Poets, and often represented on the Stage. In fine, it was in this same heroic Age that those Games were instituted, and frequently by the Heroes themselves; those Games, I say, that have made Greece so famous; Games consecrated by Religion, and where the greatest Poets have reckoned it their Honour to celebrate those who had gained the Victory in them. This in general is the History of those fabulous Times, whereof I am to explain the several Parts in this Volume, assign their just Bounds, explain Fables that belong to them, so as to leave to the Heroes, whose History they have disguised, in Proportion as they embellished it, the just Share which they had in the Glory that has immortalized their Names.

C H A P. I.

Of the Chronology of the antient Greeks.

WE must not imagine that the antient Greeks had a very certain Way of computing Time, since they wanted one Branch of Knowledge essential to good Chronology, I mean the Knowledge of the Heavens and their Revolutions, which is absolutely necessary to that Study : 'Tis this Knowledge that enables to settle Periods and Cycles that serve to fix Time to certain Æras. They attained to it however at length, though very late, by the Commerce which they had with the Egyptians, and some People of Asia, whose Chronology was built on a certain Foundation. In the mean Time, as the most barbarous Nations have always had some Method of calculating Years, were it but by Knots cast upon Cords, as is the Manner of the Peruvians ; the first Greeks had also a Kind of Chronology of their own, less certain, 'tis true, than the technical Chronology which has been in Use for these many Ages past, yet far from being so gross as that of the People now named, which perhaps at Bottom only appeared so to the Spaniards, because they were not let into the Secret of it.

The Greeks then computed their Years, either by Means of several Games which they celebrated at set Times, such as the Pythian, the Olympic, the Isthmian Games, &c. or by the Priesthood of the Priestesses of Argos, or by Reigns ; but more generally, by Generations,

The Learned have great Disputes about the Duration of each Generation ; some extend it even to the Length of 50 Years ; but the greater Number confine it within the Space of between 27 and 33 Years. Herodotus reckons 33 Years to each Generation, or three to a hundred Years ; and to his Opinion, which is the most generally followed, I shall conform myself in the Sequel.

As for Reigns, they not being usually so long as Generations, nerations, we may fix them to 22 or 25 Years one with another, though some Authors, and among others Sir Isaac Newton, assign to them a shorter Duration.

I shall settle the most considerable Æras of this Period of Time, the first by the Arrival of the Colonies in Greece, and the rest by Generations. In the mean Time, to enable my Readers with more Facility to call to mind the several Events, I shall subjoin here two Tables; the one composed by a learned German (1), which giving a Duration of 1250 Years to the fabulous Age, distributes them into 25 Epochas, each consisting of 50 Years. The second, taken from different Passages of Dionysius Halicarnassens, beginning with Inachus, contains forty Generations of thirty Years each.

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. Egialeus , King of Sicyon , 2180 Years before Christ . | 14. Perseus . |
| 2. Telchines , second King of Sicyon . | 15. Jason and the Argonauts . |
| 3. Inachus , the first King of Argos . | 16. Theseus . |
| 4. Ogyges . | 17. The War of Troy . |
| 5. Apis . | 18. Orestes . |
| 6. Minos . | 19. The Return of the Heraclidae into Greece . |
| 7. Crius . | 20. Codrus the last King of Athens . |
| 8. Cecrops . | 21. Acastus , the Archon . |
| 9. Deucalion . | 22. Thersippus . |
| 10. Amphion . | 23. Thersites . |
| 11. Cadmus . | 24. Caranus . |
| 12. Pandion I. | 25. Corebus , or the Re-establishment of the Olympiads . |
| 13. Pelops , from Phrygia . | |

The Second Table.

- | | |
|---|-------------------------------------|
| 1. Inachus , the first King of Argos , the Son of the | Ocean , that is come by Sea. |
| | 2. Pho- |

(1) Lerquer in a Work intituled Ion.

2. Phoroneus, the first King of Peloponnesus.
3. Lycaon I.
4. Pelasgus I. the Son of Lycaon I. and Niobé the Daughter of Phoroneus.
5. Lycaon II. the Son of Pelasgus and Dejanira the Daughter of Lycaon I.
6. Oinotrus the Son of Lycaon II.
7. Pelasgus II. the Son of one of the Children of Lycaon II.
8. Larissa, the Daughter of Pelasgus II.
9. Pelasgus III. Achaius and Phtius, Sons of Larissa.
10. Phrastor, the Son of Pelasgus III. and of Menippe the Daughter of Peneus.
11. Amintor the Son of Phrastor.
12. Teutamides, the Son of Amintor.
13. Nanus, the Son of Teutamides.
14. Deucalion, the Son of Prometheus and Clymene.
15. Hellen, the Son of Deucalion.
16. Amphiſtion, the Son of Hellen.
17. Dardanus, the Son of Electra the Daughter of Atlas.
18. Erichthonius, the Son of Dardanus and Bateia the Daughter of Teucer.
19. Tros, the Son of Erichthonius, and Callirhoe, the Daughter of Scamander.
20. Assaracus, the Son of Tros, and Acalis the Daughter of Amedès.
21. Capys, the Son of Assaracus, and of Clytadora, Daughter of Laomedon.
22. Anchises, the Son of Capys and Nais.
23. Æneas, the Son of Anchises and Venus.
24. Ascanius, the Son of Æneas and Creusa, Priam's Daughter.
25. Sylvius Posthumus, the Son of Æneas and Lavinia, Latinus's Daughter.
26. Æneas II. the Son of Posthumus.
27. Latinus II.
28. Alba.
29. Capetus.
30. Capys II.
31. Capetus II.
32. Tyberinus, slain near the Tyber, so called after his Name.
33. Agrippa.
44. Alladius, a Tyrant, who was Thunderstruck.
35. Aventinus, from whom Mount Aventine was named.
35. Procas.
37. Amulius, who usurped the Kingdom from his Brother Numitor.
38. Numitor,

38. Numitor, re-instated by his Grandson Romulus. Numitor, Mother of Romulus.
 39. Ilia, the Daughter of of Rome.
 40. Romulus, the Founder of Rome.

This Table goes farther than the former, since it includes the List of the Latin Kings, and extends from Inachus to Romulus, who founded Rome in the Year 753 before Christ, and comprehends the whole fabulous Age in its greatest Extent; and as I also carry my Enquiries through the Successors of Æneas down to the same Epocha of the Foundation of Rome, this Table may be of good Use to those who would retain the Events I am to speak of. Only we must observe that all the Generations are not direct, but some of them collateral^(a); and that in this Table the Epochas are at thirty Years Distance from one another; which however will not hinder me from examining the Chronology still more exactly as I go along.

I was willing to set down these two Tables for the Sake of those who don't seek after great Precision in these Matters. For my own Part, in the Details which I shall sometimes be obliged to make, I shall follow the Method of Herodotus, who reckons three Generations to a hundred Years.

But in order to reconcile the Chronology of profane History to Scripture, 'tis fit we likewise subjoin here the principal Epochas thereof.

The first Epocha, Adam. It reaches down to the Deluge in the Year of the World 1656.

The second, Noah, or the Deluge: Containing the Space of 426 Years, that is to Abraham.

The third is Abraham, 1917 Years before Christ, and comprehends 430 Years to Moses.

The fourth is Moses, including the Space of 480 Years, to Solomon, or the Year before Christ 1483.

The fifth is Solomon, or the Building of the Temple of Jerusalem, containing 576 Years to the Babylonish Captivity, in the Year before Christ 1012.

The

^a (a) See the Dissertation of M. Boisvieux the Elder. Mém. de l'Acad. des Bell. Lett. Tom. II. p. 399.

The sixth is the Return of the Jews, in the Year before Christ 532, and reaches down to the Christian Æra.

C H A P. II.

The Duration of the Heroic Age.

BOOTH Antients and Moderns are equally agreed, that the Heroic or Fabulous Age reaches down from Ogyges to the Re-establishment of the Olympiads, when the Historical Age begins; but they are not so unanimous as to the Duration of this Period. Two Writers of the last Age, Conringius, and the celebrated Newton, have contracted it a great deal, and brought it nearer to the Vulgar Æra than it had been before by about 500 Years. Almost all other Authors assigned to it a much longer Duration, and made it consist of 1600 Years, reckoning 400 Years from Ogyges to Inachus, 400 from Inachus to Cecrops, nearly the same Space of Time from Cecrops to the taking of Troy, and somewhat more from that Epocha to the Re-establishment of the Olympiads. The Marbles of Paros, the most authentic Monument of antient Chronology, serve indeed for a Guide from the Olympiads tracing back to Cecrops, with whom the Authors of this Chronicle begin their Epochas; but as they go no higher, the Chronology from the Arrival of that Prince in Greece to Inachus, has always been perplexed and intricate. The late M. Boivin the elder, has given some Light to it, by restoring a Passage of Censorinus, as may be seen in his Dissertation printed in the Memoirs of the Academy of the Belles-Lettres (1). After the following Manner, according to that Academic, an Interval of 400 Years between Cecrops and Inachus may be settled; S. Justin, Tatian, and in general, all the Fathers of the Church before Eusebius, made Inachus Contemporary with Moses. Now Porphyry, as Eusebius understands him, supposed that Moses lived in the Time of Semiramis, whom the same Eusebius makes makes to have reigned 800 Years before the Trojan War: Inachus, Contemporary with Moses, lived therefore 800 Years before that Epocha, and consequently 400 Years before Cecrops, who, according to Censorinus, the Chronicle of Paros, and all the Chronologists, reigned 400 Years before the taking of that City. As to the 400 Years from Inachus to Ogyges, they are clearly made out from Censorinus. Here then is the Duration of the Heroic Age determined to 1600 Years. But how can so great Antiquity be assigned to Ogyges? The taking of Troy, which is the best established Epocha of all the fabulous Times, falls, according to the best Chronologists, in the Year 1183 or 1184 before the Christian Æra; if Ogyges was in the World 1200 Years before that Epocha, he must then have lived 2383 Years before Christ; and consequently, in the System of Chronology abridged, almost in the very Time of Noah's Deluge; which is not tenible, unless we make him to have been the same with that Patriarch, and the Deluge, which happened under his Reign to have been the same with that mentioned in Scripture.

(1) Tom. ii.

In the first Place then, I cut off from the Duration of the Age now in question, those 400 Years that make Ogyges to have lived even in the Time of Inachus, or of Phoroneus his Son.

Again, 'tis impossible to allow of a Space of 400 Years between Cecrops and the Trojan War, in which Minstheus the eleventh King of Athens assisted, who had even begun to reign but a few Years before. Now ten Reigns, and the Beginning of an eleventh, are far from containing so long a Space of Time, according to the ordinary Course of Nature. Reigns are even shorter than Generations. Thus there remain about 1200 Years for the fabulous Age; but as I find Fables end almost with the Return of the Heracidae into the Peloponnesus, that is, fourscore Years after the taking of Troy, and more than 300 Years before the Re-establishment of the Olympiads, I carry my Researches no farther than this Return. For though there are some Fictions

Fictions to be met with in the rest of this Period, they rather stand by themselves, and are not interwove with the Lives of the great Men who lived then; and the Explanation of them I reserve for the last Part of my Work.

In fine, the Number of Generations which the Antients have transmitted down to us, has obliged me to reduce to a shorter Duration, the Events of the Age that preceded the Destruction of Troy, I mean the Fight of the *Centaur*s, the Conquest of the *Argonaut*s, the Hunting of Calydon, the War which followed it, and the two Wars of Troy. For how can those Events be removed to so great a Distance from one another, as they are by most Chronologists, and particularly by the Commentators on the Parian Marbles, however knowing in other Respects, since it was mostly the same Persons or their Sons, and but few of their Grandsons who were the Actors therein? What other Method have we of calculating those remote Ages, but by the Number of Reigns and Generations, after the Example of the Antients themselves. It may perhaps be said, that the whole Number of Generations has not been transmitted down to us, and that several of them are wanting in Apollodorus, Diodorus, and other Antients; but as this is but mere Conjecture, I may be allowed to use the Manner of Computation followed by the Antients, till it be demonstrated, by any possible Means whatever, that some Reigns or Generations have actually been omitted.

C H A P. III.

The State of antient Greece.

THE Country which is known at this Day under the Name of Greece, had not always the same Extent as when it fell into the Hands of the Romans, and it very often changed its State: I leave other Things to be discussed by Geographers, being to consider in this Mythology only the State it was in during the Heroic Age. We are also to observe, that it often often changed its Name. The Hebrew Text of the Bible seems not to assign any Name to it; only Mention is there made of Javan. Isaiab says, according to the Hebrew, and towards Tubal and Javan, and in the remote Isles: The Vulgate has, in Italiam & Græciam, ad Insulas longe. In like Manner, it renders Javan by Greece, in Ezekiel, Daniel and Zechariah: The Hebrew throughout has Javan; but the Septuagint translates it by Hellas, which, as we shall see in its own Place, was one of the Names of Greece, or by Hellenes, one of the Names of the Greeks; and our Vulgate has imitated them, by rendering the Word always Græci or Græcia. 'Tis remarkable that the Name of Javan, in Hebrew, not having any Points to determine the Pronunciation, is the same with Ion; and we find the first Ionians that are known, were in Greece. There is even Reason to believe, that they were its first Inhabitants; tho' they were not there alone for any considerable Time. The Phœnicians, who had always been great Sailors, came thither and settled Colonies among them. For the Sake of their Commerce they taught the natural Greeks Navigation, Commerce, and especially Writing, the Invention whereof is ascribed to them. The Egyptians were not the last who helped to people that Country. They again communicated to them a Taste of Arts and Sciences; and infecting them with their Idolatry, gave them not only Kings, but Gods.

C H A P. IV.

Of the first Inhabitants of Greece.

IT must be owned, in the first Place, that as nothing is more perplexed than the Origin of antient Nations, we are not to be surprized if we meet with the same Obscurity in the antient History of the Greeks. We ought not to appeal to the Authors of that Nation for their Antiquity; for besides that we have not now most of the Works of those who would have been able to inform us herein, and those now extant are mere Moderns

Moderns with respect to the Facts which they relate ; it is every where to be observed in their Books, that being disposed in their Histories to gratify the Humour of Greece, always fond of the Marvellous ; and having only undigested Memoirs of those early Times, they have contented themselves with putting them into an agreeable Order, without being greatly concerned about the Truth. Further, the Greeks were really ignorant of the Antiquities of their own Nation, as they are reproached by several Authors, among others, by Aristotle, and Josephus, who in his first Book against Appion, demonstrates to them plainly, that it was very late before they had the Use of Letters, and that consequently they must have been quite ignorant of antient History : And what is carefully to be observed, the Jewish Historian reproaches them thus, at the very Time when they had several Authors which are since lost, and who pretended to be well acquainted with Antiquity, such as Varro, Castor, Nicolas of Damas, Julius Africanus, Trogus Pompeius, and Numbers of others, often quoted by the Historians now extant, as Authors very knowing in earliest Antiquity.

Again, what undeniably proves the Ignorance of the Greeks as to their own Original, is, that so soon as they carried their Researches pretty far back, finding themselves lost in the Darkeness of earlier Ages, they were forced to say their Ancestors had sprung from the Earth, or from the Oaks of the Forest of Dodona ; and when they attempted to trace out their Genealogies, after having gone back to Deucalion, still Jupiter, or some other God was at their Head. What obliged them to assume the Name of Autochthones, or the original Inhabitants of that Country, was, that they piqued themselves on great Antiquity, and scorned to be thought descended from any People. They carried their Vanity so far as to be fond of having it believed that their Ancestors were the Founders of other Nations, which they had peopled by their Colonies ; whereas 'tis beyond Doubt, that their Country was originally planted by Foreigners, who came and settled there.

there. However, if we will believe them, the Perfians were descended from Perfeus, the Lydians from Lydus, the Medes from Medus, Medea's Son, the Cilicians from Cilix, the Armenians from Armenus, and the Ionians of Asia Minor, not to mention others, from Ion the Son of Xutus, and Grand-Son of Deucalion. 'Tis true, Greece sent Colonies into Asia and Italy (a), but thofe Transmigrations happened very late, and when the Country was overftocked with Inhabitants by the frequent Colonies that had arrived there from Egypt and Pbænicia.

But to trace this Matter up to its Source ; firft, 'tis not to be doubted that all the Countries of the World were peopled by the Descendants of Noah, who, after the Division of his three Sons, fettled in different Places. As the Bible fays little or nothing of thofe firft Founders of Empires, and as it often calls the Countries where the firft Men who lived after the Deluge fixed their Residence by Names which have long fince been extinct, 'tis very difficult to clear up this Subject ; infomuch that whatever Pains the Interpreters of Scripture have taken, we may affirm that the tenth Chapter of Genesis, containing the History of the firft Settlement of Nations by Noah's Pofterity, will always be a ftumbling Block to the Learned. Josephus fays little more upon this Head than Mofes ; and as to the oriental Hiftorians, befides that we have now but fome Fragments of the more antient ones, thofe that remain are generally ftuffed with Fables.

What we know with Certainty is, that Javan the Son of Japhet, known to the Greeks under the Name of Japetus, had the Weft for his Division. This is what Mofes fays of him ; Filii Japhet Gomer & Magog & Javan, &c. Filii autem Javan, Elisa, & Tarfes, & Cethim, & Dodanim. Ab iis divifæ funt Infulæ Gentium, in regionibus fuis (1). Him therefore we are to look upon as the Father of the Ionians and other Greeks.

(a) See Herodotus and the other Hiftorians who fpeak of thefe Colonies.

(1) Genesis, c. 10.

Greeks. Few Authors now-a-days call this Truth in question, which has been so fully proved by the learned Bochart (1), and Father Kirker (2), that we may now build upon it as a Certainty. The Text of Josephus says also the same Thing in so many Words. From Javan, says that Author, came the Ionians and all the Greeks (3). That antient Patriarch therefore led his Colony into the West, and we cannot but place the Æra of that Transmigration after the Dispersion that ensued upon the Confusion of Babel. 'Tis no easy Matter indeed to determine precisely in what Country of the West Javan fixed his Residence. Loerquer, in a Book composed upon this Subject, intituled Ion, contends that he did not cross the Sea, but settled in Asia Minor, whence his Descendants went into Greece, probably by the Thracian Bosphorus, as the Place where the Sea is narrowest. This Author adds, that the Ionians, so well known upon the Asiatic Coasts of the Egean Sea, are not descended from Ion the Son of Xutus, and Grandson of Deucalion, but from Javan, from whom they were denominated Jaonians, as well as the Greeks of Europe, Ἰαῶνες, as it is in Homer (4), and by softening the Pronunciation, Ionians. 'Tis true, in the Time of Herodotus, the Name of Ionians was restricted to the Asiatic Greeks alone, insomuch that the Athenians and their Neighbours would not go under that Name. It cannot however be denied, after the Testimony of Homer, Strabo, and Hesychius, that antiently it was common to all the People of Greece.

'Tis therefore in that Country we must look for the Settlement of Javan. Elisha led his Posterity into Elis; Dodanim settled in the Neighbourhood of the Forest of Dodona; Cethim passed into Macedonia: For I reckon Bochart is mistaken in making that Patriarch to have settled in Italy. Tharses fixed his Residence in Cilicia, where he founded the City of Tarsus. Thiras chose to reside in Thrace, as Josephus, and after him St. Jerom,

(1) See his Phaleg. (2) In his Tower of Babel. (3) Ant. l. 1.
(4) Iliad. l. 13.

St. Jerom, and almost all the Interpreters, are agreed.

These, without Doubt, are the first Inhabitants of Greece; here we find the Japetus so famed in the Historians and Poets, who had but a very confused Knowledge of this first Transmigration.

The Pelasgi were, according to them, the original Inhabitants of Greece, and it cannot indeed be denied that they possessed it from the earliest Ages. Herodotus (1), as has been already remarked in the Beginning of the second Volume, makes them to have come from the Island of Samothrace, whence they set out and settled at first in Attica; and this perhaps is the best we have to say upon the Subject. However, as several other Authors have made Mention of those Pelasgi, I ought to quote their Testimonies. They tell us therefore, that those People, who often moved their Habitation, were denominated Pelasgi, because they were an unsettled wandering People. Accordingly we find of them every where, in the Isle of Samothrace, in several Parts of Greece, in Asia Minor, and lastly in Italy. They went at first from Athens towards Dodona, as we are told by Herodotus in the Place I have quoted (2). They possessed themselves of Arcadia, and Hemonia since called Thessaly. First the Curetes and the Leleges, and then Deucalion, having driven them out thence, they spread themselves through Estiotis, Phocis, Beotia, and Eubæa. Some of them passed over into Asia, others into Italy; as to which you may consult Strabo and Dionysius of Halicarnassæus.

The Historians who are later than Herodotus, whose Information doubtless is not so good as his, differ from him as to the Original of the Pelasgi, in making them to have come from a foreign Country: They, on the contrary, take them to have been Autochthones (3); which was the Designation given to the Natives of the Country, or rather to all whose Original was unknown. But the Variety which is to be found among other Authors as to the Original of this People, is an Argument for

(1) L. 2. c. 50, 51. (2) See what has been said of this in the Beginning of the second Volume. (3) Hesiod.

for our adhering to the Historian now named. For why, if we take Apollodorus's Authority, we must say, the Pelasgi derived their Name from one Pelasgus of great Antiquity. Servius is of the same Opinion with Apollodorus (1): Pelasgi, says he, a Pelasgo terræ filio, qui in Arcadia est genitus, ut ait Hesiodus. Eschiles says only, that Pelasgus was an antient Inhabitant of the Country, to whom he gives not the Name of Autochthon, but that of Παλαίχθον. The antient Scholiast on Apollodorus Rhodius, a Man well skilled in the Antiquities of Greece, makes Pelasgus to have been the Son of Inachus; and this is he who, according to Hesiod, was the Father of Lycaon, King of Arcadia. Eustathius, after Hellenicus, names a third Pelasgus, the Son of Phoroneus, and consequently the Grandson of Inachus. There is a fourth, the Son of Jupiter and Niobe, the first Mistress of that God, as we learn from Acusilaus, whose Testimony is quoted by Tzetzes (2). Hesychius (3) mentions a fifth, the Son of Arcas, and Grandson of Lycaon. We read of another, who was the Son of Asopus and Merope (4). Lastly, Dionysius of Halicarnassus names a Seventh, whom he makes the Son of Neptune.

According to Pausanias (5), Pelasgus was the first Man who appeared in the Country, a Man extraordinarily endued by Heaven, who surpassed others in Make and Strength, in a goodly Aspect, and in all other Qualifications both of Body and Mind; which comes much to the same Idea given of him by the Poet Asius.

Pelasgus then having begun to reign, taught the Arcadians to build themselves Cottages to shelter them from the Rain, from Cold and Heat, in a Word from the Injuries of the Weather. He taught them also to cloath themselves with Boar's Skins, as is still the Manner of the Peasants of Phocis and Eubœa. Till then they had lived upon the Leaves of Trees, upon Herbs and Roots; whereof some, instead of being good for

VOL. III.

A a

Food,

(1) On the second Eneid. (2) Upon Lycoph. v. 177. (3) In Πελασγαί. (4) Pindar. Olym. (5) In Arcad.

Food were of a pernicious Nature. He recommended to them the Use of Accorns, or rather of a Kind of Fruit which grows upon the Beech-tree ; and this Food became so common, that long after Pelasgus, the Lacedemonians coming to consult the Priests Apollo, about the War which they were going to make upon the Arcadians, were answered, that a People who lived only upon Accorns, were terrible in War and not easily conquered.

We are told that Pelasgus gave his Name to that Country, and that it was denominated Pelsgia. His Son Lycaon, in some respects, was more wise and prudent ; for he built the City Lykosura upon Mount Lycaeus, established the Worship of Jupiter under the Name of Lycean, and instituted in his Honour Games that were called Lycaia.

Scarcely had three Generations passed from Pelasgus, says Pausanias, when the Country was already well stocked with Men and Cities. Nyctimus, the eldest of Lycaon's Sons, had succeeded his Father ; his other Sons having separated from one another, built Cities, some in one Place, some in another. Pallantium was built by Pallas, Oresthasium by Orestheus, Phigalia by Phigalus. The Poet of Himera, Stesichorus, makes Mention of Pallantium in his Geryon Jupiter. As for Oresthasium, it was afterwards called Orestea, from Orestes the Son of Agamemnon. Phigalia in like Manner was named Phialia, from Phialus the Son of Bucolion. The other Sons of Lycaon were Trapezeus, Deceartes, Mucareus, Helisson, Acacus, and Tochnus. This last built the City Tochnia, and Acacus was the Founder of Acacesium. Orchomenus built Methydrion, and was the Father of the Orchomenians, a People so rich in Cattle that Homer distinguishes them by that Epithet. Hypsus laid the Foundations of Melenæa, Hypsus, and Thyræa, which still subsists. If we may believe the Arcadians, Thyræa a City of Argos had for its Founder Thyreas, who also gave his Name to the Gulf upon which it stands. Mantineæ, Tegæa, and Menæus, those Cities once so famous in Arcadia, owe their their Original to Menalus, Tegeas, and Mantineus, who were likewise Sons of Lycaon. Crömes was built by Eromus, Charisia by Charisius. The Tricolons come from Tricolonus; the Peretbeans from Peretbus; the Azeans from Azeates; the Lyceates from Lyceus; the Sumatians from Sumateus; lastly, Hereus and Aliphorus built the Cities which bear their Names. As for Oenothrus, the youngest of Lycaon's Sons, he planted a Colony in Italy.

Nyctimus being dead, Arcas the Son of Calisto Lycaon's only Daughter, the same who was beloved by Jupiter, and transformed first into a Bear, then into a Constellation, took Possession of the Kingdom. Having been instructed by Triptolemus, he taught his Subjects to sow Corn, to make Bread, and to spin Wool for Stuffs and Cloaths, which last he learned from Aristæus. Arcas had by his Wife Erato three Sons, Azan, Aphidas, and Elatius, among whom he divided his Dominions. But Elatius left Arcadia, passed into the Country which at this Day is called Phocis, and there built the City Elatæa. This Prince had five Sons, Epytus, Peræus, Cyllen, Ischis, and Stymphalus. Upon Occasion of Azan's Death, funeral Games were celebrated for the first Time; it is at least certain, that Horse-Races were there; but what were the other Sort of Games, says Pausanias, I know not.

Clitor fixed his Residence at Lycosura; he was one of the most powerful Kings of his Time, and he built a City called after the Name of its Founder. Aleus took Possession of the Lands that had fallen to his Lot. As for the Sons of Elatius, Cyllen gave his Name to Mount Cyllene, and Stymphalus gave his not only to a Fountain of that Country, but also to a City which he built hard by.

The Kingdom of Arcadia devolved upon Epytus, the Nephew of Clitor, who died without Issue; and he himself was killed by the Bite of a Serpent. Aleus succeeded him, and built the Temple of Minerva Alea in the City of Tegæa, which was the Capital of his Empire. After the Death of Aleus, Lycurgus ascended the Throne. His Son was Ancæus, who distinguished himself in the Conquest of the Golden Fleece, and in the Hunting of Calydon, in which he perished. Lycurgus having lost his Son, was succeeded by Echemus, under whose Conduct the Acbeans gained a signal Victory near the Isthmus of Corinth. Agapenor, Son to Ancæus, who ascended the Throne after him, commanded the Arcadian Troops at the Siege of Troy. After the Destruction of that famous City, he was driven by Stress of Weather upon the Coasts of Cyprus, where he settled.

These, according to Pausanias, were the first Inhabitants of Greece, especially of Arcadia; but that Country soon put on a new Face, by means of the Colonies that arrived there from Egypt and Phœnicia.

C H A P. V.

The History of the first Kingdoms founded in Greece, by the Colonies that arrived there.

AS the large and beautiful Country of Greece had not been sufficiently peopled by Javan's Posterity, and by the antient Pelasgi, several Colonies came thither at different Times, especially from Egypt and Phœnicia, which Countries being nearer to those where the first Descendants of Noah settled, were also more populous. The first and at the same Time the most necessary Arts of Life, which Noah had either preserved or invented, and which are always to be found in Countries where was the first Settlement of Mankind after the Deluge, were lost in Proportion as Men removed to a greater Distance; and thus they who knew them had to teach them anew to those among whom they settled. Accordingly they gradually revived in the West with the Arrival of the Colonies; who together with Arts and Sciences introduced thither their Customs, Laws, and Religion. Idolatry reigned at that Time in Greece, but it was so very gross, that the very Names of the Gods whom they worshipped were unknown, unknown (1). Thus the first Inhabitants of Greece, made no Scruple to adopt the Divinities of the Ori-entals, to whom they were indebted for their Politeness, and the civilized Life which they led afterwards.

Among those Leaders of Colonies, the most noted are Inachus, Cecrops, Deucalion, Cadmus, Danaus, Pelops, and some others: Of these several Colonies were formed the Kingdoms of Sicyon, Argos, Athens, Thebes, and the rest. The History of these several States, and the Explanation of the Fables that are intermingled with it, shall be the Subject of so many separate Articles.

A R T I C L E I.

The Kingdom of Argos founded by Inachus.

The Beginnings of the Kingdom of Argos are somewhat confused. Inachus, who came from Phœnicia, arrived in Greece about the Year 1880 before Christ, where he founded that Kingdom, and settled in the Country, since called the Peloponnesus. This Epoch tallies to the System of Dionysius Halicarnassæus, who had himself followed that of Eratosthenes. This Author reckoned twenty-two Generations between that Leader of the Colony and the Destruction of Troy. Of those twenty-two Generations there were twelve to Nanus, contemporary with Cecrops, which make just the four hundred Years they reckoned between these two Princes. Moses was contemporary with Inachus, and not with Cecrops, as Eusebius would have it, having for that Effect abridged the Times, and departed from Africanus, Josephus, Philo, and Polybistor, Ptolemy of Mendes, and many other Authors, as Father Pexron has fully proved in his Book of The Antiquity of Time restored (2); and this is a Truth controverted by few of the Learned at this Day. I refer to the Author now quoted for the Arguments in Support of this Opinion, though to speak the Truth, I don't believe that Period to be so long; but there is no Danger in following the Opinion of the two Antients now named.

A a 3

The

(1) See the Beginning of the second Volume. (2) Ch. 8 and 9.

The Learned are not much satisfied with the Researches of the Greeks, who not knowing whence that antient Prince came, gave out that he was the Son of Oceanus and Tethys, the common Genealogy of those who came by Sea ; and several Moderns have puzzled themselves to unfold the Original of that antient King. Some will have him to have come from Egypt ; others make him the same with the famous Anak, or rather one of his Posterity. But M. le Clerc, after Bochart (1), maintains, with more Reason, that Inachus is not a proper Name, but an Appellative. The antient Phœnicians were called Ben-Anak ; thus the Son of Anak was a Name, given to those who came from that Country and settled elsewhere ; and of that Name was formed Inak or Inachus, the Appellation given to the Leader of the Colony. For the same Reason did the Greeks give the Name of Anaces to their antient Divinities, of whom they had the Knowledge and Worship from Phœnicia, and with a small Variation to their antient Kings. Farther, it was given out afterwards, that this Inachus was the God of a River, only because he communicated his Name to the River Amphilochus, for which he made a Channel be dug ; and after his Death, they fabled, according to the Custom of those Times, that he was become the tutelar Divinity of that River.

The Kingdom of Argos, founded by Inachus, enjoyed a long Succession of Kings : The nine first were called Inachides, namely Inachus, Phoroneus, Apis, Argus, Chryseus, Phorbas, Triopas, Stelenus and Gelanor ; the last was not long in Possession of the Crown, which was taken from him in the Manner I shall relate, after having spoke of the Kings of Sicyon.

A R T I C L E II.

The Kingdom of Sicyon, founded by Egialeus.

There is no small Uncertainty and Obscurity in the antient History of Sicyon. This City was
in

(1) Phaleg. l. i. c. i.

in the Peloponnesus, upon a Mountain in the Neighbourhood of the Gulf of Corinth. Pausanias has left us a Catalogue of those Kings, which precedes those of Argos by 200 Years. Eusebius and Syncellus have preserved that of Castor the Historian, but not so full as that of Pausanias. Authors justly remark, that those Princes are fictitious, and never had a real Existence, and the rather, that their Reigns don't agree with those of the Kings of Argos, whose History is attested in a quite other Manner by the Antients; This is what led Marsham, so well skilled in the Knowledge of Antiquity, to reject most of those Princes (1). The chief Arguments he builds upon are the following.

1. Egialeus, according to Apollodorus (2), is the Son of Inachus, and Brother of Phoroneus, which undoubtedly is the Opinion we ought to follow. However, the two Lists of those antient Kings now remaining, place him at the Head of those of Sicyon, and consequently, make him live 200 Years before his Father.

2. The nineteenth King of that Dynasty, we are told, gave his Name to the City; but according to Pausanias, this was Pelops, who did not live till long after that City had got the Name of Sicyon.

3. Polyphilus, the twenty-fourth of those Kings, lived, if we may believe some antient Authors, at the Time of the taking of Troy. Yet he is unknown to all the Authors who have given Account of the Siege of that City; and Homer says expressly, that Adrastus was the first King of Sicyon.

4. In the Enumeration which that Poet makes of the Captains who led Troops to Troy, no Mention is made of the Sicyonians; which proves that City to have been then subject to Agamemnon King of Mycenæ.

To these Arguments we may add, that the Proofs which we bring afterwards, quite overthrow the Pretensions of the Sicyonians. For how shall we reconcile what the Antients say of the Antiquity of Argos with these Pretensions of theirs? Pliny tells us, upon the

A a 4. Autho-

(1) Can. Chron. (2) L. 3.

Authority of Anticlides, that Phoroneus, King of Argos, is the most antient King of Greece. Clemens Alexandrinus says the same, upon the Testimony of Acesilaus, and he adds that Phoroneus was even the first Man. Plato, in his Timæus, knows nothing in the Greek History prior to that Prince ; and Syncellus, from these Authorities, thinks that History ought to begin with Inachus, the Father of Phoroneus. These are the Arguments of Marsham, who could not even believe that Inachus was a Man, but a River.

M. le Clerc, and some other Authors, add to these Arguments, that the Name of Egialeus, which Eusebius, after Castor, puts at the Head of the Kings of Sicyon, appears to be fictitious. And indeed Egialeus imports one who inhabits upon the Coast, Littoralis ; for which Conjecture, Herodotus furnishes these Authors with a Handle (1). The Ionians, says he, who inhabited the Peloponnesus before Ion the Son of Xutus, were called Pelasgian Egialei : Whence that Historian would seem to distinguish two Sorts of Pelasgians in the Peloponnesus, those who dwelt upon the Sea-coast, and those who inhabited the Inland Country, towards Mount Cyllene, where Pelasgus, according to the Testimony of Asius in Pausanias (2), had settled.

Notwithstanding these Authorities and Arguments, we may still adhere to the Authority of Eusebius and Cedrenus, who have adopted the List of those Kings given by Castor the Historian ; for though the Word Egialeus signifies an Inhabitant of the Sea-coasts, and though this were not the true Name of the first King of Sicyon, yet he might nevertheless be a real King, and one of the Sons of Inachus, who had got that Appellation to denote that he had left Argolis, which extended as far as the Sea, and established a new Kingdom near the Gulf of Corinth, in a Place at some Distance from that which he had left. However, I shall not set down that Canon here ; for what would be the Use of giving a List of Kings almost unknown, and of whom we have hardly any Account in History ?
It

(1) L. 7. (2) In Arc.

It suffices to know, that according to Scaliger (1), the two Dynasties of the Princes of Sicyon, that of the Kings, who are in all 26, and that of the Priests of Carnean Apollo, to the Number of 17, lasted 893 Years, or, according to M. Fourmond (2), 992 ; that the Kingdom of Sicyon commenced 1351 Years before the first Olympiad, 927 Years before the Trojan War, about 2000 Years before the Christian Æra ; more Exactness is not here necessary. I refer the Reader to the Author of the Critical Reflections whom I have already quoted. As to Pausanias, what he says of these Kings being more full and instructive, I think proper to give it a Place here.

“ As for the Sicyonians, says he (3), this is the Ac“ count which they give us of their Original. Egi- “ aleus, say they, a Native of their own Country, was “ their first King ; under whose Reign, that Part of “ the Peloponnesus which is called at this Day Egiale, “ got its present Denomination. In that Country,
 “ he built in the open Field the City Egialea, with a “ Citadel which covered all the Ground whereon the “ Temple of Minerva now stands. Egialeus was the “ Father of Europs, of whom was born Telckis, whose “ Son was Apis. This last became so powerful, be“ fore the Arrival of Pelops at Olympia, that all the “ Country comprehended in the Isthmus, was called “ from him Apia. The Descendants of Apis were “ Talxion his Son, Egyrus the Son of Talxion, Thuri- “ machus the Son of Egyrus, and Leucippus the Son of “ Thurimachus. Leucippus had but one Daughter, “ whose Name was Chalcinia, who bore a Son to “ Neptune. Leucippus took Care of this Son, and up-
 “ on his Death bequeathed the Kingdom to him.
 “ The Name of this Son was Peratus, and he was the “ Father of Plemnea, of whom ’tis reported that when “ she could not bring up a Child, Ceres in Disguise “ offered herself to nurse the young Orthopolis. Or-“ thopolis

(1) Doctr. Temp. (2) Ref. Crit. T. 2. p. 267. (3) In Corinth. c. 5 & 6, according to the Translation of the Abbé Gedouin, D. 1. p. 156.

“ ibopolis had a Daughter named Chrysorta, who had
 “ by Apollo, Coronus; to him were born Corax and “ Lamedon.

“ Corax having died without Issue, Epopeus from “ Thessaly possessed himself of the Kingdom, and it “ was under his Reign that an Army of Foreigners, “ entered for the first Time into the Country.”

Pausanias relates the Cause of this War, which was kindled upon Account of Antiope; but not to interrupt the Succession of these Kings, we shall reserve the History thereof for the Article of that Princess.

“ After the Death of Corax, continues Pausanias, “ Lamedon his Brother ascended the Throne, and mar“ ried Pheno the Daughter of Clytus the Athenian.
 “ Being attacked by two powerful Enemies, he in“ vited Sicyon from Athens, on whom he bestowed his “ Daughter Zeuxippe in Marriage. Sicyon, after the “ Death of his Father-in-law, took Possession of the “ Kingdom, changed the Name both of the City and “ Country, which from that Time was denominated “ Sicyon. This Prince left a Daughter called Ctono- “ phyle, who had two Sons, Polybus and Andromas.
 “ It was under the Reign of the former of these “ two Princes, that Adrastus, banished Argos, fled
 “ for Refuge to Sicyon, and reigned there after him.
 “ But being recalled home, he left the Crown to Jā- “ niscus, the Grandson of that Clytus, who had given “ his Daughter to Lamedon, as has been said. He “ again had for his Successor Phestus, who having “ gone over into Crete, was succeeded by Zeuxippe.
 “ After her Hippolytus, the Grandson of Phestus, ascended
 “ the Throne. Agamemnon declared War upon him, “ and reduced him to Terms of Submission. He was “ succeeded by his Son Lacestades: It was under his “ Reign that Phalces, the Son of Terminus, at the “ Head of a Troop of Dorians, made himself Master “ of the City of Sicyon, and shared the Kingdom
 “ with the lawful Prince. From that Time the Si- “ cyonians were united with the Dorians, and began
 “ to make a Part of the Kingdom of Argos.”

This,

This, to be sure, is a very circumstantiated History, which Pausanias had learned in the Country itself. I was willing, however, before I cited it, to enable the Reader to judge of it, by setting forth the Arguments of the Learned, who combat its Truth. If it be asked whence came this Egialeus, whose Original is not given, we may answer that he came from some Country of Phœnicia, as Inachus, or from Egypt, as Danaus, of whom we shall speak in the following Article.

ARTICLE III.

The Arrival of Danaus in Greece.

The happy Success of Cecrops's Colony, probably induced Danaus, who was an Egyptian as well as he, likewise to attempt a Settlement in the same Country. Being forced to quit Egypt, he fitted out a Ship wherein he embarked his fifty Daughters, whom he had by several Wives, with all his Domesticks, and some Egyptians who were willing to accompany him. He stop'd first in the Island of Rhodes, where after having consecrated a Statue to Minerva, one of the great Divinities of Egypt, in Gratitude for his Successful Voyage, he re-embarked and arrived in Greece.

Gelanor, who had lately ascended the Throne of Argos, received the Stranger with Courtesy, which very soon became fatal to himself. The Beginning of Gelanor's Reign was full of Broils; of these Danaus took Advantage, and having made a considerable Party, dethroned his Benefactor, put a Period to the Reign of the Inachides, and became the Head of those who were called Belides.

His Brother's Sons, who were also fifty in Number, having got Information of their Uncle, embarked to go in quest of him, with a Design to marry their Cousins, and to make Settlements in that Part of Greece where Danaus reigned; but that Prince, who took Umbrage at every Thing, and was in continual Dread of being dispossessed of the Crown which he had usurped, having received them with all the Marks of sincere Friendship, and given them his Daughters in Marriage, being alarmed with the Response of an Oracle, which foretold that he was to be dethroned by one of his Sons-in-law, enjoined his Daughters to kill their Husbands the first Night of their Marriage; and all of them obeyed him but Hypermnestra, who saved her Husband Lynceus. Danaus hearing of this Disobedience of his Daughter, intended to punish her; but coming to himself at last, he acknowledged Lynceus for his Son-in-law and Heir; thus having died after a long Reign, Lynceus ascended the Throne, which he possessed for forty Years; and had for his Successors Abas, Prætus, and Acrisius, who left an only Daughter named Danaë, of whom was born Perseus, who had the Misfortune to kill his Grandfather, as shall be fully said in the History of this Heroe; for here we do but transiently touch upon the principal Æra. Perseus being guilty of this involuntary Murder, was forced to fly his Country, and to exchange his Dominions for those of Megapenthes his Cousin, King of Tyrinthia.
in

Thus the Kingdom of Argos lost the greatest Part of its Glory, and the rest of her Kings are little known until Eibeocles, the last of that Race, who died at the Siege of Troy. We find however one Bias, King of Argos, who by his Death left the Crown to his Son Talaus, from whom it devolved upon Adrastus, who, according to Pausanias, being dethroned, retired to Sicyon, and became the first King thereof, as we read in Homer; for this Poet seems to have known nothing about those fabulous Kings, as Egialeus, and others whom we find in the List of Kings of that City.

Perseus, grown sick of his Residence at Tyrinthia, removed to Mycenæ, and had also several Successors, who are as little known as those of the Kingdom of Argos, down to Euristheus the Rival of Hercules, and the last King of that Line, who died without Issue in the War which he had with the Heracliidæ. When that Prince set out from Mycenæ for that Expedition, he left the Administration of his Kingdom to Atreus the Son of Pelops, who became Master thereof after him.

him. He was succeeded by Agamemnon, who was slain upon his Return from Troy, as shall be said afterwards (a).

Orestes next ascended the Throne, and put a Period to the Kingdom of Mycenæ. We have an Account however of some of Orestes's Successors; but their History is so uncertain, and their Reigns so short (b), that they have hardly a Place given them among the Kings of the Peloponnesus. The Heracidae, fourscore Years after the Destruction of Troy, re-entred into that Part of Greece, where they quite changed the Face of Things, and held it in their Possession for a considerable Time.

We may add, that to Alceus the Son of Perseus were born Amphitryo and his Sister Anaxo, who by her Husband Electrion had Alcmena, who married her Uncle Amphitryo, the Father of Hercules. Of Mestor, the other Son of Perseus, and Siffidea his Wife, was born Hypotboos the Father of Taphius, who dwelt in a City of Cephalonia, which he called Taphos after his own Name. After his Death Electrion invaded his Part of the Kingdom of Mycenæ, and his Sons coming to resume their Right, there ensued a Scuffle upon that Occasion, wherein they slew the Sons of Electrion, who gave Alcmena to Amphitryo, on condition that he would revenge their Death; but he having had the Misfortune to kill Electrion himself, was banished Mycenæ by Sthenelus, and retired to Thebes. There Hercules was born, who by this Means became a Subject of Euristheus the Son of Sthenelus, whose Kingdom belonged to him, the Race of Perseus being extinct by the Death of that Prince.

It will not be foreign to the Purpose, before I close this Article, to explain a Fable which we have in Pausanias with relation to Inachus (1). “The Greeks gave “ out,

(a) Several of the Antients put Plisthenes between Atræus and Agamemnon, and even make the Latter to have been his Son.

(b) And indeed if Orestes reigned 70 Years, as we are told, there would remain but 10 for his Successors, for the Year of the Entrance of the Heracidae into Peloponnesus is fixed.

(1) In Corinth.

“ out; says that Author, that Inachus, the King of “ the Country, derived his Name from a River which “ he consecrated to Juno. This River had a Son nam“ ed Phoroneus, who, with three other Rivers, Cephi- “ sus, Asterion, and Inachus, his own Father, was Ar“ biter in the Controversy between Neptune and Juno, “ to determine which of the two had a Claim of “ Right to that Country. The Plea was decided in “ Favour of Juno. This Neptune highly resented, and “ in Revenge drained all those Rivers, by which Means “ neither the River Inachus, nor the other two could “ yield any Water, except in the Season when there is “ great Plenty of Rain.” This Fiction, making Allowance for the Marvellous, imports, 1. That Inachus got the better of the Inhabitants of Cephesus and Aste- rior, in consecrating to Juno the Ground which was watered by those Rivers, which was before sacred to Neptune; for thus we are to understand all those Controversies of the Gods which Pausanias speaks of (1). 2. That the pretended Revenge of Neptune had no other Foundation but that those Rivers happen in Reality to be only small Brooks, that are dry almost the whole Year.

As whatever relates to Genealogies is usually obscure, to help the Memory of Readers, I here subjoin a Table compiled by the learned and exact Father Briet, and inserted in his Parallels (2), which will shew at one Glance of the Eye the whole Posterity of Inachus and Danaus.

(1) See the Article of Minerva, Vol. II. B. 1. (2) Tom. I.

The POSTERITY of INACHUS, King of ARGOS.

INACHUS, Founder of the Kingdom of Argos.

Io or Isis
had by Jupiter

Epaphus
King of Egypt

Libya had by Neptune

BELUS.

DANAUS
had thirty Daughters whereof twenty-nine flew their Husbands.

ÆGYPTUS
had thirty Sons whereof twenty-nine were slain by their Wives.

HYPER-MNESTRA.

Abas

ACRISIUS
PROETUS

DANAE
TALAUS

PERSEUS
ADRASTUS

Lynceus was saved alone by his Wife Hypermnestra.

AGENOR.

CADMUS.
PHOENIX.
CILIX.
EUROPA.

Phoroneus

Cares.
Niobe
who had by Jupiter

Pelasgus

LYCAON
King of Arcadia

Fifty Sons who were all slain except Nyctimus.

Calisto
who had by Jupiter

ARCAS

Aphidas
LYCURGUS
CEPHEUS
STENOBEA
the Wife of Prætus

AMPHI-DAMAS, ANCEUS, EPOCHUS, IDÆUS,

Melanion who had by Atalanta

Parthenopæus one of the 7 Chiefs before Thebes.

Elatni

While Phoroneus, the Successor of Inachus, was in Possession of the Throne of Argos, Ogyges governed Attica, and a Part of Beotia. Under his Reign happened the Inundation known since by the Name of Ogyges's Deluge.

ARTICLE IV.

The Deluge of Ogygès.

Nothing in the Antiquities of Greece is more obscure than the History of Ogyges, and of the Deluge which happened in his Time. Here are three Questions not in our Power sufficiently to answer : Whether this Prince was a Native of Greece or a Foreigner ; at what Time he lived ; and what Deluge it is that happened under his Reign. The Greek Historians tell us, that Ogyges reigned in Attica and Beotia, while Phoroneus, the Son of Inachus, governed Argolis, and that it was in his Time the Deluge happened which goes under his Name, whereof Censorinus fixes the Date about the Year 1200 before the Trojan War : But they quote no Authority in Proof of these Facts. The Parian Marbles say nothing of it, and that famous Chronicle begins only with the Arrival of Cecrops in Greece. There is as little Certainty in what the Antients say of the Deluge that happened under his Reign. Strabo alledges, it was owing to the overflowing of the River Colpias ; as if the Waters of that River could have swelled so high as to deluge Beotia and Attica. We may say with more Probability, that as Beotia is a Country environed with Mountains, the Middle thereof being a Valley, there was formed in this Valley a Lake, which had no Outlet but by Canals under Ground provided there by Nature, through which the Waters discharged themselves across Mount Pious ; and that these Canals having been choaked up by the falling down of the neighbouring Lands, the Waters which came thither from the adjacent Mountains, and which perhaps were encreased by great Falls of Rain, or by the melting of the Snows, which considerably swelled the River Colpias, flowed back upon the neighbouring Fields and laid them under Water. This

This I take to have been the most probable Cause of that Deluge ; and the curious Wæler, who in his Travels through Greece had occasion to examine that Lake and its Outlets, agrees that it could not possibly have happened any other Way.

S. Augustine, who in his Book de Civ. Dei has preserved to us valuable Fragments upon the Greek Antiquities, says, the Deluge of Ogyges happened, as has been said, under the Reign of Phoroneus the second King of Argos ; and he adds, that this was the Opinion of Eusebius and S. Jerome. Orosius places this Deluge 1040 Years before the Foundation of Rome, near 2000 Years before the Christian Æra ; but Scaliger thinks they are both in an Error.

I shall not quote here the Opinion of Sir Isaac Newton : That celebrated Author, we know, has greatly contracted the Antiquities of Greece, by placing the Date of this Deluge in the Year 1045 before our Vulgar Æra.

Julius Africanus, upon the Authority of Hellanicus, Philochorus, Castor and Diodorus Siculus, will have it that Ogyges lived more than 1020 Years before the first Olympiad, and consequently, near 1800 Years before Jesus Christ ; which agrees to the Opinion of Petavius, who fixes the Deluge under that Prince's Reign to the Year 1796 before our Vulgar Æra.

Sinſon, in his Origines Sacræ (1), makes Ogyges the same with Cadmus ; but M. Fourmond has by solid Arguments, which may be seen in his Critical Reflexions, proved that Author to be mistaken. The same M. Fourmond offers a Conjecture concerning Ogyges and his Deluge, which, if true, will cast a great Light upon Balaam's Prophecy. That Prince, says he, was the same with Og, Agag, or Ogug, who having left his own Country came and settled in Greece, where he perished by an Inundation. He was therefore an Amalekite Prince, who was forced to quit his own Dominions, being pursued by the other Princes of the Race of Amalek, who at that Time were actually very powerful, and it was while he was in Greece that the Deluge happened in which he perished (1).

S. Jerome, in his Latin Version of the Chronicle of Eusebius, departs from his Author, and contends that it was not in Attica, as all the Antients alledge, but in Egypt that the Deluge of Ogyges happened ; and as S. Jerome will have that Prince to have been contemporary with Moses, we may conjecture that this pretended Deluge was nothing else but the Event that happened in the Red-Sea at the Exit of the Hebrews.

To give my own Opinion upon this Subject, 'tis certain that Ogyges was not a Native of Greece, his very Name alone sufficiently proves him to have been a Stranger ; but whether he came from Egypt or Phœnicia, or from the Country of Amalek, is more than I am able to determine. He went and settled at Thebes in Beotia, named frequently by the Antients Ogygian Thebes, and he also reigned over Attica. It was under his Reign the Inundation happened which I have been upon, which occasioned great Desolation in the Country, and went by the Name of the Deluge. That Prince had married Thebe, the Daughter of Jupiter and Jodamia (2), by whom he had two Sons, Cadmus and Eleusinus, who built the City Eleusis, and three Daughters, Alalcomene, who is said to have nursed Minerva, who at that Time appeared upon the Borders of the Lake Tritonis ; whence Homer has given to that Goddess the Epithet of Alalcomenian ; the second of those Daughters was called Aulis, who communicated her Name to a Town in Beotia ; and the third Thelphonia. These three Princesses, after their Death, were worshipped as Divinities, under the Name of the Praxidican Goddesses (2).

The two Sons of Ogyges reigned, the one in Beotia and the other at Eleusis ; for no Credit is to be given to those who say that Attica was laid so much under Water by that Deluge as to continue a long Time

(1) See p. 231. & seq. (2) See Pausanias in Att. (3) Πραξι-διναι.

Time uninhabited (1). Whether Ogyges perished in the Inundation or not, is what we cannot positively say. Among the three Daughters of Ogyges, Alalcomene was the most celebrated, from the Office she had given her, of being Nurse to Minerva, and from the Worship that was paid to her after her Death. She was reckoned the Goddess who brought Designs to a happy Issue, as is implied in the Word Praxidice. To her were offered in Sacrifice the Heads of Animals, as we are told by Suidas (2). Pausanias adds (3), that Menelaus, upon his Return home from the Siege of Troy, erected to her a Statue, as having by her Assistance put an End to the War which he had undertaken for the Recovery of Helen his Wife.

Whatever Diversity of Opinions we find as to the Epocha of the Deluge of Ogyges, I reckon it may be placed towards the Year 1796 before Christ. This Epocha is fixed in the Greek History. Accordingly Julius Africanus, cited by Eusebius (4), informs us, that all the Chronologists, and among others Hellenicus, Philochorus, Castor, Tallus and Diodorus Siculus, are agreed in placing this Inundation 1020 Years before the first Olympiad. This Olympiad was undoubtedly that of Chorebus, celebrated about the Summer Solstice of the 776th Year before Christ. Thus, by necessary Consequence, this Deluge was in the Year 1796 before the Christian Æra. Petavius and Marsham have made the same Computation, and we may rely upon the Judgment of those two learned Men: But after all, the Time when that Prince reigned is so uncertain and obscure, that we can embrace no Hypothesis which is not liable to vast Difficulties. Accordingly every Thing of dark Antiquity used to be called Ogygian.

We must not omit, that the Reign of Ogyges was remarkable for a strange Appearance in the Heavens, as we learn from S. Augustine (5), after the Historian

B b 2

Castor:

(1) Eusebius says it remained desolate 190 Years. (2) On the Word Praxidice. (3) In Lac. (4) Præp. Evan. l. 10. c. 9. (5) De Civit. Dei.

Castor : These are the Words of that learned Father of the Church. Est in Marci Varronis libris, quorum Inscriptio DE GENTE POPULI ROMANI, Castor scribit, in stella Veneris . . . Tantum portentum extitisse, ut mutaret colorem, magnitudinem, figuram, cursum; quod factum ita neque antea, neque postea sit. Hoc factum Ogyge Rege dicebant Adrastus Cyzicenus, & Dion Neapolius, Mathematici nobiles. I shall not insist upon the History of this Phenomenon, which is said to have made the Planet Venus change her Diameter, Colour, Figure and Course, because M. Freret, who takes it to have been a Comet, the same that appeared in 1680, has composed a very large Dissertation upon that Subject, which the Reader may consult (1).

ARTICLE V.

The Kingdom of Athens founded by Cecrops.

The Chronicle of Paros begins its first Epocha with the Arrival of Cecrops in Greece, and from that Time we have more Insight into the History of that Country. As a Work composed for the Use of all ought to contain Pieces of Knowledge which will be of little or no Use to the Learned, I think my self obliged to explain in a few Words what this Chronicle is, commonly called The Parian Marbles : I have already quoted it, and shall have Occasion, as I go along, frequently to cite the Epochas of it. 'Tis a Series of several Pieces of Marble, containing the Chronology of the principal Events of Greece, beginning with Cecrops, and ending with the Archonship of Diognetus ; that is, thirteen hundred and eighteen Years after. This Chronicle was compiled by public Authority for the Use of the Athenians, sixty Years after the Death of Alexander, in the fourth Year of the hundred and eightieth Olympiad ; and as in the Dates which it fixes, no Mention is made of the Olympiads, 'tis probable, that they were not then used in Chronology. It was not till five or six Years after, that Timæus of Sicily made Use of them in his History. These

(1) Mem. of the Acad. of the Bell. Let. Vol. 10. p. 357.

These Marbles were dug up in the Island of Paros, and sold to the Earl of Arundel, who brought them over to England, where they are at this Day in the Library of the University of Oxford. They have the Misfortune to be very much damaged in several Places, and oft-times but a few Words are legible on some of the Æras which they contain.

Three learned Authors, Selden, Lydiat and Prideaux, have laboured to give Light to them, and to supply, as far as possible, the Text where it is defaced. They have also settled the Time of the last Æra of those Marbles; so that by tracing backward, we see the Distance from one Æra to another. Let us now begin the History of the Kingdom of Athens.

It was under the Reign of Triopas, the seventh King of Argos, that Cecrops, come from Egypt, settled in Attica. The Interpreters of the Arundel Marbles place this Event in the Year 1582 before the Christian Æra, and this Epocka agrees to the Chronology of Censorinus, and Dionysius Halicarnassens, who make that Prince to have lived 400 Years after Inachus, and a little less than 400 Years before the Destruction of Troy: There is only the Difference of 26 Years between it and that of Eusebius (1). This Author, who agrees with the Chronology of those Marbles as to the Time that elapsed from Cecrops to the taking of Troy, has abridged the Period between that War and the first Olympiad by 26 Years. But both of them set the Arrival of that Prince in Greece too far back, as those do still more, who make him contemporary with Inachus or Egialeus; for by adding the Reigns of the Kings of Athens, from and including that Prince, to Mnestheus, in whose Time Troy was taken, there are only eleven Reigns and ten Generations, which computed at the Rate of three to a hundred Years, make but 330 Years from Cecrops to the taking of Troy; for we reckon not Mnestheus, who was but just come to the Crown.

Cecrops married the Daughter of Acteus, who com-B b 3
municated

(1) See Selden Notæ Histor. ad Marmora, p. 94 & 95.

municated his Name to that Country (a), and with his Colony founded twelve Cities, or rather twelve Villages, whereof he composed the Kingdom of Athens, and established there both the Laws of his Country, and the Worship of its Gods ; he especially introduced thither that of Minerva, worshipped at Sais his native City, that of Jupiter, and the other Gods of Egypt. This Fact is attested by all Antiquity. Eusebius (1) says he was the first who gave Jupiter the Name of God, erected an Altar to him, and dedicated a Statue to Minerva. S. Epiphanius repeats the same Thing, as Pausanias had said so before (2).

If there is some Resemblance between the Laws which this Prince gave the Athenians, and those of the Jews, it may be owing to his having learned them from the Israelites who sojourned a long Time in Egypt ; and the Reason why the Poets call him Diphyes, as you would say, a Man of a double Nature, is probably that he having come with his Retinue from a foreign Country, and having the Command of two Nations, the one of them civilized, the other quite barbarous, was given out to be half Man half Serpent, as it is in Apollodorus (3) ; or perhaps for having spoke two Languages, the Egyptian and the Greek ; or lastly, because he regulated the Laws of Marriage which unite both Sexes : For all these three Interpretations are given by Authors. In fact, he polished the barbarous Manners of the Pelasgi, and habituated them by Degrees to those of the Egyptians.

It was the same Cecrops, if we may believe Eusebius (4), who first invoked Jupiter, erecting Statues and Altars to him, and offering Sacrifices in his Honour : Primus Cecrops bovem immolans Jovem appellavit (5), after the Manner probably of the Egyptians, whose

(a) The Country where Cecrops settled, as is remarked by the Parian Marbles, was formerly called Actica, from Acteus ; or Ogygia, from the Name of Ogyges ; and that Prince changed it to Cecropia.

(1) Præp. Evan. l. 10. c. 9. (2) In Att. (3) L. 1. (4) In Princ. l. 2. Chron. (5) N. 46.

whose Laws and Ceremonies he had learned. Pausanias (1) however remarks, that he offered in Sacrifice only Things inanimate, and that the Custom of animal Sacrifices was not introduced into Greece till after his Time.

As for the Policy and Order which this Prince established in his new Kingdom, it suffices to observe with Strabo (2), after Philochorus, that in order to secure his Subjects against the Irruptions of the Cerians, who attacked them by Sea, and from the Beotians of Aonia, who infested them by Land, he collected them into twelve Villages, the Names whereof this Author has not preserved. Theseus, who afterwards ascended the Throne of Athens, reduced those twelve Villages to one City.

Porphyry (3) informs us, that Cecrops staid some Time in Cyprus before his Arrival in Greece, and that in the City Coronis, which Cecrops rebuilt, and which was since called Salamis, a Custom was established in Honour of Aglauros his Daughter, of sacrificing every Year a Human Victim. This Custom lasted very long; and after the Death of Diomedes, that Heroe had the Honour of the Sacrifice which was offered up before to that Princess. The unfortunate Victim, says the same Author, was conducted to the Temple; and after he had been led three Times round the Altar, the Priest transfix'd his Body with a Spear; and immediately had it laid upon a Funeral-Pile. Demophilus, the King of Cyprus, abolished this detestable Ceremony in the Time of Seleucus, exchanging the human Sacrifice for that of an Ox.

Thus Athens, the Inventress of Arts and Sciences, the Seat of Learning and Politeness, owes her Beginning to Egypt: Not that the Country was quite desolate when Cecrops arrived there, but its Inhabitants were mostly barbarous and savage, living in the Woods and Mountains, without Laws, Society or Discipline. This Egyptian Prince gathered into one Body all in his Neighbourhood, formed them into a solid

B b 4

(1) In Att. l. 8. (2) L. 9. (3) L. 2. de Abstin.

solid Establishment, and built the Fortrefs which from him was denominated Cecropian, as was also the whole Country.

Cecrops left three Daughters, Aglauros (a), Herfê, and Pandrosos, who became famous under his Successors, by the Fables I am going to relate. After the Death of Cranaus who ascended the Throne after Cecrops, Erichthonius disputed the Crown with Amphiction, who having gained the Victory, succeeded Cranaus, after whom reigned Erichthonius. 'Tis of this last that the Cecropian Fables have been published. This Erichthonius had an infamous Original given him: Minerva seeing him born lame and misshapen, hid him in a Basket, and gave the Care of it to Aglauros, forbidding her to look into it; but as Prohibitions serve but to raise that Sexes Curiosity, she opened the Basket, and found therein nothing but a Child with the Legs of a Serpent. Minerva punished that Princess's Indiscretion, by making her jealous of Herfê her Sister, of whom Mercury was enamoured; and one Day as she was going to hinder that God from entering into the Appartment of his Mistress, he struck her with his Caduceus, and transformed her into a Rock. The Truth of this Fable is, that the Name of Erichthonius being compounded of two Greek Words which signify Contest and Earth, instead of saying he had been so called from the Dispute he had with his Competitor, they fabled, and Strabo (1) says it as well as others, that he was the Son of Vulcan, and of the Earth, who had conceived him at the same Time when Minerva resisted the Violence of that God; unless we choose rather to say with S. Augustine, that this Prince passed for the Son of Vulcan and Minerva, only because he had been exposed in a Temple consecrated to them.

As Erichthonius had really weak and distorted Limbs, so he invented the Use of Chariots, as most of the Antients

(a) The Greek Authors are not agreed that she was dead when her Father arrived at Athens.

(1) L. 9.

nients alledge with Virgil (a); or at least he added Wheels to a Kind of Dray which Trochilus had brought into Use before him; and he made so good Use of this new Invention in the Celebration of the Athenaia, where he won the Prize, and whereof he was the Founder, according to the tenth Epocha of the Parian Marbles, that after his Death he was advanced to the Constellation of the Charioteer, or Bootes, as we learn from Hyginus (b).

To the Fable now recited they add, that Pandrosos, the third Daughter of Cecrops, would not disobey Minerva; and that the Greeks, as a Reward for her Piety, built her a Temple after her Death near that of the Goddess, as it is in Pausanias: But Herodotus says Aglauros and Hersè received the same Honour.

The Kingdom of Athens lasted upwards of 400 Years under 17 Kings; namely, Cecrops, Cranaus, Amphietyon, Erichthonius, Pandion, Erechtheus, Cecrops II. Pandion II. Egeus, Theseus, Mnestheus, Demophoon, Oxintes, Aphidas, Tymoethes, Melantes, and Codrus, who devoted himself to his Country.

Cranaus, a Native of the Country, succeeded Cecrops, and reigned nine Years; his Reign would be very obscure, were it not for two Events which the Parian Marbles record to have happened in that Time. The first is the Judgment given by the Areopagus, founded by Cecrops, between Neptune and Mars, of which we have spoken at full Length in the History of those Gods. The second is Deucalion's Deluge, which the same Marbles refer to the fourth Year of this Prince's Reign.

After Codrus, perpetual Magistrates were elected, under the Name of Archons. The History of the first Kings of Athens down to Demophoon, is full of Fables,
as

(a) Primus Erichthonius Cursus, & quatuor ausus Iungere equos, rapidisque rotis insistere victor.

Geor. l. 3.

(b) Alii Anguina crura habuisse Erichthonium dixerunt, eumque primo tempore adolescentiæ ludos Minervæ Panathenææ fecisse, & ipsum quadrigis cucurrisse: pro quibus factis inter sidera dicitur cal-latus. Hygip. Coel. Astro. l. 2.

as we shall see in the sequel; but there are none of them whose Chronology is not ascertained; since the Parian Marbles mark exactly the chief Events of them, and fix their Æras.

The Kingdom of Laconia was founded during the Reign of the same Cecrops by Lelex, who gave it the Name of Lelegia. But as these Kings enter seldom into our Fables, we shall dwell no longer upon this Subject. All we shall observe here is, that the first Dynasty, answering to the Times we are now upon, includes twelve Kings; namely, Eurotas, who communicated his Name to the River that runs in the Country; Lacedemon, his Brother, after whom the Capital and Kingdom were called; Amyclas, who built a City of his own Name; Argalus, Cynortas, Ebalus, Hippocoon, Tyndarus the Son of Ebalus and Brother of Hippocoon; Castor and Pollux, the Sons of Tyndarus, and Brothers of Helen; Menelaus the Son of Atreus, who got the Crown by Helen; Orestes, the Son of Agamemnon, by his Marriage with Hermione the Daughter of Menelaus and Helen; Tisamenes, the Son of Orestes. It was under his Reign that the Heraclidæ entered into the Peloponnesus, and made themselves Masters not only of the Kingdoms of Argos and Mycenæ, but also of Lacedemon. Euristhenes the Son of Aristodemus ascended the Throne, and began the second Dynasty of the Kings of Sparta, denominated Agidæ from Agis his Son.

ARTICLE VI.

The Arrival of Deucalion in Greece.

We have said in the History of the Titan Princes (1), that Prometheus had been banished into Scythia, to the Confines of Caucasus. His Son Deucalion, who married Pyrrha his Cousin, the Daughter of his Uncle Epimetheus, weary of that melanchonly Retreat, and having probably found some favourable Opportunity, came and settled in Thessaly (2), in the Confines of Phthia, or rather, according to the Parian Marbles, in Lycoria near Parnassus. These Authors explain that

Chronicle

(1) Vol. II. B. 1. (2) Apoll. l. 1.

Chronicle contrary to the Sentiment of Pausanias (1), who alledges, that Lycoria was not a Province, but a City, situated upon the Declivity of that Mountain. At Bottom there is no Contradiction between these two Authorities, since the City and the Province that depended upon it might both have the same Name.

The Æra of the Arrival of that Prince is well marked in the same Chronicle, and it was the ninth Year of Cecrops's Reign at Athens; that is about the Year 215 or 220 before the Trojan War, and about 1400 Years before the Christian Æra. Farther, every Thing concurs to justify the Æra of those Marbles, since 1. From Cecrops to Theseus, who died a short Time before the Siege of Troy, there are ten Reigns, whereof the first reached even to the Arrival of Deucalion. Now reckoning 22 or 23 Years for each, we will have the Date settled by the Chronicle. 2. By considering the Descendants or Generations from that Prince to the taking of Troy, as they are enumerated by the Antients, the Thing will be yet more certain, since we seldom find more than six or seven of them, which make about 200 or 230 Years. 'Tis true, in some of the Families of those Descendants we find sometimes to the Number of ten; but besides that they are more frequently only six or seven, we know that at the End of 200 Years, the Generations of two collateral Families are not always equal.

To conclude, nothing is more celebrated in the Greek History than Deucalion, who has been reckoned the Repairer of Mankind, since it was under his Reign that the Deluge happened which bears his Name, and he had a numerous Posterity who reigned in several Parts of Greece; Two Points upon which 'tis necessary to enlarge.

ARTICLE VII.

The Deluge of Deucalion.

Let us begin with the Fables relating to this famous Event. Jupiter, they tell us, seeing the Wickedness edness of Man grow from Day to Day, resolved to extirpate the whole human Race (1). For that End he poured down such a Quantity of Rain as to drown the whole Earth : Even the highest Mountains were covered with Water, and frustrated the Hopes of those who fled thither for Refuge. Only Mount Parnassus, whose Top was not laid under Water, saved the pious Deucalion and his Wife Pyrrha. After the Waters were withdrawn, they went to consult the Goddess Themis, who delivered Oracles at the Foot of the Mountain (a), and there they learned that in order to repeople the World, they were to dig up the Bones of their great Mother. Their Piety was alarmed at so cruel an Oracle ; but Deucalion considering that as the Earth was their common Parent, her Bones might possibly signify the Stones contained within her Bowels ; they took some of them, and cast them behind their Backs, having their Eyes shut : Those which Deucalion threw formed Men, and those of Pyrrha Women. Let us see what this Allegory means.

(1) In Phoc.

'Tis obvious that this Narration contains many Fables ; but as the Substance thereof is true, it must be explained. In the ninth Year of the Reign of Cecrops, Deucalion came into Greece, and took Possession of Leucoria near Parnassus, where he reigned ; but not contenting himself with the petty State which he had seized upon, he made War upon his Neighbours, and made himself Master of Part of the Lower Thessaly, near the River Peneus ; the Name of the Province at that Time was Phthiotis, from Phthius of Arcadia, who had seized upon it 160 Years before, as we learn from Pausanias (2). As the Country before Phthius's Time

(1) See Ovid's Met. l. 1.

(a) Ovid in this follows the better Tradition ; for the Learned agree. that the Oracle of Delphi was not yet established in that Place. but that Themis at that Time delivered Oracles there. The Mythologists agree that there always was an Oracle in that Place : First Terra, or the Earth, gave Predictions there, then her Daughter Themis, then Apollo.

See the Article of the City of Delphi, and what we have said upon Oracles in the first Volume.

(2) In Arc.

Time was denominated Hellas, Deucalion thought fit, in order to gain the Good-will of his Subjects, to call one of his Sons Hellen; and he having ascended the Throne after the Death of his Father, and having made several Conquests, would needs have his Subjects take the Name of Hellenians, which was peculiar to them till what Time all the Greeks assumed it; which happened about the Beginning of the Olympiads, that is, about 775 Years before the Christian Æra. In the Time of Homer we know that none but Deucalion's Posterity were called Hellenians.

Most Authors are of Opinion that the Deluge which happened under the Reign of this Prince was occasioned by the River Peneus, whose Course was probably stopped by some Earthquake between Mount Ossa and Olympus, where is the Mouth of that River, through which it discharges itself into the Sea with the additional Water of five other Rivers: This, say they, together with a vast Quantity of Rain which fell that Year, laid all Thessaly, which is a low Country, under Water.

What Herodotus (1) says in his Description of that Province, sufficiently proves this to have been the Cause of that Inundation. “ ’Tis said that Thessaly “ once was nothing but a Lake, being environed on “ all Sides with Hills. The Country which lies between those Hills is what they call Thessaly, which is “ watered with Plenty of Rivers, the chief whereof “ are the Peneus, the Apidanus, the Onsches, the “ Eripeus, and the Panito. These five Rivers, falling down from the neighbouring Mountains, after “ having run through the low Country, disembogue “ themselves into the Sea by a very narrow Canal, “ where they all unite, and make but one great River, which retains the Name of Peneus. They tell “ us further, that before the Canal was made, these “ Rivers flooded the whole Country, and turned it “ into a great Lake; but that Neptune having formed that great Canal, all the Waters retired.”

IN

(1) L. 7.

In the mean time, as the Parian Marbles make Deucalion to have reigned not in Thessaly, but at Lycbræa, in the Confines of Parnassus, we must add to Herodotus's Relation, that Part of the Inundation was owing to a Breach in the Bank of the Lake, which was at the Bottom of Parnassus, and that Deucalion, to shelter himself from it, went up to the highest Top of the Mountain: As to which, you may consult the Travels of Spoh and Wæler, who have seen the Lake.

Some Time after, the Waters having retired, the Country was very soon re-peopled. The Children of those who were preserved, are the mystical Stones whereof the Poets make so frequent Mention, this Fable having no other Foundation but a mere Quibble, the Phœnician Word Aben, or Eben, signifying equally a Stone or a Child (1); and the Word Laos in Greek a Stone, or a People, as is observed by the learned Scholiast on Pindar (2). Thus those who gave Account of this antient Fact, took one Signification for another, and vented a mysterious Fable. We may even add, that the Ferocity and Obduracy of those first Men, by no Means belied their Original.

*Inde genus durum sumus, experiensque laborum,
Et documenta damus qua simus origine nati* (3).

To proceed. The Manner in which Salmasius reads a Passage in Hesiod in his Fragments, casts a great Light upon the Explanation of this Fable. The Locrians were antiently called Leleges, and they inhabited Phocis. That Poet says Jupiter gave them to Deucalion to re-people the World; and the Expression he makes use of, according to the Correction of that Critic, signifies not that Jupiter gave him Men of Stone, but come from a stony Country: Erutos e terra lapidum dedit Deucalioni. In a Word, instead of saying the Men who were not drowned in the Deluge, came from a stony Mountain, they fabled that they were sprung from the very Stones of that Mountain.

Pausanias,

(1) See Bochart. (2) See Grant Menil, p. 532. (3) Ovid. Met. l. 1.

Pausanias, in his Phocica, says the Wolves, by the Howlings they made for fear of being drowned, warned those who run the same Hazard to get up to the Top of Parnassus; and that having built there a City, they called it by the Name of Lycoræa, from the Wolves; but the Arundel-Marbles overthrow this Tradition, since we see by them that Deucalion reigned at Lycoræa before this Deluge.

The Poets, in order to veil the History of this Fact under an ingenious Fiction, fabled that Neptune, by a Blow of his Trident, separated Mount Ossa from Olympus, to open a Channel for the River Peneus; but Herodotus is more rational in his Relation of this Fable (1). “The Opinion of those who made Neptune the Author of that Separation, says he, was not quite groundless: For all who are for ascribing Earthquakes to Neptune, and who will have all Openings that are thus made, to be the Works of that God, will have no Difficulty to believe that Neptune made this Canal, when they take a View of it.” His Meaning is, that the Opening appeared so very surprising, as to be attributed to Neptune, according to the Custom of those Times. As to which it is observed (2), that the Festival of the Peloria, so famous among the Thessalians, where public Entertainments were prepared for Strangers, and even for Slaves, who were served by their Masters, came from this, that one Pelorus was the first who gave Intimation to Pelias, that by Means of an Opening in the Valley of Tempé the Waters were removed; which gave that Prince so much Joy, that he regaled Pelorus in a magnificent Manner, and would needs even serve him at Table.

When the Waters were thus assuaged, Deucalion, according to the Parian Chronicle, went to Athens, where, in Gratitude to the Gods for having preserved him from the general Inundation of his Country, he offered solemn Sacrifices to Jupiter, in a Temple which he built to his Honour, and which was still subsisting in in the Time of Pisistratus, who rebuilt it at an infinite Expence. This is the famous Temple of Olympian Jupiter, begun by this Prince, continued by his Sons, by Seleucus, and Antiochus Epiphanes, and which was finished at last by Adrian. The Athenians, in Commemoration of the Deluge, sacrificed every Year in this Temple a Cake of Meal and Honey, on the first of the Month Anthisterion.

(1) L. 1. (2) Athenæus, l. 14.

Antiquity is not agreed as to the King who reigned at Athens in the Time of that Retreat. Eusebius alledges it was under Cecrops, but according to the Marbles it was Cranaus; and we readily subscribe to what is contained upon that antient Monument, which appears to have been compiled by public Authority, and with great Exactness. Thus we must fix the Æra of the Deluge not to the Year 1557 before Christ, as the Commentators on this Chronicle alledge, but to the Year 1380 or 90 before that Epocha, for Reasons given at the Beginning of this Article.

'Tis proper to remark, before we go farther, that the Tradition of the universal Deluge, which was carried even to the most distant Nations, had been very conducive to the Embellishment of the History of that of Deucalion; and this is what makes Ovid say, in giving the Description of it, that it had laid all the Earth under Water, and that the Waters overtopped the highest Mountains:

*Jamque mare & tellus nullum discrimen habebant,
Omnia pontus erant, deerant quoque littora ponto* (1).

That of all the Inhabitants of the Earth there remained but one Man and one Woman:

Et superesse videt de tot modo millibus unum, &c. (2).

The Poet Lucan, not to mention others, says much the same Thing (3), and Diodorus asserts that the Deluge had destroyed all the living Creatures that were then upon the Face of the Earth. But 'tis not only in this Idea that the Poets and Historians seem so conformable formable to Moses in the History of Deucalion's Deluge. We discern so many in their Works, especially those of Ovid, that it would seem he had either read the Genesis, or learned what he says of it from Tradition still very lively. First he gives us a Description of the Disorders which abounded in the World; he mentions the Avarice, the Parricides, the Impurity, and other Crimes that reigned amongst Men; adding that Piety was sacrificed to the vilest of Passions.

(1) Ovid. Met. l. 1. (2) Id. ib. (3) Lib. 1.

Vieta jacet pietas; &c.

He mentions the War of the Giants armed against Heaven; he makes Jupiter hold a Council to declare to the other Gods his Resolution of punishing all those Crimes, much in the same Manner as Moses makes God Almighty: I will destroy all Flesh (1). He says afterwards that Jupiter's first Design was to consume the World by Fire, but calling to Mind that Fate had fixed the Time of the general Conflagration, which was to burn up the whole Universe, he was content for that Time to bury the Earth under Water.

*Jamque erat in totas sparsurus fulmina terras:
Sed timuit - - - - -
Esse quoque in factis reminiscitur, affore tempus
Quo mare, quo tellus, correptaque Regia Cæli Ardeat, & mundi moles operosa laboret.*

Lastly, the Poet remembers the Rainbow; and in one Word, the Manner in which he describes the Reparation of Mankind by two Persons of eminent Piety, proves that he had delineated Deucalion's Deluge from the Ideas of that of Noah (a).

All the other Poets, and several Historians speak in the same Strain; only substituting Deucalion's Name in Place of Noah's. Lucian (2), speaking of those antient People of Syria, among whom, according to themselves,

VOL. III.

C c

Deucalion

(1) Delebo omnem carnem. &c. Gen. c. 2.

(a) *Non illo melior quisquam, vel amantior æqui,
Vir fuit, aut illa metuentior ulla Deorum.*

Id. ibi

(2) De Dea Syria.

Deucalion lived, and who related the History of the Deluge, says: “ The Greeks assert in their Fables, that “ the first Men being cruel and insolent, void of “ Faith, inhospitable and inhuman, were all destroy“ ed by the Deluge ; the Earth discharging from her “ Womb a vast Quantity of Waters, which swelled
 “ the Rivers, and together with the Rains made the “ Sea overflow, insomuch that all was laid under Wa“ ter. Deucalion alone remained, who saved himself
 “ and Family in an Ark, and two of each Kind of “ Animals, both wild and tame, who followed him
 “ of their own Accord, without preying upon one “ another, or doing any Harm. Thus Deucalion “ floated till the Waters asswaged, then he repaired the “ human Race.”

Stephanus, and the Author of the Etymologicon say, this Vessel rested upon a high Mountain. Berosus and Nicholas of Damas even assert, that it was upon one of the Mountains of Armenia. Plutarch makes Mention of the Dove, and Abydenus of certain Fowls that flew out of the Ark, and returned twice, because they found no Place where they might take Rest. In fine, as the last Stroke of Resemblance, the Antients tell us, that Deucalion, a Man of Virtue and Piety, having gone to Athens, offered Sacrifice to Jupiter the Saviour, and built him a Temple. In like Manner the sacred Writings tell us, that Noah, after he came out of the Ark, offered Sacrifices of clean Beasts, in Gratitude to God for having saved him and his Family.

Josephus tells us (1), that the History of the Deluge and of the Ark had been wrote by Nicholas of Damas, by Berosus, Mnaseas, and some others ; these are probably the Sources whence the Greeks and Romans took what they have inserted in their Works. In one Word, the Reason is, that the History of the Deluge was not peculiar to Moses ; it was a History of Mankind, not easy to be forgot.

Before I finish what relates to Deucalion's Deluge, I shall make some Remarks. The first is, that we find
 in

(1) Ant. l. 1.

in the King's Cabinet, a Medal of the Inhabitants of Apamea, representing this Event; and what is singular in this Monument, the last Letters of the Legion APA-MEON being reversed, instead of EON, we read NOE, and these three Letters being placed nearer to the Ark, which is represented there, it would seem their Intention was to exhibit the universal Deluge, unless it proceeded only from an Error of the Coiner. The second is, that the Parian Marbles, which fix the Date of Deucalion's Deluge, speak of it only as of an extraordinary Rain that flooded the Country. A third is, that the Author of the Book of Meteors, attributes this Deluge not to the Overflowing of the Thessalian Rivers, but to that of the Achelous (1). However, the most general Opinion is, that it flooded the Plain of Lycoræa in the Confines of Parnassus, a Country at a good Distance from Acarmania and Etolia, where that River runs. The fourth is, that though the Poets and Historians who have spoke of this Deluge, tell us there remained none upon the Earth but Deucalion and Pyrrha, yet the Inhabitants of Megara had an antient Tradition, which imported, that Megarus the Son of Jupiter by a Nymph, was saved from this Deluge, by getting up to the Top of Mount Geranim, which had then another Name. For according to that Tradition, this Megarus, guided by the Noise of a Flock of Cranes which were flying that Way, swam up to the Top of that Mountain, which from that Event was called Mount Geranim, from the Cranes, in Greek Γέρωνι (2). Again, Pausanias informs us, that within the Territory of Olympian Jupiter at Athens, there was to be seen an Opening of about a Cubit wide, through which, said the Athenians, the Waters had retired after Deucalion's Deluge; and he adds that it was customary to throw yearly into that Gulf a Kind of Paste made of Flower and Honey. This Temple of Olympian Jupiter, according to that Author, was of very great Antiquity, and Deucalion himself was given out to be the Founder of it; and in Proof of Deucalion's having died at Athens, his Tomb was shewn near the Temple. We may remark by the Way, that Pausanias is mistaken in making the Temple which Deucalion founded to have been consecrated to Olympian Jupiter. It was Pisistratus, by whom it was rebuilt, that dedicated it to Jupiter under that Name; whereas Deucalion had consecrated his to Jupiter Phrygius, as much as to say, Jupiter by whose Aid he was preserved from the Deluge. That Prince, besides the Temple now mentioned, instituted also a Feast in Honour of those who had perished in the Deluge; and this Feast named Ἰδπο-φρία, lasted to the Time of Sylla, as may be seen in Plutarch (1).

(1) Meteor. l. 1. c. ult. (2) Pausan. in Att.

Cedrenus and John of Antioch Malala, as has been said in the History of Ogyges, have asserted that Deucalion had left in Attica, the History of the Deluge which had obliged him to fly thither for a Retreat: But as we don't believe the Greeks had then the Use of Letters, 'tis better to say he left them a living History of it by the Temple and Feast which he instituted in Memory of that Event.

Lastly, I remark farther that Xenophon reckons five Deluges: The first happened under an antient Ogyges, and lasted three Months. The second, in the Time of Hercules (2) and Prometheus, was but of one Months Duration. The third, under another Ogyges, whereby Attica was laid waste. The fourth, under Deucalion, laid Thessaly under Water for the Space of three Months. The fifth and last happened in the Time of Proteus, during the War of Troy; this is that which was termed Pharonian, and that overflowed a Part of Egypt. Diodorus Siculus mentions also a sixth Deluge that happened in Samothrace (3).

ARTICLE VIII.

The Posterity of Deucalion.

Deucalion having been saved from the Deluge, and repopled Thessaly, is therefore accounted by the Poets and Historians, the Repairer of the human Race, as we

(1) In Sylla. (2) This is the Phœnician Hercules. (3) L. 5.

we find in Justin after Trogus (a). All Authors are agreed that this Prince was the Son of Prometheus, and married to Pyrrha his Uncle Epimetheus's Daughter. The Prometheus here in Question, is quite different from him who in the Time of Jupiter reigned over the Scythians in the Confines of Caucasus, since Deucalion, whose Genealogy is so consistent, lived long after Jupiter; and it was perhaps this Difficulty in adjusting the Chronology, that led M. le Clerc (1) to take Deucalion not for a proper Name, but a Name compounded of two Words, Digle-Ion, Vexilla-Ionum, the Chief of the Ionians, that is of those who escaped the Deluge: And that of Pyrrha, according to the same Author, signifies Earth, or Red.

Let that be as it will, nothing is so famous in ancient Authors as the Posterity of Deucalion: They served to people a Part of Greece, and founded there several Kingdoms: And as we shall have often Occasion to speak of them in the Sequel, 'tis proper briefly to lay open their History.

Deucalion had two Sons, Hellen and Amphiſſion. The Latter, whose Line was of less Extent than that of his Brother, came and settled in Attica, where he reigned after having expelled from thence his Father-in-Law Cranaus. That Prince established his Dominion in the Confines of Thermopylae, and in the second Year of his Reign assembled the People of the Neighbourhood, and from his own Name called the Council of those who had the Regulation of Affairs, the Amphiſſionian Council. The fifth Epoch of the Arundel Marbles, marks the Institution of this Council.

Nothing is more celebrated in Antiquity, than the Council of the Amphiſſions, who assembled at the Charge of the Public twice a Year, in the Spring-Time and Autumn, in the Temple of Ceres at Thermopylae, near the Mouth of the River Asopus. No private Causes were there determined (a), as of too small Importance to imploy so august an Assembly; but only such as concerned the Public, whether in Matters of Peace, or War, or Religion; and the Decrees of that Senate were to be signed by the High-Priest of Delphi, before they were engraved upon Marble Columns, in order to be preserved as authentic Monuments. We shall not dwell any longer upon this celebrated Court; referring the Reader to the learned Dissertation of Van-Dale.

(a) Superfuerunt quos refugia montium receperunt; Et ad Regem Theſſalicae Deucalionem ratibus arceſti ſunt; a quo propterea genus hominum conditum dicitur. L. 11. c. 28.

(1) Comp. Hiſt. Univ.

Hellen, Deucalon's second Son, reigned in Phthiotis (i), and communicated his Name to the Hellenians (b), as we learn from the sixth Æra of the same Marbles. The Beginning of his Reign falls in the third Year of that of his Brother Amphiction.

This Prince had by his Wife Orseis three Sons, Eolus, Dorus, and Xuthus. Eolus, the eldest of the three Brothers, succeeded his Father, and gave the Name of Eolians to the People whom he had denominated Hellenians. Having married Enarete, Deimechus's Daughter, he had by her seven Sons, Cretheus, Sisyphus, Athemans, Salmones, Deion, Magnes, and Perieres; and five Daughters, Canache, Halcione, Pisidice, Calyce, and Perimedes (c). Let us begin with the Descendants of the Daughters.

Calyce married Eteolus, and had by him the famed Endymion, who removed the Etolians from Thessaly, and settled them in Elis. Eteolus, the Son of Endymion and Nais, retired to the Curetes, and called their Country Etolia. Of him and Pronoe, the Daughter of Phorbas, were born Pleuron and Calydon, noted for the Cities which they built in that Country. Agenor, the Son

(a) Except that of Ephialtes, who shewed Xerxes a Passage into Greece by Mount Oeta. Herod. l. 2.

(i) This is a Part of the Lower Thessaly.

(b) Whatever relates to this Name of Hellenians, is to be found in Lodius's Remarks upon the Marbles. p. 20, and upon the Notes ad Marmora, p. 134, 135, & seq.

(c) Consult for all these Genealogies, Apollodorus, Pausanias, and among the Moderns, Petavius, and the Commentators on the Arundel Marbles.

Son of Pleuron, married his Cousin Icarte, the Daughter of Calydon, and had by her four Children, among whom was Althæa, who having matched with Oenæus, became Mother to Meleager, whom she devoted to the Furies. The same Oenæus after the Death of Althæa married Peribæa, the Daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus, who having married Deiphile the Daughter of Adrastus, had by her Diomedes, so famed in the History of those Times.

Perimedes married Achelous, and had by him Hippodamus and Oresteus. Pisidia became the Wife of Myrmidon, who communicated his Name to the People about the River Peneus, whom his Uncle Acheus had named Acheans, and by him had a Son called Aëtor, who succeeded his Father; he having taken in Marriage Egina the Daughter of Asopus, who had already bore Eacus to Jupiter, had by her Menetius and several others, who being grown up, formed a Conspiracy to dethrone their Father: He discovered their Plot, expelled them the Kingdom, and married his Daughter Philomela (a) to Peleus the Son of Æacus, and left the Kingdom to him. It was of this Marriage that Achilles was born.

Menetius retired into the Country of the Locrians, whom he subdued. His Son Patroclus, forced to fly his Father's Kingdom for having slain Cleonimus, or Orantes, the Son of Amphidamas, came to the Court of Peleus his Kinsman, and contracted an inseparable Friendship with Achilles.

Canache, seduced by Neptune, had by him several Children, among others Iphimedia who was married to the Giant Aloeus, and brought him the two Aloides, Ephialtes, and Otus, who, as we are told by Pausanias (1), built the City Asera, at the Foot of Helicon, a Mountain which they consecrated to the Muses: But because they served Phlegyas in the War which he waged against the People of Delphi, the Poets have represented them as two Monsters of Impiety who attempted to dethrone the Gods.

C c 4

We

(a) We assign the Reason elsewhere why she passed for Thetis, the Goddess of the Sea.

(1) In Beotic.

We know nothing of Alcyone, but that it was she, or at least her Daughter, who married Ceyx, the King of Trachine, distinguished by his Misfortunes. Let us now speak of the Sons of Eolus.

Sisyphus having built Ephyre, which was afterwards called Corinth (1), married Merope the Daughter of Atlas (a), by whom he had Glaucus the Father of Bellerophon, known by the Fables of the Chimæra.

Perieres having destroyed the whole Race of Polycaon, who had reigned long over the Messenians, was declared their King; and having married Gorgophone, the Daughter of Perseus, had by her Aphareus and Leucippus. The former having succeeded his Father, gave Reception to Neleus who had been banished from Colchos by his Father Pelias, and shared his Dominions with him. Leucippus had one Daughter, named Arfinoe (2), who was Mother to that Esculapius, whose Sons Podalirius and Machaon assisted at the War of Troy. The Children of Aphareus, Lynceus (3), and Idas, having died without Issue, the Kingdom of Messene devolved upon Nestor, the Son of Neleus.

Magnes established his Dominion in the Confines of Oeta and Pelion, upon the Confines of Thessaly towards the Sea, and communicated to that Country the Name of Magnesia, as well as to the City, which was the Capital of it. Having married Neis, he had by her Alceus, Pisus, Diocles, and Polydeces. The two last retired into the Island of Seriphus; it was under their Reign that Perseus, persecuted by his Grand-father Acrisus, landed there, as shall be taken Notice of upon another Occasion, together with all the Histories, whereof I only give here a short Sketch, for the Sake of the Connection. Pierus reigned over that Part of his Father's Kingdom, which was since called Pieris, and his nine Daughters were often confounded with

(1) Pausan. in Corinth. Apollod. l. 1.

(a) This is another Atlas than he who was King of Mauritania, and contemporary with Jupiter the third.

(2) Others make him the Son of Coronis. See his Hist. Vol. V. B. 5. (3) So famed for his Quickness of Sight.

with the Muses (1). Alektor succeeded his Father, and his Great Grand-son Prothous passed into Asia after the War of Troy, and there built the celebrated Town of Magnesia (2).

Salmoneus, having dwelt some Time in Thessaly, retired into Elis (3), where he built a City of his own Name : His Impiety cost him his Life, as has been said (a). Tyro his Daughter (4), being brought up with Cretheus her Uncle, the King of Argos, had two Children upon the Banks of the River Enipeus, whose Father not being known, they were fathered upon Neptune ; that is upon some Sea-Captain, or a Priest of that God. These two Children having been exposed, were found by Shepherds, who named the one Pelias, and the other Neleus. Having grown up, they were owned by their Mother, and put in Possession of their Dominions. Neleus, expelled by his Brother, retired into the Country of the Messenians, and there built the City Pylos. Not long after he married Chloris the Daughter of Amphion, by whom he had twelve Sons who were all put to Death by Hercules, except Nestor, famed at the Siege of Troy no less for his Wisdom than for his great Age. Those Princes had taken up Arms for Augeas, King of Elis, on whom Hercules made War, to be avenged on him for having cheated him of his Hire promised him for cleansing his Stables, as shall be said in the History of that Heroe : Thus Hercules victorious put them all to Death but Nestor, who being then too young to go to War, was still in Gerania where he had been brought up, and for this Reason Homer frequently gives him the Appellation of Γεράνιος. Tyro having afterwards married her Uncle Cretheus, had by him Amithaon, Pheres, and Eson.

Cretheus

(1) The Poets often call the Muses Pierides. (2) See Eustathius upon Homer. (3) Apollod. Strabo, &c.

(a) Here however it is to be remarked, that as Homer, Odyss. 1. calls him, ἀνύμνα, inculpatus, Eustathius considers this Imputation of Jupiter's Thunder rather as the Effect of his admirable Address, than of his Impiety.

(4) Apollod. l. 1.

Cretheus being dead, was succeeded by Pelias in the Kingdom of Colchos ; and the Oracle having warned him to beware of Jason his Brother's Son, he sent him to Colchis, to the Conquest of the Golden Fleece.

Amithaon dwelt long at Pylos, married Idomene, the Daughter of Pheres, and had by her Bias and Melampus. Bias demanded in Marriage Perone, Neleus's Daughter; but as that Prince had resolved to give her only to him who should bring him the Oxen of Phylacus, which were kept by Maltives, he found a Way to come at them with the Assistance of his Brother, and married Perone. Talaus, his Son, took to Wife Lyfmache, the Daughter of Abas ; and among the Children whom he had by her, Eriphyle, the Wife of Amphiaraus, who signalized himself in the Theban War, is the most noted.

Pheres built a Town of his own Name in Thessaly, and had two Children, Lycurgus and Admetus. The first dwelt near Nemæa, and he is distinguished by the Misfortune of his Son Archemorus, who was devoured by a Serpent, while his Nurse was shewing the Argive Chiefs a Fountain, as they were conducting their Army to the Theban War. The second was the King of Pheres ; and he is famed for his Wife Alcestes, the Daughter of Pelias, King of Thessaly, who was content to die to save his Life.

Athamas, the sixth Son of Eolus, settled in Beotia, and had by Nepbelé a Son named Phryxus, and a Daughter called Hellé. After the Death of his Wife, he married Ino, the Daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had Learchus and Melicerta. This Step-Mother having a Mind to destroy the Children of the first Marriage, they were obliged to fly into Colchis with Part of their Father's Treasures ; this was the Golden Fleece, which their Cousin went to recover, as shall be said in the Article of the Argonauts.

Lastly, Deion, or Deioneus, the last Son of Eolus, reigned in Phocis (a), and he was married to Diomedé, his his Uncle Xuthus's Daughter, by whom he had several Children ; the most noted of them was Cephalus who was carried off by Aurora, and who unhappily slew his Wife Procris, without knowing who she was. Being exiled by the Areopagus, he retired into one of the Islands of the Teleboans, whereof he made a Conquest together with Amphitryon, and called it from his own Name, Cephalenia. He was succeeded by his Son Celeus, and he again by Arcegius the Father of Laertes, famed for his Son Ulysses who led to the Trojan War the Ithacians, the Zacynthians, and the Cephalenians (a). The other Son of Cephalus was Oeneus, who had the Dominions of his Grand-father Deioneus.

(a) This is the Opinion of Apollodorus, from whom this Account is taken. Other Authors alledge that we must read Phiotis.

Such is the Posterity of Eolus the Son of Hellen; let us now say something of that of Dorus and Xuthus, his two other Sons.

The former settled first in Estiotis, which made a Part of Thessaly, where his Father reigned (1), and he gave to it the Name of Doris, and to the People that of Dorians : But his Descendants having been expelled that Country, a Part of them retired into Macedonia to the Confines of Pindus ; and Teuclamus his Son went to Colchos to his Father-in-Law Cretheus, where having drawn together a small Army, consisting of Dorians, of Eolians, the Subjects of Cretheus, and of some Pelasgians, who had followed him from Thessaly, he equipped a Fleet, and passed over into Crete (2), and was the first of the Greeks who reigned in that Island. His Son Asterius, surnamed Jupiter, became famous for the Rape of Europe, and the Birth of Minos, the first of the Name. Those of the Dorians who had settled in Macedonia, again left that Country ; and arriving at the Foot of Parnassus, between Phocis and the Oetæan Mountains, resumed their first Name of Dorians, and built several Cities. (3)

Xuthus, the third Son of Hellen, having seized upon his

(a) The People of three small Islands in the Ionian Sea, of which he was King.

(1) Herod. l. 1. Strabo, Apollod. l. 1. (2) Diod. l. 2.

(3) Herod. l. 1. Strab. l. 8 & 9.

his Father's Treasures (1), was banished from Theffaly by his two Brothers. Erechtheus, the King of Athens, to whom he offered Assistance against the Chalcidians of Eubæa, received him kindly, gave him a small Country, where he founded four Cities, Oeneon, Marathon, Probalynthus, and Tricosythus, and to crown all, gave him in Marriage, after a signal Victory he had gained over the Enemies of that Prince (a), his Daughter Creusa, by whom he had Ion and Acheus, from whom the Acheans and Ionians were afterwards denominated.

Ion, who was one of the greatest Captains of his Time, served his Father-in-Law in the War he had with Eumolpus and the Eleusians, gained a decisive Victory over them, and slew their Leader with his own Hand (b); which won him so much the Hearts and Confidence of the Athenians, that according to Conon in Photius (2), they made him King after the Death of Erechtheus. We seldom find Ion among the Athenien Kings. Pausanias asserts that after the Death of Erechtheus, his Children disputed the Crown; and having chosen for Arbiters Xuthus the Father of Ion, and Acheus his Brother, they gave Judgment in Favour of Cecrops. Perhaps Ion, proclaimed King by the People, was not able to support himself against the Factions of his Brothers-in-Law; and this may be the Reason why he is excluded from the Catalogue of the Kings of Athens.

Be that as it will, being banished Attica by his Competitors, he retired with his Father and Uncle into that Part of the Peloponnesus, to which Acheus gave the Name of Achaia; there he married Helice, the Daughter of the King of Selinus, and succeeded him in the Kingdom of Achaia, formerly denominated Egiale, which he changed to Ionie; there he built a
City

(1) Pausan. in Achaic. Strab. l. 8, &c.

(a) Strabo l. 8. Pausan. in Att. Conon apud Photium Nar. 27.

(b) Strab. l. 8. Pausanias in Att. Arist. in Eleusina, &c.

(2) In Achaicis.

Mimas, who reigned { His in Æolis, { by.

Perieres married Gorgopbon
Perseus, by whom he had sc

Dorus, of whom nothing is said, but that the Xuthus, who being exiled by his Brothers, fled for Refuge to E- richtheus, whose Daughter he married,

{ Achæus, Peloponne
Ægiale.
Ion, who
by the A Ionians.

Amphietyon, who after the Expulsion of Cranæus, reigned at Arb say the Greeks derived the Name of Ionians from Javan their founder, whence they were called Javonians, laonians, as Homer designs them, and afterwards Ionians. These Authors say the same of the Name of Hellenians and others; and F. Pczron adds, that Deucalion, to reconcile the Greeks to his Government, gave to his sons the Names of Hellen, Dorian, &c. known in the Country long before him.

The POSTERITY of DEUCALION, King of Thessaly.

Deucalion, who reigned in Thessaly, where happened the Deluge denominated from him, about the Year of the World 2373, or 1611 before the vulgar Æra. He had by his Wife Pyrrha, Hellen had by Orseis his Wife three Sons, who gave Rise to three Kinds of Greeks. viz. the Eolic, the Doric, and the Ionic; namely, Eolus, Dorus, his Sons; and Ion his Grandson.

Eolus, who by Enarete the Daughter of Deimachus, had five Daughters, Canache, Alcyone, Pisidice, Calyce, and Perimedes and eight Sons, according to Diodorus, Cretheus married Tyro his Brother Salomoneus's Daughter, Æson } Jason, Chief of the Argonauts.

Melampus married Iphianira, the Daughter of Anaxagoras, Son to Megapenthes, King of Argos. He cured the Daughters of Prætus, who were delirious, and Anaxagoras, in Gratitude, made him King of Argos with his Brother Bias, Antiphas.

Manto.
Bias.
Promoe.

Bias shared with his Brother Melampus the Kingdom of Argos. By his Wife Perone he had a Son named, Talaus } Adrastus.

 Parthenopæus.
 Eriphile the Wife of Amphion.
 raus.

Pheres, } Admetus, } Opheltes, also named Lycurgus, } Archemorus.

Sisyphus, the Founder of Corinth, had by Merope, the Daughter of Atlas, } Glaucus, } Bellerophon.

Athamas, the King of Beotia, } By Nephele, } Phryxus.
 Helle.
 By Ino the Daughter of Cadmus, } Learchus.
 Melicerta.

Salomoneus, who reigned first in Thessaly, then in Elis, } Tyro, Wife to Cretheus. She had before by Neptune, Neleus, who fled to Messene. He had by his Wife Chloris, Daughter of Amphion, } Nestor and ten other Sons, who were slain by Hercules.

 Perone, Wife of Bias.
Pelias, King of Thessaly, } Acastus.
 Alcestes, Wife of Admetus.

Deione, who reigned in Phocis, } Cephalus, the Husband of Procris.

Magnes, whose two Sons, } Polydeutes, } Had the Island of Seriphus.
 Dictys, }

Mimas, who reigned in Æolis, } Hippotes had by Menalippe, } Eolus, whose Daughter } Arne had by Neptune, Eolus, King of the Eolian Islands near Sicily.

Boeotus, from whom Boeotia had its Name.

Perieres married Gorgophone, the Daughter of Perseus, by whom he had four Sons: namely, } Aphareus.
 Leucippus.
 Tyndarus.
 Icarus.

Dorus, of whom nothing is said, but that the Dorians came from him.

Xuthus, who being exiled by his Brothers, fled for Refuge to Erichtheus, whose Daughter he married, Achæus, who having committed an accidental Homicide, fled to the Peloponnesus, and communicated his Name to Achaia, which was called Ægialé. He returned however to Thessaly, where he reigned.

Ion, who is said to have reigned at Athens after his Grand father by the Mother Side. From him the Athenians were denominated Ionians.

Amphiæyon, who after the Expulsion of Cranaus, reigned at Athens.

City

(1) Pausan. in Achaic. Strab. l. 8, &c.

(a) Strabo l. 8. Pausan. in Att. Conon apud Photium
Nar. 27.

(b) Strab. l. 8. Pausanias in Att. Arist. in Eleusina, &c.

(2) In Achaicis.

City which he called Helice, after the Name of his Wife, which was afterwards overthrown by an Earthquake, in the last Year of the hundredth and fourth Olympiad (1). But while he had Thoughts of extending his Dominion, the Eleusians, who esteemed his Valour, imploring his Assistance against the Athenians, whom he had Reason to hate, chose him for the General of their Forces, and after several illustrious Atchievements, he died in Attica.

Acheus his Brother at first passed into the Peloponnesus, and gave the Name of Achaia to that Part which his Brother had called Ionia, as has been now said; but not long after he retired into Thessaly, where, with the Assistance of the Athenians, and of Ion, who was at their Head (2), he possessed himself of the Kingdom of Phthiotis, after the Death of Eolus his Uncle, and likewise gave the Name of Achaia to that Part of Greece (a). His Descendants had several Adventures whereof we shall say nothing here.

Such was the Posterity of Deucalion, of Hellen and Amphietyon, his two Sons, who peopled the greatest Part of Greece, founded several Kingdoms, and derived their Names to the Greeks, who were called sometimes Ionians, Acheans, Hellenists, sometimes Dorians, &c. Thus it is that the Greek Authors (b), Apollodorus, Strabo, Hesychius, Pausanias after the Arundel-marbles, speak of the several People of Greece, to whom the Descendants of Deucalion communicated their Names, as well as to the different Dialects of their Language; and that at a Time when that Country was very little peopled, as appears from the

(1) Diod. l. 15. (2) Pausan. l. 7. Didym. in 1. Iliad.

(a) Scholiast. Apollonii ad l. 1. Eustath. Didymus, &c.

(b) Some Moderns, among whom are F. Pezron in his Antiquity of the Language of the Celts, and Loerquer, in a Book intitled Ion, say the Greeks derived the Name of Ionians from Javan their Founder, whence they were called Javonians, Iaonians, as Homer designs them, and afterwards Ionians. These Authors say the same of the Name of Hellenians and others; and F. Pezron adds, that Deucalion, to reconcile the Greeks to his Government, gave to his Sons the Names of Hellen, Dorian, &c. known in the Country long before him.

the Facility they found of settling in the Places whither they came.

This short History of Deucalion's Posterity I thought necessary for understanding what is to be said afterwards. And indeed, when we come to the Events of thole fabulous Times of Greece, whereof we shall explain the Fables at great Length, we shall every now and then meet with Successors of this Prince, and the Reader may easily call to Mind what has been now said, especially if he will take the Trouble to cast his Eye upon the following Table *.

C H A P. VI.

The Arrival of Lelex in Greece.

I Have no where read but in Pausanias (1) the History of the Arrival of this Lelex in Greece, nor does he say whether he planted a Colony there, or if he arrived alone. However, as he became King of Megara, where probably he was powerful enough to form a Party, and had some Successors; as he communicated his Name to the Megareans, and his History relates to the fabulous Times, I thought it deserved a Place in this History.

“ The Megareans, according to the Author now “ quoted, reported that twelve Generations after Cae- “ tes the Son of Phoroneus, Lelex came from Egypt
 “ into their Country, and reigned there; that from “ his Time they assumed the Name of Leleges;
 “ which Lelex was the Father of Clefon, whose Son
 “ was Pylas, of whom was born Scyron, who married “ Pandion's Daughter. They add, that after this “ Alliance he disputed the Kingdom with Nisus the “ Son of Pandion, and that each of them chose for “ Judge of their Controversy Eacus, who adjudged
 “ the Kingdom to Nisus and his Heirs; but on Con“ dition that Scyron should have the Command of the “ Troops: In fine, that after the Death of Nisus, “ Megareus, the Son of Neptune, having married “ Iphinoé,

(1) In Attic.

* See the Table fronting Page 398.

“Iphinoë, that Prince’s Daughter, succeeded to his “Father-in-law.” This is all that we know of this Lelex; but this Relation requires some Reflections.

First, ’Tis easy to trace the Time when Lelex arrived in Megaris, namely, five or six Generations, or about two hundred Years before the Destruction of Troy, since his Great-Grandson, who was in the third Generation after him, was contemporary with Eacus, who lived two Generations before the same Æra. We also know the Time when Nisus his Competitor lived, since he was contemporary with Minos the II. who waged War with him, as shall be said in the History of this King of Crete.

Secondly, It appears that the Reign of Lelex’s Race ended with Scyron, and tho’ he was to have the Command of the Troops, according to Æacus’s Decision, yet we hear no more of him from that Time.

Thirdly, We must distinguish this Lelex the Egyptian from another Lelex the first King of the Country, that has been since designed Laconia, and had been called Lelegia from him (1). This last was a Greek originally.

Fourthly, We are far less to confound these Leleges of Greece with those of Ionia, who, according to Homer (2) and Strabo (3), inhabited that Part of Asia which was upon the Banks of the Satnion, and over whom Alces reigned in the Time of the Trojan War, and kept his Court at Pedafus, the Capital of his Kingdom.

C H A P. VII.

The Colony of Cadmus settled in Greece.

THE Rape of Europa, the Flight of Cadmus, his Settlement in Beotia, the Misfortunes of his Family, the Conquests of Bacchus his Grandson, and his Deification, make a considerable Part of the History of the fabulous Age.

In the fourth Year of the Reign of Hellen the Son of

(1) In Lac. (2) Il. l. 21. (3) L. 13.

of Deucalion, 200 Years, or thereby, before the taking of Troy, and 1350 or 60 before the Christian Æra, Cadmus came by Sea from the Coasts of Phœnicia, and the Confines of Tyre and Sidon, in quest of a Settlement in Greece. He possessed himself of a Part of Beotia, built the Citadel, which from him was called Cadmea, and there fixed the Seat of his Government. But then it was not without a great deal of Resistance from the antient Inhabitants of the Country, that Cadmus formed his new Settlement. The Hyantes especially made vigorous Opposition to it; but a decisive Battle obliged them to quit the Country, and to go in quest of a Retreat elsewhere. The Amians, grown wise at the Expence of their Neighbours, made a voluntary Submission to the Conqueror, who admitted them into the Number of his Subjects, and leaving them in the Possession of their Villages, united them into one People with the Phœnicians.

Such is the general History of this Colony; but as the Greeks always intermixed a Number of Fictions with their Antiquities, we must trace it up to its Source, and explain it from the most authentic Monuments left us by Antiquity.

Jupiter, as we read in Ovid and Hyginus, falling in Love with Europa, Daughter to Agenor King of Phœnicia, ordered Mercury to convey her to the Seashore, where that God having transformed himself into a Bull, took her upon his Back, and transported her into Crete (a).

Palephatus (1) takes the Foundation of this Fable to have been, that a Captain of Candia named Taurus, carried off that Princess, after he had taken the City Tyre from Agenor: But Echemenides, who had wrote the History of Crete, says with more Probability, that

(a) ————— *Sceptri gravitate relicta,
Ille Pater, Reſtorque Deum, cui dextra triſulcis
Ignibus armata eſt, qui nutu concutit Orbem, Induitur Tauri faciem, &c. Ovid. Met. l. 2. Hygin; Tab. 178.*

(1) Lib. de Incredibil.

that some Merchants of that Island having arrived upon the Coasts of Phœnicia, and seen the young Europa, whose Beauty struck them, carried her off for their King Asterius; and as their Ship bore upon the Fore-castle a white Bull, and that King of Crete had assumed the Name of Jupiter, hence it was fabled that the God had transformed himself into a Bull to carry off this Princess.

Herodotus in the Beginning of his History, agrees with Echemenides, that it was by Cretans the Daughter of Agenor was carried off; but then he adds, it was done by way of Reprizals, the Phœnicians having before bore away Io the Daughter of Inachus. These Testimonies are positive, and I know not why Bochart, not quite satisfied with either of the Explanations I have given, and imagining he has a Right to expect in the Equivocations of the Phœnician Language the Solution of a Phœnician Fable, says after Fullerus, that this Fable had taken its Rise from the double Signification of the Word Alpha or Ilpha, which signifies either a Bull or a Ship. He adds, that the Greeks not fully understanding that Language, when they met with that ambiguous Expression in the Annals of that People; instead of saying Asterius had carried off Europa in a Ship, fabled that Jupiter had transported her into Crete (1).

Be that as it will, 'tis certain from the Testimony of all Antiquity, that Europa was conveyed from Phœnicia into Crete, where she arrived by the Mouth of the River Lethé which ran by Gortyna, as we learn from Solinus (a).

The Greeks, who carried the Fabulous to extremity, seeing upon that River Plane-trees always green, gave out that it was under one of those Trees Jupiter had carried on his first Amours with Europa; which gave Occasion to the Inhabitants of Gortyna to strike a Medal, where on one Side was Europa in some Distress,

VOL. III.

D d

seated

(1) Bochart Can. l. 1. c. 28. & l. 2. c. 11.

(a) Gortynam Lethæus amnis præter fluit, quo Europam Tauri orso Gortynii ferunt vestitatam.

seated upon a Tree half Plane and half Palm, at the Foot whereof is an Eagle from which she is turning away. The same Princess is represented on the other Side, seated upon a Bull, incircled with a Border of Laurel-Leaves, with the Legend, ΓΟΡΤΙΝΙΩΝ (1).

Authors are not agreed as to the Name of the Prince who carried her off. Some call him Taurus, as has been said; Saint Augustine names him Xantus, and that Father adds he had several other Names besides (a). But the most common Opinion is that he was called Asterius, as we learn from Apollodorus, Diodorus, Eusebius, and several others; with this Difference that Diodorus alledges, that Prince being too young when Europa arrived in the Island of Crete, she had first by Taurus, Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthus; and that Asterius having married her afterwards, and not being able to get Children, had adopted them: Whereas others contend they were his own Off-spring.

Asterius, if we may credit the same Diodorus, was not a Native of Crete, and his Parents came from Greece. Teuſtanes the Son of Dorus, having matched with the Daughter of Cretheus, took with him some Pelasgians and Eolians, the Subjects of his Father-in-Law, and having gone over with them into Crete, was the first who reigned there. After his Death, his Son Asterius ascended the Throne, and assumed the Name of Jupiter.

Apollodorus tells us who were the Parents of Europa. Libya had two Sons by Neptune, Belus and Agenor; the latter having removed into Europe, married Telephassa, by whom he had three Sons, Cadmus, Phœnix, and Cilix, and one Daughter named Europa; though there are Historians, according to the same Author, who assert that this Princess was the Daughter of Phœnix and Grand-Daughter of Agenor.

Europa having brought forth the three Princes now named,

(1) This Medal is in the King's Cabinet.

(a) Per eos annos a Rege Xanto Cretensium, cujus apud alios aliud nomen invenimus, rapta perhibetur Europa, & inde geniti Rhadamanthus, Minos, & Sarpedon, quos magis ex eadem muliere filios Jovis esse vulgatum est. August. de Civ. Dei, l. 18. c. 12.

named, gained the Esteem and Regard of all the Cretans, who worshipped her after her Death as a Divinity. They even instituted a Feast in her Honour, which Hesychius, after some Authors, names Hellotia; and as the Greeks changed the Names of those whom they took into the Number of their Gods, they called Europa Hellotes, a Name which the Author of the Etymologicon translates Virgin; which has puzzled Bochart: for what Probability, says he, is there, that they would call the Mother of three Princes a Virgin? This inclines him to think that the Word comes from the Phœnician Hallots, which imports an Encomium, or Epithalamium, and that it was designed to signify that the Arrival of Europa and her Marriage had been solemnized by Verses and Songs; which Solemnity probably was renewed every Year during her Life, and continued after her Death in the Festival instituted to her Honour, which retained the same Name Hellotia, or the Epithalamium, as well as the City Gortys where it was celebrated: Itaque Hallots, vel Hellots Hellotia dici potuere a Cretensibus Europæ festa epithalamia, quæ renovabantur quotannis (1).

Those who are not satisfied with Bochart's Conjecture, may adopt the following one which I am going to offer. Minerva, among several other Names, had that of Hellotis; which Name was given her upon the following Occasion. The Dorians having set Fire to the City Corinth, Eurithion and Hellotis, who were two Sisters, fled into the Temple of that Goddess, and died there. The Pestilence afterwards laying waste the whole Country, they consulted the Oracle, who answered that they were to appease the Manes of the two Virgins now named: Accordingly a Temple was built to Minerva Hellotis, and a Festival instituted to her under that Name. The Cretans having afterwards worshipped Europa as a Goddess, gave her the Surname of Minerva, and celebrated to her Honour the Festival which was consecrated to that Goddess among the Corinthians. What further confirms this Opinion, the Sidonians, to console Agenor, likewise deified that Princess, and confounded the Worship which they paid to her, with that of Astarté; which makes Lucian say, that they were both but one and the same Divinity.

Dd 2 the

(1) Bochart. Chan. l. 1. c. 18.

We are farther to observe that several Authors were of Opinion Europe had taken its Name from that Princess; but the learned Bochart believes with more Reason, that this Part of the World was so denominated from the Whiteness of its Inhabitants, as has been said in the Origin of Fables. We may however presume that had Europe been so called from its Whiteness, the Name should have extended to all that Part of the World whose Inhabitants are of that Complexion. As to what remains, that Princess must needs have been extremely white, since the Poets on that Occasion invented the Fable, importing that the young Angelo, the Daughter of Jupiter and Juno, had stole her Mother's Paint and given it to Europa, who made Use of it with such Success that she acquired a Complexion bright to the last Degree, as we learn from the Scholiast on Theocritus.

Upon the News of the Rape of Europa, Agenor her Father, King of Phœnicia, sent every where in search of her, and ordered his Sons to imbark, and not return till they found her. Hyginus (1) names the three Princes whom Agenor sent out to make the Discovery. The first was Cadmus, who fixed his Residence in Beotia; the second Cilix, who settled in that Part of Asia Minor, which goes since under the Name of Cilicia; and the third Phœnix, who passed into Africa. Thus the Poets and Mythologists relate this Fact; but Conon in Photius (2), says, the true Reason of Cadmus's Voyage, which is also to be understood of his two Brothers, was the Hope of making some Conquest in Europe, and of settling there a Colony, adding that the Rape of his Sister had only been a Pretext for his Voyage.

Cadmus having traversed a Part of Greece without any Information of her, thought fit to settle in Beotia, where where he built the famous City Thebes, upon the Model of that of Egypt, whereof he was a Native; or to speak more accurately, he built a Citadel which was called from his Name Cadmea, and only laid the Foundations of the City Thebes, built by his Successors, and inclosed with Walls by Amphion. There is nothing but what is natural in such a Settlement, and a Narration quite simple would have sufficed for transmitting the History of it down to us; but this was not the Manner in which the Greeks laboured for Posterity. This Relation they have interspersed with all the Marvellous they could think of. Cadmus, say they, having sent his Associates into a Grove consecrated to Mars, there to draw Water for a Sacrifice he designed to offer to the Gods, before he laid the Foundations of his new City, a Serpent which had the Keeping of that Place, devoured them, and Cadmus to revenge their Death, fought the Monster and slew him, sowed his Teeth, whence sprung up a Body of armed Men: They added that he threw a Stone among them; which put them into such Disorder, that they fought together and slew one another, all but five, who assisted him in building the City now named (a): Which cost him dear afterwards, as shall be said.

(1) Fab. 178. (2) Narr. 37.

Those who have no Mind to dive into Subjects of this Kind, content themselves with saying after Palephatus (1), and some others (2), that the Serpent was a King of that Country, whose Name was Draco, a Son of Mars, that his mysterious Teeth are his Subjects, who rallied again after his Defeat; that Cadmus put them all to the Sword except Echthonius, Edeus, Hiperenor, Pelorus, and Echion, who joined with him. Or with Heraclitus (3), that Cadmus actually slew a Serpent which made great Havock in Beotia; a Thing

D d 3

usual

(a) *Martigenam ille aggressus Belluam
Magnus Europæ quæstor, anguineo
Repente hostes peperit seminio, & pugnata illa pugna
Frater trudebat fratrem hasta & galea.*

Plaut. Amphit. Act. 4. Ovid. Met. l. 3. Apollod. l. 3. &c.

(1) Lib. cit. (2) First Supplement to Velleius. (3) De reb. Incredibil.

usual enough in Countries where Colonies were settled. But Bochart (1), and after him M. le Clerc (2), take the Rise of the Fable to be a Phœnician Word, which signifies either a Serpent's Teeth, or Javelins trimmed with Brass, and that which signifies the Number five, likewise signifies armed. Thus the Greeks in writing the History of that Planter from the Phœnician Annals, instead of saying that Cadmus upon his Arrival in their Country had armed his Soldiers with Javelins trimmed with Brass, with Helmets and Cuirasses, which were then quite unknown in Greece, chose rather to take Advantage of the equivocal Meaning of the Word, and say agreeably to their own Taste, that he had five Companions sprung from the Teeth of a Serpent (a).

And to be sure, nothing can be a fuller Proof that this Fable had taken its Rise from a figurative Expression, than what we read in Herodotus (3) of Psammeticus, King of Egypt, who having been banished to the Fœnus, sent to consult the Oracle of Latona, who told him he was to be re-instated by Men of Brass sprung from the Sea; which at first seemed to him a Chimera. However some Years after, a Band of Ionians who had been necessitated to land in Egypt, appeared upon the Shore with their Arms and Cuirasses of Brass, and those who perceived them told the King that Men armed with Cuirasses were pillaging the Country. Then that Prince comprehended the Meaning of the Oracle, and having made a League with them, regained the Crown by their Means. Further, those Men sprung from the Sea, and those others sprung from the Earth, are only the Soldiers who assisted Cadmus and Psammeticus to resettle their Affairs; and what confirms Bochart's Conjecture, Cadmus was he who introduced into Greece, or invented the Use of Cuirasses and Javelins, as we are told by Hyginus. However,

(1) Cæn. Pref. & ch. 19. l. 1. (2) Upon Hesiod.

(a) The same Phrase which ought to have been rendered : Conscribere exercitum virorum armatorum cuspidibus æneis, was interpreted by this : Fecit exercitum quinque virorum armatorum ex dentibus serpentis. Bochart. lib. cit.

(3) L. 2.

However, I am of Opinion that, without refining so much, we may very rationally take those Men who sprung out of the Earth and from the Dragon's Teeth, to have been the People of the Country, whom Cadmus found a Way to bring over to his Side, and who having assisted him to get rid of his Enemies, served him afterwards in building the Citadel which secured him against the Insults of his Neighbours.

According to the Fable told by Ovid (1), Apollodorus (2), and Seneca (3), the Oracle had informed Cadmus, that in the Place where he should find a Heifer, he was to build a City, which accordingly he did; and this was the Reason of his giving to the Country the Name Beotia, Boeotia, a Bove. But this Fiction has no other Foundation but either the Ignorance or Credulity of the Greeks, who did not know that Cadmus had assigned that Name to the Country where he settled, upon account of the Nature of the Soil full of Clay and Fens, as Bochart also remarks (4).

Cadmus having reigned a long Time in Beotia, with his dear Hermione (a), a Conspiracy was formed against him, which drove him out of the Kingdom. Being thus forced to retire with his Wife, and his Son Polydorus into Illyricum, he there led a very reclusive Life (b); which perhaps gave a Handle to say that after his Death he was transformed into a Serpent, as we learn from Ovid (5) and Plautus (6).

The Phœnicians, or rather the Idumeans, were antiently called Achivians, or Heveans, a Name which they always kept from their Settlement in Greece: Now Chiva in Hebrew imports a Serpent; and this is doubtless

D d 4

(1) Met. l. 3. (2) L. 3. (3) In Oedip. (4) Chan. l. 1.

(a) She was the Daughter of the Grecian Mars of whom we have spoke. Apollodorus says, Cadmus had been eight Years a Slave to that Prince for slaying the Dragon.

(b) Yet Apollodorus says, Bib. l. 3. he commanded the Army of the Illyrians, who chose him afterwards for their King.

(5) Met. l. 3.

(6) - - - - - Et nostræ auctorem gentis,

Cum Veneris filiâ, angues repisse tellus

Illyrica vidit.

Plaut. Amphit. Ac. 4.

doubtless what gave a Handle to his Subjects, firnamed Achiviens, who had nothing better to say of the obscure Life and Death of their Heroes, than to publish by Means of that Word, that Cadmus and Hermione had been transformed into Serpents (a); and to give more Countenance to the Thing, they even erected in Illyricum Serpents of Stone, as Monuments of the Supernatural Transformation of their Founder. Thus all those Ideas of Dragons and Serpents which we find scattered up and down in the Poets who speak of that Prince, derive their Original from thence. But if we chuse not to give Credit to the Author now quoted, we may account for this last Fable, from what Aulus Gellius says of the Illyrians.

According to that Author, the antient Inhabitants of Illyricum had two Eye-lids to each Eye; and such a piercing Look, that if they fixed their Aspect upon any one, they killed him as a Dragon or Basilisk would have done. This Opinion, true or false, which was conceived of the Illyrians, a People otherwise rude and savage, made the Greeks probably call them Serpents and Dragons; and consequently when Cadmus had retired among that People, they must have said he was become an Illyrian, a Dragon, a Serpent; a metaphorical Expression, which was afterwards understood in the literal Meaning.

Cadmus had built a City in Illyricum, which he called Lygnes; and Bochart, always ingenious and fruitful in Conjectures, produces a pretty probable one as to the Name of that City, and the Lake of the same Name in the Country of the Ancheleans, a People of Illyricum, among whom Cadmus retired. 'Tis probable, says he, that he gave it a Phœnician Name: Now as the Place where he built was very fenny, he called it Licbnoth, which is the Contraction of Lecanoth, which in that Language imports a Reed; thus (a) Ptolomy Ephestin is, I believe, the only one who says that Cadmus and Hermione was transformed into Licens.

The Hebrews said they had given a People of Canaan the Name of Cbiwa, because they dwelt in Caves, after the Manner of Serpents.

thus the City and the Lake were called from that Time by the same Name, unless you will derive this Original from the Greek Language, which however is not so probable, and say the Foundation of the Name was that the Lake abounded with Eels, whence it was thus denominated, as well as the People and the neighbouring City : Ἐγχελύναι, Enchelavians, quasi Anguilares (1).

'Tis not universally agreed that Cadmus was the Son of Agenor ; some alledge he was but one of his Officers, and Hermione a Singing-Woman whom he had debauched, and that it was only to do him Honour that the Greeks made him the Son of that Prince. Eubemerus, as we have it in Athenæus, who has preserved the Fragment of that Author (2), says Cadmus was the King of Sidon's Cook, and that he fell in Love with Hermione, one of that Prince's Singing-Women, carried her off, and retired into Greece, a Circumstance which does no great Honour to Bacchus his Grand-Son, whom the Greeks enrolled among their Gods.

Others even alledge, that Cadmus is not a proper Name, but an Appellative, which signifies Leader, because in Fact he came from Phœnicia, not to go in quest of Europa, but to plant a Colony of Heveans in Greece ; and Bochart contends that he was called Cadmus, only because he came from the East of Phœnicia, a Country which the Scripture calls Cadmonim, which imports Oriental, and from about Mount Hermion, which was the most eastern Part of Phœnicia, whence probably was derived the Name of Hermione, given to his Wife.

According to the Antients, it was Cadmus taught the Greeks the Use of Letters, which they knew not before. These Letters, which Herodotus calls Cadmian or Phœnician, were afterwads called Ionian : Which is to be understood in the Manner I am going to explain. There is no Ground to think that the Use of Letters, which is pro-

(1) See Grant-Menil in his Greece, c. 25. p. 207. (2) Athen. 948.

probably as old as the World (a), was unknown in Greece until the Time of Cadmus. But the Foundation of that Opinion, is, that he introduced into the Country a new Alphabet which the Greeks afterwards made Use of, instead of the Pelasgian which was there in Use long before. 'Tis however to be observed that this Alphabet had only sixteen Letters ; Palamedes added to it four (1), and Simonides of Melos the other four (2). Thus was compleated that Alphabet whereof the first sixteen Letters were Phœnician ; which is so certain, that the old Greek Characters are entirely like those of the Phœnicians, as all the Learned are agreed.

'Tis beyond Doubt that Letters were not unknown in Greece before Cadmus, as has been now said : The Pelasgians, the most antient People of that Country, had the Use of them. My Author is Eustatbius, who explaining the Epithet of Divine, θεῖος, which Homer gives the Pelasgians (3), says : Homer calls them Divine, because they alone after Deucalion's Deluge preserved the Use of Letters. Pliny (4) seems to confirm this Opinion, by saying : Pelasgos in Latium Literas attulisse. 'Tis true Diodorus (5) reckons the Pelasgians to have been the first who changed the Phœnician Characters of Cadmus, and that their Letters were therefore called Pelasgian ; which would prove that those People had them not before. However Vossius (6) cannot be justified for saying Se non legisse ullas fuisse in Græcia litteras Cadmæis antiquiores, since he had read Eustatbius, who says the Contrary. M. de Grant-Menil in his Greece (7), gives a favourable Gloss to the Passage in Diodorus, by saying, he means that upon the Cadmean Letters being received in Greece, the antient Writing came to be called Pelasgian ; and if this was not his Meaning he has contradicted himself, since he asserts elsewhere (8) that the Greeks had the Use of Letters before Cadmus.

But we shall not dwell longer upon this Article, as to which

(a) See Father Kirker in his Obelisks. Joseph. l. 1. Antiq. &c.

(1) ΘΣΨΧ. (2) ΖΗΨΩ. (3) Upon the 6. Book of the Iliad.

(4) L. 7. (5) L. 3. (6) Art. Gram. (7) Ch. 9. (8) L. 5.

which I refer to Montfaucon's Paleography, & Olaus Rudbeck (1).

Besides the Alphabet which we have been speaking of, Cadmus introduced into Greece the Worship of most of the Divinities of Egypt and Phœnicia, as Diodorus and the most antient Authors inform us ; but especially that of Osiris or Bacchus. This Prince having travelled into Samothrace, got himself initiated into the Mysteries of the Gods Cabiri and of the Mother of the Gods, whose Worship was then famous in that Country ; and Diodorus Siculus informs us (2), that when he stopped in the Island of Rhodes, he there built a Temple to Neptune, to make that God propitious to him in the rest of his Voyage. 'Tis probable, to mention it by the Way, that the Rhodians had received the Worship of Neptune by their Commerce with the Libyans, who, according to Herodotus (3), worshipped him Time immemorial. Lastly, Cadmus is said to have taught the Greeks the Art of casting Metals, then unknown to Greece, to make it subservient to several Uses ; which agrees with what we have said of those Javelins of Brass whereof he was the Inventor.

The History of Cadmus's Family is preserved to us by the Antients, especially by Apollodorus (4), and we find it also conform to that Author upon a Fragment of the Isiac Table, conceived in these Terms : Cadmus had by Hermonia four Daughters, Ino, Agave, Autonoe, Semele, and a Son named Polydorus. Aristæus and Autonoe had a Son Acteon. Athamas and Ino had Learchus and Melicerta. Echion and Agave, Pentheus. Jupiter had Commerce with Semele, and having burnt her with his Lightning, took out of her Womb Dionysius or Bacchus, and carried him in his Thigh, whence he afterwards brought him forth, and gave him to be nursed by Juno (a).

As

(1) Atl. v. 1. c. 38. (2) L. 5. (3) L. 2. (4) L. 2.

(a) 'Tis M. Bianchini has given a Draught of the Fragment where we find this Genealogy ; Fabretti knew nothing of it, when in 1683 he published the Isiac Table.

As this whole Family was extremely unhappy, it was given out, in order to support the Fable of the Rape of Europa, that the Jealous Juno had persecuted her Rival even in the Posterity of Cadmus her Brother; or that Vulcan, to revenge the Infidelity of his Wife Venus, gave to Hermione, whom she had by Mars, a Vestment dyed in all Sorts of Crimes, which had Effect to make all the Children of Cadmus wicked. Whatever be in that, 'tis certain that the greatest Crimes and Disasters were the Lot of this Family; Ino, who married Athamas, died miserably with her Children, as has been said in the History of the Sea-Gods (1). Agave the Wife of Echion, saw her Son the unfortunate Pentheus torn in Pieces by the Bacchanals, for having attempted to oppose the Irregularities that entered into the Ceremonies of Bacchus; unhappy for not having profited by the Example of Cadmus, who was banished for that same Reason (a). Farther the Manner in which Ovid describes the tragical End of that unfortunate Prince, is but too historical; the Bacchanals having made Choice of a Day for celebrating the Feasts of Bacchus, whereof one of the principal Ceremonies was to run up and down all disheveled, as delirious, they went to the Palace of Pentheus, and most inhumanly tore him in Pieces. Ovid had taken this whole Relation from Euripides, who had employed it in the Tragedy of the Bacchanals; and it evidently appears that under the Veil of this Fiction they intended to transmit down to us the History of the Introduction of Bacchus's Worship into Thebes, and to inform us that Pentheus's Opposition, which succeeded that of his Grandfather Cadmus after he had been exiled, cost him his Life.

Autonoe the Wife of Aristeus, was so unhappy as to see her Son Alceon transformed into a Stag, and torn in Pieces by his own Dogs, for having seen Diana in the Bath; and though this Catastrophe is expressed in a poetical

(1) Vol. II. B. 2.

(a) Here the Reader may reflect on what has been said to this Purpose in the History of Bacchus. Vol. II. B. 2.

a poetical Manner (1), 'tis not the less real; whether this Prince was slain by his Dogs turned mad, as some Authors will have it (2), or that having shewed some Disregard for that Goddess, he had been reckoned impious, as we learn from Diodorus (3) and Euripides (4), who adds that he was going to eat of the Meat that had been offered to her in Sacrifice, and with insupportable Pride had preferred himself to her; which Ovid describes under the Parable of a vain Curiosity. The Poet Stesichorus, as we read in Pausanias, added to this dismal Adventure, that Diana herself had covered Acteon with the Skin of a Deer, which provoked his Dogs to fall upon and destroy him; and that as a Punishment for having designed to marry Semele; a Circumstance not told by Ovid. In fine, Semele perished miserably, if we may credit the Poets, for her fatal Curiosity to see Jupiter in all his divine Majesty.

From all that we have now said, we may draw these Conclusions; 1. Cadmus was a foreign Prince, a Native of Phœnicia. 2. The Country which he inhabited before his Retreat into Greece, being upon the East of Mount Hermon, the Hebrews gave that Country the Name of Quadmi or Quadmon. 3. The People whom he brought with him, were named Heveans, whence came the Fable of the Serpents or Dragons, which Bockart has very well explained. 4. That the Greeks have made Cadmus the King of Sidon's Son, tho' he was only his Master-cook. 5. That the Cadmoneans and Heveans were but one and the same People; and that the first of those Names was given them only because they dwelt in the East. Accordingly we read in Joshua, and in the Book of Judges, that the Heveans were surnamed Orientals and Quadmonim. 6. That from Mount Hermon, Cadmus's Wife Harmonia, or Hermione, had her Name. 7. That both of them were said to be transformed into Serpents, only from the Name of Heveans which they went by. 8. That

(1) Ovid. Met. l. 3. (2) Pauf. in Beot. c. 1. (3) Lib. 4. (4) In Bacchis.

8. That what gave a Handle to say that Cadmus's Soldiers were five in Number, was the Equivocation of the Word Camosh, which signifies either five or armed: For the Sake of the Fable the first Signification was chosen preferably to the second. 9. That such another Mistake gave the Greeks a Handle to say, as we are told by Hyginus, that Cadmus was the Inventor of the Uses to which Brass was afterwards applied, and that he had found out the Stone for making Brass, named by Pliny Cadmia. 10. That Cadmus, banished from Thebes by Amphion and Zethus, according to Eusebius, or by the People named Encbēlean, according to Diodorus Siculus, led a Part of his Colony into the Place of his Exile. The eleventh Inference is, that we may, and that we ought perhaps, entirely to detach the History of Cadmus from that of the Rape of Europa, tho' the Greek Authors have joined them together. The last Inference is, that by the Generations from Tbersander, who lived at the Beginning of the Trojan War, tracing back to Cadmus, the Number whereof is preserved to us in Herodotus, Pausanias, and almost all the Antients who had Occasion to mention them, especially if with the Author of The Critical Reflections we join to them the History of the Kings of Troy, from Dardanus Contemporary with Cadmus, to Priam, we may fix the Æra of the Entry of the Phœnician Chief into Beotia, as well as that of Dardanus into Pbrygia, to the Year 200 before the taking of Troy. Accordingly, we find between Cadmus, and Tbersander, who was slain by Thelephus in the first Year of the Siege of that City, only six Generations, Cadmus, Pentheus, Polydorus, Labdacus, Laius, Oedipus, Polynices and Tbersander, which, according to the usual Manner of reckoning, amount only to 200 Years.

We may remark, 1. That I name indeed eight Persons, which would make seven Generations; but Pentheus and Polydorus make but one, their Reigns, especially that of the first, having been very short. 2. It will be objected, that I mention neither Amphion, on,

on, nor his Uncle Lycus, who both reigned at Thebes, as well as Creon, after the Death of Laius, slain by Oedipus; but these three Princes who usurped the Crown, the two first from Polydorus, and the last during the Interregnum which followed upon Laius's Death, make no Addition to the Number of Generations in Cadmus's Family, which followed one another equally during the Space of Time that these three Princes reigned; and we are only to look upon them as precarious Reigns, which had it not been for the Misfortunes that befel that Family, might equally have been filled up by the Successors of Cadmus. But a short History of those Reigns will clear up what seems obscure in this Place.

Cadmus being dethroned, as has been said, Pentheus was substituted in his Place; but he being torn in Pieces by the Bacchanals, Polydorus ascended the Throne, whence he too was expelled for having attempted to reform the Worship of Bacchus, which was become very indecent. He was succeeded by his Son Labdacus (1), who married Nyctis, the Daughter of Nycteus, by whom he had a Son named Laius, who was but an Infant in the Cradle when his Father died; which induced Lycus, the Brother of Nycteus, to seize upon his Nephew's Crown.

Not long before the Death of Nycteus, his Daughter Antiope, who had hearkened to the Solicitations of her Gallant, whom she alledged to be Jupiter (2), had been obliged, in order to shun her Father's Displeasure, to retire to the Court of Epopeus King of Sicyon, who married her. Nycteus, upon his Death-bed, engaged his Brother Lycus to punish his Daughter and his Son-in-law, which he faithfully put in Execution; for having put Epopeus to Death, he brought away his Niece, who was delivered by the Way of two Sons, who were therefore called Zethus and Amphion (3). When Antiope was in a Condition to be transported, Nycteus delivered her to his Wife Dirce, who who for several Years treated her in the most cruel Manner possible ; but she at last having found a Way to make her Escape, went in quest of her two Sons to the Persons with whom she had intrusted them, who having entred Thebes Sword in Hand, slew Lycus, and bound Dircé to the Tail of a wild Bull, whereby she died a miserable Death, made themselves Masters of the City, and banished Laius from it, who did not recover the Kingdom till after their Death, as shall be said in resuming the History of Thebes, upon occasion of Oedipus the Son of the same Laius.

(1) Apollod. l. 3. (2) Id. ib. Pausan. in Cor. &c. (3) That is, quasi in Bivio nati.

The Punishment of Dircé is represented in a fine Groupe which Montfaucon has published, where you see that Princess bound to the Tail of a monstrous Bull. Again, Amphion is he who built the Walls of Thebes during his Reign ; and the Poets fabled that he had built them by the Musick of his Lyre, by which Figure they give us to know, that besides his Skill in playing upon that Instrument (a), he had been so eloquent as to persuade a rude People to quit the Fields and Woods, where they led a wandering and unsettled Life, to repair into a City, and secure themselves by Walls both against their Enemies and the wild Beasts (b). For sure no Body will understand literally what Pausanias relates (i) of some Stones neither polished nor cut, that were to be seen near the Tomb of that Prince, and which were said to be the Remains of those which he had drawn after him by the Sound of his Lyre.

We may remark however, 1. That as the poetical Fables were invented at different Times, 'tis probable

(a) Plin. l. 7. c. 56. and after him Pausanias in Beot. c. 5. say that Amphion, Tantalus's Kinsman, had taught the Lydians Musick, wherein he excelled, and introduced the Harmony thereof into Greece, having added three Strings to the four which the Lute then had. See the Notes of M. Burette upon Plutarch's Dialogue of Musick. Mem. of the Acad. of the Belles Lettres, Vol. 9.

(b) Diſtus & Amphion Thebanæ conditor arcis

Saxa movere sono testudinis, & prece blanda

Ducere quo vellet. Horat. de Art. Poet.

Memia Phebeæ structa canore lyre. Ovid. Met. l. 6.

(i) In Beot.

probable that this is pretty late, and that it was not propagated till after Homer; since that Poet, so knowing in the Pagan Mythology, would not have failed to speak of it in that Passage of the Odyſſey (1), where he makes Mention of thoſe two Princes who fortified Thebes by ſeven good Gates, and raiſed Towers at proper Diſtances, without which, ſays he, however formidable they were, they could not have lived ſecure in that great City. But, as Pauſanias very well remarks (2), “ That Poet ſays not a Word “ of Amphion’s miraculous Voice, nor of the Walls “ of Thebes built by the Muſick of his Lyre.” It was probably the Author of the Poem upon Europa, mentioned by the ſame Author, that invented this Fable, ſince in that Work Amphion was ſaid to have learned from Mercury to play upon the Lyre, and by his melodious Muſick to have made the wild Beaſts and the very Stones to follow him.

Again, the Author of the Poem of the Myniad, whereof the ſame Pauſanias makes mention, is the only one of the Antients, ſo far as I know, who ſays that Amphion ſuffered in Hell the ſame Punishment with the Thracian Thamyris, and that for having ſlighted Latona and her Children (a).

2. That as theſe antient Hiſtories were not very conſiſtent, Pauſanias (3) relates ſomewhat differently the Hiſtory of Antiope and her Amours. Antiope, ſays he, the Daughter of Nycteus, was then famous through all Greece for her ſingular Beauty; ſhe was even ſaid to be the Daughter, not of that Prince, but of the River Aſopus, which waters the Lands of the Plateans and Thebans. Whether it was that Epopeus wanted to marry her, or being violently in love with her, was willing to gratify his Paſſion at any Rate, he committed a Rape upon her. The Thebans determined to avenge this Injury, marched directly againſt him;

VOL. III.

E e

(1) L. 2. (2) In Corinth.

(a) See what has been ſaid to this Purpoſe in the Hiſtory of Niobe, B. 1.

(3) In Corinth.

him ; the Battle was bloody ; there Nycteus received a mortal Wound, whereby Epopeus gained the Victory, but he too was wounded. Nycteus being carried back to Thebes, and perceiving he had but a short While to live, left the Administration of the Kingdom to his Brother Lycus, which by Right belonged to Labdacus his Pupil, the Son of Polydorus and Cadmus's Grandson. He also gave the Tutorage of the young Prince to Lycus ; but at the same Time adjuring him to revenge his Death, by engaging Epopeus with stronger Forces, and to punish Antiope, if she fell into his Hands. In the mean time Epopeus was chiefly concerned to give Thanks to the Gods for the Success of his Arms, and to build a Temple to Minerva. When the Temple was finished, he prayed the Goddess to let him know by some Sign whether the Consecration of it was agreeable to her ; and 'tis said, that immediately after his Prayer an Olive-tree was seen to spring up before the Gate of the Temple ; notwithstanding, in a few Days after Epopeus died of his Wound which he had neglected. His Death put an End to the War, for Laomedon, who succeeded him, again delivered up Antiope into the Hands of Lycus : She was carried back to Thebes, and in the Way thither, not far from Eleutherae, she was delivered of her two Sons, upon which Subject Asius the Son of Amphiptolemus made Verses to the following Effect.

The charming Antiope, Daughter of Asopus, was Mistress to Epopeus, and to Jove himself : No Wonder then if she was the Mother of two Heroes, Amphion and Zethus.

3. Tho' Dircé has been reckoned a very cruel Princess, because of the Evils she was the Cause of Antiope's suffering, yet as she paid singular Honour to Bacchus, that God espoused her Quarrel, by depriving Antiope of the Use of Reason (1). She was rambling thro' Greece like a Vagabond, when Phorcas, the Son of Ornytion, and Grandson of Sisyphus, having

(1) Pausan. in Beot.

ing found her by Chance, first cured, and then married her.

4. That the Transformation of Dircé into a Fountain is only one of those Embellishments that used to be superadded to the History of Persons distinguished either by their Birth or Beauty; and the Foundation of this Fiction is the Name of a Fountain that runs near Thebes, which in Arabic was called Zarca, or Zirca, which imports clear; a Name which had been given to it to signify the Purity and Clearness of its Water; which Statius (1) expresses in this Verse :

Cærulea cum rubuit leoneo sanguine Dircé.

The Greeks changing the Z into a D, and softening the Pronunciation of the Word, made it Dircé; and to celebrate more magnificently the tragical End of the Wife of Lycus, who was dragged about that Fountain, they thought fit to say that Bacchus had transformed her into that Fountain round which she had been dragged (2).

5. That notwithstanding all the Misfortunes that befel Cadmus's Family, several of those who belonged to it, were advanced either to the Rank of Gods or Demi-Gods. I have already mentioned from Pausanias the heroical Monuments that had been raised in Honour of that Prince, as also of the Worship that had been paid to Aristeus one of his Grandsons, and to the unfortunate Æteon, who, according to Pausanias, was acknowledged for a Hero by the Orchomenians; to Semelé and Ino his Daughters; but an Altar, dug up lately near Cologne, and explained by an Academic of Lyons (3), informs us also, that the other two Daughters of Cadmus participated of the same Honours; the Inscription which is upon the Altar bearing, DEÆ SEMELÆ ET SORORIBUS EJUS DEABUS, &c. (a).

E e 2

No

(1) Thebaid. (2) Bochart Chan. l. i. c. 78. (3) See the Journal of Trevoux, July 1738.

(a) See what has been said of them in the History of the Mother-Goddesses, Vol. III. B. 6.

No Body hitherto questioned the Deification of Semelé Bacchus's Mother, nor that of Ino the Nurse of that God, and of this we have occasionally said enough: But as to their two Sisters Autonoe and Agavé little or nothing is known about them: Only Pausanias tells us, that the first having left Thebes, came and settled in a Town dependent upon Megara, where her Tomb was to be seen; but as for Agavé, the barbarous Agavé, the most zealous in exciting her Companions to tear in Pieces the unhappy Pentheus; by what Means had she arrived at divine Honours? Perhaps it was for that same Zeal she had shewn for the Worship of Bacchus. Besides, she had contributed with her Sisters to the Education of that God, and nothing more was necessary to intitle her to the same Honours with her Sisters; but it suffices that the Altar in question is an incontestable Proof that she shared therein.

We might further cite a Monument published by Gruter, on which are represented four Women, with this Inscription, To the four Sisters; but the Antiquaries are not all agreed that it relates to the Daughters of Cadmus. To make what I have said of the Posterity of Cadmus the more intelligible, I here subjoin his Genealogy, and that of his Alliance with the House of Nycteus.

The POSTERITY of CADMUS.

Agenor had by Telephossa his Wife, three Sons and one Daughter,	Cadmus ; sent by his Father in Quest of his Sister Europa , built the City Thebes .	Polydorus married Nycteis , Daughter of Nycteus , Autonoe , who mar- ried Aristeus . Ino , the Wife of Athamas Son of Eolus . Agave , who married Echion . Semele , Mistress to Jupiter , Mother of the Grecian Bacchus .	Labdacus , { Laius , dethroned by Lycus his Un- cle and then slain by his Son,	Oedipus had by his Mo- ther, { Antigone , a Daughter, Etheocles , Polynices ,	{ They killed one another.

Phœnix, from whom the Phœnicians derived their Name, who were then very powerful in Asia. The Seat of his Empire was at Thebes in Egypt.
Cilix, who gave Name to Cilicia.
Europa, ravished by Jupiter.

I said that Laius was dethroned by his Grand-Uncle Lycus, and the following Table will shew their Degree of Consanguinity.

The ALLIANCE between the Family of CADMUS and of NYCTEUS.

Who was their Fa- ther is not known,	Nycteus , come from Eubœa with his Bro- ther,	Nycteis , who mar- ried Polydorus Son of Cadmus ,	Labdacus . {	Laius dethroned.
		Antiope , who had by Jupiter ,	Zethus , Amphion ,	Brought up by a Priest, they avenged the Injuries done to their Mother Dirce .
	Lycus , Brother of Nycteus ,	He had to Wife Dirce , and dethroned Laius . He took Antiope his Niece, who had married Epopeus . Dirce having used her very ill, she was avenged by Zethus and Am- phion , who slew Lycus and bound Dirce to a mad Bull.

C H A P. VIII.

The Arrival of Pelops in Greece.

TO conclude : The last Foreigner who arrived in Greece before the Destruction of Troy, was Pelops the Son of Tantalus, King of Lydia. This Prince, forced to fly his Country upon account of the War which Tros had waged with him, to revenge the Rape of Ganymede, retired into Greece, where he married Hippodamia the Daughter of Oenomaus King of Pisa, ascended the Throne after the Death of his Father-in-law, and communicated his Name to that Part of the Peninsula, which was from that Time called the Peloponnesus, or the Island of Pelops : Nor was his Dominion confined to that Count y, since he possessed himself of Ætolia from Ætolus the Son of Endymion, who was King thereof ; and by his vast Riches he became one of the most powerful Kings of Greece.

This Prince had two Sons, Atreus and Thyestes, famous for their mutual Hatred to one another. Atreus was the Father of Agamemnon and Menelaus, who assisted in the Trojan War. I shall handle more particularly the History of Pelops and his Descendants, who reigned at Mycenæ until the Return of the Hercleide, in speaking of Agamemnon and his Family.

The only Question here is to settle the Æras : Now that of Pelops's Arrival in Greece, must necessarily fall about the 110 or 120 Year before the Trojan War. 'Tis true, between that Prince and Agamemnon who commanded the Grecian Troops at the Siege of that City, there are only two Generations, which would not require so great an Interval ; but on the Side of his Daughter Lysidice, who married Mestor, and of his Son Pitheus, who reigned at Trezen, there is a far greater Number. Ethra, the Daughter of this Pitheus, was the Mother of Theseus, who was born upwards of 60 Years before the War now in question : Thus, taking a just Medium between these several Generations, we ought to place the Æra of Pelop's

Pelops's Arrival in Greece in the Time where I have now fixed it.

Such are the principal Æras of the History of the heroic Age. No doubt the Reader will have observed that I contract a little the Duration until the Trojan War; for as to the taking of that City, I always place it either in the Year 1183, or 1184 before the Christian Æra, according to the Opinion of Eratoſthenes and Apollodorus; and tho', in my other Works upon Mythology, I have followed another Chronology, I thought myself bound to alter it, for the Reasons which I am going to offer. Why then, in beginning with that which is better known to us, and tracing back from the taking of Troy to the Arrival of the Colonies in Greece, I have only found the Space of Time which I have fixed; namely, from the taking of that City to Pelops, only about three or four Generations, which yield only 100, or 120 Years: From the same Æra to Cadmus there are only six; so that we can fix that Interval only to about 200 Years. From Dencalion to the same Æra are only seven Generations; therefore I thought proper to reckon only two hundred and thirty Years Distance between the Arrival of that Prince in Thessaly and the Trojan War; the Succession of the Kings of Athens alone is Confirmation thereof. The Arrival of Cecrops, which gives Occasion to the first Æra of the Parian Marbles, can only reach back to two hundred and sixty Years before the Trojan War, since that City was taken under the Reign of Mnestheus his eleventh Successor, and we must even lengthen a little the Reigns of these Princes. The same Number of Generations from Danaus to the foreſaid Æra, and that of Inachus's Descendants to Danaus, have served me for a Guide in determining the Time which elapsed from the Foundation of the Kingdom of Argos until my last Æra. I say nothing here of the Kingdom of Sicyon, because most Authors reckon fictitious the first Kings whom I have named from Syncellus, and since Homer makes the first of those Kings to have lived only about the Time of the Trojan War.

Of these different Colonies came the Heroes who gave Name to the Age under our Consideration in this Volume ; and as in after Ages they made Greece exceedingly famous, the Recital of their Actions is to make the most considerable Part of this History.

B O O K II.

Of the HEROES.

THE Heroes, as we have already observed, were not known out of Greece, where their Names were synonymous with that of Demi-Gods. A very high Opinion was conceived of those illustrious Men, and they were considered as Persons signalized by their glorious Deeds, and as a kind of Giants, or at least Men of a Stature far superior to that of ordinary Mortals. This is the Idea we have of them from the Poets, from Homer especially, who makes them throw Stones which four Men of his Time could hardly have raised from the Ground. The Historians have sometimes described them like the Poets ; and Pausanias (1) says Polydamas was the tallest Man had been seen since the heroic Age. But before we speak of the Honours that were paid them, we must enquire into the Original of their Name.

C H A P. I.

The Original of the Name of Heroe, and what Kind of Worship was paid to them who acquired it.

THE most known Names are often those whose Original is most obscure : Accordingly the Antients assign several Etymologies of the Name Heroe. Some derive it from the Word Eros, Love, to denote that the Heroes were the Offspring of the Love of the Gods for mortal Women, or of the Goddesses for Men ;

(1) In Att.

Men; for there were Heroes of both these Kinds. Servius is not far from this Opinion, since he says the Appellation of Heroe was given to those who sprung from the Embraces of Spirits under visible Forms with Women; and according to that Author, the Name was synonymous with that of Demon or Genius; but this Original cannot hold, since we find several Heroes who were the Sons of mere Mortals. St. Augustine (1) derives the Name from that of Juno, called in Greek Hera, whence, according to him, the Name of Heroe was given to one of her Sons (a). But as I know no Author names this Son of Juno, whom St. Augustine himself was not acquainted with, I reckon we are not to lay much Stress upon this Etymology; and I would rather adhere to the Opinion of those who derive the Name from the Valour and Courage of the Persons on whom it was conferred, ἀπὸ τῆς Ἀρετῆς.

Herodotus (2) and Pausanias (3) let us know the Distinction that was made between the Gods and the Heroes; and tho' I have said something of this in the very Beginning of this Work, I judge it proper to go deeper into the Subject. According to these two Authors, the Worship of the Gods consisted in Sacrifices and Libations, which, say they, are Honours due to the Divinity; whereas that of the Heroes was only a kind of Funeral Solemnity, wherein the Memory of their Exploits was celebrated; which makes the first of these Historians say in that Passage where he speaks of the Temple which the Greeks had erected in Honour of Hercules; “Wherefore methinks the “Greeks have acted wisely in building Temples to “Hercules, sacrificing to one of the two surnamed the “Olympian, as being of an immortal Nature, and “performing in Honour of the other, as to a Heroe, “Funeral Obsequies rather than Sacrifice.” Pausani-
as

(1) De Civ. Dei, l. 10. c. 21.

(a) Heroum nomen ab Junone dicitur tractum, quod Græce Juno Ἥρα appellatur, & ideo nescio qui filius ejus, secundum Græcorum fabulas, Heros fuit nuncupatus.

(2) Lib. 3. (3) In Att.

as makes also the same Distinction, when he says, that to Alexanor were ascribed the usual Honours that belong to Heroes, and that after Sun setting; but to Evemerion divine Honours were paid. The same Author adds, that at the Dedication of Cities, Sacrifices were offered to the Gods, and that Heroes were invoked merely by Prayers. When Epaminondas, says he (1), was designed to re-establish the Messenians, and build them a City, after having consulted the Augurs, and upon their Report made Choice of the Place where it was to have been built, the Arcadians, the Messenians and Thebans, offered each to their own Gods private Sacrifices, then they all invoked the Heroes of the Country; especially Messenus the Son of Triopas, Eurytus and Aphareus, with their Children, and among the Descendants of Hercules, Cresphontes and Ephytus. Besides, they invoked Aristomenes in a particular Manner, and his Memory was more honoured than any other. But this Distinction did not always subsist, since the Heroe often became a God, as I have proved from the Authority of the Antients, in the third Book of the first Volume. Farther, I believe we may assert, that the due Promotion of Heroes to the Rank of Gods, was owing to the Doctrine of the antient Philosophy, which taught that the Souls of great Men were advanced even to the Stars, the Mansion of the Gods; and hence it was thought necessary to honour them like the Gods themselves with whom they dwelt. The Stoics, on the contrary, settled only the Habitation of the Heroes in a pure and serene Climate, which they believed to be above the Moon; which makes Lucan say, That vast Expansion which is between Heaven and Earth, is the Mansion of the Demi-Gods (a).

So firmly were they persuaded that the Heroes interested themselves as well as the Gods in the Affairs of this World, that they were believed to be the Avengers

(1). In Mess.

(a) *Quodque patet terras inter cœlique meatus
Semidei Manes habitant.* Phars. l. 9.

vengers of Impiety. The Examples of this, quoted by Pausanias (1), are very authentic. Cleomenes, says he, having corrupted the Priestess of Delphi, to oblige her to declare, that Demaratus was not the legal Son of Aristo, and thereby to exclude him from the Crown, to which he had a Right, having stabbed himself in one of those Fits of Madness to which he was subject, his Death was looked upon as a Punishment from the Gods and Heroes. “ And indeed, says that Historian, it was not the first Instance of the Vengeance the Gods and Heroes had taken upon Men. Protesilaus who is worshipped at Eleus, and who in his Time was a Heroe no less celebrated than Argus, punished with his own Hand the Persian Artacetus (2); and ever since the Megareans presumed to appropriate to themselves and cultivate the Lands consecrated to the Divinities of Eleusis, they have never been able to appease their Wrath.”

This in few Words is what the Antients taught as to the Heroes and their Worship. We shall speak afterwards at more Length of those who by their Achievements attained that high Rank, which at Bottom was much the same with that of the Gods. But before we close this Chapter, 'tis proper to examine what the Antients understood by the Tomb of the Heroes Ἡρώων μνημα, an Expression which often occurs in Pausanias. The Abbé Sallier, who has treated this Subject in a Memoir which he read to the Academy of the Belles-Lettres, says, that by these two Words was understood the Tomb of a Heroe erected in a Place inclosed with a sacred Grove, and near which was an Altar, which they used to frequent at set Times, and offer upon it Gifts and Libations. In Proof of this Proposition, he quotes several Authorities from Homer and Euripides, which may be seen in his Dissertation (3), and he concludes with a Passage in Virgil, and with the Testimony of Servius his Commentator, which set the Matter in full Light :

Solennes

(1) In Lacon. (2) Herodotus relates the same Fact. (3) Mem. de l'Acad. Tom. V.

*Solemnes tum forte dapes & tristia dona
 Ante urbem in luco, falsi Simoentis ad undam,
 Libabat cineri Andromache, manesque vocabat
 Hecloreum ad tumulum, viridi quem cespite inanem
 Et geminas, causam lacrymis, sacraverat aras.*

Æn. l. 3.

Since in these Verses we actually find the three Things requisite to the Tombs of Heroes, the sacred Grove, Lucus, the Heroe's Shade; Has tenent Heroum animæ, says the same Poet in another Place; and lastly the Offerings, Libabat cineri Andromache. Servius (1) in his Commentary upon this Passage of Virgil, says, the Poet never uses the Word lucus, but he means a Place consecrated by Religion (a). The heroic Monument was not peculiar to Heroes alone, since we learn from Pausanias that it was also erected in Honour of Heroins (2), as we shall see afterwards.

CHAP. II.

At what Time and in what Manner the Practice of worshipping Heroes was introduced into Greece, &c.

TIS not easy to determine at what Time the Worship of Heroes commenced. The Antients, and Pausanias himself, who says so much of this Worship, give us no Account of its Original; but among the Moderns we have Men of Learning, who not discerning any Traces of this Worship before the Arrival of Cadmus, conclude from thence, that he had brought it from Phœnicia into Greece. From that Period, say they, commenced the Practice among the Greeks, of honouring the Funerals of their Relations by Festivals, Invocations, and Offerings; of erecting to them remarkable Tombs, whither they repaired, especially on the Day of their Anniversary, there to perform Libations.

(1) In 3 Æn.

(a) Lucum nunquam ponit sine Religione, nam in ipsis habitant Manes piorum, qui Lares viales sunt.

(2) In Corinth.

bations. To these Tombs very soon succeeded Statues, and afterwards Altars. Every private Person was permitted to pay his Respects to his Ancestors, but often their Fame reached no farther than their own Family. It was otherwise as to those on whom Cities or Kingdoms conferred Honours. As it was commonly to Persons who had done good Service to the State, and had signalized themselves by great Atchievements, their Names became thereby exceeding famous, and were propagated every where. Thus we are to distinguish two Sorts of Heroes; some were so only in their own Families, and were as their Gods Penates: Others were so by public Decrees, and became the Heroes of a whole People. To the one were erected only Tombs of Stone which served for Altars, while those which were raised to others differed but little from the Temples of the Gods; and that the Homage paid them might be the more solemn, Mysteries were instituted in their Honour, with Ceremonies and Feasts; and a Succession of Priests destined to their Service.

As the Number of the Heroes and Heroins is almost beyond Reckoning, and it would be impossible to name them all, I shall collect into one Chapter the Names of all whom I know, reserving till afterwards what further Enlargements I have to make on those of them that are more illustrious.

C H A P. III.

The Names of the Heroes and Heroins worshipped in Greece.

FIRST of all we find in the single Family of Cadmus, that Prince himself, Europa his Sister, and Atymnus his Brother, his four Daughters, Melicerta the Son of Ino, Bacchus the Son of Semele, Aristeus the Husband of Autonoë, and Jasius the Brother of his Wife Harmonia. In that of Minos, that Prince himself, Rhadamanthus, Androgeos, &c.

In the Family of Inachus, Danae, Perseus, Hercules, Alcmena,

Alcmena his Mother, and many more. At Athens, Cecrops, Erichthonius, Pandion, Theseus, and Hippolitus his Son. The latter was even honoured as a God. Diomedes, as is thought, built him a Temple, and consecrated to him the Ground that encompassed it. This Heroe was reckoned the first who paid divine Honours to him. The Priests who had the Charge of his Worship, had it for Life, and the Festival of the God was solemnized every Year. Among other Ceremonies performed in his Honour the young Virgins before Marriage cut off their Hair, and consecrated it to him in that Temple. At Eleusis, Triptolemus and Celeus. In the Family of Pelops, this Prince himself, and Hippodamia his Wife, Castor and Pollux, Helen, Menelaus, and Agamemnon. In that of Æacus, this Prince, Peleus his Son, and Achilles. In that of Priam, Hector and Cassandra his Daughter, and Helenus, one of his Sons. We may also reckon in the same Number the Soothsayer Amphiaraus, and his Son Amphilochus, Phoroneus, Orpheus, Protesilaus, Arcas the Son of Callisto, Idomeneus, Emeriones, Melampus, Adrastus, Iolaus, Macbaon, his Son Polemocrates, and his Brother Podalirius, Areotopotes, or the great Wine-biber, honoured as a Heroe at Munichia, according to Atheneus, as Alabandus was in Actaia, according to Cicero and Asius, if we may believe Strabo; Amicleus and Apollonius Tyanus (1). Calchas the Soothsayer, so famous at the Siege of Troy, had a Temple, according to Strabo, at Daunia upon a Hill, and Caystrius, according to the same Author, an Altar near the River Cayster. The Apotheosis of Homer represented upon an antient Monument, explained by Cuper, leaves no Room to doubt of that Poet's having been worshipped at least as a Demi-God.

A Passage of Pausanias (2) gives us the Names of several Heroes; whom he calls Eponymes: A little above the Place where the Senate was held, are the Statues of these Heroes, from whom the Athenian Tribes took their Names afterwards; the first is Hippocoon, the Son of Neptune,

(1) Philost. Vita Apoll. Tyan. (2) In Att.

Neptune, and Alope, the Daughter of Cercyon; Antiochus the Son of Hercules and Medea, is the second, and the third is Telamon the Father of Ajax. Among the Athenians is reckoned Leos, who by the Advice of the Oracle devoted his Daughter for the Safety of the State; Erechtheus (a) who defeated the Eleusians, and slew their General; Immarandus the Son of Eumolpus, Egeus who is well known, Ceneus the natural Son of Pandion, and Acamas one of the Sons of Theseus. I have seen in the same Rank, adds he, the Statues of Cecrops and Pandion. Cleodea, the Daughter of Hilus, Oebalus and Telechus had their heroic Monuments in Laconia (1): The latter was the Son of Archelaus King of Sparta. Eurylnus the Son of Menecus, was worshipped in Oechalia on the Day of his Anniversary (2). Theagenes of Thasos, who was so often Conqueror at the Olympic Games (b), received divine Honours; and as his Adventure is singular, I shall relate it. A Statue had been consecrated to him of Bronze (3), and as one of his Enemies was once a beating of it by Way of Revenge upon him, the Statue falling down suddenly upon the Fool, and crushing him to Death, his Sons sued it in Judgment, as being guilty of Murther, and the People of Thasos condemned it to be thrown into the Sea; so one of Draco's Law ordained. In the mean Time the Thasians being sore distressed with Famine, had Recourse to the Oracle of Delphi, who answered them that it would cease when they had recalled all those whom they had banished. They obeyed, but the Calamity still continuing, they sent a second Time to the Oracle, and the Priests answered, that their Theagenes it seems passed with them for a Cypher. Upon this they got the Statue fished up, and from that Time began to honour the Memory of that Heroe.

Pyritheus,

(a) Herodot. l. 8. makes also Mention of the Temple of that Prince which was in the Citadel of Athens.

(1) Id. in Lacon. (2) Id. in Messen.

(b) The ordinary Text of Pausanias bears that he had won 1400 Crowns, an exorbitant Number, which some Interpreters reduce to 400, which still appears very great.

(3) Id. in Eliac.

Pyritheus, Oedipus, and Adrastus, as we learn from Pausanias, had their heroic Monuments in Attica; Pallas the Son of Lycaon had his in Arcadia, and Pelops had a Temple in Alces, and a Piece of Ground consecrated to him: For, as the same Author remarks, the Eleans set that Prince as far above other Heroes, as they set Jupiter above other Gods. It is thought to have been Hercules himself that consecrated that Piece of Ground to Pelops, from whom he was descended in the fourth Generation. They added (1), that he had sacrificed to him by the Side of a Ditch, where the Archons were wont every Year to offer Sacrifice before they entered upon their Office; and their Sacrifice had this Singularity in it, that no Part of the Victim was allotted to Divination.

Telephus received the Honours of Sacrifice at Per-gamus upon the Caicus (2). Philip, King of Macedon, was too illustrious not to acquire heroic Honours; accordingly he had in Alces a Chapel built in Form of the Rotondo, where he had a Statue of Gold, by the Hand of Leochares. However ambitious his Son Alexander was to be taken into the Number of the great Gods, as has been said elsewhere, I know not if he ever attained even to Heroic Honours; at least if any Worship was paid to him, it was not very extensive. Phylacus, for having relieved the City Delphi, obtained a heroic Monument. Polydorus the Son of Alcamenes the King of Sparta, received extraordinary Honours from the Lacedemonians after his Death; but Pausanias has not told us whether he was reckoned a God or a Heroe (3).

Deucalion had Altars in Greece, and was honoured there as a Divinity. Diomedes was esteemed a God, and had a Temple and a sacred Grove at Timavus, according to Strabo (4). Ergane a Goddess had also her Altar. The Descendants of Phidias sacrificed to him, according to Pausanias. Hermotimus was worshipped as a God among the Clazomenians, and had there a Temple,

(1) In Eliac. (2) Id. in Arcad. (3) Id. in Eliac. (4) P. 146.

Temple, according to the Testimony of Tertullian (1). Palamedes, according to Philostratus (2), was honoured as a God. He had a Statue erected to him with this Inscription, To the God Palamedes. Pandarus (3) was worshipped in Lycia. Pasithea, says Cicero (4), had a Temple near Lacedemon: Others take her for Pasiphae the Wife of Minos. Phoroneus, as we learn from Pausanias (5), had one at Corinth, near that of Nemean Jupiter; and even in Pausanias's Time they still celebrated the Anniversary of that Heroe. Acesidas and Acesius had also heroic Monuments in Greece, as we read in the same Author, as also Acratus, a Genius of Bacchus's Retinue, and Adrastus the Son of Talaus, Æthlius the Son of Eolus, who was surnamed Jupiter; Agamedes and Trophonius his Brother, the same who had the famous Oracle; Agamemnon and Menelaus, and Ajax the Son of Telamon, participated of the same Honours, while Ajax the Son of Oileus received them in the small Island of Leuce, where a particular Worship was also paid to Achilles. Pyræus his Son was worshipped principally at Delphi. Lycurgus, if we may believe Strabo (6), had a Temple at Lacedemon.

Pausanias, who of all the Antients has enlarged most upon this Subject, having travelled over Greece which was full of heroic Monuments, makes Mention of those of Alalcomedes, the Foster-Father of Minerva, of Alcathous, Alcimedea, Alcines, Aleon, Ambryssus, Anaxis, Mnasinous, Aratus, Archemorus, Astrabacus, Atys, Augæas; of the Arcadian Aulon, of Baton Squire to Amphiaræus, of Perseus, Thyestes, whose heroic Monument was upon the Highway that led from Mycenæ to Argos; of Bellerophon, Butes, Chilon, Cladeus, Cleodeus the Son of Hyllus; of Chiron, so celebrated in the heroic Age, of Cleomedes, Cleoneus, Cranius. He makes also Mention either of the Temples or Statues of Stemmu-tius, of the Curetes, of Tenes, Hyacinthus, peculiarly honoured in Laconia, of Iolaus the Companion of
VOL. III. F f Hercules,

(1) Lib. de Anima. (2) Life of Apoll. Tyan. (3) Strabo, l. 14. (4) L. 1. de Divinat. (5) In Corinth. (6) L. 7. (7) L. 7.

Hercules, worshipped in Sardinia; of Iphicles, Brother to the same Hercules; of Orestes, Lacedemon, Latius, Laphistius, Lycurgus, Melampus, Hippoton, whose heroic Monument was at Athens; of Preugones, to whom heroic Honours were paid at the Time of the Festival of Diana Limnatis, whose Statue he had carried off at Sparta; of Prometheus who had a Statue in Phocis, with a Chapel and Altar; Games were also instituted in Honour of him; of Ptolomy Philadelphus, whom this Author reckons in the Number of the Heroes Eponymes; of Sebrus, Alcimus, Enarephorus, whom Apolodorus calls Arcinus, of Dorycles, and Tebrus, whose heroic Monuments were in Laconia; of Stinyclerus, the Messenian Heroe, of Tberas the Son of Autesion, whose Anniversary was celebrated by the Thereans, who derived their Name from him; of Triptolemus, whose Temple was to be seen at Eleusis; of Zarax, a Man of great Fame, who had learned Music from Apollo himself, and whom this Author reckons to have been not from Athens, but the Extremities of Laconia, where was the City of Zaraxa, to which he communicated his Name.

This curious Traveller, after naming so many Heroes, has not forgot the illustrious Women who had attained to the same Honours; such as Alexandra, or Cassandra, the Daughter of Priam, who had a Temple in Greece; Almena, whose Altar was at Athens in the Temple of Hercules her Son; Andromache, who had a heroic Monument in the same Country; Anaxandra, who had likewise an Altar there, as also Aphea and the Trojan Aïmené; Coronis, the Daughter of Phlegyas, and Mother of Esculapius, who was worshipped there with her Son; Helen, who had a Temple at Lacedemon; Cynisea, the Daughter of Archidane, who gained the Prize at the Olympic Games. Hilara and Phæbea, the Wives of Castor and Pollux; Iodamia, who though transformed into a Stone, had the Honour of an Altar; Iphimedeia, Laphria, Latria, Ladona the Mother of Apollo and Diana, Manto the Daughter of Tiresias, who professed the Art of Prediction like her her Father ; Meganira, Rhadina, whose Tomb was honoured by unfortunate Lovers ; and lastly Octavia, whose Temple was in high Reputation.

These in general were the Heroes and Heroins, to whom Greece had destined Religious Worship ; but as there were some among them who had signalized themselves more than the rest, in the Events which make the most considerable Part of the History of the Heroic Age, 'tis proper to give a fuller Account of them : This is what I shall do in the following Chapters, observing, as near as possible, the Order of Time.

As Perseus is one of the most celebrated, both for his Antiquity and Atchievements, with him I shall begin.

C H A P. IV.

The History of Perseus, Andromeda, the Gorgons, &c.

THERE are few Histories of those Times more obscure and fuller of Fables, than that which is to be the Subject of this Chapter. 'Tis in several Parts of it quite inexplicable. However, let us try to clear it up as far as we are able ; let us take for certain what Antiquity acknowledges, and for Conjectures only the Explanations of the Fables which are so closely interwoven into the real Adventures of that Prince.

Perseus was of the Blood of Danaus, who had usurped from Gelanor the Kingdom of Argos, by Hypermetra his Great-Great-Grand-Mother. Acrisius his Grand-Father, who had but one Daughter, named Danaë, having learnt from the Oracle, that one Day his Grand-Son was to bereave him of his Life and Crown, shut her up in a Tower of Brass, and would give Ear to no Proposal of Marriage for her. In the mean Time, Prætus his Brother, being desperately in Love with his Niece, found a Way, by Means of Money, to corrupt the Fidelity of the Keepers of the Princess ; and having entered through the Roof into the Place where she was imprisoned, made her the Mother of Perseus.

A Fable which Ovid has comprehended in this single Verse:

Persea quem pluvio Danaë conceperat auro. (1)

And which Horace has applied to a moral Sense, to demonstrate the Power of Gold over Mankind, among whom no Obstacle is to be found powerful enough to surmount its Force :

Aurum per medios ire satellites Novit, &c.

Those who wrote the History of this Adventure, to palliate the Disgrace which this Intrigue intailed upon the Royal Family, gave out, that Jupiter, enamoured of Danaë, had transformed himself into a Shower of Gold; which was the more probable, that Prætus, if we may believe Vossius (2), took upon him the Surname of Jupiter, as has been already said in the History of that God (3).

Here is the whole Mystery, for the Ground of the Story is true. Pausanias (4) mentions that Tower, or rather that Apartment of Brass, in which Danaë had been shut up, and assures us that it subsisted till the Time of Perilaus the Tyrant of Argos, who demolished it; adding that even in his Time some Remains were still to be seen of the subterraneous Palace whereof Danaë's Chamber made a Part.

To conclude, there is nothing very extraordinary in this Adventure; that a Prince affrighted by an Oracle (and we know how far they carried their Credulity for Oracles) being averse to the Marriage of his Daughter, because the Child to be born of her was one Day to dethrone and bereave him of his Life, kept her close confined; nor that a Man so powerful as Prætus his Brother bribed the Guards; and far less, that this Adventure, according to the Practice of those Times, was laid in Jupiter's Name.

The Commerce of that Prince with Danaë was kept very

(1) Met. l. 6. (2) De Orig. & Prog. Idol. l. 1. (3) Vol. II. B. 1. of the English. (4) In Corinth.

very secret for a Time; but at Length the Princess being delivered of Perseus, Acrisius ordered her to be exposed upon the Sea with her Child, in a pitiful Barge, which after being a long Time driven along at the Mercy of the Winds, stopped near the little Island of Seriphus, one of the Cyclades in the Egean Sea. Polydestes, who was King of the Island, being apprized of it, gave a favourable Reception to the Mother and the Child, and took great Care of the Education of the young Prince. But afterwards falling in Love with Danaë, and afraid of Perseus now grown up, he sought a Pretext for dismissing him. It was a very singular one he made use of. He pretended that he was courting one of the Grecian Princesses, and that in order to have the Marriage celebrated with more Magnificence, he designed to furnish out an Entertainment upon that Occasion with all the Rarities the World could afford. He actually invited the Princes of the neighbouring Isles, begging each of them to bring with him to the Feast the best Things his Country produced. He even prescribed to them what Things he was desirous to have; and to make Perseus's Expedition the longer, ordered him to go and fetch the Head of Medusa, one of the Gorgons.

C H A P. V.

The Explanation of the Fable of Medusa and the Gorgons.

NEVER did either Poets or Historians allow themselves more Scope than in the Fable of the Gorgons. I begin with what the Poets say of them, then shall come to the Historians and Mythologists, and shall close this Chapter with an Explanation of the Fable.

All the Method I here propose, is to range the Poets according to the Time when they wrote, that we may see with one Glance of the Eye the progressive Steps of this Fable, incomparably more simple in the first, than in those who came after. As Homer is the most antient, I ought to begin with him ; but what he says of the Gorgons amounts to so little, that Hesychius makes no Scruple to assert, that this Poet had no Knowledge of them ; but that Critic is in an Error, as we shall see. Homer in the Description of Minerva's Ægis (1) thus speaks : In the middle thereof was to be seen the Head of the Gorgon, that frightful Monster, that enormous and formidable Head, the amazing Prodigy of the Father of the Gods. He says elsewhere (2), that the same Head was engraved upon Agamemnon's Buckler, accompanied with Terror and his Retinue.

Hesiod enters into a much fuller Detail : I shall not quote what he says on this Subject in the fine Description he gives of Hercules's Buckler, which the Abbé Massieu has translated with so much Elegance, that I may come to the Theogony of that Poet, where he relates this Fable with all its Circumstances as they were known in his Time. “ Phorcus, says he, had
 “ by Ceto two Daughters, Pepbredo and Enyo, who “ came into the World with gray Hairs—He had “ also by her the Gorgons, who dwelt beyond the “ Ocean, at the Extremity of the World, near the “ Regions of Night—The Names of those Gorgons
 “ are Stbeno, Euryale, and Medusa, so famed for her “ Misfortunes. She was mortal, while her two Sisters “ were subject neither to Old-age nor Death. The “ God of the Sea was captivated with Medusa's Charms;
 “ and upon the grassy Couch of a beautiful Meadow, “ adorned with all the Gay Flowers of the Spring, gave “ her convincing Proofs of his Love. She died afterwards an untimely Death : Perseus cut off her Head,
 “ and from the Blood that issued from it sprung the “ Hero Chrysaor and the Horse Pegasus. Chrysaor derived his Name from a golden Sword which he “ had in his Hand, at his Birth. He fell afterwards
 “ in Love with Callirhoe the Daughter of the Ocean,
 “ and had by her Geryon, the famous Giant with three “ Heads. Pegasus was so named, because he was “ born

(1) Iliad. l. 5. (2) Iliad. l. 11.

“ born near the Sources of the Ocean : He instantly “ left the Earth, and winged his Way to the Man“ sions of the Gods. There he now resides, in the “ Palace of Jupiter himself, whose Thunder and “ Lightning he bears.”

Eschiles in his Prometheus has only copied Hesiod :
 But as the Fables still grew as they passed from one Poet to another, the former adds that the Daughters of Phorcus had but one Eye and one Tooth among all the three, which they made Use of one after another, and that the Gorgons, their younger Sisters, had Hair interwoven with Serpents, and killed Men with a single Glance of their Eye. The Scholiast on that Poet adds, that their Tooth was longer than the Tusks of the strongest Boar, and that their Hands were of Brass.

Pindar (1) goes farther than either Eschiles or his Commentator, since he heightens the Fable by three Circumstances unknown to his Predecessors. The first is that the Gorgons turned those into Stone whom they looked upon, and that it was by this kind of Death that Perseus, in presenting Medusa's Head, desolated the Island of Seriphus, whose Inhabitants he petrified, together with their King whom he surprized at Table.
 The second is, that Minerva, who aided Perseus while he was struggling with Medusa, being surprized with the Melody of the Gorgons Sighs intermingled with the Hissings of their Serpents, felt certain Charms in that mixed Composition of doleful Accents ; and to renew the Idea of the Harmony, she invented a Flute in Imitation thereof which she imparted to Men ; and in Allusion to its first Model she called the various Sounds it produced, a Harmony with many Heads. The third is, that the Horse Pegasus whom Hesiod makes to have taken Flight to the Mansion of the Gods, was afterwards broke by Minerva, and given to Bellerophon, who mounted him to combat the Chimera ; but that Heroe having attempted to ascend to Heaven on the Wings of that Horse, was thrown down to the Earth, and Pegasus placed among the Stars (a). As

(1) Pyth. 12.

(a) See his third Olympiad, and the seventh Pyth.

As this Fable still grew in its Progress by passing from one Hand to another, Apollonius Rhodius, and Ovid add, that Perseus having taken his Flight over Libya, all the Drops of Blood that trickled from the fatal Head, were transformed into so many Serpents, and that hence came the prodigious Quantity of those venomous Animals, which have since infected that Country.

The Latin Poets, though faithful Copiers of the Greek ones, have yet loaded the Fable of the Gorgons with new Circumstances. Homer had said that the Gorgon's Head was engraved upon the tremendous Ægis of Minerva; Virgil adds, and upon her Cuirass too, in the Place which covered the Goddess's Breast.

- - - - - Ipsamque in pectore Divæ
Gorgona descēto vertentem lumina collo.

Æn. l. 8.

The other Poets speak no more of the Gorgons after the Defeat of Medusa: Virgil says, they had their Residence near the Gates of Hell, with the *Centaur*s, the Chimera, and the other fabulous Monsters (a).

Ovid of all the Poets has most enlarged upon the Fable of the Gorgons, and he lets us know a good many Circumstances which are no where to be found but in his Metamorphoses (1). According to him, Medusa was a consummate Beauty, and kindled the Desires of many Lovers, who sought to marry her; but of all the Charms of her Person none was more attractive than her fine Hair. Neptune made Love to her, not in a Meadow, as it is in Hesiod, but in Minerva's Temple, with which that Goddess was so incensed, that she changed that Beauty's Hair into Serpents; and this is the Reason why among the three Gorgons, Medusa alone has her Hair interwoven with Snakes; though Eschylus had said long before him, that

(a) Vestibulum ante ipsum - - - - - Centauri - - - - -

Gorgones, Harpyiæque, &c.

Æn. l. 6.

(1) L. 4. & 5.

that her Sister's Locks were branded with the same Deformity. That Poet goes on to relate after what Manner Perseus surprized the single Eye which we have mentioned, while one of the Gorgons was giving it to the other; after which he went to the Place where Medusa lay, whom he found fast asleep, and cut off her Head. Of the Blood which issued from it, came forth Pegasus, on whom he mounted; and flying through the airy Regions, went into Mauritania, where he transformed Atlas, who had given him a bad Reception, into that Mountain which has since bore his Name. From thence, continues he, he went into Ethiopia, where he rescued Andromeda from the Monster that was ready to devour her, and punished Phineus his Rival, together with all those who had sided with him, by shewing them the Gorgon's Head, which turned them all into Stones. This Poet adds several other Fictions, which we shall endeavour to explain as we go along.

Though the Mythologists and Historians have in Relation to this Fable followed the Poets who hatched it, yet they have altered some Circumstances in it, and also give us some additional ones. Phericides, and after him Apollodorus and Hyginus say, that Mercury, as well as Minerva, had a great Hand in the Expedition of our Heroe, and that as the Goddess lent him her Looking-Glass, so Mercury provided him with a Sword made in Form of a Scythe; that by the Advice of them both Perseus went to the Habitation of certain Nymphs, to borrow some Arms deposited with them, among which were the winged Shoes, the Sandal and Helmet of Pluto; that this Helmet had the Property to leave all Objects open to View, while the Person who wore it was himself invisible; that the Looking-Glass of Minerva produced also the same Effect; in fine, that these were the Means of saving the Heroe who appeared before Medusa, without being perceived by her. The same Mythologists add farther, that it was Minerva herself guided the Hand of Perseus when he cut off the Gorgon's Head. Lastly, that after

after this Victory the Heroe returned the Arms to those from whom he had them, reserving to himself Medusa's Head, of which after his other Expeditions he made a present to Minerva, who put it upon her Ægis.

When we lay together on one Hand, the little which History has left us in relation to the Gorgons, and on the other the numberless Prodigies told on that Occasion by the Poets, we cannot but imagine at first Sight that it is in vain to pry into this Fable. In the mean Time several Authors, both antient and modern, have undertaken to explain it ; and I think myself obliged to give the History of their Sentiments before I offer my own (a). Theopompus (1) was of Opinion that the Gorgons were such ugly Women, that the very Sight of them turned those who looked upon them into Stones, so to speak, their Astonishment being so great. Others, on the contrary, affirm that Medusa was exceedingly handsome, until Debauchery rendered her hideously ugly. Proclus of Cartbage said this same Medusa was one of those barbarous African Women who conducted the Troops, whereof Perseus by her Death made himself Master, and led them into Greece. Diodorus Siculus, who is very full upon this Subject, after observing that Libya antiently produced whole Nations of Women, who by their warlike Disposition and Courage were become the Astonishment of the World, adds that the Gorgons, who were of that Number, maintained a War against Perseus, where they signalized their Valour and Prowess exceedingly, under the Conduct of Medusa their Queen.

What Pausanias tells us of these Women, has a considerable Affinity to what the Author now quoted had said before. The Gorgons, according to him, were the Daughters of Phorbus ; for thus that Name is read in the printed Copies and Manuscripts ; tho' the Learned think it ought to be read Phorcus, since this is the Name given to the Father of the Gorgons by all the Antients.

Be

(a) See the curious Dissertation of the Abbé Massieu, Mem. de l'Acad. T. 3. p. 51.

(1) L. 17.

Be that as it will, after the Death of Phorbus, says the same Pausanias, Medusa his Daughter reigned over the People who inhabited in the Confines of the Lake Tritonis. As she had a violent Passion for Hunting and War, she laid waste all the Lands of the neighbouring People; but at last Perseus having surprized her one Night, defeated the flying Camp wherewith she was escorted, and killed herself in the Encounter. The next Day he was desirous to view her, and dead as she was, she appeared so beautiful, that he cut off her Head, and carried it into Greece, to make it a Spectacle to the People, who could not behold it without being struck with Astonishment.

Alexander of Myndus, a City of Caria, cited by Athenæus (a), contended that the Gorgons were a kind of savage Beasts, whose very Look turned Men into Stones. In Libya, says he, the Nomades give the Appellation of Gorgon to a certain Animal which has very much the Air of a wild Sheep. The Breath of it is said to be so pestilentious, that it infects all those who approach to it. A long Main falls down from the Top of its Forehead, and deprives it then of Sight. This Main is so ponderous, that the Animal has much ado to raise it up again; but when it gets this brought about by some extraordinary Effort, it overthrows all those who look upon it, and kills them, not with its Breath, but with a Poison which it darts from its Eyes. One of these Animals was discovered in the Time that Marius was carrying on War in Africa. Some Róman Soldiers, who took it for a Sheep, fell upon it; but having raised its Main, it killed them all with a single Glance of its Eye. Other Soldiers, who came up after them, had the same Fate, till some having learned from the People of the Country the Nature and Qualities of the Animal, slew it with their Javelins, and carried it to their General.

Xenophon of Lampsacus, followed by Pliny and Solinus,

(a) This Passage is taken from the second Book of Alexander of Myndus upon Animals, and cited in the third Book of Athenæus.

linus, was of Opinion that the Gorgons were female Savages, who dwelt in the Island Gorgades. Near that Promontory, says Pliny, which we call the western Cape, are the Gorgades, the antient Residence of the Gorgons. Hanno, the Cartbaginian General, says he after the same Xenophon of Lampsacus, penetrated as far as the Gorgades Islands, where he found Women, who, in Swiftneſs, outrun the Flight of Birds. Among ſeveral he met with, he was able to catch no more than two, whoſe Body was ſo brifling with Hair, that in order to preſerve the Memorial of them, as of ſomething prodigious and incredible, their Skins were ſet up in the Temple of Juno, where they continued ſuſpended, until the Ruin of Cartbage.

Palephatus and Fulgentius will have the Gorgons to have been young Women of opulent Fortunes, who improved their vaſt Revenues with ſingular Oeconomy. The former adds, that Phorcus, their Father, had a golden Statue of Minerva, four Cubits high, which he deſigned to have depoſited in the Temple of that Goddeſs. But having died before the Conſecration of the Statue, his three Daughters, Stheno, Euryale, and Meduſa, lodged it among their Treafure, and Perſeus carried it off. Phorcus, according to the ſame Author, was a Native of Cyrene and Libya, but he had in his Poſſeſſion three Iſlands in the Ocean. The three Gorgons, after his Death, reigned, one after another, in one of thoſe Iſlands. They had but one Miniſter, who paſſed from the one Iſland into the other; and this is what gave Riſe to the Fable of their having but one Eye, which they lent one another by Turns.

As Perſeus was then navigating upon thoſe Seas, he ſurprized this Miniſter while he was paſſing from one Iſland into the other; which explains that Circumſtance of his having ſtole their Eye, while one of them was giving it to her Siſter.

They were inſoluble for the Loſs of ſo neceſſary a Miniſter; but Perſeus gave them to know that he ſhould be returned to them, provided they would deliver liver up to him the Gorgon Medusa, and in case of a Refusal threatened them with Death. Medusa would never hearken to this Demand, but her two Sisters consented to it; wherefore Perseus put Medusa to Death, carried off the Statue, and restored to Stheno and Euryale their Minister.

The attentive Reader will easily observe that Palephatus had in his Eye to trace all the Parts of this Fable Step by Step, to reduce them to Probability, without dreaming that most of the Circumstances were added to it at different Times. He does not even explain that of the Tooth and Horn which the three Gorgons had in common.

Gerard Vossius, in his excellent Treatise upon the Origine and Progress of Idolatry, is persuaded that the Fable of the Gorgons took its Rise from the Relation of Hanno the Cartbaginian General, which we have cited from Xenophon of Lampsacus; namely, that he believed they were the same with those Women who run so fast as to equal the Flight of Birds. M. Le Clerc, on the contrary, in his Notes upon Hesiod, takes them for the Mares of Libya, -which we have also spoke of. That learned Author alledges, that under the obscure Allegory of Perseus's Expedition, was designed to be preserved the Memory of an ancient Voyage which the Phœnicians had once made to Africa, whence they carried away a vast Number of Horses; that the Name of Perseus, which perhaps was given to the Leader of that Expedition, comes from the Phœnician Word Pharscha, signifying a Horseman, which perfectly agrees to the Name of the Horse Pegasus which the Poets give him to ride upon, it being derived from the Phœnician Word Pag-sous, which signifies a harnessed Horse, as Bochart, from whom he borrows this Conjecture, had said before him (1); whence he concludes that the Gorgons were the Mares of that Country, which the Phœnicians carried away.

M. Le Clerc confirms this Explanation by the very Passage

(1) Hierog. l. 1. c. 6.

Passage in Hanno's Relation, where it is said (a), that the Women of that Part of Africa where he had travelled, were all overgrown with Hair, and that they were impregnated without the Concurrence of their Husbands; which agrees to the Mares, according to popular Belief, whereof Virgil makes Mention in his Georgics, where he says they conceived by turning towards the Zephyrs. That same Author confirms his Opinion by the Reflection he makes, that all the vast Expeditions of the Greek Heroes were nothing but the Enterprizes of Merchants, who navigated into Countries then unknown to Greece.

Those who would allow of M. Le Clerc's Conjecture, might confirm it from the Greeks having called the Isles which were said to be inhabited by the Gorgons, by the Name of Gorgates, or rather Gorgades, in Allusion to the Velocity of those Mares, as is very well observed by Osman in his Dictionary (1), and by Isaac Vossius upon Pomponius Mela (b).

Olaus Rudbeck, one of those who have wrote the most learnedly upon the Fable of the Gorgons, reckons they were Princesses of great Wisdom and Valour, who governed their Dominions with excellent Order, and that they were possessed of those Talents in the highest Degree which are conducive to the good Management of a Kingdom, Talents which he reduces to three; Prudence, Strength, and Foresight. These are the excellent Qualities possessed by the Gorgons which the Poets had in their Eye, when they said in their figurative Stile, they had but one Eye, one Tooth, and one Horn; since by the Eye they have marked out their Prudence; by the Tooth their Strength and Courage; and by the Horn the Care they had to procure Plenty in their Dominions by Commerce. One of their Ships was called the Horn, because it carried upon its Prow this Symbol of Plenty,

(a) See Pomponius Mela, who relates this Fact, c. 3.

(1) On the Word Gorgades.

(b) Γόργαδες, sic dictæ a pernicitate sæminarum quas Plinius Gorgades, id est, pernices vocat, sicut Græci ἀλᾶδες, cito navigia vocant.

ty, and another the Dragon. From this Conjecture the Author draws the Explanation of two mysterious Circumstances that enter into the Fable of Medusa, and which have not been hitherto mentioned. The first, that Medusa's Horn was said to have grown out of a Dragon, all covered with Gold and Gems, because the Ship called the Dragon had once returned loaded with Gold and precious Stones. The second bore, that Medusa's Horn was full of Poison, and that it poisoned those who approached it; whereby we are given to understand the Strength of Medusa's Fleet, which no Body durst attack. This Explanation is fortified in the Suedish Author, by the very Etymologies of the Names of the three Gorgons, since Stheno implies Strength; Euryale, Admiral; and Medusa, Care of the State: Names which doubtless were given them from a Regard to their Qualities and Functions.

These Conjectures appear happy; but that Author takes off from their Value, by endeavouring to accommodate them to his Chimera; I mean, when he would prove that the Gorgons dwelt in the North, upon the Coasts of the Baltick Ocean, where he pretends to find Vestiges of almost all the Greek Fables (a). 'Tis true, in order to confirm his Conjecture concerning the Residence of the Gorgons, he has Recourse to the Authority of Diodorus Siculus, who says the Gorgons were often at War with the Amazons, who are known to have inhabited Scythia; but he ought not to have dissembled that this Historian positively asserts, that both the Gorgons and the Amazons, whom he speaks of in that Passage, dwelt in Libya.

In fine, M. Fourmont is of Opinion, that in order to understand this Fable, we must have Recourse to the oriental Languages, as Bochart, M. Le Clerc, and some others had thought before him; but we ought to do him the Justice to own, that without treading in their Steps, he chalks out a new Path to himself. Greece, says he, having been partly peopled by Colonies nies that came thither from Egypt and Phœnicia, 'tis natural to suppose she derived most of her Traditions from the East: Thus to attempt to explain the Greek Fables, without the Assistance of the Languages whence those Traditions came, would be fruitless Presumption, since in fact these are the Languages wherein they had either been first broached, or written, or expressed.

(a) See the third Vol. of his Atlant. intitled Manheim.

This Fable, according to him (1), is reducible to five Articles. 1. Phorcys, a Sea-God, who had to Wife Ceto. 2. His five Daughters; two of whom, namely Pepbredo and Enyo, had the Appellation of Graia, Greeks; the other three named Gorgons, are Stbeno, Euryale, and Medusa. 3. These Gorgons have among all the three only one Tooth, one Horn, and one Eye. 4. From Medusa's Blood sprung a Man, namely, Cbrysaor the Forger, and a Horse, which is Pegasus. 5. The Horse carried into Greece, is subservient only to Perseus and Bellerophon. To these Hints the Author subjoins, that in the Hebrew and Phœnician Languages, the Words Ben, Benei, Bar, Banot, signify equally the Possession and the Offspring; thus the Ships of a Prince were called his Sons, and the Gallies his Daughters. In all Ages, continues he, Ships had Names, the Pristis, the Centaur, the Whale, &c. and 'tis no Wonder that they were taken for Monsters, and had the Names of Monsters given them. The Americans looked upon the first Spanish Ships as such. Therefore, concludes the Author, the five Daughters of Phorcys were nothing else but the five Ships whereof his small Fleet consisted. Further, says he, the five Names now mentioned, and which we find in Hesiod (2), are Phœnician. Enyo signifies a Ship of Burden, Navis oneraria; Pepbredo, and by Transposition Perpbredo, Navis aquaria, for carrying sweet Water; Stbeino, a Vessel with Oars, or a Galley; Euryale, Navis transitoria, a Shallop; Medusa, an imperial Ship, Navis imperatoria, the Word Sepbinale, a Ship, being understood. Of these five five Vessels two were called Greeks, because they had been carried off from one of the Ports of Greece; the other three were at first named Kúpos. Now Kópos or Képos, is the first and the most antient Isle of the Pheacians, since called Corcyra, whence Perseus carried them off into Greece. In the Odyssey, Minerva shews Ulysses Ithaca his Country, and among other Things, the Port of the old maritime Prince Phorcys: Here then we have the Father of the Gorgons, Phorcys King of Ithaca, who is Master of five Ships, two of them taken from the Greeks, and three from Cyros, who are the three Gorgons sent out from that Island to trade in Africa, and upon the Coasts of the Ocean, where they trafficked in Gold, Elephants Teeth, the Horns of divers Animals, the Hyenas and Fishes Eyes, and other precious Stones. This Commerce was known in the Time of Perseus, according to Pliny, Ptolomy, Pomponius Mela, Pausanias and Hesiod. Now if it be well considered that the same Country bears the Name at this Day of the Gold-coast, the Ivory-coast; that Animal's Horns are one of the chief Branches of that Trade; that the Eyes of some Fishes, and of some Animals are reckoned by Pliny (1) in the Number of precious Stones; that it is there also the Potasse is found, a kind of Buffalo, of which they made their Pegasus: If these Things, says M. Fourmond, be considered, the whole Secret will be cleared up. In a Word, Perseus carried off three Ships of Phorcys, loaded with Gold, Elephants Teeth, and some precious Stones: Here is the whole Mystery laid open. But the Reader should have Recourse to the Work itself of this Author, which I have abridged as much as possible.

(1) Mem. de l' Acad. Tom. 7. p. 120. (2) Theog.

Such are the Explanations which the Mythologists and Historians have given of the Fable of the Gorgons: The Misfortune is, that what they say of it is big with Contradictions: For under what various Forms have they represented these same Gorgons? They have made of them Heroins, wild and ferocious Animals, industrious and thrifty young Women, Prodiges of Beauty, Monsters of Ugliness, lewd Courtezans, and lastly Mares (1). They vary no less as to the Place of their Abode; some place them in Libya, others in the Orkney Islands, and that without knowing well where these same Islands lay. Some make our Heroe go as far as the Ocean, at a Time when that Sea was hardly known, and in which few durst venture themselves. Others mount him upon Pegasus, whom Hesiod makes to have winged his Way to Heaven from the Moment of his Birth, and with this Equipage they make him fly through the Air over a great Part of Africa. In fine, they have made a Horseman of a Sailor, and instead of a Ship give him a Horse for a maritime Expedition.

VOL. III. G g mals,

(1) Lib. 30.

For my Part, I am of Opinion, in the first Place, that the Residence of the Gorgons was not so remote from Greece as is commonly thought. In proof whereof it must needs be allowed, 1. That in the Time of Perseus Navigation was not greatly improved in Greece; that it was difficult to undertake long Voyages; and, in short, that the Ocean was reckoned inaccessible. Even Hercules, the greatest Heroe of Greece, and who lived not long after Perseus, bounded his Conquests by the western Extremities of the Mediterranean, where he erected those famous Pillars, which intimate that he was able to go no farther, Ne plus ultra.

2. We recede but little either from Tradition, or from the Opinion of the best Authors, in saying that the Gorgons dwelt in that Part of Libya, which was afterwards called Cyrenaicum. Palephatus, who might have learned it from Authors which are not now subsisting, asserts, that Phorcys their Father was a Cyrenian; and tho' Homer mentions the Port he had at Ithaca, that Prince very probably might have conquered that Island, which is not far from the Coast of Africa, where he resided.

3. We may easily believe that this Prince would employ

(1) See the Abbé Maffieu.

employ his Fleet in carrying on an advantageous Trade, and that Polydeſtes, King of Seriphus, either to get rid of Perſeus, whose Mother he was in love with, or to enrich himself with the Spoils of the Libyan Prince, engaged this young Heroe to undertake an Expedition which promised him a great Deal of Gain, and gave him some Ships to go and play the Pirate upon the Coasts of Africa.

Perſeus's Voyage was not therefore so difficult as is imagined: He set out from the Isle of Seriphus for the Coasts of Libya, where having found the Fleet of Phorcys, he made himself Master of some of his Ships, and a Part of his Riches. That these Ships bore the Names of Medusa, Stheno, and Euryale, is no ways improbable. Ships have always had Names. The Resolution of one Fable is often a Key to others. These Ships were loaded, as M. Fourmond has very well observed, with Elephants Teeth, with Horns of Fishes, and with Hyænas Eyes, which Phorcys bartered for other Goods: Here is the Mystery of that Tooth, that Horn and Eye which the Gorgons borrowed by Turns; that is to say, the Ships, when arrived in the Port, took each of them Goods proper for the Place to which they were bound.

The other Fictions that accompany this History will explain themselves. 'Tis evident, in the first Place, that Perſeus's Expedition was a Sea-voyage, and that those are mistaken who have taken this Prince for a Horseman who had broke Pegasus. Thus the Conjectures of Bochart, and of M. le Clerc, which we have quoted above, should go for nothing. To go from the Island of Seriphus to the Coasts of Libya, required Ships, not a Horse, and Pegasus himself was a Ship with Sails which Perſeus carried into Greece, after having made use of it to rescue Andromeda, as shall be said afterwards. Pindar, who is the first that said Perſeus rode upon Pegasus, and flew across the vast Expansion of the Air, is to be reckoned a very modern Author, in Comparison of the Antiquity of this Fable; and Ovid, who has copied him, is still more so. Further, we may suppose, with a great deal of Probability, that under this allegorical Fiction both of them intended the Description of a good Ship under Sail, which cuts the Waves with vast Rapidity; Volaticus dicitur, quod navibus venerit. Thus Virgil elegantly gives the Epithet of Wings to a Ship, Remigio alarum. If Hesiod, and after him the other Poets, say that Pegasus sprung from the Blood of Medusa, the Reason is, that Perseus did not carry off the Ship which went by that Name, till after a sharp Engagement, wherein much Blood was shed. Pegasus was in a Manner the Offspring of that Gorgon, because he belonged to her Father Phorcys's Fleet. When Hyginus adds (1) that Neptune was his Father, the obvious Meaning is, that so fine a Ship was considered as the Work of the God of the Sea. If Pausanias says that Pegasus was broke by Minerva, we may suppose he would have us thereby to understand that Perseus found Occasion for a good Share of Prudence to manage to Advantage a Ship with Sails, the Use whereof was then unknown to him; for Dedalus, who was the first in Greece that made use of such Ships, was not yet born. To conclude; if according to Ovid, Perseus mounted Pegasus for his Mauritanian Expedition, we need not be told that it was meant of a Ship, not a Horse; For no Body sets out from an Island, nor travels across the Seas on Horseback.

But it will be said, Hesiod relates that so soon as Pegasus was born, he left the Earth, and flew away to the Mansions of the Gods. I answer first, tho' it were not possible to explain all the Circumstances of a Fable so complicated, and at the same Time so obscure, that M. le Clerc has been forced to own one would need Ariadne's Clew to get out of such a Labyrinth, yet the Explications given of other Circumstances, would have never the less Probability; but this same may be reduced to a plausible Meaning, by saying that Perseus, upon his Return into Greece, as an Acknowledgment to the Gods for his happy Voyage, confe-

(1) Cœl. Poet. Astron. l. 2. c. 13.

consecrated the Prow of the Ship Pegasus in Jupiter's Temple, according to the Custom immemorial of lodging those Sorts of Offerings in Temples. And if this Temple stood upon Mount Olympus, which was accounted Heaven, and the Mansion of the immortal Gods, nothing more would be wanting as to this Circumstance. As for the Poets that are later than Hesiod, who make Pegasus to have taken Flight upon Mount Parnassus, where with a Blow of his Foot he made the Fountain Hippocrene to spring up, and which became so famous afterwards for the Seat of Apollo and the Muses, we may reckon that Perseus consecrated likewise in the Temple of Apollo, which was upon that Mountain, some other Part of his Ship.

The Assurance with which I undertake to explain all these Fictions, will justify the Reader to ask me an Account of others; and as to some of them, I shall endeavour to satisfy him. Why does Ovid alledge that from the Blood of Medusa's Head sprung Coral? I answer it is because Perseus found thereof in the Seas to which he voyaged, and that it was his Victory enabled him to fish for that Commodity, and to trade therein with Ease. But how is the same Poet to be understood, when he says the Monsters and Serpents of Africa sprung from the Drops of Blood that trickled from Medusa's Head? That is to say, Perseus found and carried off Ships which bore the strange Names of some Monsters, or of some Serpents. If Hesiod says that Phorcys had five Daughters, whereof two came into the World with grey Hairs, and were therefore denominated Graia (a), and that the other three, whom he calls Gorgons, resided beyond the Ocean, it is because that Prince's Fleet consisted of five Ships; the two first, as being older, went to no great Distance from the Port; the other three were destined to long Voyages. In fine, as to Chrysacr, who, together with Pegasus, issued from the Blood of Medusa, holding a golden Sword in his Hand, as we read in the same Poet, I heartily embrace the Explanation

G g 3 thereof

(a) See M. le Clerc's Notes upon this Passage.

thereof given by M. Fourmond, who reckons him some ingenious Artist who wrought in Gold and Ivory ; which is sufficiently intimated by the golden Sword, whence he had the Name of Chrysaor, which signifies one who works in Metals. Phorcys employed him to work the Elephant's Teeth, and the Horns of the other Animals which his Ships brought home. Might I be allowed to offer a Conjecture as to the golden Sword with which Chrysaor came into the World, I would say he had appeared with that Sword for the first Time at the Court of Phorcys. If the same Poet says Chrysaor married the beautiful Callirhoë the Daughter of the Ocean, by whom he had Geryon ; the Meaning is, that Phorcys, to engage so great an Artist to continue in his Dominions, had procured him a considerable Match : For, in short, we must explain these Fictions by the Rules of common Sense, and suppose Men acted then as we would now do in a parallel Case.

In fine, what shall we say as to that pretended Quality in the Head of Medusa to turn into Stones all those who looked upon it ? I might answer first, That this is a moral Fable, whereby we are to understand the Astonishment those were seized with who saw Perseus return Victorious from so dangerous an Expedition. And indeed the Effect of violent Surprise is to make us quite immovable. But Palephatus (1), besides this Moral, informs us of a Circumstance that may serve for a Key to this Fable. The Inhabitants of Scriphus, says he, seeing Perseus arrive with Medusa's Head upon the Prow of his Ship, deserted the Island ; and that Heroe having entered into it, and finding there nothing but Rocks and Stones, propagated the Fable of the Transformation of those Islanders. Bochart, after Eustatbius, has come nearer the Mark than Palephatus, in making it to have no other Foundation but the Etymology of the Word Scriphus, the Name of the Island, which imports Stones, and which Tacitus therefore calls not an Island, but

(1) De Rebus Incred.

but a Rock, Saxum Seriphum. And as to the additional Circumstance of Perseus's putting Polydeſtes to Death, to avenge the Wrong done to his Mother, whom probably he had compelled to marry him, whatever Reluctance ſhe had to the Match, and of his diſmiſſing or deſtroying moſt of his Courtiers, it will be eaſily granted that this Event might have been deſcribed as a real Transformation.

When Ovid ſays Meduſa's Head had alſo petrified ſome Plants of Coral under which Perſeus had concealed it, before he undertook the Reſcue of Andromeda, and that it had turned them into a red Hue: This is a Circumſtance of a phyſical Nature, which is eaſily explained, when we are told that Coral is a ſoft Plant in the Sea, which hardens in the Air, and acquires thoſe Colours with which it appears.

After the Conqueſt which we have related, this Heroe, ſays Ovid, paſſed through Mauritania, where the famous Atlas reigned. That Prince, warned by an Oracle to be on his Guard againſt a Son of Jupiter, denied him the common Rights of Hoſpitality; upon which, Perſeus producing the Meduſa's Head, turned him into a Stone; that is, flew him in the Mountains which bear his Name, and carried off the golden Apples from the Gardens of the Hesperides, which was kept by a Dragon given them by Juno.

Several Authors have ſet themſelves to work in examining where the Gardens of the Hesperides lay, and every one preſumes he has found out their true Situation. Rudbeck fancies they were near the Baltic Ocean. Others have placed them in the Heart of Africa, and beyond the Cape Verd Iſlands. Salmaſius was of Opinion that they were near the Straits of Gibraltar. But 'tis more probable that they lay in that Part of Africa, which is called Mauritania Tingitana, between the Ocean and the Extremity of Mount Atlas, which is at preſent the Kingdom of Morocco: This is the Opinion moſt conformable to the Authority of the Antients, and the Beauties of the Country are a Confirmation of this Conjecture; the very Name of Hesperides, which is given to these Gardens, is an Indication that they were near the Place where the Sun was believed to go every Evening to Bed, as has been already said elsewhere. Hesiod, in the Description he gives of these Gardens, leaves no Room to doubt of this Conjecture. Atlas, says that antient Poet (1), props the Skies at the Extremities of the Earth, near the Country of the Hesperides.

Again, if it be asked why the Poets make these Gardens to have been kept by a Dragon, I answer with Solinus, it is because the Sea in that Extremity of Africa makes various Turnings and Windings in the Land, whereof the Inequality of the Coasts are an ample Testimony (a). As to the golden Apples, they were either Oranges and Citrons, wherewith the Country abounds, or according to some Antients, Sheep whose Fleece was exceedingly rich (2). But 'tis needless to dwell longer in examining into a Circumstance which is rather the Result of poetical Fancy, than of an exact Description of that Part of Africa, which they knew only from the Relation of Hanno, wherewith they have intermixed so many Fables; which induced Pliny to call Mount Atlas, Montem Fabulosissimum (b).

The Poets, who have traced the History of this Heroe, tell us that after the Adventure of Atlas, he penetrated as far as Ethiopia, where he rescued Andromeda, the Daughter of Cepheus and Cassiopeia, from the Monster to which she was exposed, married her, and brought her with him into Greece. This Piece of History, (for 'tis true that Perseus married Andromeda, and had several Children by her) is intermixed with Fictions,

(1) Theog. V. 517.

(a) I explain this Particular of the History of Perseus, only because it is in Ovid; for I am persuaded, as I have already said, that this Heroe never travelled so far from Greece.

(2) See the History of Hercules.

(b) Fluctuoso meatu æstuarium e mari fertur, adeo sinuosis lateribus tortuosum, ut procul videntibus lapsus angueos fracta vortigine mentiat, idque, quod hortos appellare, circumdat; unde pomorum custodem interpretantes, struxerunt iter ad mendacium fabulandi. Solin. c. 24.

Fictions, which must be related before we reduce them to exact Truth.

Ovid, who has described this Fable at very great Length (1), says Cassiopeia, the Mother of Andromeda, having offered to compare her Beauty to that of the Nereids, incensed them; and that the Effects of their Displeasure having been felt in the Country, they were obliged to consult the Oracle of Ammon, who made Answer, that to appease those Goddesses Andromeda must be exposed to a Sea-monster: The Poet considers this Oracle as unjust (a).

And indeed he had Reason; for why inflict such a cruel Punishment upon the Daughter for the Vanity of the Mother? In the mean Time, the young Princess, adds the same Poet, was exposed upon a Rock, and the Monster that came out of the Sea was ready to devour her, when Perseus, mounted upon Pegasus, perceived her from the Air, came to her Relief, slew the Monster, broke Andromeda's Chains, and returned her to her Parents Witnesses of this Spectacle. As she was to be the Prize of him who should save her, Perseus got her to Wife: But while the Nuptials were celebrating, Phineus, the Nephew of Cassiopeia, to whom Andromeda had been promised, entered the banqueting Hall with a Band of armed Men, and began a very bloody Fight, which undoubtedly had proved fatal to Perseus overpowered by Numbers, had it not been for his having Recourse to Medusa's Head, the Sight whereof petrified Phineus and his Associates.

'Tis easy to see that Ovid grounds this Narration of his upon History; but that he borrows the Help of Fiction by way of Ornament to it. Gerard Vossius (2), who attempted to trace out the mysterious Meaning, says: Andromeda had been promised to an insolent inhuman Pirate, who by his Incursions infested the Coasts of Ethiopia, on Condition that he would give no Molestation to Commerce; Perseus, who arrived

(1) Met. l. 4.

(a) ————— maternæ pendere linguæ
Andromedam pœnæ, injustus jusserrat Ammon.

(2) De Orig. & Progr. Idol. l. 1.

rived at that Time at Cepheus's Court with his small Fleet, gave Chace to the Pirate, slew him, and married Andromeda. Perhaps in the Epithalamiums that were composed upon Occasion of his Marriage, the Pirate was represented as a Monster from whom Andromeda had been delivered by the Valour of Perseus.

There are Mythologists of Opinion, that what gave Rise to the Fiction, is, that the Ship with which the Pirate, now mentioned, ravaged the Coasts of Ethiopia, was called the Whale, and bore the Representation of that Fish upon the Prow. This Opinion wants not Probability: This Ship might be called the Whale, as that of Perseus himself was named the Pegasus.

I am persuaded however, that we are not to seek for the Ethiopia which Ovid speaks of in the Extremity of Africa, Perseus never having penetrated thither. That Prince, after he left the Island Seriphus, came to the Coasts of Libya, which are at no great Distance from it, and from thence to the Country where the Father of Andromeda reigned. 'Tis beyond Doubt that the Antients knew two Ethiopias; that which lies to the South of Egypt, and another which they took to lie in Asia; this last is the Ethiopia in question in the History of Andromeda. Its Bounds are not determined by Authors, but nothing hinders us from believing that one of its Extremities is upon the Coasts of Asia; and as I have very good Reason for saying that the Adventure now in debate happened in the Confines of Joppa, now Japha, upon the Coasts of Phœnicia, or rather Palestine, there we are to look for the Ethiopia referred to by Ovid, and make it the Scene of this Event, or else grant this Poet to have been mistaken, in making Perseus traverse Ethiopia.

From the Libyan Coasts, where he then was, it was easy for him to go to those of Palestine; and he might have got some Information of the Oracle of Ammon, which had ordered a young Princess to be exposed exposed to a Monster, by whom she was to be devoured; a Supposition the more probable, that this Oracle was in Libya where he then was. The Love of Glory animated him to the Adventure, and he set Sail from that Coast of Joppa. 'Tis to little Purpose to enquire whether it was indeed a Monster that ravaged the Country, or some of Cepheus's Enemies. All we need to know is, that the young Princess was to be the Prize of him who should rescue her: My chief Business is to prove that the Coast of Phœnicia, and not Ethiopia, was the Theatre on which this Scene was acted.

In proof of which, I have in the first Place the Authority of Josephus (1), who says this Adventure was thought to have happened near the City Joppa, where was still to be seen upon a Rock the Marks of the Chains with which the lovely Andromeda had been bound. 'Tis true this Historian adds, that those Marks had perhaps been engraved thereon to give Credibility to the Fact; but it will still be true that this was an antient Tradition of Joppa. Strabo (2) says the same in two Places of his Geography; and this Author, speaking of Ethiopia, asserts that there were not wanting Authors who placed it upon the Coasts of Phœnicia, adding, it was near the City now named, that the Adventure of Andromeda happened, according to the same Authors, who did not advance this Opinion concerning Ethiopia from Ignorance of Geography, but only on Occasion of the Fable now in question.

What we read in Pliny (3), is a further Proof that this Tradition of Joppa was not without Foundation. " Scaurus, says he, brought from Joppa to Rome, " during his Edileship, the Bones of the Monster " that was to have devoured Andromeda." Belluæ cui dicebatur exposita fuisse Andromeda, ossa Romæ apportata, ex oppido Judææ Joppe, ostendit inter reliqua miracula, in Ædilitate sua M. Scaurus, longitudine pedum 40, altitudinis coararum Indicos Elephantos excedente, spinæ crassitudine

(1) De Bell. Jud. l. 5. (2) L. 1. & l. 16. (3) L. 9. c. 5.

dine sesquipedali. Solinus his Copyist says the same, differing from him only in the Thickness of the Skin of the Backbone, which he makes but Half a Foot; instead of a Foot and a Half. Pomponius Mela (a) says something still more particular. “Joppa, says “ he, is a City thought to have been built before the “ Deluge : The Inhabitants assert that Cepheus reign“ ed there, relying on what is still to be seen upon “ antient Altars, namely, the Name and Title of “ that Prince, and of his Brother Phineus. As for “ the Fable, so much celebrated by the Poets, of the “ Rescue of Andromeda by Perseus, they have for “ Proof of this the Bones of the Monster that was “ going to devour her, which they shew with a great “ deal of Ostentation (b).”

Pausanias (1) delivers the same Tradition, when speaking of the different Colours of Water, he says near to Joppa was a Fountain, whose Water was red like Blood ; and that the People of the Place gave out, that Perseus being stained with Blood in killing the Sea-monster to which Cepheus’s Daughter had been exposed, bathed himself in that Fountain, and thereby gave that red Tincture to the Water.

Here then, according to Josephus and Strabo, we have the Marks of Andromeda’s Chains upon a Rock near Joppa. According to Mela, the Bones of the Monster are preserved in that City ; these same Bones transported to Rome, according to Pliny, under the Edileship of Scaurus, and the Dimensions of these Bones, and that of the Thickness of the Monster’s Skin, according to the same Author and his Copyist Solinus. Thus nothing hinders us from believing that under the Reign of Cepheus there appeared a Sea-monster
 near

(a) Mela here recedes from the Opinion of other Antients, who made Phineus the Nephew of Cassiopeia Cepheus’s Wife.

(b) Est Joppe ante Diluvium, ut ferunt, condita, ubi Cephea regnasse eo signo accolæ affirmant, quod titulum ejus, fratrisque Phinei, veteres quædam aræ cum religione plurima retinent. Quin etiam rei celebritate carminibus & fabulis servatæque a Perseo Andromedæ, clarum vestigium, Belluæ Marinae ossa immania ostentant.

(1) In Mess. c. 25.

near the Coasts of Joppa, which overfet the Barges, and was an Interruption to Trade; and that the Oracle being confulted, gave a Refponfe that Andromeda must be expofed to it. This is not the firft Time that Oracles have enjoined fuch Kind of Victims: What will not Superftition do! As to the Exiftence of the Monster, befides that antient History is full of fuch Prodigies, the Adventure of Jonas is a Proof that there were upon that Coaft Fifhes of a monftrous Nature both for Bulk and Voracity; for we may pre-ferve all due Faith for the facred History, without multiplying Miracles to no Purpofe; nor need we imagine the Fish that fwallowed up the Prophet came from fome remote Country, tho' we acknowledge in this Event the Punifhment which God inflicted upon his Difobedience.

'Tis therefore upon the Coasts of Phœnicia, or to fpeak more accurately, upon thofe of Paleftine, that the Adventure of Perfeus and Andromeda happened; and tho' the Reafons now offered fhould make but little Impreffion, yet I have another Argument which has not hitherto been ufed, and that ferves very much to evince it. This Argument I take from the De-fcription which Ovid gives of the Skirmifh between Phineus and Perfeus his Rival. The Poet names feve-ral Perfonages, which it will not be eafy to find in the Place which has been taken for the Scene of this Ad-venture; but who, being in the Neighbourhood of the Syrian Coasts, were very likely to take up Arms in behalf of Phineus. The firft whom Perfeus put to Death in this Scuffle is the young Athis, whom the Nymph Limnias had brought forth in a Cave near the River Ganges, or rather in a City of Syria, which Ptolomy calls "Αἰς, and which was the patronymic Name of that Youth. He who avenges this Death is called by the Poet Lycabas, a Native of Affyria, Affyrius Lycabas, the neighbouring Country to Paleftine. Ovid names Phorbas next, of the City of Syenna in the higher Egypt, and the Libyan Amphimedon: Then Polymedon, who was defcended from Semiramis the Queen

Queen of the Assyrians; and Halcioneus, to whom he gives the Epithet of Baëtrius, or, as it is in some Manuscripts, Barcæus, who came from Barce, a City of Cyrenais; Celadon, a Native of Mendes in the lower Egypt, or rather of the City of Myndes in Syria; for there are Manuscripts in which we read Myndesius Celadon, instead of Mendesius; Astrius, whose Mother was of Palestine itself, Matre Palæstina; Molpheus, to whom he gives the Epithet of Chaonius, that is, who derived his Original from the Chaonians, a neighbouring People to Arabia, according to Pliny (1); Ethemon, a Nabathæan or Arabian; Nileus, who pretended to be the Son of the Nile; Qui se genitum septemplice Nilo ementitus erat; that is to say, who was born in Egypt, or on the Confines of that River; lastly Astyages, whose Name is evidently Assyrian.

By this Detail we see, that all these Captains, or, if you will, all these Soldiers of Phineus's Army, came from Countries not far from the Place which I make to have been the Scene of this Adventure; which proves that it was near to Joppa the Battle was fought between Perseus and Phineus. That Country had Commerce at that Time with Greece, which had received several Colonies from thence; and it was easy for Perseus to go thither-upon his Departure from Libya.

The Result therefore of all that has been now said, is, that Perseus is not to be reckoned a Horseman, who performed so many glorious Exploits on the Horse Pegasus, but a Commodore, who performed some Expeditions; first in Ships with Oars, which he had brought from Seriphus, then in Ships with Sails which he seized upon the Coasts of Libya.

Our Heroe, after this Expedition, carried his Spouse to Seriphus, where having put Polydeës to Death, he went with her and his Mother into Greece, where he slew Prætus, who, not content with his own Inheritance, which was the City of Tyrinthia, Mydea, and all the Coast of Argolis, had dethroned Acrisius. Perseus

(1) Lib. 6. c. 28.

seus re-established his Grandfather in his Dominions; but as he was endeavouring to shew his Dexterity in playing at the Coit, he unfortunately slew him: In the following Manner is this Event related by Pausanias (1).

Acrisius having learned that Perseus was not far from Argos, and knowing the Reputation he had acquired by many signal Exploits, was impatiently desirous to see this Prince, and for that End repaired to Larissa upon the River Peneus. Perseus, on his Side, no less full of Impatience to embrace his Grandfather, and to ingratiate himself with him, did not fail to come to Larissa. There Perseus was willing to shew his Address; but as bad Luck would have it, having thrown his Coit with all his Force, it hit Acrisius such a fatal Blow that he died instantly. Thus the Prediction formerly given him was accomplished, without his being able to evade it by all the Cruelty he had exercised towards his Daughter and his Grandson. Perseus having repaired to Argos, where he deeply regretted the Parricide which he had thus accidentally committed, induced Megapentes, the Son of Prætus, to exchange Kingdoms with him, and he built Mycenæ, which became the Capital of his Dominions.

I have spoke of his Successors in the History of the Kings of Argos, and here have nothing further to add on that Head: for as to the Time when he lived, I shall reserve a Chapter for that by itself, after the History of Bellerophon. As our Heroe in his Lifetime had been a Patron of Learning, and built an Academy on Mount Helicon; and as he was farther distinguished by his glorious Exploits, he was advanced to Heaven, in the Panegyricks made in his Honour, and after his Death became a Demi-God. Of this Prince, and all his Wife's Family, were also formed the Constellations called Cassiopeia, Perseus, and Andromeda: The very Monster which he was said to have killed, was placed in the Heavens, where it formed the Sign of the Whale. They intermixed the

(1) In Corinth.

the Recital of his Actions with all the Supernatural they could devise ; and as he made all those his Conquests and Expeditions with equal Conduct and Fortune, and with incredible Dispatch, hence it was fabled that the Gods had lent him their Arms; Mercury his Wings and winged Shoes, to denote the Celerity of his Voyages; Pluto his Helmet, a Symbol of his Prudence and Policy, which made him conceal all his Designs in deep Secrecy; Pallas her Buckler, to signify the good Fortune which always accompanied him.

Pausanias says (1) this Prince was worshipped as a Heroe at Argos, and still more in the Isle of Seriphus and at Athens, where he had a Temple, in which was an Altar consecrated to Diētys and Clymene, who were reckoned the Preservers of this Heroe. This Diētys was the Brother of Polydeēs, and it was he and his Wife Clymene that had the Care of his Education by the King's Order, when he was driven by the Waves into the Island of Seriphus.

It will perhaps be asked what is the Foundation of the Fable which imports that the Daughters of Prætus, whom we mentioned, imagined themselves transformed to Heifers, and running through the Fields to hinder their being yoked in the Plough, made them to re-echo with their Lowings, as we learn from Virgil (a)? 'Tis thought that they actually became delirious, and that their Madness consisted in fancying themselves Heifers; Melampus, by whom they were cured, married one of them, and his Brother Biances the other; they were their Cousins, Prætus being their Uncle by the Mother's Side. These two Brothers afterwards had a Part of the Kingdom of Argos from Megapenthes their Father-in-law, as a Reward for this Piece of Service; and by this Means Talaus, Adrastus, and Tydeus, his Son-in-law, came to have a Share

(1) In Cerinth. c. 18.

(a) Prætides implerunt falsis mugitibus agros;

At non tam turpes pecudum tamen ulla secuta est

Concubitus, quamvis collo timuisset aratrum,

Et sæpe in lævi quæfisset cornua fronte. Ecl. 6.

in the Kingdom of Argos. We ought not to omit that the Misfortune of those young Ladies was attributed to Juno's Vengeance, whom they had incensed by comparing their Beauty to hers, which was a Crime the Gods by no Means pardoned ; but, setting aside all Fictions, 'tis probable that this Madnefs was the Effect of some Distemper where the Imagination was much affected, as we see in hypocondriac People, who fancy they resemble several Sorts of Animals. Accordingly Melampus employed in their Cure black Hellebore, since called from his Name Melampodion. Pausanias says (1) they were cured at Sicyon in the public Place, and that Prætus, their Father, built in that Place a Temple dedicated to Persuasion; an Argument that Melampus and his Brother contributed at least as much to the curing of those Virgins, as the Remedies which they gave them.

According to Pausanias they alone were not seized with this Distemper ; that Author ascribes it to other Women of Argos ; and this Madnefs of theirs consisted in running up and down the Fields.

We may see at one Glance of the Eye Perseus's Posterity in the following genealogical Tree.

(1) In Corinth.

The POSTERITY of PERSEUS.

Perseus, the Son of Danaë and Jupiter, rescued Andromeda the Daughter of Cepheus, married her, and had by her six Sons and one Daughter.

Alceus married Hippomona the Daughter of Meneceus, of $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \textit{Amphitryo.} \\ \textit{Anaxo, the Wife of Eleetryon.} \end{array} \right.$

Mnesto married Lisys the Daughter of Pelops, of $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \textit{Hippotoe} \text{ had} \\ \text{by } \textit{Neptune,} \end{array} \right. \left\{ \begin{array}{l} \textit{Taphius, who built} \\ \text{the City of } \textit{Taphus} \\ \text{in } \textit{Cephalonia,} \end{array} \right. \left\{ \begin{array}{l} \textit{Pterelas, whom } \textit{Nep-} \\ \text{tune his Grand-Father} \\ \text{made immortal.} \end{array} \right.$

Eleetryon married $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \text{Nine Sons, besides} \\ \text{his Niece } \textit{Anaxo,} \end{array} \right. \left\{ \begin{array}{l} \textit{Alcmena, who after the Example of her Mother married} \\ \text{by whom he had } \textit{Amphitryo} \text{ her Uncle.} \end{array} \right.$

Stenelus married Nicippe the Daughter of Pelops King of Elis, by whom he had, of $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \textit{Eurystheus, whom } \textit{Hercules} \text{ served, and in whom} \\ \text{ended the Posterity of } \textit{Perseus, so that the King-} \\ \text{dom of } \textit{Mycenæ} \text{ came into the Hands of the } \textit{Pelo-} \\ \text{pidæ.} \end{array} \right.$

Ielas, whose Posterity is not known.

Perfes, whom he left with Cepheus his Father-in-Law. From him the Per-sians pretended to be descended.

Gorgophone, married Perieres one of Deucalion's Descendants.

C H A P. VI.

The History of Bellerophon.

BELLEROPHON, who, according to Homer (1), was the Son of Glaucus, King of Ephyre, or of Corinth, and Grandson of Sisyphus, had the Name of Hipponous; but having slain his Brother, or some considerable Person in Corinth, whose Name, according to Authors, was Beller, he got the Name of Bellerophon, as much as to say, The Murderer of Beller, and he was obliged to retire to Argos, where Prætus gave him a very kind Reception; but Queen Stenobæa his Wife, or rather Antæa, as she is called in Homer who relates this Fable at full Length, falling in Love with him, and not able to make any Impression upon him, turned his Insensibility to a Crime, and accused him before her Husband of having attempted to debauch her. “ Sir, says she (2), you must resolve either to die yourself, or put Bellerophon to Death, who has been so insolent as to offer Violence to me.” The Prince, surprized at this strange Piece of News, would have instantly put him to Death; but not daring to violate the sacred Rights of Hospitality, he contented himself with sending him to his Father-in-law Jobates, King of Syria, the Father of Stenobæa, desiring him in a Letter, whereof Bellerophon himself was the Bearer, to make away with him (a). Bellerophon set out, continues Homer, under the Protection of the Gods, the Guardians of persecuted Innocence, and happily arrived in Lycia,
H h 2 upon

(1) Il. l. 6. (2) Id. ib.

(a) Eustathius alledges that these Letters were Tablets, which instead of Letters contained Hieroglyphics representing to the King the Bearer's Crime, and the Revenge he wanted to have taken upon him: For this Reason Homer calls them Σήματα, Signa. Be that as it will, it has become a proverbial Way of speaking to call those Bellerophon's Letters, which contain something against the Interest of those who bear them: See Erasmus in his Adagia. Such were the Letters of Uriah; whom this Story pretty much resembles.

upon the Banks of the Xanthus (a). Jobates received him with Joy, and regaled him for nine Days, and on each Day sacrificed to the Gods a Bull, as an Acknowledgment for the happy Arrival of the young Prince. On the tenth Day he asked of him the Letters which the King his Son-in-law had wrote to him. He deferred it so many Days in Compliance with the Custom of those Times; greater Precipitancy would have bespoke indiscreet Curiosity, and been reckoned Unpoliteness.

Jobates had no sooner read Prætus's Letters, than he ordered Bellerophon, with a View to have him destroyed, to encounter a formidable Monster called the Chimera. Here begin the Fables which are interwoven with the History of this Prince; let us see what may have given Rise to them.

The Chimera, according to Homer (1), was not of human but divine Extraction. She had the Head of a Lion, the Tail of a Dragon, and the Body of a Goat; and from her gaping Mouth she vomited Torrents of Fire and Flame. Hesiod, who has also given a Description of this Monster (2), adds, that it was the Offspring of Typhon and Echidna, and had the three Heads of the Animals now named: Lucretius, Virgil, Ovid, and the other Poets have followed Hesiod and Homer (b). It will not, I presume, be expected that

(a) Homer is at great Pains to let us know that this Part of Lycia was the Scene of Bellerophon's Adventures, and he never confounds it with the other which was nearer to Phrygia, and whereof Pandarus commanded the Troops at the Siege of Troy; while Glaucus and Sarpedon, the Grandsons of our Heroe, had led thither the Lycians from the Confines of Xanthus, as says the same Poet, l. 2.

(1) Iliad. l. 6. (2) Theog.

(b) In the Grand Duke of Florence's Gallery is a Figure of the Chimera, such as we have now pictured it from the Poets. 'Tis a Lion with a Goat coming out of his Back, and a Serpent rising out of his Tail. His Hind-legs have some Resemblance to the small Wings of a Serpent: We have it the same Way represented upon several Medals of Corinth, both in those of Marcus Aurelius and others: and in like Manner is it designed in the antique Pictures of the famous Manuscript of Virgil, which is in the Vatican Library.

that I should realize a Monster whose Name is become synonymous with the imaginary Beings, which are themselves nothing else but specious Chimeras; nor need we be so serious upon the Head as Lucretius, who has endeavoured to prove, by good Arguments, that the Chimera never subsisted: For how is it possible, says he, to believe that there was a Being compounded of three Natures, with the Head of a Lion vomiting Flames, since Fire equally consumes the Entrails of all Animals? Should it be alledged, continues that Poet, that the new made Earth, in her State of vigorous Fertility, was capable of producing such Monsters, who will say against her being able likewise to form Rivers of liquid Gold, Trees whose Leaves and Fruits were precious Stones, and Men able to cross the Seas without any other Support but their own Force and Activity? These are physical Reasonings, which we may reckon merely thrown away.

We must therefore enquire what might be the Foundation of this Fiction, and, by good Luck, the Mythologists, both antient and modern, have not spared their Conjectures on this Subject. To avoid a tedious Detail, I shall only take notice of those that appear most plausible: For little Regard, I believe, will be had to the Testimony of Plutarch, who says there was a Rock upon the Top of a Mountain of Lycia, which reflected the Rays of the Sun so intensely on the Plain below, as quite to burn up the neighbouring Fields and Herbs, and that Bellerophon having cleft that Rock asunder, diminished the Effect of that incommodious Reflection, which gave Occasion to say that he had destroyed the Chimera.

Nor, I presume, will the Explanation of Nicanor of Colophon be better relished, who alledges, that by the Chimera was intended the Rivers and Torrents, which in Winter run with a rapid Course, lay waste the Fields, and resemble the Tail of a Dragon by their crooked Meanders; and that the Victory of Bellerophon, who kills the Monster with his Darts, denotes the Beams of the Sun, which, during the Summer Heats, dry up the Torrents, and make the Rivers shrink up within their Channels.

The Conjecture of those who are for moralizing this Fable, deserves as little Credit as the physical Explanation of Nicander; and it will not be easy to believe that it was invented for no other End but to teach us that we ought to labour assiduously to extinguish the Fire of our Passions, which, like roaring Lions, continually assault us; insinuate themselves, like Serpents, into the most secret Recesses of Self-love; and, like Goats that brouze upon the tender Grass, are always preying upon the Peace and Quiet of the Mind.

As, according to Homer, Jobates obliged Bellerophon to fight the Solymes, also the Amazons, and the Lycians themselves, who had laid an Ambuscade for him to surprize him; Tzetzes, upon the Authority of Cerystius, alledged that the Idea of the Chimera had been taken from the Characters of these three Sorts of Enemies; the Solymes, a couragious People, are compared to Lions; the Amazons, who made less Resistance, and who perhaps fortified themselves in steep rocky Places, are the Goats; and the Lycians, who lurked in secret to surprize the Heroe, are the Serpents.

The learned Bochart (1), who judiciously thought it improbable that this fabulous Monster had been formed of the three Enemies which Bellerophon defeated at different Times and Places; and who knew that Homer had not mentioned these three Expeditions till after the Heroe had vanquished the Chimera, has Recourse to another Conjecture, which, tho' it is more ingenious, is not perhaps more solid. As this Author presumed he had found Traces of the Phœnician Language in several Parts of Greece and Asia Minor, he alledges that by the Chimera is to be understood the three Captains of the Armies of the Solymes, Argus, Arselus, and Trosibius, whose Names, in the Phœnician Language, answer to the three Animals where-

of

(1) Chan. l. i. c. 6.

of the Monster is compounded: The first imports a Lion, the second a Goat, and the third the Head of a Serpent; or, which comes to the same, it was the three principal Divinities of that People, whose Names were the same with those of the Animals which were upon the military Ensigns. In the first Battalion the Colours had a Lion, those of the second a Goat, and those of the third a Serpent. But where shall we find these three Phœnician Divinities, as to which all Antiquity is profoundly silent?

Agatarchides of Gnidos (1) offers an Explication which at first Sight appears very specious. Amisodar, says he, King of a Part of Lycia, had to Wife one whose Name was Chimera, whose two Brothers were called the Lion and the Dragon. These two Princes having seized upon several important Posts, put to the Sword all those who fell into their Hands, and made great Devastation on the Lands of their Neighbours. Their strict Union with their Sister, gave Occasion to say they were three Bodies under one Head, as had been fabled of those three Princes of Epirus, whom Hercules defeated under the Name of the monstrous Geryon. Jobates, infested by the Inroads which those two Brothers made into his Dominions, sent against them Bellerophon, who rid the Country of them, and for that Reason he is said to have vanquished the Chimera.

Homer, in a Passage quoted by Apollodorus, may have given a Handle to this Explanation, when he tells us the Chimera had been brought up by Amisodar; but besides that this Passage is neither in the Iliad nor Odyssey, 'tis certain that Homer, in the sixth Book, where he relates the Adventures of Bellerophon at very great Length, says not one Word of this.

'Tis therefore by following Strabo, Pliny, Servius, and other very antient Authors, that I shall establish what appears to me the just Explanation of this Fable. That Part of Lycia where Jobates reigned, which extended

H h 4 along

(1) Hist. Asiæ, l. 3.

the River Xanthus as far as the Sea, was full of Mountains covered with Woods and Pasturage. The Cragus alone had eight Tops; upon one of which, according to Strabo, was a City which bore the Name of that Mountain. Upon another Top, which was called the Chimera, as we learn from Pliny, was a Volcano which was never extinguished, Flagrat in Phaselitide mons Chimæra, & quidem immortalibus ac nobilibus flamma (1). This Author adds, that it was from Ctesias's Authority he described the Volcano of Mount Chimera; and yet in the Passage of Ctesias quoted by Photius (2), where Mention is made of that same Volcano, the Name of Mount Chimera is not to be found; so that one of the two has undoubtedly wrong copied that Antient.

Be that as it will, these Mountains of Lycia, according to the same Writers, were full of Lions, wild Goats and Serpents, which made great Havock in the Valley and Meadows that lay along the Xanthus as far as the Sea, and hindered the Shepherds from leading their Flocks that Way. Iobates, either to exercise the Valour of young Bellerophon, at a Time when Heroism consisted in purging the Earth almost wholly overspread with Forests and wild Beasts; or in Compliance with the Demand of his Son-in-law, whom he feared, employed him in this hazardous Expedition. Bellerophon hunted down all those Animals, rid the Country of them, and made the Pastures in the Mountains and neighbouring Plains quite safe and habitable. Servius, upon this Verse in Virgil, Flammisque armata Chimæra, explains this Fable in the same Way as I have now done (a). I shall add that it was chiefly from the Goats of the Mountain it had the Name of Chimera given it, this Word being compounded of two others that signified a Goat brought forth in Winter.

The History of Hercules, who lived much about the Time

(1) L. 2. c. 106. (2) Cod. 72.

(a) Revera mons est Lyciæ, cujus ladicque ardet cacumen, juxta quod sunt Leones; Media autem pascua sunt, quæ capris abundant, imò vero montis serpentiis plena. Hunc Bellerophon habitationem fecit, unde Chimæram dicitur occidisse. Æn. 1. 6.

Time of Bellerophon, hardly leaves Room to doubt of this being the true Explanation of the Fable of the Chimera, and the only one we ought to depend upon. This Expedition bears too great a Resemblance to the Labours of that Heroe, especially to his clearing the Fens of Lerna, full of Serpents and other venomous Beasts, not to make us believe that the Chimera and the Hydra had the same Original: For, to say it once more, such Kind of Monsters never had an Existence, and those are the real ones we must seek for, which made great Havock in those Times upon the Flocks, and sometimes even upon Men.

It was, no doubt, after so important a Piece of Service that Jobates gave his Daughter (1) in Marriage to Bellerophon; for I am of Opinion that we are not to range the Events of this Heroe's Life, as Homer has done, who enumerates all his Adventures together, and does not make him marry the King of Lycia's Daughter till after all his Combats are over; since we know, that when he made War upon the Solyimi above mentioned, he had a Son by that Princess who accompanied him to it, and was killed therein.

The Solyimi, Jobates's Enemies, were according to Herodotus (2), People of Lycia, who were afterwards denominated Mylians. Strabo, who differs from that Historian opposes to his Opinion a Passage in Homer, where that Poet says (3) Bellerophon set out from Lycia to go against the Solyimi; for, says he, he would not have spoke accurately, if the Solyimi had dwelt in Lycia itself: Thus this learned Geographer, and Pliny after him, place those People in Pisidia. Bellerophon, at the Head of Jobates's Troops, made War upon them, and routed them in an Engagement, which Glauco in Homer says was a very bloody one. Ister, the Son of our Heroe, lost his Life in it, and was interred in the Confines of the Meander, in a Valley, which, according to Strabo (4), took the Name of the Valley of Bellerophon, and undoubtedly was the Field

(1) She was called Philonoë. (2) L. 1. c. 173. (3) L. 6.
(4) L. 13.

Field of Battle where this Engagement happened, Homer says poetically, that the God Mars took away that Prince's Life; an Allegory too plain not to be comprehended by every Body.

After the Defeat of the Solyi, Bellerophon turned his Arms against the Amazons. I shall not insist much upon those Heroins, of whom the Antients have said so much. All I shall observe, is, that it appears from Strabo they had quitted the Banks of the Thermodon about the Time of the Trojan War, and made an Ir-ruption into Phrygia and the adjacent Countries, where Priam (1) and Bellerophon made War upon them. These Amazons, of whom Strabo here speaks, are undoubtedly those against whom Hercules fought, and who, according to Pausanias, came and settled in the Confines of Ephesus, where the Temple of Diana served them for a Sanctuary. This Country was between Phrygia, where Priam reigned, and Lycia, where Bellerophon had fixed his Residence.

Our Heroe, upon his Return from this Expedition, was attacked by a Band of Lycians, who, growing jealous of the Reputation and Credit he had gained in the Country, laid an Ambuscade for him. The Traitors were defeated notwithstanding a stout Resistance, and Bellerophon returned victorious over so many Enemies to the Court of Jobates. “Then it was, according to Homer, that the King of Lycia perceiving, from these great Exploits, that he must be of the Race of the Gods, bestowed upon him his Daughter in Marriage, with the Half of his Kingdom as a Dowry. The Lycians themselves, after their Prince's Example, made over to him the Property of a large Park, where was the finest Vineyard of the Country, with Woods and arable Ground; the ordinary Present given by the People to Heroes, wherein they treated them like Gods, who had also Lands consecrated to them.”

After the Death of Jobates, who left no Male Issue, Bellerophon succeeded him, and his Descendants reigned in

(1) Strabo, loc. cit.

in that Part of Lycia whereof his Father-in-law was King. He had by his Wife three Sons; Isander, who died in the Battle against the Solymi; Hippolochus, who reigned after him, and was the Father of Glaucus; and one Daughter named Laodamia, who had an Intrigue which she fathered upon Jupiter, and became the Mother of Sarpedon. Homer says (1) Diana put her to Death; which signifies that she died suddenly, or of an infectious Distemper.

The same Poet subjoins, that after Bellerophon had incurred the Hatred of the Gods, he was given up to such a deep Melancholy, that he wandered alone in the Desarts, tortured with Anxiety, and incapable to relish the Pleasures of Society. He does not say what had drawn down upon him this Hatred of the Gods; whether it was, as Madam Dacier has remarked, that he found it easier to preserve his Integrity in his State of Persecution than in Prosperity, and that he was ruined by Pride. I should rather think, that as the Poet in this Passage relates the Death of Isander and Laodamia, he would have us to understand, that the Death of those his two Children had rendered him inconsolable, and that he had resigned the Administration to his Son Hippolochus, to go into Retirement.

This, I presume, is the most consistent Account can be given of Bellerophon and his Family. I have chiefly relied upon Homer, who relates this History detached from most of the Fictions superadded to it by those that came after. Therefore I have said nothing of Pegasus, that famous Horse which was broke by Minerva herself, who gave him to this Heroe, and to which he owed his Death: For as this Prince, we are told, mounted upon Pegasus, was attempting to soar up to Heaven, a Gad-bee stung the Horse, and the Heroe was overthrown, and killed with the Fall: They add, that Pegasus at that Time got a Place among the Constellations, where Aurora employs the Hours to unbar the Gates of Day (1). First, because this is an Episode whereof Homer has said nothing, Pindar being the

(1) Hygin.

the first who broached this Fiction afterwards. Hesiod, who mentions the Horse Pegasus, says not, as has been already observed in the History of Perseus, that Bellerophon made use of him. In the second Place, because I think I have sufficiently proved that Pegasus was not a Horse, but a Ship which bore that Figure upon the Prow. Thirdly, when Hyginus says (1) Bellerophon was the Son of Neptune, he clearly proves that he was considered not as a Horseman, but as a famous Sailor, who had come by Sea from some remote Country.

This Fable of Hyginus gave Birth to another, or at least was a Continuation of it. Bellerophon, according to Plutarch, being disobliged with Jobates, who had exposed him to so many Dangers, prayed his Father Neptune to take Vengeance upon him. After this Prayer the Waves of the Sea followed him, and overflowed all the low Country. The Lycians, seeing themselves in Danger of being inevitably ruined, supplicated him to vouchsafe to appease the incensed God: But this Prince being insensible to their Tears, the Lycian Women presented themselves before him in an undecent Manner, and compelled him at last to return towards the Sea, upon which the Waves retired. This Fiction, unknown to Hesiod and Homer, and which agrees so ill with the signal Demonstrations of Gratitude which Jobates had given to Bellerophon, has undoubtedly no other Signification, but that the Sea having overflowed the lower Lycia, this Heroe raised there a Mole which put a Stop to the Inundation, after the Example of Hercules, who made such another Work upon the Banks of Troy which the Sea had overflowed.

We shall conclude with a Remark of Bockart (2), that the Name of Bellerophon seems to be compounded of two Hebrew Words, Baal Haroun, Magister vel Præfectus Jaculatorum; The Head or Master of the Archers. And we may add, that the Name of Hipponous, ponous, which he bore before the Murder that obliged him to quit Corinth, had undoubtedly been given him, because he had practised the Art of breaking Horses (a).

(1) Hygin. Cœl. Poet. Astr. c. 6. (2) Hieros. p. 1. l. 2. c. 6.

Tho' Bellerophon had quitted Corinth, whither he never returned, that City however valued itself on having given him Birth, and he is represented upon Medals of that City with the Chimera, as may be seen in the second Volume of the Thesaurus Britannicus.

Upon these Medals the Chimera appears with a Lion's Head; from the Middle of the Body rises a Goat's Head, and the Tail terminates in that of a Serpent. Bellerophon appears in the Air, mounted upon Pegasus, and ready to give the Monster the deadly Blow. We have also an Intaglio published by the late M. Maffei, whereon Bellerophon in like Manner appears in the Air upon the Horse Pegasus, darting his Javelin at the Chimera. It has also a Lion's Head, that of a Goat rises from its Back, and its Tail terminates in that of a great Dragon. Another Intaglio, published by Licetus, represents the same Combat: But the Chimera appears here to be only a Lion, at least the Smallness of the Stone hinders us from discerning any Thing else upon it.

I shall now fix, as well as I can, the Time when Perseus and Bellerophon lived: Nothing being more conducive to give Light to the Antiquities of those Times, than the true Æras of these two Heroes.

C H A P. VII.

Wherein we examine when Bellerophon and Perseus lived.

CHronologists, both antient and modern, presuming that Bellerophon had been expiated from the Murder he had committed, by Prætus King of Argos, have been obliged to say, that he lived long before Perseus, who was only Prætus's Grand-nephew; and their their Opinion was generally received, when M. Freret and I having examined this Question at the same time, and without communicating our Thoughts to one another, we laid before the Academy of the Belles-Lettres two Dissertations (1), wherein we both proved by the Synchronisms and Genealogies preserved to us by ancient Authors, that Perseus was prior to Bellerophon by several Years; that the former lived in the fifth Generation before the Siege of Troy, while the latter was but at the Distance of two Generations, and even less from that Æra: and consequently, we were obliged to conclude that the Prince, to whom Bellerephon had Recourse to be expiated from his Crime, was not the King of Argos, who had dethroned his Brother Acrisius. I hope the Result of these Dissertations will satisfy the Reader as to the true Time when the two Heroes lived whose History I have given.

(a) See the Dissert. of M. Freret upon Riding, Mem. de l'Acad. Tom. 7. p. 286.

If we take the Succession of the Kings of Argos and Mycenæ only from Danaus, of whom Perseus was descended, to the Destruction of Troy, we shall find ten Generations, and Perseus in the fifth: Now five Generations, reckoning with Herodotus at the Rate of three to a hundred Years, amount to 166 Years. To make the Thing more plain, let us join the last of these Generations with that of the Kings of Athens, supposing only what needs not be thought extraordinary, that the Reigns are not exactly equal in a Duration of two Lines, and that sometimes the one runs beyond the other.

Danaus	-	-	-	Erichthonius.
Lynceus	-	-	-	Pandion I.
Abas	-	-	-	Eretheus.
Acrisius and Prætus	-			Cecrops II.
Danae and Perseus	-			Pandion II.
Electrion and Sthenelus	-			Egeus.
Euristheus , Hercules	-			Theseus.
Atreus and Thyestes	-			Minestheus.
Agamemnon	-	-	-	Demophon.

†Tis

(1) See the Mem. Vol. 7.

'Tis therefore evident, if there is any Certainty in the History of those early Ages, that Perseus lived about a hundred or a hundred and twenty Years before the Trojan War.

Monfieur Fourmond, in his critical Reflexions upon the Histories of antient Nations, reckons between Perseus and the Trojan War only fourscore Years; but he is obliged, for Proof of this Hypothesis, to say that the Successors of Acrisius, to the War of Troy, which he is forced to acknowledge with all Chronologists, had either reigned several together, or had only reigned a short Time (1). M. Freret, in his Chronological Researches upon the History of Lydia (2), is of Opinion, that from the Commencement of Perseus's Reign to the taking of Troy, there are 178 Years. In fine, the Chronographer Apollodorus alledges, that Pretus, Perseus's Grand-uncle, lived 187 Years before that Epocha. For my Part, I am of Opinion, that if we reduce the Reigns of his Successors to their just Standard, we can admit between that Heroe and the War of Troy, neither a longer nor shorter Space of Time than what I have reckoned it. But whatever Sentiment we embrace, 'tis certain that Perseus preceded Bellerophon several Years, which is the Scope of this Disquisition, since the latter lived only forty or forty-five Years at most before the Destruction of Troy: This is what remains to be proved.

Glaucus and Sarpedon, his two Grandsons, commanded the Lycians at the Siege of Troy, as we read in Homer (3). The same Glaucus recounts to Diomedes the Adventures of Bellerophon his Grandfather, and subjoins, that his Father Hippolochus was yet alive when he set out for that War. There are not therefore two Generations compleat between Bellerophon and the Trojan War, since his Son was not then dead; and this is my Reason for reckoning it only an Intervál of forty or forty-six Years. From the same Conversation between Glaucus and Diomedes, other Arguments may be deduced ted for the Truth of what I advance. These two Princes coming to the Knowledge of one another, Dionysius says, he had heard from his Father Tydeus, that Bellerophon had been at the Court of Oeneus King of Calydon. This Oeneus was his Grandfather, as Bellerophon was Glaucus's: Thus the two Grandfathers lived two Generations before the Trojan War. The Synchronism of Oeneus gives us several others; that is, all the Princes who went to the Hunting of the Calydonian Bear, Meleager, Idas, Lynceus, Castor and Pollux, Theseus and the rest, who all lived but one Generation before the taking of Troy. But if the other Adventures of Bellerophon, except this Journey to the Court of Oeneus, are not inserted with those of the Heroes of his Age, 'tis because he had left Greece very young, to retire into Lycia.

(1) See Tom. 2. p. 242. & seq. (2) Mem. de l' Acad. T. 6. p. 311. (3) Iliad.

If we were to review the several Branches of the Families of that Time, we should also find a Number of Testimonies in Confirmation of the same Truth. Pausanias (1) says Medea, when she quitted her Residence at Corinth, which the Perfidy of Jason had rendered odious to her, left the Crown to Sisyphus: Medea and Jason were therefore Contemporaries with Bellerophon's Grandfather; consequently this Prince lived only about the Time of the Expedition of the Argonauts, of whom Jason was the Chief, and so but a few Years before the Siege of Troy. The same Pausanias says farther (2), that Bellerophon, before he quitted Greece, had gone to Trezene to make his Addresses to Æthra, the Daughter of Pitheus, who, in a short Time after, was delivered of Theseus: Bellerophon therefore lived in the Time of Pitheus and Egeus.

We might bring this Prince yet nearer to that Æra. Eolus, his Great-grandfather, had, among other Daughters, Alcyone, the Wife of Ceyx, King of Trachin. Now Ceyx, according to all the Antients, was contemporary with Hercules, whom he received at his Court, and gave him Expiation for the Murder he had committed. Alcyone was therefore Grand-aunt to Belle-

(2) In Corinth. (2) Loc. cit.

Bellerophon, who consequently could not be born till about the last Year of Hercules, or even after that Heroe's Death. In fine, to abridge the Synchronisms which would lead me too far, I shall only remark further, that Strabo says the Amazons made War upon Priam and Bellerophon, in the Time of the Trojan War: Now the Time of Priam is very well known, since he began to reign after the first taking of that City by Hercules, which is doubtless what Strabo speaks of in the Passage now referred to.

But it will be said, if Bellerophon is so many Years later than Perseus, who then is that Prætus who received him, and gave him Expiation from the Murder he had committed at Corinth? It would be a sufficient Answer to this Question to say, that tho' History spoke of no other Prætus but the Grand-uncle of Perseus, it would still be much more probable that Bellerophon is many Years posterior to him, than it is that he who gave him Expiation, was the King of Argos who dethroned his Father Acrisius. M. Freret, in the Dissertation which I have mentioned in the Beginning of this Chapter, instead of one Prætus, posterior to the King of Argos, finds two; as to which Pausanias may be consulted. It will be urged, that Homer, speaking of Prætus, who expiated Bellerophon, says he was one of the most powerful Princes of Argos. But it may be answered, 1. That Poet gives him not the Title of King. 2. By Argos, he may mean not the City of that Name, but Greece in general, as is usual both in him and Virgil; for it cannot be denied, that when the latter says Troy never was to be taken till the Greeks returned once more to Argos, and renewed the Omens,

Nec posse Argolicis exscindi Pergama telis, Omina ni repetant Argis, &c. Æn. l. 2.

the Word Argolicis must be taken for all the Greeks, and that of Argos, for Greece in general.

'Tis surprizing that these Arguments should have escaped the Learned of the two last Ages by whom so many happy Discoveries have been made in Chronology ; but I observed at the Beginning of this Chapter the Source of their Error. They knew Prætus the Brother of Acrisius, as being a Prince very celebrated in the History of those Times ; and the Adventures of Bellerophon appeared to them connected with his Reign. This Prætus was unquestionably Perseus's Grand-uncle ; hence they concluded that Perseus had not lived till two generations after Bellerophon ; but at the same Time they ought to have perceived that the same Perseus was Great-Grand-Uncle to Hercules, still better known than Bellerophon and Perseus. Hercules lived one Generation before the Trojan War ; therefore his Great-Grandfather lived four Generations before that War. Bellerophon was but the Grandfather of Glaucus and Sarpedon, who assisted in the taking of that City ; consequently he must have preceded that Æra only by one Generation.

C H A P. VIII.

The History of the two Minos's, and of the War of the second against the Athenians, with the Adventures of the Minotaur, of Dedalus, Theseus, &c.

I Said in the History of Cadmus, that Jupiter, or rather Asterius, having ravished Europa, Agenor's Daughter, and conveyed her to the Island of Crete, where he reigned, she had by him three Sons, Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthus. I shall now give the History of the first of these Princes, which has been greatly obscured, because most of the Antients on this Occasion have fallen into a considerable Error, in acknowledging only one Minos, whereas it is certain that there were two of them. Apollodorus (1), Strabo (2), Plutarch (3), Eusebius, and several others, are chargeable with this Mistake, having confounded the Son of Jupiter, or rather of Asterius, with the Son of Lycastrus,

(1) Bibl. 1. 3. (2) L. 10. (3) In Theseo.

Lycaſtus, whom Homer (1), Diodorus (2), and the Pa-rian Marbles have plainly diſtinguiſhed (3) in two of their Æras, whereof one refers to Minos the firſt of the Name ; and the ſecond, which is poſterior to it by about fifty Years, to Minos II. But the ſame Authors, except thoſe of the Chronicle, as well as moſt of the Moderns, after having ſettled or ſuppoſed the Diſtinc-tion of theſe two Princes, have run into ſeveral Inconſiſtencies by not ſtudying their Characters ſufficiently ; ſpeaking of Minos ſometimes as a wiſe Legiſlator, frequently as a cruel and barbarous Tyrant, becauſe in Fact it is true that the former was a juſt and equitable Prince, and the ſecond, for having avenged upon the Athenians the Death of one of his Sons, has been very much cried down by them.

I ſhall endeavour ſufficiently to diſtinguiſh theſe two Kings of Crete, and aſcribe to each the Actions that belong to him.

After the Death of Aſterius, Minos (4) aſcended the Throne. Apollodorus (5) ſays Sarpedon and Rhadamanthus, his two Brothers, having diſputed the Crown with him, he prayed the Gods to vouchſafe to give him a Mark of their Approbation ; upon which Neptune made the Sea to produce a Ball of ſurpaſſing
Whiteness ; but this Adventure relates to Minos
II. whom that antient Author has not diſtinguiſhed from the firſt, at leaſt in what of his Works are now extant.

Minos, in peaceful Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, married Ithone the Daughter of Liëtius (6), by whom he had two Children, Lycaſtus, who ſucceeded him, and Acacallide, who, according to Diodorus (7), was married to Apollo ; that is, probably, either to one of his Priests, or to a Prince, who, on account of his Taſte for the Sciences, or for Muſick, had acquired the Name of that God. The Iſland of Crete, little known before the Reign of the King we are now ſpeaking of,
I i 2 became

(1) Iliad. l. 3. (2) L. 4, & 5. (3) Ep. 11, & 20. (4) See the Fable of his Birth in the third Chapter. (5) L. 3. (6) Diod.
l. 4. (7) Loc. cit.

became then very famous; Minos having governed his People with great Lenity and Justice, and having built several Cities, among which is reckoned that of Apollonia, which Cidon his Grandson (1) afterwards embellished, and gave it the Name of Cidonia (2), and that of Minoa Liétia, which was so called from his own Name, and that of Liétius his Father-in-law, which is confirmed by the eleventh Epocha of the Arundel-marbles.

But nothing so much distinguishes this Prince as the Laws which he gave to the Cretans, since they have always made him be reckoned one of the greatest Legislators of Antiquity. To give the greater Authority to his Laws, he retired into a Cave in Crete, where he feigned that Jupiter his Father dictated them to him; and every Time he returned from thence, as we learn from Nicolas of Damas (3), he delivered some new Law: This is what makes Homer (4) give him the Title of Jupiter's Disciple; Δίος μεγάλου ὁ ἀρῆς, which is thus expressed by Horace;

Et Jovis arcanis Minos admissus (5).

Josephus, of all the Antients, as far as I know, is the only one who says Minos had received his Laws from Apollo, and that he had travelled to Delphi to learn them from that God (6).

All the other Legislators, to mention it by the Way, have taken the same Way to gain Authority to their Laws. Mnevis, King of Egypt, attributed his to Mercury or Teutates; Zamolxis, the Thracian Legislator, to the Goddess Vesta; Zoroastres, to his Genius; Numa Pompilius, to the Nymph Egeria, whom he consulted in the Forest of Arícia; Pythagoras gave out that he went down to the Kingdom of Pluto; Epimenides again, that he had slept fifty Years in a Cave in the Island of Crete; and undoubtedly all of them, after Moses, who had received the Tables of the Law upon upon Mount Sinai, with such Pomp and Solemnity, that the Tradition thereof had spread among all Nations. Maximus Tyrius (1) is of Opinion that this Cave into which Minos retired, was in Mount Ida, but Eusebius places it elsewhere.

(1) He was the Son of Acacallide. (2) Strabo, c. 10. (3) See excerpta Stobæi verbo CRETENSES. (4) Odysse 19. (5) Od. 10. l. 1. (6) L. 2. against Appion.

Strabo (2), after Ephorus, will have it that Minos dwelt nine Years in Retirement in the Cave now mentioned, and that learned Author quotes in Proof of his Opinion the Testimony of Homer (3); but the Passage where that Poet speaks of it, is variously read in the Authors who have copied him; for first it may signify, as this Historian understands it, that Minos was the Disciple of Jupiter during the Space of nine Years successively; or, as Plato interprets it (4), that this Prince went every ninth Year to hear Jupiter's Lessons; or, lastly, as Nicolas of Damas has transcribed it (5), that Minos, who reigned nine Years, was Jupiter's Disciple.

The learned Interpreter of Homer in his Notes has proved what must needs be the true Sense of the Poet in this Place, and that the Word ἐννέωρος signifies every ninth Year. “The Encomium, says that Philosopher, which Homer here bestows upon Minos is very short; but 'tis so high, that he gives it to none of his Heroes.—He says Minos was admitted to an Interview with Jupiter every ninth Year, ἐννέατω ἔτει, and that he went to him to receive Instruction as a Disciple from his Master. Consequently, since there is no other Heroe but he on whom the Poet confers this Encomium of being instructed by Jupiter, we are to look upon this Panegyric as the highest and the most admirable of all Praises.—Minos then went every ninth Year, continues he, ἐννέωροις ἔτοις, into Jupiter's Cave, there to learn new Things, or to reform, according as the Cases should require, what he had learned in the preceding ninth Year. The Cave into which this wise Prince retired, was afterwards called Jupiter's Cave (a).”

I i 3

All

(1) Diff. 22. (2) L. 10. (3) Odyss. 19. (4) In Miaque.

(5) Loc. cit.

(a) Homer. Odyss. l. 19. Plato, V. 2. p. 309.

All Antiquity has always had a high Esteem for the Laws of Minos; Plato, Aristotle, Diodorus, Pausanias, Plutarch, and several others, have very much enlarged upon this Subject; and I should never have done, were I to quote here all the Testimonies of these Authors. I shall only say, that Lycurgus travelled on purpose to Crete there to collect Minos's Laws, and give them to the Lacedemonians (1); and we may judge by the wise Policy of that People, by their Conquests, and the great Reputation they acquired, of the Equity of the Laws which he took for his Model. We may add further, that Josephus, as great a Lover as he was of his own Nation, has owned that Minos is the only one among the Antients who deserved to be compared to Moses.

To know now upon what Model this wise Prince formed himself in giving Laws to so rude and ignorant a People, is not an easy Matter. If we will believe Huetius, the Question will be very soon decided, since, according to that learned Prelate, Minos is the same with Moses; and here is the Parallel he runs between them; Moses and Minos lived much about the same Time (a). Diodorus gives Minos to Wife Ithone, whose Name, in the Chaldaic Language, signifies antient, only to denote that this Prince is of very great Antiquity. The Mother of the Cretan Prince is said to have come from Phœnicia, only because the Parents of the Jewish Legislator were Natives thereof. The former is made to have reigned in Crete, because the latter led the Israelites into Palestine, the People whereof were sometimes named Cretans, as Bochart remarks after the Septuagint. Minos had no other Brother but Rhadamenthus, for Sarpedon was the Son of Laodamia, and Grandson of Bellerophon; Moses in like Manner had but one Brother named Aaron. Diodorus gives the Lawgiver of Crete but two Children; the Lawgiver of the Jews had just the same Number. The former professed

(1) Aristot. 2 Polit. c. 10.

(a) He is obliged in this Place to strain a little; but 'tis not the only Place where the Parallel is forced.

professed to have received his Laws from Jupiter; God had given his to the latter. The one had Intercourse with the fabulous God in the Caves of Mount Ida; the other with the God of Abraham and Jacob upon Mount Sinai. Homer gives Minos only the Honour of having had Jupiter for his Master; God discovered himself only to Moses, and he was the sole Depositary of his Commands, Moses employing Aaron to put them in Execution, as Minos did Rhadamanthus. The Cretan Prince was accounted the King of the Sea; only because the Hebrew Lawgiver commanded the Waves of the Red-sea to retire. The former was considered as the chief Judge of Hell, deciding what Differences arose between the other two, only because the latter established a Council to ease him of the Burden of lesser Affairs, reserving to himself the Cognizance of Causes of greater Importance. Hesiod gives the Cretan King Jupiter's golden Scepter, and why, but because the Scripture mentions Moses's mysterious Rod. Josephus, adds this Author, had therefore Reason to compare these two great Men; since, accurately speaking, there never was another Minos but Moses.

But, with all due Respect to the Erudition of this learned Prelate, the Testimony of all Antiquity is too decisive, not to make us acknowledge another Minos than the Jewish Lawgiver; and, without entering into a critical Examination of this Parallel, which I have even softened a great deal, there are many Strokes that will not convince a Sceptic.

I shall not however deny that Minos had heard of Moses; his Mother was a Phœnician, and probably many Persons came from that Country and settled in Crete during his Reign; among others, I find one Atbymnus, the Brother of Europa, who, according to Solinus, was worshipped as a God after his Death at Gortys: Gortynni & Atbymnum colunt Europæ fratrem (1). Perhaps this Prince, if I may be allowed to offer my own Conjecture, often conversed with his Nephew about the Laws and Policy which Moses had established.

(1) Solinus ex emendat. Salmasii, c. 11.

established among the Jews; and even assisted him in reducing his Body of Laws, and was therefore advanced to divine Honours. We may likewise add, that Marnas, who, according to Plato (1), was Minos's Secretary, came also from the same Country; at least it is certain, that the Phœnicians had a God of that Name: But, in regard that he was the great Divinity of the City of Geze, as has been said in the first Volume, perhaps he is not the same with him whom Plato speaks of. Be that as it will, it may reasonably be conjectured, that some Knowledge, tho' confused, of the Laws of Moses served for a Model to those of the King of Crete.

Minos, after having governed his Subjects with a mild and gentle Sway, died in Crete, and being interred there, had this Epitaph put upon his Tomb (2).

ΜΙΝΩΟΣ ΤΟΥ ΔΙΟΣ ΤΑΦΟΣ.

Minois F. Jovis Sepulchrum.

But as in Process of Time this Name of Minos came to be defaced, and there remained only the two last Words of the Epitaph, Jovis sepulchrum, the Cretans gave out that this was the Tomb of Jupiter. Nor was it by the Injury of Time, or by any other Accident that this Inscription was mutilated, but by the Malice of the Cretans, as the old Scholiast on Callimachus has very well remarked. They would needs make their Boast of possessing the Tomb of the Father of the Gods, whom they pretended to have brought up in his Infancy; with which the Poet Callimachus sharply reproaches them in a Hymn addressed to Jupiter, whereof the following is the Sense. “The “ Cretans are always Liars, since they vaunt that “ they have thy Tomb, O great King, who livest
“ for ever (3)!” And 'tis to this Passage of that antient Poet, to mention it by the Way, that the Apostle makes Allusion, when he upbraids the same
People

(1) In Minoe. (2) See the Scholiast on Callimachus. (3) Hymn. in Jovem.

People in Callimachus's own Words, with the Vice of Lying, Cretenses semper mendaces (a).

A Prince who had been so just in his Life Time, must needs have been honoured after his Death: Accordingly the Poets, whose Province it was to dispose of the Employments of the other World, established him Judge of Pluto's supreme Court in Hell.

I said, in speaking of the System of the poetical Hell, that the Greeks had borrowed their Conceptions thereof from the Egyptians, and that in appointing Judges there, after the Example of that antient People, they had singled out those from among their great Men, who had lived with the most unblemished Integrity; of which Number they had found none who better deserved that Honour than Minos, Eacus, and Rhadamanthus. They afterwards divided their Functions: Eacus, according to Plato, judged the Europeans; Rhadamanthus, who had left Crete, and fixed his Residence in Asia, had the Asiatics for his Lot, among whom were also comprehended the Africans; and Minos, as chief President of the infernal Court, decided the Differences that arose between the two Judges. All the Poets are agreed in this Superiority of Minos over his Collegues. Homer (1) represents him with a Scepter in his Hand, seated in the midst of the Shades, whose Causes are pled before him: And Virgil adds, that he holds in his Hand, and shakes the fatal Urn wherein are contained the Lots of all Mortals;

Quæstor Minos Urnam movet.

while the stern Rhadamanthus in Tartarus sees to the Execution of the Sentences which his Brother pronounces (b).

Thus,

(a) We must not have Regard to the Opinion of Stephanus, who makes Minos to have travelled into Phœnicia to build the City Minos, which the Founders thereof named so in Honour of the Son of Europa.

(1) Odyss. 11.

(b) *Glossius hæc Rhadamanthus habet durissima regna;
Castigatque, auditque dolos, subigitque fateri
Quæ quisque apud superos furto lætatus inani, Distulit in seram commissa piacula mortem. Æn. 6.*

Thus, strictly speaking, Rhadamanthus is there only a subaltern Judge, and as it were Minos's Lieutenant Criminal: He prepares the Trials, examines and confronts the Witnesses, extorts from the Guilty, by putting them to the Rack, a Confession of their most secret Faults; and after his Brother has passed upon them the final Sentence, he puts it in Execution (1).

'Tis not easy to fix the Date of the Reign of Minos I. If we consult the Arundel Marbles, where his Æra is a little defaced, we shall there find that this Prince reigned in the Time of Pandion I. King of Athens (a): which the Authors of the Remarks upon those antient Inscriptions make to fall in the Year before Christ, 1462: And what serves for a Confirmation of this Date, the Marbles join the Reign of Minos with the Invention of Iron by the Idæi Daëtyli, when upon the burning of the Woods of Mount Ida, they observed the flowing of that Metal melted by the Fire; an Event, which, according to an antient Chronologist, cited by St. Clement of Alexandria (2), falls in the Year of the World 2743, supposing the Christian Æra to have begun after the Year 4005.

Eusebius also favours this Opinion, by placing the Reign of Minos in the 32d Year of Pandion's, which is the 151st Year of the Attic Æra, that is 26 Years later. But I reckon these Authors have lengthened too much the fabulous Age, since between Minos I. and Idomeneus, who, according to Homer, and all the Antients, assisted at the Siege of Troy, there are but five Persons, who make four Generations: Minos I. Lycaëstus, Minos II. Deucalion, and Idomeneus, who was then but very young. Thus, reckoning, with Herodotus, three Generations to an Age, and a half for Idomeneus, it will follow that Minos lived only 120 Years before the War of Troy: And that City having been taken, according to the most probable bable Opinion, in the Year before Christ 1184; we may fix the Date in Question, to the 1304th Year before the Christian Æra. We know not exactly how long this Prince reigned, the Passage where Homer (1) seems to give him a Reign of nine Years, being very ambiguous.

(1) See La Cerda upon the sixth Book of the Æneid.

(a) A quo Minos I. regnavit. L. instauravit, & ferrum inventum est in Ida, inventoribus Idæis Daëtylis, Cœli—regnante Athenis Pandione, &c. Ep. 11.

(2) Strom. l. 1.

I said Minos had two Brothers, Rhadamanthus and Sarpedon: 'Tis proper before we go farther to recite their History.

Rhadamanthus, if we may believe Apollodorus (2), Plato (3), Diodorus (4), St. Augustine (5), and almost all the Antients, though some of them are not agreed in it, was Minos's Brother, who, according to Plato, made good Use of his Knowledge in composing his Laws, and in making them be exactly observed: He was a Prince of eminent Virtue, the most sober and moderate Man of his Time.

I know none but Apollodorus who says, that he returned into Beotia, after having assassinated his Brother Amphitryon; which, no doubt, relates to another Prince of the same Name, since 'tis certain, from the Testimony of all the Antients, that he whom we are now speaking of, went and settled in one of the Isles of the Archipelago in his Brother's Dominions, whether it was as some Authors alledge, that Minos, jealous of his Reputation, had obliged him to quit the Island of Crete; or rather, that he gave him that Dependency, to propagate by his Means the Knowledge of his Laws in Asia. Diodorus informs us, that he made several Conquests in the neighbouring Isles, not so much by Force of Arms, as by the Lenity of his Administration, several People having voluntarily submitted to his Government. It was this Equity and Love of Justice, that made him be ranked in the Number of the infernal Judges. Rhadamanthus, before his Death, divided his Dominions among his two Sons, and gave the Government of the Cities to his chief Officers.

All the Antients I said were not agreed that Rhadamanthus

(1) Odyss. 19. (2) L. 1. (3) In Minoe. (4) L. 4. (5) De Civ. Dei, l. 18.

damantbus was Minos's Brother, some of them making him only his Secretary, probably founding their Opinion upon what Plato says, that this Prince had made Use of him in digesting his Body of Laws. Strabo too lets us know, that Rhadamanthus, upon whose Model Minos formed himself, had lived long before him; had given Laws to Crete, and built therein several Cities. 'Tis perhaps he of whom Pausanias speaks (1), who according to the Poet Cyneton, was the Son of Vulcan, the Grand-Son of Talus, and Great-Grand-Son of Ceres. Loerquer (2) again is of Opinion that the Prince of this Name who reigned in Lycia, was not Minos's Brother, and he censures Diodorus and Plato for making him to have come from Crete. The same Author acknowledges a second Rhadamanthus, Brother to Minos II. a Lawgiver like the first; all this proves that there were several Persons of this Name.

Sarpedon, obliged to quit the Island of Crete, after that his Brother, with whom he disputed the Crown, had got the better of him, retired first into Caria, where he built the City Miletum (a), and after making some Stay there, he went farther into Asia, and arrived at last in the Country of the Myliades, which not long after took the Name of Lycia, from a Prince called Lycus, the Son of Pandion and Brother of Egeus, who retired thither, and was well received by Sarpedon, who had just founded there a small Kingdom, where he reigned in Peace the rest of his Days. After his Death, Evander his Son ascended the Throne, as we read in Diodorus; but we must not confound this Sarpedon with the Grand-Son of Bellerophon, who also lived in the same Country, about 100 Years after, and who, according to Homer, Iliad, l. 6. led to the Siege of Troy those of the Lycians who inhabited in the Confines of the Xanthus (3).

After the Death of Minos I. his Son Lycaustus succeeded him; but his Reign has nothing remarkable.
'Tis

(1) In Arc. (2) See his little Book intitled Ion.

(a) Diodorus, l. 5. Herodotus, l. 1. Pauf. in Atticis Stephanus, &c.

(3) See the History of Bellerophon.

'Tis not so as to that of Minos II. his Son, whom I am going to speak of.

This Prince having ascended the Throne, became formidable to his Neighbours, made several Conquests in the adjacent Isles, and at length became Master of the Sea. Thucydides, Apollodorus, Diodorus Siculus, and the other Antients, speak of the Successes of his Fleet, the most numerous that had been seen before ; and he would have had the Reputation of one of the greatest Princes of his Time, but for the unhappy Adventure I am going to relate. It disturbed the Peace of his whole Life, and gave the Greeks a Handle cruelly to asperse him with a thousand Calumnies.

The Celebration of the Panathenaia inviting to Athens all the Nobility of the Neighbourhood (a), Minos would needs send thither his Son Androgeos ; and this young Prince combated in those Games with such Address and good Fortune, that he won there all the Prizes, which procured him the Esteem of all the People, and the Friendship of the Sons of Pallas, Ægeus's Brother. The Intercourse of this young Prince with the Pallantides gave Umbrage to Ægeus the King of Athens : As he had not yet acknowledged Theseus, and had no other Children, he was afraid that, with Minos's Assistance, they might have it in their Power to dethrone him ; thus hearing that Androgeos was going to Thebes, he got him assassinated in the Town of Oeneus upon the Confines of Attica. Minos had no sooner heard this mournful Piece of News, than he resolved to revenge the Death of his Son. Apollodorus remarks (b), that he was then in the Island of Paros, offering a Sacrifice to the Graces, and that in the Pa-

roxisms

(a) Diodorus, l. 1. Apollod. l. 3. Plutarch in Theseo, and Servius upon the sixth Book of the Æneid.

(b) Apollodorus, l. 3. gives another Account of Androgeos's Death : He says this Prince was slain by the Bull of Marathon, which Neptune had sent into Crete to punish Minos, because he being Master of the Sea, did not acknowledge his Divinity. This Bull having ravaged the Island of Crete, crossed over the Sea, came into Greece, and having found Androgeos by the Way, destroyed him. But 'tis probable this Report was only spread to screen the Honour of Egeus, who had violated all the Laws of Hospitality.

last gave him Admission into the Town by the Keys, which she took while her Father was asleep, and which Ovid probably intended under the Symbol of the fatal Hair.

Her Transformation into a Lark, as well as that of her Father into a Sea-Eagle, are merely poetical Ornaments, founded however upon two Equivocations connected with this Event, the one Greek and the other Hebrew; for as Ovid plainly enough insinuates, the Name Ciris, comes from the Greek κείρεν, to clip:

Ciris, & a tonso est hoc nomen adepta capillo; and that of Nisus from the Hebrew Neiz, which signifies a Hawk, a Fowl which very much resembles the Sea-Eagle:

*Tunc pendebat in auras
Et modo factus avis fulvis Halyætus in alis.*

If we may credit Apollodorus (1), Minos himself ordered Sylla to be thrown into the Sea, or according to Zenodotus, to be hanged on his Ship-mast. Huetius, to keep up the Parallel between Moses and Minos, will have this Adventure to be the same with that which Josephus relates on occasion of Tarbis, who proposed to deliver up to Moses a City which he was besieging in Ethiopia, if he would marry her: But we would overturn all History, were we, upon every apparent Resemblance, to confound Events that are quite different. This whole History of Minos is true, notwithstanding the Fables superadded to it, and it is confirmed by all Antiquity.

Ovid, I said, has by Anticipation given the City Nisa the Name of Megara, which it did not get till after the Death of Nisus: For this I have the Authority of Pausanias (2), who tells us, that while Minos was besieging that City, Megareus came from Onchestos to the Relief of it, and that after the Death of Nisus and Minos's Retreat, he had rebuilt the Walls thereof, and given it the Name of Megara. There was still to be

(1) L. 3. (2) In Attic.

be seen in that City, says the same Author, the sacred Hearth of the Gods called Prodromei, that is, those who were invoked before laying the Foundations of any Edifice whatever it was, to whom Megareus had offered Sacrifices, that they might be propitious to him. The same Author, I know, delivers another Tradition, which imported that it was not Megareus himself rebuilt that City, since he had been slain during the Siege, but his Son-in-law Alcathous, who gave it the Name of Megara. Thus, 'tis still true that it had not this Name when it was besieged by Minos.

As Antiquity has hardly transmitted down to us any Fact, without a Mixture of Fiction, it was fabulously said that Apollo had assisted Alcathous in rebuilding the Walls of Nisa; which imports that the Work was so fine, as to require a God to be the Architect. However famous this Expedition of Minos was, the Megarians, as we read in Pausanias (1) disowned the Fact, and affected to say they had never heard of his Name.

After the taking of Nisa, Minos went to lay Siege to the City of Athens, and he found it extremely desolate. Heaven had already declared for him (2); an extraordinary Heat and violent Drought having laid waste all Greece. The Oracle consulted gave Response, that in order to appease the Gods, Eacus must become the Intercessor for his Country, and that the Prayers of that Prince had already begun to mitigate them; but Athens and all Attica were nothing the better for them. In vain had the Athenians, in remembrance of an antient Oracle, which signified that they were one Day to be delivered from a great Famine, by sacrificing some female Strangers, offered up at the Tomb of the Cyclop Cerastus, the Daughters of Hyacinthus the Lacedemonian, who had come not long before and settled at Athens; the Desolation did not abate; and the City being still more distressed by the Famine than by the Enemy, sent once more to the Oracle; and had answer that the Gods would never give over afflicting them, till entire Satisfaction was was given to the King of Crete. The Athenians therefore immediately sent Ambassadors to him in the Condition of Suppliants (a), to beg Peace of him; and the Prince granted it to them, on Condition that every ninth Year, according to Plutarch and Ovid, or every seventh Year, according to Diodorus Siculus and Apollodorus, the Athenians should send to him seven Youths, and as many Virgins. This Article being agreed to on both Sides, Minos raised the Siege and withdrew to Crete, carrying along with him those who were chosen by Lot to be the first Victims to the Preservation of their Country.

(1) Plutarch, Diodorus, Apollodorus. (2) Apollod. l. 4.

Here it is that the Greeks, to make this Prince odious, broached a Fable which afterwards made so much Noise. They said the King of Crete condemned the Athenian Youths, who were sent to him, to fight in the Labyrinth which Dedalus had built with the Minotaur, which was the Offspring of the infamous Passion of Pasiphae his Queen, for a white Bull which Neptune had produced from the Sea; that Dedalus, who was obliged to leave Athens, and remove to Crete, as shall be said immediately, had favoured that monstrous Passion of the Queen, in the Manner that Apollodorus relates (i), and which is but too well understood from the Verses of Virgil (b): That from this Conjunction sprung the Minotaur, a Monster, which, according to Euripides, cited by Plutarch, was half Man, half Bull, which Ovid thus expresses:

Semibovemque virum, semivirumque bovem.

All the Stages of Greece resounded afterwards with the Story of this Intrigue (c).

VOL. III.

K k

To

(a) That is to say, according to Plutarch, having upon their Heads Crowns of Leaves, and in their Hands Boughs wrapped about with Fillets of white Wool. Plutarch in Theseo.

(i) Lib. 3.

(b) *Hic crudelis amor Tauri, suppositaque furto
Pasiphae, mistumque genus, prolesque biformis
Minotaurus incest, Veneris monumenta nefandæ. Æn. 1. 6.*

Consult also Plutarch, Apollodorus, Diodorus.

(c) All the other Poets speak much the same Way with those now quoted. Propertius, l. 2. Ep. 32.

Uxorem

To make this Fable the more credible, and to intermix with it something supernatural, they added, that Minos was wont to sacrifice every Year to Neptune the fairest of his Bulls; that one Day he saw one so beautiful that he was charmed with him; and, instead of making him a Sacrifice, kept him for a Breed; with which the God of the Sea was so incensed, that he inspired Pasiphae with the absurd Passion now mentioned (a).

'Tis obvious that it was the Hatred of the Greeks against Minos that made them invent this Fable; Plato (1) says to this Purpose, that the advantageous Character which Homer and Hesiod had given of this great Prince, availed him nothing against the Malice of his Enemies; and Plutarch adds, that it is dangerous to provoke a knowing People, who have it always in their Power to take Revenge (2). But as Fables have always some Foundation, let us see what may have given Rise to this.

There is no Probability of its having been what Lucian alledges (3), that Pasiphae had learned from Dedalus that Part of Astronomy which relates to the Constellations, especially the Sign of the Bull: For what Affinity can that Science have with so infamous a Fable? 'Tis better therefore to say with Servius (4), Izetzes,

Uxorem quondam magni Minois, ut aiunt, Corripuit torvi candida forma bovis.

Silius Italicus, l. 8. says much to the same Purpose;

Hinc genus orditur Minos, immistaque Tauro Pasiphae.

But Virgil has far surpassed them all in his Relation of this Fable in the sixth Eclogue, where he makes the old Silenus thus speak;

Et fortunatam si nunquam armenta fuissent, Pasiphaen nivei solatur amore Juvenci.

Persius in like Manner, Ep. 5.

Junctam Pasiphaen Dictæo, credite, Tauro Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.

which, by the Way, shews us that the Romans imitated the Greeks in representing this Fable with too much Freedom upon their Stages.

(a) Hyginus gives another Cause of it, whereof we shall speak afterwards.

(1) In Minoe. (2) In Theseo. (3) De Astrol. (4) Upon the sixth Book of the Æneid.

Tzetzes, and Zenobius, who seem to have learned it from Apollodorus, whose Works were not so disfigured in their Time as they are at present, that in Minos's Absence, or as Palephatus has it, during a long Indisposition he was under, Pasiphae fell in Love with a young Lord of the Court at Crete, named Taurus, who, according to Plutarch, was also Admiral of Minos's Fleet; that Dedalus was the Confident in this Intrigue, and to keep it concealed, lent his House to the two Lovers. These Authors add that Pasiphae was delivered of Twins, of whom the one resembled Minos, and the other Taurus, which gave Rise to the Fable of the Minotaur. But, without having Recourse to this pretended Resemblance, 'tis obvious that the very Name of Taurus, the sworn Enemy of the Greeks, for Reasons to be mentioned afterwards, was more than enough to give a Handle for the Fable of this Monster, to whom they would have it believed that the Choice of the Athenian Youth was exposed.

What Palephatus says of Minos's Indisposition, is not without Foundation; and he was cured of it by Procris when she retired into Crete after the Breach with her Husband Cephalus. Minos even fell so in Love with her, as we learn from Apollodorus (1), that he quite neglected Pasiphae, who, on the other Hand, during that Time made up the Intrigue with the young Admiral just now mentioned; and this is undoubtedly what makes Ovid say, Pasiphaes Minos in Procnide perdidit ignes.

where, instead of Procnide, we must read Procris; as Meziriac first remarked (2). Apollodorus adds, that Procris was forced very soon to depart from Crete to escape the Fate of Minos's other Mistresses, who were destroyed by Vipers, so soon as he approached them, Pasiphae having rubbed him with some Kind of Herb which attracted those Insects; which imports, no doubt, that the jealous Queen put her Rivals to Death

K k 2

ly

(1) L. 5. in fine. (2) Upon the Epist. of Phedra and Hippolitus.

by the Poison she extracted from Vipers, or in some other Way which we know not; and what confirms my Conjecture, is, that Pasiphae was reckoned the Daughter of the Sun, as well as Circe, probably for no other Reason, but because she, like the other, was skilled in Simples, and the Composition of Poisons. This is what gave Rise to another Fable told by Hyginus, importing that it was Venus threw the Queen of Crete into the Disorder we have been describing, to be avenged of the Sun her Father, who had viewed too near, and so divulged her Commerce with the God Mars.

But since, in Fact, there never was such a Monster as the Minotaur of the Poets, and consequently the Fable which makes the Athenian Youth to have been exposed to it is without Foundation; what then became of those who were sent to Crete, in Consequence of the Treaty made with Mēnos, and of whom the Tax was three times paid (a)? Philochorus, quoted by Plutarch, says the King of Crete had instituted Funeral Games in Honour of Androgeos, wherein those unhappy Slaves were assigned as the Prize of the Conquerors. The first, according to the same Authors (b), who bore away all the Prizes there, was Taurus, a Man of an insolent and tyrannical Disposition, who was very harsh to those of the Athenians who were delivered up to him, which contributed not a little to the Fable we have explained, since it is certain that the Greeks never fought at those Games, nor were destroyed by the Cruelty of a Monster that never existed. Aristotle too informs us that they often grew old in their Thraldom, obliged to earn their Living by the most painful Drudgery (c). Plutarch adds, after this Philosopher, that those unhappy Wretches once made their Escape, and that having passed over into Apulia, they remained there for some Time, and went afterwards into Thrace, where they formed the

Republic

(a) Ovid says it was paid four Times.

(b) See Plutarch in the Life of Theseus.

(c) 'Tis Plutarch quotes the Republic of the Beoticians of that Philosopher; but this Work is not now extant.

Republic of the Beoticians. Their Daughters repeated from that Time on their Festival-days this short Burden of a Song : Let us go to Athens.

But waving this, Theseus at this Time having quitted his Residence at Trezen, where he had been bred up, offered to go to Crete with the other Athenian Youths, without even waiting to see if the Lots should favour him, as we learn from Plutarch (1), and Catullus (a), contrary to what we read in Diodorus (2), which seems more suitable to the Character of that Prince, who had undertaken to tread in the Steps of his Cousin Hercules. This young Heroe having obtained his Father's Permission, and the other Youths having cast Lots, prepared to set out for Crete. While the Ship was getting ready for their Transportation, a vast Number of Sacrifices were offered to propitiate the Gods (3); and Theseus being in the Phalerean Harbour, offered a solemn Vow to Apollo, as we read in Macrobius (4), after Pherocydes, promising to send every Year to the Island of Delos, to offer him a Sacrifice. We are further told, that this Prince having consulted the Oracle, was informed, that the Way to procure a favourable Voyage, was to take Love for his Guide; and upon this Response he sacrificed to that Divinity upon the Shore a She-goat, which was transformed into a He-goat; whence Venus got the Surname of Epitragios (5); and hence, according to Pausanias (6), came the Custom among the Eleans, of representing that Goddess sitting upon a He-goat.

After all the Ceremonies were over, Theseus set sail, and the Wind being favourable, he arrived at

K k 3

Crete

(1) In Theseo.

(a) *Nam perhibent olim crudeli peste Coactam
Androgeonææ pœnas exsolvere cœdis
Electos juvenes; simul & decus innuptarum
Cecropiam solitam esse dapem dare Minotauro:
Queis angusta malis cum mœnia vexarentur,
Ipse suum Theseus pro caris corpus Athenis Projicere optavit, &c.* Catull. in Epith. Pelei & Thetidis.

Isocrates, in his Panegyric on Helen, says much the same Thing.

(2) L. 4. (3) Plutarch in the Life of Theseus. (4) Lib. 1. Sat. c. 17. (5) Plutarch in Theseo. (6) In Eliacis.

Crete in a very short Time. The fine Address of this young Heroe soon drew upon him the Eyes of Ariadne, Minos's Daughter, who gave him a Clew, which he happily made use of to find his Way out of the Labyrinth after vanquishing the Minotaur, as we are told by Ovid (a) and Catullus (b), after all the Historians, who, as Plutarch observes, are in this unanimous with the Poets; namely, that Ariadne taught her Lover to vanquish Taurus, furnishing him with Arms; and by the Clew I reckon we are to understand the Draught and Plan of the Labyrinth which the Princess gave him, and whereof he made use to find his Way thence after his Encounter: And what confirms my Conjecture, Eustatbius, upon the first Book of the Odyssey, and Lutatius, upon the second Thebaid, informs us that Ariadne had received that Clew from Dedalus himself; which can only be understood of the Plan of the Labyrinth.

Philochorus in Plutarch relates in another Manner the History of this Combat, that antient Author alledging that Theseus encountered Taurus not in the Labyrinth, but in a public Place, where the Games were celebrated in Honour of Androgeos: And that this young Heroe, animated by the Presence of the fair Ariadne, defeated Taurus, which gave great Joy to all, even to Minos himself, who was thus rid of a formidable Rival. Palephatus still recedes more from the common Opinion. The Son of Pasiphae and Taurus making great Desolation in the Mountains to which Minos had confined him, this Prince, says he, sent all the Atbenian Slaves to combat with him; and Theseus having gone thither in his Turn, put him to Death with the Sword which his Mistress Ariadne had given him.

Lastly, Pausanias (1) says Theseus fought and defeated

(a) Atque ope Virginea, nullis iterata priorum,

Janua difficilis filo est inventa relicto. Ovid Met. l. 8.

(b) Inde pedem victor multa cum laude reflexit

Errabunda regens tenui vestigia filo.

Catull. Epithal. Pelei & Thetidis.

(1) In Corinth.

defeated Asterion the Son of Minos, a Prince of uncommon Strength and Courage, and that this Victory was the greatest Exploit of the Athenian Heroe. But the same Author, always too credulous, or who has not Courage to declare openly against the antient Fictions of the Greeks, speaking of the Picture which was at Athens, representing the Combat of Theseus with the Minotaur, adds: “ Whatever this was, “ whether a Man, or a Monster, as we are rather inclined to believe; and to say the Truth, we have “ heard of Women who brought forth Monsters still “ more extraordinary.”

Whatever be in that, there always remains in the Circumstances of this Story, some kind of Obscurity, which it is not easy to see through. For how is it that Theseus fought with Taurus, since, according to Aristotle (1) the Athenians did not fight in Androgeos’s Games, being reserved to be the Prize of the Conquerors? Shall we say that this Prince was distinguished upon account of his Rank, and that he went to Crete, as we are told by Diodorus, only upon Condition that if he was Conqueror he should deliver his Country from the Tribute which they paid to the King of Crete? But this will not quite solve the Difficulty. Was it out of the Labyrinth these Games were celebrated, as has been now said? In that Case what Occasion had Theseus for Ariadne’s Thread? Did Minos know that Taurus was his Rival? Was it not easier for him to take away his Life than to confine him in Prison? In fine, was it against the Son of Pasiphae and Taurus, whom Apollodorus names Asterius, that Theseus fought, and who at the Time of paying this fourth Tribute, must have been upwards of twenty-five Years? which Ovid seems plainly enough to insinuate (a). These are so many Difficulties which it is impossible to clear up.

K k 4

Theseus

(1) In Plutarch.

(a) *Creverat opprobrium generis, fœdumque patebat
Matris adulterium monstri novitate biformis;
Destinat hunc Minos thalamis remove pudorem,
Multiplic’que domo, cæcisque includere testis.* Met. l. 8.

Theseus, victorious over the Minotaur,
 The Sequel of Theseus's Adventure. departed from Crete, and carried along with him the beautiful Ariadne; but arriving in the Island of Naxos or Dia, he abandoned her, as we learn from Diodorus, Catullus, Ovid (a), and several other Authors. Bacchus, who met her upon the Shore, falling in love with her, married her, and made her a Present of a fine Crown, which was afterwards transformed into a Star. The young Eglé, if we may believe Hesiod, according to Plutarch, was the Occasion of Theseus's Inconstancy; but the Verse of that antient Poet where this was said, is not to be found in his Works: Pisistratus, according to the Historian Herodotus, having cancelled it for the Honour of the Athenians, thinking at the same time to cancel the Memory of the Athenian Heroe's Fallhood. Plutarch, however, is of Opinion that Orpheus, the Priest of Bacchus, ravished from him that young Princess; which afflicted him to such a Degree, that forgetting to hang out the white Flag, as his Father had enjoined him, that Prince seeing from the Top of a Rock, whither his Impatience had led him, his Son's Ship all in Mourning, believed he was dead, and in Despair threw himself down into the Sea. Pausanias adds (1) to this Story, that a Chapel was built to Victory, with a Statue without Wings, to figure that the News of the Victory which Theseus won over the Minotaur, had not arrived in due Time.

The Greeks gave out, that this Prince by his Death, had communicated the Name of Egean to the Sea which is near Athens; but Bochart confutes them, and shews it to have been from the Ruggedness of the Promontaries that this Sea took its Name, as much as

(a) Dian

Vela dedit. comitemque suam crudelis in illo

Littore æseruit. Met. l. 8.

Almost all the Antients are of this Opinion: Diodorus, l. 4. Apollonius, l. 4. of the Argon. Lactantius, l. 1. c. 10. Alciphron, Epistle of Glycera to Menander, Nonnus Dion. 47. Catullus, Epithal. Thetidis & Pelei, Hygin. Fab. 43, and Pausanias in his Attics.

(1) In Attic.

to say, the Sea of Goats, mare capræ, ab asperitate pilorum capræ; comparatione ducta a capris (1). There is also another Etymology given of this Denomination, which comes much to the same Sense; namely, that the Waves of this Sea frisk like Goats with every Breath of Wind.

I chose rather to follow this Tradition concerning Ariadne than that which represents Theseus as highly ungrateful: For what Probability is there, that if Theseus had really abandoned this young Princess by the basest of all Perfidiousness, Deucalion, after the Death of Minos, would have given him Phedra her other Sister in Marriage? Some Authors, I know, will have it, that he carried off the two Sisters at once, and that he brought only Phedra to Athens, having abandoned Ariadne in the Island of Naxos, where she hanged herself in Despair: But Plutarch justly refutes them, since this Princess lived long enough to have by Onarus several Children, among whom are reckoned Oenopion and Staphilus, whom some believe to be Theseus's Son.

Pausanias (2) delivers a Tradition of the Argives, which throws a new Obscurity upon all these Events; but these popular Traditions were founded only upon frivolous Conjectures. The Argives shewed Ariadne's Tomb; and what they delivered upon that Occasion was to this Effect. Bacchus having declared War upon them, came from the Ægean Islands with a great Number of Women; but he who then commanded the Argive Troops having cut them all off, they were buried in the very Place of Battle; and their Tomb was still called in the Time of Pausanias, the Tomb of the Marines. Bacchus afterwards made Peace with the Argives, and chose their City for Ariadne's Burying Place, near the Temple which they had raised to himself under the Name of Bacchus Cretius, or the Cretan. Pausanias adds, Leuceus wrote, that when that Temple was repaired, an Urn of Earth had been found there containing the Ashes of that Princess,

(1) Chan. l. 1. c. 15. (2) In Corinth. c. 22 & 23.

Princess, and that several Argives had seen that Urn.

In fine, Homer (1) follows another Tradition, and says it was Diana detained Ariadne in the Island of Naxos, upon Bacchus's Testimony : A Fiction which may be explained with a great deal of Probability, by saying, Homer designed thereby to intimate, that Ariadne died in that Island, either suddenly, or by an untimely Death.

We must not omit here, that Ariadne's
Fables about Ariadne's Crown.
 Crown, which I have transiently mentioned, gave Rise to several Fables : Let us trace them to their Source. Theseus had taken along with him the young Slaves which were destined by Lot to follow him (a). The handsome Peribæa, who was of the Number, captivated Minos's Affection ; and that Prince having a Mind to take her into the Number of his Mistresses, Theseus opposed it, and resolved to protect the Innocence of the young Slave at the Hazard of his Life. Pausanias (2) and Hyginus add, that Minos on this Occasion loaded the Athenian Prince with many Reproaches, especially upon Account of his Birth, telling him that if he was the Son of Neptune, he would make no Difficulty to dive to the Bottom of the Sea for a Ring, which he threw into it to banter him. Theseus, stung with this Reproach, jump'd into the Sea, and some Dolphins having taken him upon their Backs, conveyed him to the Palace of Amphitrite, who delivered the Ring to him with a fine Crown, the Work of Vulcan, which he gave to Ariadne, and which was afterwards placed among the Stars, as we read in Ovid and Manilius (b).

Several

(1) Odyss. l. 11.

(a) Servius, upon the sixth Æneid, has preserved their Names, tho' somewhat disfigured. Thus they are restored by Meursius in his Theseus ; the Names of the Youths were Hippoforbas, Antimachus, Mnestheus, Phidochus, Demolion, and Periction : The Virgins were Medippe, Jesione, Andromache, Pimedusa, Europa, Melitta, and Peribæa.

(2) In Attic. Poet. Astron. l. 6.

(b) Protinus aspiciens, venienti nocte Coronam

Grossæda, Thesea crimine facta Dea est. Ovid. Fast. l. 5.

Several other Fables are propagated as to this same Crown : Hyginus (1) alledges that it was by the sparkling of the Diamonds of which it was composed, that Theseus found his Way out of the Labyrinth ; which would imply that it was made up of precious Stones, though some Antients quoted by Meursius (2) tell us it consisted only of Flowers, reciting on this Occasion the Fable of the Nymph Psalachas, who had given it to Bacchus, on Condition that this God, with whom she was in Love, would gratify her Passion ; but being slighted by the God, upon his giving away the Crown to her Rival, she killed herself in Despair, and was transformed into a Plant of the same Name, as we are told by Ptolomy Ephestion in Photius; a Fable founded undoubtedly upon the Resemblance of that Nymph's Name to that of the Plant ; and in this there is no Difficulty. We cannot say the same as to the preceding Fiction ; for 'tis not agreed that it was Theseus but Bacchus himself, who gave the Crown to Ariadne. Farther, what could be intended by the Adventure of the Ring thrown into the Sea and recovered by Theseus ? I own I have nothing plausible to offer upon this Head. 'Tis impossible to explain all the Fables ; and this same, I presume, has no other Foundation but some Proof which Theseus gave Minos, to convince him that Neptune was really his Father.

From Naxos, Theseus went to Delos ; where he consecrated a Statue of Venus, made by Dedalus's Hand. As Ariadne had given it to him, he would carry nothing with him into Greece, which might revive the sad Remembrance of that unfortunate Princess (a). In the same Island, to perpetuate the Memory of his Victory over the Minotaur, Theseus instituted a kind Gnossia desertæ fulgent monumenta puellæ.

- - - - - Tollentur ab undis

Clara Ariadnææ quondam monumenta Coronæ.

Manilius, l. 1. & 5.

(1) Cœl. Astron. l. 1. (2) In Theseo.

(a) Aristotle, l. 5. upon the Soul, says, this Statue was a Kind of Automaton, which moved of itself by Means of Quick-silver, which Dedalus had lodged in the Muscles that served it for Springs.

kind of Dance, named the Crane (1), wherein they imitated the Windings of the Labyrinth; and we are further told that our Heroe performed this Dance about that famous Altar which was made of the Horns of Animals. The Description given of this Dance by the Learned (a), proves that it bore a considerable Resemblance to our modern Country-Dances.

The first Thing Theseus did upon his Return to Athens, was to pay the last Duties to his Father; and in Gratitude to the Gods for the Success of his Voyage, he instituted in their Honour several Feasts, the Expence whereof was to be defrayed by the Families of those whom he had brought back from Crete (b). He also had a piece of Money coined, whereon was stamped the Figure of a Bull (c). But nothing so much signalized the Commemoration of this Event, as the Care that was taken afterwards to perform the Vow which he had made of sacrificing to Apollo. Accordingly they never failed to send every Year to Delos Deputies crowned with Olive-Branches; which Embassy was called Theoria, as you would say, The Visitation of the God. In this Voyage the same Ship was employed on which Theseus had embarked, and in the Preservation whereof so great Care was taken, that it was always in good Condition; which makes Callimachus

(1) Dicearchus in Plutarch.

(a) The following Description of it is given by Scaliger, Poet. l. 1. c. 18. Plures erant simul, verum certis ordinibus utrinque a capitibus lecti duces, versus certos inter se subeuntes implicabant: eam Theseus ἡγεμεν vocavit tum ob aciem, tum propter commutationem certis legibus servatam.

(b) The Principal of these Feasts was called Κυβερνηρία, quasi Gubernatoria, in Honour of his Pilots Naufitheus and Pheacus, who were of Salamis, to whom he raised a Monument in the Phalerean Harbour near Sciron's Tomb.

(c) Some Authors will have it that it was not so much in Allusion to his Combat in Crete, as to that in which he had slain the Bull of Marathon: Or perhaps by the Symbol of that Animal to incline the People to Agriculture. The Romans, as we learn from Rosinus, Antiq. Rom. l. 10. c. 5. and Vossius, de Idol. l. 3. c. 78. before the Time of Cajus Marius, bore upon their Ensigns the Figure of the Minotaur, especially in secret Expeditions, to teach the Soldiers religious Secrecy, as Festus remarks.

machus say in his Hymn to Delos, that it was immortal. In Fact, during the Reign of Ptolomy Philadelphus, when that Poet flourished, that is, near a thousand Years after the Death of Theseus, this Ship was still subsisting, as also the Custom of sending it to Delos. From the Moment the High Priest began to purify the Vessel, no Prisoner was allowed to be put to Death at Athens.

Plutarch relates a pleasant Dispute between the Greek Philosophers in Relation to this Ship still renewed: Some alledging it was the same, and others that as there was not one Plank of the old one remaining, it was absolutely another. What Acuteness did it require to decide this Question?

But 'tis Time to resume the History of Minos, whence I was diverted by this necessary Digression.

After Theseus's Escape, the King of Crete, to be revenged on Dædalus, who had favoured the Queen's Amours, shut him up in the Labyrinth with his Son Icarus. As he knew all its Mazes, he found no great Difficulty to extricate himself; and having got a Ship which Pasiphae had provided for him, he fixed Sails to it (1), the Use whereof was not then known in Greece, as we learn from Pausanias and Palephatus, and by that Means outstripped Minos's Galley which pursued him with Oars. His Son Icarus (2) having arrived in an Island very remote from the Continent, and endeavouring to come ashore too precipitantly, fell into the Sea and was drowned; or not having Skill enough to manage his Barge, as we learn from Pausanias (3), perished near the Island of Samos. 'Tis well known how the Poets have veiled this Escape under the ingenious Fiction of Wings, whereof Dædalus is said to have invented the Use (a); and in what

(1) Diodorus, l. 5. & Hygin. Fab. 40. (2) Diod. loc. cit.

(3) In Beot.

(a) Horace thus speaks of them, Od. 1. 1.

*Expertus vacuum Dædalus æra
Pennis non homini datis.*

Virgil calls these Wings Remigium alarum; Juvenal, Sat. 1. and Ovid.

what Manner the young and enterprising Icarus, for not having followed the wise Counsel of his Father, who recommended to him not to soar too high, lest the Heat of the Sun should melt the Wax with which his Wings were fastened, while he himself flew near the Surface of the Water, or even took Care, as Diodorus Siculus remarks, to moisten his Wings from Time to Time, lest they should be overheated. But it is to be observed, that those Antients who say the Icarian Sea had taken its Name from the Son of Dædalus, among whom are Diodorus and Ovid :

- - - Nomenque - - - traxit ab illo.

And in another Place :

Icarus Icariis nomina fecit aquis.

are mistaken, since that Part of the Ægean Sea, which is near Samos, was so called upon Account of the Isle Icaure, which imports Fishy, in the Phœnician Language, as is observed by the learned Bochart (a).

Dædalus having arrived in Sicily, found at Cocalus's Court a Retreat, which other Princes had refused him, for Fear that Minos, who was very powerful by Sea, should come and demand him by Force of Arms (1); which accordingly happened : For that Prince after searching for him in several Places, got Information that he was in that Island, and arriving there in a little Time after, summoned Cocalus to a Surrender of his Prisoner. He being loath to violate the Laws of Hospitality, or rather, as Diodorus remarks (2), having no Mind to part with so celebrated a Person, and one who Ovid, Met. l. 8. say the same. Pausanias, l. 9. explains this Fable as I have now said ; Dædalus è Creta fugiens sibi & Icaro puero non magna ædificavit navigia, & vela quæ nondum ea ætate inventa fuerant navibus applicuit. This is only to be understood of Greece, where this Invention, so antient among the Phœnicians and Ægyptians, was not yet known in the Time of Minos.

(a) Itaque ut Græce Ichthiussa, hoc est piscosa, a piscium ubertate, ita Phœniciè dicta est I-caure, insula piscium, unde Græcorum ἰκαρὸς, quomodo in Sicilia Heccaure, id est sinus piscium, factum sit Hiccara. Bochart, Chan. l. 1. c. 8.

(1) Diod. l. 4. (2) Loc. cit.

who had signalized himself in that Island by several fine Works, entreated Minos to come to Camicus to treat of the Affair in an amicable Manner. That Prince went thither, and at first was treated with all Manner of Civility ; but Cocalus having invited Minos to use the Bath, had him conveyed into a Bagnio, where he was suffocated with the Heat. This Account of his Death is given by Diodorus (1), and all the Antients.

According to Hyginus, Conon, quoted in Photius (2), Pausanias (3), Eusebius (4), Zenobius (5), and some others, it was Cocalus's own Daughters, who being charmed with the little Pieces of Clock-work which Dedalus made them for their Amusement, that put Minos to Death in the Bath ; and this needs not appear very strange, since of old the Daughters, even of Kings, put their Guests into the Bath, as we learn from Athenæus (6), who adds, that they performed their Part with so much Modesty, that the most rigid Virtue could not have taken Offence at it.

The King of Sicily having put the best Face he could upon this Death, delivered up the Body of Minos to his Soldiers, who interred it secretly ; and Diodorus remarks, that in order the better to conceal the Place of his Burial, they built over it a Temple to Venus, which became very famous. The same Author adds, that some Ages after, when they came to build near that Spot of Ground the Walls of the City Agrigentum, this Tomb was discovered, and after they had gathered up the Ashes of that Prince, they sent them to the Island of Crete. Thus died in a foreign Land Minos II. who would have had the Character of one of the greatest Princes of his Time, but for the Hatred of the tragic Poets, who omitted nothing that might render his Memory odious.

Socrates being interrogated why a Prince, whom Homer and Hesiod had praised, passed for a Tyrant (7) ?
answers,

(1) Loc. cit. (2) Narrat. 25. (3) In Achaic. (4) In Chron.
(5) Cent. 4. Proverb. 92. (6) L. 10. (7) Plato's Dialogue, intituled Minos. I

answers, it was owing to his having waged War with Athens, and exacted that cruel Tribute which we have spoke of. This, says he, is the Source of all the evil Surmises that have been spread concerning him, tho', in other Respects, he was a Man of Probity; but we are to observe, that Plato and Socrates still confound the two Minos's, ascribing to the first what Homer says of the second.

Meursius, Marsham, and several others, are of Opinion that Minos II. was the Lawgiver and Judge of Hell; two Titles which I have taken from him, and assigned them to his Grandfather; and the Reasons which determined me to it are these.

First, 'Tis no Wonder that the Antients fell into this Mistake, since almost all of them have confounded the two Princes I have spoke of, as also their Adventures. As they knew but one Minos, they were obliged to make him Judge of Hell and Legislator, and the Subject of the Fables of the Minotaur (a). This was their Way as to all those who bore the same Name: They charged the History of the best known and commonly of the latest, with the Actions of all the rest: Of this the History of Jupiter of Crete, of Theban Hercules, and several others, are convincing Proofs. I know none but Homer and Diodorus who have distinguished the two Minos's; and the Verse in the Greek Poet is even very ambiguous (1): 'Tis hard to say, as Madam Dacier has remarked (b), whether he means that Jupiter was the first Father of Minos, or if he was the Father of Minos I. But let us take it in the most natural Sense; for tho' there were some Ambiguity in the Expression of this Poet, 'tis certain that he never designed to say what is inferred from the first Sense; and we shall see in the Sequel, that he makes the elder to have been the Legislator

(a) What contributed especially to make these two Princes be confounded, is, that there was none between them but Lycastrus, whose Reign had nothing in it remarkable.

(1) Iliad. l. 13.

(b) Remarks upon the third Book ὅς πρῶτος Μινῶα τέκε, not as Eusebius read it, ὅς πρῶτον Μινῶα τέκε.

gillator and Judge of Hell, since in the nineteenth Book of the Odyssey he calls him who had these two Titles the Son and Disciple of Jupiter; which cannot agree to Minos II, who is known to have had Lycaſtus for his Father. Diodorus indeed plainly diſtinguiſhes theſe two Princes; but he has not been ſo happy in diſtinguiſhing what belonged to each of them, ſince he makes the ſecond to have been the Legiſlator and infernal Judge. As he only compiles from the Antients, often without examining them, not remembering in the fifth Book what he had ſaid in the fourth, he aſſerts that Rhadamanthus and Sarpedon were Brothers to Minos II. tho' he had expreſſy ſaid they were Brothers to the firſt.

But it will be ſaid, what Authority can be produced in ſupport of this Opinion? I may answer firſt, that in a Point of Criticiſm, which has not been thoroughly examined, there is no Neceſſity for the expreſs Teſtimony of the Antients; in that Caſe the Thing would be abſolutely decided; but if we can but find a reaſonable Probability, it is ſufficient to found an Opinion upon. Now I have more than Probability for my Hypotheſis. Is it to be thought that a Prince, who in his Youth made many Conqueſts over his Neighbours, and made himſelf Maſter of the Sea; who, in a more advanced Age, had to revenge by Force the Death of a Son, to puniſh the Falſhood of a Spouſe, to chaſtiſe the Inſolence of a Rival; to purſue a fugitive Priſoner, and who died a violent Death; is it to be thought, I ſay, that he had Time and Tranquillity enough to give Laws, to go into a Cave for the Space of nine Years, or every ninth Year to deviſe them at his Leiſure? To digeſt Laws ſo ſalutary as thoſe now in queſtion, requires a long Tract of Peace; whereas we find nothing but Broils and domeſtic Grievances in the Life of Minos II. Farther, would ever the Greeks have given the Character of a wiſe Lawgiver, and placed at the Head of the infernal Judges, a King whom they made it their Buſineſs to aſperſe and defame in their Satyrs? Would their great Men have travelled to Crete to collect the Laws of a Prince whom they turned to Ridicule upon their Stages? Would they have associated with Eacus their great Heroe in Piety and Justice, a Man whom they reckoned a Tyrant, and the Persecuter of their Nation? But the Chronicle of Paros, which so plainly distinguishes these two Princes, a Work done by public Authority, which has been followed by the Athenians, not to mention other Nations who made the same Use of it, is it not equivalent to the Testimony of one at least, if not of several Historians? And is it not of much greater Antiquity than most of those who are quoted every Day for such Facts? 'Tis therefore the antient Minos, whose Wisdom and firm Attachment to Justice have been so much cried up, who is the Lawgiver and the infernal Judge. But an exact Comparison of these two Princes, founded upon the most authentic Testimonies of Antiquity, will undeniably settle their Distinction and Characters, so as to leave no Room for Mistake, or for alledging that this Distinction relies only upon bare Conjectures.

Minos I. was the Son of Jupiter, or rather of Asterius and Europa, according to all the Authors whom I have quoted (a). Minos II. was the Son of Lycastrus and Ida, the Daughter of Corybas, as we learn from Diodorus. The one had two Brothers, Rhadamanthus and Sarpedon; the other was an only Son. The first, according to Diodorus, had only two Children, Lycastrus and Acacallide; the second, according to the same Author and Plutarch, had a greater Number, Androgeos, Glaucus, Deucalion, Molus, Phedra, and Ariadne. The Wife of the first was called Ithone, that of the second Pasiphaë; to this all are agreed. The one was a pacific Prince, a Lover of Justice and Retirement; the other loved War, made many Conquests, and his domestic Calamities left him not one Moment's Repose; for this Article I have a Cloud of of Witnesses. The first, according to the eleventh Æra of the Marbles, lived in the Time of Pandion I. King of Athens; the other, according to the twentieth Æra, in the Time of Egeus. The one died, and was buried in Crete; the other ended his Days in Sicily. The one flourished 120 or 130, the other only 35 or 40 Years before the Trojan War. Would we desire more Marks of Distinction; and Characters more different? As to the first, the Method of Generations is the only one that now remains. There are four between Minos I. namely, Lycaſtus, Minos II. Deucalion, and Idomeneus; whereas we find only two from Minos II. to that Siege, at which his Grandson assisted. And let it not be said that the antient Generations are often curtailed; since it would be easy to answer, 1. That we have no other Rule for fixing those antient Dates but that of the Generations now remaining. 2. That we are not to recede from this Rule upon bare Possibility; since, by having Recourse to a perhaps, we may overthrow the whole History of that Age, and of all others too. 3. That the Distance which the Chronicle of Paros puts between these two Princes, perfectly agrees to the Number of Generations.

(a) Apollodorus, Diodorus, Plutarch, St. Augustine, Strabo, Homer, &c.

But not to insist on this, Deucalion, after the Death of his Father Minos, succeeded to the Crown, and left a Son named Idomeneus, who reigned after him, and distinguished himself at the Siege of Troy, as we read in Homer; but upon his Return he was forced to abandon his Kingdom, and to retire into Italy, where he founded the City Salentum, by reason of a Rebellion raised against him upon account of the rash Vow he had made in Time of a Storm, to sacrifice his only Son to the God of the Sea. The illustrious Author of Telemachus has treated this Article of that Prince's History in such a masterly Way as is enough to immortalize his Name.

If we may believe Meursius, Deucalion departed from Crete, and repaired to Athens to his Brother-in-law Theseus, where he spent the Remainder of his Days. It was he, according to the same Author, that founded in Honour of Olympian Jupiter the famous Temple whereof Pausanias has left us a Description: But the most common Opinion among the Learned, is, that he remained in his Kingdom, and that the Temple in question was built by the antient Deucalion, under whose Reign happened the Deluge that goes by his Name. Be that as it will, here is the List of the Kings of Crete left us by Meursius.

The first was Jupiter, the Brother of Cælus; after him reigned Cres, Ammon, and Jupiter II. after whose Death there is a Void of three hundred Years, which this learned Author fills up with the Names of Cecrops, Cydon, Preres, &c. after whom we have from Greece, according to Diodorus, Teuctamus, who passed into that Island, where he founded a small Kingdom, which he left to his Son Asterius; then Minos I. Lycastus, Minos II. Deucalion, Idomeneus, and Merion. After the Death of this last, the Form of Government was changed into a Republic, which continued a considerable Time. The most antient People of that Island were the Eteocretes (1), the Idæi Dactyli, and the Cu- retes: But we must refer the Curious to the learned Treatise of that Author upon the Island of Crete. That Island always valued itself upon the Reign of Minos, as is confirmed by Medals: We find one of that Prince and Pasiphaë his Wife, in the second Volume of the Thesaurus Britannicus. Let us next say a few Words of Phedra.

C H A P. IX.

The History of Phedra and Hippolitus.

AFTER the Death of Minos II. Theseus sent to ask of Deucalion, who had just come to the Crown, his Sister Phedra in Marriage; which he willingly granted, being then in League with the Athenians. But it was the Fate of the Blood of Minos to break the Repose of Theseus. This Princess had no sooner sooner arrived at Athens than she fell in Love with young Hippolitus, whom Theseus had by the Amazon Antiope, and whom he brought up at Trezen with his Grandfather Pithæus. There it was that the young Queen saw him for the first Time in an Expedition, wherein Theseus, who wanted to be expiated by his Grandfather, took her along with him, and where a Passion was first kindled which proved fatal in its Effects. As she durst not declare it to her Lover, nor ask her Husband to bring Hippolitus to Athens, she thought fit to build a Temple to Venus upon a Mountain not far from Trezen, where, under Pretext of going to offer up her Vows to that Goddess, she had Access to see her Gallant perform his Exercises in the neighbouring Plain (a). At first she named this Temple Hippolition, and afterwards it was called the Temple of Venus the Spectatress (1): But this Expedient did not ease the unfortunate Lover; Hippolitus understood not, or feigned not to understand this dumb Language: She resolved therefore at last to declare her Passion to him, and her Declaration was ill received. Her Love encreasing from Day to Day, and Hippolitus growing still more cold and insensible, she hanged herself at last in Despair, taking the Opportunity of Theseus's Absence, whom Aidoneus King of Epirus detained Prisoner, as shall be said elsewhere. Theseus arriving not long after, and finding in the Hand of the unfortunate Princess a Letter, wherein she declared that Hippolitus attempted to dishonour her, and that Death was her only Refuge from that Disgrace, he sent in haste for that young Prince, to punish him with Death for this flagrant Insult. He, not knowing his Father's Purpose, made such Haste to arrive, that his Horses being overheated grew unmanageable; whereby his Chariot was broke in Pieces, and he himself drag'd along among the Rocks, where he died.

(1) See Diodorus, l. 4.

Some Authors contend (b) that Hippolitus arrived at
L 1 3
Athens,

(a) See Ovid's Epistle of Phedra to Hippolitus; Meseriac upon that Epistle; Pausanias in Atticis, Plutarch, &c.

(1) Pausanias in Attic.

(b) See Meseriac, on the Epistle of Phedra to Hippolitus.

Athens, whence his Father banished him, after loading him with Imprecations. They tell us further, that Neptune, to revenge Theseus's Disgrace, produced a Monster from the Sea, which so affrighted the Horses, that they dragged Hippolitus among the Rocks, where he was bruised to Death in the Manner that Ovid describes (1). What I take to be the true Account is, that this Prince, in his great Distress and Agony of Mind, not giving Heed to the Management of his Horses, was unhappily overturned in his Chariot. There appeared in Italy in the Time of Numa Pompilius a false Hippolitus, who would needs pass for the Son of Theseus: He dwelt, as we learn from Ovid, in the Forest of Aricia, and assumed the Name of Virbius, as much as to say, Twice a Man, giving out that Esculapius had raised him again to Life; but the Athenians, who had seen the true Hippolitus perish, gave no Faith to this Impostor.

To proceed: Hippolitus was worshipped as a God at Trezen, in a Temple built by Diomedes, who first paid divine Honours to this Prince, as we learn from Pausanias. The Priest who had the Charge of his Worship, had it for Life; and the Festival of this God was celebrated every Year. Among the other Ceremonies that were there performed, the young Women before Marriage cut off their Hair, and consecrated it in his Temple. The Trezenians, adds the same Author, did not allow that the Death of Hippolitus was owing to his being dragged along by his Horses; on the contrary, they would have it believed that the Gods had carried him up into Heaven among the Constellations, where he forms that which is named the Charioteer.

To conclude. 'Tis surprizing that Plutarch, who wrote at very great Length the History of Theseus, should make no Mention of this Adventure. Perhaps he designed thereby to cover his Heroe's Disgrace; but he relates other Stories of him which are not much more to his Honour; such as the Rape of Helen,

(1) Met. l. 15.

Helen, and also the Project of ravishing for his Friend Pirithous, the Daughter, or the Wife of Aidoneus, &c. It may be said that this is an Invention of the tragic Poets, who brought him upon the Stage. But authentic Monuments confirm it, and the Temple of Venus but now mentioned, was a living Proof of it. Besides, the Memory of Theseus was too dear to the Athenians, for them to invent a Story of their Heroe so much to his Dishonour.

A high Evidence of their Respect for him is, that so soon as his Bones were found, which the Oracle ordered the Athenians to search after in the Place where he died, they were carried to Athens, and a Temple was built to his Honour, which became a Sanctuary of the highest Veneration. It was even believed, that the Victory at Marathon was owing to him, where it was given out that he had appeared in the Army of the Greeks, and fought for them.

'Tis to be observed that Plutarch has not wrote this Heroe's Life with all the Care that was requisite. And indeed we find there several Omissions, as may be seen by comparing it with the Accounts of him which the learned Meursius has collected (1) ; and not only so, but manifest Contradictions, especially as to the Expedition to Colchis, as we remark upon another Occasion : Lastly, Repetitions, great Confusion in the Arrangement of the Facts : In a Word, whatever good Opinion we may have of the Author in general, we can only consider this Life as a very imperfect Collection.

C H A P. X.

The History of Dedalus, and of the Labyrinth of Crete.

D*edalus* (a), the Son of Hymetion, Grandson of Eupolemus, and Great Grandson of Eretheus
L 1 4
King

(1) In Theseo.

(a) Diodorus, l. 4. Pausanias, l. 7. Pliny, l. 7. Ovid Met. l. 8, &c.

King of Athens (a), was without Controversy the most skilful Artist that Greece ever produced ; an able Architect, an ingenious Statuary, who invented several Instruments in these two Arts, such as the Hatchet, the Level, the Whimble, &c. as we learn from Pliny. To him also is ascribed the Glory of having been the first that made Sail-yards for Ships, and made use of Sails instead of Oars ; but nothing signalized him so much as the Art of making Statues, wherein he succeeded so well, that they were said to be animated, to see and walk : A Fable whose Foundation is not what Aristotle alledges (b), that he made Pieces of Clock-work that walked by means of Quick-silver which he put within them, but that before him the Statues of the Greeks were extremely rude, without Eyes, Arms and Legs ; they were nothing but shapeless Blocks of Stone, as are still to be seen in the Cabinets of the Curious. Dedalus, as we learn from Suidas, Themistius, and Palephatus, made them Faces according to the Life, formed Arms to them, and separated their Legs, which made him be universally admired (b) : But his Misfortunes, as is remarked by Pausanias (1) and Diodorus (2), made him as famous afterwards as his fine Works. He had taken great Care of the Education of one of his Nephews named Talus, his Sister Perdix's Son ; and this young Man made such Proficiency in a short Time, under so able a Master, that he likewise invented several very useful Instruments. The first, which

(a) Eustathius in Iliad 5. Solin. cap. 11. are of Opinion that Dedalus was of the Island of Crete, probably led into this Error by his having dwelt there a long Time. Ausonius has fallen into the same Mistake, since he calls Dedalus, Gortinius Aliger, and in his 12. Idyll. he thus speaks of him :

Præpetibus pennis super aera vectus homo Cres.

(b) Lib. 1. de anima, c. 42. He says, after one Philip, that Dedalus made a Statue of Venus that walked by Means of Quick-silver. He says the same Thing, lib. 1. Pol. c. 4. Hesychius, Lucian, Dion Chrysostom, Or. 36. are of the same Mind.

(c) Pausanias, l. 9 seems to think that Dedalus was so called from his having excelled in the Art of making Wooden Statues, which were then denominated Δαίδαλα.

(1) Loc. cit. (2) L. 4.

which was his Essay Piece (1), was a Wheel such as Potters make use of. Next, having found a Serpent's Jaw-bone, and made use of it to cut a small Piece of Wood, he tried to imitate in Iron the Ruggedness of that Animal's Teeth, and thus he communicated to People of his Profession the Saw, which is one of the most useful of their Instruments. In fine, from him is derived the Turning-wheel, and a Number of other Inventions, which are of vast Use in Mechanics.

Two Inventions so useful, raised Dedalus's Jealousy, and lest his Reputation should one Day be eclipsed by that of his Nephew, he put him secretly to Death; but having told one of his Friends that he had been burying a Serpent, his Crime was thereby detected, as we learn from Diodorus Siculus, who observes, that the same Animal which had given that young Man occasion to invent the Saw, the Object of his Uncle's Jealousy, served also to detect the Author of his Death. Ovid feigns, that he had thrown him down from the Top of Minerva's Citadel (a), and that this Goddess, the Patroness of fine Arts, had transformed him into the Partridge, a Fable founded upon the Conformity between the Name of Perdix, Talus's Mother, and of that Fowl (b).

If we may believe Diodorus Siculus (2), and Apollodorus, the Areopagus of Athens condemned Dedalus to Death; but Servius says, it was only to perpetual Banishment. Be that as it will, this Murder having provoked the general Indignation against him, Dedalus secretly withdrew from Athens, and retired into the Island of Crete, where Minos, overjoyed to have a Man

(1) Diod. l. 4.

(a) Servius upon the sixth Æneid, v. 14. favours this Tradition concerning the Death of this young Man, whom he with Ovid and Hyginus names Perdix; but Diodorus and Suidas call him Talus.

(b) *Dædalus invidit, sacraque ex arce Minervæ
Præcipitem mittit, lapsumque . . . at illum
Quæ favet ingeniis excepit Pallas, avemque Reddidit, &c.* Ovid. Met. l. 8.

(2) L. 4.

Man so celebrated, gave him a very favourable Reception. It was during his Retreat in that Island, he built in the City Gnossus the famous Labyrinth that has been so much talked of.

By the Word Labyrinth, we are to understand a kind of Edifice full of Chambers and Avenues, disposed in such a Manner that you enter from one into another, without being able to trace your Way out again, which Virgil, Catullus, and Ovid express very happily (a).

Pliny alledges (b), that Dedalus had travelled into Egypt, and that he had there taken the Model of that famous Labyrinth, which has been reckoned one of the Wonders of the World (1), but had imitated only that Part of it which respects the Cells and winding Alleys, that is, but the hundredth Part. To prove that Dedalus had been in Egypt, several Monuments were cited, which were said to be his; and they even added, that the Inhabitants of Memphis had erected a Statue to him in the Temple of Vulcan, and had worshipped him as a Divinity after his Death. The Labyrinth of Crete was intirely destroyed when Pliny wrote this Passage, and that of Egypt was almost entire, a great Part of which is subsisting at this very Day, as we learn from all the Travellers (c). According to Philochorus cited by Plutarch (2), the Labyrinth

(a) *Ut quondam Creta fertur Labyrinthus in alta
Parietibus textum cæcis iter, ancipitemque
Mille viis habuisse dolum, quæ signa sequendi
Falleret indeprensus & irremeabilis error.* Æn. l. 5.

*Nec Labyrinthi è flexibus egredientem
Tecti frustraretur & inobservabilis error.* Catul. Carm. 4.

*Dædalus ingenio fabræ celeberrimus artis,
Ponit opus, turbatque notas & lumina, flexum
Ducit in errorem variarum ambage viarum.* Ovid. Met. l. 8.

(b) L. 36. c. 13. He calls the Labyrinth of Egypt; Potentissimum humani ingenii opus.

(1) See Herodotus, l. 2. c. 148.

(c) The Reader may consult the Description of the Labyrinth of Egypt, in one of my Dissertations, printed in the 5th Vol. of the Acad. of the Belles-Lettres. Crebris foribus inditis ad fallendos occursum, redeundumque in errores eosdem. Plin. ibid.

(2) Life of Theseus.

byrinth of Crete was only a Prison in which Criminals were confined, and whereof Dedalus had given the Plan: Eustathius and Cedrenus speak of it only as of a Cave, wherein were a great many Windings, and where Art had a little assisted Nature. In fine, according to some Authors (a), there never was in Crete any other Labyrinth, but the Quarries which Minos had dug in Mount Ida, when he built the City Gnos-fus, whereof, according to Strabo, he was the Founder, and which resemble pretty much, says Bellon who has visited them, a kind of Labyrinth, by the several Paths they had been obliged to make therein.

M. de Tournefort (1), a Man no less ingenious than accurate in his Researches, having visited this so much celebrated Place, says it is a subterraneous Apartment, after the Manner of a Screw, which by a thousand Mazes that turn every Way inward, and without any Separation, occupy the whole Inside of a Hill at the Foot of Mount Ida towards the South, about three Miles from the Ruins of Gortyna. The curious Traveller, after having visited its Mazes, convinced those who were with him, that there was nothing in it to prove it had been a Quarry, as Bellon imagined. And indeed where is the Probability that they would have sought after Stones of a very bad Quality in the Bottom of an Alley of a thousand Paces deep, intersected by a Number of other Alleys, where they were in Danger of losing themselves every Moment? How could the Stones be conveyed into a Place which is in the Middle of the great Alley, where one must creep along the Ground for upwards of a hundred Paces? Besides the Mountain is so rugged, that there is Difficulty to get up to it on Horseback. 'Tis therefore more probable, continues this Author, that the Labyrinth is a natural Conduit, which some curious Prince formerly took Pleasure in rendring accessible, by enlarging the narrower Passages. Perhaps the Place which is still so low was not touched, that

Poste-

(a) Huetius misled by Bellon and some other Moderns.

(1) Voyage to the Levant, T. 1. p. 67. & seq.

Posterity might see how Nature herself had disposed this Cavern : For the Maze is equally beautiful throughout.

But notwithstanding these Authorities, I am of Opinion that there was once in Crete an Edifice built by Dedalus named the Labyrinth, which Time has destroyed, though it was neither so sumptuous nor so durable as that of Egypt, wherein so many Kings had bestowed their Labours. Almost all the Antients are of this Opinion, Apollodorus, Diodorus, Strabo, Pausanias, and Pliny (a), besides the Poets whom we have named ; and what is still more decisive, we find Medals of the City of Gnossus, whereon the Labyrinth is represented. We have even an Antique, containing the Plan of this Work, in the Middle of which appears the Minotaur (1).

But not to insist, Dedalus being forced to depart from Crete, as has been said, retired into Sicily, where he probably spent the rest of his Days, tho' neither the Time nor Manner of his Death is known. This ingenious Man, as an Acknowledgment for the Obligations he owed to Cocalus, applied himself to several Works, whose Magnificence corresponded to their Usefulness. First of all he dug that great Canal into which was conveyed the River Alabas, called at this Day Cantera, and also built upon a Rock, near the Place where the Town of Agrigentum stood, a very strong Citadel, and made the Avenues to it so strait and so oblique, that three or four Men are sufficient to guard them : A Situation so happy that Cocalus made it his Palace, and laid up his Riches there. He also dug near Megaritis a Fish-pond, through which the River Alabas discharges itself into the Sea. For the Convenience of the Sick, who cannot frequent public Bagnios, he wrought at a Cavern in the Territory of Selinus, where he disposed with so much Art and Success the Steams of the subterraneous Fires, that those who

(a) Pliny mentions also two other Labyrinths, one in Tuscany and the other at Lemnos.

(1) See Montfaucon's Antiquities, Vol. 1.

who entered into it found themselves gradually provoked to a gentle Sweat, whereby they were insensibly cured, without even being exposed to the Inconvenience of the Heat.

Mount Eryx was so steep that the Houses built about the Temple of Venus, which were upon the Top, appeared every Moment ready to fall. Dedalus enlarged the Top of it, and inclosed it with a good Wall. He also dedicated to Venus Erycina a golden Heifer, which resembled the Life so much that it seemed to exceed the Power of Art. He also made in the same Country, as we learn from Diodorus, several other Works which Time has destroyed.

There were also in several other Places Monuments of Dedalus's Art: Pausanias speaks of them in several Places; but I presume we are to judge of the Works of this ingenious Artist, as of the Labours of Hercules, which every one was proud to imitate, and put down to that Hero's Account (a). Dedalus formed a Scholar who was almost as ingenious as himself, whom Pausanias names Endocus: Faithful to his Master, he did not desert him in his Disgrace, but followed him every where. The same Author adds, that Minerva sitting as she was represented in the Citadel of Athens, was the Work of this Endocus, and Critias was he who consecrated it.

C H A P. XI.

The War of the Centaurs and Lapithæ: Ixion, and Pirithous.

NOT many Years after the Events now related, there happened in Thessaly a Contest which gave Rise to a bloody War, wherein almost all the Heroes of that Time signalized themselves. This was the War

(a) Some of them have even been confounded with those of another Dedalus, an ingenious Statuary of Sicyon, who also made fine Works, whereof you may see the List in the same Pausanias. For the Story of Dedalus the Reader may consult the Dissertation of the Abbé Gedouyn, Mem. de l'Acad. des Belles-Lettres, Tom. VIII.

(1) Pausan. in Atticis.

War between the *Centaur*s and the Lapithæ, two People, of whom the former was quite extirpated, or at least entirely dispersed by the Valour of Hercules. But in order fully to understand the History of this War, to which the Marriage of Pirithous gave Rise, 'tis necessary in the first Place to give some Account of that Prince, the Son of Ixion, Jupiter's Rival, whom the poetical Fables have rendered exceedingly famous.

First, we find in his Genealogy, as in all those of that Age, so many Contradictions, that we may easily judge the Annals of the Heroic Age to have been very uncertain. Hyginus will have it that Ixion owed his Original to one Leontus, whose History he knows not. Euripides says he was the Son of Phlegyas; this was probably that King of Phocis who was condemned to Tartarus, for having burnt the Temple of Apollo at Delphi. Some Authors make him descended from Jupiter or Mars. Eschiles, and after him Diodorus, give him Antion for his Father. This Variety of Sentiments proves perhaps that there were several Princes of this Name; but as they were but little known, their Adventures were all united in the Person of him whose Fable I am going to explain. Let us begin with his Genealogy as it is in Diodorus Siculus, who makes it clearer than any other.

Of all the Children of Oceanus and Tethys, says that Author, one of the most famous was Peneus, who gave his Name to a River in Thessaly. This Prince married Creusa, by whom he had Ipheus, and a Daughter named Stilbia. Apollo had by this Princess Centaurus and Lapithus. The latter had by his Wife Eurionne, Arsmus's Widow, two Sons, Phorbas and Periphas, and having chosen for his Residence the Confiner of the River Peneus, had the Command of the People afterwards called by his Name. Phorbas his eldest Son succeeded him; but after his Death Periphas his Brother got the Crown, and having married Astiage, the Daughter of Ipheus, had by her several Children, of whom Antion was the most noted for having

having given Birth to Ixion (a). He after the Death of his Father, who reigned over a Part of Thessaly, ascended the Throne, and fixed his Residence at Larissa in the Neighbourhood of Mount Pelion. Ixion having married Clia, or Dia, the Daughter of Eioné, or Deioné, by whom he had Piritbous, fell out with his Father-in-Law, upon the following Occasion. The Custom of the Ancients in their Marriages was quite different from that of the Age wherein we live : Large Gratifications were given to the young Ladies whom they were to marry, and even to their Parents, whereas it is very rare now-a-days for one to marry a Woman without a Portion. Homer and several others, mention this Custom, and would to God it were still in Fashion : How many young Women who groan under the Yoke of involuntary Celibacy, would find Husbands to make them happy, did not the Avarice of those Husbands reduce them to the Calamities wherein Ixion was involved.

His Father-in-Law having often solicited him to fulfil the Promises he had made him at marrying his Daughter, and finding that he did but amuse him with fair Words, carried off his Mares one Day as they were feeding in the Field. Ixion stung to the Quick with this Affront, feigned a Willingness to enter into an Accommodation with him, and invited him to a Feast. Deioneus repaired to Larissa, and there was received with vast Magnificence ; but Ixion having dug a Ditch at the Door of the Banquetting Hall, into which he had thrown a great deal of Wood and burning Coals, Deioneus, whom he honoured with the Precedence, fell into it and lost his Life. This Crime moved universal Abhorrence, and as it was without a Precedent, there was no Formulary for expiating it. In vain did Ixion solicit all the Princes of Greece, no body would so much as give him the Rights of Hospitality, and he wandered a long Time without finding any Sanctuary.

Here begin the Fables of the Poets, for the Events
of

(a) His Mother was named Melate; the Daughter of Amithonus.

of those Heroic Times are always wrapped up in Fictions. They tell us therefore that this Prince (a) abandoned in this Manner by all the World, had Recourse to Jupiter, who took Pity upon him, received him into Heaven, and permitted him to eat at the Table of the Gods. So signal a Favour served only to work upon his Ingratitude and Presumption. Ixion captivated with the Charms of the Queen of Heaven, had the Insolence to make Love to her. The virtuous Juno provoked with that Prince's Presumption, went immediately and informed Jupiter of it, who thought at first it was a Snare she laid for him against Ixion, who passed for his Son. He knew how fatal her Resentment had been to Calisto, to the young Arcas, and others; so that before he made any Noise about it, he was willing to inform himself better in an Affair which so nearly concerned his Honour. To bring this about the more effectually, he formed a Cloud into a Phantom which perfectly resembled Juno, and ordered the Goddess to make a particular Assignment with him, which Ixion having punctually kept, let Jupiter know that he wanted not good Will to rub the same Affront upon the Father of the Gods, he had offered to other Husbands. Jupiter, who was not rigidly severe on this Head, and finding the Thing was quite a Secret, had Pity on the Fool whom Nectar and Ambrosia had a little disordered, and contented himself with dismissing him from the Court of Heaven, and degrading him again to the Earth. But Jupiter seeing him afterwards make his Boast every where that he had dishonoured him, launched a Thunder-bolt at his Head, and hurled him headlong into Tartarus, where he ordered Mercury to bind him to a Wheel surrounded with Serpents, which he was doomed to turn without Intermission.

Thus the Poets have represented this Event, which it is easy to disentangle from the fabulous Circumstances which accompany it. Most Princes of old assumed the Name of Jupiter; it was almost synonymous with that that of King, as we have proved in the Article of Jupiter (1). The Queens their Consorts were denominated Juno, their Court was Heaven, and their Tables where sat the Princes their Sons, were the Tables of the Gods. Thus it is obvious that this Fable was designed to inform us, that some Prince, surnamed Jupiter, vouchsafed to shew the King of the Lapithæ the Hospitality which all his Neighbours denied him; and that while he thought to have expiated him from his Crime, the ungrateful Prince fell in Love with his Queen, in whose Place the Husband, to be sure of the Presumption of his Guest, substituted a Slave. Upon his making his Boast afterwards of having been intimate with the Queen, the King banished him from his Court, and from that Time he led a very forlorn and unhappy Life, hated and despised by all the World.

(a) V. Ovid. Met. l. 6. Virg. Æn. l. 6. Hygin. Fab. 68. &c.

The Punishment of this Prince is only an ingenious Allegory expressive of his Character. By the Serpents wreathed about the Wheel, Tortosque Ixionis angues (2).

we are given to understand the Stings of his Conscience, wounded with Remorse for a foul and hideous Crime. By the eternal Revolution of the Wheel (a), the continual Vexation in which this Prince lived ever since his Parricide, seeking every where for Rest which he could not enjoy, and finding daily new Motives in his own Breast urging him to fly from himself.

Volvitur Ixion, & se refugitque fugitque (3).

When Proserpine made her Entry into the Kingdom of Pluto, this unhappy Prince was unchained for the first Time :

Non rota suspensum præceps Ixiona torquet Solvitur Ixion, &c.

VOL. III.

M m

The

(1) Vol. III. B. 1. (2) Virg. Georg. l. 1.

(a) Illic Junonem tentare Ixionis ausi

Versantur celeri noxia membra rota. Tibul. Eleg. 3. l. 2.

(3) Ovid. Met. l. 4.

The Punishment of Ixion puts me in mind, to mention this transiently, of a Thing very singular, which Lampridius relates of the Emperor Heliogabalus. This Prince called the Parasites his Ixions, and ordering them to be fastened to one of those Wheels which are used in drawing Water, rota aquaria, which was turned about before him with vast Rapidity, he took a singular Pleasure in seeing them sometimes suspended in the Air, sometimes sunk in the Water (a).

To proceed, we know not the true Name of the Prince who expiated Ixion; for little Regard will be had to the Opinion of Tzetzes (1), who calls him Pharæb, without telling us upon what Authority, that Name being scarcely known in Greece. We are also ignorant what were the other Adventures of this Prince, and in what Manner he died: Perhaps a Thunder-Bolt put an End to his Days, and gave a Handle to say, that Jupiter had thus thrown him down into Tartarus; for it was a current Tradition in those Times, that they who had once tasted the Nectar of the Gods, were not capable of dying but by a Clap of Thunder. The Æra of this Prince's Reign is easily found out; Eusebius places it in the Time of Ægeus King of Athens, and of Atreus and Thyestes, Kings of Mycenæ; that is, two Generations, or 60 Years before the Siege of Troy, in the Year 1240 before Christ; and this Date seems sufficiently proved, since Pirithous, his Son, was contemporary with Theseus, and Polypetes, his Grandson, commanded the Lapithæ, according to Homer, while the Greeks were besieging that City. We must take Care not to confound this Ixion with another Prince of that Name, of the Blood of the Heraclide, who reigned at Corinth after the Death of his Father Aletes for 57 Years, according to Eusebius, or in Syncellus's Reckoning but 37.

Of the Commerce between Ixion and the Cloud which

(a) Parasitos ad rectam aquariam ligabat, & cum vertigine sub aquas mittebat, rursusque in summum revolvebat, eosque Ixionios amicos vocavit

(1) Chil. 7. hist. 99.

which Jupiter substituted in Juno's Place, were born the Centaurs, those Monsters, half Men and half Horses, so celebrated in the History of the Age now in Question, though Pindar, who had followed another Tradition, says they were the Sons of Iperphialus, who was the Issue of that Intrigue.

Diodorus Siculus, Hyginus, and several other Antients speak of those Monsters as a Thing that might have happened in the Course of Nature. Fabulous History made Mention of some parallel Productions; and it was under this Form that Chiron was the Offspring of Saturn's Amour with Phillyra, whom that God, to conceal his Intrigue from his Wife Rhea, had debauched by transforming himself into a Horse (a). But what is more singular, natural History furnishes us with several Examples thereof.

Plutarch, in his Banquet of the seven wise Men, tells us, that Periander, the King of Corinth, had been shewn a young Centaur, whom a Mare had brought forth; which so much startled the whole Court, that it was thought necessary to use Means of appeasing the incensed Gods. Every one knows what the Philosopher Thales replied upon that Occasion. Pliny affirms, that he had seen a Hippocentaur, which was brought from Egypt to Rome under the Reign of Claudius, embalmed in Honey, after the Manner of those Times (b); and this History is confirmed by Phlegon of Tralles (1), and some other Authors.

Saint Jerom gives the Description of the Hippocentaur which Saint Anthony met in the Desert, when he was going to see St. Paul the Hermit: It was probably of the Race of that one which Pliny mentions, since it was from the same Country (c). This holy Doctor adds that it might be one of those Monsters which Africa

M m 2

(a) Saturnus equo geminum Chirona creavit. Ovid. Met. 1. 6.

(b) Claudius Cæsar scribit Hippocentaurum in Thessalia natum, eodem die interiisse; & nos principatu ejus allatum illi ex Ægypto in melle vidimus. L. 7. c. 3.

(1) De Mirab. c. 34 & 35.

(c) Comperit hominem equo mixtum, cui opinio Poetarum Hippocentauro vocabulum indidit. In vita S. Antonii.

frica often produces. He even distinguishes elsewhere the Monsters that are sometimes seen, such as the *Centaur*s, from the fabulous ones, such as never had an Existence, as the Hydra, the Chimera (a) ; and 'tis certain that Isaiab speaks of the *Onocentaur*s, whom Eliau reckons real Animals (1).

But as these monstrous Productions, if such sometimes happen, are only a kind of Abortions that never live, and the Poets and Historians mention a People who had the Name of *Centaur*s, we must reckon all that we have now related, as well as what Philostratus and Lucian say upon this Subject, the one in his Picture of the young *Centaur*s, the other in his fine Description of the Picture of Zeuxis ; we must, I say, reckon all this with Rabelais among the Beings that never subsisted out of the Country of Tapistry. Lucretius is of the same Mind :

*Sed neque Centauri fuerunt, neque tempore in ullo
Esse queat duplici natura & corpore bino
Ex alieni generis membris compacta potestas.*

Gallien, who lived not long after Pblegon, and who doubtless must have seen, or informed himself by conversing with Philosophers about the anatomical Representation of the Centaur sent to the Emperor Claudius, denies absolutely the Existence of those Sorts of Monsters (2). Thus 'tis necessary to enquire into the Origin of the historical *Centaur*s.

Under the Reign of Ixion, says Palephatus (3), certain Bulls that were feeding upon Mount Pelion, turned mad, and occasioned great Desolation in the Country, falling equally upon Men and Cattle. The King of Thessaly to get rid of them, published through all his Empire, that he would give a considerable Sum of Money to those who should kill the Bulls. Some young

(a) Multa in orbe monstra generata sunt, Centauros & Sirenas in Isaia legimus ; Chimeram, atque Hydram multorum capitum narrant fabulae Poetarum. Contra Virgilium.

(1) De Animal. l. 17. c. 9. (2) De usu partium. 3. c. 1.
(3) De reb. incred.

young People having taken it into their Heads to break Horses, an Exercise then unknown in Greece, where only Chariots had been in Use, undertook to hunt down those Bulls ; and having set about the Pursuit of them, shot at them with Darts as they were flying, and as they turned upon them fled into Places of Shelter where they were secure from their Attacks. Hence they got the Name of Centaurs, compounded of two Greek Words, Κεντεῖν and Ταυρὸς, that is, to transfix Bulls.

When these new Horsemen, adds the same Author, had received the Reward which the King had promised them, they grew haughty and insolent, and made several Inroads into the Country, pillaging all that came in their Way. It was ordinarily by Night that they made a Descent into the Plain, and retired in the Morning to the Mountains. As nothing of them was seen when they fled but the Tail of the Horse and the Head of the Rider, they seemed to be but one Animal : hence came the Fable, that those Centaurs were half Men and half Horses, whence they got the Name of Hippocentaurs. Again they were said to be the Offspring of a Cloud, because they were mostly from a Village named Nepbelé, Νεφελή, which signifies a Cloud.

This Explication of Palephatus seems a little adapted to the Theatre; for not to insist on those mad Bulls, whereof no other Author makes Mention, nor yet of the Village of Thessaly, named Nepbelé, unknown to all the Antients, and which appears a mere Fiction, is it probable that People on Horseback would be taken for Monsters whether they were seen flying, as this Author alledges, or when they led their Horses to drink in the River Peneus, as it is in Servius ? and though People had even been thus mistaken at first, as Hertera (a) relates of some Savages of America, who took our Riders for a kind of Centaurs, would they not have been soon undeceived, and the Fable soon have lost all Credit ?

Isaac Tzetzes who was not pleased with Palephatus's Explanation, passes a very harsh Censure upon it, and endeavours

M m 3

(a) The History of the Conquest of the West-Indies.

endeavours to turn it into Ridicule; but in Truth what he himself says upon the Subject is still less probable. For who will believe the Rise of the Fable of the Centaurs to have been, that the Slave whom Jupiter Pharaob, as he calls him, substituted in Place of his Queen, was denominated Aura? Which made it be said that it was a Cloud, and that the young Imbrus, who was the Production of this Embrace, was surnamed by Way of Derision Centaurus, as if the Expression had been intended to intimate that Ixion in his pretended Commerce with Aura had given her a pungent Wound, which is the Sense of the Verses made against Palephatus upon this Subject; a Piece of low and comic Wit, which bears no Stamp of Antiquity. Besides this Explication informs us not why the Centaurs were taken for Monsters compounded of Man and Horse; and it was not worth while to criticise an antient Author, only in order to substitute in the Room of his Explanation a poor Etymology of his own.

M. le Clerc, who likewise rejects Palephatus's Explication, says, the Name of Centaurs was given to certain Shepherds who had Herds of Bulls, that were very common in Arcadia; whence, according to him, those Shepherds are said to have invented Bucolic Verses, that is, Verses which they sung as they tended their Oxen: As they pricked forward their Bulls in leading them to Pasture, hence they were named Centaurs, or Ox-goaders. But, in the first Place, 'tis certain that the Centaurs were known in Thessaly before their Name was heard of in Arcadia; and it was not till after they were expelled by the Lapithæ from the Confines of the Peneus, as Diodorus expressly says, that they went and settled in the Neighbourhood of Mount Pholoë. In the second Place, why would the Name of Centaurs have been given to the Neat-herds of Arcadia rather than to those of other Countries? Did they not all drive their Flocks in the same Manner? In fine M. le Clerc assigns no Reason why the Centaurs were taken for half-Men and half-Horses, unless he will say it was because those Arcadian Shepherds were seen on Horseback ; and then it returns to the Explication of Palephatus.

on

But what are we then to think of this Fable ? Here three Questions are previously to be examined. First, what those Centaurs were, and whence came their Name ? Secondly, why they were accounted Monsters, compounded of two Natures ? And then a third is, for what Reason they were taken for the Offspring of Ixion and a Cloud ?

'Tis certain, from the Testimony of Diodorus Siculus and other Antients, that the Thessalians, chiefly those who inhabited about Mount Pelion, were the first of the Greeks who applied themselves to the breaking of Horses. Virgil expressly says so in his Georgics (a). Servius confirms the Testimony of the Latin Poet : Pelethronium est oppidum Thessaliæ ubi primum domandorum equorum repertus est usus (1). The Thessalians sought thereby to distinguish themselves from the other People of Greece, who fought only on Foot, or in Chariots, the Use whereof they learned from Erichthonius the King of Athens, as has been already said.

Pliny who gives Bellerophon the Honour of having been the first that attempted to mount a Horse, owns at the same Time that the Thessalians of all the Greeks applied themselves most to this Exercise : Equo vehi invenisse Bellerophontem, frænos & strata Pelethronium, pugnare ex equo Thessalos qui Centauri appellati sunt (2).

'Tis proper to remark by the Way, either that Pliny is mistaken, in taking Pelethronius for a Man's Name, whereas it was the Name of a Mountain in Thessaly, where was a little Town, or else that there is an Error in the Text ; upon which Vossius remarks that we are to read Pelethronios. 'Tis therefore in Thessaly we must seek for the antient Cavalry of Greece ; I say of Greece, for we have seen in the History of Bellerophon

M m 4

lerophon

(a) *Fræna Pelethroniæ Lapithæ, gyrosque dedere
Impositi dorso, atque Equitem docuere sub armis Insultare solo, & gressus glomerare superbos.*

Georg. l. 3.

(1) In 3 Georg. (2) L. 7. c. 56.

Ierophon, what is my Opinion as to the Origin of Riding. 'Tis then very probable, that in speaking of a Thessalian, they gave him the additional Epithet of Hippios, as for the same Reason it was given to Neptune, who had the Denomination of Hippios Poseidon.

If the Opinion of Servius, adopted by Vossius, were true, it would be a very proper Confirmation of my Conjecture, since those Authors take Neptune to have been Ixion himself (a). Those Horsemen afterwards, in order to acquire more Strength and Agility, performed a Kind of Exercise wherein they fought with Bulls, which they pierced with their Javelins, or overthrew in grasping them by the Horns. Pliny informs us not only that this Exercise was common among the Thessalians who invented it, but also that it was one of the Shows which Julius Cæsar exhibited to the Romans (b).

Suetonius says the same of the Emperor Claudius, and Dion Cassius of Nero. There is therefore great Probability, that in speaking of these Thessalians, they added to the Name of Hippios that of Centaur, and hence of these three Words ἵππιος, κέντει, ταυρὸς, was compounded that of Hippocentaur, a Horseman-Bull-shooter. As these Horsemen became formidable afterwards by their Depredations, the Equivocation which appeared in the Name made them be accounted Monsters compounded of two Natures. The Poets laid hold on this Idea: 'Tis well known that they improved every Thing that might give an Air of the Marvellous to the Subjects they treated of; and may we not assert, without any Danger of being mistaken, that Men who made Oranges pass for golden Apples, Shepherdesses for Nymphs, Shepherds in Disguise for Satyrs, and Ships with Sails for winged Dragons, would would make no Difficulty in taking Horsemen for Centaurs?

(a) Probus annotavit, says Vossius, primum in Thessalia equum esse conspectum, quem isthic exhibuerit Neptunus; qui Neptunus, si extra fabulas eatur, non alius sit quam Rex Thessalus, ut vocat Servius.

(b) Thessalorum gentis inventum, equo juxta quadrupedante, cornu intorta ceruice, tauros necare: primus id spectaculum dedit Romæ Cæsar Dictator.

In the old Language of Greece, as M. le Clerc has observed, these Centaurs were perhaps called Nephilim: This Name may be understood literally, in which Case it comes from Naphal, to fall, or for that of a Giant, as the Vulgate renders it; and in both these Significations it was applicable to the Centaurs; for not only might they be considered as a dissolute Race fallen into gross Enormities, since Diodorus, Apollodorus, Strabo, Palephatus, Ovid, and others, make frequent Mention of the Devastations they made wherever they came, and of their Incontinency at the Marriage of Pirithous; but also as real Giants. And indeed, may we not say those were accounted such who are said to have darted whole Ash-trees like Javelins (a).

Those Horsemen therefore were real Giants in History and Fable, especially if we join the Strength of the Horse to that of the Rider, as those did who spoke of them. The Greeks, who came afterwards, found in their antient Writings this Word Nephilim, and not understanding its Signification, but only finding in their own Language it came near to that which signifies a Cloud; hence they conceived that the Centaurs were the Offspring of a Cloud, and invented the Fable of Ixion's embracing it; in regard, that under that Prince's Reign, and by his Orders, the Lapithæ had begun to break Horses, and to exercise themselves in fighting with Bulls, which, by a reasonable enough Hyperbole, made them be called his own Offspring.

But

(a) - - - Quantas jaculetur Monychus ornos.

As says Juvenal after Apollodorus, and who plucked up whole Rocks to crush their Enemies:

- - - Saxumque a monte revulsum

Mittere conatur,

As Ovid says; who by their Fall overturned huge Trees.

- - - Et pondere corporis ornum

Ingentem fregit.

Lastly a Race, whose Bones and Limbs were of an immense Size:

- - - Cubitique ingentia fregit

Ossa,

As the same Poet says of one of the Centaurs.

But now having explained the Original of the Centaurs, and of their Name, we must pursue their History. Diodorus informs us (1), that as they were mostly related to Ixion, they claimed after his Death a Share in the Inheritance; and that Pirithous having refused to enter into Partnership with them, they made War upon him, which at length terminated in a Peace; but upon what Terms he does not say. Some Time after, adds the same Author, the new King of Larissa having married Hippodamia (a), or, as others call her, Deidamia, the King of Argos's Daughter (b), he invited the Centaurs to the Marriage, and they being heated with Wine, offered Violence to the Ladies, and were going to carry them off; but Hercules and Theseus, with the other Lapithæ, chastised the Insolence of those Miscreants, slew a great Number of them, and obliged the rest to fly to the Mountains; and this, by the Way, is the famous Battle which Ovid so elegantly describes (2). Every one knows in what Manner he embellishes this Narration with the charming Episode of Ceneus, whom Neptune endowed with a Capacity of changing Sex; as also that of Hylonome, who killed herself over the Body of Cyllarus, whom she passionately loved. I insist here only upon what is historical, and wave what Hesiod (3), Valerius Flaccus (4), and the other Poets say of this Battle, which Pausanias (5) says was represented in the Temple of Olympian Jupiter; as also at Athens, by Phidias and Parrhasius, as we read in Pliny (6). We are further told, that those who had been wounded by Hercules's poisoned Arrows, having bathed themselves in the River Anigrus, which rises out of the Mountains of Thessaly, made the Waters thereof so infectious, that the very Fishes in it were not eatable. Strabo adds (7), that those

(1) L. 4.

(a) Plutarch, in Theseo, calls her Deidamia, and Propertius, Ischomache.(b) Others say she was the Daughter of Fystus a Relation of the Centaurs; and Palephatus says, it was a Festival which the Lapithæ were celebrating.(2) Met. l. 12. (3) In Scuto. (4) L. 1. Argon. (5) In Eliacis. (6) L. 36. (7) L. 9. Geogr.

those who died of their Wounds, having been buried near Calydon, in a Spot of Ground since called the Tomb, ταπὸς, bred a terrible Infection in all the Neighbourhood.

Whatever be in that, the Lapithæ, under the Conduct of Hercules, Pirithous and Theseus, the three Lapithæ who distinguished themselves most in this War, having pursued the Centaurs to their very inmost Retreats, as we learn from Diodorus, Palephatus and Strabo, had so often the Superiority over them, that they obliged them at last to quit the Country, and retire into Arcadia. But their brutal and insolent Temper not allowing them to live in Peace, they made several Inroads upon the Confines of Pholoë where they were settled. At last Hercules, with the Assistance of his Companions, rooted them quite out in the following Manner. As that Heroe was going, says Apollodorus (1), by Euristheus's Order, to the hunting of the Boar of Erymanthus, he lodged by the Way with the Centaur Pholus, the Son of Silenus and Melia. In the midst of the Feast, the Heroe was going to fall upon a Cask of Wine which belonged to the other Centaurs, but was given them by Bacchus only upon Condition that when Hercules passed their Way they should regale him with it (2), a Fable importing that it was excellent Wine. They run up to the Cave, armed with Stones and Darts, Hercules began to shoot his Arrows at them, and it being a very warm Engagement, several of the Centaurs were killed, and the rest put to Flight. Hercules pursued them, with those who accompanied him to the Chace, and who were probably very numerous; and tho' they were only Infantry, and the others fought on Horseback, yet he led them on fighting in a Country cut out into Woods and Mountains, as far as Malea (a), when they repaired to Chiron the Centaur, the wisest and most renowned among them. This Horseman, expelled by the other Lapithæ

(1) L. 2. c. 6. (2) Lyl. Gyrald. Synt. de Hercule, p. 576.

(a) The Greek Word used by Apollodorus in this Passage is μίλαι; but he had said a little before, and says immediately after μαλέαν.

ibæ from Mount Pelion, where he had lived with so much Reputation, that the most famous Princes of that Age, as Hercules and Jason, were willing to become his Disciples, had come thither some Time before to seek a Retreat which he could not find in his own Country.

The Centaurs hoped that the Presence of Hercules's Preceptor would check the Fury of that Heroe; who still continued however to attack them, without any Design to involve Chiron in their Destruction; but an Arrow which he aimed at Elarus, having missed him, wounded Chiron in the Knee. Hercules grieved at this sad Accident, run up quickly to give him Solace, and applied to the Wound a Remedy which the Centaur had taught him; but the Wound proved incurable, and the unfortunate Chiron, after suffering intolerable Pains, prayed Jupiter, as the Poets tell us, to put a Period to his Days: For being the Son of Saturn, he was not subjected to the Condition of other Mortals. The Father of the Gods, affected with his Sufferings, exchanged his Immortality with Prometheus, and Chiron having paid to Death the Tribute which all Mankind owe, was placed among the Stars, where he forms the Constellation Sagittarius; that is, setting aside these poetical Fictions, this illustrious Centaur died of the Wound which he had received in the Battle. He was a Man of very great Knowledge for that Age, especially in that Part of Medicine which comprehends Skill in Plants, those particularly that serve for the Cure of Wounds, as I shall prove by and by.

Hercules, enraged by this Accident, fell foul upon the rest of the Centaurs, (these are still Apollodorus's Words) and spared not one of them that came into his Hands. Those who were able to make their Escape retired into the Caves of the Promontory of Malea, and Neptune concealed others of them near Eleusis; that is, reducing this Circumstance to historical Truth; some of them conveyed themselves by Sea to Attica. Antimachus, quoted by Noel le Comte (1), says some of
the

(1) Article of the Centaurs.

the Centaur removed into the Island of the Sirens, that is, into the Promontory of Pelorus, where those petty Queens reigned at that Time; and the same Author adds, that most of them were insnared by the Charms of Pleasure to their own Ruin.

Hercules, after this Defeat returned to Pholoë, where he learned that the Centaur, his Host, was dead of the Wound he had received from an Arrow drawn from the Body of one of his Companions, and after paying his last Duty to him, he prepared himself for putting Euristheus's Order in Execution. Nessus, who had retired towards the River Evenus, was afterwards punished by the same Heroe, for having attempted to ravish Dejanira in the Manner that is well known.

Thus, by the Valour of Hercules, Theseus, Piritheus, Nestor, and other Lapithæ, those first Horsemen of Thessaly, whom their Pride and Successes had rendered so insolent, were all cut off.

'Tis easy to determine the Chronology of all the Events now related, from the Time when those Heroes flourished.

But the Centaur Chiron requires a new Article: Sir Isaac Newton's Chronology, and Dissertations made on both Sides of the Question making this necessary.

C H A P. XII.

Wherein we examine, if Chiron made a Kalendar for the Argonauts.

IT had been a generally received Opinion, that Chiron was a wise Thessalian, a Physician by Profession, nor had any Body ever dreamed of making so profound an Astronomer of him as to be able to settle the Position of the Heavens, and consequently, to make a Kalendar to serve for a Rule. Sir Isaac Newton, however, from a Passage in the Titanomachy, quoted by Clement of Alexandria (1), infers that he had framed one for the Expedition of the Argonauts, and he finds, by computing the Time from Metæ to that Expedition, pedition, that he must have placed the Equinoctial Points in the Middle of Aries, and in the Middle of Libra, and the Solstitial Points in the fifteenth Degree of Cancer, and in the same Degree of Capricorn.

(1) Strom. l. i. p. 15.

Before I examine the Authority on which that illustrious Author founds this Hypothesis, 'tis to be observed, that his Argument is of the Nature of those which we call a Circle; for 'tis as if Newton had said : I am to abridge Chronology by 400 Years. The Expedition of the Argonauts did not fall out 1300 Years before Christ, as is commonly reckoned, but only 937. This is the System I have followed in my Chronology. Thus, since in the Time of Meto, 433 Years before Christ, the Summer Solstice was in the eight Degree of Cancer, and Chiron had determined the Equinoctial Point to the fifteenth Degree of Aries, the Motion of the Equinoctial Points, contrary to the Order of the Signs, being fifty Seconds in a Year, and one Degree in 72 Years (a), the Distance between Meto's Observation and that of Chiron, must have been about seven Degrees; and the Time that intervened between them 504 Years; which added to 433, make 937 Years before Christ. Therefore, that or the following Year was the Æra of the Argonauts, which had been erroneously removed back to the Year 1300, or according to others, even to the 1467, before our Vulgar Æra.

Books have been wrote in France for and against the System of this celebrated English Author: The Position and Arrangement made by Chiron, has been cavelled at, instead of being denied; but F. Hardouyn, in the Memoirs of Trevoux, September 1729, has cut short all the Objections, by proving unanswerably, that Chiron was never considered by any of the antient Authors, whose Testimonies he cites, but as a Physician who knew the Virtues of some Plants, those especially

(a) This is F. Ricci's Computation, who makes the entire Period 25920 Years. Mr. Cassini, as also the famous Ulugh-Begh, the Grandson of Tamerlane, reckons it only 25200 Years, and determines the proper Motion of the Heavens to be one Degree in 70 Years; but this Difference, and some others, have nothing to do here.

ly that serve for the Cure of Wounds ; but never as an Astronomer, able to frame a Kalendar, and to fix the true Position of the Heavens in the Time when he lived (a).

After all, the Passage taken from Clement of Alexandria proves nothing for his being a skilful Astronomer, capable of fixing the Equinoctial and Solstitial Points: Here is a Translation of it Word for Word: Hermippus of Berytus gives the Designation of Wise to Chiron the Centaur ; and the Author of the Titanomachy, says he was the first that taught Mankind to live according to Justice, by shewing them the Nature and Obligations of an Oath, Sacrifices of Joy and Thanksgivings, and the Figures of the Heavens, σχήματα Ὀλύμπῳ. For not to insist on the odd Association of those three Sorts of Science ; not to examine the Authority of an unknown Poet, of whom the Ancients have said little or nothing, can we conclude from thence that Chiron was Astronomer good enough to fix the Position of the Heavens ; that he made a Kalendar for the Argonauts, two Years before their Expedition ; that he placed the four Points of the Solstices and Equinoxes in the Middle, that is in the fifteenth Degree of Cancer and Capricorn, of Aries and Libra ? On which Position, however, Newton's System partly depends, for abridging the Chronology of the Greek Antiquities as he does. The only native Conclusion, methinks, that can be drawn from it is, that Chiron, besides his Skill in some Plants, was acquainted with that Sort of Astronomy which respects the Heliac Rising and Setting of the Stars, wherein he instructed some Argonauts: Such a Knowledge, in short, as was but narrow and confined, and perhaps pretty common in his Time ; but which was far from qualifying one who was Master of it, for settling the true Points of the Heavens, and from

(a) This is the Idea Homer gives of him both in his Iliad and Odyssey. This wise Centaur instructed Achilles, and Jason too, according to Eusebius, in the Knowledge of Medicine, and in the Use of topical Remedies for Wounds. Virgil. Georg. III. 549. gives the same Idea of him, as also Pliny, L. 24. Sat. 19. and Diodorus, l. 4. p. 221, Plutarch, Suidas, and all the rest.

from which, at least, it can never be proved that it was in such a precise Point Chiron found and placed them: A mere groundless Supposition, calculated only to serve the Purpose of the Author, in abbreviating the Chronology of the Greek Antiquities.

What the same Clement of Alexandria immediately subjoins, concerning Hippo the Daughter of Chiron, and whom Ovid names (1) Ocyroë, confirms the Account I have given of Chiron's Knowledge in Astronomy to be just. Hippo, his Daughter, says he, having married Eolus, the same at whose Palace Ulysses arrived, instructed her Husband in her Father's Science; namely, in the Contemplation of Nature. Euripides, adds he, says of this Hippo, that she knew and predicted divine Things by Oracles, and by the Rising of the Stars.

C H A P. XIII.

The Continuation of the History of Pirithous.

P*irithous*, who had pursued the *Centaur*s with so much Warmth, had as unhappy an End as they. As he had assisted his Friend Theseus in carrying off Helen, on Condition that he would concur with him in his designed Project of ravishing Proserpine the Wife of Aidoneus (a); they set out together for Epirus; but the King being previously apprized of their Design, was prepared to meet them, and let loose some Mastiff Dogs which fell upon Pirithous and tore him in Pieces, and Theseus, who escaped their Fury, was detained Prisoner till Hercules set him at Liberty. As Aidoneus employed Labourers in the Mines, and inhabited a low Country in respect of the rest of Greece, that is towards the West; hence the Western Parts, where it was believed that the Stars set in the Ocean, Suadentque cadentia sidera somnos, were also reckoned the Mansion of the Dead: For as Pliny elegantly says: In sede Manium opes quærimus, nos ad inferos adiungunt.

(1) Met. l. 11. 638.

(a) Others say she was only his Daughter; but Virgil calls her his Wife.

Chap. XIII. explained by History. 491

gunt. Thus the Voyage of those two Princes came to be considered as a Descent into the Realms of Pluto, that King of Epirus being confounded with him; which makes Virgil put these Words in Charon's Mouth;

*Nec vero Alciden me sum lætatus euntem
Accepisse lacu, nec Thesea Pirithoumque, Quanquam Dīs geniti (1).*

These last Words would occasion some Difficulty as to the Genealogy of Pirithous, who is not commonly made to be descended from the Gods; did we not know that Jupiter himself says in Homer (2), that having been captivated with the Charms of Ixion's Wife, he had made her the Mother of Pirithous; which intimates, that the great Men of that Age had always a divine Original.

Pausanias informs us (3) in the Particulars of this Expedition. Theseus, says he, having entered with his Troops into Thesprotia, to carry off the Wife of the King of the Thesprotians, lost the best Part of his Men: He was afterwards taken Prisoner with Pirithous, and the Thesprotian confined them at Cycbirus. He was afterwards set at Liberty by Hercules, but Pirithous died in his Prison.

Such is the History of the *Centaur*s, whose Defeat was followed by an Event which became exceedingly famous in the History of the fabulous Age, and shall be the Subject of the next Book.

(1) Æn. l. 6. (2) Iliad, l. 4. (3) In Attic.

F I N I S.

BOOKS Printed for, and Sold by A. MILLAR:

I. THE History of the Church under the Old Testament, from the Creation of the World: Wherein also the Affairs and Learning of Heathen Nations before the Birth of Christ, and the State of the Jews from the Babylonish Captivity to the present Times, are particularly considered. To which is subjoined, A Discourse to promote the Conversion of the Jews to Christianity.

II. The History of the Propagation of Christianity, and the Overthrow of Paganism. Wherein the Christian Religion is confirmed. The Rise and Progress of Heathenish Idolatry is considered. The Overthrow of Paganism, and the Spreading of Christianity in the several Ages of the Church is explained. The present State of Heathens is enquired into; and Methods for their Conversion proposed. In 2 vol. 8vo. The third Edition corrected, with Additions.

The above by ROBERT MILLAR, A. M.

III. A Critical and Historical Discourse upon the Method of the Principal Authors who wrote for and against Christianity from its Beginning. Translated from the French of M. l'Abbé Houtteville. To which is added, A Dissertation on the Life of Apollonius Tyaneus. With some Observations on the Platonists of the latter School.

IV. The Works of FRANCIS BACON, Baron of Verulam, Viscount St. Alban, and Lord High Chancellor of England; in which are contained several Original Papers of His, never before printed in any Edition of his Works. In 4 vol. Folio.

V. The additional Pieces to Lord BACON's Works, with the Life of the Author, by Mr. Mallet, of the same Size with the last Edition, to compleat those Gentlemens Sets who bought that Edition.

VI. The Life of Lord BACON, by Mr. Mallet, in Octavo.

VII. An Historical and Political Discourse of the Laws and Government of England, from the first Times to the End of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. With a Vindication of the antient Way of Parliaments in England. Collected from some Manuscript Notes of John Seldon, Esq; By Nathaniel Bacon of Gray's Inn, Esq; The fourth Edition; corrected and improved by a Gentleman of the Middle Temple.

N. B. There are a few of Lord Bacon's Works, and this last, printed on a superfine Writing-Royal Paper.

VIII. The Political Works of ANDREW FLETCHER, Esq; containing, 1. A Discourse of Government, with relation to Militia's. 2, 3. Discourses concerning the Affairs of Scotland; written in the Year 1698. 4. Discorso delle Cose di Spagna scritto nel mese di Luglio 1698. 5. A Speech upon the State of the Nation, in April 1701. 6. Speeches by a Member of the Parliament, which began at Edinburgh the 6th of May 1703. 7. An Account of a Conversation concerning a right Regulation of Governments for the common Good of Mankind. In a Letter to the Marquis of Montrose, the Earls of Rothes, Roxburgh and Haddington, from London, the first of December, 1703.

THE MYTHOLOGY
AND FABLES
OF THE
ANCIENTS,

Explained from

HISTORY.

By the Abbé BANIER,

Member of the ACADEMY of INSCRIPTIONS
and BELLES-LETTRES,

VOL. IV.

Translated from the Original FRENCH.

LONDON:

Printed for A. MILLAR, at Buchanan's-Head, against
St. Clement's-Church in the Strand.
M.DCC.XL.

THE MYTHOLOGY
AND FABLES
OF THE
ANCIENTS,

Explained from
HISTORY.

By the Abbé BANIER,
Member of the ACADEMY of INSCRIPTIONS
and BELLES-LETTRES.

VOL. IV.

Translated from the Original FRENCH.

Containing,

- | | |
|---|---|
| I. The History of the Argonauts , and of the famous Conquest of the Golden Fleece; with an Account of the Lives and Adventures of the celebrated Heroes of that Expedition, viz. Hercules , Theseus , Castor and Pollux , Orpheus , &c. | Rise, with the History of the principal Leaders both of the Grecian and Trojan Armies, viz. Agamemnon , Achilles , Hector , Diomedes , Ulysses , Antenor , Eneas , Idomeneus , &c. |
| II. The History of the Hunting of the Calypsonian Boar, and of the two Theban Wars, with the Lives and Adventures of the famous Men of that Age. Meleager , Oedipus , Adrastus , Capaneus and Tiresias . | IV. An Explanation of some Fables that stand by themselves, viz. of Progne and Philomele , of Narcissus and Echo , of Pyramus and Thisbe , Byblis and Caunus : To all which is added, an Account of the Games of Greece and Rome , their Foundation, their various Kinds, the Motives of their Institution, &c. |
| III. The History of the Trojan War, the true Account of its | |

LONDON:

Printed for A. MILLAR, at Buchanan's-Head, against
St. Clement's-Church in the Strand. M.DCC.XL.

T H E
C O N T E N T S
O F T H E
Fourth and Last V O L U M E.

B O O K III.

T H E History of the Argonauts, and of the Con- quest of the Golden Fleece,	Page 1
CHAP. I. The Voyage of the Argonauts to Colchis,	30
CHAP. II. What happened to the Argonauts in Colchis,	39
CHAP. III. The Return of the Argonauts into Greece,	44
CHAP. IV. The Date of that Event,	55
CHAP. V. The Continuation of the Adventures of Jafon and Medea,	60
CHAP. VI. The History of Hercules,	72
CHAP. VII. An Abridgment of the History of Her- cules's Successors to their Settlement in the Pelopon- nesus,	127
CHAP. VIII. The Sequel of Theseus's History,	130
CHAP. IX. The History of Castor and Pollux,	147
CHAP. X. The History of Orpheus,	156
CHAP. XI. The History of Calais and Zethes,	166

B O O K IV.

The History of the Hunting of Calydon, and of the two Wars of Thebes.
CHAP. I. The History of the Hunting of Calydon, and of the War to which it gave Rise,	168
CHAP.

The C G N T E N T S.

CHAP. II.	The History of the two Wars of Thebes, of Oedipus, the Sphinx, &c.	178
CHAP. III.	The particular History of the Leaders in those Wars.
	Of Amphiaraus,	193
	Of Adrastus,	198
	Of Antigone,	200
	Of Capaneus,	201
	Of Tiresias,	203

B O O K V.

	The History of the Trojan War, and of those who joined in it,	206
CHAP. I.	The Origin of that War,	207
CHAP. II.	The true Cause of the Rape of Helen,	212
CHAP. III.	Of the War that ensued upon that Rape,	215
CHAP. IV.	The History of the Siege of Troy,	220
CHAP. V.	Fatalities annexed to the City Troy,	225
CHAP. VI.	Of the last Year of the Siege, and of the taking of the City,	232
CHAP. VII.	The Æra of the taking of Troy, with the History of that City.
ART. I.	The Æra of the taking of Troy,	247
ART. II.	The History of the City Troy,	248

B O O K VI.

	Containing the particular History of the Captains of the Grecian and Trojan Armies,	252
CHAP. I.	The History of Agamemnon and his Family,	253
CHAP. II.	The History of Eacus, Peleus, Achilles, and Theus,	268
CHAP. III.	The History of the two Ajaxes,	281
CHAP. IV.	The History of Diomedes,	286
CHAP. V.	The History of Ulysses,	289
	CHAP.

The CONTENTS.

CHAP. VI.	The History of Antenor and Eneas,	306
CHAP. VII.	The History of Memnon,	323
CHAP. VIII.	The History of Eurypilus,	335
CHAP. IX.	The History of Laocoon,	338
CHAP. X.	The History of Paris, Helen, Menelaus, and Oenone,	340
CHAP. XI.	The History of Protefilaus, Calchas, and Philoctetes,	348
CHAP. XII.	The History of Idomeneus and Merion,	353

PART II.

BOOK VII.

	The Explication of some particular Fables that occur in the Books of Mythology,	356
CHAP. I.	The History of Tereus, Pandion, Progne, Philomela, the Daughters of Pandareus, and Eretheus,	357
CHAP. II.	The History of Lycaon,	363
CHAP. III.	The History of Narcissus, Echo, Pyramus, and Thisbe,	365
CHAP. IV.	The History of the Pygmies and of Pygas their Queen; of their Battles with the Cranes and Partridges; wherein we also examine what is meant by the Pygmies, of whom the Prophet Ezekiel speaks,	369
CHAP. V.	The History of Cephalus and Procris,	378
CHAP. VI.	The History of Ceyx and Alcyone, of Philammon, Autolycus, Kione, and Thamiras,	380
CHAP. VII.	The History of Orion,	385
CHAP. VIII.	The Explanation of the Fables of Byblis and Caunus, of Iphis and Ianthe, of Anaxarete, Arion, &c.	390
CHAP. IX.	The Continuation of the Fables in Ovid,	396
	CHAP.

The C O N T E N T S.

CHAP. X. Of the Fables collected by Conon, and Antoninus Liberalis,	403
CHAP. XI. Fables taken from Hyginus,	404

B O O K VIII.

Of the Games of the Greeks and Romans,	409
CHAP. I. The Motives for the Institution of those Games, and their various Kinds,	413
CHAP. II. Of the Founders of those Games,	414
CHAP. III. Explains what the Gymnastic was,	417
CHAP. IV. Of the Places destined to the Celebration of the Games, and of the principal Cities that exhibited them,	421
CHAP. V. Of the Olympic Games,	424
CHAP. VI. Of the Pythic Games,	432
CHAP. VII. Of the Nemean Games,	435
CHAP. VIII. Of the Isthmic Games,	436
CHAP. IX. Of the Scenic Games; of the Prizes proposed for the Tragic Poets in the Games of Greece,	438
CHAP. X. The Continuation of the same Subject,	443
Of the Trojan Game, or the Game of the Youth,	ibid.
Of the Games of Augustus,	446
Of the Capitolin Games,	ibid.
Of the Games of Ceres,	447
Of the Aëtiac Games,	448
Of the Agonal and Aëtyc Games,	ibid.
Of Games celebrated in the Camps,	449
Of the Games of Castor and Pollux,	ibid.
Of the Megalesian Games, celebrated in Honour of Cybele and the other great Gods,	450
Of the Floral Games,	451
CHAP. XI. Of some other Games,	452
Of the Circensian Games,	453
Of the Games of the Cross-streets, or Compitales, and some others,	454

MYTHOLOGY and FABLES

Explain'd by

HISTORY.

BOOK III. *

The History of the Argonauts, and of the Conquest of the Golden Fleece.

THE antient History of Greece sets before us few Subjects so celebrated as the Conquest of the Golden Fleece by the Argonauts; but at the same Time there is none that abounds more in Fictions (a).

'Tis however connected with the antient History of Greece, and cannot be detached from it without overthrowing almost all the Genealogies of those Times; being fully laid open, it serves to give great Light to the Antiquities of the heroic Age; in fine, there are few antient Authors but speak of it; and I was of Opinion, that by drawing together what is dispersed in their Works, I might contribute in some Measure to clear up the History of an Age, the Study whereof is attended with considerable Difficulty.

VOL. IV.

B

Tho'

* This answers to the seventh and last Volume of the Original.

(a) I have made several Dissertations on this Subject, which are, or will be printed in the Memoirs of the Acad. of the Belles Lettres; and to them I might have referred: But as I have been informed by knowing Persons that Readers were glad to find in this Mythology what they neither had Leisure, nor Inclination to gather from other Books, I shall give an Abstract of them here.

Tho' we have now neither the Poem of the true Orpheus, nor that of Epimenides of Crete, who, according to Diogenes Laertius, wrote a Poem upon this Expedition towards the Forty seventh Olympiad, about 600 Years before the Christian Æra, consisting of Six thousand six hundred Verses; nor yet the Work of Varro, who, as we learn from Probus in his Commentary upon Virgil's Georgics, left four Books upon the same Subject; nor lastly, the other Poets, who, according to Lyllo Gyraldi, Dial. 4. had wrote upon this Expedition; yet we are not quite destitute of Helps. Among the Historians, Diodorus Siculus, Apollodorus, Strabo, Trogus Pompeius, not to mention others, are those who have wrote upon it at greatest Length. I name not here Herodotus, because he says only a Word of it by the By; but indirect Proofs taken from that same Author, will be of great Service to me as I go along.

We have still three Poems upon this Expedition; that of Onomacritus, which goes under Orpheus's Name, and which was composed in the Time of Pisistratus, towards the Fifty fifth Olympiad, about 550 Years before the Christian Æra; that of Apollonius Rhodius, who lived about the Time of the first Ptolomys; and that of Valerius Flaccus, who wrote it under the Reign of Vespasian, and whose Work being imperfect, ends about the Middle of the eighth Book.

The Bulk of the other Poets make frequent Allusions to this Conquest; Pindar especially speaks of it very particularly in his fourth Olympic, and in his third Isthmic. Homer indeed says of it but little, but that same little enables us to form a just Idea of it. 'Tis in the twelfth Book of the Odyssey, where Circe foretelling to Ulysses the Dangers he should undergo by Sea, mentions to him the floating Rocks which she represents to be in the Straits between Sicily and Italy, tho' they are in Reality at the Mouth of the Euxine Sea, and where she adds, the Ship Argo passed. "There never was, says Circe, but one Ship that got "clear of those devouring Eddies; namely, the celebrated “ celebrated Ship Argo, which returned that Way from “ Colchis where King Æetes reigned, with the Flower “ of the Grecian Heroes ; and they too had been in“ fallibly dashed against the Rocks by the impetuous “ Waves, had not Juno herself been their Pilote,

 “ and guided them safely through, because she loved
 “ and protected Jason.”

These are the Sources whence I have drawn the History of the Argonautic Expedition, not neglecting however those of the Moderns, who have explained some Circumstances of it, as Bochart and M. le Clerc ; and 'tis also from the same Sources we must derive the true Idea of this Event, which certainly is neither a grand Mystery, as some Philosophers imagined, nor a mere Voyage of Greek Merchants who undertook to traffic upon the eastern Coasts of the Euxine Sea, as M. le Clerc alledges (1), who has however, by the Lights he has got from the learned Bochart, very happily explained some Adventures in this Expedition ; far less is it the History of Abraham, Hagar, and Sarah, of Moses and Joshua, as was undertaken to be proved not long ago by an Author (a), who, upon the System of F. Thomassin, Huetius, and some other Authors of the last Age, is for reducing most of the antient Fables to holy Writ, ill interpreted by the Pagans, and particularly the History now in debate to Abraham's Peregrinations ; as if there were the smallest Degree of Resemblance between the various Transmigrations of that Patriarch, who traversed Syria and the neighbouring Provinces, and came at last into Egypt still by Land, and the maritime Expedition of the Argonauts. By pursuing such Ideas, what may we not compare ?

Eustathius (2), of all the Antients, is the one perhaps who gives us the justest Conception of it, when he says this Voyage was a military Expedition, which besides the Purpose of the Golden Fleece, or, to speak more accurately, the Recovery of the Effects which

B 2

Phryxus

(1) Bibl. Univ. c. 20.

(a) A Comparison of Fable to Scripture, Vol. 1.

(2) Upon the 686 Verse of Dionysius Perigetes.

Phryxus had carried to Colchis, was also undertaken from other Motives ; as that of trafficking upon the Coasts of the Euxine Sea, and of settling there some Colonies, for the Security of their Commerce. For that End several Ships and a considerable Number of Men were necessary ; and they had both, as appears from the Settlements made by the two Squires of Castor and Pollux, whereof the one was called the Colony of the Tyndarides, the other that of the Heniochians. Some of those Vessels deserted the Ship Argo, which was as it were the Admiral to that small Fleet ; others of them were separated by the Winds ; but the Poets, continues this learned Author, speak only of one Ship, and name none but the Leaders in this Expedition.

That I may fully lay open an Event wherein all Greece was so much concerned, I shall trace the Matter from its Original.

The Causes of Atbanas (1), the Son of Eolus, the the Expedition. Grandson of Hellen, and Great-grandson of Deucalion, was King of Thebes in Beotia, or only of Orchomenos, according to Pausanias (2). This Prince had two Wives ; Ino, the Daughter of Cadmus, whom he divorced some Time after to marry Nepbele, by whom he had Phryxus and Helle ; this is the Name which Sophocles gives to Atbanas's second Wife, whom Pinder (3) calls Demotice ; and Phercides, Themisto. As she was subject to certain Fits of Madness, he was very soon disgusted at her, and took back Ino, who bore him two Sons, Learchus and Melicerta (a). Ino, who then gained greatly the Ascendant over her Husband, had a mortal Aversion to the Children of her Rival, who, being the eldest, were to succeed their Father, to the Exclusion of hers, so that she sought all Means to destroy them. To accomplish her Purpose the more effectually, she had Recourse to Religion. The City Thebes was laid waste by a cruel Famine, whereof she herself is reckoned to have been the Cause, having poisoned

(1) Apollod. l. 1. (2) In Attic. (3) 4 Olymp.

(a) I give the History of Ino and her two sons elsewhere.

soned the Grain that was sown the preceding Year ; or, if we may believe Hyginus (1), having steeped it in boiling Water to burn the Bud. It was usual in public Calamities to have Recourse to Oracles ; the Priests were gained by the Queen, and their Response was, that in order to put a Stop to the Desolation, Nephele's Children must be sacrificed to the Gods. These barbarous Sacrifices were not unknown in a Country where Cadmus had introduced the religious Worship of the Phenicians, who offered the like Sacrifices to Moloch with vast Solemnity.

Phryxus, apprized of Ino's Design by his Governor, if we may believe Diodorus Siculus (2), or by one of the Priests of the Oracle, who, according to Herodotus, made him the Discovery, fitted out a Ship secretly ; and having carried off a Part of his Father's Treasures, embarked with his Sister Helle to seek a secure Retreat at the Court of Æetes his Kinsman, who reigned in Colchis. The young Helle, oppressed with the Hardships of the Voyage, died by the Way, or, as we learn from Diodorus (3), having got up to the Ship's Deck, fell into the Sea, and was drowned. She is thought to have derived her Name to that Part of the Archipelago, which from that Adventure has been called the Hellepont, or the Sea of Helle. As they were then at no great Distance from the Coast, Phryxus landed there to bury his Sister, and after performing her Funeral Obsequies, he re-embarked, and arrived happily in Colchis, where Æetes gave him a kind Reception, and some Time after bestowed upon him his Daughter Calciopé in Marriage.

Pindar (4) assigns another Motive for Ino's Persecutions. This Princess, says he, was in love with Phryxus, but finding him insensible to her Passion, she formed a Resolution to destroy him. Be that as it will, Phryxus's first Care after his Arrival was to thank the Gods for the happy Success of his Voyage, and he consecrated the Prow of his Ship either to Neptune,

B 3

or

(1) L. 1. Fab. 11. (2) L. 4. (3) Loc. cit. (4) 4 Pyth.

or Mars; or, if we rely on the old Scholiast on Pindar (1), to Jupiter Phryxius, or The Preserver. To embellish this Piece of History, we are told, that a Ram with a golden Fleece, that had Wings, and was even endowed with the Faculty of Speech, had forewarned Phryxus and Helle of the bad Designs of their Mother-in-law; or, according to another Tradition, that seeing them near the Altar upon which they were to be sacrificed, the Animal had taken them upon its Back, and carried them off; that Phryxus, upon his Arrival in Colchis, had sacrificed this Ram to Jupiter (a), and consecrated the Skin of the Animal in his Temple; and that it was this precious Fleece, so much coveted by the Greeks, that gave Occasion afterwards to the Expedition of the Argonauts. The Poets went even so far as to give the Genealogy of this Ram, and fabled that he was the Son of Neptune and Theophane, whom that God, the better to conceal his Intrigue, had transformed into a Sheep, having metamorphosed himself into a Ram.

By way of Explanation of Circumstances so manifestly absurd, the antient Mythologists invented a new Fable, and said the Governor of Phryxus (2) was named Crios, the Ram, or Chrysomallus, the Golden Fleece: But I believe we had better say simply with Diodorus Siculus, Eusebius, and the antient Scholiast on Apollonius, that the Ship on which Phryxus went aboard was named the Ram, or the Golden Fleece, because it bore the Representation thereof. I add, that this Ship being very light, had flown, as I may say, from Greece to Colchis, and that Phryxus, according to the Custom of those Times had consecrated the Prow of it to one of the Gods whom I have named. 'Tis even easy

(1) Upon the fourth Pythic.

(a) Pausanias, in his Attics, says there was to be seen at Athens a Picture, where Phryxus was sacrificing the Ram that had carried him to Colchis. 'Tis not well known, he adds, to whom he sacrificed it; but we may conjecture that it was to that God whom the Orchomenians call Lapbystius; a Word derived απο της λαβυσσειν, festinare, to hasten, and he was the same God with Jupiter Phryxius, whose Denomination has the same Meaning.

(2) Diod. Paleph. &c.

easy to see from this Explanation, in what Sense it might have been said that the Ram and the Golden Fleece was the Son of Neptune, because the Ram represented the Ship which carried Phryxus and Helle, and every good Ship might be considered as the Son, or rather the Work of the God of the Sea.

Apollonius Rhodius adds to the Fable now explained, that it was Nephele herself, by assuming the Form of a Cloud, had concealed her two Children when ready to be sacrificed, and mounted them upon the Back of the Ram with the Golden Fleece; but 'tis easy to see that this Fiction is founded only upon the Name of this Princess, which in Greek signifies a Cloud.

The first Years of the Marriage of Phryxus and Calciope were very happy, and he had by her four Sons, Argos, Phrontis, Melas, and Cylindus (1); but Æetes, who coveted the Treasures of his Son-in-law, put him to Death; and Calciope, to save her Children from the bloody Hands of their Grandfather, who undoubtedly would not have spared them, put them secretly a Shipboard to transport them into Greece; hoping that Ino, of whose Death she had got Intelligence, being no more in the Way to persecute them, Athamas would give them a favourable Reception; but they were shipwrecked in an Isle, where, according to Diodorus Siculus (2), they waited the Arrival of Jason, who carried them back to Colchis, and delivered them to their Mother; who, the same Historian adds, in Gratitude for so important a Service, used all possible Means to promote the Success of that Prince's Passion for Medea her Sister, as I shall have Occasion afterwards to observe (a).

B 4

During

(1) Diodorus. (2) Loc. cit.

(a) Pausanias in Beot. c. 34. says however, that Phryxus returned into Greece in Athamas's Lifetime, and that he settled upon him his Dominions, which, upon Failure of Issue, he had made over to his Nephews Coronus and Haliartes; the Sons of Thersander and Grandsons of Sisyphus his Brother, leaving to them a Portion. According to other Authors, it was not Phryxus himself returned to Greece, but his Son Presbon, whom he had by the Daughter of Æetes.

During that Time, Pelias the Relation of Atthamas by Eolus, from whom they were both descended (1), governed a Part of Thessaly. This Prince had usurped the Crown from Eson, to whom it of Right belonged, and a long Series of Tyranny rendered him the Object of his People's Horror and Dislike (2). For the better Understanding of this History, we are to know that Tyro, the Daughter of the celebrated Salmones (3), having gained Neptune's good Graces, that is to say, one of his Priests, had by him Neleus and Pelias; but as these Sorts of Gallantries did not then mar a Lady's Fortune, she was afterwards married to Cretheus, of the Race of the Eolides, and had by him three Sons, Eson, Pheres, and Amithaon. Cretheus built in Thessaly the City Iolcus, which he made the Capital of his Dominions, and at his Death left the Crown to Eson the eldest, leaving other Settlements to Pheres the Father of Admetus, and to Amithaon, without any Regard to Pelias, who was none of his. He however, after the Death of Cretheus, became very powerful, and dethroned Eson, reducing him to a private Station, tho' he durst not banish him from Iolcos. In the mean time, to secure the Crown, he no sooner heard that Alcimede the Wife of Eson (a), was delivered of a Son, than he sought all Means to destroy him, because the Oracle whom he had consulted after his Usurpation, had foretold him that he was to be dethroned by a Prince of the Race of the Eolides. Eson and Alcimede, discovering the Tyrant's cruel Purpose, gave out that the young Diomedes, this was Jason's first Name, was dangerously sick, and in a few Days after spread the News of his Death. His Funerals were even prepared with great Solemnity; but instead of his Interment, his Mother secretly conveyed him to Mount Pelion, where Chiron, the wisest and most ingenious Man of his

(1) Apollod. l. 1. (2) Valerius Flaccus, l. 1. (3) Apollod. l. 1.

(a) Tho' the Antients vary a great deal about the Name of Jason's Mother, as may be seen in the Commentary of Meziriac upon the Epistle of Hyppobole to Jason, yet most of them name her Alcimede.

his Time, took Care of his Education (1). Other Authors say Pelias never knew that Eson had a Son till he was pretty well grown up, and that he had shipp'd him off in an old Weather-beaten Vessel, in hopes he would perish ; but that having been happily preserved, Chiron concealed him in his Cave (a).

This young Prince, about the Age of twenty Years, went to consult the Oracle, who ordered him to dress himself after the Manner of the Magnesiens, superadding to that Habit a Leopard's Skin, like that which Chiron wore ; to arm himself with two Lances, and to go in that Equipage to the Court of Iolcos, all which he punctually put in Execution.

In going from Mount Pelion to that City, he had to pass the Anaurus, a River unknown to the Geographers, but which is so called by Apollodorus Rhodius and Lucan. This River, or rather Brook (b) having then overflowed its Banks, Jason fortun'd to meet Juno in the Form of an old Woman, who offer'd to carry him over upon her Shoulders. In the Passage the young Prince drop'd one of his Shoes. Diodorus Siculus, who relates this Circumstance, says the Oracle which foretold Pelias that he was to be dethroned by a Prince of the Race of the Eolides, had added, that he was to beware of a Man who should appear before him with one Foot bare, the other shod (c). Jason making his public Appearance in Iolcos, in the Equipage which the Oracle had prescribed to him, drew the Attention of the whole City. They were astonish'd to see so handsome a Youth, in so extraordinary a Habit. Pelias hearing of the Arrival of this Stranger, went him-

(1) Apollod. Valer. Flacc. and especially Pindar, Pyth. 4.

(a) All the Antients are agreed that Jason was educated by Chiron, and the Scholiast on Pindar even quotes for Proof of it two Verses of Hesiod, who expressly says so. That Centaur taught him the Sciences which he himself profess'd, especially Medicine, and gave him for that Reason the Name of Jason, instead of Diomedes, which he had before.

(b) Valerius Flaccus names this River Enipeus, and Hyginus, Evenus ; but to be sure this is an Error in that Author.

(c) Apollod. l. 1. Tzetzes upon Lycophr. and the Scholiast upon Pindar, Pyth. 4.

himself to the Place where he was; and observing that he had but one Shoe, made no doubt but he was the Person with whom the Oracle had threatned him. However, he dissembled his Surprize, and demanded of the Stranger who he was. Jason, without being apprehensive of the Danger there was in declaring the Truth, told him briskly that he was the Son of Eson, and recounted to him in what Manner he had been educated in Chiron's Cave: Then addressing himself to the chief of the Assembly, asked them where his Father dwelt, was conducted to his House, there received as his Son, while the Tyrant, who had the Mortification to see how much the People interested themselves in the Prince, durst make no Attempt against him.

Pheres, who reigned in a Part of Thessaly, hearing of his Nephew's Arrival, came to Iolcos, accompanied with his Son Admetus, and sent for Neleus and Amithaon who were settled in Messenia. When the three Brothers were met, they spent five Days in rejoicing: On the sixth in the Morning Jason had an Interview with his Father and his Uncles, and they consulted together how to dethrone Pelias. After several Overtures, it was agreed that they should go all to his Palace (1); and upon their Arrival, Jason addressed his Uncle in a bold courageous Manner, demanded of him the Crown which he had usurped, reproached him with his unjust Procedure, and exhorted him amicably to compromise the Matter; assuring him, that far from coveting his Possessions, however unjustly taken from him, all he demanded was the Crown, and that he consented to leave him all the Wealth he had acquired by it.

Peleas was old, and hated by his People: so bold a Speech struck him to the Heart, and he made no doubt but his Subjects, charmed with Jason's fine Address, would support him with all their Might. Perhaps too he might apprehend, for Tyranny is always timorous, that there was already a Party formed against him; him ; thus, without daring openly to refuse so reasonable a Proposal, he sought to evade it.

(1) Pind. loc. cit.

Jason was then in that Time of Life when the Love of Glory is the darling Passion ; and Pelias being persuaded that he might remove him from Iolcos by setting before him an Opportunity of gratifying his Ambition, told him that the unfortunate Phryxus, their common Relation, descended with them from Eolus, had been assassinated in Colchis, and that his Ghost had appeared to him, charging him to revenge his Death, and to save his Children who were every Day exposed to the insatiable Avarice of the Tyrant, who detained them at his Court. He added, that he was very ready to resign to him a Crown to which he had a legal Title ; but that as a Duty of Religion bound him to the Expedition to Colchis, which he was not in a Condition to undertake himself, he hoped he would not refuse to discharge it for him, and give Satisfaction to the injured Manes of a Relation who called aloud for Revenge. To make Jason relish this Proposal the better, and the more to inflame his Ardour to undertake the Expedition, he told him that Phryxus, when he was obliged to abandon Thebes, had carried with him a Fleece of great Value, the Conquest whereof would enrich him, and at the same Time crown him with immortal Glory. Disturbed, as I have been, says Pelias, with frightful Dreams, I sent to consult the Oracle of Apollo, who made Answer, that it was absolutely necessary to appease the Manes of Phryxus, and to bring them back to Greece (a); but my Years make so long a Voyage impossible for me. You who are in the Flower of Youth, are in a Condition to undertake it, your Duty engages you to it, Glory calls and invites you ; thereby you shall fulfil an Obligation which I am not able to discharge, and I swear by the Almighty Jove, from whom you and I derive our Original, that you shall no sooner be returned, than I will

(a) It was a common Opinion of those Times, that the Manes of those who died in a foreign Land, were in Exile, and still sought to return to their own Country. The Scholiast on Pindar, in Confirmation of this Opinion, cites two Verses from Homer.

will establish you in the Possession of the Throne that belongs to you.

This Proposal was highly grateful to Jason, who having withdrawn to confer with his Father and Uncles, they resolved unanimously to publish their Design through all Greece, to invite the Youth to join with him in so glorious and advantageous an Expedition.

While the Choice of the Grecian Youth were assembling in Thessaly to accompany Jason, a Ship was ordered to be got ready proper for so long a Voyage; this is the famous Argo, of which so many Fables have been uttered. As no Body has explained them better than Bockart (1), from him I shall partly borrow what I am to say on this Article, after I have delivered what the Antients themselves say of it.

In the first Place there are four Opinions concerning the Name Argo, which was given to this Ship. Apollonius, Diodorus Siculus, Ptolomeus Ephestion in Photius, Servius, and some others, will have it to have been derived from Argus, who proposed the Plan of it; and then they vary too a good deal with respect to this Argus, who certainly cannot be the Argus whom Juno employed as a Guard to Io, whose Time preceded that of the Argonauts by eight or nine Generations; for which I refer to Meziriac (2), who has very justly remarked, that in Apollonius Rhodius, we must read Argus the Son of Alektor, instead of Son of Arestor, who is the Father of the antient Argus. Alektor, a Thespian by Birth, lived in the Time of the Argonauts, and most of the Antients agree, that it was his Son built the Ship Argo, and took Care of it during the whole Voyage: For we ought to reject the Opinion of Ptolomey Ephestion, who said, as we are told by Photius, that Hercules himself had built that Ship, and had given it the Name of Argo, from the Name of a Son of Jason, whom he loved, since we learn from Pindar, and most Authors, that Jason himself was but eight and twenty Years of Age, when he undertook this Expedition.

The

(1) Chan. l. 2. c. 12. (2) Upon the Epistle of Hypsipyle to Jason.

The second Opinion is that of Diodorus Siculus (1), Servius (2), and the Scholiast upon Euripides (3), who alledge, that the Name of Argo, was given to that Vessel upon Account of its Swiftneſs, the Word ἀργος ſignifying Swift.

According to the third Opinion, which is that of Tzetzes (4), it was ſo called becauſe it was built at Argos, or rather becauſe it was made upon the Model of that of Danaus King of Argos, which Germanicus, in his Commentary upon Aratus, alledges to have been named Argo. Laſtly, Cicero quotes two Verſes, intimating, that this Ship was named Argo, merely becauſe it carried the Greeks, Argivos.

Argo, quia Achivi in ea deſecti viri Veſti, petebant pellem inauratam arietis.

Theſe Verſes are from Ennius who tranſlated the Medea of Euripides; though Euripides ſays no ſuch Thing.

The ſame Antients vary no leſs about the Quality of the Wood that was uſed in the Conſtruction of this Ship: I ſhall not enter here into any Detail, only obſerve that according to Euripides in his Medea, and almoſt all the Antients, it was built of the Wood of Mount Pelion, whence it had the Epithet given it of Πηλιας, and in Latin, Peliaca; and that it was built in a Place of Magneſia, which from that Time was ſtiled Pegaſæ, from the Word Πηγνύμι, ſignifying among other Things to build. The learned Scholiast on Apolonius (5) ſays ſo expreſſly: Pegaſé is a Cape of Magneſia, ſo called from the Ship Argos having been built there. In that Place there was a Temple of Apollo; hence that God, in Hefiod, has the Name of Pegaſian given him (6). There it was alſo that the Argonauts embarked, and the particular Spot of Ground where this Imbarkation was made, from that Time got the Name of Aphetæ, as is poſitively aſſerted by Strabo (7), and Stephanus, who cites for this Opinion Hellanicus.

One Thing not to be omitted is, that in the Conſtruction of this Ship an Oak of the Foreſt of Dodona was

(1) L. 4. (2) Upon the fourth Eclo. of Virgil. (3) Trag. of Med. (4) Upon Lycophron. (5) Upon the firſt Book of the Argonauts. (6) Upon Hercules's Buckler. (7) L. 9.

was employed, which was put in the Prow, and hence undoubtedly came the Tradition, importing that the Ship Argo delivered Oracles, and gave Responses to those who consulted it, as may be seen in Apollodorus, in Apollonius, Lycophron, &c. whence it has the Epithet given it of Loquax and Sacra. Valerius Flaccus places this Oak upon the Stern, and Appollonius Rhodius says it served for a Mast.

As for the Form of this Ship, 'tis certain from all the Antients, whose Authorities need not be quoted here, that it was long, and nearly of the Figure of our Gallies, whereas those which the Greeks used before were round ; which makes Pliny say (1), Longa nave Jasonem primum navigasse, Philo Stephanus autor est. Where it is to be remarked by the by, that by long Ships the Greeks understood Ships of War, and by the round those which served for Merchants. 'Tis according to this Idea that the Scholiast on Aristophanes explains these Words ναῦς μακράς, long Ships, by ναῦς πολεμίας, Ships of War : And this single Remark demolishes the Opinion of M. le Clerc, who will have the Expedition of the Argonauts to have been only an Enterprize of Merchants, as has been already said at the Beginning of this Chapter. There was even, according to Clidimus cited by Plutarch, a general Law for all Greece, forbidding Merchants to set sail with a Ship containing more than a hundred Persons.

I promised after delivering the Opinions of the Antients about the Ship Argo, to give Bochart's Sentiments of it, and I shall now fulfil that Promise. The Greeks, says this Author, had learned the Art of Navigation from the Phœnicians, whom Cadmus brought into their Country. The Phœnicians made Use of two Sorts of Ships ; the one round, which they called Gaulis, and the other long, which were denominated Arco ; whence the Greeks by changing the c into g, as of Cneius and Caius they made Gneius and Gaius, instead of Arco pronounced and wrote Argo. Appollonius says, this Galley consisted of fifty Oars, and calls it, πεντηκοντέρον ναῦν ; thus, continues our learned Author, we may conjecture conjecture that it had twenty-five Oars on each Side, and fifty Cubits in Length. If we rely on Theocritus, who mentions it on Occasion of the young Hylas, it was even ten Cubits more in Length, having, according to him, thirty Oars on each Side. Consequently, he concludes, it was neither from its Lightness nor Swiftneſs, as the Antients imagined, nor becauſe it was built by Argus, whoever he was, nor becauſe it carried the Greeks or Argives, that this Galley was named Argo; but on Account of its long Figure.

The Antients are not agreed as to the Number of thoſe who embarked with Jaſon; but the moſt common Opinion is that they were fifty two. The Number of the Argonauts. Firſt of all they conſidered who ſhould be the Leader in this Enterprize, and though Hercules, both by his Character and Exploits, might have diſputed it with any, he was however content to yield the Honour thereof to Jaſon, as the one whom this Expedition more nearly concerned, being a near Kinsman of Phryxus; beſides that Pelias had inveſted him with the Commiſſion. Next they nominated the Pilot of the Ship, and this Truſt was veſted in Typhis, who was accounted a Son of Neptune, that is, he was a good Sea-Man. As moſt of the other Argonauts were celebrated Princes in that Time, I ought as I name them, to give their Characters in a few Words, reſerving the latter Part of this Book for a more particular Account of thoſe who diſtinguiſhed themſelves not only in this but alſo in other Expeditions wherein they were concerned.

Jaſon, as Chief, claims the firſt Place in this Catalogue; but what I have already ſaid, and what I ſhall be obliged to ſay of him afterwards, will make him ſufficiently known. What I am to ſay of Hercules, whom I name immediately after Jaſon, will only turn upon what relates to this Enterprize, wherein ſome Antients even pretend that he had no Part. All the reſt however agree that he embarked with the Argonauts: Some alledging too that he was at firſt nominated their Chief, and that Jaſon did not become ſo till after after Hercules had been left in Troas where he landed to go in quest of Hylas, as I give Account in the Life of Hercules. There are even Authors who will have it that this Heroe did not go the Length of Asia, but debarked upon the Coasts of Thessaly, in the Gulph of Magnesia, where the Argonauts stopped to take in fresh Water, and that this Place was from that Time called, Aphetes, or the Place of Dereliction; others, on the contrary, that it was in that very Gulph the Argonauts embarked, and that Aphetes signifies, the Place of Departure.

If Hercules went not as far as the Coasts of Asia, it was upon another Occasion that he took the City Troy, and perhaps, as M. Freret observes in a Dissertation of his printed in our Memoirs (1) upon his Return from Lydia: But what makes against this Opinion, in the Trojan Expedition, this Heroe was accompanied with Telamon, on whom he bestowed Hesione in Marriage, and it will not be easy to account for it how that Prince could then be upon the Coasts of Phrygia.

Theseus, according to Plutarch, also embarked for this Expedition, but this Article is likewise liable to great Difficulty, as I have remarked in speaking of that Prince.

Acastus, the Son of Pelias and Anaxibia, was of the Number of these Chieftains. He was Cousin-German to Jeson, and known by the Antients as a celebrated Hunter, very expert at handling the Bow, as Ovid remarks: Jaculo que insignis Acastus (2).

Again, some reckon Aëtor among the Argonauts; but as there were several Princes of that Name, he whom I take to be the Argonaut, must have been the famous Eurytus. Ovid (3) gives him a Place with his Father in the Battle between the *Centaur*s and the Lapithæ, and in the hunting of Calydon. These three Events happened near enough to one another, for the same Man to have been concerned in them all, as I shall prove elsewhere.

Aëtorides who is also ranked among the Argonauts,
and

(1) Vol. v. (2) Met. l. 8. (3) Met. l. 11.

and who is designed under this patronymic Name, is Menætius the Son of Actor and Father of Patroclus.

Admetus, the King of Thessaly, whom all the Antients reckon in the Number of the Argonauts, was the Son of Pheres, and Grandson of Cretheus, and consequently Jason's Cousin. The Story of the loving Alcestes his Spouse is universally known.

Ætalides the Son of Mercury, and of Eupoleme a Native of Larissa, is added by some Authors to the List of the Argonauts. 'Tis said of him that he had obtained of his Father Mercury two Favours; the one, that whether alive or dead he should always be informed of what was transacted in the World; the other, that he should be one half of his Time among the Living, and the other half among the Dead: A Fable built perhaps upon his having been the Herald of the Argonauts, which Office occasioned his being often present, often absent from the Army, and obliged him to be exactly informed of all that passed. He was also by his Mother's Side of the Race of the Eolides, since she was the Daughter of Pisidice the Sister of Cretheus.

Apollodorus is the only one who names Almenus, a Person unknown to the other Antients; he means perhaps an Inhabitant of a City situated upon the Coasts of the Euxine Sea, which was called Almené, who embarked with the Argonauts, and is stiled by that Author a Son of Mars, which agrees well enough to a Thracian: But what is more surprizing, Apollodorus is the only one who reckons the celebrated Amphiaræus among the Argonauts. It is very possible that he was both in the Expedition to Colchis, and at the Siege of Thebes, where he died, as I shall shew afterwards.

As Apollodorus is the sole Author who names Amphiaræus, so he is the only one who has omitted Amphidamas, an Arcadian the Son of Aleus and Cleobule, and Brother of Lycurgus and Cepheus, who is in all the other Lists, as also Amphion, the Son of Hyperasius, a Native of Pallene in Arcadia, where his Father was King. We must not however confound this Amphion with the King of Thebes, who had the same Name, but was dead before this Expedition.

All the Antients, with one accord, mention among the Argonauts the Pilote Typhis, of the little City Typha in the Extremity of Beotia upon the Sea-coast, whose Inhabitants were valued for being good Seamen. Some Authors make him the Son of Phorbas and Imané, and others give him for his Father Anginus or Hagnius. He died at the Court of Lycus, in the Country of the Mariandinians, and his Place was supplied by the famous Anceus, who is reckoned the Son of Neptune, because he was an excellent Pilote ; his Mother was named Astipalea, the Daughter of Phœnix. Upon his Return from Colchis he applied himself to the Improvement of Agriculture, and took great Care of his Vineyards : As he bore too hard upon his Vine-dressers, and used them ill, he was told by one of them, that he would never drink of the Vine which he was then labouring. The Time of the Vintage being come, he ordered a Goblet to be quickly filled up of the first Juice that could be drawn from the Grape ; and fixing his Eye upon him who had made the Prediction upon him, reproached the Man for his Want of Foresight, upon which the Labourer replied, that many Things often intervened between a full Cup and the Time of drinking it. Accordingly, in the very Moment he was bearing the Cup to his Mouth, he was informed that a monstrous Boar was ravaging his Vines : Forthwith he parted with the Cup, flew to his Arms, and in pursuing the Boar received a Wound whereof he died ; and this Answer of Anceus's Servant became a Proverb, which Cato thus turns into Latin : Multum interest inter os & offam ; though the Sense of the Words of the Proverb is, Multa cadunt inter Calicem supremaque labra. We must not confound this Anceus with another of the same Name, whom all the Antients reckon in the Number of the Argonauts. He was the Son of Lycurgus, King of the Tegeates in Arcadia, who sent him in his Place into Colchis, because he would not part with his Father Alceus, whose Age and Infirmities required his Presence.

Onomacritus speaks also of another Anceus of the City Pleuron in Etolia, whom he names among the Argonauts; but the List of this antient Author is the least exact of all; for he inserts into it also one Ancystheus, a Person quite unknown, unless we suppose, with some Authors, that he had wrote Acastus the Son of Pelias, of whom he makes no mention, though he be owned by all the Antients to have been of the Number of the Argonauts. He names also one Areus; which is an Epithet often used by Homer, rather than a proper Name; for it was a common Practice with the antient Poets to give the Name of Mars, or Son of Mars, to Warriors celebrated by their Exploits.

The same Author takes no Notice of two of the Name of Argus, whom all the rest reckon among the Argonauts; and as there were many Persons of this Name, 'tis not easy to distinguish them. 'Tis however commonly allowed, that one of these Argus's was the same who built the Ship Argo. The other Argonaut of the same Name was that Son of Phryxus, who having suffered Shipwreck in his Return from Colchis, as has been said, was driven upon an Island, whence Jason brought him back to his Mother with his Brothers.

We know little about one Armenius, or Armenus, whom some reckon in the Number of those Chiefs who accompanied Jason, and alledge, that he was of a City of the same Name, situated between Pheres and Larissa, whether the Name of the City had been given to the Argonaut, or that of the Argonaut to the City, whereof perhaps he was the Founder; for all those who embarked with Jason were of the best Families in Greece.

Apollodorus again stands alone in filling up the List of those Heroes with the Names of Ascalaphus and Almenus, or rather Ialmenius, as he calls him elsewhere; as he is also named by Homer, both of them Sons of Mars, who had them by the fair Astioché.

If Esculapius assisted in the Expedition of the Argonauts, 'tis surprizing that he is to be found only in Hyginus's List: 'Tis true, Clement of Alexandria names him him also with Castor and Pollux, upon the Authority of Apollonius Rhodius, who, however, in the Passage which he quotes, mentions only the DioscURI, without taking any Notice of Asclepius or Esculapius. As for Castor and Pollux, there is not any one of the Antients has omitted them (a).

Asterion, though we know little else about him, is however named among the Argonauts by some Authors, who say he was the Son of Cometes and Antigone, the Daughter of Pharcs; and as Pharcs was the Brother of Cretheus the Son of Eolus, he was Jason's Cousin: Cometes too, as well as his Wife, may have been of the Race of the Eolides. I am however of Opinion, that we must not confound this Asterion, as Apollodorus has done, with Asterius the Son of Nelus, and Brother of Nestor, who is also reckoned among the Argonauts.

Those who will have it that Atalanta embarked with these Captains, are certainly mistaken; for what Probability is there that one young Woman alone would have undertaken this Expedition among all these Heroes?

Several of the Antients have also put down in their List, Augeas, or Augias the Son of the Sun, or rather of Phorbas King of Elis; this is that Augeas whose Stables Hercules cleaned, which makes one of that Heroe's Labours.

Euphemus is mentioned by Pausanias alone, who in speaking of the other Argonauts who were present at the Funeral Games celebrated by Acastus at his Return from Colchis, names some that are very little known to the other Antients; among the rest Eurybates, who he says distinguished himself in the Game of the Coit. He was the Son of Tebeon, and he it was that cured the Wound which Oileus received as he was hunting with Hercules the Birds of the Stymphalic Lake. Pausanias adds next, that Melanion, Neotheus, Phalareus, Argus and Iphiclus, are the five who seem to have disputed the Prize of the Foot Race. This Iphiclus was the Father of Protesilaus, the first that was slain upon the

(a) I shall give their History in a particular Chapter.

the Banks of Troy when besieged by the Greeks; as for the rest, they are not named by the other Antients among the Argonauts. According to the same Author, Iolas the Companion of Hercules in his Labours, won the Prize of the Chariot-race; and as it is probable that none were admitted to those Games but those who had accompanied Jason, we may conclude that Iolas had left Hercules, as the other Argonauts had done, and went with them to Colchis.

Calais and Zetbes, the Sons of Boreas and Orithya, the Daughter of Erethheus King of Athens, are too famous in this Expedition, to have been omitted; I shall speak of their Adventures in the History of the Expedition which those Heroes made after their Departure from Greece.

Canthus the Son of Abas, or according to some Authors, the Son of Cometes, and Grandson of Abas, who reigned in Elis, is also named among these Captains; Apollonius says he perished in Libya, probably when the Ship Argo, in returning from Colchis, landed upon the Coasts of Africa, as shall be said afterwards. The same Author is singular in reckoning among these Chieftains, Autolycus, that celebrated Robber, who was the Son of Mercury and Chione the Daughter of Dedalion; but 'tis probable that he confounded this Autolycus, who lived at a very great Distance from the Time of this Expedition, with another Prince of the same Name, who according to other Authors joined the Argonauts near the City Sinope, with his two Brothers Deileon and Phlagius. The first was Father to Ulysses's Great Grandfather.

I shall only name Azorus, a Person unknown to all the Antients but Hesychius, who says he was for some Time Pilote to the Ship Argo. I ought not even to name Buphagus, tho' reckoned by some among the Argonauts: Perhaps 'tis not without Reason that those who have taken him into their List are censured for having made a Person of the Epithet that was given to Hercules, because he ate up all the Provisions of the Argonauts; which probably was not one of the least Motives that determined them to leave him in Troas.

The brave Ceneus, the Son of Elatus, so celebrated in the Battle between the *Centaur*s and the Lapithæ, is named among Jason's Companions by Hyginus alone: His Son Serenus is also in the Lists given by other Authors, of those who joined in this Expedition. Cepheus an Arcadian, the Brother of Lycurgus, and Son of Aleus, is mentioned by all the Antients.

Cius is named by none of those who have written upon the Expedition of the Argonauts; but Strabo's Authority seems sufficient to give him a Place among those Heroes. That Author says the City Prusa in Bitlynia, rebuilt by Prusias, was formerly named Cius, from the Name of its Founder, who built it upon his Return from Colchis.

Clytus and Ipkitus, the Sons of Eurythus and Antiope, come from Oechalia, where their Father reigned: Eumedon, the Son of Bacchus and Ariadne, and Clymenus, the Brother of Iphiclus, and Uncle of Protesilaus, are found but in a few Authors.

As there were several Deucalions, Authors are at a Loss to determine which of them is he whom we find in some Lists of the Argonauts: We may however reckon, with a great deal of Probability, that he is either the Son of Minos I. or the Son of Melampus, Jason's Kinsman by Eolus, who had both the Name of Deucalion, and lived in the Time of this Expedition.

There is as little Difficulty in determining who that Ecbion was, whom all the Antients make to have accompanied Jason; 'tis undoubtedly he who was said to be the Son of Mercury and Antianira. For the one, who lived in the Time of Cadmus, and whose Son was Pentheus, cannot be the Argonaut now in question. Ecbion was a Man of Cunning and Policy, and this is what made him be called a Son of Mercury; accordingly he was employed as a Spy during the Voyage.

Ergyrus, another celebrated Argonaut, who shared the Pilotship with Tiphis, was undoubtedly accounted a Son of Neptune, for no other Reason, but because he was expert in Navigation. We are to think the same same of Euphemus, who was also said to be the Son of Neptune and Macionissa, and who, after the Death of Tiphis, was made Pilote of the Ship Argo. All those who have given account of the Argonauts make Mention of him; and I shall have Occasion to speak of him afterwards.

In the Number of the Argonauts is also reckoned Phlias, who communicated his Name to that small Country near Sicyon, which is watered by the River Asopus, and which was called Phliasia: He passed for the Son of Bacchus, his Mother was Arethyrea, and not Ctonophile, who was rather his Wife, by whom he had a Son named Androdamas.

Euryalus, the Son of Mecistius, the Grandson of Talaus, and Great-grandson of Amitbaon, who had for his Father Cretheus, is also reckoned among the Argonauts. We find this same Prince at the Siege of Troy, where Homer says he commanded the Argives with Diomedes.

Eurydamas, the Son of Iras and Demonassa, is named by Hyginus alone, tho' his Brother Eurytion is in all the Authors who have spoke of the Argonauts. Several Antients have confounded this Eurytus with Eurytion; but I believe we must distinguish them, and make of the latter a third Argonaut, who is omitted by none of those who give account of this Expedition; and as several Authors concur in making Eurytus the Son of Mercury and Antianira, and Brother to that Echion whom I mentioned a little before, we must conclude from thence that this Eurytus is not the same with Eurytus the King of Oechalia, whom Hercules put to Death, and whose two Sons, Iphitus and Clytus, were of the Number of the Argonauts.

Posides, an antient Author, cited by Athenæus, reckons also in the Number Glaucus, without saying any more about him. 'Tis not probable that he means Glaucus of the City of Anthedon, that celebrated Fisherman mentioned by Ovid, who says he was transformed into a Sea-God, and who, according to Apollonius, rose up from the Bottom of the Water to let the Ar- gonauts know that Destiny stood in the Way of Hercules's Voyage to Colchis, and that they had done right to leave him: Thus I reckon he designed Glaucus the Son of Sisyphus, the Grandson of Eolus, and Jason's Kinsman.

Idas, a Messenian, and Brother of Lynceus, is celebrated among these Captains. He, as well as Jason, was descended from Eolus, since his Father Aphareus was the Son of Perieres, whose Grandfather was Eolus. Arane his Mother, the Daughter of Oebalus, gave her Name to a City of Messenia.

Idmon is named also by almost all the Antients. As this was a celebrated Soothsayer, he had Apollo given him for his Father; but Hyginus, upon antient Authorities, asserts that he was the Son of Abas, and that Argos was his Country. Some of the Antients confound Idmon with Mopsus, and others distinguish them. Tho' Idmon foresaw, by the Principles of Divination, that he was to perish in this Voyage, he embarked however, and actually died either of Sickness, according to some, or, according to others, of a Wound which he had received at the hunting of the Boar in the Country of the Mariandinians.

Iolaus, the Son of Iphiclus, and Nephew of Hercules, is named among the Argonauts by none but Hyginus, and Ovid says he assisted at the hunting of Calydon: He might very well have been at both these Exploits. The fabulous Tradition delivered by this last Author, imported that Hebe had renewed his Youth at the Request of Hercules; which means that this Prince advanced in Years, had recovered all the Vigour of Youth, when he slew Eurystheus, who, after Hercules's Death, declared War against the Albanians, to oblige them to deliver up to him the Heraclides, who had thrown themselves upon their Mercy, to secure them from the Persecutions of this Enemy.

Among the Argonauts are also named two Iphiclus's, one the Son of Thestius, the Brother of Althea, Meleager's Mother, and the other the Son of Philacus, and Father of Protesilaus. Valerius Flaccus is the only one one who reckons in this Number Iphis the Son of Alektor; and none but Hyginus name Ixition of the City of Corinth. Munkerus thinks there is a Fault in the Text of that Author, and that we are to read Cantbus instead of Ixition; this Cantbus I have already taken notice of.

If Laertes, the Son of Arcefius, and Father of Ulysses (a), was among the Argonauts, 'tis surprizing that he is mentioned by none but Apollodorus. What may be said in Vindication of this Author, is, that Laertes was contemporary with Jason, and his Kinsman; and this perhaps is the Reason why he has inserted him in his List, where he has omitted Leodatus, the Son of Bias, the Brother of Talaus and Arcius, who are all three named among the Argonauts.

They have not omitted the celebrated Lynceus, the Son of Aphareus, and Brother of Idas, who must not be confounded with the Son of Epytus, who had the same Name. This is that Lynceus, who is said by all the Antients to have been so quick-sighted, that he saw even into the Bowels of the Earth; a Hyperbole under which is figured a Man skilful in the Search of Metals.

Meleager, the Son of Oeneus King of Calydon, must have been very young when he set out for this Expedition with Tydeus his Father's Brother, since he had a Governor given him, Leodatus his natural Brother, whom some Authors have also reckoned among the Argonauts. As all the Antients are agreed that Meleager was of the Number of these Heroes, 'tis evident that the famous hunting of the Calydonian Boar, and the Death of this Prince, who perished in the Manner known to all the World, are Events posterior to the Conquest of the Golden Fleece.

The famous Diviner Mopsus is also reckoned of the Number by all the Antients, tho' they are divided as to the Place of his Nativity; Some think he was of Oechalia,

(a) Homer, who often speaks of Laertes in his Odysey, never insinuates in the least that he joined in this Expedition.

Oechalia, but the most common Opinion makes him a Thessalian, of the City of Titarene.

I presume we are not to confound this Mopsus with another Diviner of the same Name; the first was the Son of Ampycus and Chloris, whence he got the Name of Ampycides; the second had for his Father Tiresias; the first practised Divination during the Voyage to Colchis (1); the second signalized himself at the Siege of Thebes (2), and both of them were very much honoured after their Death, and had Oracles which were often consulted. That of Mopsus the Son of Tiresias was in Cilicia, and that of the Argonaut was in Africa, where he died in his Return from Colchis (3).

Butes the Athenian is mentioned by all the Authors who have spoke of the Argonauts. After his Death he was honoured by the Athenians as a Heroe, and he had an Altar, according to Pausanias (4), in the Temple of Erechtheus.

Nauplius, the Son of Neptune and Amymone, Danaus's Daughter, is also reckoned in all the Lists, as also Menætius, who is omitted by none of the Antients; he was the Son of Actor and Egine, and Father of the famed Patroclus.

Neleus the Brother of Pelias, who had quitted Thessaly to go and settle at Pylos in the Peloponnesus, came with Perichlymenes his Son, to imbark with Jason: This is the same Perichlymenes, who being transformed into an Eagle, was slain by Hercules; whence we may conclude, that it was not till after the Expedition of the Argonauts this Heroe made an Inroad into the Peloponnesus, during which he slew all the Children of Neleus, Nesſor excepted, whom Valerius Flaccus (5) also makes to have been at the Conquest of the Golden Fleece.

We have none but Apollodorus who names Palemon the Son of Etolus, and Great-grandson of Eolus by Calice his Grandmother; and Hyginus is the only one who who reckons among the Argonauts Oileus the Father of that Ajax who ravished Cassandra; but in all the Lists we find Peleus, the Son of Æacus, and Father of Achilles, as also Telamon his Brother.

(1) Statius Thebaid. l. 3. v. 520. (2) Strabo, l. 14. (3) Amm. Marcell. l. 14. Apuleius. (4) In Attic. (5) L. 1. v. 380.

Peneleus, the Son of Hipalmus, Staphylus, Phanus and Phalerus, the Sons of Alcon the Athenian, are little known, tho' the Name of the last is in all the Lists, whereas none but Apollodorus names the rest.

Philammon, the Son of Apollo and Chione, celebrated in Ovid's Metamorphoses, is mentioned among the Argonauts by none but Hyginus, who takes also into the Number of those Captains Philoctetes the Son of Pean, the Companion of Hercules, and Heir to his Arrows, who afterwards joined in the Siege of Troy, as shall be said in the Sequel. The same Author is also the only one who reckons among them Phocas, the Son of the Lapithe Ceneus, of the City Magnesia, as also his Brother Priapus, and his Cousin Polyphemus, the Son of the Thessalian Elatus, the Brother of Ceneus. But what shall we think of one Thersanon, the Child of the Sun, and Leucothea, the Daughter of Orcamus King of Persia, whom Hyginus names among the Argonauts? Shall we say it is an Error in the Text, and that we are to read Philammon? But this Name is joined to a Genealogy which admits not of such Corrections. I leave also to Muncherus the Thessalus whom he has inserted in the Catalogue he has made up from that Author. May he not have taken for an Argonaut the Country where most of the Heroes were born? I have not the same Opinion of Thesstor, the Father of the celebrated Calchas, who, according to the antient Scholiast on Apollodorus, was inserted by some of the Antients into the Number of Jason's Companions.

I have reserved for the Close of this List, Theseus and his Friend Pirithous, who are named among the Argonauts, by none but Hyginus and Apollodorus; whereas Apollonius Rhodius asserts, that they were then both of them confined in Prison, by Aidoneus King of Epirus, upon whose Daughter Pirithous had attempted a Rape;

a Rape ; and whom other Authors will have not to have yet left Trezené. Plutarch in the Life of Theseus, says indeed, that Hero performed this Expedition with the other Argonauts ; but like an inaccurate Compiler, he plainly contradicts himself, since in the same Life he says, Theseus at his first setting out from Trezené for Athens, where he was acknowledged by his Father, found Medea there : Now Medea returned not till the Return of the Argonauts. The Age I am now speaking of is full of chronological Difficulties, and the Life of Theseus makes one of the most considerable of them. Some make him too young at the Time of the Conquest of the Argonauts, others again make him too old. If we consider the Genealogies of those Times, Theseus would have been even extremely old, if not dead, when the Argonauts set out, since Hypsiphile was the Daughter of Thoas, and Thoas the Son of that same Ariadne, whom Theseus left in the Island of Naxos : Accordingly we find in Apollonius (1), and Valerius Flaccus (2), Jason reciting to Medea the Story of Theseus and Ariadne. On the other hand, the Arrival of Theseus at Athens after his Departure from Trezené, is sufficiently marked by Diodorus (3), Plutarch (4), and Pausanias ; and according to these Authors he was at that time very young, and in a Virgin's Habit, that he might not be known. These Authors say it was in the Time that Egeus his Father was new married to Medea, and consequently long after Jason's Expedition. Further, we know that this Heroe, younger than his Cousin Hercules, lived to the Time of the Trojan War. After the Authorities now offered, I am determined upon the whole to believe, that he is not to be reckoned in the Number of the Argonauts. There is no less Difficulty as to the Time of the War with the *Centaur*s, and of the hunting of Calydon ; for all the Antients agree, that Theseus was present at the Marriage of Piritheus, and at the Battle of the *Centaur*s ; and all inform us also, that he joined in the hunting of the Calydonian Boar ; Events which border
very

(1) L. 5. v. 996. (2) L. 6. v. 90. (3) L. 4. (4) In Theseo.

very near upon the Conquest of the Argonauts, and the first whereof, I believe, even preceded it. Thus 'tis impossible for us to extricate ourselves from these Difficulties.

Such were the Heroes who joined in the Conquest of the Golden Fleece, that is, all who were most distinguished in Greece at that Time, both for their Valour and their Birth, and whereof the most Part were Jason's Relations, because at that Time, almost all Greece, except a Part of the Peloponnesus, was peopled by Deucalion's Descendants, from whom he derived his Original.

As the Art of Navigation was then so little known, that they kept generally pretty near the Coasts, and yet foresaw they would be obliged often to lose sight of them, they applied to Chiron to make up a new Kalendar, and to reform the old one; because, according to the old Kalendar, where the Ascensions and Declinations of the Sun were not marked, the Equinoxes and the Solstices happened in times remote from the Points where they ought to have been fixed: Chiron, say some Authors, rectified them, and formed a Kalendar proper to direct the Princes in their Navigation; which Opinion I have examined in a Chapter by itself (1).

When all things were in readiness for the Voyage, Jason, according to Apollonius, before he set sail, ordered a solemn Sacrifice to the God the Founder of his Race, and to all the Divinities whom he thought able to succeed his Enterprize. Every one was zealous to carry Stones for erecting the Altar (2), which was covered with Olive-branches. After the ordinary Oblations, the Priests sprinkled upon the Altar Flour mixed with Honey and Oil, offered up two Oxen to the Gods in Honour of whom the Sacrifice was performed, and invoked their Protection from the Dangers of so long a Voyage. Jupiter, adds Apollonius after Pindar (3), promised by the Voice of Thunder his his Aid to this heroic Body, who embarked after the Sacrifice.

(1) B. II. Ch. 12. p. 541. (2) Apoll. c. 4. (3) Pyth.

The Argonauts were already in the Ship, when Chiron arrived to take leave of his dear Jason; and after having embraced him as well as the other Heroes, gave them proper Directions for their Voyage, and offered up Vows for the happy Success of their Enterprize. He hugged the young Achilles in his Arms; a Circumstance which I remark, because it will be of use afterwards to prove the Date of this Expedition.

In fine, the Wind being favourable, they launched out into the Sea, and set sail.

C H A P. I.

The Voyage of the Argonauts to Colchis.

THE Voyage of the Argonauts, which furnishes several Adventures, which I shall endeavour to reduce to History, was at first prosperous enough; but a Storm obliged them very soon to put in to the Island of Lemnos. The Women in that Island had failed in their respect to Venus, and the Goddess in revenge, had infected them with such a bad Smell, that their Husbands had forsaken them, for Slaves whom they had taken from the Thracians, with whom they were at War. The Lemnian Ladies, exasperated with this signal Contempt, conspired against the Men in the Island, and falling upon them in their Sleep, assassinated all of them who were in Lemnos, for the greater Number was not there at that Time, as we shall see afterwards. Hyppsihrile alone spared the Life of her Father Thoas, who was the King of the Island. However extraordinary this Fact appears, 'tis however confirmed by the unanimous Testimony of all the Ancients; for their varying in some Circumstances, instead of destroying it, demonstrates on the contrary, that it was generally believed. Apollodorus (1), and after him Suidas, alledge that Venus's Resentment was owing to the Lemnian Women having desisted to offer Sacrifice
to

(1) L. 2.

to her, and we know how highly the Gods thought themselves outraged by such Sort of Contempt. The Scholiast on Euripides (1), after Hyginus (2), says this Goddess was provoked at the abolishing of a Festival, which used to be celebrated in her Honour, which amounts to much the same, and was equally punishable according to the Principles of their Theology. Others in short (a), ascribe the Cause of the Goddess's Wrath to the Adventure of the Net in that Island, the Work of Vulcan, who by means thereof discovered to the Gods the Adultery of his Spouse with Mars. The learned Scholiast on Apollonius (3), says after Myrtilus of Lesbos, that it was Medea, upon the Return of the Argonauts, had infected the Women of Lemnos; but this Opinion which changes the Time of this Event, is embraced by no other Author.

Since this Adventure is generally attested, in order to reduce it to History, we need but set the Fiction of Venus's Wrath aside, and say that those Wives jealous of the Slaves who had been preferred to them, revenged themselves upon them at a Time when part of the Men in the Island were absent and engaged in the Thracian War. In this Conjunction the Argonauts arriving at Lemnos, the married Women run to the Shore to oppose their landing, upon which ensued a Skirmish (4); but our Warriors, whom the Ladies had mistaken for their Husbands, making themselves known, were kindly received by them. They spent two Years in the Island, where they had several Children, who were those Mynians I shall have occasion to speak of afterwards. Hypsiphile for her part had two by Jason, the one of whom was called Thoas after his Grandfather, the other Euneus, who commanded the Lemnians at the Siege of Troy.

From Lemnos the Argonauts went to Samothrace, first to accomplish the Vow which Orpheus had made during

(1) Upon the Trag. of Hecuba. (2) Ch. 15.

(a) Lact. upon the 5th Book of Statius's Thebaid. Val. Flacc. l. 2, &c.

(3) Upon the first Book of the Argonauts. (4) Soph. Lemn.

ing the Storm we have mentioned ; and in the second Place, because Castor and Pollux, according to Diodorus Siculus (1), were desirous to be initiated into the Mysteries that were celebrated in that Island, in order to render the Gods propitious to their Expedition.

As they were at Sea after departing from Lemnos, the Tyrrhenians gave them a bloody Battle, where all our Heroes were wounded, except Glaucus, who disappeared, and was taken into the Number of the Sea-Gods (2). From thence they entered the Hellepont, turned towards Asia, and landed upon the Coasts of the Lesser Mysia, above Treas ; and there it was that Hercules, Telamon, and Hylas lost them, as shall be more fully said afterwards (3).

From thence the Argonauts landed at Cyzicum, a City situated at the Foot of Mount Dindymus, whereof Cyzicus was King. Besides the Molions who inhabited his City, Apollonius Rhodius (4) says, there were Giants who had each six Arms and six Legs, whom Juno had made the Earth produce to be the Death of Hercules ; that is, some Pyrates who cruized upon their Coasts with six Ships, signified by the Number of their Arms and Legs ; or, which comes to the same, some Freebooters who ravaged the Country, as we learn by Polygnotus, cited by the ancient Scholiasts ; for they gave the Name of Giants to that sort of Banditti, as well as to those who were of an extraordinary Size. The King being apprized by an Oracle of the Arrival of those Strangers, gave them a favourable Reception ; and after giving them an Entertainment, and large Presents, he dismissed them ; but being driven back in the Night-time, by a contrary Wind, into the same Port, Cyzicus hearing a Ship was newly arrived, and apprehending it to be the Pelasgi his Enemies, went to attack them, and was slain in the Engagement by Jason himself, who to expiate this Bloodshed, tho' involuntary, having first given the Prince a magnificent Funeral, offered a Sacrifice to the Mother of the Gods, and

(1) L. 5. (2) Pausis in Athenæus, l. 7. c. 12. (3) See the of Hercules. (4) Loc. cit.

and built her a Temple upon Mount Dyndimus, employing therein the Water of a Fountain which the Goddess, we are told by the Poets, made to spring out of the Earth; that is, setting aside the Marvellous, which the Argonauts found in an unknown Spot of Ground. Clyte, the Wife of that King, not being able to survive the Death of a Husband whom she fondly loved, hanged herself in Despair, as we read in Apollonius and his Scholiast, who had borrowed the Story I have now related from the Periplus of Calisthenes.

After departing from Cyzicum, our Voyagers spent some time in Bebrycia, which was the old Name of Bithynia, if we may believe Servius (1). There reigned Amycus, who was wont to challenge in Gauntlet-fight those who arrived in his Dominions, Pollux accepted the Challenge; but having learned that Ambuscades were laid for him by the Prince, to take away his Life, he called one of his Companions to his Assistance, and served the King himself with his own Measure. Theocritus, in the Idyllium he has composed upon the Dioscouri (2), describes this Combat, as also Valerius Flaccus (3). Virgil, who keeps always Probability in his Eye, speaking of Butes, celebrated in the Gauntlet-fight, says he came from the Bebrycians, and valued himself on having derived his Original from Amycus (4).

After the Death of Amycus, the Argonauts set out from his Dominions to continue their Voyage; but being driven by Strefs of Weather upon the Coasts of Thrace, they landed at Salmydeffa, where reigned Phineus the Son of Phænix, a Prince old and blind, who was continually tormented by the Harpies. Some Authors make Phineus to have reigned in Bithynia; others in Arcadia; but the most common Opinion, and that which Servius follows (5), is, that he was King of Salmydeffa in Thracia. He married Cleobule, accord-

VOL. IV.

D

ing

(1) Upon the 5th of the Æneid. v. 373. (2) Idyll. 22.

(3) L. 4. (4) Æn. 5. (5) Upon the 21st Verse of the 3^d Æneid.

ing to the same Author, or Cleopatra (1) the Daughter of Orythia and Apollo, or rather of Boreas King of a Part of Thrace, and his Neighbour, and had by her two Sons Plexippus and Pandion; but having afterwards divorced this Princess and married Idea the Daughter of Dardanus (2), this cruel Step-dame, to get rid of these two Princes, accused them of having offer'd to dishonour her, and the too credulous Phineas put out their Eyes. The Gods, we are told, made use of the Northwind to be the Instrument of their Revenge, and by means thereof struck him blind; which no doubt means, that Boreas his Father-in-law retaliated upon him the same Punishment he had inflicted upon his two Sons.

As the Traditions of these antient Histories were never uniform, some Authors will have it, that Phineus was struck blind by Neptune (3), for having shewn the Argonauts the Way to Colchis; others, that it was for having disclosed the Secret of the Gods; which signifies some Piece of Indiscretion that Prince had been guilty of, like that of Tiresias. They add further, that he was at the same Time given over to the Persecution of the Harpies. These Monsters, whereof the Poets have said so much, were as Hesiod tells us, the Offspring of Taumas and Electra. They were three Sisters, Celene, Ocipeta, and Aello, who with a Woman's Face, had a Bill and crooked Claws, and a prodigious big Belly (a). They raised a Famine wherever they came, carried off the Provisions from Phineus's Table, poisoned whatever they touched, and predicted future Events.

Phineus having given a kind Reception to the Argonauts, and promised them a Guide (4) to conduct them through the Cyanean Rocks, or Symplegades, which were then reckoned extremely dangerous to pass, they offered to employ their utmost Efforts to deliver him

(1) Apollon. l. 5. (2) Apollod. (3) Apollod.

(a) Virginei volucrum vultus, fœdissima ventris
Proluvies, uncæque manus, & pallida semper
Ora fame. Virg. Æn. l. 3.

(4) Servius upon the third Æneid.

him from the Persecution of those Monsters, and Cælais and Zethes the Sons of Boreas, who had Wings, pursued them without Intermission as far as the Islands Plotæ, in the Ionian Sea; and there it was that they received an Order from the Gods by Iris, to give them no further Disturbance, but to return. This return ερόφη was the Occasion of changing the Name of those Islands, which from that Time were called Strophades.

This Fiction undoubtedly conceals some Truth; accordingly great Pains have been taken to find it out. Palephatus is of Opinion, that the Harpies were Phineus's own Daughters, who ruined him by their Debauchery. According to Servius (1), they were the Furies who incessantly reproached him for his Cruelty towards his Children; and 'tis true that Virgil confounds the Harpies with those Goddesses (2). M. le Clerc (3), takes the Harpies for a Swarm of Locusts, which after they had laid waste Bithynia and Paphlagonia, produced a Famine there; and it must be owned, that his Explication of this Fable is very ingenious. The Word Arbé, says he, of which that of Harpy is formed, signifies a Locust; and as the Northwind rid the Country of them, having driven them as far as the Ionian Sea, where they perished, hence it was fabled, that the Sons of Boreas had put them to flight. Whatever the Poets, continues he, have said of the Harpies, agrees to the Locusts. To raise Famine, is not this to carry off the Food even from the Tables of Kings? To say that they are invulnerable, is undoubtedly true in respect of their prodigious Number; that they were the Dogs of Jupiter or Juno, that they had the Gift of Prediction, and that Tartarus had thrown them out; in fine, that they returned as fast as they were pursued: What else does all this signify? but that this Plague was considered as an Effect of Divine Vengeance, which the Gods had poured forth from the Gulph of Hell, to be a sad Prognostic of Famine.

D 2 and

(1) Ibid. (2) See their History, Vol. III. B. 4. (3) Bibl. Univerf. T. 2.

and Desolation, and to make such Havock as was not in the Art of Man to prevent. And what others add of their being the Daughters of Neptune and the Earth, is agreeable to the ancient Physiology, which taught that all Insects were formed of a Mixture of Earth and Water. We may add further, that the Names given them by the Antients, wonderfully quadrate with this Explanation, since Occipeta, signifies Volatile; Celeno, Obscurity, a Cloud; and Aello, a Storm; and is it not their Nature to fly, to obscure the Air, and make greater Havock than the most violent Storms?

However happy these Conjectures are, I cannot give into them: 1st, Because the Scene of this Adventure not having been in Bithynia, but in Thrace, the Northwind cannot have driven the Harpies to the Strophades. 2^{dly}, In support of this Explication Calais and Zetbes can only be considered as allegorical Personages, against the Sentiment of all Antiquity, which takes them for Heroes, the Sons of Boreas King of Thrace, but confounded sometimes with the Wind of the same Name, and of Orythia the Daughter of Pandion King of Athens. Phineus had married their Sister, and 'tis no Wonder that finding their Brother-in-Law in the Condition we have now represented him, they assisted him with all their Might. But who then were those Harpies? For my Part, I believe Antiquity designed to figure by those pretended Monsters some turbulent and troublesome Neighbours, or rather some Pirates who made frequent Descents upon Phineus's Dominions. As, no doubt, they pillaged the Country and the Towns, they literally carried off the Provisions that were for his Use; and what accounts for their being called Juno's Dogs, is, that the Ravages they committed were considered as an Effect of celestial Vengeance. Calais and Zetbes, with a Ship which Phineus equipped, put them to flight, and pursued them to the Strophades Isles, where they destroyed them, or put out their Eyes. What Apollodorus says (1), that

(1) L. 2.

that one of the Harpies fell into the River Tygres, upon the Coasts of the Peloponnesus, since called Harpis, where she perished, undoubtedly signifies, that one of those Pirates was shipwrecked at the Mouth of that River; and what we are further told, that the other having flown as far as the Echinades, turned back, and not being able to bear up any longer, fell into the Sea, signifies that this was the Place where the second Pirate perished.

Diodorus Siculus (1) relates this Adventure, without mentioning the Harpies, he who seldom omits the ancient Fables; all he says is, that Hercules, who had not yet left the Argonauts, not being able to obtain from Phineus the Release of the young Princes whom he kept in Prison, put him to Death, and parted his Dominions between them.

After having received from Phineus seasonable Directions for the rest of their Voyage, and especially as to the Passage of the Cyaneæ or Symplegades, the Argonauts quitted Thrace, and entered into the Euxine Sea.

The Cyaneæ are two Clusters of Rocks at the Mouth of the Euxine Sea, of an irregular Figure, whereof one Part is on the Side of Asia, and the other of Europe, and which leave between them, according to Strabo (2), only a Space of twenty Furlongs; so that the Waves of the Sea, which break against them with a violent Noise, raise a Foam which darkens the Air, and makes that Passage very difficult. As the nearer you approach to an Object, or go further from it, its Extremities seem proportionably to draw nearer, or remove farther; hence the Opinion that those Rocks were moveable when seen at some Distance, and that they drew nearer to one another to swallow up Ships, which made them get the Name of Symplegades, which implies that they dashed upon one another (a); and this, Pliny tells us, was the Origine of the Fable.

D 3

Our

(1) L. 4. (2) L. 7.

(a) The same Conceptions they had of the Rocks of the Straits of Scylla, as shall be said in the History of Ulysses.

Our Voyagers, startled at the Sight of this Frith, let go a Pigeon, which happily flew across it; after which they attempted the Passage themselves. This Pigeon which the Poets speak of, was nothing else but a light Vessel Phineus had given them, and whose Pilote was well acquainted with those Straits. Nor is this a mere Conjecture, since Apollodorus expressly says, that this Prince, to fortify the Argonauts, had given them a Guide. Homer will have it, that Juno befriended them on that Occasion; which signifies, that the Air, whereof this Goddess was the Symbol, was calm and serene; and as to the additional Circumstances, 1. Of the Pigeon's having lost its Tail, and the Ship Argo a Piece of its Stern; this intimates that those two Vessels struck against one of the Rocks, by which the former lost her Rudder. 2. That from that Day Neptune fixed those Rocks; as much as to say, that the Passage once well known, there was no longer such Difficulty in attempting it; and from that Time Commerce was free in that Sea. Accordingly, if we may believe Plutarch, it was by that Voyage of the Argonauts the Commerce of the Greeks in the Euxine Sea was established, Jason having cleared it of the Pirates who infested it.

Our Voyagers, leaving this Pass, turned towards Asia, and landed in the Country of the Mariandinians, where Lycus, who was their King, and a Greek by Birth, gave them a favourable Reception; but during their Stay in that Country, they lost two of their Companions; Idmon the Son of Abas, who died of a Wound from a Boar, and the Pilote Tiphis. They gave them a magnificent Funeral; and after substituting Anceus in Tiphis's Stead, they reimbarked, and a Storm having driven our Heroes upon the Island of Arecia, they found there the Children of Phryxus, whom Ætes their Grandfather was sending into Greece to inherit their Father's Estate, and carried them back to Colchis, after a sharp Encounter with certain Fowls; which, according to Apollonius Rhodius and Pomponius Mela, darted deadly Quills at a Distance; stance ; that is, no doubt, with the Inhabitants of that Island, who pursued them with Showers of Darts. Nothing remarkable befel them from the Island of Mars, till they came to Æea, the Capital of Colchis, the Theater of their great Adventures.

C H A P. II.

What happened to the Argonauts in Colchis.

WHILE Jason and his Companions passed the Night in deliberating after what Manner they should present themselves next Day to the King, and what Way they should take to demand the Effects which Phryxus had left at his Death. Æetes, on his Side, hearing of their Arrival, and of the Motive of their Expedition, and moreover terrified by an unhappy Dream, was contriving Means how to destroy them, or at least their Chief, as the most interested in the Affair. Thus when the Argonauts appeared before him, that Prince, upon Jason's demanding the Golden Fleece, prescribed to him such hard Conditions, that he was hopeful he would either desist from his Purpose, or perish in the Execution. There is nothing in all this but what is natural ; but as the Relation of this Voyage was probably written in that antient Language of Greece, which was almost the same with that which Cadmus introduced thither, I mean the Phœnician, those who came afterwards to read it, finding in it many Expressions which they did not understand, and which offered several Senses, embraced that which appeared the most marvellous ; and upon occasion of an Adventure quite simple, broached Fables no less extraordinary than difficult to be explained. The Poets especially who borrowed from this History the Subject of their Poems, or of their Tragedies, sought to embellish it. The Interposition of the Gods, so common in Works of Antiquity, and Love, those two great Springs, were the Machinery they employed. Apollonius Rhodius, and Onomacritus, probably after other more antient Poets, for the Argonaut Orpheus himself had composed a Poem upon this Subject, tell us, that Juno, who loved Jason, and Minerva agreed together that it was necessary to make Medea fall in love with Jason, not doubting but that she, who was perfectly Mistress of the Art of Incantments, would happily extricate him from the Dangers to which he was going to be exposed. In the mean time Jason and Medea meet together without the City, near the Temple of Hecate, whither both of them had repaired to implore the Assistance of the Goddess; and Medea, who was already beginning to conceive a fond Regard for Jason, promises him all Manner of Assistance, if he will plight his Faith to her. After mutual Oaths they parted, and Medea goes to prepare whatever was necessary for the Preservation of her Paramour; for the King had prescribed, that before he could have the Golden Fleece, in quest of which he had come so far, he was first to put under the Yoke two Bulls, a Present from Vulcan, which had Feet and Horns of Brass, and vomited Clouds of Fire and Smoke; fasten them to a Plough of Adamant-stone, and make them plough up two Acres of a Field consecrated to Mars, which had never been cultivated, there to sow the Teeth of a Dragon, whence armed Men were to spring up, who were all to be exterminated without so much as one of them being left (a); lastly, to slay the Monster that waked continually for the Preservation of that sacred Depositum, and to execute all these Labours in one Day. Jason, secure of Medea's Assistance, accepted all, and the next Morning an Assembly is held without the City in the Field of Mars. The King on one Side, accompanied with a Multitude of his Subjects, came up to be Spectator of the Combat; on the other, the Leader of the Argonauts, with all his Associates, full of Consternation at seeing seeing the Danger to which he was going to expose himself. The Bulls are let loose, whose very Sight made the Spectators tremble. Jason tames them, puts them under the Yoke, ploughs the Field, sows therein the Teeth of Mars's Dragon ; and when he sees the Combatants spring up, throws a Stone among them, which puts them into such Fury, that they kill one another ; goes next in quest of the Monster that kept the Golden Fleece, laid him asleep by means of enchanted Herbs and a prepared Draught, which his Lover had given him, puts him to Death, and carries off the precious Treasure ; returns victorious to his Ship, where Medea having come to him by Night, he sets sail, and goes off with her.

(a) These, according to some Mythologists, were the Teeth of that Dragon of Mars's Fountain, which Cadmus had slain, and a Part whereof Minerva had given to Æetes, to destroy him who should one Day come on purpose to carry off the Golden Fleece.

It might be said, that all these Fables are nothing but the mere Invention of the Poets, who, contrary in that to the Historians, never recount the Facts which are the Foundation of their Poems without Machinery. However, the celebrated Bochart, who perfectly understood the Genius of the Eastern Languages, thinks he has found in that of the Phœnicians a Key to most of these Fictions ; and as no body has succeeded better than he in the Explanation of this Fable, I shall set before the Reader his Thoughts. Medea, whom Jason had promised to marry, and to carry along with him to Greece, at the Solicitation of Calciope her Sister, Phryxus's Widow, who saw her Children a Prey to the Avarice of a cruel Tyrant, assisted her Paramour to rob her Father's Treasures, either by giving him a false Key, or in some other Manner, and set sail with him.

This History was written, as has been already said, in Phœnician, which the Poets, who came long after, understood not, and 'tis the equivocal Words of that Language that gave Rise to the Fable which I have now recited. For, in that Language the Syrian Word Gaza (1) signifies literally a Treasure : Saur, which imports a Wall, signifies also a Bull, and in that Language, Brass, Iron, and a Dragon, are all expressed by the

(1) Boch. Phaleg. l. 4. c. 31.

the Word Nachas : Thus, instead of saying that Jason had carried off a Treasure, which the King of Colchis had in a Place well secured, and which he carefully kept, they fabled, that in order to carry off a Golden Fleece, he was put to the Necessity of taming Bulls, slaying a Dragon, and the rest. Medea's love to Jason, this great Spring, which Eliau takes to have been the Invention of Euripides in the Tragedy of Medea, composed at the Desire of the Corinthians, has nothing in it but what is common ; and that Princess, who left her Father and her Country to follow Jason, makes it plain, by this Conduct of hers, that she was in love with him, without any Occasion of bringing in Juno and Minerva in this Intrigue, which was the Work of Calciopé, who, to revenge the Death of her Husband, and to save her Children, whom Æetes resolved to put to Death upon their Return from Greece, whither he had sent them, as I have said, exerted all her Endeavours to promote the Passion which her Sister had conceived for Jason. We may further add, that the four young Princes whom he had brought back into Colchis, seeing themselves exposed to the Fury of their Grandfather, if the Greeks were overcome, assisted them to the utmost of their Power.

The same Bochart gives a very happy Explication of the Circumstance of the armed Men who sprung out of the Earth, and killed one another. There must have been, says he, in this History a Phrase consisting nearly of Words that signify, Jason drew together an Army of Soldiers, armed with Brazen Pikes, ready to fight, which they explained thus by means of equivocal Words : He saw spring up from the Teeth of Serpents, an Army of five Men, or rather of armed Soldiers ranged by Fives, which was the ancient Manner, especially among the Egyptians, of marshalling and marching Troops. Thus we may very reasonably conjecture, that Jason, besides his Companions, had raised in the Country some auxiliary Troops, which were given out to be sprung out of the Earth, because they were Subjects of the King of Colchis, and of the same Country, and who perished in the Battle that was probably fought between the Greeks and the Colchans: For this whole poetical Mystery which I have set forth, may very well be understood of a Battle which made the Greeks victorious, and Masters of Æetes's Person and Treasures. This Explanation is undoubtedly preferable to that of Diodorus Siculus (1), who says the Keeper of the Golden Fleece was named Draco, and that the Troops which served him had come from the Tauric Chersonesus, which gave Rise to the Fables I have been now explaining.
and

We have observed, in the History of Cadmus, that the antient Poets introduced into it the same Fable of those armed Men, sprung from the Teeth of Mars's Dragon, who killed one another, all but five; because, in fact, such another Adventure having happened to that Leader of the Colony, with the Assistance of Troops which he had levied in Beotia, was writ in the same Language, and probably pretty much in the same Terms with that of Jason.

I know it is not generally agreed that the Golden Fleece was nothing but the King of Colchis's Treasure. Diodorus Siculus is of Opinion, that it was the Fleece of a Ram which Phryxus had sacrificed, and which was kept very carefully, because an Oracle had foretold, that the King would be slain by him who should carry it off. Strabo and Justin thought the Foundation of the Fable of this Fleece was, that in Colchis there were Streams which rolled a golden Sand, which they gathered with Sheep's Skins, as is the Practice at this Day about Fort-Louis, where the Gold Dust is collected with such Fleeces, which, when well filled therewith, may be considered as golden Fleeces. Varro and Pliny will have it, that this Fable derives its Original from the fine Wool of those Countries, and that the Expedition which some Greek Merchants had undertaken in quest thereof, had given Rise to the Fiction. We may add, that as the Colchans had great Traffic
in

(1) Lib. 4.

in Marten's Skins, and other Furs, this perhaps was the Motive of the Argonautic Expedition.

Palephatus (1) imagines, I know not upon what Foundation, that under the Emblem of the Golden Fleece, was designed a fine golden Statue which the Mother of Pelops had procured, and which Phryxus had carried with him into Colchis.

Lastly, Suidas reckons that the Golden Fleece was, a Parchment Book, containing the Secret of making Gold, a proper Object to inflame the Ambition, or rather the Covetousness, not only of the Greeks, but of the whole Earth ; and this Opinion, which Tollius thought to have revived, is followed by all the Alchymists.

C H A P. III.

The Return of the Argonauts into Greece.

JASON having happily accomplished all his Designs, was now solicitous to be gone, and how to conceal his Departure ; thus taking Advantage of a dark Night, when Medea and those who accompanied her, had repaired to his Ship with Æetes's Treasures, he quickly set sail, not doubting but that he would soon be pursued. Accordingly he was so : The King quickly fitted out some Ships, which set out under the Command of Abfyrthus his Son, with a View to pursue the Ravisher. He very soon overtook him ; but Jason, according to Oronacritus, having landed with his Brother-in-law, conveyed him with Medea into some remote Place, under Pretext of treating of an Accommodation, where he and Medea assassinated him, and scattered the Members of his Body along the Way to retard the March of his Pursuers ; after which they re-imbarked.

This Fact is undoubtedly the Invention of the Poets now quoted, since we shall find afterwards, that Abfyrthus pursued the Ship Argo for a long Time. Further, the Character of Medea, which I shall give in a particular

(1) De Incred. c. 31.

cular Chapter, where I shall shew, that she was by no means such a bad Woman as some Poets have represented her, especially Euripides, corrupted by the Corinthian Money, will remove the very Suspicion of so barbarous an Action.

His Return into Greece is told by antient Poets in several Ways very different one from another; and however extravagant their Relations are, yet they had all the good Luck to find in the Places which they make him to pass through, Monuments to confirm that Heroe's having been there; and their Relations have been adopted either in whole or in part, by grave Historians, such as Hecateus of Miletus, Timagetes, Timeus, &c. Strabo himself, who gives no Credit to them, mentions however Monuments found in the Places where the Poets now cited make him to have passed.

Onomacritus makes him to have cruised along the Eastern Coasts of Asia, sailed through the Cimmerian Bosphorus, and the Palus Meotis; whence having entered certain Straits, they passed there nine Days, at the End of which they were got into the Northern Ocean, where the Wind failing them, they were obliged to land, and lay up their Ship. Some time after a gentle Gale invited them to put again to Sea, and they sailed on, still keeping to the Left, and arrived at the Island Peucestes, which was not unknown to the Pilote Anceus: From thence to that of Circe, where Jason sent out for Intelligence, had an Interview with that Princess, who after informing him that all his Misfortunes were owing to the Murder of Absyrthus, from which, however, she refused to expiate him, they continued their Course, arrived at Hercules's Pillars, re-entered the Mediterranean, passed near Sicily, and fell into the Straits of Scylla and Charybdis, where they would infallibly have been shipwreck'd, if Tethys, to prevent the Calamity with which her Husband Peleus was threatned, had not extricated them from it. The Seat of the Sirens, which is not far from thence, was like to have been as fatal to them as the Straits; but Orpheus's Eloquence saved them from that Peril. Having
ing

ing escaped this new Danger, they arrived in the Country of the Pheacians, where they met with the Enemy's Fleet, which was come by another Way to wait for them. The Commanders of that Fleet demanded of him Medea, and it was agreed on both Sides, that Jason should be obliged to deliver her up to them, if he had not actually married her. But the Wife of Alcinous, who was chosen Judge, having got the Nuptials celebrated that same Night; and having declared to the Deputies from the Enemy's Fleet, that she certainly knew that Jason and Medea had been married from the Time of his carrying her off, they were obliged to let him keep her, and return. In the meantime, our Adventurers departed from the Island of the Pheacians, and were now arrived in the Gulf of Ambracia, when a Storm drove them upon the Quick-sands of Africa, where they underwent a vast Number of Dangers. At length having got clear of so hazardous a Place, they made the Cape Malea, where was performed the Expiation for Absyrtus's Murder, as Circe had enjoined them, after which they arrived upon the Coasts of Thessaly.

How improbable soever this Voyage is, especially for a Period of Time when Navigation was but little improved, that which Apollonius Rhodius makes them accomplish, is still more so. Juno, says that Poet, having a Mind to deliver the Argonauts from the Danger which they were in from the Fleet of Absyrtus, which was in Pursuit of them, was turning the Ship Argo towards Greece, when they called to mind that Phineus had bid them return home by a different Way from that which they had taken in going to Colchis; that this Course had been marked out by the Priests of Thebes in Egypt; that from that Country had antiently come a Conqueror, who after having over-run Europe and Asia, and conquered many Countries, had founded several Cities, and among others Æea the Capital of Colchis; that those antient People shewed Pillars whereon were engraved the Roads and Courses from and to all Places both by Sea and Land that were accessible, which Pillars intimated, that there was at the Extremities of the Ocean a vast River, of a very extensive Course. This River was the Danube, into which they entered by one of its Mouths, while Absyrthus, whom that Poet makes to have been then dead in the Manner above mentioned, entered thither by another Mouth, and went up the River for several Leagues. Then the River failing them, they landed, and carried their Ship for upwards of fifty Leagues, as far as the Adriatic Gulf, where they met with Absyrthus, who had got before them; and there it was, according to this Poet, that Jason put him to Death, much in the same Manner as Onomacritus relates.

It was after this Murder an Oracle was delivered from the Beam that had grown in the Forest of Dodona, letting them know that they were not to get home till Jason had submitted to the Ceremony of Expiation: Upon which, they thought fit to steer their Course another Way, and landed in the Port of Æea, the Seat of Circe, Sister to the King of Colchis, and Aunt to Medea. This Princess received her Niece with Jason without knowing them: They both advanced with downcast Eyes, and without uttering a single Word, till they came up to the sacred Hearth, where Jason fixed in the Ground the Sword wherewith he had killed Absyrthus. Their Silence, and the Posture in which they appeared, made Circe apprehend that they were Criminals, and therefore she prepared herself to give them Expiation. First, she ordered to be brought a young Pig, not yet weaned, and having cut the Throat of it, rubbed the Hands of Jason and Medea with its Blood, and performed the usual Libations in Honour of Jupiter Expiator. After which, having thrown out of the Palace the Remains of the Sacrifice, she burnt upon the Altar Cakes baked with Meal, Water, and Salt, and accompanied all these Ceremonies with Prayers proper to appease the Gods. The Expiation ended, she made her Guests sit down to an Entertainment; but afterwards, coming to understand that Medea was her Niece, she expelled her with Jason, without however doing them any Harm, because they had implored her Protection in the Posture of Suppliants.
with-

Leaving this Seat, they again put to Sea, made a prosperous enough Voyage for some Time ; and they were just almost arrived on the Coasts of Greece, when a Storm drove them upon the Quick-sands of Africa, from which they had the greatest Difficulty imaginable to extricate themselves. However, they got clear of them at length, and arrived happily in Greece.

Lastly, a third Tradition, after making the Argonauts go up the Phasis a second Time, brings them to visit several Countries of Asia, where they left many Footsteps of their Rout. However void of Probability these three Relations seem to be, they deserve some Reflections. First, That of Onomacritus, which makes our Heroes return by the northern Ocean, is plainly a Fiction, which demonstrates, that in the Time of that Poet the northern Countries were but little known. That the Argonauts entred by the Euxine Sea into the Palus Meotis, has nothing strange in it : 'Tis even possible that they might have for some Time gone up the Tanais ; but to imagine it possible by that River to go as far as the Ocean, is the Height of Ignorance, and a childish Fiction which the Author has introduced, only to give him an Opportunity of describing to us the People of those distant Countries so far as they were known in his Time ; People to the most of whom we are intire Strangers, and who had not so much as an Existence in the Time when Onomacritus is said to have lived ; while the Situation of others is only placed at a Venture in the Relation of this Expedition. I shall not enter into any Detail with respect to all the Nations which the Argonauts light upon in this Rout of theirs, and which the Author barely mentions, without saying any thing particular about their Manners or Customs. Herodotus alone is sufficient to rectify the greatest Part of this Relation. What Onomacritus says of the Macrobiani is fully explained in the two Dissertations which the Abbé Gedouyn and I have made upon the Hyperboreans. As to the Cimmerians, who inhabited

inhabited near the Bosphorus of that Name, this Poet, in Imitation of Homer, has placed them in the Ocean, because possibly it was known even in their Time, that a People could not be buried in Darkness, unless they inhabited nearer the Pole than the Bosphorus is. I say nothing of the other geographical Errors with which this Poet may be charged, because they are obvious; far less of the Conveyance of the Ship by Land, which appears a mere Fiction; but I ought not to pass over in Silence what Apollonius Rhodius says of those Pillars of Colchis, upon which were engraved all the Routs known in that Time; this Fact relating to Sesostris, who actually extended his Conquests as far as the Phasis, and left there several Monuments of no less Magnificence than Utility. This Poet having spent most of his Life in Egypt in Quality of Librarian to Ptolemy Philadelphus, had undoubtedly in his Possession the History of Sesostris; and tho' this was posterior to the Argonautic Expedition, he might, by way of Anticipation, speak of the Monuments which that Conqueror left in Colchis: For which, besides Herodotus, I refer to Syncellus, Jamblicus, Huetius (1), and several other Authors. The antient Commentator on Apollonius Rhodius, gives the Name of Sethoncosis to the Prince who had erected these Pillars, who is the same with Sesostris.

I might content myself with these general Reflections upon the two Poets, and the Historians who have spoke of the Return of the Argonauts; but as among the Fables with which they have interspersed the Relation of this Voyage, there are some that may be reduced to History, I hope it will not be ill taken that I attempt to explain them.

I begin with that of Abfyrthus. The Murder of this young Prince, sent by his Father in pursuit of those who had carried away the Golden Fleece, is so variously related by those who have had Occasion to speak of this Expedition, that there is little Doubt of its being a mere Fiction. That Medea, or Jason, or both together, laid a Plot to put him to Death; that after having assassinated him, they cut his Body in Pieces, and strewed them in the Way of the Colchians, that they might spend Time in gathering up the scattered Members, and thereby be retarded in their Pursuit; all this appears to be fabulous. The Authors of this Murder, by making use of that Stratagem, instead of retarding, would much more have hastened the Pursuit of the Colchians, who would probably have deferred the gathering up of those sad Remains of their Chief, till they had overtaken and punished the Criminals. Thus, with respect to this Pursuit, I prefer the Opinion of those of the Antients who tell us there was an Engagement upon the Euxine Sea, when the Fleet of Æetes had joined the Argonauts, wherein that Prince and his Son were slain; which left our Voyagers the Liberty to return into Greece by the same Way they came; thus they landed at the Cape of Malea, as Herodotus expressly says (1).

What we read in Pindar (2), that the Argonauts arriving near the Coasts of Greece, were assailed by a Storm which drove them upon the Coasts of Africa, is the more probable, that Herodotus, and some other Historians, are agreed with that Poet; but whether it was in their Return, or at their first setting out, is not easy to determine. Herodotus, who advances this Fact, is not clear enough upon this Article. We may suppose it happened not long after their setting out. That Author, speaking of the River Triton, which discharges itself into the Lake Tritonis, where is an Island which was called Phla, says it was believed that this Island must have been inhabited by the Lacedæmonians; and he adds, it was reported by Tradition, that when Jason had built at the Foot of Mount Pelion the Ship which was called Argo, and had stowed in it a Hecatombe and a Tripod of Brass, he undertook the Voyage to Delphi by the Tour of Peloponnesus; that taking his Rout by the Promontory of Malea, the North-wind drove him upon Libya, where he found his Ship run aground in the Lake Tritonis; and while he was endeavouring to extricate himself, a Triton appeared to him, and told him, that if he would give him the Tripod he had in his Ship, he would shew him how to get clear of this Danger; upon which, Jason agreeing to the Proposal, gave him the Tripod, which the Triton laid up in his Temple, and foretold Jason and his Crew, that when one of their Descendants should carry off that Tripod, it was fixed by Fate that there should be a hundred Greek Towns built upon the Lake Tritonis; in fine, that the Libyans being informed of this Oracle, kept the Tripod carefully concealed.

ing

(1) L. 4. (2) Pyth. 4.

I shall first make some Reflexions upon this Narration. The first is, that if this Adventure is true, it must have happened not long after the Departure of the Greeks, as has been said; and 'tis natural to believe so, from the Hecatomb which Jason had stowed in his Ship, which would have greatly encumbered him in his Expedition; besides, it was destined for a Sacrifice to Apollo for obtaining a prosperous Voyage, according to the Practice of those Times, and if so, then Medea was not at that Time with the Argonauts, as Pindar tells us (a). 2. Though little Stress is to be laid upon a Story which Herodotus relates upon the Faith of another, without seeming to adopt it, yet, as it was the Consequence of an antient Tradition, and stood connected with Events which we learn from History, 'tis better to explain the fabulous Circumstances thereof than to reject it.

'Tis certain in Fact, as far as may be affirmed of the Events of that Time, that the Argonauts landed in that Part of Libya which is called Cyrenaicum. Being embarrassed in a difficult Pass, they had the Assistance

E 2

of

(a) See Page 53. where Pindar supposes that Medea, in whose Mouth he puts a Prediction, was then with the Argonauts.

of the People of the Country to help them to get clear of it. This Fable is clothed in a fabulous Dress; the Poets hardly venting any Thing but under the Veil of Fiction. The Triton who appeared to them under a human Form, was a Prince who reigned in that Place, whom Pindar and his Scholiast name Eurypilus. He gave good Instructions to our Heroes to avoid the Sand Banks which lie in the Syrtes and thereabout. This is the whole Mystery: The Prediction which they put in his Mouth having only been invented after the Event; that is, after the Greeks were settled in that Part of Africa, and had built Cities there.

The Sea-Goddesses and the Genii, whom Apollonius makes also to appear to our Voyagers, are the Inhabitants of that Coast who assisted them; and that Horse unyoked from Neptune's Chariot, whose Tract he ordered them to follow, is a Ship detached from Eurypilus's Fleet, which served them for a Guide. This Horse was feigned to have Wings, and to cut the Air with vast Rapidity, which denotes the Swiftneſs of the Ship: For how is it poſſible otherwiſe to reconcile what we read in the Poet now named, of the Argonauts having carried their Ship, being ordered at the ſame Time to follow the Traces of a Horse which went as faſt as the ſwifteſt Bird?

Our Heroes, in Gratitude for the ſignal Service done them by Eurypilus, made him a Preſent of the Tripod above mentioned. Diodorus, who alſo ſpeaks of it, ſays there was upon the Tripod an Inſcription in very antient Characters, and adds, that it was preſerved to the lateſt Times among the People called Hesperitans, in Cyrenaicum.

Pindar, intending to write a Panegyric upon Arceſilæus King of Cyrene, one of the Deſcendants of Euphemus that celebrated Argonaut mentioned elſewhere, quite forgets his Heroe, and runs out at great Length upon the Adventures that beſel the Argonauts, eſpecially in Africa, relating the Hiſtory of that Clod of Earth which the Triton gave them; but he differs from Apollonius Rhodius, who wrote not till after him. The Triton, says Pindar, charmed with the Tripod given him by the Argonauts, beg'd them not to set out till he should have Time to go and fetch them the Presents which every Host is bound to make to his Guests ; but those Princes, whom a favourable Wind perhaps invited to set sail, not having allowed him Time, he took a Clod of Earth and gave to Euphemus. When the Argonauts had arrived near the Island Calisthé, the fatal Clod drop'd into the Sea, and Medea foretold Euphemus that this Incident would retard the Settlement of his Posterity in Libya.
ſays

For understanding this Prediction of Medea, we must relate here what we are told by Historians, of the Descendants of the Argonauts, and of the Women of Lemnos, whom the Antients called the Mynians. The Pelasgi, says Dionysius of Halicarnassus (1), having made themselves Masters of that Island, expelled them from it, in the fourth Generation after the Passage of the Argonauts. Being forced to quit their Country, they put to Sea, as we read in Herodotus (2), and passed into Laconia. The Lacedemonians perceiving them near Mount Taygetus, where they had lighted up Fires, sent a Deputation to them ; and hearing that they were the Descendants of the Argonauts, who were coming in quest of their Relations, they received them into their City, upon Account of Castor and Pollux. But these new Guests having become factious, were banished the City, and came most of them and settled in the Island Calisthé, named afterwards the Island of Thera.

From the Island Calisthé the Argonauts happily arrived on the Coasts of Thessaly, whence they set out. Peleus having died in the Voyage, Acastes his Son engaged his Companions before their Separation to celebrate Funeral Games in Honour of his Father ; and as Pausanias (3) gives the Description thereof, we shall here set down his Words.

“ Behind the Place which represented the Palace of “ Amphiaraus, upon the Coffer of the Cypselides, is

(1) L. 1. (2) L. 4. (3) In Eliac. l. 1.

“ to be seen a Multitude of Spectators, in the midst
 “ of whom is Hercules sitting upon a Throne. Behind “ him, is a Woman playing upon the Pbrygian Flute, “ as appears from an Inscription. Petus, the Son of “ Perieres, (he was only his Grandson) and Asterion
 “ the Son of Cometes, each mounted on a Chariot, “ are urging their Steeds in the Race : Pollux, Adme- “ tus, and Euphemus are disputing for the same Prize.
 “ And we see it is the last that gains the Victory.
 “ On another side Admetus and Mopsus the Sons of “ Ampysus are engaged in the Gauntlet-fight ; between “ them is a Man playing upon the Flute. The “ wrestling Match is between Jason and Peleus ; they “ seem to be of equal Strength. Eurybotus is in the “ Posture of a Man throwing a Coit. Melanion, “ Neotheus, Pbalarus, Argius and Iphiclus are the “ five who seem to have disputed the Prize of the “ Foot-race : Iphiclus wins the Prize, and Acastes is “ putting a Crown upon his Head. This Iphiclus
 “ was the Father of Protesilaus, who went to the Siege “ of Troy. We see also in the same Picture several “ Tripods for the Conquerors. The Daughters of “ Pelias join in those Games, one of whom is named “ in the Inscription ; namely Alcestes. Jolaus the Com“ panion of Hercules in his Labours, carries the Prize
 “ of the Chariot-race, and this closes the Funeral-
 “ Games of Pelias.”

The same Author adds (1), that Glaucus the Son of Sisyphus, had been trod down by his Horses in the same Games ; but he says nothing of the literary Contests that accompanied them : Acesander however, cited by Plutarch (2), will have it that this Sort of Match was likewise exhibited there, wherein the Poets disputed the Prize, in reading their Tetralogia ; and this no doubt, is the most antient Example that can be cited of this literary Trial, so much used afterwards in the Games of Greece.

The Argonauts before they separated (3), entered into a Confederacy against all who should have any Quarre

(1) In Eliac. L. 2. (2) In Symp. (3) L. 4.

Quarrel with them; and to make it the more solemn, Hercules convened them in the Plains of Ælis, there to celebrate the Olympic Games, which had been interrupted for a long Time, as they likewise were afterwards. Jason consecrated in the Isthmus of Corinth to the God of the Sea, the Ship Argo, which the Poets have since placed in the Heavens, as may be seen in Hyginus, and in the first Verses of Valerius Flaccus.

C H A P. IV.

The Date of this Event.

AS the Date of this Event may cast a great Light upon the Age whereof I am now writing the History, I shall endeavour to settle it with some Accuracy. But the Difficulty that occurs here is very great: The Learned have embraced different Opinions as to this Æra; some removing it too far from the Trojan War, for it is enough if we can determine its Distance from that Event; others again bringing it too near; that is to say, the first set it at the Distance of 96 Years from it, with Eusebius; and others only 20 Years, with Joseph Scaliger; both which are equally contrary to what I am going to demonstrate.

If the Date of Hercules's Death, assigned by Apollodorus (1), who makes that Heroe to have died 53 Years before the Taking of Troy, was once fixed, and the Space of four or five Years were to be allowed for what he did from the Expedition of the Argonauts to his Death, this Conquest would then have fallen out about 58 Years before the taking of Troy; which cannot be admitted. 'Tis true Velleius Paterculus (2), makes Hercules to have died only forty Years before that War, to which if we add the five Years I have mentioned, the Æra we want, would fall in the Year 44 or 45; but this Distance is still too great, and is inconsistent, tho' less than the rest, with the most incontestable Records of Antiquity with relation to the

E 4

Age

(1) Clem. of Alex. Strom. l. 1. (2) L. 2.

Age in Question. For in fine, how can we think otherwise of two Events, in the last of which, we find a good Number of the same Warriors, several of their Sons, and only a few of their Grandsons, but that they were much nearer to one another than several Authors allow, namely, at the Distance of not above 34 or 35 Years; much in the same Way as we judge of the War in 1701, and that in 1734, where we have seen the same Warriors, their Sons, and some of their Grandsons. Now this is precisely the Case of the Argonauts, and the Captains in the Trojan War, according to all Antiquity, beginning with Homer.

Among the Warriors who joined in both Expeditions, I reckon first Philoctetes, who without dispute was of the Number of the Argonauts, and concurred in the Siege of Troy after Ulysses brought him from Lemnos where he had been left, and who consequently went twice to that Island, as we have it in Valerius Flaccus (a). I shall even make it appear in the particular History of this Heroe, that he survived the taking of Troy a long Time. Euryalus the Son of Mecestheus, and Grandson of Talaus, the same who had been present at the Conquest of the Golden Fleece, commanded the Argives with Diomedes at the Siege of Troy: I say the same, since Homer gives him the same Genealogy with that now mentioned.

Tho' Nestor is named among Jason's Companions only by Valerius Flaccus (1), he is at least to be reckoned in the Number of their Contemporaries. He had seen his Country laid waste by Hercules, he had been at the Battle of the *Centaur*s, and at the Hunting of Calydon; two Events, whereof the one preceded, and the other followed soon after the Expedition of the Argonauts.

Tho' Castor and Pollux two of the principal Argo- nauts,

(a) *Tu quoque Phryxos, vidco, Pæantie Colchos,
Bis Lemnum visure petis: nunc Patris — — Inchytus, Herculeas olim moture sagittas.*

Val. Flac. l. 1. v. 39.

(1) L. 1. & l. 6.

nauts, were not present at the Trojan War, they may serve for the same Synchronism, since they died only at the Beginning of that War, or not long before it, and even died very young. Helen, their twin Sister, who must have been about the Age of 15 or 16 Years, when her Brothers embarked with Jason, was at the taking of that City, being then not very old, as I shall prove in her History.

We are to think the same of Priam, who had been Witness to the Taking of Troy by Hercules, at the very Time of the Expedition of the Argonauts, and was then of Age fit to govern; for 'tis no where said that Hercules, who left him the Crown after he had put Laomedon to Death, gave him at the same Time a Tutor. Anchises had also been witness to this Expedition of Hercules; as Virgil makes him say at the Time when Aeneas was advising him to leave Troy with him.

- - - - - Satis una, superque
Vidimus excidia, & captæ superavimus urbi (1).

I find also among those who joined in both the Expeditions, Ascalaphus and Falmenus, both Sons of Mars; for as Apollodorus (2) reckons them in the Number of the Argonauts, so Homer (3), who gives them the same Father and Mother, Mars and Astioché, tells us that they were at the Siege of Troy, where they commanded the Beotians of Aspledon and Orchomenos a City of Mynias. What is also singular in this, the same Apollodorus (4) reckons these two Princes in the Number of Helen's Lovers, who came to Sparta to make Proposals of Marriage to her, a new Argument that several Persons had seen both the Events now in Debate. It may be objected that these two Princes were Grandsons of the Argonaut Aëtor, by their Mother Astioché; but in answer to this, it is no rare Thing for the Grandsons, especially on the side of the Daughters, to perform their first Campaigns with their Grandfathers.

Theseus,

(1) Æn. l. 2. (2) Bibl. l. 1. (3) Iliad. l. 2. (4) L. 3.

Theseus, who had been of the Number of the Argonauts, or at least had joined in the War between the *Centaur*s and Lapithæ, died indeed some time before the Siege of Troy; but he might have been there for Age, since his Mother Æthra was at Troy when the City was taken, the Slave of Helen, from the Time that Castor and Pollux had delivered their Sister, to whose Care Theseus had committed her. Plutarch I know contradicts the Authors who assert this; but a historical Monument quoted by Pausanias (a), shews that this was a current Tradition. This Monument was a Picture of Polygnotus, representing the taking of Troy, wherein among several other Personages, was to be seen at Helen's Side, Æthra the Mother of Theseus, with her Head shaved, and Demophoon the Son of Theseus, who, as far as one can judge from his Attitude, was contriving how he might set her at Liberty. The Poet Lescheus, from whom the Painter had got those Facts, as Pausanias remarks, said in his Poems, that after the taking of Troy, Æthra came into the Grecian Camp; that she was known there to Demophoon the Son of Theseus, who ask'd her Liberty from Agamemnon, and obtained it from him, with Helen's Consent. This fact, if true, is the most proper to determine the nearness of the two Events in Question; for here is the Mother of a Contemporary of the Argonauts, who outlived the Destruction of Troy. Nor is Pausanias the only one who attests this Fact, since we find it in the tragic Poets, in Lescheus, Cleon (1), and in the Historian Isthor (2).

According to Servius, here is another Argonaut who was also alive after the taking of Troy; namely, Eryx, whom Eneas saw in Sicily. In fine, if the Argonaut Peleus was not present at the Trojan War, he was however then very vigorous, and survived the taking of that City many Years, since the Chronicle of Paros observes, that seven Years after he banished his Son Teucer from his Court.

These

(a) In Phocic. See also the tragic Authors who relate the same Fact.

(1) Var. Hist. l. 4. c. 5. (2) Attic. l. 3.

These are the Argonauts or their Contemporaries, who either were, or might have been, present at both Expeditions; thus reckoning only thirty four or thirty five Years between them, those Heroes, as yet very young at the first, will have been Fifty five or Sixty Years of Age at the End of the second, some over, some under, and this is nearly the Age that Homer gives them. As for Priam, Nestor, and some others who were older, it is because they were already Men full grown at the Time of the War of the *Centaur*s, and of the Expedition to Colchis, while most of the rest, as Castor and Pollux, were in the Bloom of Youth. To which purpose, 'tis proper to observe, that when the Poet now named says Nestor had seen two Ages of Men, and was then living in the third, he means that he had seen a Revolution of two Generations, that is Sixty or Sixty-six Years; and if he was in the Middle of the third, he must have been about Seventy-five or Eighty Years.

Almost all the other Captains of the Grecian Army were either Sons of the Argonauts, or of their Contemporaries. Teucer and Ajax were the Sons of Telamon who had embarked with the Argonauts. Schedius and Epistropius had for their Father Iphitus the Argonaut: Agapenor was the Son of the Pilote Anceus: Thespius, of Eurytus; Thoas, of Andremon: Tlepolemus, of Hercules and Astioché: Achilles, whom all the Antients allow to have been at the Siege of Troy while he was very young, was however born before the setting out of the Argonauts, to whom Chiron presented him, as has been said; and consequently we may conclude, that when Ulysses found him out in the Isle of Scyros, and brought him to Troy, he was about Thirty-five Years; which perfectly well agrees with the Age of Pyrrhus his Son, who probably was about Seventeen or Eighteen Years when he arrived at Troy, in the tenth Year of the Siege.

Podarces was the Son of the Argonaut Iphiclus: Eumenes, of Admetus, Jason's Contemporary: Polypates, of Pirithous: Diomedes, of Tydeus; Ulysses, of Laertes likewise wife Contemporary with Jason; and if Glaucus was only Bellerophon's Grandson, 'tis certain that his Father Hippelocbus was still alive. In fine, Calchas was the Son of the Argonaut Testor, and all these Sons were, as Homer tells us, in the Flower of their Age. I say nothing of the Grandsons, who are not above two or three, some of whose Grandfathers were even still alive. I have therefore good reason to maintain that there was between those two Expeditions but an Interval of Thirty-four or Thirty-five Years, or to speak the Language of those Times, that the last happened but one Generation after the first; and I dare challenge those who are of the contrary Opinion, to advance any thing as certain against the Synchronisms now offered. I know there are vast difficulties in reconciling the Chronology of the Age now in question; but weighing one Difficulty against another, the Opinion I have established is loaded with fewer than all the rest.

C H A P. V.

The Continuation of the Adventures of Jason and Medea.

THE Sequel of Jason's History is told by the Antients in so many different Ways, that 'tis not easy to establish any thing certain upon this Head, from the Return of the Argonauts; that of Medea especially, is interspersed with a Number of Fictions which destroy one another. Here she is a cruel inhuman Princess, the Murderer of her Brother and of Pelias, having obliged her own Daughters to cut his Throat under pretext of making him renew his Youth; of her Rival whom she put to a miserable Death, and of her own Children whom she sacrificed to her Jealousy (1). There she is a virtuous Person, whose only Crime is the Love which she had for her Spouse, who basely abandoned her, notwithstanding the Pledges he had of her Affection, to wed the Daughter of Creon; a Woman of a very different Character from Circé her Aunt

(1) Eur. Ovid. &c.

Aunt (1), who employed the Secrets she had learned from Hecate her Mother, only in making up salutary Remedies for those who came to consult her, while Circé used only to the Purposes of her own Revenge the Knowledge she had acquired, or in the Language of the Fable, which the Sun her Father had communicated to her.

Lastly, a Queen forsaken, persecuted, who after having had recourse in vain to the Security of her Husband's Promises and Oaths, is obliged to wander from Court to Court, and at length to cross the Seas in quest of a Sanctuary in distant Countries: Accordingly even those who have loaded her with the greatest Number of Crimes, could not help owning, that being of a virtuous Disposition, she had only been drawn into Vice by a Kind of Fatality, and by the Wrath of the Gods, especially of Venus, who persecuted without Intermision the whole Race of the Sun, who had discovered her Intrigue with Mars. Hence these Words of Racine: O Sun whom I abhor! Hence again that fine Sentiment of Ovid (2): Video meliora, proboque; deteriora sequor; which one of our Poets has happily imitated in these Lines: *

*I see the Right, and I approve it too;
Condemn the Wrong—and yet the Wrong pursue.*
Garth's Ovid. Met. l. 7.

The antient tragic Writers are blamed, and I think justly, for having vitiated the History of this Princess, and entirely perverted her Character, as we shall see afterwards. The Pathetic is what tragic Poets aim at, and enormous Crimes, which being wrought into the odious Characters of their Personages, are susceptible of those theatrical touches, that are so apt to produce Terror and Compassion. Being authorised by Traditions that favoured their Design, tho' not so well vouched as others which would have crossed their Purpose,

(1) Diod. Siculus. (2) Met. l. 7. v. 20.

* *Le destin de Médée est d'être criminelle,
Mais son cœur étoit fait pour aimer la vertu.*

pose, they greedily laid hold on them, and without troubling themselves about the exact Truth, they have transmitted down to us the History of Medea under the most odious Character; and the modern Poets have not been wanting to imitate them.

We shall endeavour to unravel the Truth from what is Fiction, weigh Authorities, and leave the Reader at liberty to judge if this Princess was so bad as she has been represented.

To begin with the Murder of Absyrtus. I have made it appear that this Fact is differently related by the Poets; that the Story of that Prince's Members being dispersed in the Way, was a pure Chimera; and besides, here is a Fact related by Herodotus, the natural Inferences from which prove that I have reason thus to judge of it. That knowing and judicious Author says, Æetes finding that those whom he had sent out against his Daughter's Ravishers, were not able to come up with them, thought it necessary, in order to do himself Justice, to send Ambassadors into Greece. These Deputies arrived there accordingly; but as the Argonauts had taken an Oath, that before their Separation they would support one another, and as they were the stronger Party, the Ambassadors of the King of Colchis had no other Answer, but that as no Reparation had been made to the Greeks for the Rape of Io, the Daughter of Inachus, ravished by Phenician Merchants who had come to traffick at Argos, neither were they disposed to give them any Satisfaction. It does not appear that the King of Colchis, after receiving this Answer, took any other Step for the Recovery of his Daughter. This Embassy supposes that the Prince would have been overjoyed to see his Daughter again, whom however he had reason to consider as a Monster, if she had really imbrued her Hands in the Blood of her Brother.

In the mean time, the Death of Pelias, whose Funerals had been celebrated with so much Pomp and Apparatus, left the Throne vacant, to which Jason had had a legal Title, but probably the Party of his Cousin Acastus was the stronger, and it does not appear that he shared it with him, as he ought to have done, or resigned it to him altogether, since his Father had only possessed it by Usurpation from Eson. Jason thus seeing himself deprived of his Inheritance, and not being powerful enough to obtain it by Force, embarked with Medea, and retired to Corinth, where he had Friends, and even some Pretensions to the Crown by his Wife, as shall be said afterwards.

Diodorus Siculus says the same upon the Authority of Simonides, and contends, that it was the Corinthians themselves invited Medea to come and take Possession of a Throne which belonged to her; or at least to share the Authority of it with Creon, who was in Possession. Here again is a Fact attested by antient Authors, which overthrows another Calumny published against Medea, by Ovid, Apollodorus, Pausanias, and some others.

First, 'tis supposed by them that Pelias and Eson were still alive at the Return of the Argonauts, that the latter being extremely old, and hardly able to support himself, Jason had desired Medea his Wife to employ some secret Art, which she knew, some Composition capable to restore him to his Strength and Vigour; and that she had accordingly given him one so efficacious, that by means of it he became young again. This is the Substance of that miraculous Operation as it is described in Ovid: “ While all Thessaly was rejoicing
“ for the Arrival of the Argonauts, Eson alone did “ not join in the Festival that was celebrated on that “ Occasion. Oppressed with old Age, and just upon “ the Brink of the Grave, he could enjoy no part “ of the public Mirth: Jason his Son much affect“ ed to see him in this Condition, thus bespoke Me“ dea. I know, my dear Spouse, that you have saved
“ my Life: The Obligations I lie under to you are “ inexpressibly great. But I have one Favour more “ to ask you; cut off some Years of my Life, and “ add them to those of my Father: This is what “ you

“ you can do, for nothing surmounts the Power of “ your Art. As he thus spoke, he could not refrain “ from Tears. Medea was touched with Jason’s ten“ der Affection for his Father ; it made her call to “ Mind Æetes, whom she had left ; but this she kept “ to herself. What you require of me, says she to “ him, is highly unjust ; do you really believe, my “ dear Husband, that any Motives can determine me
 “ to abridge a Life which I prize so much ? Were I “ capable of such an Action, I would pray the God“ dess Hecate to prevent me from it. The Love “ which you bear to your Father urges a Crime which “ I am incapable of committing. Your Wishes “ however shall be gratified, but in a Manner which “ you did not expect. I am going to exert all my “ Endeavours to prolong the Life of a Father whom “ you love.”

Upon this she went out of the Palace ; and mounting a Chariot drawn by winged Dragons, which descended from Heaven in her Sight, she traversed several Countries, and there gathered Herbs of all Kinds, of which she composed a Potion, then drew out the Blood which run in Eson’s Veins, and injected in its stead the Liquor which she had prepared. So soon as the Draught had insinuated itself into the Body of the old Man, his Beard and his gray Hairs began to darken, the Wrinkles of his Face disappeared, and he recovered his pristine Vigour and good Plight.

The Daughters of Pelias, amazed at this Prodigy (1), besought Medea to vouchsafe the same Remedy to their Father ; and she having a mind to avenge her Father-in-law and her Husband of Pelias’s Usurpation, persuaded her Cousins that the Remedy would have the same Effect upon their Father as upon Eson. First, she took an old Ram, cut it in Pieces, which she threw into a Caldron, and after mixing certain Herbs therewith, took it out and let them see it transformed into a young Lamb. She therefore set about making
 the

(1) Ovid. loc. cit. Pausan. in Arcad.

the same Experiment upon the Person of the King (a); she dissected him in the same Way, and threw his Body into a Caldron of boiling Water; but the perfidious Sorceress left it there till the Fire had entirely consumed it; insomuch that nothing of it remained for his Daughters to bury. This, says Pausanias, is what made those unfortunate Princesses fly into Arcadia, where they ended their Days and were interred; while Medea, to save herself, mounted her Chariot in Haste, and flew through the Air.

The Mythologists, I know, give Explications of this Fable; some of them alledging that it refers to an Experiment of transfusing the Blood, which has sometimes been tried, but always with bad Success; while others say Medea having learned of her Mother the Knowledge of some Simples, had composed a Remedy of them which had restored her Father-in-law to his Vigour: For which I refer to Pliny, Servius and Elian. The same Mythologists add, that she mixed up with the Draught designed for Pelias, some venemous Herbs that poisoned him.

By bad Luck these Explications rest upon nothing; and this Fable, which was only invented to make Medea pass for a great Sorceress, has no Foundation in History. Eson had been forced by Pelias to drink Bull's Blood, and was dead before Jason's Arrival, as also his Wife, who had strangled herself for Grief. Pelias himself was deceased at the Return of the Argonauts; of which his Funeral Games celebrated by those Heroes are a convincing Proof. Jason joined in them with the other Argonauts; and how could he have been present there, if his Wife had been guilty, as is said, of the Murder of his Uncle? The Fact is, that after the Celebration of those Games, Jason seeing his Cousin's Party too strong, found it convenient to quit Iolchos; and having embarked with Medea in a Ship named The Dragon, which gave Rise to the Fable of

VOL. IV.

F

those

(a) Ovid says she induced the Daughters of Pelias to cut their Father's Throat, and then to divide his Body in Pieces with their own Hands.

those winged Dragons we have mentioned (a), went to push his Fortune elsewhere.

Corinth presented him with a secure Retreat, and Creon (b), who reigned there, made no Opposition, or durst not make any to his entering that City. For, if we may believe Eumelus, a very antient Author, a Corinthian by Birth, and of the Blood-Royal (1), Medea, as has been said, had a Right to the Crown, since, according to this Author, the Sun, the Son of Hyperion, having had by Antiope, Æetes and Alous, divided his Dominions among them, and Corinth having fallen to the first, who went and settled in Colchis, committed that City in Trust to Bunus, to be kept until he or one of his Children should come and demand it of him. The same Eumelus added, that Medea actually reigned at Corinth jointly with Creon, which is confirmed by Simonides. Diodorus Siculus says (2), it was the Corinthians themselves had invited this Princess to quit Iolchos, to come and take Possession of a Crown which belonged to her.

Medea and Jason resided ten Years in that City, where they lived in perfect Harmony, and had two Children. But Jason's Perfidiousness having made him forget the Obligations he owed to his Spouse, and the Oaths which he had taken to her, he made no Scruple to violate the sacred Ties of Marriage, which were then very much regarded; and falling in love with Glaucé, Creon's Daughter, divorced Medea. As antient Histories are always intermixed with Fables, it was given out that Medea, to be avenged of her Rival, had sent her a poisoned Garment, which, like the Shirt that Dejanira had given Hercules, no sooner was put on by that unfortunate Princess, than she felt a secret Flame

(a) Horace thus speaks of her Chariot:

Hoc delibutis ultra donis pellicem

Serpente fugit alite. Epod. III. 13.

(b) As we frequently find at Corinth the Name of this Creon, Paulmier de Grantmenil, thinks it rather was a Title of Dignity, ἡγεμῶν, Imperans, than a personal Name, and that he who reigned then in that City was called Glaucus; and his Daughter Glaucé.

(1) Pausan. in Corinth. (2) L. 4.

Flame begin to prey upon her, and died in the most exquisite Torment. They further added, that Creon's Palace was set on Fire, and he himself consumed in the Flames ; and lastly, that after having torn in Pieces her two Sons, Pheres and Memercus, she retired to Thebes to Hercules, hoping that he would avenge her of Jason's Falsehood, in regard that he, with the other Argonauts, were engaged to see to his keeping the Oath which he had taken at Marriage, never to have any other Wife but her ; but that not being able to procure Satisfaction from him, she had repaired to Athens. This again is another Fiction, without all Foundation. Not to insist upon what is certain, that Hercules died ten or twelve Years after the Return of the Argonauts, as I shall prove elsewhere, I have this to say further ; it was a current Tradition, that the Corinthians themselves had stoned them to Death, either to revenge the Death of Creon, whom Medea was said to have slain, or to put an End to the Intrigues she was still forming for securing the Crown to her Children. It was Euripides, in his Tragedy of Medea, that propagated the Fable which I am refuting ; a Mystery which it is proper to explain. The Report which had been spread on all Hands, of the Cruelty exercised by the Corinthians upon Medea's Children, had made them odious to all Greece. Therefore, being informed that Euripides was designed to bring that Subject upon the Stage, they made him a Present of five Talents, to induce him to lay to Medea's Charge the Murder of the young Princes. They had Reason to hope that this Fable would gain Credit from the Character of the Poet who employed it, and would at length jostle out a Truth which was little to their Honour. For History bore, that these two Princes having fled for Refuge to the Temple of Juno, surnamed Ἀνρείη, found no Protection from the Sacredness of the Place, but were assassinated even at the Feet of the Goddess. The same History added, that some Time after, the Corinthians being distressed with the Pestilence, were apprized by the Oracle, that they would never see an End of their Calamities till they were expiated from the sacrilegious Murder whereof they were guilty. This Fact we learn from Parmeniscus, a very antient Author quoted by the Scholiast on Euripides, who added, that the Corinthians on that Occasion had instituted a Festival which was still subsisting at the Time when he wrote. The principal Ceremony of this Feast consisted in prohibiting seven young Virgins, and as many Youths, of the principal Families of Corinth, from approaching the Territory consecrated to Juno, a Prohibition which lasted a Year.

Pausanias, who is as little favourable to the Corinthians as Parmeniscus, relates the Story somewhat differently ; according to him it was not the Pestilence that laid Corinth waste, but an epidemical Distemper which destroyed all the Children of the Corinthians, until, by the Advice of the Oracle, they instituted Sacrifices in honour of Medea's Sons, and consecrated to them a Statue which represented Fear ; and this Statue was still subsisting in his Time. To give the greater Solemnity to the Reparation the Corinthians thought themselves obliged to make to those unfortunate Princes, they made their Children wear Mourning, and cut off their Hair, to a certain Age. 'Tis therefore manifest, that the Corinthians alone were guilty ; and I am also persuaded, that the Story of the fatal Robe which she had sent to Glaucé is another Fiction, as well as the burning of Creon's Palace : For when one has a mind to render a Person odious, he takes Care to do the Work not by Halves : Thus, whatever it cost, Medea was to be made guilty of all the Crimes could be imagined. Unluckily for the Corinthians, History has unravel'd the Truth from among the Fictions wherewith Euripides and the other Tragic Poets had disguised it ; and Monuments still more certain than History, Feasts, Sacrifices, and Statues, were plain and standing Proofs that reproached the Corinthians with a Crime wherewith they endeavoured to blacken Medea's Reputation : And if the Fact be as I have now related, as is exceeding probable, it makes not much for the Honour of Euripides, who allowed himself to be corrupted by the Corinthians for five Talents ; but not to insist here that he may have followed other Traditions, perhaps as well vouched as that which Parmeniscus has transmitted to us ; that the Subject, as he has managed it in his Tragedy of Medea, seemed to him calculated for raising Terror and Fear, and the other Emotions which the Drama requires ; 'tis not so strange as may at first appear, to suppose he would prefer the present Reputation of the Corinthians, who suffered still by those Reports, to that of a Princess dead several Ages ago, wherein, probably none interested themselves.
not

Be that as it will, she removed to Athens, where, according to Ovid (1), Egeus received her, and married her some Time after. Plutarch (2), who relates the same Fact, says not that Egeus married her, but that she lived with him in a shameful Intimacy, promising him that by her Drugs she would procure him Children. In the mean while Theseus, say those Authors, arrived at Athens for the first Time ; and Medea hearing of his Arrival, and of the Design he had of discovering himself, had such Influence over the Mind of Egeus, grown weak with Age, and rendered fearful and suspicious by the different Factions that prevailed in the City, as to persuade him to poison his Son, at a Feast he had provided for him as a Stranger. Theseus therefore was invited in his Name. When he was in the Hall, he thought it not proper to declare who he was ; but having a Mind to give his Father an Occasion of making the first Discovery, so soon as the Meat was served up, he drew his Poinard to cut it up, and having let the Guard of his Sword be seen, on which was Egeus's Seal, that Prince knew him, and presently overturned the Cup in which was the Poison, then proposed several Questions to Theseus, and after embracing him, made him be acknowledged, by all the Athenians. Medea, by mounting her flying Chariot, escaped the Punishment she deserved, Here again is a new Crime with which the Poets thought fit to load the Memory of Medea; for this Narration can by no Means be supported. Egeus was dead long before Medea's Arrival in Greece, having thrown himself down, as has been said (1), from a Precipice upon the Return of his Son from Crete, which was Theseus's first Expedition after his Discovery. Besides, Theseus having been of the Number of the Argonauts, how could Medea have forgot him after she had made that long Voyage with him? And how is this consistent with what Plutarch asserts, as has been already remarked, that this Prince had been in Colchis, and at the same Time that he had found Medea at her Father's Palace, at his first Departure from Trezene? These are some of the Contradictions which Compilers not very exact are apt to fall into.

After this Adventure we hear little more of Medea; only Trogus Pompeius, as we read in Justin (2), had wrote that she crossed the Sea, and returned to Colchis with young Medus and Jason, who was reconciled to her; that there they had re-established Æetes upon the Throne from which he had been deposed by a powerful Faction; that Jason had made War upon the Enemies of his Father-in-law, had conquered a great Part of the Lesser Asia, and at length acquired so great Glory, as to be honoured as a God, some of his Temples being still to be seen in the Time of Alexander, which Ephestion had demolished, that none might be equalled to his Master. Lastly, That after the Death of Jason, Medus had built the Town of Medea in Honour of his Mother, and had given Name to the Medes. But this whole Narration is overthrown by the Greek Traditions, which make Jason to have died in Thessaly, as we shall see by and by. Pausanias (3) says, that Part of Asia was denominated Aria, and that the Inhabitants were from that Time called Medes, from the Name of that Princess. This Author adds farther, that the Son whom she carried with her, and whom whom she had by Egeus, was called Medus; but that Hellanius gave him the Name of Polixenes, and made him the Son of Jason.

(1) The History of Minos. (2) L. 4. c. 2 & 3. (3) In Corinth.

The Greeks, according to the same Author, had old Pieces of Poetry which they called Naupaetian, from their Author Carcinus, of the City Naupaetus, where it was said, that Jason, after the Death of Pelias, had quitted Iolchos to go and settle at Corcyra, and had lost there his eldest Son Memercus, who had been torn in Pieces by a Lioness, as he was diverting himself in hunting, in that Part of the Continent which is opposite to the City; but they give no Account of Pheres his other Son. There were also in Greece ancient Genealogies of one named Cinetho a Lacedemonian, where it was said that Jason had by Medea a Son Medus, and a Daughter Eriopis; but neither of these Authors said any Thing of Medea and Jason's having resided at Corinth, which was so plainly set forth in the History of Eumelus which we have mentioned; who, besides what has been said, added, that after the Death of Bunus, to whom Æetes had given in Trust his Property in the City Epbyre. Poppæus, the Son of Aloeus, having ascended the Throne, and Corinthus, the Son of Marathon, who changed the Name of the City Epbyre to that of Corinth, having succeeded him, and having left no Male Issue, the Corinthians had sent for Medea from Iolchos, as has been said. The same Author added that Medea had several Children by Jason, whom she carefully concealed in Juno's Temple, hoping thereby to procure them Immortality; that at length being baulked of this Expectation, and seeing that Jason, incensed against her, had returned to Iolchos, she had formed a Resolution to leave Corinth, as has been already related.

As to the last Years of Jason, all we know is that he led an unsettled Life, without any fixed Residence; and that as he was one Day resting himself upon the Sea-shore, under the Shelter of the Ship Argo, which had been laid up, he was there crushed to Death by the Fall of a Beam which was loosened from it, an Event said to be foretold him by Medea, as Euripides reports.

To conclude: It is not without Reason that I have not represented Medea as criminal as Authors commonly make her; having good Vouchers for my Opinion among the Antients. I presume that I have sufficiently overthrown, and that by formal Authorities, the odious Facts that are laid to her Charge. I may further add, that the only Thing for which she can be blamed, is for having left her Father and Mother to follow a Stranger; but besides that it was a Relation she followed, who was become her Husband, we are told that her Departure was forced and involuntary, being hated both by her Father and Mother because she was of a humane beneficent Disposition. They tell us further, it was this generous Temper prompted her to befriend the Argonauts, who, but for her, must all have perished. The antient Scholiast on Euripides confirms this Opinion of Diodorus, and other Authors, when he says Medea was highly in Favour with the Corinthians, for having delivered them from a grievous Famine by Means of her Inchantments; that is, by the Resources her extensive Knowledge had found out for bringing about a good Harvest.

Ovid himself, who seems to have so little Favour for her, after he has put the most virtuous Sentiments in her Mouth, before she gave Way to her growing Inclination towards Jason, makes her utter those remarkable Words before quoted.

C H A P. VI.

The History of Hercules.

THAT there were several Hercules's is a Thing not to be doubted. Diodorus Siculus reckons three of them: The first an Egyptian, who travelled into Africa, and raised those famous Pillars near Cadiz, to give Notice to Voyagers that they were not to attempt tempt to go farther (a). The second was born in Crete, among the Idæi Daëtyli; he it was, according to the same Author, that instituted the Olympic Games. The last was the Son of Jupiter and Alcmena; he was born at Thebes, and signalized himself by a thousand Labours. He might have added a fourth, more antient than the others, namely, the Phœnician. Cicero (1) reckons there were six of them. The first, according to that Author, was the Son of Jupiter and Lysidice. The second is the Egyptian Hercules, sprung from the Nile. The third was one of the Daëtyli of Mount Ida. The fourth was the Son of Jupiter and Asteria, the Sister of Latona, and this is he whom the Tyrians worshipped. The fifth is the Indian surnamed Belus. In fine, the sixth is the Son of Alcmena. There are Greek Authors who reckon to the Number of Forty three of them, either because several Persons did themselves the Honour to assume so illustrious a Name, or rather because Hercules was not a proper Name, but an Appellative, derived perhaps from the Phœnician Word Harokel, which signifies Merchant, as has been proved some Years ago by the learned M. le Clerc (2), who alledges that this Name was formerly given to the famous Traders who went to discover new Countries, and to plant Colonies there, frequently signalizing themselves no less by purging them from the wild Beasts that infested them, than by the Commerce they established there; which, no doubt, was the Source of antient Heroism and War (a). Thus it appears that the Word Hercules was only the Surname of the Hercules's we have mentioned: For the Tyrian was called Thasius; the Phœnician, Desanaus, or Agenor; the Grecian (b), Alceus, or Alcides; the Egyptian, who was contem-

(a) See what has been said from the same Author, in the Article of Osiris, Vol. I.

(1) De Nat. Deor. l. 3. (2) Bibl. Univers. Tom. 2.

(a) See what the Bible says of Nimrod, that first Heroe and Conqueror: It calls him, Fortis Venator coram Domino. A mighty Hunter before the Lord.

(b) Diodorus is of Opinion that Alcides was called Hercules, that is, the Glory of Juno, not till after he had in the Cradle squeezed two Serpents to Death, which Juno had sent to devour him.

contemporary with Osiris, and General of his Troops, Osochor, or Chon; the Indian, Dorsanes; and the Gaul, Ogmion.

But 'tis to be observed that the Greeks have filled up the History of the Theban Hercules with the Exploits of all the rest, with those numerous Travels mentioned by the Poets who have written his Life, and with so many Adventures, for which the Life of no one Man would be sufficient: Here is his History.

Perseus had by Andromeda, Alceus (1), Sthenelus, Hilas, Mestor, Electrion, and a Daughter named Gorgophone, who, as has been said elsewhere, was married to Perieres. Alceus having married Hippomona, the Daughter of Menecus, had two Children by her; namely, Amphitryo and his Sister Anaxo. To Mestor and Lysidice, the Daughter of Pelops, was born Hippothoë, who, having been ravished by Neptune, that is, by some Pirate, was conveyed into the Eschinades Islands, where she had a Son named Taphius, who led a Colony to Taphos, the Inhabitants whereof he afterwards called Teleboans, to denote that they had settled far from their own Country. To this Taphius was born Pterelas, who had several Male Children (a), and a Daughter named Cometo.

Electrion married his Niece Anaxo, the Daughter of Alceus, and of this Marriage was born Alcmena (b). From Sthenelus and Micippe, the Daughter of Pelops, sprung Alcinoe, Medusa, and Eurystheus, who was afterwards King of Mycenæ. Taphius being dead, Pterelas

(1) Apollod. l. 2. Diod. &c.

(a) Namely, Chromius, Tyrannus, Antiochus, Cherses, Damas, Mastor and Ezeres.

(b) Plutarch, in the Life of Theseus, delineates Alcmena's Genealogy otherwise: He says she was the Daughter of Lysidice; and the Scholiast upon Pindar, Ode 17. Olymp. agrees with Plutarch. Euripides, in the Tragedy of the Herculides, Servius upon the fifth Book of the Æneid, and Diodorus Siculus, l. 4. plainly make Alcmena descended from Pelops; but the two first name not her Mother, and the last calls her Eurymede: But Apollodorus, Bibl. l. 2. is of a quite different Opinion; for he makes the Mother of this Princess Anaxo, the Daughter of Alceus.

relas sent his Children to Mycenæ to demand of their Grand-uncle Electrion, who was King thereof, that Share of their Grandfather Mestor's Estate which belonged to them. That Prince having refused to satisfy their Claim, they ravaged the Country, and carried away his Flocks. Upon which, the Sons of Electrion drew together their Troops, and gave them Battle, where both the one and the other lost their Lives. Lycimnus, the natural Son of Electrion, a Prince then but very young, remained alone to carry the News thereof to his Father ; and on Pterelas's Side, there was none escaped the sad Fate of the Brothers but Eve-res, who had the Care of the Ships, who having put the rest of his Troops on board with those of Electrion, repaired to his own Country.

The King of Mycenæ, before he set about revenging the Death of his Children, left the Government of his Kingdom, with his Daughter Alcmena, to Amphitryo his Nephew, promising to give her to him in Marriage upon his Return. As he actually returned victorious, and was bringing back his Cows, Amphitryo was going to have stopped one of them which had got away, and threw after her his Club, which lighted upon Electrion, and slew him. This Murder, tho' involuntary, was the Mean of that young Prince's losing the Kingdom of Mycenæ ; for Stbenelus, the Brother of the Deceased, taking Advantage of the public Odium which Amphitryo had incurred by this Accident, expelled him from the whole Country of the Argives, and made himself Master of Mycenæ, where his Son Euristheus reigned after him. Amphitryo, forced to retire to Thebes, was received there by Creon ; but his Cousin Alcmena, whom he had brought along with him, not being satisfied with the Vengeance which her Father had taken upon the Teleboans, declared that she would marry him who should declare War upon them. Amphitryo, who was passionately in love with her, accepted the Proposal, and having struck up an Alliance with Cephalus, Anceus, Creon, and some other neighbouring Princes, went and laid waste the Islands of the Taphians. But while Pterelas was alive, he was not able to take Taphos; but Cometo his Daughter being enamoured of Amphitryo, or, according to others, of Cephalus, and having cut the fatal Hair on which her Father's Destiny depended; that is, having conspired with his Enemies, this unfortunate Prince lost his Life. Amphitryo having thereby become Master of the Isles of the Taphians, gave them to Cephalus and Eleus, who built Cities therein, put Cometo to Death, and returned loaded with Spoils and Booty (a). Hear how Plautus makes Amphitryo speak in Reference to this :
of

Ego idem ille sum Amphitryo---qui Acarnanios & Taphios vi vici, & summâ Regum.
Virtute bellica. Illisce præfeci Cephalum
Magni Dionei filium. Amph. Act. 4.

It was during this War that Hercules was born; and whether Amphitryo had consummated his Marriage before he set out, or whether he had returned to Thebes incognito, or to Tyrinthia, where Hercules is thought to have been born, it passed current that Jupiter was this young Prince's Father, and that he had imposed upon Alcmæna, by assuming the Figure of her Husband; a Fable which was propagated to cloak some Intrigue of Alcmæna; or perhaps Jupiter was afterwards given out to be Alcides's Father, instead of Amphitryo, only upon account of his Valour; and 'tis very probable that it is to be understood in this last Sense, since Seneca thus brings in Hercules himself speaking of his Birth: "Whether this whole Story
 " be taken for Truth, or for a mere Fiction, and my " Father be really but a mere Mortal, my Mother's " Infamy is sufficiently wiped off by my Valour; nor " am I unworthy to be Jupiter's Son (b)."

To

(a) See the History of Theseus, where the like Adventure befel Afinos.

(b) Virtute nostra pellicem feci, tuam
Credo Noxeram, sive nascente Hercule

To this Fable it was added, that on the Day of his Nativity loud Peals of Thunder had been heard, and several other Prodigies seen (a).

To the same Purpose it was given out, that the Night on which Jupiter counterfeited Amphitryo had been prolonged. Lycophron says it lasted the Space of three Nights, and others extend it even to nine. Hyginus (b) and Seneca describe this Fable, as also Plautus (c) in his Amphitryo.

Some Authors say this Princess was delivered of Twins, of whom the one, Iphicles, passed for the Son of Amphitryo, and the other, Alcides, claimed Jupiter for his Father ; and tho' they had been conceived at three Months Distance the one from the other, yet they were born on the same Day. 'Tis thus that Plautus makes Mercury speak of them (d).

But

*Nox illa certa est, siue mortalis meus
Pater est ; licet si falsa progenies mihi,
Materna culpa cesset & crimen Jovis ;
Merui parentem, contuli cælo decus.*

Sen. de Herc. Oeteo. Act. 4.

(a) ——— *Ibi continuo contonat
Sonitu maximo. Ædes Primo ruere rebamur tuas,
Ædes totæ consulgebant tuæ quasi essent aureæ.*

Plaut. Amph. Act. 5. Sc. 1.

(b) Amphitryon cum abesset ad oppugnandam Oecaliā, Alcmēna existimans Jovem conjugem suum esse, eum thalamis suis recepit ; qui cum in thalamos venisset, & ei referret quæ in Oecaliō gessisset, ea credens conjugem esse cum eo concubuit.——Postea cum nunciaretur ei conjugem victorem esse, minime curavit, quod putabat se conjugem suum vidisse. Qui cum in Regiam intrasset, & videret negligentius secutam, mirari cæpit & queri quod se advenientem non recepisset. Hygin.

(c) *Cui lege mundi Jupiter rupta
Roscidæ noctis geminavit horas,
Jussitque Phæbum tardive celeres
Agitare currus ; & tuas lente
Remeare bigas, candida Phæbe !
Retulitque pedem, alternis nomen
Stellæque mutat, seque mirata est
Hesperum dici. Aurora movit
Ad solitas vices caput, & relabens
Imposuit senis humero mariti.* Senec. Amph. Act. 4.

(d) Hodie illa pariet filios geminos duos :

Alter

But this I take to be another Fiction, owing to this that the two first of Alcmena's Children had been confounded together, the one of them being born during the War of the Teleboans, and the other but a short while after ; unless we choose to think, that she was really delivered of Twins.

To proceed, I am of Opinion that there was no Foundation for the Fable of Jupiter's having made the Night in which he lay with Alcmena longer than others : At least, this Event put nothing in Nature out of Order, since the Day that followed it was proportionably shorter, as the same Plautus remarks :

*A:que quanto nox fuisti longior hac proxima,
Tanto brevior dies ut fiat faciam, ut æque disparet,
Et dies e nocte accedat.* Ibid. Ac. 1. Sc. 3.

As for Galantbis, Alcmena's Slave, whom Ovid makes to have been transformed into a Weasel, for having imposed upon Juno, (who in the Disguise of an old Woman, planted herself near Amphitryon's Palace, in a fit Posture, as she thought, to retard Alcmena's Delivery) by making her believe that her Mistress was brought to bed ; this is an Episode invented to set the Resentment of Juno in a stronger Light. As to which, however, we may add, that Similitude of Names had given Rise to the Transformation ; and the pretended Punishment which Juno is said to have taken on that new Animal, by condemning it to bring forth its Young by the Mouth, this is only an Allusion to a popular Error, which has no other Foundation, but that the Weasel is almost always bearing about its Young in its Mouth, continually shifting them from Place to Place. Eliau says the Thebans worshipped this little Animal (1), because it had facilitated Alcmena's Labours. What-

*Alter decimo post mense nascetur puer
Quàm seminat, alter mense septimo.
Eorum Amphitryonis alter est, alter Jovis.*

*Alcmenæ hujus honoris gratia
Pater curavit uno ut factu fieret.
Uno ut labore absolvat ærummas duas.*

(1) De Anim.

Whatever be in that, Amphitryo, who was of the Race of Perseus, and sole Heir to Electrion by his Wife, ought to have succeeded to the Kingdom of Mycenæ, and his Son Hercules after him ; but having slain his Father-in-law, as has been said, he was obliged to retire to Thebes, and by that means Sthenelus became sole King of Mycenæ, and after him his Son Euristheus, who was born at the same time with Hercules. Thus our Heroe became Subject, and as it were Slave to that King ; tho' others will have it, that he was subjected to him by the Oracle of Delphi, upon account of the Murder of his Children, whom he slew in the Rage of his Madness (2), since he might have exempted himself from Subjection to the King of Mycenæ, being under the Protection of Creon, whose Daughter he had married.

This is the Source of the Fables of the Jealousy of Juno, who had retarded Alcmena's Delivery, to gain Time for Eurystheus to come first into the World, and consequently to command the other, as by Right of Seniority. Homer relates this Fact with an Air of the Marvellous, which he knows so well to give his Narrations :

*Hear me, ye Sons of Greece ! with Silence bear,
And grant your Monarch an impartial Ear :
A while your loud, untimely Joy suspend,
And let your rash injurious Clamours end :
Unruly Murmurs, or ill-tim'd Applause,
Wrong the best Speaker, and the justest Cause.
Nor charge on me, ye Greeks, the dire Debate ;
Know, angry Jove, and all-compelling Fate,
With fell Erinnys, urg'd my Wrath that Day,
When from Achilles' Arms I forc'd the Prey.
What then could I, against the Will of Heaven ?
Not by myself, but vengeful Ate driv'n ;
She, Jove's dread Daughter, fated to infest
The Race of Mortals, enter'd in my Breast.*

Not

(1) Sup. to Vell.

*Not on the Ground that haughty Fury treads,
 But prints her lofty Footsteps on the Heads
 Of mighty Men ; inflicting as she goes
 Long-fest'ring Wounds, inextricable Woes !
 Of old, she stalk'd amid the bright Abodes ;
 And Jove himself, the Sire of Men and Gods,
 The World's great Ruler, felt her venom'd Dart ;
 Deceiv'd by Juno's Wiles, and female Art.
 For when Alcmena's nine long Months were run,
 And Jove expected his immortal Son ;
 To Gods and Goddesses th' unruly Joy
 He show'd, and vaunted of his matchless Boy :
 From us (he said) this Day an Infant springs,
 Fated to rule, and born a King of Kings.
 Saturnia ask'd an Oath to vouch the Truth,
 And fix Dominion on the favour'd Youth !
 The Thund'rer, unsuspecting of the Fraud,
 Pronounc'd those solemn Words that bind a God.
 The joyful Goddess, from Olympus' Height,
 Swift to Achaian Argos bent her Flight ;
 Scarce sev'n Moons gone, lay Sthenelus's Wife,
 She push'd her ling'ring Infant into Life :
 Her Charms Alcmena's coming Labours stay,
 And stop the Babe, just issuing to the Day.
 Then bids Saturnius bear his Oath in Mind ;
 " A Youth (said she) of Jove's immortal Kind,
 " Is this Day born : From Sthenelus he springs,
 " And claims thy Promise to be King of Kings."
 Grief seiz'd the Thund'rer, by his Oath engag'd ;
 Stung to the Soul, he sorrow'd, and he rag'd.
 From his ambrosial Head, where perch'd she sat,
 He snatch'd the Fury-Goddess of Debate,
 The dread, th'irrevocable Oath he swore,
 Th'immortal Seats should ne'er behold her more,
 And whirl'd her headlong down, for ever driv'n
 From bright Olympus, and the starry Heav'n :
 Thence on the nether World the Fury fell ;
 Ordain'd with Men's Contentious Race, to dwell,
 Full oft the God his Son's hard Toils bemoan'd, Curs'd the dire Fury, and in secret groan'd.*

Pope's Iliad xix. 81, &c.

Hence

Hence also came all the Heroism of Alcides: For Eurystheus, jealous of his Reputation, enjoined him those immense Labours which gave him an Opportunity to display his Valour and Courage; that Prince, notwithstanding their Affinity, (for they were Cousin-germans) having persecuted him without Intermiſſion, or, to ſpeak more properly, that political King who was afraid leaſt he ſhould be dethroned by the brave Alcides, who had a Title to the Crown, took Care to cut out Work for our Heroe, during his whole Life, by imploving him in Enterprizes equally artful and dangerous; which was no difficult Matter at a Time when Greece was no leſs over-run with Robbers and Free-booters, who had ſeized upon the High-ways, than with Lions, Boars, and other wild Beaſts. The Extirpation of theſe Monſters employed the whole Life of our Heroe, who commanded the Troops of Eurystheus, as is expreſſy ſaid by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus; and theſe are the pretended Perſecutions enjoined by jealous Juno's Counſel, that is, by the Influence and Policy of the King of Mycenæ.

Alcides was brought up at the Court of Creon King of Thebes, who took great Care to cultivate his Genius; and this young Prince having from the earlieſt Years given Marks of Valour, and eſpecially of a good Diſpoſition (1), by making War upon the Tyrant Erginus, to deliver his Country from the Tribute it payed to him (a), Creon gave him in Marriage his Daughter Megara, by whom he had ſome Children; but when he underſtood that he was obliged to be ſubjected to the Orders of Eurystheus, he fell into ſuch a Fit of Madneſs, that he ſlew his Couſin Iolas, and even his own Sons without knowing them; which threw him afterwards into ſuch Melancholy that he left Thebes, and after receiving Expiation for the Murder at Athens, went in queſt of Eurystheus.

Thoſe who gave Account of this ſad Event took
VOL. IV. G Care,

(1) Diodor. l. 1.

(a) It was in this War that Amphiaraus died.

Care, in support of the Fable of his Birth, to ascribe his Madness to Juno's Jealousy. Aristotle is of Opinion, that he was under the Influence of a melancholy Humour, others think he was subject to the Epilepsy, or to some Fits of Madness. We are told farther, that Pallas having thrown a Stone made him fall asleep; which probably signifies that the wise Precautions of his Friends, and their Remedies, restored him to the Use of his Reason (a). He gave Megara afterwards to another Iolas, the great Companion of his Travels, from a Persuasion that his Marriage with her could not but be fatal.

In his most tender Years, and perhaps in his first Expedition, Alcides slew some Serpents : It was given out afterwards that this Adventure happened to him, when yet in the Cradle, and that the Goddesses Juno sent them to devour him (b). Plautus adds, that these two Serpents left the young Iphiclus the Brother of Hercules go to him ; and that as soon as he had seen them, he started up from his Cradle, and squeezed them to Death ; whereby he was known to be the Son of Jupiter (c). Thus it was thought fit by poetical Exaggerations to embellish the Infancy of this Heroe.

The Chace which he gave to some Lions of the Nemean Forest, among which was one of an overgrown Size, which he slew himself, and whose Skin he wore, was the first of the twelve Labours that have been so much celebrated. To make this Fact the more memorable, it was afterwards fabled that this Lion was ranked among the Stars (1). Several Kings of Syria, or of the Seleucides, as also the Hera-

(a) Some Authors tell us, that Pallas threw this Stone at him, when he was going to kill Amphitryo his Father.

(b) Cunarum labor est angues superare mearum, Ovid. Met. l. 9.
Par ut erat, manibusque suis Tyrinthus Heros, Pressit, & in cunis jam Jove dignus erat. Id. de Art. Am.

(c) Citius è cunis exilit, facit recta in angues impetum
Alterum altera apprehendit ; eos manu perniciter
Puer ambo angues enecat. Plaut. Amph. Act. 5.

(1) Manilius Aëginus, &c.

Heracles from whom they descended, affected frequently to wear this Skin. According to Pausanius (1), there was still to be seen in his Time, in the Mountains that are between Cleone and Argos, the Cave into which that Lion had retired, which is only at the Distance of fifteen Furlongs from the Town of Nemea.

The same Heroe delivered also Arcadia from another Calamity which laid it waste; namely, from the Birds of the Stymphalic Lake, which are thus described in Lucretius (2):

— — — Uncisque timendæ
Unguibus Arcadiæ volucres Stymphala colentes.

We are told, that Hercules banished them out of the Country by pursuing them with a loud Noise. Mnaseus explains this Fable, by telling us there were Robbers laid waste the Country, and robbed Passengers in the Confines of the Lake Stymphalus in Arcadia. These Hercules with his Companions destroyed; hence the Fable of the Birds Stymphalides, whom this Heroe is said to have banished, having invented a kind of brazen Timbrals to fright them away, and which are said to have been given him by Minerva. The crooked Talons that are given them, are perfectly applicable to Robbers, as well as the Wings, the Head and Iron Beak which Timagnetes gives them, with Javelins of the same Metal, which they darted at those who attacked them, as we are told by Euripides and Claudian (a); the Import of which is, that they were armed with Lances and Javelins. We are told further, that they were trained up by the God Mars, to intimate that they were very warlike. Hercules found a Way to dislodge them from the Woods where they sheltered themselves, by affrighting them with the Sound of his Timbrals, and thus cut them off.

We may remark by the Way that Natalis Comes is mistaken

G 2

(1) In Corinth. (2) L. 3.

(a) Audierunt memorande tuas Stymphale volucres, Spicula vulnifico quondam sparsisse volatu. Claud.

mistaken (1), in confounding the Birds Stymphalides with the Harpies, since Petronius, not to mention others, so plainly distinguishes them :

*Tales Herculeâ Stymphalides arte cruentas
Ad cælum fugisse reor, pennaque fluentes
Harpyias, cum Phineo maduere veneno Fallaces epulæ, &c. (a).*

Tho' to say the Truth, the Antiquaries are very much divided about some Birds which occur upon Monuments and Medals, and which some take for Harpies,² others for the Stymphalides.

The Fens of Lerna near Argos were infected with several Serpents that seemed to multiply as fast as they were destroyed : Hercules, with the Assistance of his Friends, cleared the Fens of them entirely, set Fire to them to burn the Reeds, and thus made the Place habitable and fertile, and this perhaps is what made Ptolomy Ephestion say, as we are told by Photius, that the Heads of the Hydra were of Gold : An ingenious Symbol of the Fertility which our Heroe procured to a Place before inaccessible. It is no doubt for the same Reason that Euripides, in his Tragedy intitled Ion, says, the Scythe which this Heroe made use of to cut off the Heads of that Monster was of Gold. Apollodorus adds, that whenever Hercules lop'd off one of the Monsters Heads, Iolous his Companion set Fire to it, lest the Blood that sprung from it should produce a new one. Wherein he only copies the Poet now quoted ; and thus was that Event actually represented in a fine Picture that was in the Temple of Delphi (2). Perhaps among those Serpents there was one of that kind which the Greeks call Hydros, being of a very venomous Nature ; which might give rise to the Fable of the Hydra. It is to be remarked

(1) L. 7. c. 6.

(a) Consult besides the Poets, Pausanias, in Arcad. and the Scholiast on Appollonius, upon the 105th Verse of the 11th Book of his Argonaut.

(2) Eurip.

marked that Hercules dipt his Arrows in the Blood of this Serpent, or rather, according to Diodorus Siculus, Eschiles, Hyginus, and several others, in its Gall, which was the most venomous Part of its Body; which communicated to them a poisonous Quality, as appears from the Wound given to Nessus, whom we shall speak of very soon, and from that of Philoctetes who was diseased ten Years for having had one of them fall upon his Foot.

Servius gives another Explication of the Fable of the Hydra; he says what gave rise to it was that from the Fens of Lerna issued several Torrents which flooded all the Country; that Hercules drained them, planted Moles, and made Canals to carry off the Water. I have read some where (a), that this Fable was owing to seven Brothers who lived upon Plunder, and used to shelter themselves in the Fens of Lerna, whence none was able to dislodge them. Hercules first slew one of them, then the other six, by drawing them two by two to the Fight. This possibly might have given the Poets a Handle to say that the Hydra had seven Heads; but they are not very consistent upon this Article. Simonides says it had ninety. According to Alceus it had fifty; and others give it only five. Pausanias says it is very possible that the Blood of the Hydra poisoned Hercules's Arrows; but he cannot persuade himself that it had many Heads, this being a Circumstance, he says, which had been added to make the Monster still more terrible, it having been first represented in that Manner by Pisander of Camira in the Island of Rhodes, to give a greater Air of the Marvellous to his Poetry; probably in the Poem he had composed upon Fables, as we read in Macrobius.

Plato thinks that by the Hydra, the Poets intended a Sophist of Lerna, who let loose his envenomed Tongue against Hercules; and that by the Heads that grew again, are figured his Fruitfulness in producing fallacious Arguments, wherewith that kind of People never fail to support their Sophistry. Others will have it, that by the Hydra and its fifty Heads, we are to understand a Citadel defended by fifty Men under the Command of Lernus their King; and they explain the Fable of the Crab defending the Hydra, by saying that a Prince of that Name aided his Ally against Hercules and Iolaus who besieged it, and that those two Heroes were forced to set fire to the Citadel before they could make themselves Masters of it (1). As all the Incidents of this Heroe's Life were related in an extraordinary and fabulous Manner, we learn from Hyginus, that Juno seeing Hercules ready to overcome the Hydra, had sent a Sea-Crab which bit him in the Foot, and that it being slain by the Heroe, was placed by the Goddess among the Stars, where it forms the Sign of the Crab. But of all these Explications, the first, importing that Hercules had drained the Fens of Lerna, is the most natural, and probably the only true one. The Abbé Fourmond, who in his Travels to the Morea visited this Place, says it is still quite Fenny and full of Reeds.

(a) Hist. Mem. of the Morea, by M. Corcelli, after Tzetzes.

The Wood of Erymanthus was full of Boars which The Boar of Erymanthus made great Desolation in the Country: Hercules was employed to give Chase to them; which he did with such Success, that having with his own Hands slain the largest of them, he made a Present of it to Eurystheus. To embellish this Event, they added that Hercules bore it upon his Shoulders, and that the Sight of this struck such a Terror into the King of Mycenæ, that he went and hid himself in a brazen Cask. Perhaps the good-natured Eurystheus was not very stout, and believing the Boar not quite dead, fled into his Chamber and lock'd himself up. The Teeth of this frightful Boar were a long Time preserved in the Temple of Apollo.

Hercules having for a whole Year been in pursuit of The Hind with the Brazen Feet a Hind, which Eurystheus had enjoined him to bring to him alive, they fabled afterwards that it had brazen Feet; a figurative Expression,

(1) Lylio Giraldi de Hercule.

Expression, intimating the Swiftneſs with which it run. We are told further that it had Horns of Gold; tho' whatever the Poets may ſay, 'tis certain Does have no Horns.

King Augias had ſo many Herds of Cattle, that not having Stables enough to contain them, he was obliged to leave them in the open Field; and his Lands were at laſt ſo overſtock'd with Dung, that they became entirely barren. Hercules, with the Aſſiſtance of his Troops, made the River Alpheus to paſs thro' them, and thus reſtored them to their wonted Fruitfulneſs: Hence the Fable of Augias's Stables. That Prince, as we read in Diodorus Siculus (1), having a Mind to defraud him of what he had promiſed, Hercules ſought an Opportunity of being revenged on him; and having found Eurytus, whom his Father was ſending to Corinth to celebrate the Iſthmic Games, put him to Death. Then he ſet out for Elis, and cut off Augias himſelf; ſubſtituting in his room his Son Phileus, who having been choſen Arbitrator, had adviſed his Father to reward Alcides for ſo important a Piece of Service. It was during this Work, which he performed with the Troops he had attending him, as we learn from Pausanias (2), that he was obliged with Minerva's Aid to fight with Pluto, incenſed againſt him for having carried off from Hell the Dog Cerberus, and that he wounded the God. The Eleans, in Proof of this, cited the Verſes of Homer, where that Poet actually ſays the God of Hell was wounded upon that Occaſion with an Arrow, by which he ſuffered grievous Pain. But if we would ſet aſide the Allegory, we may ſuppoſe that Aidoneus the King of Theſprotia, came to the Aſſiſtance of the Eleans, to defend them againſt Hercules's Army, who, in order to be revenged of Augias's Perfidiousneſs, had made War upon them.

The Iſland of Crete had a Breed of Bulls remarkably beauteous, and Euryſtheus being deſirous to have ſome of that Race, ordered our

G 4

Pariſphae's Bull.
Heroe

(1) L. 4. (2) In Eliac.

Heroe to go and fetch him the fattest of them, which accordingly he did. This was given out afterwards to be the same with that of Pasiphae.

Diomedes having very fine Mares, Eurystheus enjoined Diomedes's Hercules to go and carry off some of Mares. them. Diomedes offering to resist him, was slain in the Scuffle; and as that Prince had ruined himself by breeding Horses, and had sold for that Effect his very Slaves, hence it was fabled that his Mares were fed with human Flesh, as we read in Palephatus (1), and perhaps what contributed to the Fable, is, that they had actually devoured a young Man. Some Authors explain this Fable of Diomedes's Daughters, who fattened themselves at the Expence of the Victims, which their Lust enticed to the Court of their Father (2), who prostituted them to Strangers.

Hercules in his way to Spain sacked the Island of Cos; The Defeat then he defeated the famous Geryon who of Geryon. had three Bodies, and carried away his Flocks; that is, he with his Army, (for he was very well accompanied both in this, and his other Expeditions, as good Authors remark) defeated either a Prince who reigned over three Islands, Majorca, Minorca, and Ebusa, or according to others, over Tartessus, Cadiz, and Euritbia; or else three Princes in Alliance, who were considered as one Person, so closely were they united; which comes to M. le Clerc's Explanation (a), who will have it that Hercules defeated three small Armies made up of the Inhabitants of that Country. Hesiod says, this Geryon was the Son of Cbrysaor, sprung from the Blood of Medusa, as we have already said elsewhere. If we may believe the learned Bochart (b), Geryon reigned not in Spain, but in Epirus, and there it was that Hercules defeated him, and carried away his Oxen. For, says that Author, besides

(1) L. 4. (2) Erasmus in Adagiis.

(a) M. le Clerc upon Hesiod, says, the Phœnician Phrase, wherein occurred the Word Griana, and whose Sense was that Hercules had defeated three Armies, had given Rise to the Fable of Geryon.

(b) Consult for this Bochart, Loc. Cit. and Possius upon Seylae.

besides that this famous Greek never was in Spain, it was not so much as known in his Time. Coleus of Samos, who lived near a hundred Years after, was the first who travelled thither, or rather was driven thither by a Storm; and besides the Pastures of Eurithia were not proper for feeding Oxen. Accordingly Strabo, speaking of that Island, makes no Mention of him; thus all that the Greeks say of the Travels of their Hercules into Spain and Cadiz, is a Fable.

Bochart's Opinion is not founded, like most others of his, upon bare Conjectures, or upon Analogy drawn from the Oriental Languages: It is supported by the Testimony of the Antients. Hecateus, cited by Arrian, says Geryon was King of Epirus; that the said Country had excellent Pastures, and fed great Herds of Oxen, and that it was from thence Hercules carried off those of Geryon. Eustatbius, upon Diomysius Periegetes says the same Thing, and Pindar in his fourth Nem. speaks of the Pastures and Horses of Epirus. These Things may perhaps incline the Reader to adopt the ingenious Conjecture of Bochart, who says Epirus took its Name from the Hebrew Word Abiri, as much as to say, the Land of Horses and Oxen: But whether it does or not, still it must be owned there is no Likelihood that Hercules went to a remote Country in quest of Geryon's Oxen: Epirus, at a Time when it was not very well peopled, when Voyages were hazardous, and Navigation full of Danger, was reckoned a Country very remote from the eastern Provinces of Greece, such as Beotia; it was to the Greeks the Extremity of the World, the Hesperia, the Country where the Sun set, and which was the Seat of Hell and the infernal Rivers. These Notions were apt enough to signalize the Voyages of that Heroe, and to make it be considered as a very hazardous Enterprize (a).

But let that be as it will, Hercules having travelled from Epirus to Italy (b), there defeated certain Robbers,

(a) Hecateus, cited by Arrian, de Rap. Alex. says the same Thing. See the Passage in Grant-menil's Greece, p. 441.

(b) For Hercules's having travelled into Italy, we have several Proofs in the 8th Chapter of Theodorus Ryckius's Dissert.

bers, among others one Cacus, whose Retreat was in the Aventine Mount, and who was even so daring as to steal his Oxen. Caca discovered her Brother to Hercules, who put him to death, as we learn from Titus Livius (1) and Servius (2). Dionysius of Halicarnassus (3) thus relates this Adventure. Hercules having arrived with his Troops in Italy, while he was waiting for his Fleet to return to Greece, made several Conquests upon the People its antient Inhabitants, and several among them were glad to submit to his Authority. The Heroe, satisfied with what he had atchieved, and reckoning that all was quiet, had encamped in a negligent Manner, with a Design to rest himself from his Labours, when Cacus, a petty Tyrant, who dwelt in Rocks inaccessible, surprized him by Night, and carried off from him a Part of his Booty. Hercules pursued him, block'd him up in his strong Hold, and as he made a stout Resistance, he lost his Life. Hercules's Soldiers, with the Troops that had come to our Heroe's Assistance under the Conduct of Evander, shared Cacus's Spoils. Hercules, continues the same Author, after having purged Italy, disbanded a Part of his Troops, and divided the conquered Lands among his Allies and Soldiers, who settled in the Country, united with the Aborigines, and lived with them in perfect Harmony. The Foundation whereof was this.

Evander, an Arcadian by Birth, had left Greece some Time before, and planted a Colony in that Part of Italy which was afterwards called the Latin Territory. That Prince, who had introduced thither the Use of Letters, which was then unknown there, had gained the Affection of the Aborigines, who without considering him as their King, obeyed him as a Man of uncommon Wisdom. But nothing procured him more the Veneration of that People, than the Reputation of his Mother Carmenta, whom the Greeks named Themis, and who was looked upon as a Divinity. During her Life-time she was the Oracle of that whole Nation,

(1) L. 1. (2) Upon the eighth of the Eneid. (3) L. 1.

Nation, and after Death had divine Honours paid to her. Evander, who had learned not long ago from Carmenta, that a Heroe, a Son of Jupiter, was one Day to arrive in the Country, and that his heroic Achievements would raise him to divine Honours, had no sooner heard the Name of him who had slain Cacus, than he was determined to be the first who should do honour to him, even in his Life-time as a Divinity. Thus he erected an Altar to him in haste; and after having let him know his Mother's Predictions, sacrificed to him a young Bullock. After the Sacrifice, it was agreed to, at Hercules's Desire, and with the Consent of the whole Nation, that such a Solemnity should be perpetuated from Year to Year, according to the Grecian Rites, which he himself took Care to teach them, and for that Effect two of the most noble Families of the Country were set apart, that of the Potitians, and that of the Pinarians. The former, according to the Roman Historians, was afterwards entirely destroyed for having offered to perform that Ceremony upon public Slaves, while that of the Pinarians, faithful to their Engagements, was still subsisting in the Time of Cicero.

To proceed; I know not for what Reason some Authors consider the Adventure of Cacus as a Fable. For tho' it were not even attested by two antient ones, namely, Titus Livius and Dionysius Halicarnassæus, and, what is still more decisive, by a Festival to perpetuate the Memorial of it; and tho' we should understand it literally in the Manner as Virgil relates it in the eighth Book of his Eneid; yet, what is there in it of so extraordinary a Nature to hinder us from believing it to be a true History? Might there not have been in Italy, in the Time that Hercules arrived thither, one of those Robbers who were then so common, who having found some of Hercules's Oxen straying from the rest of the Flock, stole and hid them in some Cave? Might not one of them have answered to the Lowings of the others, and thereby detected the Theft? And might not Hercules, who, as Dionysius

Jus tells us, had good Troops with him, have attacked him, and delivered Italy from a petty Tyrant, who was guilty of great Abuses in the Country? And as to what Virgil tells us, that this Robber was the Son of Vulcan, and that in defending himself against our Heroe, he had vomited Torrents of Fire and Smoak, these are only poetical Circumstances wherewith such sort of Adventures were usually embellished.

We learn from some of the Antients, that as our Heroe was desirous to perpetuate his Memory by more Ways than one, he married the Daughter of Evander, by whom he had Palans. He had also brought with him, says Dionysius of Halicarnassus, a Female Slave, whom he gave in Marriage to Faunus, of whom was born Latinus. We are further told, that Hercules abolished in Italy the cruel Custom of offering to the Gods human Victims, substituting in their Stead only animal Sacrifices, or at most Representations of Men; for, to mention this by the Way, when they had not Ability to purchase the real Victims, they contented themselves with offering up something that represented them.

Being designed to plant a Colony in Africa for facilitating Commerce, which was one of the Ends of his Voyage, he was hindered from it at first by another Merchant who had settled in Libye, and was already grown so powerful that it was not possible to force him. Our Heroe artfully drew him out to Sea, and having cut him off from all Communication with the Land whither he used to go for fresh Provisions and Recruits, he thus destroyed him. Hence the Fable of Antheus, that famous Giant, the Son of the Earth, who could not die, as we are told, till he was stifled in the open Air, in regard that he recovered new Strength every Time he was laid in the Earth; because in fact he was always furnished from the Land with a Supply of Troops. Time has preserved to us a fine Groupe of Marble which represents Hercules holding up Antheus in the Air, and strangling him with all his Force. This Antheus theus built the City Tingi (a), which is at this Day a small Town upon the Straits of Gibraltar. We are told that Sertorius caused the Tomb of that Giant to be opened, and that his Bones were of an extraordinary Bigness (b).

While Hercules was in Africa, Busiris, that noted Tyrant, had sent Pirates to carry off the Nieces of Atlas Prince of Mauritania and Hesperia, the Daughters of Hesperus his Brother, and therefore named the Hesperides. Our Heroe rescued them, gave Chace to the Pirates, and went and slew Busiris himself, 'as has been said elsewhere (1). Atlas, to reward Hercules for so signal a Piece of Service, taught him Astrology; and as it was he discovered the milky Way, which is an immense Cluster of Stars, hence arose the ridiculous Fable, that Juno, by the Counsel of Minerva, having suckled Hercules, whom she found in a Field where his Mother had exposed him, he sucked her Breasts with so much Eagerness, as to spill a great Quantity of the Milk, whereby was formed that milky Way.

Further, the wholesome Counsel which Hercules imparted to Atlas, and the Support he afforded him in the Wars wherein he was engaged, especially in the Affair of Busiris, gave Rise to another Fable, which imports, that he aided him in proping the Heavens for some Time upon his Shoulders (c). Atlas, before he took Leave of Hercules, made him a Present of some of the finest Sheep in the Country, and these are the famous golden Apples which that Prince is said to have kept by a Dragon in the Garden of the Hesperides, and the Fable is founded upon a mere Equivocation; for the Greek Word (2) signifies either a Sheep or an Apple. There is in the King's Cabinet a fine Medaillon, on which Hercules is represented gathering the golden Apples. The Serpent which twines about the

(a) It is called at present Tangier.

(b) See what has been said on this Subject, V. 2. B. 1.

(1) V. 2. B. 1. Art. of Atlas.

(c) See the Fable of Atlas in the History of Jupiter.

(2) τὸ Μῆλον.

the Tree that bore them, is bowing its Head, as if it had received a mortal Wound. That Monster, the Offspring of Typhon, had, we are told, a hundred Heads, and as many Voices; but upon the Medaillon it has only one. The three Hesperides, Eglé, Arethusa, and Hypertbusa, are near the Tree, and seem to be reproaching Hercules for his Theft.

M. le Clerc (1) remarks, that this Adventure happened near Tingi in Africa, where, according to Pliny (2), we are to place the Gardens of the Hesperides, so called, not from Hesperus's Daughter, but upon account of their westerly Situation; whence Spain got the same Name (3). Palephatus explains this Fable otherwise (4), and says, there was a Milesian, an Inhabitant of Caria, named Hesperus, whose Daughters were called Hesperides, who kept Flocks of Sheep so beautiful, that they might justly be called golden Sheep. These Hercules carried off, together with the Shepherd, whose Name was Draco. But this Author is apt to forge Explanations of his own, and to give Existence to Persons who never were; however, Agroelas, an antient Author, quoted by the learned Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, has much the same Sentiments of this Fable with Palephatus, and takes these pretended golden Apples to have been Sheep of a surprising Beauty, and which were therefore called golden Sheep, and their Keeper a Dragon, upon account of his Vigilance and Fierceness. The only Difference we find between those two Writers, is, that the first takes the Scene of the Adventure to have been in Caria, whereas the second makes it to have been in Libya; which is more conform to the Opinion of the Antients. Be that as it will, I would rather adopt the Conjecture of Bochart (5), who says, this Fable was intended to set forth the Riches of Atlas, the Phenician Word Malon, whence the Greeks formed Melon, signifying either Riches or Apples (a).

Hercules,

(1) Upon Hesiod, p. 41. (2) L. 5. c. 5. (3) Macrobius, Sat. l. 1. (4) De reb. incred. (5) Chan.

(a) The Reader will be pleased to call to Mind what has been said

Hercules, during this Expedition, having penetrated as far as Cadiz, which was considered as the Extremity of the World, whither the Sun went to set in the Ocean, erected two Pillars, to intimate it was there the Enterprises of that Heroe ended, and that no Body ought to attempt to go farther. Bacchus, or rather Osiris, had done the same in the Indies. Nothing is more famous in fabulous History than these Pillars of Hercules; and yet learned Critics reckon with Bochart that they never subsisted, and that what gave Rise to the Fable, is the Situation of two Mountains named Calpé and Abyla, whereof the one is in Africa, and the other in Europe, upon the Straits of Gibraltar, which were considered as a kind of Pillars, denoting that there was the Extremity of the World, and the Boundaries which Nature had planted, to intimate to Men that the Progress of their Conquests and Ambition must there stop short; and what confirms the Conjecture of that eminent Author, is, that Abyla, which is the Name of a Mountain, signifies likewise a Pillar.

Whatever be in that, 'tis certain there were magnificent Pillars in the famous Temple which the Inhabitants of Cadiz erected in Honour of Hercules at some Distance from their City; and as they were engraved in Phenician Characters, it was afterwards believed that Heroe himself had erected them. These two Pillars were looked upon by the Antients as two Talismans that had Influence to stop the impetuous Force of the Elements, least if they happened to blend with the Ocean, the Seat of dark Chaos, they should introduce universal Confusion and Disorder: Terræ & Oceani vinculum sunt hæ columnæ, quas in domo Parcarum inscripsit Hercules, ne quâ Elementis contentio accedat, nec amicitiam disjungant, qua invicem junguntur (1). It was undoubtedly the antient Phenician Characters engraved upon them, and which were not understood, that said on this Subject in the second Volume, Book first, on Occasion of Atlas; and if he desires a fuller Account, he may read the Abbé Massieu's Dissertation. Mem. de l'Acad. des Bel. Let. T. 3. p. 28.

(1) Apollon.

that gave Rise to the Fable. This Temple was very famous; its Situation in so remote a Place, its Antiquity, the incorruptible Timber whereof it was built, its Pillars enriched with antient Inscriptions and Hieroglyphics, the Labours of Hercules, which were there represented (a); Geryon's Trees, which, according to Philestratus, sent forth Blood, the old Ceremonies that were practised (b); all these made it very celebrated, and Cadiz thought itself secure under the Protection of so great a Heroe. Accordingly, as Theron, the King of Spain, was coming to rife this Temple (c), a panic Terror dispersed his Ships, upon the sudden Appearance of Fire from some Cause unknown.

The Mythologists tell us that the African Expedition was the last of our Heroe's Exploits, and that Eurystheus being satisfied enjoined him nothing further. But it is to be observed with Diodorus Siculus, that among the Labours of this Heroe, some had been commanded him by Eurystheus, others to which he was prompted by his Valour alone. Thus he penetrated as far as the Extremity of Scythia, where he is said to have set at Liberty Prometheus, whom Jupiter had there fast bound, and where an Eagle was continually preying upon his Liver, to punish him for his Presumption, as has been already more fully said in his History.

The

(a) As to which we may observe, it was not till many Ages after the Phenician Hercules, who built this Temple, that the Greeks superadded to it the Ceremonies, Paintings, &c. which related to their Hercules.

(b) Silius, l. 3. describes them in these Verses:

Femineos prohibent gressus, ac limite curant
Setigeros arcere suos, aut discolor ulli
Ante aras cultus; velantur corpora lino,
Discinētis mors thura dare, atque è lege parentum
Sacrificam lato vestem distinguere clavo.
Pes nudus, consueque comæ, castumque cubile.
Inrestrineta focis servant altaria flammæ,
Sed nulla effigies, simulacraue nota Deorum.

(c) This Temple was at a considerable Distance from Cadiz, on the East of the Island, near the main Land. Consult Bochart, Can. l. 1. c. 34.

The River Achelous by its Inundations, laid waste the Plains of Calydon, and introducing Confusion among the Landmarks, often obliged the Ætolians and Acar-nanians to make War upon one another. This Prince, with the Assistance of his Companions, fenced it with Moles, and made the Course of the River so uniform, that it gave no further Trouble to those People. Those who wrote this Event, related it in a quite fabulous Manner: Hercules, said they, fought with the God of that River, who had first transformed himself into a Serpent, whereby was denoted its winding Course; and then into a Bull, which sets forth the swelling and Impetuosity of the River, and the Desolation it made in the Fields (a). They added, that Hercules had vanquished him at last, and had tore off one of his Horns; that is, he reduced into one single Channel the two Arms of the River; that this Horn became a Cornucopia, because it actually introduced Plenty into the Country; tho' by the Cornucopia is often understood that of Amalthea, who had nursed Jupiter, which the Nymphs, we are told, had given to Achelous in exchange for that which Hercules had torn from him (1). Oeneus King of Calydon, to reward Hercules for this Service, gave him his Daughter Dejanira in Marriage, by whom he had a Son named Hilus. He continued three Years at that Prince's Court, and then went into voluntary Banishment for a Murder he had committed (2). If we compare now this Piece of History with the pompous Description which Ovid gives of the Combat between that River and our Heroe, we shall see how far poetical Licence carries Fiction.

I ought not to omit here the Explanation of that Circumstance in the same Poet, when he tells us, that

VOL. IV.

H

the

(a) Rivers were often represented under the Figure of a Bull, to denote the Desolation they made: Taurorum specie simulacra fluminum, id est, cum cornibus, quod sunt atrocia ut Tauri. says Festus, Tzetzes, Eliau, Acron upon Horace, L. 4. Od. 14. and others say the same; Strabo thinks it was from the Noise of the Water.

(1) Apollon. (2) Diodor. l. 4.

the River Achelous having been neglected by the Nymphs in a Sacrifice which they offered to the other Gods, he swelled over his Banks so high, as to bear them away into the Sea, where they were transformed into those Islands which we call the Eschinades. What gave Rise to this Fable, is, that the River Achelous, by its frequent Overflowings, carried down into the Sea such a vast Quantity of Sand and Mud, as to form thereof several Islands (1); to which we may add, that the Shipwreck of certain Shepherdesses in some of those Inundations, gave a Handle to the Invention of this Fiction. Those Islands lately formed, says another Poet, gave Rise to a pretty singular Adventure. Alcmeon, we are told, the Son of Amphiaraus, being left to wander as a Vagabond for the Murder of his Mother, came to consult the Oracle to know where he might find a Retreat; and the Answer was, that he never would be released from the Persecution of the Furies, till he had found a Place which was not enlightened by the Sun at the Time of his committing that foul Parricide. After having mused a long Time upon the Sense of the Oracle, he thought the Eschinades Isles must be intended, they being newly formed, and large enough for him to reside in. Thither he went and settled, founded therein a small Kingdom, and communicated his Son's Name to the neighbouring Coast (a).

Theseus delivered from Hell.

Theseus, for having attempted to carry off the Wife of Aidoneus, King of Epirus, for his Friend Pirithous, had been made the Prisoner of that Prince. Hercules, as he passed thro' that Kingdom, delivered him from his Confinement; and this Aidoneus, for Reasons already assigned, being considered as the King of Hell (b); hence the Voyage of Hercules was taken for a Descent into the Kingdom of the Dead; but two Things contributed to this Fable; the one, that he

(1) Diod. l. 4.

(a) It was called Acarnania.

(b) See the History of Plato.

he brought from Epirus some mastiff Dog, which was taken for Cerberus, as we have said (a); the other, that he slew at that time a famous Serpent that had its Den in the Cave of Ténarus, which was reckoned the Mouth of Hell. As to which Palephatus is of Opinion (b), that it was a Mastiff which Hercules had taken from Geryon; and he was said to have three Heads, because Hercules had taken him from the Town of Tricassia. Molossus, says he, that is Aidoneus, stole him from Eurystheus, and hid him in the Cave of Ténarus, whither Hercules, by Command of the King of Mycenæ, went in search of him; and this, according to that Author, is what gave Rise to that Prince's fabulous Journey to Hell (c). Aidoneus was probably wounded by our Heroë; and as that Prince was obliged to go to Thessaly for a Cure; hence it was given out, that the God of Hell had been necessitated to leave his Kingdom and repair to Olympus to implore the Succour of Peon, who was a famous Physician in Thessaly.

'Tis not agreed, as we have seen, by what Place Hercules went down to Hell. The History of Theseus seems to prove, that it was in Thesprotia; or in Epirus; other Mythologists speak of the Cave of Ténarus in Laconia, where the Descent to Pluto's Kingdom was believed to be: Lastly, Xenophon, in his sixth Book of the Retreat of the ten thousand; speaking of the Arrival of the Army in the Acherontic Chersonesus; adds, that it was in that Country Hercules was said to have descended into Pluto's Kingdom, and that there the Cave was still to be seen, which was more than 150 Paces deep.

Probably Hercules reckoned this Descent into Hell the most hazardous of his Labours, since he would not undertake it till he had first got himself initiated into the Eleusinian Mysteries. For that End he went to Athens; but Eumolpus, or according to others, Museus the Son of Orpheus, who presided therein, remonstrated

(a) In the System of Hell.

(b) Chap. 4. de reb. incred.

(c) See the System of Hell, in the Article of Cerberus.

to him; that no Stranger could be admitted into the Mysteries of Ceres. However, being unwilling to refuse the Heroe that Satisfaction, others were instituted upon his Account. These are what were called the lesser Eleusmian Mysteries, into which Strangers were from that time admitted.

Pelias (a) having been put to Death by his own Daughters, Acastus his Son resolved to pursue his Sisters as far as the Court of King Admetus his Cousin, whither Alcestes had retired (b); and because that Prince, who was enamoured of her would not deliver her up, Acastus ravaged the whole Country. Admetus having been taken in a Sally, the generous Alcestes came and made a voluntary Offer of herself to the Conqueror, if he would deliver her Lover from Death, with which he was threatned : Acastus accepted of her, and dismissed Admetus. Alcides arrived at that Time at the Court of Thessaly, and having found that Prince in the utmost Distress for the Loss of his Mistress, whom he believed upon the Point of being offered up to the Manes of her Father, was intreated by him to go in Pursuit of his Enemy. Alcides defeated Acastus, delivered Alcestes, and gave her back to Admetus, who married her. Those who wrote the History of this Event, clothed it in a fabulous Dress, and heightened it by saying that Alcestes had died to save her Lover; adding, that Hercules had encountered Death, and having gained the Victory, had bound him in Adamantine Chains, till he promised at last to restore Alcestes to the Light of Life, whereof he had so unjustly bereaved her. This, as we see, is an Allegory such as may well enough be justified ; since to deliver a Person ready to die, is to pluck him out of the Hands of Death : Thus we speak every Day without Fiction. But what rendered this Fable more probable is, when that Heroe delivered her, she had already passed the River Acheron in her Return to her Kingdom. Perhaps those who made

(a) Palephatus de reb. incred. Ch. 17. Diod. l. 4.

(b) She nevertheless was innocent, if we may credit Diodorus, l. 4.

made an Epithalamium upon the Marriage of that Princess, sung something like those Verses of M. Quinault :

Alcide est vanqueur du trepas, L'Enfer ne lui resiste pas, &c.

*Alcides Death has overcome,
And o'er the Pow'rs of Hell prevail'd.*

The Intervention of Apollo was foisted into this Fable, because that God, as has been set forth in his History, had been obliged to keep Admetus's Flocks.

The Amazons were in high Reputation in the Time of Alcides, and their Conquests over their Neighbours rendered them formidable. Eurystheus ordered that Prince to go and carry off the Girdle of Hippolita, that is, make War upon them and plunder their Treasures. Hercules embarked upon the Euxine Sea, arrived upon the Banks of the Thermodon; and having attacked those Heroines, routed them, slew a Part of them, and put the rest to flight, took Hippolita or Antiope Prisoner; whom he gave to Theseus, and Menalippe their Queen ransomed herself, by giving the famous Girdle, that is, by paying her Fine.

The Defeat of the Amazons.

Some perhaps will be curious to know who those Amazons were. It was a Republic of Women, who admitted no Men among them, contenting themselves with making them a Visit once a Year. If after this Interview they happened to be delivered of a Son, they exposed him, or sent him to the Scythians their Husbands; if it happened to be a Daughter, they took great Care of her Education, and burnt off her right Breast, that she might the more easily draw the Bow; hence they got the Name of Amazons Ἀμαζόν, without a Breast. In this all the Antients are agreed; and yet all the Amazons we see represented on antient Monuments have both Breasts.

Some Authors, among whom is Strabo, are of Opinion, that there never were Amazons; that all the Accounts given of them are mere Fables; and M. le Clerc adds, that what had given Rise to them is, that in Cappadocia the Women went with their Husbands to War, as they had formerly been at the Conquest of the Indies with Bacchus or Osiris; that the Names given them, as Antiope, Penthesilea, and the rest, are Greek, and not Scythian; and that the best Historians of Alexander's Life say nothing of them. But considering the Manner in which all the Antients, I mean Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus, Velleius Paterculus, Mela, Pausanias, Trogus, and several others, speak of the Amazons, we cannot question the Truth of what they say on this Head: They make them to have reigned in Scythia, upon the Banks of the Thermodon, and date the Commencement of their Empire from the Defeat of their Husbands, who having been driven out of Scythia by an Insurrection, seized upon Cappadocia. We are further told, that one of their Queens, named Penthesilea, came to the Assistance of Priam, and was slain by Achilles (a).

Herodotus tells us how the Greeks vanquished the Amazons, and in what Manner they saved themselves; as the Scythians came to know them after they had defeated them, and endeavoured to reduce them, by sending to them the handsomest Men of their Army. Plutarch speaks of their Irruption into Attica (1), and of the Victory which Theseus gained over them. Quintus Curtius informs us, that one of their Queens came to see Alexander, and passed thirteen Months with him. After these Testimonies, and several others which I cannot remember at present, it is hardly to be doubted that there were Amazons formerly. But without going to seek for them in so remote Ages, we are told (b) that there are of them at this Day in one of the Marian Islands. We are further told, that the Men of the neighbouring Islands visit them, and carry away with them the male Children, leaving only the Females; not to insist here on that vast Country of the

(a) Diodorus speaks of Amazons who signalized themselves in Libya.

(1) In Thes.

(b) F. Gobian, in his sixth Collection of edifying Letters.

the Amazons, which was discovered some Ages ago in the Continent of South America.

As the Conquest of the Argonauts happened in the Time of our Heroe, he could not choose but be of the Party; however, some Authors are of Opinion, as has been said, that he did not go so far as Colchus, but made a Descent upon Troas, to go in search of the young Hylas, who had lost himself in going to draw Water (a). That young Prince, we are told, the Son of Theodomantus, King of Mysia, having been sent with his Companions into Phrygia in search of Water, was devoured by some wild Beast, or drowned in some Rivulet. Hercules, who had a great Love to him, went in quest of him, and made the Shores resound with the Name of his Favourite.

His adjungit Hylam nautæ quo fonte relictum Clamassent, ut littus Hyla, Hyla omne sonavit (1).

However probable this Explanation is, M. le Clerc rejects it, and thinks the Word Hyla imports Wood; and that what gave Rise to the Fable, is, that Hercules actually landed with Telamon and his other Companions from the Ship of the Argonauts; and having cut down Timber on Mount Ida, employed it in building a Ship for their Expedition to Troy. The Sound of the Timber in falling, and the Echoe wherewith it was answered from the Forest, gave Rise to the Fable we have been explaining. Be that as it will, 'tis certain that the City Troy having been then very much damaged by the Inundations of the Sea, Neptune, by whom its Walls were built, was given out to be the Author of that Calamity, to punish the perfidious Laomedon. The Oracle being consulted, informed them, that there was no Way to appease the God of the Sea, but by exposing to a Monster a Virgin of the Blood Royal; and the Lot having fallen upon Hesione, that Prince's Daughter, Hercules offered to set her at Liberty, for a

(a) See what is said of him in the List of the Argonauts,

(1) Virgil. Ecl. 6.

Set of Horses which Laomedon promised him, and he was happy enough to succeed in his Enterprize; but the King having broke his Promise to him, he sacked the Town, carried off Hesione, whom he gave in Marriage to Telamon, slew Laomedon, and gave his Crown to Podarces his Son, at the Request of the Princess who ransomed him; for which Reason he got the Name of Priam. This Monster, in short, which desolated the City Troy, was the Sea, which, for want of Moles, overflowed the Country, and had brought a Contagion into the very City. The King was obliged to promise his Daughter to him who should stop the Inundation: This Hercules undertook and accomplished, and hence had the Fable taken its Rise. But, to mention it here by the Way, the Condition of this Contract is to be understood of some of the best Galleys of the Pbrygian Prince, which our Heroe had demanded as a Reward for his Services; and this Conjecture is proved, not only because 'tis unlikely he would be contented with six Horses for having saved Troy, but also because the Poets tell us, that these Horses of Laomedon were so light that they walked upon the Water; which can only be meant of a Ship under sail, or of a Galley. All are agreed in this Expedition of Hercules to Troy; but Diodorus thinks (1) this Hero performed it with the other Argonauts: He adds, that they left Hesione in the Hands of Laomedon, until they should return; that Hercules and Telamon having gone to claim her, that Prince had ordered the Gates to be shut against them, which drew upon him the Punishment we have described.

'Tis easy to comprehend what Lycophron means (2), when he tells us, that the Monster we have been speaking of, devoured Hercules, who continued three Days in its Body, and came out of it all bruised. 'Tis obvious that this is a bad Imitation of the Story of Jonas; or rather, this Fable has no other Foundation, but that Hercules employed three Days in raising Moles, and that he was said to have thrown himself into the Belly

(1) L. 1. (2) In his Cal.

Belly of that Monster, because he and his Companions went into the Water there to plant the Piles; or, if we have a mind to embrace Palephatus's Opinion, who will have it, that Hesione was carried off by a Pirate, we may suppose that Hercules, to rescue her, threw himself into his Ship, which was perhaps called the Whale, and that he was wounded there.

We must not forget that the Trojans, to secure Hercules from the Fury of the Monster, made an Intrenchment for him to retire into, when it came out of the Sea in pursuit of him; a Work which the Poet attributes to Minerva the Goddess of Arts, and which was still subsisting in the Time of the second Siege of that City. There it was that Juno and Neptune planted themselves to be Spectators of the Combat between Hector and Achilles after his Reconciliation. Having finished these Words, 'tis Neptune's Speech to Juno (1), he marches up first towards the Place called Hercules's Entrenchment, which Pallas and the Trojans formerly made for that Heroe, to shelter himself there from the Whale, when that devouring Monster quitted the Shore in pursuit of him, and threatened to fall upon him. This Entrenchment, or Fort, had been raised by the Trojans to secure themselves from the Incursions of that Pirate, and Hercules made advantageous Use of it.

I say nothing here of several other Exploits wherewith the History of our Heroe is filled up; Cities taken; Tyrants chastised; Monsters subdued; Princes re-established in their Dominions; new Cities built in several Places; the Course of Rivers either diverted, or reduced within their Channels; new Ways made in Places inaccessible; Colonies transported into different Countries, were, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus (2), the most common Actions of his Life: But I cannot pass over in Silence what befel him at the Siege of Messene, where he cut off all the Sons of Neleus, none of all the twelve having escaped but Nestor, who was then absent. The Adventure of the last who was slain is singular; he was named Perichlymenes. Hesi-
ed

(1) Iliad 20. (2) L. 1.

ed (1), Apollonius (2), and after them Ovid (3), tell us, that young Prince had received from Neptune the Power of transforming himself into several Shapes. We are told, that in order to avoid the Blows of the redoubted Hercules, he changed himself into an Ant, a Fly, a Bee, a Serpent; and yet all availed him nothing: He thought at length to have escaped the Hands of his Enemy, by assuming the Figure of an Eagle: But Hercules, according to the Latin Authors, wounded him to Death with an Arrow, or, according to the Greek Authors, with a Blow of his Club (4); a Fable whereby we learn the various Turns of Address which the Son of Neleus put in Practice to ward off impending Death, from which Flight could not save him.

Hercules, as we read in Ælian, sacked the City Messene, to be revenged of Neleus and his Family for having refused to expiate him from a Murder he had committed; and the same Author adds, that he spared the young Nestor, and gave him the Kingdom of his Father, because he was not in the Plot with his other Brothers; which he reckons a high Mark of Generosity and Gratitude, without considering that this single Act of Justice can never atone for the unparalleled Cruelty of this Heroe, who sacrifices a Prince and eleven of his Sons to the Refusal of an Expiation, whereof, in all Probability, he was not deemed worthy.

His Encounter at Sparta with Hippocoon and his Sons, whom he slew to revenge the Death of Oeonus the Son of Lycimnius, his Mother's Brother, is also much celebrated by Pausanias (5). Oeonus having gone to Sparta, and passing by Hippocoon's House, as his Dog was offering to bite him, he threw a Stone at it; upon which his Sons run up, and knocked him in the Head with Cudgels. Hercules fell furiously upon them; but having received a Wound in the Scuffle, he was forced to retire. Some time after he returned with Assistance, massacred Hippocoon and his Sons, and and finding Juno not averse to his Vengeance, he built a Temple, and sacrificed to her a She-goat; whence came the Sirname of Juno Egophaga, or the Goat-eater, a Name given her by the Lacedemonians.

(1) In Scuto. (2) In Argon. (3) Met. l. 11. (4) Lylio Giraldi. (5) In Lacon.

His wrestling Match with Eryx, whom he vanquished in Sicily, whither he had made Geryon's Oxen swim over by the Straits of Scylla, is no less noted. The Conditions were, That if Hercules was thrown down, Eryx should have his Oxen; and if Hercules got the better of the other, he should be Master of the Country. The Atbenians sent afterwards Dorycius to take Possession of the Canton of Sicily named Erycia from Eryx; but the Egestbeans assassinated him.

Lastly, Hercules having taken many Cities, and executed the Labours which Erystheus had enjoined him, fell in love with Iolé the Daughter of Eurytus, and this Prince having denied her to him, he subdued Oechalia, carried off the Princess, and slew the King. Upon his Return from this Expedition, he sent Lychas for his ceremonial Robes, for which he had Occasion in a Sacrifice he was going to perform. Dejanira, jealous of the Love he bore to Iolé, sent him either a Philter which killed him, or a Tunic besmeared with a Kind of Bitumen which grew near Babylon, and which was no sooner heated than it clung to the Skin; or, if we will not depart from the Antients, and especially from Diodorus, a Tunic dipp'd in the Blood of Nessus, whom he had slain with an Arrow, when that Centaur, after conveying his Wife Dejanira upon Horseback over the River Evenus at Hercules's Return from Calydon (a), offered Violence to that Princess: And as Hercules's Arrows were poisoned, as has has been said, the Blood that issued from his Wound was so too, and he made Dejanira believe that this Tunic would have Effect to prevent her Husband from loving other Women. Whatever be in this, Hercules having put on the Vestment, fell into a desperate Distemper, slew Lychas (a), went to Trachine, whither he had retired after his Exile from Calydon, obliged Dejanira to hang herself; and having consulted the Oracle about his Distemper, had no other Response, but that he was to go with his Friends to Mount Oeta, and there erect a funeral Pile. He took the Meaning of the Oracle, and prepared himself for putting it in Execution. Philoctetes lighted the Funeral Pile when our Heroe was burnt. Thus died the valiant Alcides, about thirty Years before the Trojan War, as I have proved in settling the Date of the Argonautic Expedition. He was only of the Age of fifty two Years (b). Some are of Opinion, that he died at the Court of Ceyx, and that they went and burnt his Body upon Mount Oeta, after the Fashion of the Country. Dejanira did not long survive him: She died at Trachine, and was interred at the Foot of Mount Oeta, near the Town which was afterwards called Herculeæ, where, according to Pausanias (1), she had a Tomb.

(a) He was going to Trachine to get himself expiated from the Murder of Eunomus, the Kinsman of his Father-in-law Oeneus, whom he had slain at a Feast, which obliged him to submit to voluntary Banishment from Calydon, as we learn from Apollodorus and Diodorus. In his Way from Calydon to Trachine he had to cross the River Evenus, which runs not thro' the Town, as some Authors will have it; for then he would have crossed it there either by a Bridge or in a Boat, without having Occasion for the Centaur Nessus.

All Antiquity is well enough agreed as to the Manner of Hercules's Death; but as this Event gave Rise to a fine Tragedy of Sophocles, intitled the Trachinians, and to two others of Seneca under the Titles of Hercules Furens, and Hercules Oeteus, we shall insist a little upon it. Ovid makes this Heroe receive Dejanira's fatal Present upon Mount Oeta, and to have died there without leaving the Place; but Sophocles makes him go to Trachine, and arrive there at the Time of Dejanira's having stab'd herself; and there preyed upon by the secret Poison which consumes him, he pours forth against

(a) Who was thrown into the Sea; whence the Story of his being transformed into a Rock, which bore his Name from that Time. Ovid Met. l. 11.

(b) Eusebius and Isidorus, in Chronic, after Manetho.

(1) In Corinth.

gainst her those doleful Complaints, mixed with Imprecations, which Ovid renders to very good Purpose, and Seneca, in his usual Way, with great Emphasis, and a small Share of good Sense. Ovid embellishes his Speech with this fine Sentiment:

*Defessa jubendo est
Sæva Jovis conjux, ego sum indefessus agendo.*

The Cruel Consort of Jove is tired out with multiplying her rigid Orders, while I am indefatigable in the Execution. Cicero, or according to others, Attilius, judged this Lamentation not unworthy their Pens, and have translated it into Latin. The Reader, I presume, will not be displeased to find it here, were it but to give him some Relief from the Barrenness of these Discussions (1). “ O unparalleled Enterprize of Woman! Dejanira, must I then be thy Victim! ’Tis not by the implacable Juno, nor the barbarous Eurystheus I fall, but by the Hands of my own Spouse. ’Tis she has caught me in this fatal Robe, as in a Net wrought by the Hands of the Furies; oh! detested Garment! oh horrid Poison! it seizes on my Body; it preys upon my Vitals; it penetrates into my Veins: My tainted Blood boils and consumes away: My Body burnt up by a hidden Flame, is wasted to a Shadow. O ye Gods, ye Gods! am I then doomed to expire by the Hands of a Woman, who has attempted and carried into Execution what neither armed Giants, nor monstrous *Centaur*s, nor the Power of Greece, nor all the World besides whom I delivered from a hundred Monsters, were able to accomplish! O my Son, if thou deservest that tender Name, neglect not the Duty thou owest to a wretched Father. Let not fond Compassion to a Mother prevail over the just Revenge I claim upon thy Father’s Murderer. Fly quick, drag that Fury hither, deliver her over to me, and be yourself the Spectator of her Punishment. I shall now prove whether of us you prefer,

(1) Apollod. l. 2.

“fer, her or me. Quick, fly apace I say, have Cou“rage to obey me, take Pity on a Father the most “distrest of Mortals. See thy wretched Parent dis“solved in Tears ; me, whom none ever heard utter “a Groan midst all the Horrors of adverse Fortune !
 “Ah, I blush at my own Weakness. Draw near,
 “my Son, witness the Extremity of my Sufferings.
 “Here are my Entrails. See this Body cruelly rack’d “and tortured. Ah, what Convulsions ! what “Flames ! what Pangs and Tortures still renewed !
 “Almighty Jove, hurl me down to Hell ; launch “thy Thunder and crush me to Pieces. My Wounds “bleed afresh ; I am quite consumed ; what Agony !
 “My Arms, my Arms, whose Strength was once
 “my boasted Glory, what are ye now become ? Are “these the Hands that squeezed to Death the Lion “of Nemea ? Yes, this is the Arm that cut off the “Hydra’s growing Heads ; this the Arm that van“quished the *Centaur*s ; this the Arm whose Blows “laid the Boar of Erymanthus gasping on the Ground, “that dragg’d Cerberus from Hell, that tore in “Pieces the Dragon, the Keeper of the golden Fruit ;
 “this the Arm signalized by numberless Exploits,
 “and never disarmed by Mortal. Do you know it ?
 “To what sad Plight do you see it now reduced !
 “bruised, shattered, emaciated, it languishes, it is “not to be known. I, the Son of Jupiter and Alc-
 “mena, but what are these Names to me ! even I “am become the Victim of a perfidious Woman.
 “But thus low as I am reduced, I hope for Vengeance “on her guilty Head. Hear me, thou Reproach of “thy Sex ; publish this Truth to the World, Hercu- “les, dead as he appears, shall ever live to be the “Scourge of the Impious.” We must add, imo. Sopho- “cles says not that Nessus gave Dejanira the bloody “Shirt, as it is in Ovid, but some of his own Blood “poisoned by Hercules’s Arrows, enjoining her to keep “it in a secure Place ; and that it was not till such “Time as Dejanira was apprized of the Falshood of her “Husband, that she belmeared a Shirt with it, and sent

sent it to him. A precipitant Jealousy hindered her from giving Heed to all the Precautions of the Centaur; and having recollected, after the Departure of Lycas, that the Lock of Wool which she had employed in besmearing the Shirt, when brought out to Daylight, had taken Fire, she began to suspect that the Blood was rather a Poison than a Philter to regain her Husband's Heart, of whose cruel Agonies she was at the same Time informed; and upon this she stab'd herself to the Heart upon her Nuptial Bed.

2dly, According to Ovid, and others of the Antients, it was Philoctetes lighted the funeral Pile wherein Hercules was consumed; whereas in Sophocles, it is Hilus the Son of that Heroe, after he had been bound to it by Oath, upon Assurance given him that it was the Will of the Gods, and that he could not offend them in obeying his Father.

3dly, 'Tis easy to see that Seneca in his two Tragedies, abandons that noble Simplicity of Sophocles to follow that bloated Enthusiasm, into which a false Genius sometimes rises. But at the same Time it is to be observed, that after having in the one represented Hercules strangely delirious, he makes him die in the other, in a soft and tender Manner, after he had addressed his Father Jupiter in a most moving Prayer, which he had filled with the finest Sentiments.

But to proceed. Hercules had a numerous Progeny, both by his Wives Megara, Dejanira, Iolé, Omphale the Queen of Lydia, at whose Court he is said to have employed his Time in Spinning, because he there led a very effeminate and voluptuous Life; and also by his Mistresses, of whom he had a great many: And as several People valued themselves afterwards on being descended from him, 'tis proper to mention some of the most noted of his Sons. By Omphale the Queen of Lydia, he had Agefilaus (a), of whom Cræsus came; by Epicaſte the Daughter of Egeus, Thessala; by Parthenope

(a) According to Palephatus, he was named Laomedon, or according to others Lamen.

Ithenope the Daughter of Stymphalus, Everes; by Augé the Daughter of Aleus, Telephus; by Astioché the Daughter of Philantus, Tlepolemus; by Astidamia the Daughter of Amintor, Etesipus; by Orchone the Daughter of Peleus, Pasoemon; by Megara Daughter of Creon, Therimachus, Deicoon, Crecntiades, and Deion; by Dejanira the Daughter of Oeneus, Hilus who afterwards married Iolé, Etesipus, and Glicizonus; not to insist on fifty Sons, whom he is said to have had by the fifty Daughters of Thestius; which appears a Fable, as well as what is said of the Children he had by Hebé after his Apotheosis. I am of Opinion too, that several afterwards laid claim without any Foundation, to be descended from this Heroe (a). For the Ancients name so many of them, that 'tis impossible to give them all a Place here.

Such is the History of Hercules, made up, as we have seen, of several strange Adventures. That one Man should have been able to accomplish so many Voyages, and to execute so many Enterprizes, is not easy to be conceived. We are however to observe that he was always accompanied with a Number of Persons, leading about with him Eurystheus's Troops; as Diodorus and the other Ancients remark; and whatever was done by his Orders, has been placed to his Account. I am even persuaded, that his Voyages to Africa and Spain, with all the Adventures there, must relate to the Phenician or Egyptian Hercules, who lived about the Time of Jeshua, long before the Grecian Heroe (b); as also those famous Pillars which he erected near Cadiz (c). We are to think the same Way

(a) See for the Children of Hercules, Lyllo Giraldi.

(b) Accordingly the Ceremonies imployed in his Worship at Tartessus, were Phenician: Phœnicio ritu colitur; Thebanus ipsis non est Deus, sed Tyriorum. Appian. in Iber.

Diodorus and Mela say the same.

(c) Bochart, Chan. l. i. c. 9. is of Opinion, that a mere Equivocation made the Mountains of Abyla and Calpe to be taken in after times for two Pillars, the one of those Mountains being in Africa, and the other in Spain upon the Straits of Gibraltar. If so the Inscription we have mentioned, must have been upon the Pillars of Hercules's Temple at Cadiz, which according to Philostratus were of Gold, and according to Strabo of Bronze.

Way of his Travels to the Gauls and Germany, where probably this Heroe never was. It was also the Phenician Hercules found out the Art of staining Purple, his Dog having by chance ate of an Herb which made his Mouth all red.

M. Loerquer attributes this Invention to Joshua and his Companion Caleb, in his Journey to Palestine, because in the Phenician Language Caleb signifies a Dog: Accordingly Vossius takes Hercules to be the same with Joshua. We are likewise to detach from Hercules's History several other Actions, such as his Fight with the Giants, which refers to the Egyptian Hercules, that great General of Bacchus's or Osiris's Army; a Fight which happened, no doubt, many Ages before the Birth of Alcmena's Son. We are to judge much the same Way of the Adventure of Prometheus, and in general of all those whereof Greece was not the Theatre.

In fine, we are to observe that whatever great Exploits were atchieved in that heroic Age were attributed to Hercules, that is, to Force and Valour; thus the Separation of Calpé from Abyla; the Overthrow of the Giants near Arles; the Passage over the Alps, at that Time impracticable: All these great Events, were put down to his Account. Probably they would say of him who got over these Adventures he is a Hercules, as we say now, such a one is a Sampson, a Cæsar; thus 'tis very difficult to distinguish well what belongs to each of those, to whom the Ancients give the Name of Hercules; every Nation formed to itself a Hercules of the most famous of its Heroes, as has been said at the Beginning of this History, and these in aftertimes came to be confounded. But it will be said, how are we to understand the Poets, when they tell us, that when Hercules offered to engage in the Olympic Games, and no body durst enter the Lifts with him, Jupiter himself combated with him under the Disguise of a Wrestler; and when after a long Struggle, the Advantage was equal on either Side, that God discovered himself, and congratulated his Son on his Strength and Valour?

Our Mythologists will answer, that the Poets in this Fable are alluding to the mysterious Wrestling of Jacob with the Angel of the Lord, who discovered himself in the Morning, after having wrestled with him all the Night, and gave him the Name of Israel, which imports Strong; and to be sure the Resemblance between them is considerable: Besides, the Greeks omitted nothing they could find in foreign Histories, to embellish those of their own Heroes. What makes their Conjecture still more probable, is, that this Fable is delivered by Lycophron (1), who lived in the Time of Ptolomy Philadelphus, and who might have read the Book of Genesis in the Septuagint Translation, which was composed under that Prince's Reign. The same Way are we to judge, continue those Authors, of those Stones which Jupiter made to rain upon the Giants who fought against Hercules, since that bears a great Resemblance to a parallel Story, written in the Book of Joshua (2). Pomponius Mela (3) thus describes that Event upon Occasion of Lacrau, near Arles, a Plain covered with Stones, and which he calls, Lapidum campum (a). As Hercules was fighting with Albion and Belgion, the Sons of Neptune, and had emptied his Quiver upon them, he addressed himself to Jupiter, who struck them down with a Shower of Stones: And indeed there is such a vast Quantity of Stones in that Place, that one would be apt to believe that a Shower of them had fallen.

But that the Reader may not be under the Necessity of believing that the Poets had borrowed their Notions from what they had read in the sacred Books, of which few of them had any Knowledge, I reckon the first Fable may be explained, by saying that some Priest of Jupiter fought against Hercules with equal Advantage; and to heighten the Valour which that Heroe displayed in the Olympic Games, they added, that

(1) In his Cassandra. (2) Ch. 10. (3) L. 2. c. 5.

(a) Herculem contra Albionem & Belgionem Neptuni liberos dimicantem, cum tela defecissent, ab invocato Jove, adjutum imbri lapidum ferunt: credas pluisse, adeo multi passim & late jacent.

that his Antagonist was that God himself. As to the second, I suppose what gave rise to it, is, that in the Place where the Poets make this Combat to have been fought, there is such a vast Quantity of Stones, that it looks as if they had fallen from the Clouds, the Places about not being so full of them. This Plain, to mention it by the by, fed excellent Sheep, which turn over with their Feet, any little Stones where-with the Pasture is covered, and which conceal any Tufts of Grass.

As for the Fable, which imports that the same Hercules fought with Apollo for the Tripod of Delphi, it has no other Foundation, but that our Heroe having gone to consult the Oracle of that God about the Murder of Iphitus; and the Priest not having given him a favourable Answer, he carried off the Tripod of the Temple, in spite of the Priests who made Opposition to him; but the Priestess having reproached him for not treading in the Paths of the Egyptian Hercules whom he had taken for his Patron, he was moved with her Words, and restored it to her again.

Hercules was honoured as a God not long after his Death; his Friend Iolaus performed the Ceremony of his Deification; and as the Fire had not left so much as his Bones unconsumed, he gave out that Jupiter had carried him up to Heaven, to purify them from whatever was mortal in his Nature (a). In confirmation of this Testimony, he added a pretended Prodigy, alledging that so soon as Philoctetes had lighted the funeral Pile, Lightning had fallen upon the Body, and reduced it to Ashes in a Moment. He got a Tomb erected to him upon Mount Oeta, upon which Menetius sacrificed a Bull, and instituted an annual Festival to his Honour. The Thebans followed this Example, as also the other People of Greece, and Temples and Altars were raised to him afterwards in several

I 2

(a) As Fables vary continually, another Tradition bore, that it was Philoctetes burnt this Hero's Body, and concealed the Ashes, as shall be seen elsewhere.

several Places, where he was always considered as a Demi-God.

Again, his Worship resembled that of the other Indigetes, bating some few Circumstances. In the Island of Cos he had a Priestess. In that of Rhodes the Sacrifices offered to him were accompany'd with a thousand Imprecations, as a Memorial of what had happened upon our Heroe's carrying off a Ploughman's Oxen (a), he having pour'd out many Reproaches upon him, at which Hercules only laughed; thus it was thought no greater Honour could be done him, than to repeat those Imprecations in his Sacrifices (1). We read in Athenæus, that the Phenicians offered in sacrifice to Hercules Quails (2), and the Origine of this Practice they said was, that when our Heroe was slain by Typhon, Iolaus had restored him to Life with the Smell of a Quail; the Foundation of which Fable, according to Bochart (3), is that Hercules was subject to the Epilepsy, as we learn from some Authors, and that he was brought to himself by smelling a Quail, the Scent whereof Galen tells us (4), is a useful Remedy in that Disease.

We must not omit here, that the White Poplar Tree was consecrated to our Heroe. Servius interpreting those Verses, where Virgil calls this Tree the Poplar of Hercules, relates the Fable which imports, that our Heroe having descended into Hell, made a Crown of Poplar-leaves, and that what touched the Head, received, or rather retained its white Colour, while the Part of the Leaf that was without, was blackened with the Smoak of which those dreary Regions are full: The Import whereof is, that this Heroe found in Thesprotia, in the Kingdom of Aidoneus whither he travelled, some of that kind of Poplars, and brought of them into Greece, as we read in Pausanias (5), having affected from that Time to wear
Garlands

(a) It was the Thiadamas whom we have spoke of.

(1) Lactantius, Div. Inst. l. 1. c. 21. (2) L. 9. c. 11.

(3) De Animal. Scrip. P. 2. l. 1. c. 19. (4) De partu facili, c. 155. (5) In Eliac. prior. id. l. 5.

Garlands of that Tree; and this is what makes Ovid say :

Ausus es hirsutos mitra redimire capillos, Aptior Herculeâ populus alba coma.

In fine, 'tis proper to remark with Herodotus, that there was some difference between the Worship paid to Hercules, whom they stiled Olympian, and that given to Alcmena's Son; namely, that to the one Sacrifices were offered as to a God, whereas the other had only Honours paid to him, such as are due to Heroes, as has been already said.

Before we close the History of Hercules, whose Adventures we have now related, 'tis proper to explain the several Names given him by the Poets and Historians.

That of Alcides, according to some, was given him from his Grandfather Alceus, or according to others, upon account of his Strength and Valour; that of Hercules, had a Reference to the two Serpents sent by Juno, which he put to Death in his Cradle; for that Name signifying the Glory of Juno, ἀπὸ τῆς Ἥρας τῆς κλεῖς, a laude & celebritate Junonis, seems intended to denote that the Persecutions of that Goddess would signalize him to Posterity. We are told that this Name was given her by the Priests herself.

Olaus Rudbeck, who imagines he has discovered in Sweden his Country, and in the ancient Language thereof, the Origin of most of the Pagan Divinities, offers a very probable Conjecture in relation to this Heroe's Name, which he derives from Her, an Army, and Kulle, Chief; which is very applicable to Hercules; but we cannot determine whether this is that Heroe's Name, or if we are not rather to suppose, that this great Warrior having carried his Arms as far as the Extremity of the North, and having made himself known in Celtica, Germany, and Scythia, as several ancient Authors tell us, the Name of Hercules was from thence communicated afterwards to great Captains, and these two Words, Her and Kulle, used to signify the Leader of an Army. We cannot therefore admit the Consequence which that Author draws from thence ; namely, that the Greeks got this Name from the Scythians, since it may be equally supposed that the northern Countries borrowed it from the Greeks.

Some Authors call him Tyrinthius, from the City Tyrinthus where he was brought up ; Baraicus, from a City in Achaia of that name, famous for an Oracle of our Heroe. The manner of delivering this Oracle was singular ; after those who came to consult him had addressed their Prayer in the Temple that was consecrated to him, they threw four Dice at random, upon the Faces whereof were engraved certain Figures, and then they went and consulted a Tablet where those Figures were explained, taking for the Response of the God, the Interpretation that answered to the Chance they had thrown.

He was also denominated Thasius, from a City of that Name, built in the Island of Thasos, which is in the Egean Sea, by the Phenicians who came from Tyre in quest of Europa, as we learn from Herodotus and Pausanias. The Inhabitants of that Island looked upon this Heroe as their Saviour ; and we are told by Ravellin, that there are Coins whereon this Title is given him. The same People, according to Pausanias, had dedicated to Hercules in the City of Olympia, a brazen Statue ten Cubits high, upon a Pedestal of the same Metal. If Father Tourneimine shall ever make good his Assertion (1), that most of the Heroes of Antiquity were only Pagan Copies of the Messiah, known to all Nations by a Remainder of the Traditions which they had distorted, doubtless he will not omit to make mention of Hercules the Saviour, worshipped by a People, whom Pausanias and Herodotus make to have been originally from Tyre in Phenicia, a Country so near to that where the Prophets lived, who have said so much of the Messiah. No doubt he will also trace the resemblance which Seneca finds between them (2) ; and it must be owned, that either the tragic Poet had borrowed

(1) In the journals of Trevaux. (2) In Hercule.

borrowed the pompous Ideas wherewith he embellishes the Story of that Heroe's Death upon Mount Oeta, from the Accounts delivered at Rome under the Reign of Tiberius, of the Saviour's Death upon Mount Calvary, or it will not be easy to find out what could so exalt his Imagination.

The Name of Melius was given to Hercules, either because he had carried off the Golden Apples of the Garden of the Hesperides (1), as some of the Mythologists will have it (2), or because an Ox which he was going to sacrifice (a) having escaped, a Representation of one was made in Miniature, with an Apple, to which were added Feet and Horns, according to the Manner of those Times of representing Victims, either in Paste or otherwise, when they fell short of real ones.

That of Musagetes, which imports Companion of the Muses, was given him, because he was honoured with Rites of Worship in common with those of the nine Sisters. Historians tell us, that Fulvius built a Temple in the Circus of Flaminius, to the Honour of our Heroe, and of the nine Muses (3), and we see him represented with them on ancient Monuments (4). The ancient Author who speaks of this Temple of Fulvius, says his Motive for building it was, that being Governor in Greece, he had learned that our Heroe was the Companion and Conductor of the Muses: Ædem Herculis & Musarum in circo Flamini, Fulvius ille nobilior, ex pecunia.censoria, fecit, non id modo secutus quod ipse literis & summa Poetæ amicitia duceretur, sed in Græcia cum esset Imperator, acceperat & Herculem Musagetem esse, hoc est comitem ducemque Musarum. This Author, Lyllo Giraldi tells us, is Eumenius; and what I have now quoted he delivers in an Oration intitled, De instaurandis scholis,

I 4

Suetonius

(1) Μῆλον, Malum. (2) Lyllo Giraldi in Herçule.

(a) Pollux says it was a Ram; and he adds, that ever since that Adventure, it was the Custom in Beotia to sacrifice to him those Animals.

(3) Eumenius apud Lyl, Giraldi. (4) Spon. Misc. Erud. Antig.

Suetonius (1), and Ovid (2), likewise make mention of a Temple which Martius Philippus dedicated to Hercules and the Muses; and Plutarch says (3), the Original of this Usage came from Evander, who in gratitude to our Heroe for having taught him certain Sciences, was induced to join his Worship to that of the Goddesses who presided over them. But the true Reason, I take to have been that Hercules being among the Phœnicians the Symbol of the Sun, the Greeks confounded him with their Apollo, and therefore gave him the Appellation of Musagetes. Some have fancied that the Reason of giving Hercules this Name, might be that the Muses being Virgins who are usually subject to fear, had this Heroe given them for their Companion, that his Valour might fortify them against the Insolence of those, who, Pyreneus like, should offer any Insult to them: But without examining whether this Conjecture be well founded, and if the Virgin Goddesses would have been quite safe under the Protection of a Heroe such as Hercules, we shall go on to the Explanation of the other Names that were given to this Demi-God.

That of Myagrus, or Fly-hunter, was given to him, as well as to Jupiter, for Reasons which I have already assigned. That of Polyphagus, of Pamphagus, or Buphagus, upon account of his Gluttony, which was so excessive that the Argonauts dismissed him from their Crew, as has been said, because he ate up all their Provisions.

We are told, that our Heroe having one Day carried off the Oxen of a Peasant named Thiodamas (a), he ate up a whole one at a single Meal, as I have already remarked; add to this, that he had three Rows of Teeth, as we learn from the Poet Ion.

That of Cynosarges, from an Adventure which I am going to relate. As a Citizen of Athens named Dydymus, or Diomus, according to Stephanus and Hesychius, was going to offer a Sacrifice to Hercules, a white Dog seized

(1) In Augusto. (2) In Fastis. (3) In Q. Q.

(a) This Adventure having happened at Lindus in Rhodes, hence Hercules was named Lindius.

seized upon the Victim, and carried it off. Dydimus upon this, being at a Loss what to do, heard a Voice enjoining him to erect an Altar in the Place where the Dog had stopp'd, which accordingly he put in Execution, giving Hercules, as we read in Hesychius, the Surname of Cynosarges, from that white Dog. Plato however says, our Heroe was so called from the Name of the Citizen (a).

Upon a Vase dug up at Malta, and sent in the Year 1733 to Cardinal Polignac, we find the Epithet Archegetes, given to Hercules; a Word importing the same as Dux, Princeps. Malta had received a Colony of Carthaginians from Tyre; and Hercules being the principal Divinity of the Tyrians, no wonder that they gave him this Epithet; but 'tis remarkable that no ancient Author has taken Notice of it, and that this is the only Monument dug up where we meet with it, while Thucydides says Apollo had in the Island of Naxos an Altar and Worship under this particular Title of Archegetes; and we see in Golzius, that the ancient Inhabitants of Taormina, originally from Naxos, of whose Ruins their City had been formed, put upon their Coin Apollo's Head with the same Epithet: but it often happens that a Medal, an Intaglio, or other Monument informs us every Day of Facts well known in Antiquity, which we should have been Strangers to had it not been for them.

Hercules had also the Epithet given him of Somnialis: who those particular Gods were who presided over Dreams, and had the Appellation of Dii Somniales, we know not; nor yet what Ministers were set over their Worship. Spon in his Miscellanies of Antiquity, takes Notice of an Inscription, copied at Florence in the Strozzi Palace, where mention is made of Worship paid to Hercules as a God who presided over Sleep, Cultores Herculis Somnialis.

'Tis not easy to find out the Reason why this God was believed

(a) Consult Pausanias in Atticis, and Hesychius who speak of the Temple of Hercules Cynosarges.

believed to preside over Dreams; but 'tis not the less certain that he was believed to do so, and that the Sick were sent to sleep in his Temples, there to receive in a Dream the agreeable Prefage of the Recovery of their Health.

The Sabins termed Hercules, Sanctus, Holy; as we read in Virgil when he speaks of this Heroe (a).

Some Authors confound the Name of Sanctus with that of Sangus, given by the Sabins to the same God. The Romans had erected a Statue to him with this Inscription, Semoni Sango, which induced Saint Justin to take it for that of Simon the Magician. The Name of Medius Fidius was given to this Heroe by the same People, to intimate that he was the Son of Jupiter; for this is the best Interpretation given to those barbarous Terms. Festus Pompeius is of this Opinion in Lyllo Giraldi, who takes these Words to be compounded of Dios, the Name of Jupiter, and Filius; the Ancients frequently changing the l into d. A Passage from Varro quoted by that Mythologist, confirms this Conjecture (b).

The Poets too call Hercules sometimes Trivesperum, to denote that the Night in which he was conceived had been lengthened out to three, as we have said after Plautus.

In

(a) — — — *Et lati quem Sanctum voce canebant
Auctorem gentis.* Æn. 8.

Ovid says the same thing:

*Querebam nonas Sancto, Fidione referrem,
An tibi, Semipater; tunc mihi Sanctus ait:
Cuicunque ex illis dederis, ego munus habebo:
Nomina terna fero, sic voluere Cures.
Hunc igitur veteres donarunt æde Sabini,
Inque Quirinali constituere iugo.* Fast.

Propertius says also:

Salve sanctæ pater; cui non fueret aspera Juno.

We find also ancient Inscriptions where he has the Epithet:

Herculi pacifero, invicto, sancto. See Gruter.

(b) Unde sub Dio Dius Fidius; itaque inde ejus tectum perforatum ut videatur divum, id est, cælum. Quidam negant sub tecto per hunc dejerare oportere. Filius Dium Fidium dicebat Dijovis filium ut Græci Αἰσάγγελος Castorem; & putabat hunc esse Sanctum ex Sabina lingua, Herculem a Græca.

In Zeland was found an Inscription which bore Herculi Magazano. Vossius is very much puzzled about this Word, and he sees no reason why Goropius changed it to Marcusano from the Word Marc, which imports a Boundary in the Gothic Language; but Olaus Rudbeck, who understood that Language better than either Goropius or Vossius, derives this Word from ma, valere and mageo, vis, potestas; which is more suitable to this Heroe, since he had never been the God of the Landmarks (a).

I shall not insist here on what has been already said, that every Nation had a Hercules of its own; the Egyptians called theirs Ozochor, or Chon. It is he, if we may believe Diodorus, that was the General of Osiris's Troops, and who, according to an ancient Author, gave his Name to the People in Italy, whose Country he had cleared of some Tyrants (1). The Cretans surnamed him Idean, from Mount Ida, which is in their Island. This is that Hercules, who, as we learn from Diodorus and Pausanias, founded and first celebrated the Olympic Games long before the Birth of Alcides, who likewise celebrated them in his turn.

The latter of these Authors now named, speaks also of a Hercules of Canopus, a City of Egypt; but I take him to be the same with the Egyptian Hercules.

The Indians named their Hercules, according to Eusebius (2), Desanaus, or as others write it, Desanas, Desinaas, Desines, and Dasinaus; Hesychius fixes the true Pronunciation Δοράσνας ὁ Ἡρακλῆς πᾶς Ἰνδοῖς. This is he whom Cicero (3) takes to be the same with Belus, quintus in India, qui Belus dicitur; the fifth is Belus, who is worshipped in India.

The Tyrians stiled their Hercules, Melchrates, according to the Testimony of Sanchoniathon in Eusebius; and as this Name appears to be the same with that of Melicerta, which imports King of the City, 'tis probable

(a) See what has been said of this Hercules Magazanus, v. 2.

b. 7.

(1) Antiochus Xenophanes, apud L. Giraldi. (2) In Chronic. p. 490. (3) De Nat. Deor. l. 3.

bable that this was an ancient King of Tyre signalized by his heroic Atchievements. The Celtes, or the Gauls, gave him the Appellation of Ogmion. Vossius (1) owns his Ignorance as to the Etymology of this Name; but Olaus Rudbeck (2) derives it, with a good deal of probability, from the ancient Gothic Language, in which Oggur, whence the Celtes formed their Ogmion, imported powerful by Sea; and Aggalir, powerful by Sea and Land, such as he probably was whom the ancient Gauls acknowledged for their Hercules.

The Spaniards, according to some ancient Authors, gave him the Name of Endovillicus, at least we find the Name of this Heroe joined in Inscriptions with that of this Divinity; but I have proved in Vol. II. Book IV. that Endovillicus and Hercules were different Divinities.

Besides these Names, and some others which I omit because they are easy to be understood, and contain nothing of Importance, Pausanias gives him some which are no where else to be met with, on which 'tis proper to insist a little.

That of Manticlus he had from a Temple that was built to him by a Leader of a Colony of this Name, who came and settled in the Island of Zacintbus, now Zante (3). That of Buraicus, from a Chapel and a Statue which he had in a Grotto, near the River Bura (4) where he had also an Oracle, which gave Responses by Dice. In Beotia he had the Surname of Charops, from a Temple which he had in the Place where he was said to come up when he brought with him the Dog of the God of Hell (5). The Name of Erythrus was also given him from a Temple which he had at Erythræ in Achaia (6). Pausanias remarks that the Statue of this God, which is in the Temple of Erythræ, resembles the Egyptian Statues wrought with Art. The God, says he, is upon a kind of Raft, and the Erythreans say it was thus brought from Tyre into Phenicia,

(1) De Idol. l. 1. c. 35. (2) Att. c. 53. § 3. (3) In Messen.
(4) In Attic. (5) In Eect. (6) In Achaic.

Phenicia, by Sea. They add, that the Raft having entered into the Ionian Sea, stop'd at Juno's Promontory, otherwise Messara, half Way between Erythræ and Chio. So soon as those of Erythræ and Chio perceived the Statue of the God, all strove to have the Honour of drawing it ashore, and to that Effect exerted their utmost Efforts. An Erythraean, named Phormio, a Fisher by Occupation, having lost his Sight by a Disease, was apprized in a Dream, that if the Erythraean Women would cut off their Hair, and thereof make a Rope, they might draw ashore the Raft without any Difficulty. When none of the Women of Erythræ thought fit to comply with the Dream, some Thracian Women, who, tho' free born, were in Slavery at Erythræ, made a Sacrifice of their Hair: By this Means the Erythraeans got the Statue of the God in their Possession; and to reward the Zeal of those Thracian Women, enacted that they alone should have the Liberty of entering into Hercules's Temple. Those of that City, continues the same Author, shew at this Day the Rope made of Hair, and carefully preserve it: As to the Fisher, we are assured that he recover'd his Sight, and had the Enjoyment of it the rest of his Days.

Hercules was surnamed Hippodetes (1), in a Plain of Beotia, call'd the Plain of Tenerus, from the Name of a Soothsayer, who was the Son of Apollo and Melia; and this Name was given him, because the Army of the Orchomenians having come into that Place, Hercules, by Night, tied their Horses to their Chariots, and entangled them so, that the next Day the Enemy could not make Use of them.

The Surname of Promachus (2) derived its Original from a Temple which was called by the same Name, and was consecrated to this God, near the City Thebes, where he had a wooden Statue, of a very ancient Taste, which was believed to be done by Dedalus; and another of white Marble, the Work of Xenocritus of Thebes. A little further, in the open Field, was to be seen a

(1) In Beot. (2) Ibid.

Statue of Hercules, surnamed Rhinoclustes (1), because he cut off the Noses of the Heralds of the Orchomenians, who came to demand Tribute of the Thebans.

We find also, in antient Authors, several other Names or Epithets of Hercules, but they are either such as are easy to be understood, or the Commentators have taken Care to explain them.

This would be the proper Place to speak of the different Figures of Hercules, which Time has preserved to us; but as they are to be seen in the Antiquaries, Beger having collected them into one Volume, I shall not tire the Patience of the Reader by dwelling longer upon this Subject. All I shall observe is, that our Heroe usually appears under the Figure of a strong robust Man, with a Club in his Hand, and clad in the Lion's Skin of Nemea, which he sometimes wears over his Shoulder, and sometimes it covers his Head in a very coarse Manner. Be it owing to the Fancy of the Engraver, or to some Mystery which we know not, so it happens, that he is sometimes represented in Attitudes, and with Symbols that are singular; but one Glance of the Eye upon the Figures themselves will teach the Reader more than a long Dissertation.

I said he was represented as a robust Man; and tho' the Exploits he performed did not prove him to have been so, the Picture of him drawn by Dicearchus, quoted by Clement of Alexandria, would be sufficient to convince us of it; since that ancient Author tells us he was extreamly nervous, of a square Figure, a swarthy Complexion, with an Eagle Nose, big Eyes, a thick Beard, &c. to which the Philosopher Hicronymus adds curled Hair, and horridly negligent.

(1) In Beot.

C H A P. VII.

An Abridgment of the History of Hercules's Successors, to the Time of their Re-establishment in the Peloponnesus.

CEYX had the Care of the Education of our Hero's Children, which inspired Eurystheus with so much Jealousy least they should very soon be in a Condition to avenge their Father, that he threatened the King of Trachine to make War upon him, if he did not dismiss them from his Court, together with Iolaus, and the Troops that had served under this Heroe. Ceyx, terrified with these Menaces, pray'd them to depart; and Epalius, King of the Dorians, gave them a favourable Reception, and even adopted Hillus, whom Hercules had by Dejanira, thereby acknowledging the Obligation he owed to his Father, who had restored him to his Dominions. Again being obliged to quit that Court, they retired to Athens to Theseus, the Relation and Friend of Hercules, who gave them a Settlement in Attica. In the mean Time, Eurystheus having led an Army against them, the Athenians opposed him with all their Forces, and gave him Battle, under the Conduct of Theseus and Hillus, put him to Flight, and Hillus slew Eurystheus with his own Hand. The whole Family of that unfortunate Prince was cut off in this Battle. Thus ended that Branch of Perseus's Successors; and the Crown of Mycenæ, which had continued a long Time in his Family, devolved upon that of Pelops; Atreus his Son, the Governor of Mycenæ (1), having got himself declared King thereof, after the Death of Eurystheus. The Heraclidæ, after his Defeat, retired into the Peloponnesus, and made themselves Masters of it: but the Pestilence having begun to lay waste their Army, Recourse was had to the Oracle, and the Answer was, that they having entered too soon into that Country, there was no Way for them to put a Stop to the Calamity, but by departing speedily, and they accordingly obey'd the Oracle.

Having

(1) He was also his Brother-in-law.

Having re-enter'd thither three Years after, according to the Interpretation they had put upon the Response of the Oracle, which had bid them wait for the third Crop, Atreus opposed them with his Troops, and gave them Battle, where Thomacus, one of the Chiefs of the Heracidae, was slain. Hillus seeing the War likely to continue, sent the Enemy a Challenge to fight with any one who should accept of it, on Condition that if he was victorious, Atreus should be obliged to resign the Crown to the Heracidae, his lawful Successors; but if he was defeated, his Descendants should not be permitted to re-enter the Peloponnesus till Eighty (1) or a Hundred Years after (2). Echemus, the King of Tegea in Arcadia, accepted the Challenge, slew Hillus, and, according to the Treaty, obliged the Heracidae to quit the Peloponnesus, and Atreus remain'd King of Mycenæ.

Cleodeus, the Son of Hillus, made an Attempt, but in vain, to re-enter thither some Time after; in which Enterprize Aristomachus his Son lost his Life. His three other Sons, Themenes, Chresphontes, and Aristodemus, having equipped a Fleet at Naupactus, renewed the same Attempt, so much did this Conquest lie at their Heart. While they were drawing the Troops together, Arnus, a famous Soothsayer of that Time, arrived at Naupactus; but Hyppoco'es, the Son of Phylas, and Grandson of Hercules, who took him for a Spy, having put him to Death, the Pestilence began to ravage the Camp. Upon this, the Oracle was consulted, according to Custom, and the Answer was, that Apollo, by this Plague, was avenging the Death of his Prophet, and that if they would appease the God, the Murderer must be banished, and Funeral Games instituted in Honour of Arnus, which accordingly was put in Execution, and those Games were afterwards very famous, especially at Lacedemon.

The Heracidae resolving after this to set Sail, would needs, before their Departure, consult the Oracle, which ordered them to chuse for their Leader one who had three Eyes. Oxilus, an Etolian by Birth, blind of an Eye, whom they found in their Way, mounted on Horseback, was reputed to be the Man whom the Gods had mark'd out to lead them, and him they chose for their Head. He being a Man of natural Courage, and animated besides with the Hope of obtaining Elis for his Property, urged their Departure, and their Fleet being very soon got ready, they made a Descent upon the Peloponnesus. The Acbeans and Ionians, who had derived their Names from Ion and Acbeus, the Sons of Xutus, were the next who took Possession of that Province. The Heraclidæ drove them out of Argos, Lacedemon, and Mycenæ, and shared among them these three Cities; Temenes had the first, Aristodemus the second, and Mycenæ fell to Chresphontes, who afterwards made himself also Master of Messene, whence he banished the Descendants of Nestor, Alcmeon, and Peon, who fled for Refuge to Athens. His Son Epitus, after him, succeeded to the Crown of Messene, and gave the Name of Epitides to the Kings his Successors. The one-eyed Oxilius got Elis, which had been promised him: Iphitus, who renewed the Olympic Games, is noted among his Descendants. Lacedemon remained in the Possession of the two Sons of Aristodemus, Eurysthenes and Procles; which made two Lines of Spartan Kings, who reigned there a long Time. The ancient Inhabitants of Argos and Lacedemon settled in the Cities which the Ionians possessed in Egialia, to which they gave the Name of Achaia.

(1) Vell. 1. Sup. c. 21.

(2) Schol. upon Thuc. 1. 1.

Some Time after, Aletes, one of the Heraclidæ, in Exile for the Murder of Arnus the Diviner, whom his Father had slain at Naupactus, seized upon Corinth, which the Posterity of Sisyphus had possessed till then.

Thus was peopled almost the whole Peloponnesus, by the Successors of Hercules, who had been expelled from thence by the Pelopidæ.

All these Revolutions were not brought about, as we have seen, at the same Time. After the Death of Hercules, Hyllus, and the other Heraclidæ, continued a Year or two at Trachine. Being obliged to depart thence, they repaired to Athens, where they lived for some Time; and it was not till the End of eight Years, that Eurystheus, the irreconcilable Enemy to Hercules's Name, came and attacked them. This War lasted three Years, and he was slain in the fourth.

This Return of the Heracidae into the Peloponnesus, having fallen out eighty Years before the taking of Troy, makes one of the principal Æra's of the Greek History, and that which is best marked in their Annals. Were it not for what has been now said, we should be at a Loss to know that Part of Greece which was called the Peloponnesus, which comprehended several petty Kingdoms, to which the Descendants of Hercules furnished Kings for a long Series of Generations.

C H A P. VIII.

The Sequel of the History of Theseus.

THESEUS had too great a Connection with Hercules his Kinsman, whom he had accompanied in almost all his Expeditions, not to subjoin his History to that of the Heroe: And tho' we have been obliged to speak of him upon Occasion of Minos II. I judged, however, that the rest of his Adventures required a separate Article.

Besides what Accounts we have of Theseus from Diomedorus Siculus, Apollodorus, and in general all the Mythologists, Plutarch has written his Life, at great length, and Meursius has carefully collected all that is to be known of him from Antiquity; but the Illustrations of that judicious Critic have not always given Light to these two Compilers. We shall endeavour to shun that Fault, and examine the Facts which we advance.

Egeus, the ninth King of Athens, and of the Race of Erechtheus (a), having no Issue, and seeing new Parties

(a) Here is his Genealogy. Erichthonius, or Erechtheus, the Son of Falcan and Minerva, or rather of Cranæus.

Pandion I.

Pandion II.

Erechtheus,

Egeus,

Cecrops,

Theseus.

By the Mother's Side he derived his Original from Pelops the Son of Tantalus, who was the Father of Pitheus, of whom was born Æthra.

Parties still formed against him, went to Delphi, to consult the Oracle of Apollo, and the Priestess order'd him to have no Commerce with any Woman, before he returned to Athens. This Injunction was but ill obey'd; for Egeus having gone to Trezene (1), the sage Pitheus, whom he inform'd that the Pallantides his Nephews (b) were beginning to form a Conspiracy against him, because they saw he had no Children, gave him privately in Marriage his Daughter Ethra. Egeus set out some Time after on his Return to Athens; and Pitheus, who was unwilling to discover the Match, for Fear of incurring the Enmity of the Sons of Pallas, in order to save the Honour of his Daughter, who was with Child, gave out, that Neptune, the great Divinity of Trezene, had fallen in Love with her, which made Theseus pass for the Son of that God.

Egeus, at setting out from Trezene, had put his Sword and his Shoes under a large Stone, and recommended to Ethra, that if she was delivered of a Male Child, she would not send him to him till he was able to lift that Stone. Pitheus, the most renown'd for Wisdom in that Age, took great Care of the Education of young Theseus, and gave him for his Governor Chronidas, who, by his Application and Abilities, answered so well the Intentions of his Pupil's Grandfather, that the Athenians afterwards honoured him as a Demi-God, sacrificing to him every Year a Ram, on the Day that preceded the Feast of Theseus: thus doing Honour, as Plutarch remarks, with more Reason and Justice, to the Memory of him who had formed their Heroe's Manners, than to Silanus and Parrhasius, who had only made Statues and Pictures of him.

When Ethra his Mother saw her Son robust and full grown, she led him to the Place where his Father had concealed the Sword; he lifted the Stone, took his Father's Sword, and resolved to go and make himself

K 2 known

(1) Plutarch in Theseo. Diodor. l. 4. and some others.

(b) They were the Sons of Pallas his Brother. Pandion had left four Sons, Egeus, Lycus, Pallas, and Nisus, and had left to each of them a Part of his Kingdom.

known at Atbens, in spite of the Remonstrances of his Grandfather, who represented to him the Danger to which he was going to expose himself, the Ways he had to pass from the Peloponnesus to Athens being full of Robbers, upon account of Hercules's Absence, who was then in Lydia with Omphale. Pitheus therefore omitted nothing that might have Influence to divert his Grandson from his Purpose, or at least to oblige him to travel by Sea. He gave him a Description of these Robbers one after another, and set forth to him all the cruel Treatment they used towards Strangers; but the Glory and Valour of Hercules had now of a long Time enflamed his Courage: He esteemed nothing in Comparison of him, and listened always with eager Attention to those who entertained him with a Description of that Heroe's Person, especially to such as had seen him, and were capable to inform him in any of the Particulars of his Life, to which they had been Eye-Witnesses. Thus he was raised to such Admiration of the Life of Hercules, that his Actions became the Subject of his Dreams by Night, fired his Soul with a noble Emulation by Day, and animated him to an ardent Desire of imitating the great Example.

The Relation that was between them still heighten'd his Emulation; for they were Sons of two Cousin Germans, his Mother Etbra being the Daughter of Pitheus, and Alcmena again the Daughter of Lysidice. Now Lysidice and Pitheus were the Offspring of Hippodamia and Pelops. He was therefore filled with conscious Shame and Indignation to think that Hercules should have travelled all the World over in Pursuit of Freebooters, and such like, of whom he cleared both Sea and Land; whereas he, on the contrary, shun'd the Opportunity of encountering those who came in his Way; thus dishonouring, by such base Conduct, the Memory of him who was, by the Report of the People, his reputed Father, and having no other Trophy to carry it to his real Father but Shoes and a Sword, instead of appearing before him crown'd with Glory. Thus he set out courageously, resolving to attack none, but to stand bravely to his own Defence. It

It was not long before he met with Adventures: as he was passing thro' the Lands of Epidaurus, near the Sarronic Gulf, which was the Way that led from Trezene to the Isthmus; Periphetes, who was armed with a Club, and was therefore called the Club-bearer, had the Insolence to come up to him; and stop him: Theseus fought and slew him, and, overjoyed at having made himself Master of his Club, bore it always about with him, as Hercules wore the Lion's Skin. That Skin served to shew the enormous Size of the Beast which Hercules had slain; and the Club which Theseus bore, shewed that it was capable of being won from the Hands of a Periphetes, but that it was impregnable in his. From thence traversing the Isthmus of Corinth, he punished Sinius the Pine-bender, in the same manner as that Giant had put several Passengers to Death. Not that he had ever learned any such Art, or had been exercised therein; but he shewed, by that Essay, that Valour is always superior to Art and Exercise. This Sinius had a Daughter, grown up, and very handsome, named Perigone, who, upon her Father's Death, had fled: Theseus went every where in quest of her; but she had hid herself in a thick Wood, over-grown with Reeds and Sparagus, which she invoked with a Childish Simplicity, as if they had been capable of hearing her, praying them to hide her well, and save her from being discovered; and promising them with an Oath, that if they did her that Piece of Service, she would never pluck them up, nor burn them. In the mean time, Theseus called out to her, and made her a promise that he would take Care of her, and do her no Injury. Perigone, moved with these Promises, came forth from her Hiding-Place, and delivered herself up to him. Theseus had by her a Daughter, who was called Menalipe. Her he gave afterwards in Marriage to Deioneus, the Son of Eurytus King of Æchalia. By this Marriage was born Ioxus, who, together with Eurytus, was Chief of the Colony that was led to Caria, whence came the Ioxides, who, from Father to Son, preserved the Custom, not to burn nor pluck up the Reeds and Sparagus ; but, on the contrary, to pay them a sort of religious Regard, and particular Veneration.

There was then at Crommyon, a Sow which was called Phaia, which was no contemptible Animal ; being both very dangerous, and very difficult to be overcome. Theseus traced out the Animal, encountred and slew it, that it might not be thought Necessity alone had reduced him to undertake all his Exploits ; and besides, being persuaded that a virtuous Person ought to encounter bad Men, only by way of Self-defence from their Insults, but that it is his Duty to seek out the fierce wild Beasts, and to attack them first. Others, however, tell us, that this Phaia was a Woman of Crommyon, who prostituted herself to all Comers, and who lived on Murders and Robberies ; that she was called a Sow, upon account of her corrupt Manners and bad Life, and that she was at last put to Death by Theseus.

Near the Frontiers of Megara he defeated Sciron, and threw him from the Top of the Rocks into the Sea ; because he robb'd Passengers ; or, according to others, because, thro' an insupportable Insolence and Pride, he presented his Feet to Strangers, which he ordered them to wash, and while they were doing it, he pushed them down headlong from the Rocks. 'tis true, the Historians of Megara, combating against Length of Time, as says Simonides, oppose this Tradition, and maintain, that Sciron was neither a Robber, nor a bad Man ; but, on the contrary, the declared Enemy of that Sort of People, and the Friend of the just and virtuous : for every Body knows, say they, Æacus was esteemed the most holy Man of his Time ; it is as certain that Cycbreus, the Salaminian, had divine Honours paid him at Athens, and the Virtue of Peleus and Telamon is well known. Now Sciron was the Son-in-law of Cycbreus, and Æacus's Father-in-law, and Grandfather of Peleus and Telamon, who were both born of the Nymph Endeis, the Daughter of Chariclo and Sciron : it is not therefore likely that the greatest and most

most virtuous Persons in Greece; would have contracted Alliance with a Robber, by taking from him, and giving him what Men hold most sacred; and of highest Value. The same Historians add, that Theseus did not kill Sciron in his first Voyage to Athens; but a long Time after, when he took Eleusis, which was then in the Possession of the Megarians, and banished from thence Diocles; who was the Governor thereof.

In passing thro' Eleusis, he had a Wrestling Match with Cercyon the Arcadian, and worsted him. From thence arriving at Hermione, he put to Death the Giant Damastes, who was called Proustes, that is, who stretches by force, by obliging him to equal the Dimensions of his Bed, as he had done to his Guests! And Theseus followed this Rule in Imitation of Hercules, who punished those who attacked him with the same kind of Death, which they had prepared for him. Thus it was he sacrificed Busiris, strangled Anteus in wrestling with him, slew Cygnus in a single Combat, beat out Temerus's Brains, whence came the Proverb, the Temerian Evil; for 'tis probable that Temerus broke the Heads of Passengers, by dashing his own against theirs. Theseus went on punishing in like manner the Infesters of Society, and, with Justice, exercised upon them the same Punishment which they had unjustly inflicted upon others.

Theseus having arrived upon the Banks of the Cephisus, found there the Family of the Pytalides, who were come to purify him with all the customary Ceremonies. After having staid some Days in that Place, he entered Athens on the eighth of the Month Hecatombeon, which answers to the Month of June, and he found that City in strange Confusion; Egeus, his Father, giving himself up to the Management of Medea, who promised, by her Drugs, to procure him Children. After having staid there some Days, he made himself known, at the Time that Medea was going to poison him, as we learn from Plutarch; but this appears not conform to Truth: For either Theseus had been at the Conquest of the Golden Fleece before he went to Athens, as several ral Authors will have it, and in that Case, he was certainly known to Medea, with whom he had performed that long Voyage; or the Conquest of the Argonauts had not yet happened, and then Medea could not be at Athens when Theseus arrived there, since it was Jason brought her from Colchis; thus I cannot understand how the Thing could happen as Plutarch relates it. This Author did not always give himself the Trouble to examine the Facts he delivers; and being but a Transcriber of what he had read, he has not always remembered in one Place what he had said in another. And indeed, if Theseus found Medea at Athens for the first Time, at his coming thither from Trezen, how could he have been in Colchis? That Author, however, adopts the Opinion of those who asserted that he had made that Voyage, and he seems to me to have copied Ovid rather than good Historians. I reckon it is better to say that Theseus, returning from some of his Voyages after a long Absence, got Information that his Father had married Medea; and that she, dreading his Return, formed a Faction against him, and perhaps having even attempted to poison him, to secure the Crown to the Child whereof she was pregnant, Theseus got her banished from the Court.

The Pallantidæ, upon Theseus's being acknowledged, could not contain their Resentment, and having divided themselves into two Bodies, would have given no small Trouble to that Prince, had it not been for the Treachery of Leos, one of their Leaders, who having declared the whole Plot, Theseus made so good Use of his Information, as to defeat the one Party, and put the other to flight, confirming, by that Victory, his Father's tottering Power: after this, he went to Trezen, to receive Expiation.

Some time after, having undertaken a Voyage to Crete, he delivered his Country, as has been said, from the Tribute which it payed to Minos the second; but upon his Return, he found that his Father was dead. Then it was he laboured to put in Execution a Scheme he had formed long before, to reduce into one Body of a City all the Inhabitants of Attica, who till then had been dispersed in several Villages. He met with considerable Opposition, especially from the Rich, and he reduced them only by giving them the Promise of a popular Form of Government, wherein he reserved to himself only the Power of making War, and of seeing to the Execution of the Laws. As in every City there was a Court where the Assemblies were held, and public Affairs decided, without having recourse to the Sovereign, except on Occasions of the utmost Importance, which was a considerable Limitation of his Authority; he began with the demolishing of these, suppressed the Magistrates who administered Justice therein, built for himself an Edifice to serve for that Purpose, gave the Name of Athens to the new City, and united all the People by a Sacrifice and common Festival called the Panathenaia, which he substituted to the Athenians in place of that which every City celebrated in particular. To this Feast he joined another, which by its Name Metœicia, or the Removal, perpetuated the Memory of the Change he had introduced.
of

After having executed so critical an Undertaking, Theseus went to consult the Oracle of Delphi, to know in what manner he was to govern this new People; and the Answer given him was, that he ought by all means to beware of ruling in an arbitrary Manner. Upon his return to Athens, he preferred the popular to monarchic Government, reserving to himself however the Power of seeing to the Observance of the Laws; and his whole Thoughts were employed in the right Regulation of the rising Republic, whereof he was always the Head. This Form of Government, then absolutely new in Greece, invited a great many People to Athens; and to hinder that promiscuous Rendezvous of People from introducing thither Disorder and Confusion, he divided the whole into three Bodies. The first was composed of the Nobles, the second of the Artisans, and the third of the Labourers, and to each he granted Privileges, whereof they had the peaceable Possession. We know how far the second of these Bodies carried afterwards afterwards their Improvements, especially in the Works of Sculpture and Painting.

Pausanias observes, that it was for having thus persuaded all the People of Attica to unite in one City, henceforth to make but one People, that he introduced the Worship of the Goddess Pitbo, or Persuasion, and that of Venus, because this Goddess was to be the common Bond of all the People. Theseus not satisfied that Peace should reign only in the City, if it did not extend also to the neighbouring People, in order to remove the Grounds of Quarrel which might have arisen about the Extent of their Territory, he regulated the Limits thereof, and with the unanimous Consent of the Ionians and Peloponnesians set up a Pillar, on which was engraved this Inscription: What lies to the East is Ionia; what lies to the West, belongs to the Peloponnesus.

As Religion always was the Bond which most strongly unites People, otherwise separated by different Interests, he renewed in Honour of Neptune the Isthmic Games, which had been long disused, since they were first instituted by Sisyphus King of Corinth, on Occasion of Melicerta's Deification; and as probably they were only celebrated by Night, resembling rather a Funeral Pageant, than a Festival, he order'd them henceforth to be solemnized by Day, and that with a Magnificence becoming the God of the Sea. As Hercules and he had cleared Greece of that vast Number of Robbers who infested it, and who without Mercy put those to the Sword whom Devotion drew to those Games, they were now frequented with Safety, and the Concourse of People that flock'd thither from all Quarters, made the Celebration of them very solemn. Nor is it only Plutarch, supported by the Testimony of Historians more ancient than he, that relates this Fact; the Chronicle of Paros gives a Detail of the different Celebrations of these Games, which gives this Narration all the Weight it requires; this Chronicle, as is known, being the most authentic Voucher we have. All these Changes fell out, according to Eusebius, during the first Year of Theseus's Reign, or according to other Historians, in the two first.

Theseus's

Thus far I may flatter myself that I have sufficiently followed the Order of Chronology in the Recital of Theseus's Actions; in the Sequel it will be easy for the Reader to range the Facts according to the Æras which I have established for the Events in which he was concerned: For there was not one in that Age so celebrated for Heroes, wherein he did not act a Part. All Antiquity attests, that he was at the War of the *Centaur*s with Hercules his near Relation, and Pirithous his faithful Friend; and to mention it by the by, their Friendship had commenced upon an Occasion which was like to have set them at Variance for ever. Pirithous struck with the glorious Account of Theseus's high Exploits, resolved to measure Swords with him, and sought an Opportunity to pick a Quarrel with him; but when these two Heroes met, they were struck with a secret Admiration of each other, their Heart discovered itself without any Disguise, they embraced one another instead of fighting, and swore to maintain an eternal Friendship.

Theseus, according to the most probable Opinion, joined also in the Conquest of the Golden Fleece. 'Tis beyond Doubt that he was likewise at the Hunting of Calydon, and at the War which followed it; to this all the Ancients are agreed. Tho' he had not been engaged in the Quarrel of the two hostile Brothers, 'tis certain however, that he obliged Creon to give Burial to the Argives who had died in the first War of Thebes; in a Word, there was no Expedition, no War in all those Times wherein he did not bear a considerable Part; not to insist on the Bull of Marathon, which laid waste all the Plains of Tetrapolis, and was taken by him alive, and offered in Sacrifice to Apollo at Delphi (a); so that it became a current Proverb, Nothing without Theseus,
Non

(a) Pausanias, who relates the same Fact, says he sacrificed it to Minerva, and Diodorus Siculus, who agrees with Plutarch, adds, that it was Egeus his Father performed the Sacrifice; but these small Variations, instead of weakening the Credibility of the Fact, rather confirm it.

Non sine Theseo. A new, and at the same Time an uncontested Argument that the Events of that fabulous Age, whereof we have seen the History, were not at so great a Distance from one another, as is commonly believed, and that they may be reduced, without Danger of deviating from the Truth, to the Æras I have fixed.

The Expedition of this Heroe against the Amazons is also reckoned by the Ancients in the Number of his Actions. For that end, we are told, he went to the Banks of the Thermodon, and after having given them Battle returned to Greece. 'Tis further said, that those Heroines came afterwards and invaded Attica, attacking Theseus in the very Centre of his own Dominions; but he routed them, and took Antiope Prisoner, by whom he had the unfortunate Hippolitus. But we must not dissemble that several Authors take both the Voyage and War for a mere Fiction (a). In the mean Time, were I to support the Truth thereof, I might quote several ancient Historians, cited by Plutarch, who would favour me; and what is still stronger, a great Number of Monuments scattered up and down in different Places of Attica, to attest that these Heroines came thither to make War.

Be that as it will, to come to something more certain, all Antiquity agrees that this Heroe, already signalized by a thousand glorious Actions, having heard of the Beauty of young Helena the Daughter of Tyndarus resolved to carry her off, tho' she was then but ten Years of Age, or only seven, according to some Ancients; and he himself was then fifty at least. Thus having taken with him his dear Pirithous, the faithful Companion of his Travels, he went to Sparta and carried her off. They drew Lots for her, says Plutarch (1), and she having fallen to Theseus, he bound himself to go with his Friend to carry off the Wife of Aidoneus. According to their Agreement, he left Helena at

(a) See what has been said on this Subject in the History of Hercules.

(1) In Theseo.

at Aphidnes in the Hands of his Mother Etbra, and then went to Epirus with Pirithous, to carry off Proserpine the Wife of Aidoneus. This second Enterprize did not succeed so well with him as the first; Pirithous was slain therein, or devoured by the Dogs of that Prince; and Theseus detained Prisoner (a) was released by Hercules, who having demanded him of Aidoneus, as the greatest Obligation he could lay upon him, he gave him up to him frankly, as has been said in the History of that Heroe.

It was this Voyage, to mention it transiently, that furnished the Poets with a Handle to say, for Reasons already assigned elsewhere, that this Heroe had descended to the infernal Regions, on which a Poem was founded, intitled, The Descent of Theseus into Hell. Our Heroe set at Liberty from his Imprisonment went home to his own Dominions, where his Party weakened every Day. His first Care was to testify his Gratitude to his Deliverer, for which Purpose he consecrated to him the Parks and the Lands he had got from the Athenians, and which were from that Time no more called Theseia, but Heracleia. Philocorus, in Plutarch informs us, that he reserved to himself only four Fields and Parks.

I said Helen is reckoned to have been but ten Years of Age when Theseus carried her off; it must be owned, however, that ancient Authors affirm she was older; that Theseus, before he set out for Epirus, left her pregnant with his Mother, and that she was delivered of a Daughter. As Pausanias is the only one of the Ancients that has related this Fact with all its Circumstances, I shall transcribe his Account of it (1): “ Not “ far from a Temple of Neptune, says that Author,
“ there is another, dedicated to Lucina, and consecrat“ ed by Helen, when she was brought to Lacedemon, “ after the Departure of Pirithous and Theseus for “ Thesprotia, and after that Castor and Pollux had taken
“ the City Aphidnes; for it is alledged that she was “ then

(a) See the History of Pluto, and that of Hercules.

(1) In Corinth.

“ then pregnant by Theseus, and that being delivered
 “ at Argos, she built that Temple in Honour of Lu- “ cina. We are told further, that she was delivered “ of a Daughter, whose Education was committed to “ Clytemnestra, who was then Agamemnon’s Wife, and “ that afterwards Helen herself was married to Mene- “ laus. And indeed, Sesichorus of Himera, and after “ him Euphorion of Chalcis, and Alexander of Pleuron, “ &c. are therein agreed with the Argives, and have “ all three attested in their Poems, that Helen had a “ Daughter by Theseus, named Iphigenia.”

This is that Princess, whose Character the famous Racine, who gives her the Name of Eryphile, has so finely drawn in his Tragedy of Iphigenia, and whom he makes to have been carried off from Lesbos, where she lived, by Achilles, when before the Departure of the Greeks, he had made himself Master of that City.

During the Absence of Theseus, Castor and Pollux having taken up Arms, made themselves Masters of Apbidnes, and released Helen their Sister, whom they brought back to Sparta with Etbra, who thereby became the Slave of Helen, who carried her to Troy, where she was afterwards ravished by Paris. Pausanias (1) explaining a fine Picture of Polygnotus, adds, that Etbra was therein represented with her Head shaved, as a Mark of her Slavery, and Demophoon her Grandson in the Posture of a Man in Distress, anxious to have her set at Liberty. The same Author says, the Painter must needs have read the Poet Lescheus, who in his Works writes, that Demophoon seeing in the Grecian Camp Etbra, with the other Slaves, after the taking of Troy, demanded her of Agamemnon, but that he gave her not up till Helen had given her Consent to it. Plutarch is therefore in the wrong to refute this Circumstance of the History whereof the Tragic Poets make mention, and Eliau too; so that Pausanias, we see, is not the only one who speaks of it.

The same Plutarch also refutes the History of Muni- tes, or Municbus, who was, we are told, the Son of Demo-

(1) In Phoc.

Demophoon and Laodice, Priam's Daughter. Another Circumstance is, that Ethra, who was Helen's Slave, took Care of that Child, whose Birth, and the Amours of his Father and Mother, were a secret Adventure. The same Author, citing a Verse from the third Book of the Iliad, wherein Homer, speaking of Helen's Slaves, names Ethra the Daughter of Pitheus, says several Authors consider that Verse as spurious. The History of the Captivity of Theseus's Mother is however very well confirmed by the Authors I have cited: And I know not what M. Dacier means in his Note upon that Verse in Homer, where he says, “For they reckon (that is, they who hold this Verse to be spurious) “it “is not probable that Homer would have given the Appellation of Helen's Waiting-Maid to Ethra, who “was her Mother-in-Law, and who had reigned at “Athens.” He seems to suppose that Theseus had married that Princess, and that she was consequently Ethra's Daughter-in-law. 'Tis certain, however, that Helen was then very young, and a Child, as the same Plutarch tells us; and that Theseus, after having carried her off, concealed her at Aphidnes, and saw her no more, the Tyndaridæ having set her at Liberty, while he was confined in Aidoneus's Prison. Again, Where did he find that Ethra had reigned at Athens with her Son?

Plutarch says it was one named Academos that pointed out to the Tyndaridæ the Place where their Sister was: But he is mistaken, and it is better to adhere to Herodotus (1), who affirms that Aphidnes was taken by the Treachery of Titacus. From thence the Tyndaridæ went to Athens, where they were very well received by the Pallantidæ. We are further told, that they even expell'd from that City the Children of Theseus, and strengthened the Party of the Pallantidæ, who gave them, upon that Occasion, the Name of Anaces. Elian attributes all this to Mnestheus, the Successor of Theseus. The Passage in that Author is to this Effect: Mnestheus, the Son of Pertheus, shewed not himself ungrateful to
the

(1) L. 3.

the Tyndaridæ: For, in regard that they expelled Theseus's Children, led Captive his Mother Ethra, and restored to him the Kingdom of Athens, he was the first who called them Anaces, or Anactes; because, in Fact, they had taken great Care of the Athenians, and of their City. This Word, in the Greek Language, comes from Anassein, to take Care; hence Kings were called Anactes, because they have, or ought to have, the Care of their People.

The rest of Theseus's Life was nothing but one continued Series of Misfortunes. I shall not resume what I have said in the History of Minos the second, of the Adventures that befel him in his Expedition to Crete; but I shall observe here, that Phedra was, in part, the Cause of all those Disasters. It is well known that she being in Love with Hippolitus, whom Theseus had by the Amazon Antiope, but finding him insensible, accused him to her Husband, when he was returned from Epirus, for having attempted to debauch her; that he, without examining so odious an Affair to the Bottom, devoted him to Neptune, who put him to a miserable Death.

On the other Hand, the Pallantide, taking Advantage of his Absence, had redoubled their Cabals, and gained over several of those who still adhered to him at his setting out; insomuch, that when he would have continued to govern as before, he only raised Seditions and Disorders thereby in the City; for they who hated him at his Departure, joined Insolence and Contempt to Hatred; and the People was now so corrupted and debauched, that instead of being pliable, and giving voluntary Obedience, as they had done formerly, they would needs be flatter'd and caressed. He tried to reduce them by Force; but finding this only inflamed the Disease, and that there were now no Means of re-establishing his Affairs, he sent secretly his Children into Eubœa, to Elphenor the Son of Chalcedon; and as for himself, he repaired to the Village of Gaiette, poured out Imprecations upon the Athenians, in a Place which is called at this Day, the Place of Maledictions, and embarked barked for the Island of Scyros, where he thought to have found Friends, and where he had some Estate by his Father's Side. Lycomedes was then King of that Island. Theseus, upon his Arrival at his Court, begg'd of him only to restore him his Lands, that he might be able there to pass the Remainder of his Days. Others will have it, that he applied to him for Assistance against the Athenians. Lycomedes, either jealous of a Person of such high Character, or being gained over by Mnestheus, led him up to the highest Mountain, as with an Intention to shew him the Island, and then threw him down headlong from a Rock. There are Historians however, who write that he fell of himself, having unhappily stumbled as he was walking one Evening after Supper, as his manner was. There was no immediate Examination made into the Manner of his Death. Mnestheus reigned at Athens in Peace, while the Sons of Theseus in the Quality of private Persons, accompanied Elphenor to the War of Troy; but after the Death of Mnestheus, they returned to Athens, and re-ascended the Throne. The Æra of this Heroe's Death ought to be placed, if we may believe the Parian Marbles, in the thirteenth Year of Mnestheus's Reign. Now that Prince had already reigned two Years, when Theseus died in the Island of Scyros. 'Tis very probable, as able Chronologists alledge, that his Father Egeus had admitted him to share the Crown in his Lifetime; if this was not the Case, we will find difficulty to adjust the Chronology of those Times. Theseus must have been pretty far advanced in Years, being born about seventy Years before the Siege of Troy, and fourscore before the Destruction of that City. Hercules older than he, was dead about twenty or twenty-five Years before. Thus it was only in his Youth, and after his Departure from Trezene, that Theseus accompanied that Heroe in most of his Expeditions.

Theseus had three Wives; Antiope the Queen of the Amazons, by whom he had Hippolitus: of him we shall speak in the History of Phedra; Ariadne, by whom, according to some Authors he had Oenopion and Staphylus; philus ; and Pheдра, by whom he had Demophoon, who ascended the Throne after the Death of Mnestheus, which happened while he was returning from the Trojan War.

Theseus had signalized himself by too many illustrious Achievements not to be ranked after his Death among the Heroes or Demi-Gods. He had even shewed some Piety to the Gods notwithstanding all the Irregularities of his Life, since upon his Return from one of his Expeditions, he went to the Temple of Delphos, there to consecrate to Apollo a Part of his Hair, in imitation of Bacchus who had cut his into a round Figure, leaving none of it but from the Crown of his Head to his Ears. Hector imitated both of them afterwards ; and as that Tonsure of Bacchus had been called Bacchic, and that of Theseus, Theseid, so that of Hector was termed Hectorid.

Not only did Theseus receive the Honours that were paid to Heroes, but he was also advanced to the Rank of the Gods ; a Temple was built in his Honour, which became afterwards very famous, and whereof the Ruins are to be seen at this Day, or at least the Place where it stood. The Sacrifices were offered to him on the eighth Day of each Month, especially of October, which was the Day of his return from Crete. This Sacrifice was called Ogdolion, the Sacrifice of the eighth Day.

Pausanias speaks of the fine Paintings that were to be seen in that Temple, and which represented the Battle between the Athenians and the Amazons, that of the *Centaur*s and the Lapithæ, &c. The same Author makes also mention of the heroic Monument which the same Theseus had at Athens, near the Hill for Horses, and which he had in common with Pirithous, Oedipus and Adrastus.

Plutarch agrees to the Truth of Theseus's having Honours paid him, but at the same time he says it was not till several Ages after his Death that the Athenians honoured him as a God, on the Occasion which he relates. At the Battle of Marathon, says he, he was thought to appear in Armour, fighting against the Barbarians ; barians; and after the Wars with the Medes, in the Year of Phedon's Archonship, the Athenians having consulted the Oracle of Apollo, the Prophets enjoined them to collect the Bones of Theseus, to bury them in the most honourable Place among themselves, and to keep them with a great deal of Care. But if it was difficult to find the Place where he was interred, it was still more so to transport his Bones, by reason of the savage Fierceness of the People who were in Possession of them, an intractable Race, who had no Commerce with their Neighbours. At length however, Cimon having made himself Master of their Island, was resolved at any rate to find out his Tomb. While search was making on all sides, he happily saw an Eagle pecking at a rising Ground, and trying to open it with its Pounces. Forthwith struck as with a divine Inspiration, he ordered to rake into that Place, and there was found the Coffin of a very large Man, with the Head of a Pike and a Sword. All these Cimon put into his Ship, and carried them to Athens. The Athenians overjoyed, received these Relicks of Arms with Processions and Sacrifices, as if it had been Theseus himself returned to Life, and buried them in the middle of the City, near the Place where their Exercises are at this Day performed. That Spot of Ground very soon became a Sanctuary for Slaves, and for all those who dreaded the Violence of their Prosecutors. As Theseus in his Life-time had been the Protector of the Unfortunate, and had always favourably received the Prayers of those who implored his Aid against Oppressors, the World consecrated him to the same Dignity after his Death.

C H A P. IX.

The History of Castor and Pollux.

AS Castor and Pollux were two of the principal Argonauts, who distinguished themselves in the Expedition to Colchis, no less by their Piety to the Gods, than by their Courage and Valour, I ought to give my Readers the History of their Life. There is something thing singular in the Fable of their Birth; we are told that Leda (1) the Wife of Tyndarus King of Sparta, was beloved by Jupiter; that he having found her upon the Banks of the Eurotas, a River in Laconia, had Venus transformed into an Eagle, and he himself assumed the Figure of a Swan, who being pursued by the Eagle, flew for shelter into the Arms of Leda who was with Child, and at the End of nine Months she brought forth two Eggs, whereof the one produced Pollux and Helen, and the other Castor and Clytemnestra: The two first were reckoned the Children of Jupiter, and the other two claimed Tyndarus for their Father. Tho' this Tradition is the most general, Apollodorus however (2) relates the Story otherwise, and says Jupiter being in love with Nemesis, transformed himself into a Swan, and metamorphosed his Mistress into a Duck, adding it was she that gave Leda the Egg which she had hatched, and that consequently she was the real Mother of the Twin-Brothers. Some Authors, in order to explain this Fable, say it has no other Foundation but the Beauty of Helen, and especially the Length and Whiteness of her Neck, resembling that of a Swan (a). Others alledge that this Princess acted some Scene of Gallantry upon the Banks of the Eurotas, where perhaps there were a great many Swans, and that to save her Honour, it was given out that Jupiter himself had been enamour'd of her, and transformed himself into a Swan; and we may say whenever the Fable gives a Foundation to such Glosses, they are the true Key to it.

However, I reject not the Conjecture of those who will have it that Leda had introduced her Gallant into the highest Apartment of her Palace; which was usually of an oval Figure, and called among the Lacedemonians ωὄν, which gave rise to the Fiction of the Egg (3). Be that as it will, Castor and Pollux signalized themselves by so many illustrious Actions, that they

(1) Euripid. Ovid. Epist. of Helen to Paris. (2) Book 3.

(a) See Mezeriac upon the Epistle of Helen to Paris.

(3) Celsus Cael. Poet. Astron.

they had a just Claim to be reputed Sons of Jupiter, which is the Import of Dioscūri, the Name given them, and which they bore ever afterwards. Some will have it that Glaucus, when he appear'd in the Propontis to the Argonauts, was the first who gave them this Appellation (1). It was in the Expedition to Colchis especially that these two Heroes distinguished themselves, and rendered themselves worthy of the Name they bore. In the Storm that was like to have over-set the Ship Argo, they made a Vow with Orpheus, to get themselves initiated into the Mysteries of Samothece, and to repair to that Island to return Thanks to the Gods who were worship'd there, for their Preservation from the Dangers to which they and their Companions in the Expedition had been exposed. They even carried away in Colchis a Statue of Mars, named Theritas, whether this was the Name given in that Country to the God of War, or that of his Muse; and they transported it into Greece, where it was preserved for several Ages (2).

Pollux slew the famous Amychus who challenged all the World at the Gauntlet-Fight; this Victory and that which he gained afterwards at the Olympic Games, which Hercules celebrated in Elis, made him be reckon'd the Heroe and Patron of Wrestlers; while his Brother Castor distinguished himself in the Race, and in the Art of breaking Horses: Hunc equis, illum superare pugnis nobilem, as Horace says (3) after Homer (a), who calls him a Breaker of Horses.

These two Heroes; after the Expedition to Colchis, signalized themselves by Sea, and cleared the Archipelago of the Pirates who infested it; which served not a little, after their Death, to make them pass for two Divinities friendly to Sailors; but the Adventure, whether true or fabulous, which befel them during the Voyage of the Argonauts; contributed more than any thing else to this Fable. We are told that during the

L 3

Storm

(1) Philostrat. in the Picture of Glaucus. (2) Pausan. in Lacon.

(3) Carm. l. 1.

(a) Fliny, L. 2, cap. 23. and elsewhere.

Storm now mentioned, two Fires were seen to play around the Heads of the Tyndaridæ, and very soon after the Storm ceased. These Fires, which often appear by Sea in Time of a Storm, were afterwards reckoned the Fires of Castor and Pollux. When two of them were seen at a Time, it was a prognostic of fair Weather; when only one of them appeared, it was an infallible Sign of an approaching Storm, and then they invoked the Aid of those two Heroes (1). The same Notion still prevails as to the Presage of these Fires; and all the Effect that Religion has produced, is to change their Names, they being now called St. Elme's and St. Nicholas's Fires.

The Zeal which these two Princes had expressed for being initiated into the Mysteries that were celebrated in Samothrace, contributed not a little to heighten their Reputation. The Gods in honour of whom those Mysteries were instituted, were the Cabiri, whom I have spoke of in the first Volume, and there was nothing in those Ages of Darkness more sacred and revered than these Mysteries; People had a violent Desire to participate of them, because it was thought a Means to procure the Favour of those Gods, especially during Navigation, as Diodorus Siculus remarks.

The Athenians charmed with the Moderation of these two Princes (2), who after they had taken the City Aphidnes, to avenge the Wrong done to their Sister, had only punished those who had been concerned in the Rape, gave them the Name of Anaëtes, which imports Kings, and in honour of them, instituted a Festival under the same Name.

Moderation and Piety, especially when supported by no stronger Motives than those which Paganism supplied, can hardly stand out against violent Passions. Lynceus and Idas being about to marry Phæbe and Hilaria, the Daughters of Leucippus, invited to the Feast Castor and Pollux, the near Relations of the two young Virgins, their Father being Tyndarus's Brother; but they themselves falling in love with them, ravished them,
married

(1) Loc. cit. (2) Plut. in Theseo.

married them, and had two Children by them, whom Pausanias (1) names Anascis and Menasinus, who afterwards had Statues at Corinth, in the Temple built in Honour of their Fathers (a).

The two Spouses stung to the Quick with this outrageous Insult, having met with their Rivals some time after, fought with them, and Castor slew Lynceus; but Idas avenged his Death by killing the Murderer of his Brother. Pollux again avenged Castor and slew Idas, or as some Authors will have it, he was struck dead by Jupiter himself with a Thunder-bolt.

With respect to this Event, as well as others, there occurs some Variation among the Ancients; and the manner in which Apollodorus relates this Adventure, bears not such an odious Aspect towards the Tyndaridæ, tho' it makes them not quite inexcusable, since it associates them in an Act of Injustice. They were joined with Idas and Lynceus in carrying off some Flocks; but the latter having refused to make a Division of the Booty, Castor and Pollux resolved to take Satisfaction for this Injury, and having raised Troops, entered into Messenia, carried off the Cattle of Idas and Lynceus, and laid an Ambuscade for them; but the latter having descry'd Castor hiding himself near an Oak-tree, shewed him to Idas, who put him to Death.

In whatever Manner the Fact happened, 'tis certain, 1. That Castor and Pollux had no other Wives but their two Cousins, nor other Children but those I have named: 2. That Castor was slain in the Scuffle now mentioned, as also Idas and Lynceus; and the Race of Aphareus being extinct by their Death, the Crown of the Messenians was transferred into Nestor's Family.

As Pollux was reputed immortal, being the Son of Jupiter, we are told he supplicated his Father to put him to Death, or to share his Immortality with his Brother. Jupiter heard his Prayer, so that when

L 4

Castor

(1) In Corinth.

(a) The two Wives whom we have named had likewise a Temple in Laconia, according to the same Pausanias; and the Priestesses who did the Service of the Temple, as also the Goddesses themselves, were called Leucippides.

Castor recovered Life, Pollux lost it, and when Pollux returned into the World, Castor re-entered the Kingdom of the Dead. This, by the way, is that alternative Life and Death of which the Poets have said so much after Homer (1) and Pindar, and which Virgil has so well expressed (a); the Foundation of which Fiction is, that the two Princes I am speaking of being dead, and advanced to the Rank of Gods, they formed in the Heavens the Sign of the Twins; and because one of the two Stars of which it is composed sets when the other rises, hence the Fable now mentioned took its Birth.

The Romans perpetuated the Memory of this Fiction in a pretty singular Manner, by sending every Year on the Day of the Feast of the Tyndaridæ near their Temple, a Man with a Cap like theirs, mounted upon Horseback, and leading another Horse in his Hand on which no Body rode, intimating thereby that only one of the two Brothers appeared at a Time.

But this much is certain, that both of them had been buried near Scias, a Town in Laconia; and by a strange Incongruity, whereof Man is but too capable, their Temple was shewn near the very Place where their Tomb stood, as if it had been possible for one to partake of Divinity, when he could not triumph over Death. Their Deification, according to Pausanias and the other Ancients, was only put off for forty Years. At first they were considered as Heroes; but afterwards they were reckoned in the Number of the Gods of Greece, and got the Surname of Ambulii and Aphefii (b). The Author now mentioned, speaks of the Temple they had at Sparta, and of another at Athens, wherein divine

(1) Odyss. l. 11.

(a) Si fratrem Pollux alterna morte redemit,

Itque reditque viam toties.

Æneid. l. 6.

(b) These two Epithets are only applicable to the great Gods of the Pagans, and they had been given to Jupiter and Minerva. The first signified Prolongation, and it was a prevailing Opinion that those Gods to whom it belonged prolonged Life. The second, which imports, Starting, Emissio, was peculiar to the Tyndaridæ, who were thought to preside over the Barriers, whence they who run the Races at the public Games set out. Paus. in Lac.

divine Honours were paid to them. The first of these two Cities was the Place of their Nativity, and they had done signal Service to the Second, by saving it from being pillaged. The same Author likewise makes mention of another Temple which was at Corinth, and of Statues raised to them in the little Island of Sphanos, whereof, according to the Poet Alcman, they were Natives.

The Romans, who afterwards adopted their Worship, held them always in high Veneration, and erected a Temple to them on occasion of the Aid they believed themselves to have received from them near the Lake Rhegillum. As they also adopted the Greek Fables, their Authors make mention of several Apparitions of these two Divinities. Cicero (1) makes one of his Speakers say, they were believed to have foretold to Vanitus, the Victory he gained over the Persians; but as he was not very credulous, he gives no great Credit to that Revelation, since he says Homer, who lived not long after these Heroes (2), informs us, that they were interred at Lacedemon or near by; whence he justly concludes, that they were not capable to come and predict future Events. Justin seriously relates, how in a Battle between the Locrians and the Crotoniates, two young Men appeared mounted on white Steeds, who were taken for Castor and Pollux. But the Adventure of two Messenians, which Pausanias speaks of (3), shews us what we are to think of those Sorts of Apparitions. These two young Men handsome and well made, were called Panormus and Gonipus, and belonged to a Place named Andania. They chose the Time when the Lacedemonians were celebrating the Feast of the Dioscuri, clad themselves in white Tunics with purple Cassocks, covered their Heads with Caps like the Locrians, and mounted the finest Horses they could find. In this Equipage, and armed with Lances, they entered Laconia, and repaired to the Place where the Lacedemonians were assembled for Sacrifice. Forthwith they were taken for the Gods themselves, whose whose Feast they were celebrating, and while the Lacedemonians were prostrating themselves before them, the two Messenians rush'd in upon them, cut off several of them, and then made their Escape. This sacrilegious Action, for the Messenians also worship'd the Dioscuri, was reckoned afterwards the Cause of the Calamities that overwhelmed Messenia; and they were not wanting to attribute them to the Hatred of the incensed Tyndaridæ. Accordingly, when Epaminondas had a Mind to repair Messene, one of the principal Objects of his Care was to appease the Wrath of those Gods by Sacrifices. He had seen in a Dream (1), says Pausanias, a venerable old Man, who, in order to excite him to repair that City, assured him that their Wrath, which hitherto had led them to distress the Messenians, was at length ceased, and they now satisfied.

(1) De Nat. Deor. l. 2. (2) Pausan. in Lacon. (3) Ibid.

A Passage in Homer, wherein that Poet says, Helen asked of the Grecian Deputies who were come to Troy, News of Castor and Pollux her Brothers, supposes that she knew not then of their being dead, and at the same Time that they had died since she came to that City. Now according to the same Poet, she had been then twenty Years in that City; it was therefore during that Interval her Brothers had died. It was not certainly after the Siege was begun, otherwise they had undoubtedly joined their Brothers-in-Law Agamemnon and Menelaus, in revenging the Injury done to their Sister Helen. Consequently it must have been during the Preparations for the War that they died; and this lets us know the time of their Death precisely enough, tho' we cannot determine the Year wherein it happened.

But to proceed, these two Heroes were usually represented on Medals and other Monuments, under the Figure of two young Men, with a Bonnet, on the Top of which is a Star, as may be seen in one of these Medals of the Family Sulpitia, quoted by Oyzel (2); but more commonly by Statues, where they were either on Horseback, or have their Horses by them (1); in like manner every time they are said to have appeared to Men, it is always on Horseback.
on

(1) Pausan. in Messen. (2) Fab. 41.

They who take the Art of Riding to be later than the Siege of Troy, where indeed they fought in Chariots, endeavour to evade the Arguments brought from those Representations; but these are the very Arguments which demonstrate that this Art is more ancient than they take it to be. I have no Design to enter into that Question which is foreign to my Subject, and which is treated thoroughly in The Memoirs of the Academy of the Belles Lettres (2); but were it no more but the Example of the Centaurs, who were in reality Horsemen of Thessaly, and who lived before the Siege of Troy, and what Homer says in speaking of the Horses of Rhesus, which Diomedes and Ulysses carried off, and rode away upon them without any Saddle, putting them forward with their Bows for want of Whips, this alone would be sufficient to prove riding to have been in use in Greece before that Æra. Besides, is it to be thought that the Shepherds when they found their Flocks straying, would not be directed by Nature herself, to mount their Horses to gather them again together? Is not this Way of breaking those Animals both easier and more natural, than to harness and yoke them for drawing Chariots? An Usage which was only instituted for Convenience and Show. I said in Greece; for as to the eastern Countries, riding was known there from the earliest Periods of Time. Moses, in the Song he composed after the Passage thro' the Red-Sea, very plainly distinguishes (3) the Egyptian Horsemen who were drowned, from those who rode in Chariots; and as he says in one Place, Currus Pharaonis - - projecit in mare; so he adds in another, equum & ascensorem ejus, &c.

Such were the famous Dioscuri and the Gods Anaëtes of the Greeks, who, as we have seen, have nothing in common

(1) Pausan. in Lacon. Attic. Corinth. &c. (2) Tom. VII. &c.

(3) Exod. c. 15. v. 1. & 4.

common with those of the Orientals whom we have fully discoursed of in the first Volume.

C H A P. X.

The History of Orpheus.

SOME Authors relying upon a Passage in Cicero (1), alledge that Orpheus never had an Existence; and that all the Accounts of this celebrated Man delivered in Antiquity are but mere Fictions, grounded upon the various Etymologies that may be given of his Name. True it is that Author; or rather Cotta, one of his Speakers, asserts that this was Aristotle's Sentiment: Orpheum Poetam docet Aristoteles nunquam fuisse; but besides its being very difficult to discover from Cicero's Books on the Nature of the Gods, what his real Opinions are, 'tis usual for him to put such Words in the Mouths of his Speakers; rather to deliver the several Opinions that were in vogue in his Time, than to adopt any one of them himself; besides, would his bare Authority, granting him even to be of Cotta's Opinion, counter-balance that of all Antiquity, which admitted not only one but several Orpheus's; and that upon the single Foundation of a Passage in Aristotle, which is even not extant now in his Works, and who might be singular in his Opinion of that great Man?

In Fact, Aristophanes, in his Comedy of the Frogs (2); Euripides (3), Horace, Virgil, Onomacritus, Apollonius Rhodius, Ovid, Valerius Flaccus, and several others among the Poets; Plato, Isocrates, Diodorus Siculus, Plutarch, Apollodorus, Pausanias, Hyginus, &c. among the Philosophers, Historians, and Mythologists, make no doubt but that there was an Orpheus. In a Word, we would be obliged to quote all the Ancients, who have spoke of him as a Man who had a real Existence, were we to trace his traditional History. Besides, his Name occurs in all the Lists of those who have spoke of the the Argonauts; and we have as little Reason to doubt of his Existence, as of any of the other Warriors who are named in those Catalogues.

(1) De Nat. Deor. l. 3. (2) Ver. 1064. (3) In his Hippolitus.

'Tis true, many Fables have been uttered in relation to him; but these Fables are easy to be understood and explained: And what famous Man is there in that Age of Heroes, who has not had the same Fate? After so many Authors, whose formal Testimonies I might have quoted, were it not for fear of being tedious, what shall we think of some Etymologies, which those who understand the Oriental Languages lay so great Stress upon? Because the Phenician Word Ariph signifies Knowing, shall we say with Vossius (1), that this Word gave Rise to the fictitious Name and Existence of some Man of profound Knowledge, whom they called Orpheus? Or with Turnerus, that the Hebrew Word Rapha, which imports to cure, made the pretended Orpheus pass for a great Physician? This is what will not be very easy to be believed; and I would, at least, rather say with M. le Clerc (2), without denying the Existence of that famous Man, that by confounding two Greek Words, he came to be taken for an expert-Singer, instead of a Conjurer who professed Necromancy, as shall be said afterwards; and 'tis true in Fact, that the Hymns which are ascribed to him, resemble Pieces of Conjuratation more than real Songs.

Having thus established the Existence of Orpheus, two Points remain to be discussed. First, I am to deliver the History of his Life, according to the most generally received Traditions; and in the second Place, explain the Fables that are interwove into it. But I would give the Reader previous Notice, that he will find great Lights into both from the learned Notes of M. Burette upon Plutarch's Treatise of Musick (3), and in the Dissertation of Christian Escherbach, intitled, Epigenes de Poesi & Philosophia Orphica.

Orpheus is one of the most famous, as it is one of the most ancient Names in the Poetry and Musick of the Greeks.

(1) De Nat. Poet. c. 3. sect. 3. (2) Bibl. univers. Tom. 15. p. 99.

(3) Mem. d' l' Acad. des Belles-Lettres, T. x. p. 262, &c.

Greeks. He was in flourishing Reputation at the Time of the Argonautic Expedition, that is, before the Trojan War. Some reckon to the Number of Five of them, of whom they tell us some Particularities; and 'tis highly probable that it fared with Orpheus as with Hercules, that many Actions were ascribed to one, which possibly belonged to several.

Orpheus was the Son of Æagrus, King of Thrace (1), and of the Muse Calliope, the Father of Museus, and Disciple of Linus; it was only to add a greater Lustre to his Birth and Talents, particularly as to Musick and Poetry, that he was said afterwards to be the Son of Apollo. As he applied himself a great deal to Matters of Religion, and undertook several Voyages to improve himself in that Science, he very soon united in his own Person the Dignity of Pontif with that of King; and this is what makes Horace give him the Title (2) of Minister and Interpreter of the Gods. As to Musick, he especially applied himself to the Harp, and brought that Instrument to Perfection; accordingly, those who came after him made it their Business to imitate him, whereas he had no Model to copy after (3), since before him we hear only of Airs set to the Flute. It was to demonstrate how much he excelled in playing on that Instrument, that he was said to have received it from Apollo or Mercury, and to have even added two Strings to the seven which it had before. To him is also attributed the Invention of Hexameter Verse. The Connection between Poetry and the most sublime Sciences of that Time made Orpheus not only a Philosopher, but also a great Divine. He had some Sentiments, however, that were peculiar to himself. He abstained, for Instance, from eating of Flesh, and had an Abhorrence to Eggs, considered as Food; from a Persuasion that the Egg was elder than the Chick, and the Principle of all Beings. A Sentiment relating to the Cosmogony he had borrowed from the Egyptians, and which I have sufficiently explained in the first Volume.

As

{1} Diodor. l. 4. {2} Art. Poet. {3} Plut. in Orpheo.

As to Theology, he had his first Instructions therein from his Father Æagrus, who taught him the Mysteries of Bacchus, as they were then practised in Thrace. He became afterwards the Disciple of the Dactyli of Mount Ida in Crete, and from his Intercourse with them he got new Insight into the Ceremonies of Religion. But nothing contributed more to improve him in that kind, than his Expedition to Egypt. There it was, that having got himself initiated into the Mysteries of Isis or Ceres, and of Osiris or Bacchus, he acquired Insight into the Rites of Initiation, Expiation, Funerals, and other Points of religious Worship, far superior to what he had gained till then. Diodorus Siculus, who speaks of that Voyage, and says he learned by it the Fable of the infernal Regions, the Orgies, and other Mysteries, that were adopted by the Greeks, adds, that it was inserted in the Annals of the Egyptian Priests; where mention was also made of other Greeks who had travelled into the same Country, such as Museus, Melampus, &c. He says, there were Marks to be shewn that all of them had passed some Time in that Country, such as their Picture, or some Place that bore their Name; which is an uncontestable Proof of the Expedition I have now mentioned.

Orpheus, at his Return to Greece, communicated to that Country the Knowledge he had acquired in Egypt, accommodating himself to the Notions of the People of the Country, and he made himself regarded among them, by persuading them that he understood the Secret of expiating Crimes, of purifying Criminals, of curing the Sick, and of appeasing the incensed Gods. Upon the Model of the Funeral Rites of the Egyptians, he contrived a Hell, the Idea whereof diffused itself over all Greece. He instituted the Mysteries and Worship of Hecate Chthonia, or the Terrestrial, among the Eginetæ, and that of Ceres at Sparta, and made so many other Alterations in the System of the Religion of the Greeks, that he may be reckoned one of their greatest Divines, and one of their first Reformers. Nor was it only in Matters of Religion he made those Alterations, terations, he made also considerable ones in the Manners of that Age, as shall be said in explaining one of the Fables that is wrought into his History. In fine, he distinguished himself so much both by his Talents, and by the Blessings he procured to Society, that he became one of the most illustrious Men of his Time.

His Wife being dead, he went into a Place in Thesprotia called Aornos, where an ancient Oracle delivered Responses by calling up the Dead. There he was again bless'd with a Sight of his dear Eurydice, and believing he had actually recovered her, flatter'd himself that she was to follow him; but looking back, and seeing her no more, he was so afflicted, that he killed himself through Despair.

Some Authors will have it that he was Thunder-struck, as a Punishment for having revealed the most secret Mysteries to the Profane. According to another Tradition, the Women in Thrace, vexed that their Husbands abandoned them to go after him, laid Ambuscades for him; and in spite of Fear which withheld them for some time, they at length put him to Death. Plutarch (1) asserts, that the Thracians even in his Time, stigmatized their Wives to revenge that Death. Others again make him to have fallen by Women, tho' not in Thrace but Macedonia, near the City of Dion (2), where his Sepulchre, was to be seen, which consisted in a Marble Urn set upon a Pillar. We are told however, that this Monument was at Libethra, the Place of Orpheus's Birth, whence it was transferred to Dion by the Macedonians, after the Ruin of Libethra buried under Water in a sudden Inundation, occasioned by a dreadful Storm. Pausanius who gives a full Account of this Event (3), says the Libethrians having sent to consult the Oracle of Bacchus which was in Thrace, to know what was to be the Fate of their City, the Answer was, that so soon as the Sun shone upon Orpheus's Bones, Sus should destroy their City. As that Word signifies a Hog or Boar, the Libethrians

continued

(1) De Ser. Nup. Viad.

(2) See Paus. in Beot. c. 30.

(3) Ibid. p. 770.

continued undisturbed, not being able to imagine that such an Animal should be the Cause of so great a Calamity to them. One Day about the Hour of Noon, a Shepherd having fallen asleep near Orpheus's Tomb, fell a singing in his Sleep; but in so soft and moving a Strain, that those who heard him run up to the Sound, and were followed by such Crowds of People; that having pressed hard upon one another, they overthrew the Pillar on which was the Urn that contained Orpheus's Bones, which broke in falling. The Night after, a great Storm occasioned an overflowing of the Sus, a Torrent which rolled down from Mount Olympus, so that the City Libethra was buried under the Water, and the Oracle, whose Sense had not been understood, was fulfilled.

To conclude, Plato in his Banquet, makes one of his Speakers pleasantly say, that Orpheus was punished by the Gods for having feigned Grief at Eurydice's Death which he did not feel, and that instead of having killed himself in good earnest, as Alcestes, and thereby deserving to revisit the Light of Day, the same Gods had permitted him to enjoy but for a Moment the Sight of his Wife, or rather of her Phantom, and then to be torn in Pieces, even by Women.

As for the Poems of Orpheus, which we have already mentioned, they were very short and not numerous; according to Pausanias (1). The Lycomides, an Athenian Family, had them all by Heart, and sung them at the Celebration of their Mysteries. In respect of Elegance, continues the same Author, these Hymns are inferior to those of Homer; but Religion having adopted the former, gives them the Preference to the other in Point of Honour. Further, we have none of the Works of that ancient Poet now extant, those which go under his Name, such as the Argonautics; the Poem upon the Stones, and divers Fragments which Henry Stephen has collected into a Book intitled, Poesis Philosophica, are either the Works of Onomacritus; who was contemporary with Pisistratus; or of some other unknown Author. But I advise those who would be thoroughly acquainted with the Works attributed to Orpheus, to consult the learned Fabritius (1).

2. To come now to the Explanation of the Fables that are interwove into this Life, I shall begin with that which we have in Pausanias (2), who seems to reason justly upon this Subject. “ Among the Fables, “ says he, which the Greeks set forth as Truths, we “ may reckon this ; that Orpheus was the Son of Callicope ; I mean the Muse Calliope, and not Pierus’s Daughter ; that by the Sweetness of his Song he “ drew the Beasts after him ; that he even descended “ alive into the infernal Regions, and that having “ charmed Pluto, and the Divinities of those subterraneous Mansions, he brought back his Wife from “ thence. These are so many Fictions, thro’ which “ I can find out that Orpheus was a great Poet, much “ superior to all those who had been before him, who “ gained high esteem by teaching Men the Ceremonies of Religion, and by persuading them that he “ found out the Art of expiating Crimes, of purifying those who had committed them, of curing the “ Sick, and of appeasing the Wrath of the Gods.” &c.

It was, to mention it by the way, the Journey to Theſprotia that gave rise to Orpheus’s pretended Journey to Hell. He is even said to have described this Journey under that Idea in his Poem of the Argonauts, which is not the one we have now extant under that Title. The Poets who followed him have given loose Reins to their Imagination on this Head. Virgil, among others (3), says that Orpheus having descended into Pluto’s Kingdom, charmed the Ghosts so much, that forgetting their Tortures, they danced to the Sound of his Harp ; that Ixion ceased from turning his Wheel, and that the cruel Vulture left Tityus some Intervals of Ease ; that Pluto himself charmed, was unable to withhold from him his Wife Eurydice ; but that having granted her to him only on Condition that he

(1) Bib. Græc. v. 1. (2) In Beot. (3) Georg. l. 4.

he would not look upon her till she had got out of Hell, he lost thro' his own Curiosity a Blessing which had cost him so dear.

Further, this whole Fiction is founded upon this; that Magic was highly in vogue in those Times, especially in Egypt. One of the most common Ceremonies in that detestable Art, was the calling up the Souls of the Dead (1); and so far was it from being reckoned Criminal, that it was practised even by the Ministers of sacred Things, in Temples destined for that Purpose.

But if this Explanation of the Fable of Eurydice does not satisfy some Readers, we may say with Tzetzes (2), that Orpheus cured his Wife of the Bite of a Serpent; but that she having died soon after, perhaps by her own Fault, hence it was said that he had brought her up from the infernal Regions, but that she had fallen back thither again. Orpheus, if we may believe the same Author, had learned from the Egyptians, among several other Secrets, that of charming Serpents, and of curing their Stings. The Inhabitants of Colchis an Egyptian Colony which Sesostris had left there, had brought thither this Secret: Accordingly we have seen that Medea with some Herbs charmed the Dragon which kept the Golden Fleece. As that Princess, according to the Argonautic Authors, passed into Italy with Jason, Servius says (3), she communicated that Secret to the Marsi, who inhabited on the Banks of the Fucine Lake. In fine, several other People knew the same Art; but a longer Digression would be foreign to my present Purpose.

The Fable importing that Orpheus drew after him Animals moved with the melodious Accents of his Voice and Lyre, and that he tamed the fiercest Tygers and Lions; is to be understood as a lively and ingenious Allegory, denoting the Perfection to which he had carried Poetry and Music; or if we understand it with Horace, it informs us that Orpheus civilized the

M 2

savage

(1) See the Article of Evocations, V. I. B. 4. (2) Chil. 1. of his sacred History. (3) In Lib. 7. Æn. 5. v. 750.

savage Manners of the Greeks of his Time, who used to destroy one another like wild Beasts; having reclaimed them from a savage and rustic Life, to the Sweets of Union and Society; and having at last induced them to substitute in place of Acorns, or at least of wild Fruits, a more convenient and wholesome Food (a).

This is the Sense in which I take the Words of that Poet, Cædibus & fædo victu. The Abbé Fraguier in a Dissertation upon the Orphic Life, understands these Expressions in a stricter Sense, alledging that the Thracians were real Cannibals who ate up one another, and that Orpheus not only abolished this Custom among that People; but to draw them off from it still more, entirely prohibited them from the Use of Meat, and whatever had Life; and that 'tis in this Sense we are to understand the Orphic Life. That manner of living, to mention it by the way, was afterwards embraced by several noted Personages; and it would seem that Theseus in Euripides (1) upbraids Hippolitus with it, as if that young Man had been initiated into the Mysteries of Orpheus, and practised the Orphic Life in all its Rigour; for to this Effect he speaks to him: Here then is the Man who has Intercourse with the Gods, as a Person of eminent Virtue; here is that Example of Temperance, and blameless Conduct. Think not to impose upon me any longer by this vain Shew and Parade; deceive me now if you can by your Affectation, in eating nothing that has Life, submit to your Orpheus's Rules, counterfeit yourself inspired, &c. But may we not suppose that Euripides, being to represent Hippolitus as a young Man of austere Virtue, gives him the Character of those of his Time, who after Pythagoras's Example, were initiated into the Orphic Life, whereof the Poet now named has given us a more distinct Idea than any other of the Ancients, since we see from the Passage now quoted, that

(a) Sylvestres homines sacer interpretæque Deorum,

Cædibus & victu fædo deterruit Orpheus:

Dictus ob hoc lenire tigres rapidosque leones.

Art. Poet.

(1) Hippolit. v. 948.

that it consisted chiefly in three Things, in Intercourse with the Gods, in the Study of Religion, and in Abstinence from all animal Food.

The Fiction which we have in Pausanias of those Thracians, who alledged the Nightingales that had their Nests near Orpheus's Tomb sung with more Force and Melody than any other, is a Consequence of that which I have been now explaining, and proves at the same Time that all, not excepting the Populace, were persuaded that this celebrated Person, had carried Music and Singing as far as they could go.

What Ovid says, that while the Head of Orpheus, which the Bacchanals, who tore him in Pieces, had thrown into the Hebrus, was hurried along by the Streams, his Mouth uttered a kind of mournful and plaintive Notes, proves only that a Genius of that Poet's Turn, when it has once got hold of the Marvellous, knows not when to drop it, and so commonly carries it to the Height of Extravagance ; but what he adds in the same Place, that when that Head stopp'd near the Island of Lesbos, a Serpent which was going to bite it, was transformed into a Stone, sets forth to us the Adventure of some malignant envious Person, who, for having offered to defame Orpheus, was reckoned by all a Man of no Taste, without any just Sentiment, and incapable of being moved by Beauty, in a Word, Insensible like a Stone or Rock. In fine, this Head was highly revered by the Lesbians, who consulted it as an Oracle.

The Fable which imports that the Helicon dived under Ground, that it might not furnish Water to the Bacchanals, who after having torn Orpheus in Pieces, came thither to purify themselves, is founded upon the Nature of that River, which after running for the Space of seventy-five Furlongs, sinks under Ground and rises up again in another Place, under the Name of Baphyra ; and serves at the same Time to prove, that the Crime of those Enthusiasts was detested by all Nature.

Lastly, That other Fable which intimates that Venus incensed against Calliope, Orpheus's Mother, for having adjudged to Proserpine the Possession of Adonis, had made the Thracian Women fall so desperately in love with him, that each pulling him to her Side, they had tore him in Pieces (1), is one of those Episodes which Wits think of use to embellish Narrations, which might well bear to be without them.

Again, no Body is ignorant of the Story which Lucian tells of Orpheus's Lyre, which had been deposited in the Temple of Apollo. One Neanthus, says he, the Son of Pythacus the Tyrant, bought it of the Priests, imagining that if he did but touch the Strings, he would draw after him the Trees and Rocks; but his Project succeeded so ill that the Dogs of the Suburbs, where he was playing, tore him in Pieces.

The Time when Orpheus lived is well enough known from that of the Argonauts his Contemporaries, and from the Date which I have settled of the Expedition to Colchis, in which he joined. To conclude, it is probable that Orpheus quitted Thrace, and came and settled in Greece; at least, he was represented, in a fine Picture of Polygnotus, as we are told by Pausanias (2), cloathed all over after the Grecian Manner, without any thing of the Thracian Garb appearing about him.

C H A P. XI.

The History of Calais and Zethes.

AS Calais and Zethes distinguished themselves in the Expedition of the Argonauts, I thought their History required a separate Article. They were the Sons of Boreas King of Thrace. That Prince had carried off Orithia the Daughter of Erechtheus, the sixth King of Athens; and as he was frequently taken for the Wind that bears his Name, hence his Sons had Wings given them, and were said to be the Sons of Boreas the Wind; which makes M. le Clerc (3) imagine, that by these two Princes whose Names import, That breathes strong, and that breathes soft, nothing else was meant

(1) Hygin. Cal. Astron. Poet. c. 7. (2) In Phoc. (3) Biblio. Univers. T. 6.

meant but the northerly Winds, that cleared Bitlynia of the Locusts, as has been said in the History of the Argonauts. Plato too takes the Rape of Oritbia to be a mere Fiction, which has no other Foundation, but that the Wind had made her fall into a River upon whose Banks she was playing with her Companions; but the Opinion of both these Authors is confuted by all Antiquity, which considers the Marriage of Boreas with Oritbia as an historical Fact. Pausanias (1) says, this Marriage was even very advantageous to Erechtheus; his Son-in-law Boreas having equipped a Fleet to defend him against his Enemies who infested the Coasts of Attica. In like manner, his two Sons were reckoned two real Princes, who embarked with the Argonauts, and were of great Use to their Brother-in-law Phineus. It is likewise well known, that after their return from Colchis, and during the Celebration of Pelias's funeral Games, Hercules quarrelled with them, and put them both to Death, for having joined Typhis, the Pilote of the Ship Argo, who was of Opinion that Hercules should be left in Troas, when he deserted the Ship to go in quest of Hylas. The azure Locks given them by the Poets, denoted the Air whence the Winds blow, and at the same Time carried an Allusion to the Name of their Father: Unless we choose rather to adopt the Conjecture of Tzetzes, who will have it, that the long and fine Hair of these two Princes, that waved upon their Shoulders in the Wind, producing to the Sight the same Effect as a Pair of Wings, had given rise to the Fable. Further, we may suppose that the Fiction of the Wings given to the Sons of Boreas, was owing to the loose Dress which Luxury had introduced among the Thessalians, called by the Ancients in Derision, Wings, which by its Wideness and Lightness, and especially its variegated Colours, deserved so well that Name. Perhaps the Heroes we are now speaking of, affected to wear that Sort of Dress, contrary to the Fashion of their Country; and this is probably what made them be said to have Wings.

(1) In Attic.

But I begin to be sensible that I have dwelt too long upon the History of the Argonauts; 'tis therefore time to proceed to the other Events of the fabulous Age.

B O O K IV.

The History of the Hunting of Calydon, and of the two Wars of Thebes.

C H A P. I.

The History of the Hunting of Calydon, and of the War to which it gave Occasion.

IF ever the Rule which I laid down at the Beginning of this Mythology, namely, that we ought to take the Fables as much as possible from the ancient Poets, where they are more simple, and more detached from Fiction; if ever that Rule, I say, ought to take Place, it is chiefly in the History I am going to relate: As to which, after setting forth what Homer says of it, I shall subjoin the Circumstances superadded to it by the Poets who came after him. After the following Manner does Phenix discourse to Achilles of this Event, of which he himself might have been an Eye-witness in his youthful Days:

*Where Calydon on rocky Mountains stands,
Once fought th' Ætolian and Curetian Bands;
To guard it, those, to conquer, these advance;
And mutual Deaths were dealt with mutual Chance.*

The

*The silver Cynthia bade Contention rise,
In Vengeance of neglected Sacrifice;
On Oeneus' Fields she sent a monstrous Boar,
That level'd Harvests, and whole Forests tore:
This Beast, (when many a Chief his Tusks had slain)
Great Meleager stretch'd along the Plain.
Then, for his Spoils, a new Debate arose,
The neighbour Nations thence commencing Foes.
Strong as they were, the bold Curetes fail'd,
While Meleager's thund'ring Arm prevail'd;
'Till Rage at length inflam'd his lofty Breast,
(For Rage invades the wisest and the best.)*

*Curs'd by Althæa, to his Wrath he yields,
And in his Wife's Embrace forgets the Fields.
" (She from Marpessa sprung, divinely fair,
" And matchless Idas, more than Man in War;
" The God of Day ador'd the Mother's Charms;
" Against the God the Father bent his Arms:
" Th' afflicted Pair, their Sorrows to proclaim,
" From Cleopatra chang'd his Daughter's Name,
" And call'd Alcyone; a Name to show
" The Father's Grief, the mourning Mother's Woe."
To her the Chief retir'd from stern Debate,
But found no Peace from fierce Althæa's Hate:
Althæa's Hate th' unhappy Warrior drew,
Whose luckless Hand his royal Uncle slew;
She beat the Ground, and call'd the Pow'rs beneath
On her own Son to wreak her Brother's Death:
Hell heard her Curses from the Realms profound,
And the red Fiends that walk the nightly Round.
In vain Ætolia her Deliv'rer waits,
War shakes her Walls, and thunders at her Gates.
She sent Ambassadors, a chosen Band,
Priests of the Gods, and Elders of the Land;
Besought the Chief to save the sinking State:
Their Prayers were urgent, and their Proffers great:
(Full fifty Acres of the richest Ground, Half Pasture green, and half with Vineyards crown'd.)
His suppliant Father, aged Oeneus, came;
His Sisters follow'd; ev'n the vengeful Dame,*

Althæa

Althæa sues ; His Friends before him fall :
He stands relentless, and rejects 'em all.
Mean while the Victor's Shouts ascend the Skies ;
The Walls are scal'd ; the rolling Flames arise ;
At length his Wife (a Form divine) appears,
With piercing Cries, and supplicating Tears ;
She paints the Horrors of a conquer'd Town,
The Heroes slain, the Palaces o'erthrown,
The Matrons ravish'd, the whole Race enslav'd :
The Warriour beard, he vanquish'd, and he sav'd,
Th' Ætolians, long disdain'd, now took their Turn,
And left the Chief their broken Faith to mourn.

POPE'S Iliad, B. IX. v. 653, &c.

Thus Homer relates this Story in a Manner very probable, having nothing in it supernatural but the Intervention of Diana, which may easily be detached from it, having been added only to denote the enormous Size of the Boar, the other Circumstances being abundantly credible, there being of those Animals sometimes to be met with in Forests monstrously large, that make vast Havock and Desolation, so that it requires a great many People to give chase to them. Homer accordingly tells us, there was a little Army convened for that of Calydon ; but as this Poet names not the Chiefs who commanded it, I shall give them from Apollodorus (1) ; Meleager the Son of Oeneus, Dryas the Son of Mars, both of them Calydonians ; Idas and Lynceus the Sons of Aphareus, Messenians ; Castor and Pollux the Sons of Jupiter and Leda, Lacedemonians ; Theseus the Son of Egeus, an Athenian ; Admetus the Son of Pheres, from a City in Thessaly named Phera ; Anceus and Cepheus the Sons of Lycurgus, from Arcadia ; Jason the Son of Eson, from Iolcos ; Iphicles the Son of Amphitryo, a Theban ; Pirithous the Son of Ixion, a Larissean ; Peleus the Son of Eacus, from Phthia ; Telamon the Son of the same Eacus, from Salamis ; Eurytion the Son of Aëtor, from Phthia ; Atalanta the Daughter of Schæneus, from Arcadia : Amphiaræus the

(1) Lib. i.

the Son of Oileus, from Argos; with them were also the Sons of Thestius.

Pausanias (1) speaking of a Picture of the Tegeates, where this Chace was represented, adds to those whom Apollodorus names, Iolaus the faithful Companion of Hercules's Labours; the Brothers of Althea, Protheus, and Cometes, and Hippolobus the Son of Cercion.

Ovid again, who has described this Story at full length, adds to all these Toxus and Plexippus the Sons of Thestius, whom Apollodorus had not named; the brave Leucippus, Adrastus, Ceneus who was transformed from a Girl to a Boy; Phenix the Son of Amyntor; Menetius the Father of Patroclus; Phileus, Echion, Lelex, Panopeus, Hyleus, the stern Hippasus; Nestor, who was then in the Flower of his Youth; the four Sons of Hippocoon; Laertes the Father of Ulysses; and the crafty Amphicides (a).

The Poets who came after Homer, embellished this Story with several Circumstances that were unknown to him, and among others, with that of the fatal Brand, which was the Cause of Meleager's Death, in the Manner as Ovid relates it. After that Meleager, says he, had put to Death his two Uncles by the Mother's Side, Plexippus and Toxus, who disputed with Atalanta the Boar's Skin which had been given her; Althea who was gone to thank the Gods for the Victory her Son had gained, met the two Corpses of her Brothers which they were carrying to Calydon. At this sad Spectacle she lays aside her ceremonial Habit, puts on Mourning, and makes the whole City resound with her Shrieks and Lamentations. When she learned afterwards, that her Son was the Murderer of his two Uncles, she refrained from Tears and entered into a secret Resolution to revenge their Death. When she was delivered of Meleager, the Parcæ had put into the Fire a Brand to which that Prince's Destiny was annexed,

(1) In Arcad.

(a) Apollonius, Antoninus Liberalis, Diodorus, &c. likewise describe after the same Poet, this War of the Curetes against the Calydonians.

annexed (a), and beginning then to spin his Days, foretold that they would last as long as that Piece of Wood. The same Poet adds, that they having gone forth after that Oracle, Althea pluck'd out of the Fire the fatal Brand, and laid it up, that by keeping it carefully she might preserve the Life of her Son; but the Grief with which she was seized for the Death of her two Brothers, made her forget her Love to Meleager, so that she threw the Brand into the Fire, which as it burnt away, made that Prince languish and pine away in agonizing Pain, and expire so soon as the Brand was consumed.

This Fiction, as we see, was unknown to Homer, who says indeed, that Althea devoted her Son to the Furies; but he is so far from making this Imprecation to have been the Cause of his Death, that it was pronounced upon him some Time before his Wife appeased his Wrath; and induced him to relieve the Town.

If we may believe Pausanias, Phrynicus, the Son of Polyphradmon, a Tragic Poet, the Disciple of Thespis, the Inventor of Tragedy among the Greeks, was the first who vented this Fable in his Play, intitled Pleuron. Meleager, said he in that Tragedy, these are Pausanias's Words, could not avoid Death. His cruel Mother set Fire to the fatal Brand, and in the same Fire her Son felt himself consume. Here then, according to Pausanias, is the first Time that this Circumstance of Meleager's History appeared in a Play exhibited to the Public; but it is very probable that it was known before that Time, since that Poet only hints at it as a public Tradition. And indeed, had it been of Phrynicus's own Invention, he would have insisted longer upon it: Accordingly, this Reflexion has not escaped Pausanias, who, after quoting the Passage in the Tragedy of that Poet, subjoins these Words: “It must, however, be acknowledged, Phrynicus insists not on this Event as every Poet is wont to do upon a Notion of his own Invention, which he wants to make “credible;

(a) Apollodorus, L. 1. says it was on the seventh Day after Meleager's Birth, that the Parcæ gave Althea that fatal Brand.

“credible; but he barely mentions the Fact, as a “Thing well known thro’ all Greece.”

Althea, the Mother of Meleager, was of Pleurone, a City adjoining to Calydon, and very powerful, wherein dwelt the Curetes. Her two Brothers, Plexippus and Toxeus, had their Residence there, and joined with the Troops of the Curetes, their Subjects, to make War upon their Nephew.

As to the Transformation of Meleager’s Sisters into Birds, called from their Name Meleagrides, a Fiction unknown to the same Poet, we may suppose it had no other Foundation, but that some of these Virgins were so deeply affected with their Brothers mournful Fate, as to die for Grief; as also did Althea, who being wounded with Remorse, hanged herself in Despair. Oeneus, after the Death of his Wife, married Peribæa, the Daughter of Hipponous, who had sent her to him to be chastised for having suffered herself to be debauch’d by a Priest of Mars; tho’ she gave out that it was the God himself had fallen in Love with her.

Oeneus, of the Family of the Eolidæ, was the Son of Partbaon and Euryte. He had by Althea several Children, Thireus, Clymenus, Meleager, Toxeus, whom he put to Death; and two Daughters, Gorgè who married Andremon, who succeeded his Father-in-law, and Dejanira who was married to Hercules. By Peribæa his second Wife, he had Tydeus, the Father of Diomedes, so celebrated in the Iliad. He was dethroned in the Manner that Pausanias relates, but found Means to get himself restored to the Crown; at length, being over-burdened with old Age, he left the Administration of his Dominions to his Son-in-law Andremon, and set out with his Grand-son Diomedes; but he perished in the Way by an Ambuscade laid for him by his Nephews. His Body was transported to Argolis, and interred in a small City, which from that Time bore the Name of Oenea.

We must not here omit what some Authors alledge, that under the Idea of the Boar was concealed one of those famous Robbers, who had made himself formidable dable in that Time, and against whom they were obliged to draw together a kind of Army. If we may believe Strabo, this Robber was the Son of the famous Phaya, whom Theseus cut off. We are farther told, that Meleager slew him with his own Hand, and gave his Spoils to his Mistress Atalanta, and the rest. But this is a vain Refinement; this History turns upon a real Boar, whose Skin was even a long Time preserved in Greece. Augustus, to punish the Arcadians for having espoused Anthony's Party, carried off from Tegea the Statue of Minerva Alea, with the Tusks of the Calydonian Boar brought thither by Atalanta, an Arcadian by Birth, to whom the Head of that Animal had been given; and at Rome was to be seen one of its Teeth, for the other was broken off, which, according to Pausanias, was half an Ell in Length. The same Author adds that the Skin of this Animal was still preserved in his Time in the Temple of the same Minerva Alea; but that it was very much damnified by Time, and strip'd of its Bristles.

Cleopatra, the Wife of Meleager, was the Daughter of Idas, the Brother of Lynceus and Marpesa; by her he had a Daughter named Polydora, who married Protesilaus, the first who sprung from the Grecian Ships upon the Coast of Troy, tho' the Oracle had foretold the Death of him who should first land upon that Shore. Polydora died for Grief for her Husband's Death, as also Cleopatra, who was unable to survive Meleager.

Atalanta acts too fine a Part in this History, not to have her Story related in particular. This Princess, as has been said, was a Native of Arcadia, and the Daughter of Schæneus. Some Authors confound her with another Atalanta the Daughter of Menalion, who was so swift at running, that it was impossible even for the most vigorous Men to overtake her. Others again distinguish them; what Ovid says of her is to this Effect. Atalanta, says he, had resolved to preserve her Virginity; but her exquisite Beauty gained her Admirers from all Parts. To be free from the Importunity of so many Lovers, she proposed a Running Match Match with them, on Condition that they should run without Arms, while she should be armed with a Javelin, with which she should pierce those to Death whom she could overtake, but that which ever of them arrived at the Goal before her should be her Husband. Several accepted the Terms; but as she run faster than they, many of her Suitors had already lost their Lives, when Hippomenes, the Son of Macareus, having received from Venus, whom he invoked, three golden Apples which she had gathered in the Garden of the Hesperides, or according to others, in the Island of Cyprus, made Use of a Stratagem whereby he gained the Victory. As the Lover, according to Agreement, was to run first, he artfully drop'd the three Apples at some Distance from one another, and as Atalanta was amusing herself in gathering them, he arrived first at the Mark, and married this Princess; but having afterwards with her profaned a Temple of Cybele, or a Grove which was consecrated to her, he was transformed into a Lion, and Atalanta into a Lionness.

As the Ancients are seldom or never agreed about those Histories so remote from their Time, Apollodorus has followed a Tradition concerning Atalanta, quite different from that now given. Her Father, says he, being desirous to have Male Children, and not Daughters, so soon as his Wife was delivered of her, exposed her in a desert Place, that she might perish. A She-boar that passed by, having found the Child, gave her Suck, and continued to nurse her, till some Hunters finding her, took pity upon her, and having carried her with them, took Care of her Education. As she had been brought up by People who delighted in hunting, she contracted a great Relish for that Exercise, and so soon as she was able to endure the Fatigues of it, she gave herself up to it entirely, running through the Fields; declining every Match, she turned her whole Thoughts on proper Precautions, how to lead a Life of Celibacy; however, the Life she led exposed her to many Hazards, and she was one Day vigorously pursued by two Centaurs, that is, by two Horsemen, who offered

Violence

Violence to her, but she had the Valour and Success to kill them with her Arrows. She was at the famous hunting of the Calydonian Boar; and at the Games and Combats instituted in Honour of Pelias, where she wrestled with Peleus, and gained the Prize; after this she found out her Parents; and her Father urging her to marry, she consented to marry him who should outstrip her at running, as has been said. Hesiod, and some others, pursues Apollodorus, said she was not the Daughter of Jesus, but of Schæneus, Euripides gives her Melelus for her Father, and asserts that she married Hippomenes, and not Menalion, as some of the Ancients were of Opinion, alledging even that she had by him a Son named Parthenopeus, who made War upon the Thebans. Be that as it will, Apollodorus seems to contradict himself, since in the First Book he says, Atalanta, who assisted at the Hunting of Calydon, was the Daughter of Schæneus; and in the Third, that she who is now in question, was the Daughter of Jesus and Clymene; which is often the Case with Compilers, who do not accurately revise their Works.

Elian has a long Dissertation upon Atalanta, upon her Parents, the Manner in which she was exposed, and upon some of the principal Actions of her Life; but as that Discourse seems to be a kind of Declamation, which teaches us nothing new, I presume that what I have now quoted from Apollodorus will make it needless for me to transcribe the Passage.

We have, in the Supplement to Montfaucon's Antiquities, a fine Roman Groupe, wherein is to be seen Atalanta and Hippomenes, each of them holding an Apple in their Hand, and two Monuments representing, the one Meleager with the Boar's Head, the other the same Heroe with his Mother Althæa putting into the Fire the fatal Brand, whereon depended the Preservation of his Life.

Tho' we cannot precisely fix the Date of the Event now related, yet we may determine it exactly enough with regard to its Distance from the Siege of Troy; and as that City was taken, as has been proved in the Æra

Æra of the Argonauts, about Thirty Four or Thirty Five Years before their Expedition, I think I may fix the Date of the Hunting and War of Calydon to the Twenty Eighth or Thirtieth Year before the Trojan War; and indeed there is all Probability that this Hunting did not fall out till after Hercules's Death, which happened Four or Five Years after the Conquest of the Golden Fleece, at which that Heroe, Oeneus's Son-in-Law, must needs have been present with Iolaus and Theseus, who never left him in his Expeditions. But as Hercules after his Marriage with Dejanira, returned with her into his own Dominions; and as it was during that Expedition, that Nessus gave Dejanira the fatal Tunic to which Hercules owed his Death, having not long before fallen in love with Iole, there is the highest Probability that he returned no more to Calydon; and no Ancient has actually said that he was at that Hunting.

The same Reason proves it to be posterior to the Conquest of the Argonauts, in which Time Hercules was alive. Ovid, in the long Description he gives of this celebrated Hunting-match, insinuates in more Places than one, that it did not happen till after the Expedition to Colchis; and Pausanias decides the Matter effectually, by saying that Anceus after having distinguished himself among the Argonauts, was slain by the Calydonian Boar, as he was pursuing it with too much Ardour.

Nor ought it in my Opinion to be set at a great Distance from that Conquest, since the same Heroes were at both.

Tho' the Story I am going to relate has no Connection with what has been now said, yet since it happened in the same City Calydon, of which I shall have no Occasion to say any thing further, I shall give it a Place here. Corefus, the Priest of Bacchus, having fallen in love with Callirhoë, a Princess of the Blood Royal, tried all Means to gain her Affection, but the more ardent his Addresses were to her, the more did she shew her dislike of him. Corefus finding that all his Endeavours served only to exasperate his Mistress, had recourse to the Divinity whom he served. Bacchus heard the Prayers of his Priest, and visited the Calydonians with a Distemper which deprived them of their Senses ; it was a kind of Drunkenness which led them to fight together, without knowing one another. In a little Time Calydon was like to have become a Desert, when a Deputation was sent to consult the Oracle of Dodona, to learn the Means of being delivered from so fatal a Calamity. The Oracle answered that there was no other way to appease incensed Bacchus but by sacrificing Callirhoé, or some one who was willing to be devoted to death in her stead. That Princess was already near the Altar, dressed like a Victim that was to save the People of Calydon, when Coreus ready to plunge the Poniard into her Breast, performed a generous Action that surprized all the World, and sacrificed himself to the public Safety. Callirhoé, struck with the Generosity of her Lover, killed herself near the Fountain of Calydon, which from that time bore her Name.

C H A P. II.

The History of the two Wars of Thebes, of Oedipus, of the Sphinx, &c.

EIGHT or ten Years after the Conquest of the Argonauts, an Event happened in Greece, which the Poets have very much celebrated. Eschiles, Sophocles, and Euripides have made it the Subject of several Tragedies, and Statius, of an Epic Poem (a). I mean the two Wars of Thebes, and the Story of the hostile Brothers, Etheocles and Polynices ; Wars which prove according to the Ancients, that the Wrath of the Gods against

(a) The Tragedy of Eschiles upon this Subject, has for its Title The Seven before Thebes ; that is, the seven Chiefs who follow'd Adrastus. Sophocles has made three Tragedies upon the same Subject, Oedipus King, Oedipus Colonus, and Antigone ; and Euripides his Suppliants, where he brings in the Circumstance of the Ladies supplicating the Archeians to allow Burial to their Husbands slain at the Siege of Thebes.

against Cadmus, unhappy in his Family, continued to pursue him even in his last Descendants; but in order fully to explain the Adventures thereof, we must trace the Story to its Source. After the Plague had consumed the whole House of Amphion, and Zethus deploring the Death of his Son, slain by his Mother, had sunk under his Affliction, the Thebans re-instated in the Throne (1) Laius who had been expelled from it, and this Restoration was followed with so many Misfortunes, that ancient History furnishes us with few Examples parallel to the Calamities that afflicted the City of Thebes.

Diodorus Siculus (2), Apollodorus (3), Statius (4), Eusebius, and several others, tell us that Laius having married Jocasta the Daughter of Creon King of Thebes, learned from the Oracle, that he should be put to Death by the Child that was to be born of that Marriage, which obliged him to live with the Queen in great Reserve; but on a Day of Rioting and Debauch, having gone into the Queen, she proved with Child. When she was delivered, Laius whose Thoughts turned much upon the Prediction, and gave him great Disturbance, ordered a trusty Servant to go and expose the Child in a desert Place. He instead of abandoning the Infant to the Mercy of the wild Beasts, hung him by the Feet to a Tree, whence he got the Name of Oedipus (5). Phorbas, the Overseer of the Flocks of Polybas King of Corinth, having found him in that distressed Condition, carried him to his Master, who bestowed great Care upon his Education, and adopted him. This young Prince now grown up, being informed of his Adventure, resolved to go and consult the Oracle of Apollo, to discover who were his Parents; and the Answer was, that he must beware of returning into his own Country, because it was fated that he should there kill his Father, and marry his Mother; which obliged him to undergo voluntary Exile from Corinth, which he took to be the Place intended by the Oracle: But as he was passing thro' Phocis, he met with Laius in a narrow Defile of Mount Cyberon, who having ordered him aloud to leave him the Passage clear, they came to Blows, and Oedipus slew his Father, and thus fulfilled a Part of the Prediction of the Oracle.

N 2 tended

(1) Pausan. in Beot. c. 5. (2) L. 4. (3) L. 3. (4) Theb. 1. 3. (5) The Word imports one who has swollen Feet.

At that Time the Sphinx annoyed the Thebans, not so much by the puzzling Riddles she set forth to them, as by the Havock and Desolation she made in the Country. The Fable says, she was a Monster sprung from Echidna and Typhon, which Juno, incensed against the Thebans, sent against them. She had, 'tis said, the Head and Hands of a Woman, the Body of a Dog, the Tail of a Dragon, the Claws of a Lion, and Wings like a Fowl (a). Sphinx usually repaired to Mount Phiceon, whence she fell upon Passengers, and proposed to them difficult Riddles, tearing in Pieces those who were not able to explain them. Her usual Riddle was that of an Animal which has four Feet in the Morning, two at Noon, and three in the Evening; and it was fated that she should lose her Life, so soon as any one resolved her Riddle. Already had several Persons been the Victims of this pitiless Monster, and Thebes was plunged in deep Distress, when Creon, who had re-ascended the Throne after Laius's Death, being concerned to deliver his Kingdom from her Ravages, gave public Notice, that whoever explained the Riddle should have Jocasta in Marriage, and be made Heir to his Crown. Oedipus presented himself, and was so happy as to explain it, understanding that Animal to be Man, who in his Infancy, which is the Morning of Life, creeps about on Hands and Feet; at Noon, that is in the Strength of his Age, he walks on two Legs; and in the Evening, that is in old Age, makes use of a Crutch as a third Leg. Sphinx was so enraged with Spight at his Success, that she dashed out her Brains against a Rock.

'Tis

(a) Sphinx velutris pennis, pedibus fera, fronte puella.

Auson.

'Tis easy to see that some Piece of History is comprehended under these dark Fictions.

'Tis commonly reckoned with Pausanias (1), that a natural Daughter of Laius, named Sphinx, gave rise to the Fable. That Princess, not content with the Treatment she met with from her Father, had set herself on the Head of a Troop of Banditti, who committed a thousand Abuses in the Confines of Thebes, whence she came to be reckoned a Monster. First she had given her for her Parents, Echidna, or the Chimera, and Typhon; these were always the Father and Mother of whatever was monstrous. The Lions Claws which she was said to have, denoted her Cruelty; her Body shaped like a Dog, the Abuses whereof a young Woman so abandoned is capable of; her Wings, the Agility and Address with which she escaped the Pursuits of the Thebans; and her Riddles, the Snares she laid for Passengers to decoy them into the Rocks and Thickets of Mount Phiceon (a), where she resided, and from which it was impossible for them to extricate themselves, for want of knowing the Outlets, with which she was perfectly well acquainted.

The learned Bochart (2) derives the Name of Sphinx, from a Phenician Word Phicea, in Greek $\Phi\iota\chi$, which signifies, Subtle, Crafty, Quick-sighted; and the Reason he says of giving her this Name was, because she was Cunning and Crafty, puzzling by her intricate Riddles, the most penetrating Minds; an Explanation which amounts to the same with mine, and has also a very probable Etymology in its support (b). M. le Clerc derives the Name from Sphicha, which signifies either Perplexed, or Man-slayer; which suits very well with the Riddles she set forth, or with the Man-slaughter she committed. The Phenicians who wrote this Piece of ancient History, and who had built the Town of Thebes, were wont to propose Riddles, with Prizes to those

N 3

(1) In Beot.

(a) Mount Phiceon is in Beotia near Anthedon.

(2) Chan. l. 1. c. 16. page 470.

(b) Quia mulier fuit acutissima quæ per Gryphos & Ænigmata solertissimorum sui ævi ingenia exercebat. Boch. loc. cit.

those who resolved them, and sometimes punishing those who could not hit upon an Explanation. The History of Samson, and that of Solomon, with Hiram King of Tyre, furnish us with Examples of that ancient Custom, which according to Herodotus (1), and Plutarch (2), was also observed in Egypt and other Countries. Thus, without receding from the Fable of the Greeks, we may understand the Riddles of the Sphinx literally; or interpret them in an allegorical Manner, of the Woods and Thickets of the Mountain where this Princess had her Retreat (a).

Be that as it will, Oedipus with some Theban Troops which Creon had given him, having taken an Opportunity to surprize this Woman and her Companions, cut her off in the Place of her Retreat, which is meant by his having found out a Key to her Riddle. Jocasta being the Prize of the Person who succeeded in this Enterprize, Oedipus married her, and had two Sons by her, Etbeocles and Polynices, and two Daughters Antigone and Ismena. But having afterwards discovered the Secret of his Birth, and consequently his Parricide and Incest, he plucked out his Eyes, and having abdicated the Crown, retired to Athens, and Jocasta killed herself thro' Anguish and Vexation. Sophocles, who has composed a Tragedy upon this Retreat of Oedipus, says that unfortunate Prince, guided by his Daughter Antigone, stop'd near a Town of Attica named Colonte, in a Wood consecrated to the Eumenides, and that some Athenians who found him there, affrighted at the Sight of a Man who had planted himself in a Place, where no profane Person was permitted to set his Foot, and still more so, when they came to know he was a Man pursued by divine Wrath, in one Word Oedipus,
were

(1) L. 2. (2) Banquet of the seven WISEMEN.

(a) The Sphinx of the Greeks did not resemble those that are in Egypt, especially that which still subsists, and is of a colossal Figure. The Sphinx of the last was represented with the Head covered, and without Wings. That of Thebes has the Head bare, and the Hair in order, and is painted with Wings. The Inhabitants of Chios took this Monster for a Symbol, and it is to be seen upon their Medals.

were going to have expelled him, when Antigone interceded for her Father and herself, upon which they led him to Athens, where Theseus gave him a favourable Reception, and there he spent the Remainder of his Days.

Such is the History of this unfortunate Prince, according to the tragic Poets, especially Sophocles, who building upon the Tradition I have delivered, has given his Tragedies that moving Pathetic, and infused into them more of Terror and Compassion, with the other Emotions of the Theatre, than if he had exactly followed the History. For in Fact, 'tis literally true that Oedipus married his Mother; but according to Homer, and Pausanias who cites ancient Authors, it appears that he had not the four Children whom Sophocles gives him. Ulysses in the Narrative he delivers at the Court of Alcinous, of his Descent into the infernal Regions (1), after having said he had seen there the fair Epicasfe, for that is the Name which Homer gives to Oedipus's Mother, whom Sophocles and others call Jocasta; from thence he takes occasion to recount briefly the Misfortunes of that Princess, who by a cruel Fatality saw herself the Mother of her own Husband, and the Wife of her own Son; but, continues he, the Gods very soon defaced the Remembrance of that Crime:

*But soon the Gods cut short her guilty Days,
Not suffering the foul Incest to go on.*

Epicasfe, sunk under her Anguish of Soul, went up to an upper Apartment in the Palace, there tied the fatal Noose which was the Instrument of her Death, and hurried herself into the infernal Regions. For not to enter here into the Examination of the meaning of the Word ἐναπύσσω, which has given some Trouble to the Critics, and has been the Subject of two Dissertations, the one by the Abbé Gédoyen, the other by M. Boirvin the Younger, Copies whereof may be seen in the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres (2); 'tis certain from

N 4

(1) Odyss. l. 8. (2) Tom. v. p. 146.

from the Authority of Homer and Pausanias, and the two Academics who explain the Word in question, agree to it, that the incestuous Oedipus and Jocasta had no Issue, and that this Princess who was ignorant of the Matter at first, hanged herself in the Bitterness of her Soul.

And indeed how could the Gods be said to have abolished the Memory of that Crime, or how would they have made it known to the World, for the Word Anapusta is capable of both these Significations, if Jocasta had continued to live with Oedipus her Son and Husband, so long as to have four Children by him? Homer is not explicite on this Head; but Pausanias, (1) who had examined and traced the Opinion of the Greek Poet, who lived nearer that Age, and consequently deserves more Credit than the tragic Poets, positively asserts, that after the Death of Jocasta, Oedipus married Euriganea, the Daughter of Periphas, and had by her the four Children now named. He cites to this Purpose the Poem intitled Oedipedia, or the Adventures of Oedipus; and adds for Confirmation of this Opinion, that in the fine Picture which Onatas had drawn for the Plateans, Euriganea appears overwhelmed with Grief, because the Painter had caught the Moment of Time, when that distressed Mother was expecting the Issue of the Combat in which her two Sons were going to engage. Pausanias is not the only one of the Ancients who was of this Opinion, and long before him, Apollodorus had said that Oedipus had these four Children by the same Euriganea.

Such is the true History of Oedipus, but we cannot therefore blame the tragic Poets for having given it a new Dress; had they not done so, we should have been deprived of the finest Passages in their Works. Thus, had Sophocles been scrupulously attached to the Truth of History, we should have been deprived of a Tragedy, which in the Opinion of the Ancients, is the finest and most moving that ever appeared upon the Stage, and at the same Time of those fine Lines so much praised

(1) In Attic, c. 28.

praised by Longinus *, and thus excellently translated by Boileau.

*Hymen, funeste Hymen, tu m'as donné la vie ;
Mais dans ces mêmes flancs ou je fus enfermé,
Tu fais rentrer le sang dont tu m'avois formé :
Et par là tu produis & de fils, & des peres,
Des freres, des maris, des femmes, & des meres ;
Et tout ce que du sort la maligne fureur,
Fit jamais voir au jour & de honte & d'horreur.*

O Hymen ! Hymen accursed ! But for thee Oedipus had never been ! A Wretch that lives to propagate, from those Loins whence he himself had sprung, a motley Race of Fathers, Brothers, Husbands, Sons, Mothers, Daughters, and whatever foul unnatural Productions have appeared in the World !

Nor, if the History had been exactly kept to, should we have had the Tragedy of the same Poet, which has for its Title Oedipus Colonos ; since, according to the most ancient Tradition, that Prince having wedded Euriganea, reigned at Thebes the rest of his Days, and went not to Athens, which makes Pausanias say, when speaking in his Attics of a Place named The Goat-Hill, it was there that Oedipus came to deplore his Misfortunes : This, he remarks, is what they say who will not rely upon Homer ; whence we may conclude that according to Homer's Sentiment, that Prince did not leave Thebes, but reigned there with Euriganea after Jocasta's Death, and that there he died and was buried. 'Tis true his Tomb was shewn at Athens, within the Bounds of the Arcopagus ; but as Pausanias very judiciously remarks (1), his Bones must have been transported thither afterwards from Thebes. For, says he,
what

* - - - - - ὦ γάμοι, γάμοι,
'Ερύσαθ' ἡμᾶς, καὶ φυτεύσαντες, παλιν
'Ανείτε ταῦτόν σπέρμα, κάσπεδείξατε
Πατέρας, ἀδελφοὺς, παῖδας, αἶμ' ἐμφύλιον
Νύμφας, Γυναικας, μήτέρας τέ, γ' ὅποσα
'Αισχίς ἐν ἀνθρώποισιν ἔργα γίνεται.
(1) In Attic.

what Sophocles has imagined about Oedipus's Death, appears to me to deserve but little Credit, when compared with what we read in Homer, who makes Menistheus to have gone to Thebes, to dispute the Prize in the funeral Games, that were celebrated at that Prince's Tomb. Now in these Matters, 'tis unquestionable that the Authority of Homer, who lived nearer the Age when this Story happened, and was perfectly acquainted with the Antiquities of Greece, ought to outweigh that of all others, especially of the tragic Poets, who had far greater Concern to excite the proper Emotions of Passion, than to adjust their Narrations to the most authentic Traditions.

After the Death, or if you will, the Retreat of Oedipus, his two Sons Etheocles and Polynices agreed to reign by turns. Diodorus Siculus adds (1), that these two young Princes, when grown up, confined their Father in his Palace (a), after which making themselves Masters of the Kingdom, they agreed together to reign each a Year by turns: A Contract which was the Source of their Hatred, and of the War which, according to Pausanias (2), was one of the most considerable that ever had been among the Greeks, during the heroic Age: “ For that of the Eleusinians, says that Author, “ against the other People of Attica, even that of “ the Thebans against the Minyans, was almost as soon “ ended as begun. The Armies had not far to go “ before they came up with one another, the Quarrel “ was left to the Decision of a Battle, and to Hostilities

(1) L. 4.

(a) Euripides has followed this Tradition in his Phenician Women, since he says that Oedipus was still at Thebes confined within his Palace, and that it was not till after the Death of the two hostile Brothers, that Creon who had resigned the Crown to Etheocles, reascended the Throne, and forced Oedipus to quit Thebes, whence he repaired to the Town of Colonus in Attica. The same Poet supposes also in the same Play, that Jocasta, whom the other Ancients make to have hanged herself upon the Knowledge of her Incest, did not kill herself till she heard of the Death of her Sons. So true it is, that the tragic Poets especially, vary a great deal as to these ancient Pieces of History, which they adapted to the Theatre.

(2) In Beotia

“ lities very soon succeeded either Peace or a “ Truce.

“ But the Army of the Argives came from the Ex“ tremity of the Peloponnesus into the Heart of Beotia, “ and Adrastus drew his auxiliary Troops from Arca- “ dia and Messenia, while the Thebans were necessitated “ to draw theirs from Phocis and Minyas, whence the “ Phleggyans came to their Assistance.”

The two Brothers being therefore agreed to reign after one another, Etheocles who was the eldest ascended the Throne first; but his Year being expired, he would not give Place to his Brother. Polynices (1) in Wrath retired to Argos to King Adrastus's Court (a). At that time Tydeus the Son of Oeneus, having slain at Calydon, Alcathous and Lycopus his Uncles, fled also for refuge from Ætolia to Argos. Adrastus gave them both a kind Reception, and in Obedience to an Oracle, he gave them his Daughters in Marriage: To Polynices he gave Argia, and to Tydeus, Deipyle. These two Youths had acquired a vast Reputation; and having been in high Favour with the King, we are told that Adrastus, as a Mark of his Esteem for them, promised to restore them each to his own Country, and to re-establish them in all their Privileges.

With this View he sent Tydeus upon an Embassy to Etheocles to treat with him about his Brother's Return. We are told, that Tydeus having fallen into an Ambuscade of fifty Men, which Etheocles, apprized of the End of his Embassy, had laid for him in the Way, slew them all and returned to Argos. Adrastus no sooner heard of this Piece of Treachery, than he prepared himself for a military Expedition, and drew over to his side Capaneus, Hippomedon, and Parthenopeus. In the mean Time Adrastus, Polynices, and Tydeus having shared the Command of the Army with the other Princes now named, marched against Thebes, followed

(1) Iliad l. 4.

(a) Pausanias says, Polynices quitted Thebes even in his Father's Life-time, for fear of incurring the Malediction with which his Father had threatened him and his Brother, and that he returned not thither till he was informed by Etheocles that Oedipus was dead.

followed by numerous Troops, and by several other Captains, while Polynices on his side endeavoured to persuade the Soothsayer Amphiaraus to join with him; but whether he foresaw by his Art the Misfortune that was to befall him, or for some other Reason, he refused to engage in that Quarrel, while Eriphyle, his Wife and Adrastus's Sister, bribed by a Necklace of great Price given her by that Prince, wrought so effectually as to prevail upon him to go (a).

The seven principal Leaders in this Expedition were therefore Adrastus, Polynices and Tydeus his two Sons-in-law; Amphiaraus, Capaneus, Hippomedon and Parthenopeus, who shared among them the Command of the Troops that had been levied in their Dominions.

While they were in the Way, there befel them an Adventure which gave rise to the Institution of the Nemean Games; the Occasion whereof was this. The Argonauts, as I have said elsewhere, going to the Conquest of the Golden Fleece, were obliged to put in at Lemnos; and Jason before he went to Sea again, left there Hypsiphile pregnant of a Son, whom she brought forth some time after. Hardly was that Princess well delivered, when the Lemnian Ladies heard by report, that King Thoas was still alive, and reigning in the Island of Chios, where Hypsiphile had him conveyed to be in safety, by which she became so odious to those Women, that dreading their Fury, she fled to the Sea-coast, and was there taken and carried off by Pirates.

Lycargus, to whom they sold her, made her Nurse to his Son Archemorus. As that Prince's Dominions lay in the Way by which Adrastus's Army passed, the Greeks found in a Wood that illustrious Nurse, with the young Prince whom she was suckling. They were extremely pinched with Thirst, and almost all the Springs being dried up by the Heat of the Season, they prayed her to give them some Relief; she did so, and led them to a Fountain which was not far from thence. Her Zeal to serve them was so great, that she left the
young

(a) See below the History of that celebrated Soothsayer.

young Archemorus upon the Grass, that she might be able to walk the faster. She saw the Greeks drink, and gave them a brief Account of her History. After she was done with it, and had received the Thanks of the Leaders of the Army, she returned to the Place where she had left the young Prince; but a Serpent had stung him to death, and he was just at the Point of expiring; she even heard his last Groans as she was coming up. The Greeks surprized and afflicted with this fatal Adventure, slew the Serpent, gave the Child pompous funeral Obsequies, and according to the Usage of those Times, instituted Games in his Honour. It was even resolved that they should assemble every three Years, or every five Years upon the same Occasion. These Games were called Nemean, from the Name of Lycurgus's Kingdom, or rather from the Fountain near which this Adventure happened. The Prize of the Conquerors was a Crown of Parsley.

After having discharged these funeral Rites, the Army continued its March, and arrived before Thebes, but this first Expedition was unfortunate to the Argives. The two hostile Brothers slew one another in a single Combat. Capaneus having mounted the Rampart, was overthrown, and died in the Fall, or according to others, was struck dead with Thunder while he was blaspheming the Gods (1); the Earth having opened swallowed up Amphiaraus, and all the rest perished in this Expedition, except Adrastus. A great Number of Soldiers left their Lives there; Adrastus was forced to return to Argos without giving them Burial, the Thebans not having allowed them to carry away their Bodies. In the mean Time, as no body durst bury them, because Creon who had ascended the Throne after Eteocles's Death, and during Ladamas's Minority, had made an Edict against their being buried; the Athenians, who were distinguished from other People by their Justice, discharged this Duty to all of them, and Theseus, to whom Adrastus had applied for Assistance, forced the King of Thebes to consent to it; an Event which which is the Subject of a fine Tragedy in Euripides. Thus ended the Expedition of the seven Leaders before Thebes.

(1) See the History of these Heroes below.

To give Light to this History, wherein I have followed the Authority of Diodorus Siculus and Pausanias, I shall add, that the first of these Authors makes no mention of a Battle that was fought upon the Banks of the River Ismenus, where the Thebans gave Ground upon the first Onset, and retired into their City, where they were immediately besieged; but as they knew better to defend a City, than to fight in the open Field, they made a Sally so opportunely upon the Enemy (1), that they pushed them into their Lines, cut them in pieces, and gained over them so compleat a Victory, that Adrastus was the only one who escaped them, as has been said, his Horse Arion having saved him. But this Victory cost them dear, and they lost so many Men, that it came afterwards to be a Proverb; for it was usual to call an Advantage gained over an Enemy with the Loss of much Blood, a Theban Victory.

Ten Years after this unfortunate Expedition, the Sons of these Captains undertook to avenge the Death of their Fathers; and it is this second War that is known by the Name of the War of the Epigoni, that is, of the Descendants or Sons of the former. These young Princes, marching under the Ensigns of Thersander, or, according to others, of Alcmaeon the Son of Amphiaraus, came once more to attack the Thebans; wherein it was not the Argives alone, the Messenians and Arcadians, as in the former Expedition, that took Arms, the Corinthians and Megareans would needs also join in it. As for the Thebans, they had engaged all their Neighbours in their Quarrel, and were powerfully assisted by them. The two Armies having very soon met, began the Attack upon the Banks of the Glissas. The Fight was very obstinate on either Side; but at last the Thebans having lost the Day, some of them fled with Laodamas their General, the rest threw themselves into Thebes, where they were very soon taken by Storm.

This

(1) Pausan. loc. cit.

This whole War, says Pausanias, was wrote in Verse, and Callinus, who quotes some of those Verses, makes no Difficulty to ascribe them to Homer, wherein he has been followed by several Authors of great Weight. For my Part, I own, that, next to the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer, I have not seen a finer Poem. It is remarkable that as in the first War all the Leaders of the Argives died, except Adrastus, in the Second no Person of Distinction fell on their Side, but Egialeus his Son. Such were the two first Theban Wars, which cost Greece so much Blood.

We must not forget to observe that in the First, Tiresias had foretold the Thebans, that if *Menæti*us, the Son of Creon, would sacrifice his Life for the Salvation of his Country, all the Enemy's Generals would be slain. I shall not say whether this was done with an Intention to get rid of that young Prince, or if it proceeded from a barbarous Principle of Superstition, as if the Gods had been pleased with those who sacrificed themselves to the Preservation of their Country; however it was, the Prediction gained Credit, and *Menæti*us killed himself: And as this animated the Courage and Hope of the Thebans, they made such a vigorous Defence, as to render all the Efforts of their Enemies ineffectual, and cut them almost all in pieces.

It was also in the first of these Wars, that the two hostile Brothers, to save the Blood of their Subjects, fought a Duel, and slew one another. Their Dissension had run so high in their Life-time, and their Hatred was so irreconcilable, that it is said to have lasted even after their Death; and it was given out, that the very Flames of the Funeral Piles, on which their Bodies were burnt, were observed to part asunder; an Effect which, tho' natural, was attributed to the mutual Enmity between those two Princes. The same Thing was also said to have happened in the Sacrifices that were offered to them: For however barbarous and cruel these two Brothers had been, they were not deemed unworthy to have Heroic Honours paid to them.

Pausa-

Pausanias (1) tells us, that the Place where these two Princes slew one another, was near the Tomb of Menetius and Tydeus; and that as a Monument of that fatal Combat, a Pillar was set up there, and a Marble Buckler fastened to it. He adds; I never joined in the Sacrifices that are performed there, but two Things I learned from Persons of Credit; the first, that the Thebans sacrifice to several other Heroes, but particularly to these; the other, that while they are burning the Victims offered in Sacrifice to these hostile Brothers, the Fire and Smoke visibly part asunder.

The Learned know that Callimachus is the first who advanced this pretended Miracle, and in this he has been followed by his Successors, especially by Ovid (a).

After the Death of Etheocles, his Son Ladamas succeeded him, under the Tutorage of Creon, and it was upon his Majority, that the Epigoni attempted the second Expedition. After the Loss of the Battle which we have been speaking of, he retired into Illyricum (2) with those who were willing to follow him. It was in the same Country that Cadmus, his Ancestor, being forced to quit Beotia, as has been said in his History, fixed his Residence, and where probably he had settled some Correspondence with the Thebans. During these Transactions, the Argives, Masters of Thebes, set upon the Throne Thersander, the Son of Polynices. This is the same Thersander who was slain by Thelephus in Mysia, when he was going to Troy with the other Greeks. As he had highly distinguished himself in this Fight, he had a Monument erected to him in the City Elea, towards the Banks of the Caicus; and even in the Time of Pausanias, there was still to be seen, in the public Place of that City, a Tomb of Stone, exposed to the open Air, to which the Inhabitants came every Year

to

(1) In Beot.

(a) *Ipsa sibi discors, tanquam mandetur ab illis,
Scinditur in partes atra favilla duas.*

*Hoc, memini, quondam fieri non posse loquebar,
Et me Battia des iudice falsus erat.*

Trist. 1. 5. Eleg. 6.

(2) Pausan loc. cit.

to do Honour to his Memory. After the Death of Thersander, the Greeks equipped another Fleet, and chose Peneleus for their Admiral, because the Son of Thersander was not then of Age to take the Command; but Peneleus again was slain by Euripylus the Son of Telephus, and then the Thebans owned for their King Tisamenes the Son of Thersander and Demonassa, who was the Daughter of Amphiaraus. The Furies who continually haunted the Race of Oedipus and Laius, spared Tisamenes, but his Son Antefion was so persecuted by them, as to be forced to remove into the Country of the Dorians, by the Advice of the Oracle; and the Thebans, tired with obeying Princes so unfortunate, changed the Form of their Government.

We may remark, before we go farther, that Eschiles enumerates only Seven Leaders in the first Expedition, which is the Occasion of the Title of his Tragedy of the Seven before Thebes, tho' they were a great many more in Number; for, as Pausanias observes (1) the most considerable of the Argives, Messenians, and Arcadians, were willing to share the Glory of that Enterprize.

C H A P. III.

The particular History of those Chiefs.

TH O' we have spoken of those Warriors in general, yet I think it proper to give a more particular Account of the chief of them, beginning with Amphiaraus.

The History of AMPHIARAUS.

Amphiaraus was a celebrated Soothsayer of that Time, and a Man very considerable by Birth. His Father was Oicles, descended in a right Line from Melampus; but to support the Reputation he had acquired, of having Insight into Futurity, he was given out to be the Son of Apollo and Hypermnestra. Adrastus, the King of Argos, to whose Court he had retired, gave

VOL. IV.

O

him

(1) In Corinth. c. 20.

him in Marriage his Daughter Eriphyle, who was the Cause of his Death, and of all the Misfortunes that befel his Family afterwards. Whether this famous Soothsayer had foreseen by the Principles of his Art, as Homer, Diodorus, Pliny, and Statius will have it, that he was to perish at the War of Thebes, or rather, being afraid to engage in so hazardous an Expedition, he did all that lay in his Power to prevent his going thither, and having departed from the Court of Adrastus, hid himself so carefully, that it would have been impossible to discover him, but for the Treachery of his Wife, who informed Adrastus, her Brother, of the Place of his Retreat. That Princess preferred the Preservation of her Country to the Life of her Husband; or rather, she was bribed by a Necklace of great Value, which Adrastus, or, according to others, Polynices, gave her, to induce her to reveal to him the Secret. Thus Amphiaraus was necessitated to go to the War with the rest; but before he set out, he ordered Alcmeon his Son to slay Eriphyle so soon as he heard the News of his Death. In Fact, he lost his Life there, as he had foreseen; having fallen into a deep Pit in his Return from that Expedition, while he was amusing himself in considering the Flight of some Birds, to draw Omens from them (1); which makes Pausanias say (2), that the Earth had opened and swallowed him up with his Chariot.

Pindar (3) ascribes this Death to a supernatural Cause, when he says that Jupiter, with a Thunderbolt, plunged him headlong, and his Chariot, into the Bowels of the Earth; which happened, according to Strabo, in Attica, near Oropus, in a Place named Harmia, or the Chariot: And in Proof of this, that learned Author relies upon the Authority of Homer (4). Alcmeon, being apprized of his Father's Death, executed the cruel Order he had received from him, and slew his Mother. Being forced to go to the Court of Phegeus to be expiated from his Crime, according to the Manner

(1) Strabo, l. 9.(2) In Corinth, c. 33.(3) Nem.(4) Iliad l. 2.

Manner of that Age, and at the same Time to be delivered from the Furies that persecuted him, that is, from the Stings of his own Conscience, which allowed him no Repose, that Prince received him kindly, and gave him his Daughter Alphesibea in Marriage, to whom Alcmeon gave a Present of Eriphyle's Necklace; but having afterwards divorced her, Callirhoé (a) the Daughter of Achelous, at whose Court he had Occasion to be, he went and asked back the Necklace from his Brother-in-law, to whom Alphesibea had given it. They, to revenge the Affront, which he had offered to their Sister, laid wait for him in the Way, and assassinated him. The Children whom he had by Callirhoé (b) revenged his Death, so soon as they were grown up to Manhood, and this is what gave rise to the Fable of the Goddess Hebe's having added to the Number of their Years, to put them speedily into a Condition to execute that Vengeance, as we read in Ovid (1). Thus perished the whole Family of the famous Amphiaraus.

This fatal Necklace, which we have been speaking of, and the Gold which the Argive Ladies had given to Eriphyle, to induce her to Discover her Husband, was the Source of all these Misfortunes, according to Horace.

*Concidit Auguris Argivi Domus
Ob Lucrum demersa Excidio* (c).

Achelous, considering all the Disasters had been occasioned by that Necklace, deposited it in the Temple of Delphos, where it was preserved, until the Tyrants carried it away with the other Riches that were kept there. Amphiaraus had acquired a great Reputation, Eschiles, in his Tragedy of the seven before Thebes, gives a fine Character of him, and at the same Time deplores the Misfortune of the Good, who are often

O 2 engaged

(a) Others give her the Name of Arfinoé.

(b) They were called Amphitres and Acarnan, and settled afterwards in Armenia.

(1) Met. l. 9.

(c) Homer, in the Second Book of the Odyssey, says something of this Necklace, on Occasion of Eriphyle's Ghost that appeared to Ulysses.

engaged with the Wicked, such as, in his Opinion, most of those were, who joined in that War. Amphiaraus left four Children, two Sons and two Daughters; the two Sons were Alcmeon and Amphilochus, who probably was then very young, since Pausanias, in his Description of the Chest of the Cypselides (1), whereon was represented the Palace of Amphiaraus, and the History of his Family, says an old Woman, was there seen holding in her Arms the young Amphilochus. The two Daughters were called Eurydice and Demonassa. The Poet Asius, as we read in the same Author, gives him a third Daughter named Alcmena, as was the Mother of Hercules.

Amphiaraus, after his Death, was ranked among the Demi-Gods, and honoured accordingly; if we may believe Pausanias, he was even acknowledged and honoured as a God (2), and the Oropians, a People of Attica, built a Temple to him, which became famous afterwards by the Oracles that he delivered there. The Author, now quoted, speaks also of another Temple which this new God had at Argos, near which was the Tomb of Eriphyle his Wife, and the Chapel of Baton, his Relation and Charioteer, who perished with him when he was swallowed up in the Earth. Tho' Philestratus, in the Picture of Amphiaraus, represents him conducting his Chariot himself, 'tis certain, from Pausanias and others, that Baton served him for Charioteer on that Occasion. He had also another Temple in Attica (3), near which was a Fountain, which bore his Name, and whose Water was used neither for Sacrifices nor Lustrations, not so much as to wash Hands; but those who believed themselves cured of some Disease, by the Assistance of that God, were obliged to throw into it some Piece of Gold or Silver; and what made that Fountain the Object of Veneration, was, that Amphiaraus, after his Deification, was believed to have there rose up from under the Earth. We have already said in the History of Oracles (4), that those who repaired

(1) In Eliac.
(4) Vol. I. B. IV.

(2) In Beot.

(3) Pausan. in Attic.

paired to the Temple he had among the Oropians, after having offered up a Sheep, stretched the Skin of it upon the Ground, and slept upon it, expecting that the God would inform them in a Dream of what they wanted to know. On Occasion whereof Plutarch tells us (1) that in the Time of Xerxes, a Man was sent to Consult this Oracle in Relation to Mardonius; who having fallen asleep in the Sanctuary, felt something pushing him back with Violence; and when he would not depart, he was struck in the Head with a Stone; which corresponds with the tragical End of that Poet, whom the Tutor to the Lacedemonian King, who commanded the Grecian Army, slew with a Blow of a Stone. We are told of so many Prodigies wrought in the Temple, which the Thebans had raised to him, that the impious Celsus durst compare that Impostor to Jesus Christ; which Origen refutes unanswerably (2), by detecting the Cheats of the Priests, and the other Sources of those pretended Miracles (a).

Jophon of Gnossus, one of those who explained the Antiquities of Greece to Pausanias (3), would needs persuade him that there were many of Amphiaraus's Prophecies written in Hexameter Verse; and among others a Response he had given to the Argives, when they went to besiege Thebes. “ For my Part, says
 “ this Author, I give no Credit to them: whatever “ pleases the People, and has an Air of the marvelous, “ easily finds Belief with them, and 'tis with “ Difficulty they will allow themselves to be unde“ ceived; but except the Oracles of Apollo which are “ attested by all Antiquity, I don't believe there ever “ were any other. All those who took upon them to “ foretel future Events, were Interpreters of Dreams,
 “ or People who had some Skill of the Flight of Birds,
 “ or of the Entrails of Victims. 'Tis therefore very “ probable that Amphiaraus excelled in the Interpreta-O 3 “ tion

(1) Cessation of Oracles. (2) Contra Celsum. l. 3.

(a) Virgil, Æn. l. 7. informs us, that the Oracle of Faunus was also consulted by Dreams.

(3) In Attic.

“ tion of Dreams; and what persuades me of it, is,
 “ that now when he is worshipped as a God, he de“ livers his Responses only by Dreams. Those who “ come to consult him, begin with Self-purification;
 “ then they sacrifice not only to Amphiaraus, but to “ the other Divinities under whose Name his Altar is “ consecrated.”

As according to Pausanias, Amphiaraus had also his Tomb at Sparta, which the Sons of Tyndarus had raised to him, as to their Cousin German, 'tis probable, that he participated also of the Honours paid to those Heroes. Nor is it without Reason that Pausanias says Castor and Pollux were his Cousin Germans; for Amphiaraus was the Son of Oicles and Hypermnestra the Daughter of Thestius. Thus Amphiaraus and the Tyndaridæ were the Sons of two Sisters, and consequently Cousin Germans.

The History of ADRASTUS.

Adrastus King of Argos, and Son of Talaus and Lysianassa the Daughter of Polybus King of Sicyon, was a Prince of great Valour, who acquired a high Reputation in the War of Thebes, which he undertook to support the Rights of Polynices his Son-in-law. He was, as has been said, the only one of the Chiefs who returned from thence, and he governed with great Equity and Justice the Kingdom of Argos, and that of Sicyon, which Polybus had bequeathed to him. He was of so sweet a Disposition and gentle Demeanour, that he won the Hearts of all his Subjects. He suffered from none but Amphiaraus, his Brother-in-law, who had obliged him to leave Argos; but he revenged himself on him afterwards, as has been said.

This Prince had several Children, Cyanipe, Egialea whom he gave in Marriage to Diomedes, Argia and Deipheile who married Polynices and Tydeus by a very odd kind of Adventure. Having gone to consult the Oracle of Apollo, he learned that his two Daughters were to be married, the one to a Boar, the other to a Lion;

Lion; and some Time after, the two Princes now named having arrived at his Court, the one covered with a Lion's Skin, as being a Theban, and valuing himself upon wearing the Equipage of Hercules; the other the Son of Oeneus King of Calydon, wearing the Skin of a Boar, in Memory of that which Meleager his Brother had slain; Adrastus made no Doubt but that this was the true Sense of the Oracle, and gave them his two Daughters. After a long and happy Reign, he died of Grief, for the Loss of his Son Egialeus, slain before Thebes, and was honoured as a Heroe, especially at Sicyon, where he had a Temple and Altars. There was even established in Honour of him a solemn Feast, which lasted till the Time of Clisthenes, the Tyrant of Sicyon, who abolished it in Hatred of the Argives (1). Thus is the Story told by Herodotus: Clisthenes, Prince of Sicyon the Enemy of the Argives, having resolved to demolish the Tomb of that Prince, the Priestesses whom he went to consult endeavoured to dissuade him from it. He did not appear openly to oppose the Oracle; but he accomplished his Purpose by this Expedient; he sent to Thebes to demand the Body of Menalippus the sworn Enemy of Adrastus; and having interred him in the Tomb of the Kings of Sicyon, built a Temple to him, to which he transferred the Worship and Ceremonies that were celebrated in Honour of Adrastus (2), who, he thought, would in Time be forgotten for Menalippus.

So many Fables have been uttered about the famous Horse of Adrastus, named Arion, that I must needs say a Word or two of him in this Place. Servius and Probus will have it, that he was the same with that which Neptune had produced with a Blow of his Trident, near Athens: Pausanias asserts (3), that he was the Son of that God, and Ceres, or of the Wind Zephyr, and a Harpy, as may be seen in Quintus Calaber: We are told farther, that the Nereids fed him, and that he sometimes was employed in drawing the Chariot of Neptune, who gave him afterwards to Copreus King of

O 4

Aliartum.

(1) Herodot. L. 5.

(2) Idem L. 4.

(3) L. 8.

Aliartum, as we learn from the Scholiast upon Homer (1). He again made a Present of him to Hercules, who made Use of him against Cygnus the Son of Mars, and gave him to Adrastus. This Horse is said to have had the Feet of his Right Side like those of a Man, and also to have had the Use of Speech (2). All this, when strip'd of Hyperboles, means no more, than that Adrastus had a very fine Horse, which had been in the Possession of several Masters. No Doubt, what made them give him Neptune for his Father, was because that God was reputed the first who broke Horses; and those who make him the Son of Zephrus, had a Regard to his Swiftneſs, or rather to the fabulous Opinion which Virgil ſpeaks of in his Georgics, namely, that Mares are impregnated by turning towards the Wind; and I preſume we are in like Manner to explain what Homer ſays (3) of Erichthonius's Horses, of thoſe of Achilles, and others, that were believed to be of divine Extraction.

The History of ANTIGONE.

Creon, the Brother of Jocasta, having ſeized the Crown of Thebes, after the Death of the two irreconcilable Brothers, had given expreſs Orders not to bury either the Body or the Aſhes of Polynices (4); but Antigone, his Siſter, went out of the City by Night, and performed to him that laſt Duty. The King was informed next Day, that ſome body had diſobeyed his Orders, and to find out who it was, he ordered the Body to be again dug up, and his Guards to watch it. The next Night the Princeſs was taken by Surprize, as ſhe was coming to bewail her Brother's Miſfortune, and was brought before the King, who commanded her to be buried alive; but ſhe prevented ſo terrible a Death by ſtrangling herſelf. Prince Hemon, her Lover, killed himſelf in Deſpair (5), and Eurydice, her Mother, not being able to ſurvive ſo many Cataſtrophes of Woe, likewise proved her own Executioner. This Event

(1) Upon the fourth Iliad.

(2) Propert. L. 2. Eleg. laſt.

(3) Iliad L. 2.

(4) Sophoc. Trag. of Antig. Philost. &c.

(5) He was the Son of Creon.

Event is the Subject of a fine Tragedy of Sophocles, which made such a deep Impression upon the Athenians, at the first Representation of it, that they rewarded the Author with the Government of Samos.

This is not the only Heroic Action which the War of Thebes furnishes us with. When Theseus conferred magnificent Funeral Obsequies upon those who had died before that City, the Body of Capaneus was not allowed to be buried with the rest, because he had been Thunder-struck, and was considered as a Monster of Impiety, who by his Blasphemies had drawn down upon himself the Wrath of Heaven (a), and a Funeral Pile was made for him by itself. His Wife Evadne, the Daughter of Yphis, having dressed herself in her finest Cloaths, went up to a Rock, at the Foot of which they were burning the Body of her Husband, and from thence threw herself into the midst of the Pile, to mingle her Ashes with those of a Spouse who had always been dear to her (1): I shall give his History in a few Words.

The History of CAPANEUS.

Capaneus, one of the seven Leaders of the Army of the Argives, was brave and courageous, but of a fierce and impetuous Valour. He was the first that scaled the Walls of Thebes; but his Attempt succeeded ill, he was overthrown with Stones, and died upon the Rampart. 'Tis probable, that in his Life-time he had shewed little Respect to the Gods, which perhaps gave Occasion to say that he had been Thunder-struck, as a Punishment for his Impiety. Statius paints him furious and outrageous, and puts into his Mouth a Thousand Blasphemies and Extravagancies: He is the Achilles of the Thebaid; bating only that this Poet, who designed to draw his Character after that of Homer, had neither

(a) Pliny, L. 2. c. 54. positively says it was forbid to burn the Bodies of those who had been Thunder-struck, and that they were only allowed Burial: Cremari fas non est; condi terra Religio tradidit.

(1) Euripid. in Sup. Philoct. upon Evadne.

neither so fine nor so just an Imagination as the Greek. Besides, this Author departs both from Eschiles and Euripides, who have given no such Character of Capaneus; which verifies what I have already said more than once, that the first Poets come nearer Historical Truth, than those who were later. To this Effect, Euripides speaks of him in his Suppliants. “ He was,
 “ says that Poet (1), a rich Man, but without Pride;
 “ a Lover of Simplicity, a Stranger to that foolish “ Vanity which Plenty inspires; sober, moderate, and “ a Despiser of those whom he saw abandon themselves
 “ to Feasting and Gaiety; being persuaded that Vir“ tue and high living are two Things incompatible:
 “ A Man of Honour, a faithful Friend, particularly “ towards the absent; candid, courteous, and com“ plaisant; a strict Observer of his Word, even to“ wards Slaves.”

As the same Poet goes on in this Passage to draw the Characters of the other Leaders in that Expedition, I cannot do better than continue to copy him. “ The “ next, continues he, is Etheocles, a young Heroe, “ not blest with many of the Gifts of Fortune, but “ crowned with Honour in Argolis; so disinterested
 “ in the Services he did his Country, that he could “ never be prevailed on to receive any Reward, even “ from his Friends, for Fear of corrupting his Inte“ grity, be it ever so little, and of bringing himself “ under Obligations by Gifts. He bore a Hatred to “ all bad Members of Society, but never allowed him“ self to hate the Society itself; and he distinguished “ between the Commonwealth, and those who ren“ dered it odious by Male-Administration.

“ The third is Hippomedon, who from his earliest “ Years had the Strength of Mind to trample upon “ Effeminacy and Voluptuousness, giving himself up “ to the Employments of a Country Life; living “ hardily, and inuring his Body to the laborious Ex“ ercises of Riding, Hunting, and the Bow, with a “ View to make himself a Warrior serviceable to his “ Country, Par.

(1) Act. iv.

“ Parthenopeus, the Son of Atalanta, is the fourth.
 “ Having his Education in Argolis tho’ an Arcadian, “ he had the Talent of pleasing the Citizens and the “ State by his gracious Behaviour, his Sweetness and “ Modesty ; averse to all wrangling, and whatever be“ spoke an over-bearing Temper of Mind, a Thing
 “ so insupportable in a Citizen, especially in a Stranger.
 “ With Sword in Hand he defended our Interests more “ like an Argive than a Foreigner. Tho’ he was the “ Idol of the fair Sex, he was never known to depart
 “ from the Modesty of his Age, nor to stain his Vir“ tue.

“ As to Tydeus, he deserves a high Encomium, which “ I shall give in a Word or two. He was a much bet“ ter Warrior than an Orator. Being accomplished “ in all the Stratagems of War, tho’ inferior to his “ Brother Meleager in other Parts of Knowledge, he “ was nothing short of him in the Art of War, and “ the only Science he professed was that of Arms.
 “ Ambitious of Glory, full of Ardour and Courage ;
 “ who had a Contempt of Money, tho’ rich ; and tho’
 “ no eloquent Speaker, performed many glorious At-“ chievements that spoke for him. From these Sket“ ches we will no longer be surprized that such Heroes “ fought before Thebes till they all died upon the “ Spot.”

The History of TIRESIAS.

Though Tiresias is not mentioned in this War, yet as he was a celebrated Soothsayer, and flourished at Thebes, at the same Time with Amphiaraus, I thought proper to give his History a place here. Tiresias the Son of Everus and Cariclo, devoted himself, according to the Manner of those Times, to the Science of Augu- ries, wherein he succeeded so well, that he acquired a high Character, and was reputed an able Soothsayer.
 The Thebans put so much Faith in all his Predictions, that he obliged them to repair, after the Loss of their City, to a Corner of Beotia ; but as expert as he was,
 he

he had not foreseen that this Retreat was to prove fatal to himself. He lost his Life by drinking the Water of the Fountain of Tilphosa (1). As this Diviner lived very long (a), and grew blind, he gave a Handle to two ridiculous Fables: The one, that he had lost the Use of his Sight, for having seen Minerva in the Bath, as Pherecides says; and this Author adds, that as a Compensation the Goddess conferred upon him the Gift of Prophecy; the other, that it was Juno had inflicted this Punishment upon him, because he had decided the Question against her in favour of Jupiter, whether the Man or the Woman had most Pleasure in Marriage, as we learn from Ovid and Hyginus, who also inform us, that Jupiter to make him amends for the Loss of his Eyes, made him the greatest Prophet of his Time.

Hesiod (2) relates how Tiresias changed his Sex, for having struck with his Rod upon Mount Cyllene, two Serpents as they were in Copulation; and he adds that he resumed his Sex at the end of seven Years, after having struck them a second Time; a Fable whereof I see no other Foundation, but that the famous Theban had wrote upon the Prerogatives of both Sexes. We may however adopt the Opinion of some Authors, that this pretended Change of Sex, was founded upon the Doctrine taught by this famous Soothsayer, who valued himself upon his great Skill in Astronomy, namely that the Stars not only were animated, which was a Notion pretty common in that Time, but also that they were of different Sexes.

We may observe that the Devil had taken upon him in that Time to imitate the Conduct of God; for as in the Age we are now upon, which answers to the Time of the first Judges and Samuel, there were many Prophets or Seers among the Jews, so we find several Soothsayers among the Gentiles; Amphiaraus at Argos, Tiresias at Thebes, and not long after the famous Calchas

(1) It is in Beotia.

(a) Some say he lived five Generations, and more.

(2) Theog.

chas and Mopsus, Helenus the Son of Priam, and Cassandra his Sister, and many others whose Names we have in Clemens Alexandrinus (1). 'Tis true the detestable Study of Magic which Orpheus had brought from Egypt was then in vogue, and as the Times were very superstitious, the Diviners and false Prophets were consulted upon every Occasion.

I said at the Beginning of this Chapter, that the first Theban War happened about ten Years after the Conquest of the Argonauts; and consequently twenty-five Years before the taking of Troy; thus that of the Epigoni will fall upon the fifteenth Year before the Destruction of that City, and but five Years before the Siege was undertaken. Every thing conspires to support this Æra; the same Heroes are at both these Wars; and some of their Sons; and Thersander the Son of Polynices, embarked a few Years after for Troy, and was slain in Mysia, as has been said. Hercules, who died not till some Years after the Expedition to Colchis, was dead before the first of these two Wars, and Theseus still alive, since he performed the last Duties to the Argives who lost their lives there. Now we know that the latter died not long before the Siege of Troy, and consequently very soon after these two Wars. Achelus King of Etolia, who had given his eldest Daughter in Marriage to Hercules, was still alive, and disposed of his Daughter Eriphyle, to Alcmeon the Son of Amphiaraus. In a Word, all the Synchronisms that can be deduced from the Heroes living in that Period of Time, being so many Proofs that the two Wars, whereof I have given the History, were prior to that of Troy, and posterior to that of the *Centaur*s, to the Expedition to Colchis, and to the Hunting of Calydon, prove at the same Time, that we must necessarily place them both in the Years I have now marked, and I know no solid Objection can be raised against these Æras. For once more, we have nothing else to guide us in the History of an Age so remote from the Ancients themselves who first make mention

(1) Strom. l. 1.

mention of it, but the Method of Synchronisms and Generations. Now if we read all the Historians, Mythologists and Poets, we shall find in them these Synchronisms and Generations such as I have stated them.

Lastly, to finish the History of the heroic Ages, it remains that I speak of the Siege of Troy, of all the Springs of that Expedition, of its concomitant Effects, and of what was consequent upon it.

B O O K V.

The History of the Trojan War, and of those who joined in it.

WE come now to what is undoubtedly the most celebrated Event of the fabulous and heroic Age, and what we may also call the last, since from thence to the historical Age, nothing of Importance happened in Greece, but the Wars of Hercules's Descendants against Eurystheus, and at length their Entrance into the Peloponnesus. I added, the most celebrated, by reason of the Number and Quality of those who took part therein, as well on the side of the Grecians as of the Trojans. Thus this Event deserves to be considered in all the Length I shall give it, since the History thereof being fully laid open, throws a great Light upon the Obscurity of an Age so remote from us, and is of all others the most proper to make us acquainted with the State of Greece in that Period of Time, its different Kingdoms, its Strength, and the principal Families whereof it was composed.

As this famous Expedition of the Greeks against Asia always appeared considerable, several Ancients have spoke of it; and Homer alone would have rendered it immortal.

immortal. He it is I put at the Head of those whose Authority I shall make use of in recounting the chief Adventures thereof. To that great and remarkable Poet I join Virgil, who in the second Book of his Eneid, has described the taking of that City, and is so very full and particular upon the Head, that it is plain he had consulted Works which are not now extant. In reading him we seem transported as it were to Troy, made so well acquainted with its very Streets and principal Palaces, that we could even go thro' it without losing our Way. We have also for our Guides Quintus Calaber, who tho' more modern than Virgil, and doubtless of less Authority, yet lets us know some Circumstances in relation to this War, which we should seek for elsewhere in vain. Coluthus and Triphiodorus, who have treated the same Subject, have also been of great Use to me, and I have not even neglected Ditlys of Crete, nor Dares the Phrygian; not that I think either of them was in the Time of that War, as their Works set forth; but the former is at least of Antiquity enough to have examined Originals that are now lost. Titus Livius and Dionysius of Halicarnassus have not been useless to me, no more than the Iliac Table, an ancient Work whereof I shall give a more particular Account afterwards, as also some Bas-Reliefs and several Medals. To these Helps, I have joined those that may be drawn from the Description Pausanias gives of Polygnotus's Paintings, some whereof represented several Particularities of the taking of Troy. These are the Sources whence I have taken all that is to be the Subject of the two following Books; adding to them, according to the Scheme I laid down in this Mythology, an Explanation of the Fables that are interwove into the Thread of this History, which abounds with more of them than any other in all Antiquity.

The Original of this War.

As it is a History I write and not a Poem, I shall not imitate Homer, who begins his Iliad with the Wrath

Wrath of Achilles; that is, with an Incident which happened not till the Beginning of the last Year of the Siege of Troy. We shall ascend up to the Source of this War, and trace it, ab ovo, according to Horace's Expression (1); examine what were the Causes thereof.

Virgil, who according to the usual Practice of the Poets, resolves all into the Intervention of the Gods, per Deorum ambages, says that Juno, provoked at the Judgment of Paris, and the Rape of the Phrygian Ganymede, took Revenge upon the Trojans, and that we are to look for no other Cause of the Destruction of their Capital but the Wrath of the Gods (a); the whole founded upon a fabulous Tradition which we must first relate, and then consider what may have given rise to it.

Jupiter enamoured of Tbetis the Sister of Lycomedes King of Scyros, having learned from Prometheus, that according to the Oracle of Themis, the Child to be born of that Princess was to be more powerful than his Father, resigned her to Peleus the Son of Eacus. To make the Ceremony of their Marriage the more solemn, all the Gods were invited to it, none being excepted but the Goddess Discord. She, highly disobliged at this Affront, found a Way to be signally revenged, by throwing a golden Apple into the midst of that august Assembly, with this Inscription, For the most Beautiful. We may easily judge there was none of the Goddesses, who did not lay claim to the Possession of a Present not so considerable for the Matter of it, as for being made the Prize of Merit. However, they were mostly so equitable as to resign their Pretensions to Juno, Minerva, and Venus. These three Goddesses forthwith demanded Judgment. The Affair was of a delicate Nature, and Jupiter himself not daring to decide the Controversy,

(1) Art. Poet.

(a) Manet alia mente repositum

Judicium Paridis, spreteque injuria forma. Æn. l. 1.

- - - - - Verum inclementia Divum

Has evertit opes, sternitque a culmine Trojam.

Æneid. lib. 2;

Controversy, thought fit to send them (1), under the Conduct of Mercury, to Mount Ida in Phrygia, to have the Decision of a Shepherd named Paris, in reputation for being a very competent, and at the same Time a very equitable Judge in those Matters. The Goddesses appeared before him in their gayest Dress; and we may reasonably conjecture that they neglected no Art that might set off and give a Heightening to their Charms.

In order to gain the good Will of their Judge, and engage him each in her own Favour; they made him the most flattering Promises. Juno, whose Power extended over all Thrones and Scepters, soothed him with the Prospect of immense Power and Riches, if he would adjudge the Prize to her. Minerva promised him Virtue, as the most substantial Good, and Venus assured him, that if he would decide in her Favour, she would make him Master of the finest Woman in the World.

Paris, put to a Nonplus, and being determined not to pronounce Sentence till he had fully examined into the Merits of the Cause, demanded of them a Condition at which the Modesty of Juno and Minerva were at first alarmed; but what may not that Sex be brought to, in order to display that conscious Excellence which their Hearts are so ardently set upon (2)? At length he pronounced in Venus's Favour. She was actually the greatest Beauty of the three; and probably the Promise she had made him, was more to his Taste than either Riches or Virtue.

After this Judgment, Juno and Minerva wreak'd all their Spite upon Paris, swearing that they would take Vengeance not only upon their Judge, but upon Priam his Father; and upon the Trojan Empire whose Ruin was determined; but he minded nothing but the Promise made him by Venus. Some time after having occasion to go into Greece, for Reasons that shall be given

VOL. IV:

P

(1) Hygin. Ovid, Coluthus, &c.

(2) We may see this whole Narrative in Coluthus, Of the Rape of Helen, and in Lucian. The Iliack Table confirms what these Authors say, as also a Medal of Morel, representing the three Goddesses quite naked in the Presence of their Judge.

given afterwards, he staid some Time at Sparta during the Absence of Menelaus; whom the Affairs of his Brother Agamemnon had called to Argos, and having captivated the Heart of Helen the greatest Beauty of her Time, carried her off, and thereby kindled the War which I am going to describe.

Tho' this whole Narration appears a mere Fiction, it wants not however some Foundation. The learned Meziriac relates (1), upon the Authority of Suidas, Cedrenus, and several others of the Ancients, that at the Nuptials of Thetis and Peleus, which were celebrated with all possible Magnificence, the Princes and Princesses who were invited thither, assumed for that Day the Names of Gods and Goddesses; much in the same Way as at our Village-Festivals, especially at that of the Kings, the Country-People plume themselves with the Names of Princes and their Ministers; and this is the more probable, that the Feast given on occasion of that Marriage was called afterwards the Banquet of the Gods. Peleus affected to assume the Name of Nereus, because Thetis his Spouse bore that of one of the Nereids. A Forest on Mount Pelion, near Chiron's Cave was made choice of for the Place of the Entertainment (a). During the Feast there arose some Diffension among the Ladies about Beauty, which was the Source of no small Disorder. Several Princes took part in it, either in behalf of their Wives, or of their Mistresses.

This Contest not being likely to be easily decided, 'tis very probable that at last it was found necessary to refer it to one of the Princes who was at the Feast, and whose Judgment disobliged those against whom it was pronounced. Some Poet finding this an entertaining Subject, made a Poem upon it, wherein under the Idea of the Gods and Goddesses, whose Names the Guests had assumed, he gave a happy Description of this Adventure,

(1) Epistle of Briseis to Achilles.

(a) This Fact represented upon a Marble is quoted by Pichius; there several of the Gods are knowable by their Symbols, and Chiron who has the half of his Body out of the Cave.

venture, and invented several fabulous Circumstances proper to embellish it. The Reason why they have wrought into it the Judgment of Paris who was of Phrygia, while the Feast was celebrated in Thessaly, is, as we learn from Cedrenus and Suidas, because Paris reduced, for Reasons to be given in his History, to keep Flocks upon Mount Ida, composed a Poem upon the Goddess Venus, wherein he preferred her Beauty to that of Pallas and Juno, which gave rise to the Fable. To which we may add that Paris, a Man of Genius and of great Equity, had often been chosen by the Shepherds of Mount Ida for the Umpire in their Quarrels; which contributed not a little to make him pass for the Judge of the three Goddesses. It will be said these are only Conjectures; but in Facts of this Nature, what direct Proofs can be given? And is it not allowable, by reducing ancient Fictions to human Probability, to understand them in the same Sense, as we would a Work composed by some Poet at this Day upon a similar Subject.

Eusebius explains this Fiction with some little Variation, by saying that while Helen disputed the Prize of Beauty with two other Grecian Ladies, Paris judged in her Favour; that she suffered herself to be carried off, and that this had given rise to the Fable of the Judgment of the three Goddesses. But what Proofs does he rely upon? This is what he has not told us. There is even more probability in what we are told by some Authors, that it is founded upon a Dream of Paris, wherein that Prince thought he saw the three Goddesses appealing to him for his Judgment of their Beauty; and he decided in favour of Venus, who promised him the finest Woman in Asia. Dreams were considered as Revelations; thus he wanted no more, according to the Remark of Dares the Phrygian, to determine him to accept the Command of the Fleet which his Father was going to send into Greece to demand Hesione's Estate, in hope of a Conquest more charming than that of his Aunt's Effects.

Be that as it will, Antiquity seems to have understood literally the Story of the Judgment of Paris, and we have in Spon (1) a fine Medal, struck under Antoninus Pius, on which are represented the three Goddesses now mentioned, on the Summit of a Mountain, with Paris led by Mercury: Venus only is seen naked; Minerva and Juno are still dressed.

Tho' I am no Partisan to allegorical Explications, there are some so ingenious that I cannot choose but take Notice of them. According to some Mythologists, this Fiction is nothing but an Emblem of the Mystery of the Creation, or, to conform myself to the usual Language of the Pagans upon this Subject, of the Chaos, and the Manner in which the World was formed out of it. The Gods assembled at the Marriage of Thetis and Peleus, who breathe nothing but Joy and Pleasure, represent the Efforts of fertile Nature, to produce the Earth out of Chaos. Discord thwarts her by a thousand Obstacles and Artifices which she alone can contrive, and this Discord is nothing but the jarring Confusion of the Elements, always counter-acting one another. Paris at length is entrusted with the fatal Apple, and he without Hesitation adjudges it to Venus who is the Goddess of Reconciliation, of Harmony, and lastly, of Generation; by her means all begin to be unravelled; all begin to breathe, and live. This, according to the Mythologists, is the true Reason why the Ancients reckoned Love the first and eldest of all the Gods.

C H A P. II.

The true Cause of the Rape of Helen.

THE Question is, setting aside all Fiction, to find out the true Cause of the Rape of Helen, whereof the Trojan War, and the total Overthrow of Priam's Kingdom were the fatal Consequences.

Here I shall not insist on the ancient Jealousy mentioned by Hierodotus between the Greeks and the Asiatics,

(1) Recherch. curieuses. Diff. 246 ticks, upon account of mutual Rapes for which no Satisfaction had been given. The latter had carried off Io, even in the Port of Argos; and the former, Medea; which inflamed Paris, says the Author now quoted, with a Desire to travel into Greece, there to carry off a Wife, presuming he would be as little called to an Account for it, as others had been for former Rapes. But between the House of Priam, and that of Agamemnon and Menelaus his Brother, there was a hereditary Hatred. Tantalus had formerly carried off or destroyed Ganymede; now this Tantalus the Father of Pelops, was Agamemnon's great Grandfather, and Ganymede great Uncle to Priam (a): After the following Manner did that Affair happen. Troas King of Troy, having made several Conquests upon his Neighbours, sent his Son Ganymede accompany'd with some of his Friends (b) into Lydia, to offer Sacrifices in a Temple consecrated to Jupiter. Tantalus not knowing the King of Troy's Intention, took these Persons for Spies, and having apprehended the young Ganymede, clap'd him up in Prison, where he grieved himself to Death for the Insult offered him, and Tantalus sent back to Troy the rest of his Retinue, after giving that Prince a magnificent Funeral (c). Others are of Opinion that he kept him at his Court, and as Tantalus was reputed the Son of Jupiter and Pluto the Daughter of the Ocean, that he himself took the Surname of Jupiter, and made his Prisoner officiate as his Cup-bearer, which gave rise to the Fable of the Rape of that Prince by Jupiter; or rather this Rape of Jupiter transformed into an Eagle, denotes Ganymede's untimely Death, and the Swiftneſs with which the short Course of his Life had passed away. As the King of Lydia had made him serve for his Cup-bearer, this perhaps is what gave the

P 3

Poets

(a) Hyginus is mistaken in making Ganymede the Son of Erichthonius.

(b) His Retinue consisted of fifty Persons.

(c) Suidas, Cedrenus, Eusebius, &c. Herodian says this young Prince was slain by his Brother in some remote Place, and that he afterwards decreed divine Honours to him, giving out that Jupiter had ravished him.

Poets a Handle to say that the Gods had placed him among the Stars, where he forms the Sign of Aquarius (a).

Whatever be in that, there arose upon this Occasion a long War between Tros and Tantalus, and after their Death Ilus the Son of Tros, continued it against Pelops the Son of Tantalus, and obliged him to quit the Kingdom, and return to Oenomaus King of Pisa, whose Daughter he married, and had by her a Son named Aireus; thus we may suppose that Paris, the great Grandson of Ilus, Ganymede's Brother, ravished Helen by a kind of Reprisals against Menelaus, the great Grandson of Ganymede's Ravisher.

There was besides an Antipathy between the Phrygians and Greeks of a later Date. Hercules, as has been said, had taken and sacked, about thirty-five Years before, the City Troy, and carried off Hesione, whom he had resigned to Telamon, and put Laomedon to death: And tho' he had left the Kingdom to Priam, the latter still remembered the Injury done to his Family: Thus we need not be surprized, if Paris in revenge sought to carry off a Grecian Woman; this sort of Revenge was very common in that Age. It is commonly believed that Priam sent that Prince to Telamon's Court, either to see his Aunt, or rather to take Possession of her Estate. Paris during this Expedition visited the principal Cities of Greece, and having staid some time at the Court of Menelaus King of Sparta, fell in love with Helen, the most beautiful Princess of that Time, and was beloved by her in his turn; and taking Advantage of the Husband's Absence (b), ravished her and carried her to Troy; or, according to Herodotus, being forced by contrary Wind to land in Egypt, Proteus detained Helen;

(a) Hesiodus, Hyginus tells us, says it is Deucalion forms the Sign of Aquarius, upon Account of the Deluge that happened under his Reign; or, according to Eubulus, it is Cecrops who, before the Use of Wine, imployed Water in Sacrifices. Hygin. Poet. Astron. c. 10.

(b) Dionysius of Crete, Lib. 10. says he went to Crete to share Atreus's Estate: Dares says Paris found Helen in the Island of Cythera.

Helen; but we shall give a full Account of this Adventure in the History of that Princess.

C H A P. III.

Of the War that ensued upon this Rape.

AS most of the Wars of that Time usually happened upon occasion of like Injuries, the Greeks prepared themselves in good Earnest to revenge the Insult offered to one of their Kings; but that they might not be too precipitant, but render the Trojans quite inexcusable, they were willing to try first the Way of Negotiation, and therefore sent Ambassadors to Priam (1), to prevail upon him to repair this Injury; the Embassy was fruitless, and Priam made no other Answer to the Deputies, but that they had no Reason to expect Redress, they who had made no Satisfaction for the Injury they had done to Æetes, for the Rape of Medea his Daughter, and still more lately for that of his own Sister Hesione. The Greeks, provoked at this Answer, were now bent on taking Revenge by force of Arms, and the War was heartily resolved upon. For that End a general Assembly of the States of Greece was held at Argos, or rather at Mycene, where reigned Agamemnon the Brother of Menelaus, and the most powerful Prince in Greece (a); or if we may believe one of the most learned Men of our Time (2), at Larissa the Court of Peleus the Father of Achilles, a Prince more powerful by Sea than the rest, and consequently more necessary upon this Occasion.

P 4

The

(1) Herodot. loc. cit.

(a) I put the Reader in mind once for all, that when in this History of Greece we speak of powerful Kings, Monarchies, &c. it is to be understood in comparison of their Neighbours; for in reality they were but very petty Princes, whose Dominions were of small Extent, and often confined to their Capital, and some other Towns and Villages at no great Distance. Argolis itself which formed those of Agamemnon, was a very small Country, and there are several Estates in France, more considerable by the Desmesnes that depend upon them, than this Kingdom was.

(2) Father Hardouin, Apol. d' Homere.

The War being thus resolved, almost all the Princes of Greece engaged themselves in it by Oath (a), and were heartily disposed to furnish each the Quota of Ships that was agreed to. The Armament was so considerable, that Homer makes the Number of Ships amount to 1070, others to 1200, and Virgil by a round Reckoning, to a thousand, mille carinæ; which is to be understood of Ships such as were used in that Time, flat bottoms, which with the Ship's Crew and Provisions, carried but few Soldiers. Homer has employed the second Book of the Iliad, in the exact Enumeration of the Grecian Princes who embarked for this War, and in the Catalogue of the Ships that each brought thither. Agamemnon who was unanimously declared the Generalissimo of the Army, was at the same Time King of Mycenæ, Sicyon, Corinth, and several other Towns. He had fitted out so many Ships, that he lent a Part of them to the Arcadians, under the Conduct of Agapenor: Menelaus his Brother conducted the Spartans; Nestor the Messenians: Polixenus and Amphimachus, the Eleans: Diomedes the Son of Tydeus, Steneleus the Son of Capaneus, and Euryalus, were the Leaders of the Argives: Mnestheus commanded the Athenians: Ajax the Son of Telamon, the Megarians and Inhabitants of Salamis: Schedius and Epistrophus, the Phocians. Thoas with the Etolians Megeles with the Dulichians, Ulysses with the Ithacians and Cephalonians, had considerable Places in this Army: The Beotians had five Captains to command them, among whom was Thersander. The Inhabitants of Iolchos and Pheres had for their Leader Eumelus the Son of Admetus and Alcestes; those of Ithime and Oecalia, Podalyrus and Machaon the Sons of Æsculapius; the Mineans who dwelt at Orchomenos, were under the Conduct of Ascalaphus and Ialmenus his Brother. Ajax the Son of Oileus conducted the Locrians; and Elephenor, the Eubeans. The Thessalians obeyed ten Generals, among whom Achilles with his Mirmidons, Protesilaus and Philoctetes were the most famous. Idomeneus and Merion the Sons of Deucalion,

(a) Jurabant omnes in læsi verba mariti.

Ovid.

Deucalion, and Grandsons of Minos II. commanded the Cretans. Tlepolemus the Son of Hercules, the Inhabitants of Rhodes; lastly, Phidippus and Antipus, those of Cos, and the other neighbouring Islands.

The Number of Soldiers under the Command of these Captains, according to Thucydides, amounted to 75000 or thereabouts. This fine Army being assembled in the Port of Aulis, wanted nothing but a fair Wind to carry them over the Hellepont; but the Wind was denied them for the Reason I am going to relate, Calchas, upon I know not what Foundation, had foretold, as we read in Homer (1), and Ovid (2), that they were to be ten Years before Troy; and in Confirmation of this Prediction, he gave it out to the Army that he had seen a Serpent climb a Tree, which after devouring ten little Birds that were in a Nest, had also destroyed the Mother; which Omen according to him, signified that they were not to be Masters of the City, till after a ten Years Siege; he added that the Serpent had been transformed into a Stone; a Fable invented by that high Priest to support a Prediction, perhaps dictated by some of the Princes of the Army, who dissatisfied with going to the War themselves, had a Mind to divert others from so hazardous an Enterprize.

Eschiles, in his Tragedy of Agamemnon, instead of the Prodigy now related, puts another in the Mouth of the old Men who open the Scene. Two Eagles, say they, sent by Jupiter, were seen to fall upon a pregnant Coney, and forthwith to devour the Mother and the young, Calchas upon seeing the King of the Birds, without Hesitation interpreted it of the Leaders of the Army, and pronounced the Oracle which begins thus: Priam's City shall fall under the Strokes that threaten it, &c.

But there fell out in the same Place, another Adventure of much greater Importance. An obstinate Calm detaining the Army too long in Aulis, Calchas gave the Greeks to know that Diana incensed against Agamemnon for having killed a Deer that was consecrated crated to her, withheld from them a favourable Wind, and that she could not be appeased but by the Blood of a Princess of his Family (1). Agamemnon after having hesitated a long Time, gave up his Daughter to the Solicitations of the confederate Princes. Ulysses offered to go and fetch her, under some specious Pretext, from the Embraces of her Mother. All things were disposed in order for the Sacrifice; but Diana appeased by this Act of Submission, substituted in the Place of Iphigenia, this was the Name of Agamemnon's Daughter, a Deer which was sacrificed to her, and she transported the Princess to Tauris there to serve her for a Priestess. Some ancient Mythologists tell us, that she was transformed into a Bear: Nicander will have it that she was turned into a Heifer, others into an old Woman; such Variety is to be found in these ancient Histories. Homer speaks not a Word of this Adventure; on the contrary, about the End of the Siege of Troy, he makes mention of Iphianassa the Daughter of Agamemnon, who is offered in Marriage to Achilles in order to appease his Wrath: Now no body doubts but this Iphianassa is the same with Iphigenia.

(1) Iliad. l. 2. (2) Met. l. 12.

Several Authors, 'tis true, have considered the Fact now related as a mere Fiction, and could not conceive that a Father would be so barbarous as to sacrifice his own Daughter. Some of them are of Opinion that this Adventure carries an Allusion to the Story of Jephthé, which happened about that Time, whose Daughter, according to them, had the same Name which Homer gives to the Daughter of Agamemnon (2). Others again assert that Iphigenia was actually sacrificed to the Superstition of the Soldiers (a), and to the Policy of a Prince who was afraid of losing the Command of a fine Army. Lastly, as a Key to this Fable (b), another Iphigenia has been found in the Family of Agamemnon, whom Helen ravished

(1) Virg. l. 2. Ovid. Met. l. 12. (2) Huetius Demonst. Evang.

P. 4.

(a) This is not the first Time that Superstition was the Source of such Sacrifices.

(b) See Racine in his Preface to the Tragedy of Iphigenia, after Euripides.

ravished by Theseus, had brought forth, and who had been sent to Clytemnestra already married, who took Care of her, and would have her pass for her own Daughter. For my part, I am of Opinion, that Agamemnon threatened with the Wrath of Diana, resolved actually to sacrifice his Daughter (a); that Ulysses went and tore her from the Arms of her Mother; that Preparation was made for sacrificing her to Diana incensed; but that the Soldiers, having opposed it, as well as some of the Officers, Calchas apprehensive of an Insurrection, insinuated that Diana might be appeased by the Sacrifice of a Deer, and by the Consecration of Iphigenia, who was actually sent to Tauris to serve her in quality of Priestess (b). Were we to give credit to Diety of Crete (1), we might say that Ulysses set out from the Army without consulting Agamemnon; that he forged Letters from that Prince, informing Clytemnestra that Achilles would not quit Aulis, till he had first married Iphigenia; and that having secretly conveyed her into the Camp, he with Calchas was going to Sacrifice her to the Goddess, when terrified by some Prodigies, or rather by the Menaces of Achilles who discovered the Mystery, she was sent to Tauris, and a Deer was offered in Sacrifice, which had been driven by the Storm to shelter itself near the Altar of the Goddess.

Pausanias (2) explaining the fine Pictures of Polygnotus, which were in the Poet Lescheus, says, Menelaus was there represented with a Buckler, on which was painted the Serpent that appeared during the Sacrifice, which we have been speaking of. I have seen this Piece of History no where else, which the Painter had learned from Lescheus's Poem upon the taking of Troy. The Greeks perhaps had propagated this Prodigy, and Menelaus adopted it, by making this Monster be engraved upon his Buckler.

To conclude, these Preparations, and the several Hindrances that intervened, took up ten Years before the

(a) See below the History of Agamemnon.

(b) See the History of Agamemnon.

(1) L. 1. (2) In Phocæ

the Greeks embarked, and consequently lasted as long as the Siege itself; accordingly, Homer makes Helen say, in the tenth Year of the Siege, that she had now been Twenty Years in that City.

C H A P. IV.

The History of the Siege of TROY.

THE Greeks, at length, having the Wind favourable, embarked, and arrived happily at the Promontory of Sigæum. As they had been long in making Preparation for this grand Expedition, the Trojans on their Side had full Leisure to put themselves in a Readiness for giving them a warm Reception. Priam had used all Means to procure Allies, and auxiliary Troops (1); and he succeeded so well, that all the neighbouring Princes had either come to him in Person, or sent him Supplies. Lycaon conducted thither the Inhabitants of Zelea, upon Mount Ida, Adrastus and Amphius those of Adrastia, Apesa, Pytice and Teria; Those of Aribes, of Percote, Praxion and Abydos were under the Command of Afius the Son of Hirtacus. Hippothous and Pileus were the Leaders of the Pelasgians of Lcrissa; Achamas and Pirous of the Thracians of the Hellepont. The Ciconians marched under the Conduct of Euphemus; the Paphlagonians under that of Pylemenes; the Mysians under that of Chromis. Phorcis and Ascanius led the Pbrygians. Rhesus conducted thither the Thracians, his Subjects, and Memnon the Persians and Ethiopians, whom Teutamus had put under his Command. The Amazons invited to the Defence of that City, came thither with their Queen at their Head; lastly, Eneas commanded the Dardans with Archilochus and Atbamas the Son of Antenor; not to insist on Sarpedon with his Lycians, or Ebeus, Chorebus, Elpenor and some others, who arrived not till towards the End of the Siege.

The Trojans, therefore, finding themselves in a Condition to receive their Enemies, exerted their utmost Efforts

(1) Homer, II. l. 2.

Efforts to prevent their landing, and there ensued a sharp Engagement, where the Leaders on both Sides highly distinguished themselves. Protesilaus seeing the Greeks averse to quit their Ships, because the Oracle had foretold, that the first who set his Foot a Shore was to be slain, sacrificed his Life to the Preservation of his Country; and Cygnus, on the Side of the Trojans, died there, after having performed such brave Actions, as gave Occasion to say, that Neptune had made him invulnerable (1). Besides, Cygnus was given out to be the Son of that God, because, probably, he was a powerful Prince by Sea. His Transformation into a Fowl, is a mere Fiction, invented to support the other Fable (a).

This first Battle was followed with a long Respite, as Ulysses says in his Harangue for the Armour of Achilles (2); both Sides laid down their Arms (b); the Besiegers minded nothing but the forming of their Camp, and securing themselves by good Entrenchments; and the Besieged, on the contrary, the defending of themselves. The great Care on both Sides, was to shun being surprized, and while the Greeks were careful to guard their Trenches, the Trojans were as assiduous in watching the Gates of their City (c).

The Besiegers even employed the first nine Years only in making themselves Masters of several neighbouring Towns that had taken up Arms in Defence of Troy; and this is what made the Siege last so long, as Thucydides remarks; the Troops being obliged to separate, in Order to find themselves Victuals, for which they had not made any Provision: Thus they who were in the Town, were capable to hold out against the Assailants; for had the City Troy been attacked by all

(1) Ovid. Met. l. 12.

(a) See what has been said of the different Persons that went by the Name of Cygnus, in the History of Phaeton, first Book, Volume second.

(2) Met. l. 12.

(b) Hic labor, hæc requiem multorum pugna dierum, Attulit; & positæ pars utraque substitit armis.

Ovid. ix.

(c) Dumque Vigil Phrygios servat custodia muros, Et Vigil Argolicas servat Custodia fossas.

Id. ix.

all the Forces which the Greeks had brought, doubtless it had not been able to stand out so long, according to the Author now quoted, who says the Greeks had taken so little Precaution for Provisions, and other Stores, that they were obliged to employ some of their Men to labour the Ground they were come to conquer.

Lyrnessus, the Country of Briseis, Pedafus, Zelea, Adrastæa, Pythia, Percote, Arisbé, Abydos, Chryse, and Cille, were the Conquests of Achilles; and Strabo remarks, that it was only the Tedioufness of the Siege made him attempt those Conquests. Ajax, on his Side, ravaged Thrace, and others subdued the Kingdom of Cygnus, and obliged the conquered People to supply the Army with Grain. These Captains carried the Plunder to the Camp, which was formed upon the Sea-shore, and there it was divided. The Greeks, to fortify themselves, had laid up their Ships, and entrenched themselves behind a good Wall. For 'tis proper to remark that this Camp continued always in the same Place, that is, near the Promontory of Sigeum, whence Agamemnon, and some other of the Leaders, never stirred. This was even a Ground of Reproach against him, from Achilles, when he tells the Deputies from Agamemnon, who presented him with the Gifts from that General, to appease him, that he had always been busy in carrying the Booty and Spoils of the Enemy into the Camp, while Agamemnon remained secure in his Tent, dividing the Spoil, whereof he was sure to reserve the best Part for himself. This was the general Rendezvous, whence they set out to make Excursions; for, during the first nine Years, the Greeks were much more solicitous to weaken the Allies of the Trojans, than to carry on the Siege vigorously. There happened, however, several particular Actions during that Interval, but nothing passed that was very signal or remarkable; nec aperti, says Ovid, Copia martis. Ambuscades were laid for one another; sometimes the Flocks carried off, as they were feeding in the Plain; some Peasants made Prisoners of War, as they were cultivating the Fields, and there there fold in the adjacent Countries; and it was not 'till the tenth Year that the Siege began to be carried on with Vigour.

Decimo tantum pugnativimus Anno (1)

Tho' Homer begins his Iliad with the Events that happened during this tenth Year, that is, with the Wrath of Achilles, yet he has artfully introduced, either by Speeches, or other Allusions, a Part of what was transacted during the former nine Years; and 'tis easy to see, that tho' the City was not much straitened, since, for want of a Line of Circumvallation, the Side towards Mount Ida, was quite open, yet there was Action on both Sides, tho' with less Vigour than towards the End of the Siege. That Poet, in the third Book of the Iliad, represents Helen embroidering a rich Stuff, where, says he, she had drawn all the Battles that were fought for her under the Walls of Ilium. That Passage plainly refers to Battles antecedent to the Anger of Achilles, who did not retire to his Tent 'till the tenth Year. In the sixth Book, Andromache tells Hector, that Ajax, and the two Sons of Atreus, had attempted thrice to surprize the City, when it was weak, but without Success. "While I fought, says Achilles, speaking of the first Years of the Siege (2), fierce Hector never durst leave the Walls of the City; hardly did he dare to quit the Scæan Gate, and advance to the Oak Tree;" which both proves that Achilles was not always engaged in subduing the Allies of the Trojans, and that he had often fought before the Commencement of his Anger. Eneas, in like manner, tells Lycaon (3), who was for his making Head against Achilles; after his Reconciliation with Agamemnon: "Why will you force me to go against the Son of Peleus? I am not now to learn his Valour: I fought with him formerly, when he attacked our Flocks upon Mount Ida, when the Goddess Minerva gave him a signal Victory over the Trojans." The Poet makes

Achilles

(1) Id. ibid.

(2) Il. l. 9.

(3) Il. l. 20.

Achilles say (1), that he had once made Lycaon, the Son of Priam Prisoner, having surprized him in one of his Father's Orchards, where he was pruning a wild Fig-Tree, and that he had sent him Captive into the Island of Lemnos. Hecuba complains of the Cruelty of the same Achilles, who, on various Occasions, had made several other of her Sons Prisoners, and sent them to Samos, Imbros, and other Countries.

The Wall which surrounded the Grecian Camp, was probably not raised till about the last Year, and while Achilles was taken up in reducing the Allies of the Trojans, since he rallies Agamemnon upon that Account, telling him, that while he was in the Camp, there was no Occasion for seeking Shelter from the Attacks of the Enemy.

Ovid, in the Harangue which I have already quoted, represents Ulysses employing all the Care of an Intendant-General of the Army, going in quest of Provisions, conducting them to the Camp, giving Orders for raising the Trenches, and especially encouraging the Soldiers, disheartened with the Tedioufness of the Siege. After these Particulars, it would be needless to quote Dares of Phrygia, who has left us a Journal of all that happened during the ten Years of the Siege, mentioning the Sallies, the particular Battles, Truces, Embassies, Negotiations, and the Ambuscades that were laid on either Side; nor Dicæys of Crete, who, however, deserves more Credit than Dares, and is very full and particular upon this Subject, informing us what Means the Greeks had used to procure Provisions; and Arms to fortify their Trenches; their applying themselves, especially during the Winter, to several Games, that served to keep the Troops in Exercise, as well as divert their Anxiety.

It was also during this Siege, that Palamedes, whom Ulysses had not yet sacrificed to his Jealousy, invented the Game of Dice, which was of Use, both to amuse the Officer and the Soldier.

'Tis

(1) Il. . 211.

'Tis not strange that a City, whose Walls are said to have been built by the Gods, which, setting aside the marvellous, proves at least their Strength and Sufficiency, resisted so long such feeble Attacks, and Forces often dissipated. The Siege of Veii, and some others, are a Proof of the long Resistance a City may make, when ill attack'd, and which is not cut off by a good Circumvallation from all Succour. But to all these Reasons we must add, that Superstition, which had so great a Share in all the Enterprizes of those Times, was the principal Cause of the Length of the Siege, since it was believed that Troy could not be taken till after the Accomplishment of its Destiny.

C H A P. V.

The Fatalities annexed to Troy.

THAT the Opinion which made the Ruin of this City depend upon certain Fatalities, had no other Foundation but some obscure Oracles little understood, is out of the Question. 'Tis certain that this Tradition was universally disseminated thro' both Armies, and consequently must have animated the Trojans, and disheartened the Greeks, till they were at length accomplished. The Pains they took to find out Philoctetes at Lemnos, and Pyrrhus at Scyros; the Hazards they run, in order to carry off the Palladium, and to hinder the Horses of Rhesus from drinking of the River Xanthus, prove how zealously they were attached to those Fatalities. Let it not be said, that all these Things fell out in the Tenth Year; for this is a direct Confirmation that the Greeks thought it not possible to take the City till then; and that seeing then all the Destinies accomplished, they drew together their whole Troops, to push the Siege more vigorously.

The first of these Fatalities was, that the City could not be taken without the Descendants of Eacus. The Foundation whereof was, that Apollo and Neptune being employed in building the Walls of Troy (a), had applied

Q

(a) See Pindar's Scholiast upon the Eighth Olympic.

applied to that Prince for his Assistance, that so the Work of a Mortal being joined with that of Gods, the City, which had otherwise been impregnable, might be capable of being one Day taken, if the Gods thought fit; this is what made the Greeks, who knew this Circumstance, employ the artful Ulysses to force Achilles, the Grandson of Eacus, from the Arms of Deidamia, the Daughter of Lycomedes King of Scyros, with whom his Mother had concealed him; and after his Death to send for his Son Pyrrhus, tho' he was then but very young; tho' perhaps it is true at bottom that Calchas, gained by the other Leaders of the Army, had contrived this Fatality to draw Achilles and his Troops to the Siege of Troy.

It was necessary, in the second Place, to have Hercules's Arrows, which were in the Hands of Philoctetes, whom the Greeks had basely abandoned in the Isle of Lemnos, upon Account of an Ulcer he had contracted from the Bite of a Serpent, when he was searching at Cbrysa for an Altar of Apollo, where Hercules had formerly sacrificed, and where the Greeks, according to the Oracle, were of necessity to sacrifice before the City could be taken; or by a Wound he had received from one of Hercules's Arrows, which he let fall upon his Foot; these Arrows, dyed in the Blood of the Hydra, which was a venomous Serpent, had been poisoned thereby. The Necessity they thought there was for these Arrows, obliged the Greeks to depute Ulysses to go in quest of Philoctetes, tho' he was mortally hated by him, for being one of those who advised to leave him in that Island. That sly Captain however succeeded in his Enterprize, and brought him to the Siege.

'Tis this Voyage of Ulysses and his Success in it, that makes the Subject of Euripides's Tragedy called Philoctetes, one of the finest in Antiquity, and which proves at the same Time that without either Episode or Love Story one may succeed in Tragedy; and that it is not commonly owing to the Barrenness of the Subject, for this of his is one of the most simple, that Authors have recourse to that Complication of Incidents, which spoils almost all theatrical Performances.

The

The third and most important Fatality was to carry off the Palladium (a), which the Trojans carefully kept in the Temple of Minerva. This Palladium was a Statue of that Goddess, three Cubits high, holding a Pike in the right Hand, a Distaff and a Spindle in the left. The Ancients speak of this Statue in so loose a Manner, that we know not well what to fix upon. Some say (b) Jupiter made it fall from Heaven near Ilus's Tent, when he was building the Citadel of Ilium. Herodian asserts that it fell at Pessinus a City of Phrygia; others will have it that Electra the Mother of Danaus gave it to that Prince. There are who alledge that it was the Astronomer Asius made a Present of it to Tros, as a Talisman whereon the Preservation of the City depended; or that Dardanus received it from Chryse, who was reputed the Daughter of Pallas. Dionysius of Halicarnassus (1), who agrees in Opinion with those who make it a Present sent from Heaven, adds that Eneas seized upon it, carried it into Italy with his household Gods, and that the Greeks had got only a Copy of it, made after the Similitude of the Original.

Lastly, Arnobius (2), St. Clemens of Alexandria (3), and Julius Firmicus (4), contend that the Palladium had been made of Pelops's Bones, and that by one of the Fatalities of Troy, it was necessary to have the Bones of that Heroe. Apollodorus (5) had said long before that this Statue of Minerva was a Piece of Clock-work that moved of itself.

Whatever be in these various Opinions, the Greeks looking upon this Statue as an Obstacle to the taking of Troy, so long as it was in that City, contrived how to carry it off. Ulysses and Diomedes having entered the Citadel by Night, either by Surprise, or by Means of secret

Q 2

(a) Omnis spes Danaum cæptique fiducia belli

Palladis auxilio semper stetit. Virg. l. 2.

(b) See Ryckius's Hist. of the Colonies settled in Italy, pag. 464. & seq.

(1) Antiq. Rom. l. 2. (2) Advers. Gent. l. 4. (3) Strom. l. 6.

(4) De error Prof. Rel. c. 16. (5) L. 3.

secret Intelligence (a), stole away that valuable Pledge of the Security of the Trojans, and conveyed it into their Camp; but hardly were they arrived when the Goddess gave Testimonies of her Wrath. To which Purpose Virgil makes Sinon say (b):

*Scarce to the Camp the sacred Image came,
When from her Eyes she flash'd a living Flame;
A briny Sweat bedew'd her Limbs around,
And thrice she sprung indignant from the Ground;
Thrice was she seen with martial Rage to wield
Her pond'rous Spear, and shake her blazing Shield.*

Pitt's Æn. 2. 228.

Conon (1) will have it that Diomedes alone carried off the Statue, and that when he was arrived at the Foot of the Trojan Walls, he got upon Ulysses's Shoulders, and clambering up to the Top of the Rampart, left there Ulysses, who expected he would have lent him his Assistance to get up; and having entered the Citadel, was so happy as to find the Palladium, carried it off, and came back to Ulysses, who provoked at this Procedure, kept behind him, and drawing his Sword was going to run him through; when Diomedes struck with the glittering of the Sword, turned about, parry'd off the Thrust, and obliged Ulysses to go before him: Hence the Proverb so known to the Greeks, Diomedes's Law, which is applicable to those who are forced to any thing cross to their Inclination.

In

(a) Some Authors tell us, that Helenus the Son of Priam, incensed against his Brother Deiphobus for marrying Helen, with whom he was in love, after the Death of Paris, having gone out of the City, shew'd the Greeks the Place where the Palladium was kept; and that he had let them know it was the least of all the Statues that were about it; for several had been made like to it, but of different Sizes, to hinder its being known. See Conon, Nar. 34.

(b) *Vix positum Castris simulachrum, arfere coruscæ
Luminibus flammæ arreētis, salsusque per artus
Sudor iit: terque ipsa solo, mirabile dictu,
Emicuit, parmanque ferens, hastamque tremendam.*

Æn. 1. 6

(1) Nar. 14.

In the fourth, it was necessary to hinder the Horses of Rhesus King of Thrace from drinking of the Xanthus (a), or eating the Grass of the Plains of Troy. That Prince who came in the tenth Year to the Relief of the Trojans, not knowing this Fatality, arrived by Night and encamped near the City; but Dolon, whom Heëtor sent to him, having been taken by Ulysses and Diomedes, to save himself from impending Death, informed them of Rhesus's Arrival, and of the Place where he was encamped. Thus those two Captains went and surprized that Prince, whom they found asleep, slew himself, and carried away his Horses. We may very reasonably suppose that Ulysses himself spread the Report of this Fatality, to determine the Greeks effectually to hinder Rhesus from relieving the City. Homer, who speaks of Rhesus's Death (1), says not one Word of this Fatality, and does not so much as insinuate that he was slain the first Night that he arrived near Troy; he only says that Dolon informed Ulysses and Diomedes of the Place where he was encamped, adding that he was but lately arrived (b).

Euripides, in his Tragedy of Rhesus, follows the common Opinion, and makes him to be assassinated by Ulysses and Diomedes the same Night that he arrived in the Grecian Camp. Ovid, in the Letter from Penelope to Ulysses, relates this Fact in a manner which fully expresses the Tenderneſs of that Princess for her Spouse. “ Telemachus, says she, has learned from Nestor, and I
“ from the dear Boy, the Story of Dolon and Rhesus “ sacrificed by your Hands, and how the one fell a “ Victim to Sleep, and the other to Surprize. Why, “ Ulysses, have you then lost the Remembrance of your Q 3 “ Penelope,

(a) *Ardentesque avertit equos in castra, priusquam
Pabula gustassent Trojæ Xanthumque bibissent.*

Æn. l. i. v. 476.

(1) Iliad. l. 10.

(b) Dicys, l. 2. says that Rhesus having arrived too late to enter into the City, had pitched his Tent pretty near the Grecian Camp, and that Ulysses and Diomedes, who were apprized of this, went thither by Night, and having found the Centinels asleep, slew that Prince, and carried off his Horses and Chariots.

“ Penelope, so far as to venture by Night into the “ Tbracian Camp, and expose yourself to so many Ene“ mies, with no other Assistance but that of Diomedes?
 “ No sure; the Thoughts of your Spouse must un“ doubtedly have made you take proper Measures for “ your Security. Yet how was I seized with Tremb“ ling and Affrightment, from which I never recovered, “ till the Relation of this Adventure was closed with “ an Assurance of your Return into the Grecian Camp, “ where you arrived upon the Horses of him whose “ Life you had taken away.”

In the fifth Place, another thing necessary to the taking of the City, was to put to Death Troilus the Son of Priam, and to destroy the Tomb of Laomedon, which stood upon the Scean Gate. Achilles slew that young Prince; and the Trojans themselves demolished Laomedon's Tomb, when they made a Breach in the Walls, in order to introduce the wooden Horse into the City.

Lastly, Troy could not be taken unless the Greeks had in their Army Telephus the Son of Hercules and Augé; but it was no easy Matter to get him. He opposed the Passage of the Greeks, as being in Alliance with the Trojans, and had married Laodice, or, according to Dictys of Crete, Astioché, Priam's Daughter. The Greeks seeing him engaged with their Enemies, had even made War upon him, and given him Battle, wherein he was wounded by Achilles. His Wound proving incurable, the Oracle whom he had consulted, answered that he could not be cured but by the Hand that had inflicted the Wound. As there was no Probability that his mortal Enemy would do him that Service, Chytemnestra advised him to carry off her Son Orestes, to oblige Agamemnon to make Achilles consent to the curing of him; but that Heroe being inexorable, Ulysses interpreted the Oracle to mean that the same Arrow which had done the Mischief, was to serve for the Remedy; thus having taken some Rust from the Head of the Arrow, and made up a Plaister of it, he sent

sent it to Telephus, who was very soon cured thereby, and came into the Grecian Army.

But now that I am upon this Telephus, his History as it is told by Hyginus, is very singular. Augé his Mother, to conceal her Intrigue with Hercules, had exposed him very soon after his Birth, and a Doe is said to have nursed him, because perhaps the Shepherds who found him, saw a Doe near him. That Princess, to shun the Anger of her Father who had discovered her Intrigue, repaired to the Court of Teuthras King of Mysia, who having no Children, adopted her for his Daughter. Some time after, Idas the Son of Aphareus, attempted to dethrone Teuthras; but Telephus, who was now grown up, and was come to the Court of Mysia, by command of the Oracle, in quest of his Parents, accepted of the Offer made him by Teuthras to give his Daughter Augé and his Crown to the Person who would save him from his Enemy; and putting himself at the Head of the Mysians, gave him Battle and slew him. Teuthras, to accomplish his Promise, celebrated the Marriage of that young Heroe with Augé; but as that Princess, from I know not what Foresight, was going to kill him on the Marriage-Night, the Gods sent a Dragon to separate them. Then Augé having implored Hercules's Assistance, Telephus discovered the Secret of his Birth, and carried back his Mother into her own Country. This whole Narration, doubtless, serves only to veil that Discovery, which hindered the Marriage from being consummated; and this is the true Key to the Fable.

Thus were executed all the Fatalities of Troy, and that City stood out till all its Destinies were fully accomplished. 'Tis proper however to remark that Homer makes no mention of these Fatalities, which we have in Ovid, Lycophron, and some other Ancients, and consequently we may presume that the History of them was not invented till after him. Had it been known in his Time, no doubt he would have taken Notice of it, either in the frequent Speeches of the Generals, or in the Odyssey, wherein he resumes several Particularities concerning the Siege, and the taking of that City.) He only says in one Place of the Iliad, that the Fate of Troy depended upon Hector, and that this City would defend itself so long as he was in Life; which being also known to the Trojans, obliged them, according to that Poet, to use their Endeavours to keep him from going out to attack the Enemy.

C H A P. VI.

Of the last Year of the Siege, and of the Destruction of the City.

TO proceed, it was not properly till the tenth Year of the Siege that they began to attack the City in earnest with all their united Forces. Those who had been detached the preceding Years to reduce the Allies of Troy, and oftener to carry off their Cattle and Grain, to supply the Camp with Provisions, were returned; but an Incident happened which was like to have ruined all, and retarded for some Time the taking of the City. It will easily be understood that I mean the Anger of Achilles, to which we owe the finest Poem that ever was composed.

In the Division of the Spoils which had been brought into the Camp, Agamemnon had for himself the fair Chryseis, otherwise called Astione. Her Father, who was High-Priest of Apollo, having come into the Grecian Camp to re-demand her; instead of the Justice he expected, was ill received there. In the mean Time the Plague began to waste the Grecian Army. Calchas was consulted that they might know from him the Means of putting a Stop to it; but he gave them no other Answer, but that Apollo, incensed for the Injury done to his Priest, had inflicted that Calamity upon them, which would never cease till they had appeased him, and returned Chryseis to her Father.

Whether this Answer was put into Calchas's Mouth by Agamemnon's Enemies, or was the pure Result of Equity, all the Leaders of the Army obtested that Prince to give up the Slave. Achilles raised his Voice higher higher than the rest ; and Agamemnon, who either could not or would not longer resist the Solicitations of the whole Army, delivered up Chryseis to her Father, and gave him considerable Presents ; but to be avenged of Achilles, he sent at the same Time to his Tent and carried away Briseis ; which so provoked that young Prince, who was passionately in love with her, that he resolved to draw his Sword no more in the common Cause, but confined himself to his Tent for the Space of near a Year ; for this Quarrel, to which we owe the Iliad to Homer, happened at the Beginning of the tenth Year, or in the middle of the ninth.

During this Retreat of Achilles, Hector frequently set fire to the Enemy's Ships : Eneas, Deiphobus, Memnon and several others on the side of the Trojans, imitated the Valour of Hector. . . Diomedes, Ajax, Menelaus, Agamemnon, and Numbers of others on the side of the Greeks, distinguished themselves by their Valour. Patroclus, indignant at the Advantages which the Trojans had over the Greeks in the several Battles that were fought every Day, and finding Achilles still inexorable, demanded from him his Armour, which he granted him. The Trojans seeing his Arms, at first believed it to be Achilles himself, and turned their Backs ; but the brave Hector with undaunted Courage attacked him who thus offered himself, believing, like the rest, that it was Achilles, killed him, and carried his Spoils into Troy.

Then Achilles, forgetting his Resentment, sprung from his Tent like a young Lion, and carried Slaughter into the Army of the Trojans. In vain till then had several Attempts been made to appease him : Deputations, Presents, pathetic and moving Speeches, reiterated Promises to give him back his dear Briseis ; all these had availed nothing to mitigate him, he remained inflexible : The Death alone of his Friend Patroclus was capable to make him drop his Resentment, and obliged him to quit his Tent, where he had confined himself till then. No sooner does he appear, than the Face of Things is altered : The Greeks resume their Courage,

Courage, the Trojans are repulsed and fly on all sides, and he spreads Havock, Death and Terror over all. At length, after signalizing himself by a thousand valiant Exploits, which his Panegyrist has rendered immortal, he kills Hector, the only Bulwark of Troy, and who had saved it so long from Destruction. 'Tis true, by a Barbarity which favours of the gross Manners of that Age, he fastened to his Chariot the dead Body of his Enemy, and basely dragg'd him several times round the Walls of the Town. He carried his Cruelty in celebrating the Funerals of his Friend so far, as to sacrifice to his Manes twelve young Trojans whom he had taken on different Occasions. However, his Cruelty being at length glutted, he delivered up Hector's Body to Priam, who came into his Tent in the Air of a Suppliant, and asked it of him, or rather redeemed it by rich Presents.

The Iliac Table, which I have mentioned, has preserved to us the Memory of all these Actions of the tenth Year. We see in N^o. 13. (a) the Priest Chryses by a solemn Sacrifice invoking Apollo against the Greeks. The Ravages of the Plague, and the Methods taken by the Greeks to put a Stop to it N^o. 14 and 15; and in the following Number is to be seen Ulysses giving back Chryseis to her Father. Here Neptune (1) is animating Ajax to the Battle: There (2) Idomeneus, after having slain Othryoneus, pursues Asius, who had fled. Eneas is represented killing Aphareus (3). Ajax is giving Archilochus the mortal Wound (4). Apollo on one of these Marbles is animating Hector to the Fight (5). In another Place, the same Hector is fighting at the Grecian Ships, and setting fire to them (6). Patroclus is there represented at the Time he puts on Achilles's Armour (7); Merion killing Achamas (8); Hector pursuing Antemedon, Achilles's Charioteer (9); as also the Battle between the Greeks and Trojans for the Body

(a) These Numbers are conform to those which Beger has inserted in his Work, intitled Bellum & excidium Trojanum.

(1) No. 18. (2) No. 19. (3) No. 20. (4) No. 21.

(5) No. 22. (6) No. 24. (7) No. 25. (8) No. 26. (9) No. 27.

Body of Patroclus (1), which is at length carried off by the Greeks into their Camp (2), where great Mourning is solemnized (3). In N^o. 31, 32, and 33, we see Tbetis addressing Vulcan to make Armour for her Son Achilles, and that young Heroe putting it on, and returning to the Battle. In N^o. 34, is Neptune saving Eneas from a dangerous Combat; and in N^o. 35, Achilles killing Iphition, Deumoleon, and Hippodamas. In N^o. 36, is Apollo rescuing Heetor from impending Death. In N^o. 37, Neptune fortifying Achilles against the Swellings of the Scamander, whose Channel was choaked up with dead Bodies. In N^o. 38, the Trojans fly at seeing Achilles quit his Tent. The Death of Heetor is represented in N^o. 40. And the Insults offered to his dead Body, N^o. 41. The Funeral Games in Honour of Patroclus in N^o. 42. and 43. Priam's Visit to Achilles, in his Tent, in N^o. 44. Achilles slaying the Amazon Penthesilea, in N^o. 46. In the following one is Iberfites; in the 48th is represented Achilles's Combat with Memnon. In the 49. we see Ajax and Ulysses exerting themselves to revenge the Death of Achilles slain by Paris; and his Funerals are represented in N^o. 50.

At length, after so many Battles and various Adventures, which Homer fully relates, the Greeks made themselves Masters of the City, and put it to Fire and Sword. There are two Opinions about the Manner in which this famous City was taken. The first is, that it was betrayed to the Enemy by the Treachery of Antenor and Eneas. The latter, tho' Priam's Son-in-law, was neglected by him (4); and the former had received several Grounds of Discontent. This Opinion has many Presumptions to support it; but chiefly, that it would have been impossible for those two Trojan Captains to have quietly equipped two Ships, and set out for Italy, under the Eyes of the Greeks, who were Masters of the Country after taking the City, had it not been for some Intelligence they had with them. Accordingly Dictys of Crete says (1) expressly, that Guards were set upon the Houses of these two Traitors, that they should not be pillaged, or that whatever belonged to them might be restored when the Spoils came to be divided. 'Tis even thought, that Antenor was left by the Greeks to command in the City, and that being abhorred by his Subjects as a Traitor, he was at last obliged to seek a Retreat in Italy. We are further told, that the Enemy entered Troy by the Scaean Gate, which was thrown open to them; and that there having been upon that Gate the Figure of a Horse, which was Neptune's Symbol, by whom the Walls were said to have been built; this gave Occasion to Fable, that the Enemy had entered the City by the Stratagem of a Wooden Horse; perhaps too this was called the Horse-Gate.
of

(1) N^o 28. (2) N^o 29. (3) N^o 30. (4) Iliad l. 13.

The second Opinion followed by Homer (2), Virgil (3), and at the same Time most generally received by the Ancients, especially by Palephatus and Dictys of Crete (4), is, that the Greeks, despairing to take Troy, made a wooden Horse so large, that it could not enter by the Gates, feigning that this was a Vow they offered, before their Return, to Minerva, whom they had offended by carrying off the Palladium. We are further told that the Trojans were credulous enough to introduce that fatal Machine into the City, and to place it in the Citadel, where was the Temple of the Goddess thought to be offended; and that the Greeks, who had concealed themselves, not in the Horse's Belly, as Virgil says in a poetical Manner, but in a neighbouring Cavern, taking Advantage of the Guards being asleep, who, from a Presumption that all was secure from the Greeks, had abandoned themselves to Riot and Debauchery, entered by the Breach; and their Companions having returned from Tenedos, where they likewise lay concealed, made themselves Masters of the City. According to the same Authors, Sinon, who let himself be taken Prisoner as a Defserter, gave the Greeks the Signal to return.

What-

(1) L. 5. (2) Odyss. l. 4. (3) En. l. 2. (4) De Bello Trojana.

-Whatever Embellishments Virgil has given to this Episode, the Substance thereof is very probable; and Dicys of Crete tells the Story much in the same Way as that famous Poet. Palephatus adds, that the Cave into which the Greeks retired, was still called in his Time, the Place of the Ambush of the Greeks; and we may say there is nothing impossible therein, and that this Opinion approaches nearest to ancient Tradition. Accordingly, in the Bas-reliefs of the Iliac-Table, which we have been speaking of, we see the Trojans leading the Horse into their Citadel: It is also figured, in another Place of the same Table, with a Ladder, which Sinon carries to let the Greeks descend, according to the Opinion of those who believed that they were shut up in the Cavity of that Machine. We find also the same Horse represented on several ancient Monuments, and especially on an Intaglio, published by Liceti, so current was this Tradition in Antiquity. Is it incredible that superstitious People should introduce into their City that Machine which they took to be an ex voto, made to an incensed Goddess?

But what makes this Opinion still more credible, is, what we are told to this Purpose by Dicys of Crete, concerning the Treachery of Antenor, who himself gave Ulysses that Advice, at delivering to him the Palladium, giving him to understand, that he must make a wooden Horse, as an Offering to Minerva, before his Departure; and upon this he got a Peace concluded with the Greeks, for a Sum of Money to be given them to indemnify them for the Charges of the War, which accordingly was put in Execution: So that having retired not long after, and left that Horse as a Monument of Peace, and of the Satisfaction they said they owed to Minerva, Antenor found no great Difficulty to get a Breach made in the Wall, to receive it into the City; which being done, he gave the Greeks Notice by Sinon, to return while all were asleep, and quite secure. Those who thought this Artifice too gross to impose upon the Trojans, gave out, that this Horse was a warlike Machine, which they made Use of for approach-approaching the Walls of the City, in order to demolish them: Which makes Laocoon say;

Aut hæc in nostros fabricata est Machina muros, Aut aliquis latet error, equo ne credite Teucri.

Æneid. l. 2.

Virgil, to make Eneas's Relation of the taking of that City more moving, says it was sack'd and burnt in the same Night; but most of the Ancients who have related this Event, assure us, that the first Thing they did was to make themselves Masters of all Quarters of the City, to put all those to the Sword who made any Resistance, and to take the rest Prisoners, Men and Women, pillaging the City; and that some Days after, the Booty and Slaves, which were collected upon the Shore, being divided, the Greeks, before they embarked, set Fire to it. Those who had escaped the Slaughter, by hiding themselves in Places unknown to their Enemies, run to extinguish it, and saved some Quarters, where they dwelt after the Departure of the Greeks.

Dion Chrysostom, in the Speech he made in the midst of Troy, which I quote elsewhere, asserts, upon the Faith of the Egyptian Priests, that Helen, courted by the greatest Princes of Asia and Greece, was married by her Father to Alexander, or Paris the Son of Priam: that the Greeks, disobliged at this Preference, made War upon the Trojans; that the same Greeks, weakened by Plague, Famine, and the Dissensions that arose among themselves, entered into a Treaty of Peace with the Trojans; and that, in order to perpetuate the Memory of the Peace that was concluded, they built a wooden Horse, on which were engraved, in gross Characters, the Articles of the Peace; and, in fine, that the Trojans, to introduce this Machine into the City, made a Breach in the Walls. This Narration, if true, shews us what had given Rise to the Fables delivered by Virgil, and the other Poets.

Be

Be that as it will, the City was sack'd, according to the most generally received Opinion. The numerous Family of Priam was cut off with that unfortunate Prince, and all his Children had a wretched End. He himself was slain by Pyrrhus in the midst of his Gods; and it availed him nothing to embrace the Altar of Jupiter Erceus; the Son of Achilles tore him from thence, even in the Sight of his Wife (a), and plunged his Sword into his Heart. That unfortunate Prince, as we know, had many Children by his Wives and Mistresses; one by Arisba the Daughter of Merops, his first Wife, named Esacus, who grieved himself to Death for the Loss of a Spouse whom he tenderly loved, and whom Ovid makes to have been transformed into a Didapper (b); perhaps to signify that he threw himself into some River. By Hecuba, his second Wife, he had Hector, Paris, Deiphobe, Helenus, Polites, Antiphe, Hipponous, Polydorus, Troilus; and four Daughters, Creusa married to Eneas, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra (c). These unfortunate Children almost all perished in this War.

The valiant Hector, after having a Thousand Times spread Terror and Desolation thro' the Grecian Camp, fell at last a Victim to Achilles's Resentment, as has been already said. We may, however, remark by the Way, that, according to Philostratus, the Trojans, after rebuilding their City, conferred upon that Hero divine Honours; and he is represented upon their Medals

(a) Pausanias, in his Phoc. says, that, according to the Poet Lescheus, Priam was not slain before the Altar of Jupiter Erceus, but that he was only torn from it by Force; and then being dragg'd as far as his Palace Gate, he met there Pyrrhus, who made no Scruple to take from him the little Life he had left from Old Age and Misfortunes.

(b) Metam. l. 11. that Poet feigns, in his usual Way, that he was then only in Love with the Nymph Hesperia, and that as he was in Pursuit of her, she was stung by a Serpent, whereof she died; which was the Cause of Esacus's desperate Grief:

Vulnus ab angue
A me causa data est, &c.

(c) We say nothing here of several other Children he had by his Concubines: Virgil says to this Purpose in his second Book of the Æneid:
Quinquaginta illi thalami, spei tanta nepotum.

als riding in a Chariot drawn by two Horses, holding in one Hand a Pike, and in the other, the Palladium, with this Greek Inscription, 'ΕΚΤΩΡ; and in the Exergue ΙΔΙΕΩΝ. The unhappy Troilus also died by the Hand of Achilles. Paris, after having received a mortal Wound by the Hand of Philoctetes, repaired to Mount Ida, to his beloved Oenone, and there breathed his last. Deiphobus, who had married Helen, after the Death of his Brother, was betrayed by that Traitor, and delivered up to the Greeks, who used him in the most barbarous Manner possible (a). The generous Laodice, to shun the Captivity with which she was threatened, threw herself down from the Top of a Rock (b). Polyxena, who had been the innocent Cause of Achilles's Death, as shall be said in the History of that Prince, was sacrificed by a barbarous Piety to that Heroe's Manes. Crensa, whom Priam had married to Eneas, perished in the Conflagration (c). Andromache, Hector's Wife (d), after having seen her Son Astyanax, the only Hope of the Trojans, thrown down from a high Tower, became the Slave of Pyrrhus, who, from I know not what Remains of Pity, gave her in Marriage to Helenus, Priam's Son, whose Predictions had been favourable to him. Helenus, I believe, was the only one of Priam's Children who survived the Ruin of his Country; and he spun out a wretched enough Life in Epirus, whereof he was King, sharing with his dear

(a). See to this Purpose the sixth Book of the Eneid.

(b) In Phrygia was the Tomb of this unfortunate Daughter of Priam, which Maximus, the Prætor of Asia, repaired, and put an Epitaph upon it, which is thus translated from the Greek.

Ladice quondam hic suscepit terra debiscens,
 Hostilem fugeret cum tremebunda manu
 Sed quod tempus edax consumpserat usque Sepulchrum,
 Splendorem huic Prætor Maximus attribuit:
 Quæque alibi sine honore Puellæ stabat imago,
 Ærea sic titulo desuper imposuit.

Canterul Comm. in Cassandram.

(c) Virgil, l. 2. relates this Death in a fabulous Manner.

(d) She was the Daughter of Eetion, King of Cilicia, whom Achilles slew at the Sack of Troy, with his other Children. Homer, Iliad. l. 2.

dear Andromache the Affliction which so great Disasters had brought upon her.

This Princess had three Children by Pyrrhus, Molossus, Pielus, and Pergamus; and a Son by Helenus, named Cestrinus, who having succeeded to a great Part of his Father's Dominions, with the Aid of the Epirotes, settled in the Country which is above the River Thyamis, now Calama, and gave to the Province called Cammania, according to Stephanus, the Name of Cestrina (a). Molossus ascended not his Father's Throne till after the Death of Helenus. Pergamus went into Asia; and having fixed his Residence in Teuthrania, where Arias reigned, slew that Prince in a Duel, made himself Master of his Dominions, and gave his Name to the City Pergamus.

In that City, according to Pausanias, from whom I borrow this Passage, was the heroic Monument of Andromache, who, according to some Ancients, had followed Pergamus into Asia. Pielus continued in Epirus, where he reigned after the Death of Molossus, who probably left no Children: At least, according to the Author now quoted, it was to him that Pyrrhus and his Ancestors ascribed their Original. Homer, and after him the other Poets, have always represented Andromache, as a virtuous Woman, and exceedingly attached to her Husband Hector. The last Farewel she takes of her Husband, is one of the most moving and laboured Pieces of the Iliad: two Verses of Ovid give us likewise a good Picture of her:

*Hector ab Andromaches complexibus ibat in Armis,
Et galeam capiti quæ daret, Uxor erat* (1).

VOL. IV.

R

The

(a) Pausanias, l. 2. & in Atticis, grants that Cestrinus was the Son of Helenus and Andromache, and that he gave his Name to the Country where he reigned; but he says, Andromache married not her Brother-in-law till after the Death of Pyrrhus. Pliny, l. 4. mentions the City Cestrina, which he places upon one of the Mountains of Pindus, which extended as far as Thesprotia. Ptolomy, 'tis true, makes no mention of it; but this is no Wonder, since he says as little of the Molossi, a People in the Neighbourhood of Thesprotia, and well known in that Time.

(1) Amor. Eleg. 9.

The unhappy Cassandra, whose Predictions were never credited, after having received, in Minerva's Temple, the most outrageous Insult, became the Slave of Agamemnon, and was sacrificed to Clytemnestra's Jealousy. The Fable says, that Apollo had been in Love with her, and that having allowed her to ask whatever she pleased, as the Reward of her Love, she desired of him the Gift of Prophecy, her Lover instantly disclosed to her the most secret Mysteries of Futurity; but Cassandra, instead of gratifying his Passion, shewed him nothing but Scorn and Contempt. Apollo, incensed at her Falshood, tho' he could not take away from her the Gift he had given her, took Care, at least, that she should not be the better for it, and that no Credit should be given to her Predictions, which had no other Effect, but to render her odious. The Foundation of this Fable I take to have been, that Cassandra, the Priestess of Apollo, learned from a Priest of that God the Art of Divination, either by Magic, or the Aruspices, wherein she afterwards excelled, with her Brother Helenus, who learned it from her. Probably that Priest fell in Love with her, and being unable to gain her Affection, defamed her thro' all the City, and to her Relations, laying his Intrigue, according to the Manner of those Times, to the Charge of the God whom he served. He succeeded in his Design; for Cassandra having foretold the Calamities that were to befall Paris, Priam, and the whole City, she was clap'd up in a Tower, where she incessantly sung the Misfortunes of her Country (a), which made her pass for mad. Her Shrieks and Tears were redoubled, when she learned that Paris was gone into Greece; but it was her Fate not to have her Prophecies believed, and only made the Objects of Ridicule. The Night in which Troy was taken, Ajax having met her in Minerva's Temple, where she hoped to have found a Sanctu-

(a) This is the Account given of her by all the Poets, both Greek and Latin; Homer, Eschiles, Lycophron, Euripides, Virgil, Ovid, Seneca, &c.

Sanctuary, offered Violence to her; but this Sacrilege was punished, as shall be said afterwards (a).

The Greek Captains having made a Division of the Slaves, she followed Agamemnon, who fell in Love with her; and this Passion cost both of them their Life. Clytemnestra, who had a Mind to secure the Crown to her Lover, put her Husband and her Rival to Death, in the Manner which we are going to relate immediately. Upon the Predictions of this Cassandra, surnamed Alexandra, has the Poet Lycophron made a Poem, which may be reckoned a Master-Piece of Obscurity. 'Tis probable, that this Princess was interred at Amyclé in Laconia, and that she was there acknowledged as a Divinity: Pausanias is my Voucher, and this Author relying upon some Tradition which was current in his Time; speaks of the Temple which the Amycleans had built in Honour of this Princess; wherein was also the Picture of Clytemnestra, and the Statue of Agamemnon, who was also believed to have been buried in that Place.

Hecuba attempting to revenge the Death of her Son Polydorus, was stoned to Death by the Greeks. But this Event is too considerable, not to be told at full length. Priam being informed that the Greeks were arming against him, sent his Son Polydorus with a Part of his Treasure, to the Court of Polymnestor King of Thrace, to whom he had given in Marriage his Daughter Ilione. He seeing the Greeks Masters of Troy; and apprehending he had been used ill, or prompted to the cursed Design by Avarice, secretly put to Death

R 2

that

(a) Pausanias, explaining the fine Picture of Polygnotus, representing the taking of Troy, says, and I think he is alone in his Assertion, That Ajax was there represented, holding his Buckler in his Hand, and approaching the Altar, as to justify himself by Oath from the Outrage he was going to have committed against that Princess. To what Excess did the Pagan Religion carry its Votaries! Was ever such an extravagant Oath heard of? And what are we to think of Menelaus and Agamemnon, who received it? For this I take to be the true Sense of the Expressions used by that Author, who seems to say that these two Princes freed him from that Oath; which makes no rational Sense. Would it not have been better to stone that Miscreant, as Ulysses advised. Pausan. ibid.

that young Prince, the Grief whereof killed Ilione (a). Hyginus relates the Fact with some little Variation : He says, that Priam having sent the young Polydore, who was then but in the Cradle, Ilione brought him up as her Son, and made Diphilus pass for her Brother ; probably, being jealous of the Cruelty and Avarice of her Husband. In fact, the Greeks having let him know that they would give him Electra, the Daughter of Agamemnon, if he would divorce Ilione, and put Polydore to Death, that Prince accepted the Proposals ; but instead of his Brother-in-law, it was his own Son he put to Death.

Polydore in the mean Time went to consult the Oracle of Apollo about his Destiny, and learned that his Father was dead, and his Country burnt ; but he was agreeably surprized to find the quite contrary at his Return to Thrace. Ilione, having explained to him this Riddle, he pluck'd out Polymnestor's Eyes. Homer, more to be relied on, as to all the Adventures of this War, than Virgil, and the rest, instead of this Story, relates (1) how Achilles slew that young Prince near the Walls of Troy. Pliny (2), speaking of the City Ænoa, makes Mention of the same Polydore's Tomb, for which Ausonius has made an Epitaph, quoted in the Margin below (b).

In the Opinion of those who will have him to have been slain by the King of Thrace, Hecuba having a Mind to revenge the Death of her Son, went to the Palace of Polymnestor, where under Pretence of having something to say to him in Secret, she was going to have plucked out his Eyes ; but some Greeks having run up to his Assistance, drag'd her out of that Prince's Palace,

(a) - - - Hæc Polydorum obtruncat, & auro
Vi potitur. Quid non mortalia pectora cogis
Auri sacra famas! Æn. l. 3.

(1) Iliad l. 20. (2) L. 4. c. 11.

(b) Cede procul tumulo, myrtum fuge nescius hospes :
Telorum seges est sanguine adulta mco.
Confixus jaculis, & ab ipsa cæde sepaltus,
Condor in hoc tumulo bis Polydorus ego,
Scit pius Æneas, & tu, Rex impie! quod me
Thracia pæra premit, Trojaque cura tegit.

Palace, stoned her, and propagated a Report that she had been transformed into a Bitch, to denote the Rage and Despair to which her Misfortunes had reduced her; or, as Servius remarks, because she had continually loaded with Imprecations the Army of the Greeks, that she might thereby procure Death, which she preferred to Slavery (a).

*Diety*s of Crete informs us (1), that Hecuba became a Slave to Ulysses, and that this Prince, obliged to set out incognito, because he was accused of Ajax's Death, left that unfortunate Princess in the Hands of her Enemies, who stoned her in the Manner already said. But 'tis very probable, that he himself was the Author of her Death, since it is said, that upon his Arrival in Sicily, he was so tormented with terrible Dreams, that in Order to appease the Gods, he built a Temple to Hecate, who presides over Dreams, and a Chapel to Hecuba.

Mela and Strabo (2) tell us, that in Thrace was to be seen the Place of her Burial, which was called the Dog's Tomb. Hyginus again, so many Traditions there were concerning these ancient Adventures, is of Opinion, that she was thrown into the Sea, and that the Place got the Name of Cyneum. I find, however, another Foundation to this Fable. Hecuba, in Euripides, complains of her being chained like a Dog to the Gates of Agamemnon, whose Slave she was: As to which, we are to observe, that anciently the Porters were, for the most part, chained. Perhaps this unfortunate Princess was made Porter to the King of Mycenæ. The Greeks gave bad enough Usage to those illustrious Captives, to give a Handle to this Conjecture, tho' the most common Tradition is, that she died in Thrace.

Hecuba, Homer tells us, was the Daughter of Dymas, or, according to Virgil, who has followed Euripides, of Cisseis King of Thrace, and Sister to Theano, the Priestess of Apollo at Troy, during this War.

R 3

Such

(a) To this Purpose Plautus speaks in his Menechmei.

Omnia mala ingerebat, quemquam aspexerat:

Itaque adeo jure cæpta est appellari canis.

(1) L. 5.

(2) L. 13.

Such was the deplorable Fate of this illustrious Family (a): its Allies had no better End; Memnon, Rhesus, Chorebus, Agapenor, Elpenor King of Eubœa, and the rest, lost all of them their Lives there.

The Heroes of the Grecian Army were not more fortunate: Achilles was slain by Paris; Patroclus by Hector: That Prince, the Favourite of Achilles according to Eustathius, was from Opus, a City of the Locrian Opuntians. Ajax, the Son of Telamon, killed himself in Despair, because Ulysses got the better of him in the Dispute for Achilles's Arms: Ajax, the Son of Oileus, was shipwreck'd, and buried in the Waves, as if the Gods had thought fit to avenge the Injury he offered to Cassandra in the Temple of Minerva. Ulysses suffered infinite Dangers by Sea: Agamemnon was slain by his Wife, upon his Arrival at Mycenæ. Mnestheus, King of Athens, died by the Way: Almost all these Captains died either by War or Shipwreck; and of all the Kings that were in League to avenge the Atridae, there was hardly one who returned in Peace to his Family and Children, since most of those who escaped Shipwreck, were obliged to go and plant Colonies in remote Countries. Teucer, exiled by his Father Telamon, for not having revenged the Death of his elder Brother, went to Cyprus, and built a new Salamis in Honour of Jupiter, where his Descendants reigned down to Evagoras, that is, till the Hundredth Olympiad, as we learn from the Panegyric upon this last Prince, made by Isocrates. Agapenor, the Leader of the Arcadians, retired into the same Island, and there built Paphos, and a Temple to Venus, at some Distance from that which had been formerly erected to her by Cinyras, as we read in Pausanias. Nestor, with the Pyliaus, went into Italy, and built the City Metapontus (b). Phalantus, with a Colony of Laconians, built

(a) Hic finis fatum Priami, hic exitus illorum
Sorte tulit.

Æn. l. 2.

(b) Pausanias, in Messen. supposes that Nestor, after the Trojan War, returned to Pylus, and died there; and this Author says nothing of his Voyage to Italy. He even adds, that he had preferred Pylus for the Seat of the Empire to the other Cities in his Possession, and that his Descendants followed his Example.

built in the same Country that of Tarentum : Philoctetes that of Petilia. Diomedes having found his Wife faithless, went to Apulia, where he founded that of Argyripa ; and Idomeneus, driven from Crete for having barbarously sacrificed his Son to an imprudent Vow, was forced to fly into the Country of the Salentines.

Thus perished most of the Grecian and Trojan Heroes ; but as I have but transiently touched upon most of the Adventures that befel them, the Reader no doubt will expect that I should enlarge further upon so interesting Subjects : This is what I shall do, after I have settled the Æra of the Event now related, and given a short History of the Trojans and their City.

C H A P. VII.

The Æra of the taking of Troy, with the History of that City.

A R T I C L E I.

The Æra of the taking of Troy.

THE Year in which Troy was taken, makes an essential Æra for the Knowledge of the Events of the fabulous Age : This being once effectually settled, we date the Facts prior to it, by tracing upwards ; and those that were posterior, by reckoning downwards, as far as the Christian Æra. But in every one of these Events, as in all others of those remote Ages, Authors ancient and modern differ so widely from one another, that 'tis impossible to reconcile them. Those who are for abridging the Chronology of the Antiquities of Greece, such as Conringius, and Sir Isaac Newton, date the taking of Troy only at the Distance of about 900 or 907 Years from the vulgar Era : Those who extend these same Antiquities too far, as F. Stephen Souciet, contend that this City was taken 1388 Years before the same Æra. Between these two Extremes, there are forty or fifty different Opinions, which remove this Event, some to a greater, some to a smaller Distance.

It will not surely be expected that I should insist upon an Examination into all these particular Opinions; the Reasons that induced Chronologists to prefer one Date to another, are founded upon Particulars which would carry me too far from my Subject; and those who have the Curiosity to examine them, I refer to Petavius, Scaliger, Don Pezron, and particularly to the tenth Chapter of the third Book of The critical Reflections upon the Histories of ancient Nations, by M. Fourmont the elder, where they will find full Satisfaction. For my part, I adhere to the Opinion of Eratosthenes, quoted by Eusebius, and to that of Apollodorus the Chronographer, cited by Clement of Alexandria, who place the taking of this City, the one in the Year 1183, the other in the Year 1181, before the Christian Æra; that is, about 450 Years before the Foundation of Rome, 400 or 407 before the first Olympiad, as is fully proved by Joseph Scaliger (1), in the last Year of the Reign of Mnestheus King of Athens, and of that of Agamemnon; and under the Judgeship of Eliud. After all, the Opinion which I follow is at this Day most generally received; and if Julius Africanus has taken the Mean between the two Authors above-mentioned, by placing this Æra in the Year 1182, and if Petavius has set it a Year farther back than Apollodorus, by making it fall in the Year 1184, the Difference is but inconsiderable, and affects not my Subject in the least. For in whatever Year I place this Æra, as it is the Boundary of my Researches, 'tis enough that I have settled the other Æras that preceded it, that the Reader may see with a Glance of his Eye the Distance there is between the Events which compose the History of the fabulous Times, which is all I aim at in this Volume.

ARTICLE II.

The History of Troy.

The Origine of the Trojans and of their City is, like that of all other Nations, wrapped up in Darkness and Fictions,

(1) De Emend. Temp. l. 5.

Fictions, and we find different Sentiments among the Authors who have given Account of it. Some make them come from Crete, others from Italy, or from Samothrace, or Athens, or Arcadia, and each of these Opinions is supported by Partisans of great Name. The Historian Josephus alledges, that they sprung from Thogarmah, the Son of Gomer; but as the Prophet Ezekiel makes the northern Nations descended from this Thogarmah, which hardly agrees to the Phrygians, I submit to Strabo's Opinion, who makes them to have come from Thrace: An Opinion the more probable, that besides their nearness to one another, these two People had anciently a great Conformity in Manners, and almost one and the same Religion.

Be that as it will, tracing their History from about the Time of Dardanus, provided we reckon him, as Diodorus and Apollodorus do, a Native of Thrace or Samothrace, and not of Italy, as Virgil makes him, with a View to flatter the Romans, this History, I say, begins to grow less obscure.

Dardanus having quitted Samothrace (a), after the Death of his Brother Jasion, who was Thunderstruck for having offended Ceres, went to the Coasts of Asia Minor, into the Lesser Phrygia, where he married Batea the Daughter of Teucer, who himself having quitted Crete, came and settled in the same Country, where Scamander the most ancient King of that Province we know of, had given him his Daughter in Marriage. Dardanus, after the Death of his Father-in-Law, ascended

(a) According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, l. 1. Dardanus was a Native of Arcadia; a Deluge that happened in his Time, having obliged him to depart from thence, he transplanted himself into an Island of Thrace, which was first named Dardania, and afterwards got the Name of Samothrace, as we read in Pausanias, which he also quitted, and removed into Phrygia. He had brought with him Carybas his Nephew, the Son of his Brother Jasion, who instituted there the Worship of the Mother of the Gods, as has been said in the History of that Goddess. Dardanus also transported into the same Country the Samothracian Gods, and two Statues of Pallas, whereof the one was so famous afterwards under the Name of the Palladium.

ed the Throne, reigned sixty-two Years, built the City Dardania, and was reckoned the Founder of the Kingdom of Troy. Erichthonius, who succeeded him immediately, reigned forty-six, and Tros his Son near as many Years; it was the latter gave his Name to Troy which was formerly called Dardania. Tros had three Sons; Ganymedes, carried off by Tantalus; Ilus the Founder of the Royal Line; and Assaracus the Founder of that of Anchises Eneas's Father. Ilus built the Citadel of Ilium, reigned forty Years, and left a Son Laomedon, the Father of Priam, under whom Troy was taken. Laomedon, who reigned twenty-nine Years, encompassed the City with Walls so strong, that the Work was ascribed to Apollo the God of fine Arts; or rather, if we may believe Homer, to Neptune, who raised them while Apollo kept Laomedon's Flocks, in hope of a Hire promised him by that Prince, by whom he was defrauded; which makes Horace say:

Mercede pasta destituit Deos (1).

To this Purpose Homer introduces Neptune speaking:

Troy's Walls I rais'd (for such were Jove's Commands)

And you' proud Bulwarks grew beneath my Hands;

Tby Task it was to feed the bellowing Doves

Along fair Ida's Vales, and pendent Groves.

But when the circling Seasons in their Train,

Brought back the grateful Day that crown'd our Pain,

With Menace stern the fraudulent King defy'd

Our latent Godhead, and the Prize deny'd:

Pope's Iliad, 21. 520.

The strong Moles that were found necessary to be raised against the Waves of the Sea, passed for the Work of the same God; and the Winds and Inundations having afterwards demolished a Part of these Works, it was given out, after the Manner of those Times, that Neptune had thus taken Vengeance upon the perfidious Laomedon (2). The same was the Fate of

(1) Ode 3. Book III. after Pindar. (2) See the History of Neptune.

of the Walls of Troy that perished by Age, and were rebuilt by Hercules, when he took that City, as has been said in his History.

To enable the Reader to understand the two Royal Lines from Dardanus to Priam, I have set down the genealogical Tree.

DARDANUS.

Erichthonius.

Tros.

Ilus,	Assaracus,
Laomedon, Tithon,	Capys,
Priam,	Anchises,
Hector, Paris,	Eneas.

As to what remains, we have followed the most general Opinion, and perhaps the most probable one, concerning the manner in which this famous City was sack'd; for 'tis almost beyond doubt, whatever be the Accounts of the Romans, who would needs at any rate derive their Original from Eneas and Venus, that it was not destroyed; but that Eneas and Antenor secured it from Fire and Pillage, if they did not even give it up themselves to the Greeks; and that the former, or at least his Descendants (a), reigned there very long, as Neptune plainly foretels in the Iliad, or, to speak more accurately, as Homer, an Ionian by Extraction, and consequently in the Neighbourhood of the Trojans, makes Neptune foretel, because probably, even in the Time of that Poet, the Posterity of Eneas were still reigning over that City, whom he could not but please by making the God of the Sea foretel what they actually saw with their Eyes. In fact, it would seem, as is very ingeniously remarked by a learned Author (1), that

(a) Eusebius, upon the Authority of Diclys of Crete, says the Sons of Antenor reigned at Troy after the Death of Priam, till Hector's Children expelled them thence, and reigned in their stead.

(1) Father Hardouin's Apology for Homer.

that Homer's Design was only to mark the total Extinction of Ilus's Line, from whom was descended the perfidious Laomedon, who by his Impieties had rendered himself unworthy of the Crown, for 'tis his Impieties are set forth by the Fable of Neptune and Apollo whom he cheated, and at the same time to punish Priam's base Indulgence to his Children, and particularly to the adulterous Paris; and to raise to the same Throne that of Assaracus, and of the pious Æneas, who in Homer and Virgil, is always represented as a Man reverencing the Gods, who appear to take particular Care of him, and save him several times from imminent Death, to preserve him for the Throne of the Trojans. 'Tis true, the learned Author now cited goes still farther, in maintaining that Eneas is the true Heroe of the Iliad, wherein I cannot be of his Mind, tho' he supports it very ingeniously.

B O O K VI.

Containing the particular History of the Leaders of the Grecian and Trojan Armies.

AFTER having divided the Spoils of the Trojans, the Grecian Captains embarked each with his Troops, and underwent various Adventures, which making a considerable Part of the History of that Time, claim a Place here. I begin with that of the General of the Army.

CHAP.

C H A P. I.

The History of Agamemnon, and his Family.

PELOPS being forced, as has been said, to quit Lydia, after Tros had made himself Master of his Dominions, in Revenge of the Death of Ganymede (a), had repaired to the Court of Oenomaus King of Pisa (b), who gave him a kindly Reception (c). This Prince had a Daughter, who was an accomplished Beauty, her Name Hippodamia; but whether he was in Love with her himself, as Pausanias and Hyginus will have it; or affrighted by an Oracle, which had foretold him that he would be slain by his Son-in-law, as it is in Diodorus (1), Thucydides (2), and Strabo (3), he would not give her in Marriage; and, in order to remove a Multitude of Lovers, who ply'd her continually with their Addresses, he had proposed to them a very hard Condition, promising the young Princess to the Man who should outstrip him in the Race, adding that he would put all to Death whom he got the better of. The Lover was to set out first in the Race, and Oenomaus, with Sword in Hand, was to pursue him; and to run it through his Body, if he could overtake him (d). He had already put Thirteen to Death, according to Pindar (4), and others had withdrawn, when Pelops bribed Myrtilus, Oenomaus's Charioteer (e). He, in hope of the Reward which Pelops had promised him, cut the King's Chariot in two, and then joined the two Parts together so artfully,

(a) Some Authors are of Opinion, that Pelops quitted his Country only upon Account of Earthquakes.

(b) Asopus, King of a Part of the Peloponnesus, had a Daughter named Harpina, who had by Mars, or by some Warrior or Priest of that God, Oenomaus.

(c) The Date of his Arrival in Greece has been marked before.

(1) L. 4. (2) L. 1. (3) L. 8.

(d) Diod. loc. cit. Pindar. Luc. &c. The Race was from Pisa to an Altar of Neptune, in the Isthmus of Corinth.

(4) Ode. Olym. l. 1.

(e) He is given out to have been the Son of Mercury, probably because he was very cunning.

fully, that no Appearance of a Fracture was to be seen; but while Oenomaus was in Pursuit of Pelops, who was running before him, the Chariot falling asunder, that unfortunate Prince broke his Neck, and Pelops married Hippodamia. Myrtilus was punished for his Baseness and Treachery, for Pelops himself threw him into the Sea, which from him was called Myrtilene. The Waves having driven his Body ashore, the Phe-neates gave him Burial, and instituted an Annual Feast in his Honour, because he was reckoned the Son of Mercury. By the Way, we are to observe, that the Quality of Charioteer was not dishonourable in those Times; and that frequently Kings themselves, or some Prince of their Court, guided their Chariots, as we learn from Homer, in several Places of the Iliad. This Myrtilus was therefore a Man of Figure, and if we may believe Pausanias (5), he himself was of the Number of Hippodamia's Lovers; and engaged in Pelops's Service, only in Hope he would allow him to gratify his Passion, which he had sworn to do in a Manner which is seldom agreeable to Husband or Gallant. But he had no sooner got the Victory, than he cleared himself of his Oath, by throwing him into the Sea. Mercury, we are told, was highly provoked at Pelops's Perfidiousness; and tho' that Prince, to appease him, had built to him a stately Temple, the God never gave over persecuting his Posterity, and was the Author of all those great Disasters which are so much celebrated by the Poets. It was for the same Reason, if we may believe Euripides, that Mercury sent the famous Ram, whose Golden Fleece brought so many Calamities upon that Family: But this Fable we shall explain upon another Occasion: In the mean Time, let us return to Pelops.

That Prince having ascended the Throne; gained several Conquests over his Neighbours, and gave his Name to that fine Country, which was from that Time called the Peloponnesus, as much as to say, the Island of Pelops. Further, it was fabled that the Horses which drew drew Pelops's Chariot, had Wings, and that they had been given him by Neptune, whereby was signified their Swiftneſs; or, if we may believe Pindar and Palephatus, the Meaning is, that Pelops made Uſe of a Ship with Sails to carry off Hippodamia. The Poets tell us, it was Neptune favoured Pelops in that Race; and they add farther, that God had formerly carried away that Prince, becauſe, in fact, he had left his Country to embark upon the Sea, and his Voyage had been very happy.

(5) In Attic.

Pindar has touched this Fable with a great Deal of Delicacy, in his firſt Olympic. He firſt rejects the Fable of the Ivory Shoulder, which I ſhall ſpeak of in the History of Tantalus, and conſiders it as a Fable childiſh and frivolous. He ſays that in reality Tantalus having been invited to the Table of the Gods, was willing to regale them alſo in his Turn, but that nothing fell out at that Entertainment which was not conſiſtent with ſtrict Decency. He adds, that Neptune, charmed with the Beauty of the young Pelops, carried him up to Heaven, to pour out his Nectar, as Ganymede did to Jupiter; that Search was made every where for that young Prince, without any Account of him being heard; and he would always have continued in the ſame Office, had not the Crime of Tantalus his Father, who would needs diſtribute to Men the Nectar which the Gods had reſerved to themſelves as a Symbol of their Immortality, brought about Pelops's Diſgrace, and obliged the Aſſembly of the Gods to degrade him again to the Earth, where falling in Love with Hippodamia, he went one Day to the Sea-Coaſt, to invoke Neptune's Aid, that he might have Succeſs in that Enterprize, which was attended with equal Danger and Difficulty. The God of the Sea heard his Prayer, and made him a Preſent of a Chariot, and Horſes of indefatigable Swiftneſs, with which he was victorious in the Race, and gained the Prize, which coſt ſo many unfortunate Lovers their Lives. Thus it is great Poets have the Art of embellishing their Works with ancient Pieces of History, by cloathing them with all the Ornaments of Poetry. Pelops Pelops had several Children; among others, Atræus and Thyestes. They, by the Advice of their Mother, having put to Death their Brother Chrysippus, whom Pelops had by his Mistress Astioche, that Prince banished them from his Court, with the Queen. It is even alledged, that she died thro' Anguish and Remorse for having been accessary to her Father's Death, by holding Intelligence with Pelops and Myrtilus. Pelops died some Time after Hippodamia (a).

Atræus, who had retired to the Court of Eurystheus King of Argos, and had married his Daughter Ærope, was declared King in Room of his Father-in-law, who was slain in Attica by the Heraclidæ, not long before the Trojan War; and thus it was, the Pelopidæ ascended the Throne of Mycenæ: Thyestes, who followed him, won the Heart of the Queen his Sister-in-law, and had two Children by her, or three, according to some. Atræus having discovered this Intrigue, banished him at first from his Court; but not thinking himself sufficiently revenged by that Removal, he recalled him under Pretext of Reconciliation, and having assassinated the Children whom he had by the Queen, served them up to him at Table, in poisoned Dishes of Meat, as we are told by Pausanias. 'Tis further said, that that the Sun hid his Head, that he might not shine upon so barbarous a Repast; a lively and natural Figure, to denote the Abhorrence of universal Nature at this Action. Thyestes was avenged afterwards by his Son Ægisthus, who slew his Uncle Atræus, in the Manner I am going to relate. But, in order to the right understanding of this whole History, we must know that Thyestes having found his Daughter Pelopea in a Grove consecrated to Minerva, ravished her, without knowing who she was, and he had by her Ægisthus, whom she exposed. Servius, upon the first Book of the Eneid, and Lactantius upon the fourth of the Thebaid, say, he committed that Incest wittingly, because an Oracle had foretold him that he should be revenged by a Son whom he should have by her; and that he was acted by such

a

(a) See the End of Thyestes's History.

a strong Desire of Revenge; that he stifled all the Dictates of Reason against so criminal an Action. Some Time after the Death of his Wife Ærope, Atreus married the same Pelopea, who was his Niece, and educated, together with Menelaus and Agamemnon, the young Egisthus, whom he had brought to his Court, as we learn from Pausanias (1), and Hyginus (2). They having found, at Delphi, their Uncle Thyestes, brought him to their Father, who clap'd him up in Prison, and sent Egisthus to kill him; but Thyestes having spy'd in his Hands the Sword which Pelopea had snatched from him when he was going out of the sacred Grove, after the Violence he had offered to her, found him out to be his Son. His Daughter coming up, no sooner knew the Incest of her Father, than she fell upon that same Sword, and Egisthus carried it all bloody to Atreus, who thought he had got rid of his Brother; and having gone to offer a Sacrifice of Thanksgiving, Egisthus slew him during the Ceremony, and delivered his Father out of Prison. Thus Thyestes ascended the Throne, and banished his two Nephews, Agamemnon and Menelaus, the Sons of Atreus his Brother.

These two young Princes repaired to the Court of Polyphides King of Sicyon, who sent them to Oeneus King of Oechalia; and that generous Prince married them to the two Daughters of Tyndarus, Clytemnestra and Helen. With the Assistance of their Father-in-law they resolved to revenge the Death of Atreus, pursued Thyestes vigorously; but he having fled for Refuge to an Altar of Juno, they spared his Life, contenting themselves with banishing him to the Island of Cythera. Thus Agamemnon ascended the Throne of Argos, which he transferred to Mycenæ, and his Brother Menelaus succeeded Tyndarus his Father-in-law, and was King of Sparta.

'Tis proper to remark, before we go farther, that when I say Agamemnon and Menelaus were the Sons of Atreus, I speak according to the common Opinion, tho' I am not ignorant that there are several Authors, among whom may be named Eusebius and Scaliger, who believe, and that with a good deal of Reason, that they were not the Sons of that Prince, but of Plisthenes his Brother; and as the Actions of the latter had not deserved honourable mention in History, he having led a very obscure Life, hence the Ancients, and especially Homer, to do honour to the Memory of the Chief of so many Kings, and to that of his Brother, industriously made them pass for the Sons of Atreus who had brought them up, and gives them always the Name of the Atridae.

I forgot to take notice that the Beginning of the Enmity between Atreus and Thyestes, was owing to Thyestes's having stole from his Brother a Ram with a Golden Fleece, on which he reckoned the good Luck of his Family depended; and that he committed this Theft by the Interposition of Ærope his Sister-in-law, whom he had debauched; which incensed Atreus to such a Degree, that he cut the Throats of the two Children whom his Brother had by Ærope.

As for Egisthus and Agamemnon, says Pausanias (1), I know not which of the two gave the first Provocation to the other; if it was Egisthus, or if he only acted in revenge of the Murther of Tantalus the Son of Thyestes, who had married Clytemnestra the Daughter of Tyndarus. 'Tis very true that Euripides, in his Iphigenia in Aulis, introduces Clytemnestra reproaching Agamemnon for having put to Death Tantalus the Son of Thyestes her first Husband; but Eustatbius upon the eleventh Book of the Odyssey, treats the former Marriage as a Fable, from the Authority of Homer, who speaks of Agamemnon as having married a Woman so young, that it is in no wise probable she had a former Husband.

Almost all the Ancients, especially the Poets, either believed, or would have it believed, that Atreus in revenge had made his Brother eat up his own Children, and obliged the Sun to hide his Head; and this shocking Piece of ancient History is represented upon a fine Groupe in the Farnese Gallery. It was always thought that the Statue of this Groupe represented the Emperor Commodus; but 'tis actually an Atreus, standing

(1) Loc. cit.

ing with a Poniard in one Hand, and in the other a Child whom he is going to sacrifice to his Resentment; and this is Gronovius's Opinion of it, against du Perrier, and some others (a).

'Tis proper however to observe, that Strabo and Servius consider this pretended Fact only as an Allegory, founded upon Atreus's having been the first who foretold the Eclipses of the Sun, who at that Time hides himself from our Eyes, as if he actually withdrew under the Horizon.

Be that as it will, Agamemnon being obliged about that time to leave his Court to go and command the Grecian Army, was heartily reconciled to his Cousin Egistbus, pardoned him for the Death of his Father, and even left him the Care of his Wife Clytemnestra, and of his three Children, Orestes (b); Iphigenia, and Electra, appointing however a certain Songster his sole Confident to overlook their Conduct. Egistbus having captivated the Affections of Clytemnestra, found a way to get rid of the too vigilant Guardian; and destroyed him at a Hunting-Match. After this he kept no Measures, and their Freedoms were so open, that Agamemnon himself heard the afflicting News thereof about the end of the Siege of Troy, and resolved to take Revenge so soon as he was returned; but his Wife prevented him, and killed him upon his Arrival, together with her Rival (c), as we read in Homer (1), Euripides, Diodorus Siculus (2), Lycophron (3), Virgil (4), and all the other Ancients.

To proceed, 'tis well known in what manner this sad Tragedy was acted; and how Clytemnestra, either in the midst of a Feast which she gave him upon his Arrival, or as he was coming out of the Bath, having desired her Husband to lay aside a Phrygian Habit,

S 2

which

(a) Consult Meziriac upon this Place.

(b) Orestes was the youngest, and was then but a Child.

(c) We are told that Ajax the Son of Nauplius, to revenge the Death of his Uncle Palamedes, went and informed Clytemnestra, that her Husband was in love with Cassandra, whom he was bringing with him.

(1) Odyss. l. 2. (2) L. 4. (3) In Caſſand. (4) En. l. 4.

which he wore ever since the taking of Troy, for one which she said she had wrought for him during his Absence ; that Prince was going to put it on, but his Hands being intangled in the Sleeves, which she had designedly made close, the Conspirators rose from Table and put him to Death.

The faithless Clytemnestra afterwards married Egistbus, and set the Crown upon his Head, which he kept seven Years, as we learn from Velleius Paterculus after Homer (1). Young Orestes had also been the Victim of that cruel Intrigue, if his Sister Electra had not secretly conveyed him to the Court of his Uncle Strophius King of Phocis, who had married Agamemnon's Sister. There it was that Orestes contracted that close Friendship with his Cousin Pylades the Son of Strophius, which rendered them inseparable for ever.

Pausanias says (2), there were to be seen in his Time at Mycenæ, the Remains of the Tombs of Agamemnon, of Eurymedon his Charioteer, and of all those whom that General had brought back from Troy, and whom Egistbus cut off at the Entertainment he gave them, near that of Teledamus and Pelops, and of the Twins whom Cassandra had by Agamemnon, and whom Egistbus had put to Death without pitying their tender Age, after having imbrued his Hands in the Blood of the Father and Mother.

Orestes some Years after formed the Design of revenging the Death of his Father ; and having for that Effect raised some Troops, left Strophius's Court with Pylades, entered secretly into Mycenæ, and concealed himself at the House of his Sister Electra (a), whom Egistbus had married to a Man of mean Extraction, that he might have nothing to fear from his Resentment. * She first spread a false Report thro' Mycenæ of Orestes's Death, at which Egistbus and Clytemnestra were

(1) Odyss. l. 3. (2) In Corinth.

(a) Homer, l. 9. names this Princess Laodice ; as to which the Commentators remark, that the Surname of Electra was given her only to denote that it was very late before she was married ; 'tis even probable, that it was not given her till long after by the tragic Poets, and that Homer never knew it.

were so overjoyed, that they went directly to the Temple of Apollo, to give Thanks to the Gods for this agreeable News. Orestes entering thither with his Soldiers, and having ordered the Guards to be seized, slew his Mother and her unhappy Lover with his own Hand, thus revenging the Death of his Father and Grandfather. They were interred without the City; not having been deemed worthy to be buried, as Pausanias remarks, in the same Place with Agamemnon, and those who had been slain with him.

Then it was, we are told, that Orestes began to be tort by the Furies, that is, the Stings of his Conscience gave him no respite. He went first to Athens, where the Areopagus expiated him from his Crime: A remarkable Event, whereof we have the Date upon the Parian Marbles, which falls on the Year 1093 or 94 before Jesus Christ, 7 or 8 Years after the taking of Troy. We are told that the Voices of the Judges being equal on either Side, Minerva in Person had given hers in favour of that unfortunate Prince; this is what we learn from Hesychius and Eschiles. But the Truth is, that a Person was as effectually acquitted by an Equality of Votes (a), as if Minerva had given hers to cast the Balance. We are further told, that Orestes in Gratitude, raised an Altar to that Goddess, under the Name of Warlike Minerva (b).

Orestes thought it not enough to be acquitted by the Judgment of the Areopagus, he went also to the Irezenians to submit to the Ceremony of Expiation; and Pausanias informs us (1), that he was obliged to lodge in a Place by himself, no body daring to receive him into his House, and all looked upon him as under a kind of Excommunication. At length he moved the

S 3 Compassion

(a) Pari judicum sententia reus absolvitur.

Hesych.

Vincit Orestes, siquidem suffragia judicata sunt Æqualia.

Eschiles.

(b) Pausanias, in Attic. calls it ἀρείας Ἀθηνᾶς Βωμός; which also carried an Allusion to the Areopagus, whose Name came from Ares, or Mars.

(1) In Corinth. c. 31.

Compassion of the Trezenians, who expiated him ; and the Author now named remarks, that a Laurel sprung from the Place where that famous Expiation was performed, because some of the Water of the Fountain Hippocrene had been spilt there. This Laurel was even to be seen in his Time, near the Place where that Prince was lodged. The Trezenians, as we learn from the same Author, shewed also in his Time the Place near Apollo's Temple, where Orestes was obliged to dwell by himself, till his Crime was entirely expiated ; and even at present, continues that Author, the Descendants of those who were delegated to that Purification, eat always in that Place on a certain Day of the Year. The same People shewed also the Stone on which the nine Judges had sat who expiated him, and which they called The sacred Stone.

The same Author, in another Place (1), tells us that Orestes, still pursued by the Furies, had stopped near Gytbeum in Laconia, where he took his Seat upon a rough Stone, which was still to be seen in his Time ; and that as that Prince had found there some Relief from his Disorder, he had called that Stone by the Name of Jupiter Cappatus, that is, Jupiter the Comforter.

After these Expiations, Orestes was re-established in his Kingdom by Demophoon King of Athens, who had lately succeeded Mnestheus, under whose Reign the Arundel Marbles (a) fix the Date of the Expiation by the Areopagus mentioned above ; which, according to Velleius Paterculus, happened seven Years after the taking of Troy ; wherein this Author agrees with Homer, who says (2) Egisthus reigned seven Years at Mycenæ after the Death of Agamemnon.

Neither the Judgment of the Areopagus, nor that of the Trezenians were able to calm Orestes's troubled Mind ;

(1) In Lacon, c. 22.

(a) The 26 Æra. Selden in his Commentary upon that Æra, is of opinion that this Sentence was passed in the thirtieth Year before the Destruction of Troy, notwithstanding the Authorities I have now quoted : Consult this Place of the Arundel Marbles.

(2) Odyss. l. 3.

Mind ; and the Furies incessantly tormenting him, he went to consult the Oracle of Apollo, from whom he learned, that in order to get rid of them he was to go to Tauris (a), and carry off the Statue of Diana, and set Iphigenia at Liberty from Thoas's Tyranny. Accordingly he went thither with Pylades ; but having been taken and clapped in Chains, he was upon the Point of being sacrificed to the Goddess, according to the Custom of the Country, as we read in Diodorus (1). It was on this Occasion appeared that generous Struggle of Friendship, whereof Cicero speaks, one of those two Friends offering his Life for the other. In the mean Time Orestes having made himself known to the Priestess his Sister, she artfully suspended the Sacrifice, giving the King to understand that these Strangers being guilty of Murder, they could not be offered in Sacrifice to the holy Gods till they had received Expiation ; that the Ceremony must be performed by Sea ; and that the Statue of Diana having also been profaned by their unhallowed Hands, required Purification. Iphigenia having gone on board her Brother's Ship, went off with him, and carried along with her the Statue of the Goddess. Some Authors will have it, that Orestes before he set out had put Thoas to Death. But whatever be in that, this Event makes one of the finest Tragedies in Euripides. There were so many different Traditions concerning this Expedition of Orestes, and particularly concerning his Return (b), that one knows not which of them to fix upon. One thing agreed to by all the Ancients is, that after Orestes had executed his Enterprize, the Furies gave over tormenting him ; that is, he reckoned his Crime sufficiently expiated, or Time had abated his Remorse. But since I have begun to speak of this Statue of Diana, I shall here set down all that the Ancients say of it.

S 4

Several

(a) This is the Taurica Chersonesus beyond the Euxine Sea.

(1) L. 4.

(b) See what has been said in the first Volume, in relation to the Gods of Cappadocia.

Several laid claim to this Statue of Diana, and 'tis not easy to determine in what Place Orestes left it ; 'tis probable that several similar ones were formed, which were consecrated and left in several Places. The Athenians gave out that he had deposited it at Brauton, upon the Confines of Attica ; but Pausanias thinks there is more Probability in what the Lacedemonians alledge, that it was brought to Sparta by that Heroe, where he actually reigned, and where the Statue of Diana was worship'd under the Name of Ortbya, because Orestes had brought it so equally poised that it inclined neither to the one Side nor the other, from the Word ὀρθος, rectus, right ; and Lygodesmos, because he had pack'd it up among some Vine-Twigs. Even human Victims were sacrificed to it until the Time of Lycurgus, who abolished that Custom, and substituted in its stead that of Flagellation, to denote that the Altar of Diana of Tauris was always stained with human Blood.

Orestes, after his Return, married Electra to his dear Pylades, by whom, according to Hellanicus, quoted by Pausanias (1), she had two Children, namely Strophius and Medon. He bethought him next of getting back Hermione, the Daughter of his Uncle Menelaus and Heien, who had been promised him a long Time ago, and whom Pyrrhus the Son of Achilles had carried off from him : Thus having learned that his Rival was gone to Delphi to appease Apollo, against whom he had used some indecent Expressions in relation to the Death of his Father, as we are told by Euripides and Trogus Pompeius (2), he set out thither directly with Pylades, and having insinuated to the People that Pyrrhus was only come there to rifle their Temple, made them fall upon him and murder him in a barbarous Manner. Pausanias adds (3): “ When Pylades “ conded Orestes in his Design to kill Pyrrhus, I pre- “ sume he did it not only out of Friendship to Orestes, “ but also in order to revenge his great Grandfather. “ For understanding this Passage we must know that “ Pylades

(1) In Corinth. (2) Justin, l. 17. Euripides. (3) In Corinth. c. 29.

“ Pylades was the Son of Strophius, the Grandson of “ Crestus, and great Grandson of Phocus the Son of “ Eacus; and that Pyrrhus was the Son of Achilles and “ Grandson of Telamon, who had slain Phocus his Bro“ ther, as I have said elsewhere.”

After the Death of Pyrrhus, Orestes married Hermione, and lived from that Time in peaceful enough Enjoyment of his Kingdom; but having gone to Arcadia, he was bit by a Serpent, and died there at the Age of ninety Years, after a Reign of seventy (1). For he was but twenty when he left Strophius's Court, and he ascended the Throne after the Death of Egisthus (a). His Son Thisamenes succeeded him, and after him Pentbilus whom he had by Erigone, the Daughter of Egistus and Clytemnestra, and consequently his Sister by the Mother. He had united to the Kingdom of Mycenæ that of Sparta, after the Death of Menelaus his Uncle and Father-in-law, the Lacedemonians having chose rather to settle the Crown upon the Husband of Hermione the Daughter of that Prince and Helen, than upon his natural Children. All these Facts happened from the Year 1250 before Christ, to the Year 1050 (b), that is in the Space of 200 Years: Then the Kingdom of Mycenæ came to a Period; for the Heraclidæ, as has been said, having entered the Peloponnesus in the Time of Pentbilus, obliged him to retire into Achaia.

Let us not forget another Adventure which we have in Hyginus (2). Electra having received the false News of the Death of Orestes and Pylades, who were given out to be sacrificed to Diana by Thoas, and this Report having spread, Aletes the Son of Ægisthus seeing none remaining of the Blood of the Atridæ, took Possession of the Crown of Mycenæ. In the mean Time Electra, in order to be better informed in a Piece of News wherein

(1) Petav. Rat. tem. l. 1.

(a) When Agamemnon went to the Trojan War, Orestes was but three Years old, thirteen when his Father was killed, and twenty when he avenged his Death.

(b) See Petav. loc. cit.

(2) Fable 122,

wherein she was so highly interested, arrived there the same Day that Orestes and Iphigenia did, and then the first News she heard was, that her Brother had been sacrificed by Iphigenia's own Hands. Transported with Rage and desperate Grief, she snatched a flaming Brand from the Altar, and with it was going to have bored out her Sister's Eyes, when by good Luck Orestes appeared; and they coming to the Knowledge of one another, returned all three to Mycenæ, where they were no sooner arrived, than Orestes slew his Cousin Aletes; and he would have served his Sister Erigone the Daughter of Egisthus and Clytemnestra, with the same Measure, had not Diana interposed by conveying her to Attica, where she became Priestess: Which doubtless means that the Compassion he had for the Age and Innocence of that Princess, determined Orestes to spare her Life, contenting himself with consecrating her to the Service of Diana.

It will not be thought foreign to the Purpose to lay together in a few Words, all the Crimes of this Family, in order to justify Horace's Expression, who calls it, The cruel Family of Pelops, Sæva Pelopis domus. Tantalus, who was the Founder of it, sacrificed his own Son Pelops to his Superstition: He again put to Death his Father-in-law Oenomaus, whose Wife Hippodamia killed herself thro' Despair. Atreus and Thyestes, the Sons of Pelops, slew their Brother Chrysippus at the Instigation of their Mother, who took this Revenge upon her Rival. Thyestes debauched his Sister-in-law, and Atreus assassinated the Children that sprung from that incestuous Embrace, served them up at Table to his Brother-in-law, made him drink their Blood, and at last sacrificed his Wife to his Fury. The same Thyestes ravished his Daughter, who killed herself with Grief. Egisthus the Son of Thyestes, to avenge his Father, put his Uncle Atreus to Death; Thyestes usurped the Crown of Argos, and banished his two Nephews. Agamemnon sacrificed, or at least delivered up as a Victim his Daughter Iphigenia, from Ambition to have the Command of an Army. Egisthus, violating the Laws of Hospitality, Hospitality, debauched from her Husband the Affections of his Sister-in-law Clytemnestra; and they two together assassinated Agamemnon and Cassandra. The same Agamemnon had put to Death his Cousin Tantalus. Orestes slew his Mother and his Cousin Egisthus, and brought about Pyrrhus's Assassination. What Dissoluteness, what Ferocity of Manners! or rather what obstinate Perverseness of Taste in every Age, to bring upon the Stage these hideous and detestable Subjects; instead of choosing out from Antiquity the Examples of Virtue, that might easily be found there!

It remains to explain, before we close this Article, the Fable of that Ram with the Golden Fleece which the Gods are said to have given to Pelops, and which was a kind of sacred Pledge that insured the Crown of Argos to his Family. Thyestes, as we learn from Seneca (1), stole it from his Brother Atreus, with the Assistance of Ærope his Sister-in-law, whom he had debauched (a). It was probably nothing else but a Scepter covered with a gilded Fleece, which from a Tradition not well examined, came to be taken for the Fleece of one of Pelops's Rams. The Kings of Tantalus's Race, always bore this Scepter, which they looked upon as a Talisman. It was even believed that Jupiter had given it to his Son Mercury, who made a Present of it to Pelops, from whom it passed to Atreus. Thyestes, by stealing it from his Brother, thought to secure the Crown to himself: Agamemnon again bore it at the Siege of Troy, as we learn from Homer in more Places than one (b). The People of Cheronea, if we may believe Pausanias,

(1) In Thyeste.

(a) See Cicero l. 3, de Nat. Deor. who cites this Verse from an ancient Poet, whom F. Delrio will have to be Attius.

*Addo huc quod mihi portento Cælestum Pater
Prodigium misit regni stabilimen mei;
Agnum inter pecudes aurea clarum coma,
Quondam Thyestem clepere ausum esse e regia,
Qua in re adjutricem conjugem cepit sibi.*

(b) See Seneca in Thyestes, where he introduces Atreus complaining that his Brother had stole this Scepter from him. See Justin, l. 34. & Homer.

Pausanias (1), had such Veneration for this Scepter afterwards, that they adored it like a Divinity.

Pausanias tells us farther (2), that this Ram was represented in Marble upon Thyestes's Tomb, in that Place of the Highway between Mycenæ and Argos which was called the Ram.

Such is the History of this celebrated Family, always more noted for the Incests and other Crimes than for the virtuous Deeds of the Heroes of it. I have unravelled it as far as I was able from the Fables that were blended with it. Thus when we read Euripides, Sophocles, Seneca, as also our Moderns, Corneille, Racine and the rest, we will know how to understand them; and consider only as Embellishments, whatever is not consonant to these Explanations I have now given.

CHAP. II.

The History of Eacus, Peleus, Achilles and Thetis.

EACUS, the Founder of this Race, was the Son of Jupiter and Egina the Daughter of Asopus, King of Beotia, who was confounded with a River, and therefore said to be the Son of the Ocean. That Prince, to avenge the Insult which Jupiter, that is a King of Arcadia (3) who bore this Name, had done to his Daughter, raised against him a powerful Army, and gave him Battle, wherein he was routed, as we learn from Theodotus (4); and because in ancient Times it was usual to intermix Fable with History, those who wrote this said, the River Asopus had with his Streams made War upon Jupiter, and that he, by transforming himself into Fire, had Thunder-struck him (a); a physical Circumstance founded upon the Situation of that River, which flows in a Country that abounds with

(1) In Beot.

(2) In Corinth.

(3) Pausan. in Arcad.

(4) In Boccace, l. i. c. 55.

(a) *Namque ferunt raptam patriis Æginan ab undis
Amplexu latuisse Jovis: furit amnis, et astris Inensus bellare parat, &c.*

Stat. Theb. l. 7.

with Sulphur (b). To this Fable another was added, importing that Jupiter, to save his Mistress from the Vengeance of her Father, who made strict Search for her, transformed her into an Island: which signifies that he concealed her in an Island of the Saronick Gulf, now Lepanta, which was some time called the Island of Egina. There was Eacus born, the most equitable Judge of his Time, which procured him a Place among the Judges of Hell, as has been said. What raised the Character of that Prince, is, that Attica being distressed with a great Drought, with which the Gods punished the perfidious Egeus, for having put to Death the young Androgeos, the Oracle was consulted, and Answer given, that the Calamity would cease so soon as the King of Egina became Intercessor for Greece. This Prince offered Sacrifices to Jupiter, under the Name of Panhellenian, in Consequence of which there fell great Showers of Rain. Pausanias (1) adds, that the Eginetes had built a Monument named Eacea, where were the Statues of all the Deputies of Greece, who came for that Purpose into their Island.

Again, to this History was added a third Fable, which 'tis necessary to explain before we go farther. The Pestilence laid waste Eacus's Dominions, who seeing most of his Subjects cut off by it, prayed Jupiter to avert that Calamity. Ovid, who gives a pompous Description of the Desolations occasioned by that Plague (2), says, Eacus saw, in a Dream, a great Swarm of Pismires come from the Bottom of an old Oak, which, as they appeared, were transformed into (b) The Asopus, according to Pausanias in Corinth. flowed in the Country of the Phliasians, a small Spot of Ground near Sicyon. It was under the Reign of Aras, that Asopus, who passed for the Son of Neptune and Ceclysa, discovered the Source of that River, which from him was called the Asopus. Here then are two Asopus's, the one a River, the other a Man who communicated his Name to the River. It was the same with the River Inachus, Marsyas, and a great many others. Thus when we read in the Mythologists and Historians, that Egina and Thebe were the Daughters of Asopus, we are to understand that their Father was King Asopus, who gave his Name to the River; and so others.

(1) In Corinth. c. 29.

(2) Met. L. 7.

to Men, and that on the next Morning, so soon as that Prince awoke, he received Advice, that his Dominions were better peopled than they had been before. This Fiction is founded merely upon the Equivocation of the Name of the Myrmidons, a People of Thessaly; the Subjects of Eacus; which resembles that of the Pismire, called in Greek Μυρμηξ. That People bearing a further Resemblance to that little Animal, in so far as instead of inhabiting Towns or Villages, they commonly kept in the open Fields, having no other Retreat, but the Dens and Cavities of Trees. Eacus drew them together, and settled them in Abodes more secure and commodious. This is the Truth of the Fable. Thus the Greeks took Advantage of the smallest Similitude to utter agreeable Fictions. Farther; the Original of that Circumstance, importing that Juno, to be avenged of her Rival, had inflicted that Calamity upon the Subjects of him whom she brought into the World, is, that this Goddess was often taken for the Air, from whose bad Qualities, Pestilence and other epidemical Distempers arise. For, to repeat it once more, it was usual to intermix Allegory even with the most historical Fables.

Eacus had by his Wife Endeis, the Daughter of Cbiron (a), two Sons, Peleus and Telamon; and by Psamathe the Daughter of Nereus, Thetis's Sister, a Son named Phocus. As the latter was playing with his two Brothers, Telamon's Coit lighted upon his Head, and slew him (1). Eacus being informed of this Accident, and hearing, at the same Time, that those young Princes had formerly had some Diffension with their Brother, or had committed that Crime at the Instigation of the jealous Endeis their Mother, he banished them from the Island Egina, condemning them to perpetual Exile. They went on board a Ship; and when they were got to a little Distance from the Shore, Telamon sent a Herald to his Father, to assure him, him, that tho' he had killed Phocus, it was accidentally; and by no Means thro' premediated Design; but Eacus sent him a Return, that he was never to set his Foot again in his Island, and that if he had a Mind to justify himself, he might plead his Cause from his Ship, or from an Eminence on the Sea-shore. Telamon entered the following Night into the Port called Secret, and there having of Earth made a kind of Hillock, which was still subsisting in the Time of Pausanias, he spoke in his own Defence; but having lost his Cause, and Eacus being but too well justified in his Suspicions, he set sail for Salamis. This Manner of Self-defence, by taking that Precaution, was in Use in the heroic Times, and the same Author from whom I have borrowed this Relation, informs us that the Athenians had such another Court: The Judges sat upon the Sea-shore, while the Pannel, who appeared in his own Defence, was in a Ship, ready to go off if he was condemned.

(a) According to Pausanias, the Scholiast on Pindar and Apollodorus.

(1) Diod. l. 4.

Peleus sought a Retreat at Pthia in Thessaly with Eurytion the Son of Aetor, who after having expiated him, gave him his Daughter Antigone in Marriage, and the third Part of his Kingdom. The Issue of this Marriage was a Daughter named Polydora, who married Borus the Son of Perieres, to whom was born Mnestheus, the same who expelled Theseus from Athens, and reigned in his Stead. Peleus, being invited to the Hunting of Calydon, went thither with his Father-in-law, whom he unluckily slew as he was darting his Javelin at the Boar. By this Murder, tho' involuntary, being forced to abandon Pthia, he repaired to Iolchos to Acastus, who gave him Expiation. But a new Adventure happened which disturbed his Quiet at that Court. Astidamia, the Wife of Acastus, falling in Love with him, but finding him insensible, accused him of an Attempt to debauch her. Acastus, that he might not violate the Laws of Hospitality by putting him to Death himself, ordered his Officers to lead him to the Chace on Mount Pelion, and there bind him fast, hide his Sword, and then leave him thus exposed to the Mercy of the wild Beasts: As if this Manner of putting putting him to Death had been less against the Laws of Hospitality, than if he had condemned him to die himself. Peleus, thus abandoned, found a Way to break his Chains, and having gathered some of his Friends, among others Jason, Castor, and Pollux, went to Iolchos, and having forced his Way into the Palace of Acastus, slew Astidamia (1).

As he had saved himself against all Probability from so evident a Danger, it was fabled that Jupiter his Grandfather had made Pluto loose him, and give him the Sword with which he took Vengeance of that cruel Woman. In this Manner, to mention it by the Way, did that Prince, a Native of Egina, become Master of Part of Thessaly.

After the Death of his first Wife, Peleus married Thetis, the Sister of Lycomedes King of Scyros, by whom he had several Children, who all died under Age, but Achilles, whom we shall speak of immediately.

I have observed, that upon Occasion of this Marriage, all the Gods had disputed with him that Conquest; I shall add here, that Thetis was prevailed upon, with much ado, to marry a mere Mortal, after having been beloved by Jupiter himself, and that she had Recourse to several Stratagems to break off the Match; which is signified to us under a Fiction, setting forth, that in order to evade it, she had transformed herself into various Shapes; but that by Chiron's Advice, Peleus had bound her with Chains; which, no doubt, means that this wise Centaur removed all the Obstacles that Thetis raised against that Match, and brought her, at last, to consent to it.

None of the Sons of Eacus resided in Egina. Peleus, after having wandered a long Time thro' different Countries, settled in Thessaly (a), whence he sent his Son and Grandson, with the Myrmidons, to the Trojan War, and out-lived the Destruction of that City several

(1) Apollod. l. 9.

(a) I have observed, in its own Place, that he was one of the most celebrated Argonauts; and as he survived the taking of Troy, this is a new Proof of the Proximity of those two Events.

ral Years. The Children of Phocus came and lived in that Country, which is about the Parnassus, and at this Day called Phocis: “ I am, however, of Opini“ on; says Pausanias (1), that Phocis went by that “ Name a Generation sooner, and that it derived it “ from Phocus the Son of Ornytion, who had settled in “ that Country. ’Tis very probable, continues the “ same Author, that under the Reign of the first Pho- “ cus, the Name of Phocis was only given to the “ Country nearest to Titborea and the Parnassus, and “ that afterwards the other Phocus, the Son of Eacus, “ coming to reign there, gave the same Name to all “ the circumjacent Places: Thus under the Name of “ Minyans are comprehended not only the People that “ border upon the Orchomenians, but those also who “ lie towards Scarpbea, a Town of the Locrians.”

Peleus was the Original of the Kings of Epirus, where Neoptolemus, or Pyrrhus his Grandson, reigned, upon his Return from Troy, as shall be said in his History.

Pausanias, from whom I have taken this Narrative, informs us (2), with respect to the Posterity of Telamon, that Ajax having led a private Life, none of his Descendants were very illustrious, except Miltiades, under whose Conduct the Athenians gained the Victory at Marathon, and Cimon his Son. But that Author had forgot, in this Passage, what he had said in his Atticks (3), that the same Telamon acquired the Kingdom of Megara, which he gave to his Son Ajax; and consequently ’tis certain that he did not always lead a private Life.

The Posterity of Teucer, continues the same Pausanias, maintained themselves upon the Throne of the Cypriots until Evagoras. As for Phocus, the Poet Asius gives him two Sons, Panopeus and Chrysus; to Panopeus was born Epeus, who framed the wooden Horse which the Greeks made use of in taking Troy. Chrysus

VOL. IV.

T

was

(1) In Corinth. (2) Ibid. (3) Ch. 42.

was the Father of Strophius, and the Grandfather of Pylades, whose Mother, the Sister of Agamemnon, was called Anaxibia. These were the Three Branches of the Æacide, who having all come from one Stock, went and settled in different Places.

Achilles. Achilles was the Son of Peleus King of Thes-saly, and of Thetis. We are told that this God-deſs to prove whether her Children were mortal, put them into a Caldron of boiling Water, or threw them into the Fire; whereby ſome of them perished: And Achilles would have had the ſame Fate, if Peleus had not ſeaſonably come up to his Deliverance, by which Means he had only one of his Heels burnt. This Fi-ction has doubtleſs no other Foundation but ſome Ce-remony of Purification which Thetis was wont to make uſe of. This Fable gave a Handle to ſay afterwards, that Thetis had dipp'd her Son in the Water of Styx, and had thereby made him invulnerable, all but the Heel; tho' we may alſo ſuppoſe that the Courage and Valour of that young Prince, and the Goodneſs of his Armour gave riſe to the Fable, which is not to be taken literally, ſince Homer (1) informs us, that he had been wounded at the Siege of Troy by Hector.

The Fable which I have been explaining, gave riſe to the firſt Name of Achilles, who was at firſt called Pyrrhifous, as much as to ſay, Saved from the Fire (a); and it was Chiron his Governour gave him the Name of Achilles, of whom many other Fables were publiſhed; ſuch as that he had been nurſed with the Marrow of a Lion, as we learn from Statius (b), becauſe his Name may

(1) Odyſſ. l. 11. See Euſtatius upon this Place.

(a) Statius, Achil. l. 2. Libanius, Orat. contra Achillem. Apol-lodorus, l. 4. of the Argonauts.

(b) *Non ullas ex more dapes habuiſſe, nec ullis
Uberibus ſatiaſſe famem, ſed ſciſſa leonum
Viſcera, ſemianimesque libens traxiſſe medullas.* Stat. l. 11. v. 381.
Girac however ſaid no Author had made mention of this, relying upon a Word in Plutarch ill tranſlated by Amiot, where he ſays that Philius brought up his Son, as Chiron had done Achilles with Meat not bloody; it ought to have been rendered contrary to Chiron's Method, as Miziriac has very well obſerved. See may signify that he had never been suckled; but all these Fictions are founded only upon the poor Etymology of that Prince's Name; perhaps too he was said to be nursed with a Lion's Marrow, only because in his tender Youth, he attacked in the Chace, an Exercise which he loved, Bears, Boars, and Lions without Distinction, as we learn from the same Statius (a).

Chiron gave Achilles a good Education, and taught him, besides all the Exercises suitable to a young Prince, Medicine and Music.

When Thetis was informed that all the Nobility of Greece were assembled to go to the Siege of Troy, she sent him incognito to Lycomedes her Brother, to evade the Accomplishment of some Oracles, which had foretold that this War would prove fatal to him. That he might be the better concealed, he disguised himself like a Girl, and took the Name of Pyrrha, from his red Hair (1): Then it was he captivated the Heart of Deidamia the Daughter of Lycomedes, by whom he had a Son named Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus. In the mean Time, as one of the Fatalities of Troy bore that that City could not be taken without the Presence of Achilles, search was made for him every where, and Ulysses having learned that he was at Scyros, made use of a Stratagem to find him out, which succeeded. Among several Trinkets he mixed small Arms (2); which Achilles had no sooner seen, than he grasp'd the Arms; and by this Means having discovered himself, he was obliged to march with the rest.

This History is very exactly represented in the fine Statues which Cardinal Polignac brought from Rome in his last Journey. I am persuaded however that this Adventure is of a much later Invention than to have been known in Homer's Time. That Poet even demon-

T 2

lishes

See Colomier's Bibl. Choisie, and Bayle, who has copied him in his Dictionary.

(a) - - - *Invitas turbare cubilibus ursas,
Eulmineasque fues, & sicubi maxima tigris.
Aut seducta jugis fætæ spelunca Leænæ.*

Stat. l. 4. v. 404.

(1) Hygin. Fab (2) Ovid. Met. l. 13.

lives it, when he tells us, that Nestor and Ulysses having gone to the Courts of Peleus and Ménætiüs, they brought along with them Achilles and Patroclus, whom these two Princes frankly gave up to them.

I have often taken Notice of Homer's Silence as to certain fabulous Traditions ; which proves them to be more modern than the Poems of that great Poet, who would not have failed to employ them to give an Air of the Marvellous to his Narration : But we must return to Achilles.

This young Heroe performed many noble Atchievements during the Siege of Troy, took several Towns in Alliance with the Trojans, as we read in Homer, and Strabo (1), who names them all after the Greek Poet ; but having quarrelled with Agamemnon, he kept his Tent without fighting for near a Year, and quitted it at last to revenge the Death of Patroclus his Friend, slain by Hector under his Arms. As he was stern, brutal, and outrageous, after having taken away the Life of his Enemy, he offered a thousand Indignities to his Body (2), and sold it at last to Priam his Father. Having afterwards seen Polyxena during some Truce, he fell in Love with her, and asked her in Marriage. Dithys informs us, that Achilles found Polyxena in the Temple of Apollo, serving Cassandra at a Sacrifice, and that having fallen in Love with her, he asked her from Hector ; whose Answer was, That if he would abandon the Side of the Greeks, and betray the Army, he would give her to him in Marriage ; which highly provoked Achilles ; he adds, that when Priam went to redemand the Body of his Son, he took that Princess with him, to move the Heart of his Enemy, which had the desired Success, and at the same time proved the Cause of that young Heroe's Death ; for Priam having observed that he was still very much in love with his Daughter, purposed to invite him into the Temple of Apollo under pretext of giving him his Daughter in Marriage, where, in the time that Deiphobus was embracing him, Paris killed him. The Greeks suspected suspected him of plotting with the Trojans, and so little did they regret the Death of this great Man, that Ajax was obliged to take care of his Funerals, and to employ some Persons from Troas to erect a Tomb to him upon the Promontory of Sigeum (1).

(1) L. 14. (2) Homer's Iliad, l. 24.

Dares of Phrygia gives much the same Account. He only adds, that this Prince defended himself a long Time, and sold his Life dear. Paris wounded him in the Heel, the only Place wherein he was vulnerable; which may be explained, without receding from Tradition, by saying that he actually wounded him in that Place (2), and it was given out that Apollo had directed the Blow; as if actually a God had been necessary to take away that Heroe's Life, and a Mortal could not pretend to the Power of killing him, as we are told by Sophocles in his Tragedy of Philoctetes; but without having recourse to these supernatural Circumstances, which were only invented to make the Death of that Heroe more signal; the Blow which Paris gave him, cut the Tendon of the Heel, the Wound whereof is mortal, unless there be able Hands to take particular Care of it; and to confirm what I here advance, that Tendon has since gone under the Name of Achilles's Tendon.

Tho' this Tradition concerning the Death of Achilles be commonly received, I will not however dissemble that Homer (3) plainly enough insinuates, that this Heroe died as he was fighting for his Country; that the Greeks fought a bloody Battle about his Body, which lasted a whole Day; he adds, that tho' wounded, he avenged his Death upon all those who came in his Way, and that before he expired he slew Oritheus, Hipponous, Alcibous, which put the Trojans into such Consternation that they all fled.

After his Death Ajax and Ulysses carried off his Body, and brought it into the Camp. This is what we see represented, tho' in a coarse Manner, upon the Iliac Table.

T 3

Achilles

(1) Dictys, l. 3. & 4. - (2) Hygin. Fab. 107. (3) Odyss. l. 24.

Achilles was honoured as a Demi-God in an Island of the Euxine-Sea, named at first Leuce, and afterwards Acbillæa (1), where he is said to have wrought a great many Miracles. We are farther told that he married there either Iphigenia, or according to others, Helen; and we have a thousand other Fables to this Purpose, founded upon the Relations of the Priests who imposed upon credulous Travellers. The Ancients have made this Island a kind of Elysian Fields, where the Souls of several Heroes had their Residence.

After the Death of Achilles, his Son Pyrrhus was brought to the Siege of Troy, tho' then but very young (a), and he distinguished himself there especially on the Day that the City was taken. It was he, according to Virgil, that slew Priam, and threw down the young Astyanax, Hector's Son, from a Tower; and as Polyxena had been the Cause of his Father's Death, he sacrificed her at his Tomb. The Misfortunes of this Princess were the Subject of two fine Pictures which Pausanias had seen, the one at Athens, the other at Pergamus upon the Caicus (2).

Pyrrhus after his Return from this Expedition married Hermione the Daughter of Helen, tho' already betrothed to Orestes (b), which cost him his Life; for that

(1) Pausan. l. 3. Plin. l. 4.

(a) If he was born when his Father was at Lycomedes's Court, that is when the Trojan War began to be spoke of, he might then have been eighteen or twenty Years old. The Passage I have taken from Homer, which makes Helen to have resided twenty Years at Troy, from whence it may be concluded, that ten Years were spent in making Preparations for that Expedition, removes many Difficulties as to the Age of Achilles, and that of his Son, which would otherwise be unanswerable.

Pausanias, in his Phocica, observes that in Homer the Son of Achilles is always named Neoptolemus, and that it is the Author of the Cypriacks who says Lycomedes named him Pyrrhus; it was Phœnix gave him the Name of Neoptolemus, because Achilles his Father was very young when he went to the War.

(2) Pausan. in Phoc.

(b) Hermione stung with Jealousy that Pyrrhus should have preferred Andromache to her, gave Orestes secret Information of the Absence of her Husband, and probably concerted with him to cut him off.

that Prince, as has been said, made him be assassinated at Delpbi, either by a Priest named Machareus, or by the Populace; as to which Virgil seems guilty of two Errors in speaking of this Death (1), one, in making Pyrrhus to be slain by Orestes instigated by the Furies, tho' all are agreed that he was delivered from them upon his Return from Tauris; the other in saying that he slew him before the Altar of Apollo his Father, tho' 'tis certain Achilles claimed that God neither for his Father, nor for one of his Progenitors (a); but it may be answered in Vindication of Virgil, as to the first Article, that Poets give themselves no trouble about the Chronology, nor the Circumstances of Time, and that they accommodate the Events of their Heroe's Life, so as to represent them at such and such a Time, what they were in any particular known Period of their Life; thus we may say Virgil is not blameable for not being too scrupulously attached to the Circumstances of Time, and that it was enough for him, that Orestes had been long acted by the Furies, to justify his representing him as furious on a very proper Occasion, when he was to cut his Rival's Throat in the midst of a Temple (b).

As to the second Article, we may suppose that Virgil when he says Orestes slew Pyrrhus, ad patrias aras, means at the Altars of the same God in whose Temple his Father had been slain, tho' he might have expressed his Sentiment better. The ingenious Translator of the Eneid (2) has very well expressed the Meaning of the Latin Poet in these four Verses:

T 4

Pyrrhus

(1) Eneid. l. 3.

(a) *Ast illum creptæ magno inflammatus amore
Conjugis, & scelerum furiis agitatus Orestes Accipit incautum, patriasque obtruncat ad aras.*

See Meziriac upon the Epistle of Hermione who censures Virg! for these Faults.

(b) Racine has imitated Virgil, and represents Orestes under the Influence of the Furies after the Death of Pyrrhus. Trag. of Andromache.

(2) M. de Segrais.

*Pyrrhus en fut epris ; mais le rival epoux,
Seisi de ses fraveurs & d'un transport jaloux,
Le surprend, & l'immole a sa juste colere,
Aux Autels ou Paris sacrifice son pere.*

Pyrrhus was smitten with Hermione's Charms, but his Rival Orestes, transported with Jealousy, and toss'd by the Furies, surprized that Prince in an unguarded Hour, and sacrificed him at the Altar where his Father Achilles fell before.

I must not forget to take Notice, that Pyrrhus during his Absence having lost his Father's Kingdom, which was Thessaly, or at least a good Part of that Country, retired to Epirus (1), conquered a great Part of it, and there fixed the Seat of his Empire. His Descendants reigned there after him, the Country itself was called Pyrrhis, and afterwards Epirotis.

Pindar says that Prince reigned not long among the Molossi, but that his Posterity settled there for ever ; which Thetis, in Euripides's Tragedy of Andromache, foretels him. Molossia was a Part of Epirus ; the Scholiast however remarks that this Poet mentions Molossia only by way of Anticipation, since it only got this Name from the Son whom that Prince had by Andromache.

Some of the Ancients tell us that Helenus, Priam's Son, had told him to settle in the Place where he should find Houses whose Foundations were of Wood, the Buildings also of Wood, and the Roofs of Feathers ; and that he having observed in his Way, Spears fixed in the Ground, whereon were the Cloaths of some Soldiers ; he wanted no more to persuade him that this was the Place prescribed to him, and that the Oracle was fulfilled.

Homer, who is of greater Credit and Antiquity, follows another Tradition, when speaking of Neoptolemus's Marriage, on occasion of Telemachus's coming to the Court of Menelaus, he says, that Prince had given him his Daughter ; and by this Expression he supposed that that he reigned then at Phthia, the Capital of the Kingdom of his Father and Grandfather; but he might very well have reigned over both Kingdoms; over the one by Inheritance, and over the other by Conquest.

(1) Justin. l. 17

C H A P. III.

The History of the two Ajaxes.

AMONG the more famous Captains of the Greeks, were also the two Ajaxes; the one the Son of Oileus, the other of Telamon and Hesione: The former, who was very powerful, equipped forty Ships (1), which he led to the Siege of Troy. He was a brave and intrepid Prince, stern and ferocious. The Insult he offered to Cassandra turned the Hearts of Gods and Men against him. Ulysses, according to the Testimony of Pausanias (2), was for his being stoned, and it would have been done, had he not offered to clear himself by Oath (3). He even insinuated that Agamemnon had propagated that evil Report, only that he himself might ravish Cassandra, with whom he was actually in Love. Ajax suffered Shipwreck in his Return with a Part of the Greeks, near the Cheredin Rocks, about the Island of Eubœa; Nauplius, who was the King thereof, having kindled a Light in the Night-time with a View to decoy the Grecian Fleet among the Rocks, wherein he succeeded; and thus he avenged the Death of his Father Palamedes, whom Ulysses and the other Grecian Captains had put to Death: The Poets have done him the Honour to justify him, by ascribing that Event to the Wrath of Minerva, who thus avenged the Profanation of her Temple. On this Occasion several other Fables have been delivered. It was given out, that Ajax having escaped Shipwreck, had rested himself upon a Rock which Neptune had clove with a Blow of his Trident; and that the Portion which he sat down upon had fallen into the Sea with him. Others say he was Thunder-struck struck by Minerva herself (a). Lastly (1), some Ancients assert, that after the Storm, having sat down upon a Rock, as he was insulting the Gods by a thousand Blasphemies, Minerva implored Neptune's Aid, who buried him under the Fall of the same Rock. Lycrophon (2) seems to intimate, that his Body carried by the Waves into Delos, was there interred by Tetbys's Means; another Fable; as likewise what we read in some Authors that this Heroe had three Hands, which Servius (3) explains to denote his great Agility, in moving his Hands with so much Address, that he seemed to have three.

(1) Homer. Iliad. l. 2. (2) L. 10. (3) Idem. ib.

Tho' Homer, Virgil, Horace, Seneca, and several other Ancients have said that Ajax was punished in the Manner now mentioned, yet Timeus, who was of the same Country with this Heroe, asserts in his History, that he perished not in the Shipwreck I have been speaking of, but that he returned into his own Dominions. This Author, no doubt, deserves more Credit than the Poets, who have foisted into the Account of his Death the Wrath of Minerva, and other Circumstances of Admiration. The Locrians represented Ajax upon their Medals, as may be seen in Goltzius.

Some time after his Death, the Pestilence laid waste his Kingdom; upon which the Oracle, being consulted, made answer that in order to appease the Wrath of the Goddess provoked by the Impiety of the King, they were to send every Year into the Temple she had at Troy, two young Virgins to serve her as Priestesses; which they punctually obeyed: so much did Religion, and particularly Faith in Oracles, bear Sway at that Time over the Minds of Men: a new Proof at the same Time, that Troy was not entirely demolished by the Greeks, but that it still subsisted, tho' in less Lustre and Glory than before, as we learn from Plutarch and S. Jerom after him. The Conduct of the Trojans towards these young Priestesses, might well have excused

(a) Illum expirantem transfixo pectore flammæ,

Turbine corripuit, scopuloque affixit acuto.

Virg.

(1) Quint Calaber, l. 14. Seneca. (2) In his Cassand. v. 400.

(3) In 1. Æneid.

ed the Locrians from a Compliance, yet they continued faithful to the Decision of the Oracle. The Trojans, at least in the earlier times, concealed themselves in the Way that those unfortunate Victims of their Goddess were to take, and after having assassinated them, burnt their Bodies, and threw their Ashes into the Sea. There were some of them however who by taking By-Paths arrived at the Temple, where they found a secure Sanctuary against the Cruelty of their Enemies. This Custom, which commenced three Years before the taking of Troy, lasted till the Year of Rome 564. that is, upwards of a Thousand Years (1).

The Locrians of Opus, of whom Ajax was King, had so high an Opinion of his Valour, that even after his Death they left in their Line of Battle a Place vacant, as if this Prince had been to fill it up (2). In the Battle they sustained against the Crotoniates, Autoleon seeing in the Enemy's Army a Place empty, made his Attack there; but he was wounded by a Specter; and the Wound not being like to heal, the Oracle he consulted made Answer, that the only Remedy remaining for him, was to appease Ajax's Manes. Autoleon went for that Effect into the Island Leucé, where among the Shades of several other Heroes of Antiquity, he saw that of Ajax, whom he appeased, and was instantly cured (a).

The History of Ajax, the Son of Telamon.

Ajax the Son of Telamon, was the most valiant of the Greeks next to Achilles (3): he was like him, stern, brutal and outrageous; Sophocles represents him as an Atheist, who, when his Father exhorted him to depend upon the Gods for Victory, replied the most arrant Cowards may be victorious with such Assistance; but that for his Part he was sure of Victory without it. This Prince performed a thousand signal Exploits at the Siege of Troy, as may be seen in Homer. The Dispute he had with Ulysses about the Arms of Achilles (4) proved fatal to

(1) Plutarch de sera Num. vindicta. (2) Conon Narr. 17.

(a) See what has been said of this Island in the History of Achilles.

(3) Iliad L. 2. (4) Homer, Odyss. 1. 13.

to him. The Preference given to his Competitor having turned him delirious, he fell upon some Flocks, thinking to have slain his Enemies; and finding his Mistake, killed himself in the Anguish of his Soul, in the last Year of the Siege of Troy (1). But I should have noticed that in this, as in every other Article, we find great Diversity of Opinions among the Ancients. For Suidas, after Diëtys, says these two Heroes disputed not for the Arms of Achilles, but for the Palladium. These Authors add that Agamemnon having adjudged it to Ulysses, Ajax vowed Revenge; and that Agamemnon, in Concert with the other Captains who were afraid of him, assassinated him in his Tent; that Ulysses, who was suspected for being the Author, was obliged to set out incognito, and the Army retained a high Resentment against Agamemnon.

Homer (2) makes Demodocus sing at the Feast which Alcinous gives Ulysses, the Dispute between Ajax and Ulysses, who came to high Words; which gave great Joy to Agamemnon, because it accomplished an Oracle he had received at Pytho (a), where he had consulted the Oracle of Apollo. But that Poet is not explicit as to the Ground of the Dispute. Didymus and Eustatbius, who have transmitted to us the Tradition concerning it, assure us that the Question was, whether Troy should be taken by open Force or by Stratagem (b). Be that as it will, Calchas, who was consulted to determine whether they should burn the Body of Ajax, decided that as he had died like an Atheist, he had no Title to the Honours of a funeral Pile, but ought only to be interred, as we learn from Sophocles, and the young

(1) Homer Loc. cit. Sophoc. Ovid. &c. (2) Odyss. l. 8.

(a) This Oracle was that of Delphi, which had revealed to Agamemnon that Troy would be taken when Ulysses and Ajax fell out in their Opinions, at a Feast upon a Sacrifice.

(b) Homer Odyss. l. 11. says, it was Thetis, the Mother of Achilles, that proposed the Dispute for her Son's Arms. The Grecian Captains being greatly at a Loss what Judgment to pronounce, brought before them some Trojan Prisoners, interrogated them which of the two Competitors had done them most Mischief, and they having answered Ulysses, the Arms were adjudged to him.

young Philostratus (1). Quintus Smyrneus however says his Body was burnt; Strabo (2), and other Ancients mention his Tomb, which was near the Promontory of Rhæteum.

Whatever be in that, the Greeks raised a stately Monument to him upon the same Promontory; and when Horace says (3) this Heroe remained without Burial, he deviates from the Truth, in Allusion to that incident in the Tragedy of Ajax, where Sophocles feigns that Agamemnon was unwilling to allow the Honours of Burial to be conferred upon him, but that he yielded at length to the importunate Instances of Teucer.

To proceed, there is a Mixture of Fables in this History: One is that Ajax was invulnerable, the Foundation whereof we find in Apollodorus. Telamon complaining that he had no Children, Hercules his Friend prayed Jupiter to give him a Son with a Skin as hard as that of the Lion of Nemæa, which Iris had made invulnerable (4). Farther, that Ajax being born, was covered by that Heroe with the Skin of that Lion (5), whereby he became invulnerable, except in the Place that was under the Hole of the Skin, made by the Wound Hercules had given that Lion (a).

However odd this Fiction is, I believe it may be explained by saying that perhaps Hercules, who was Telamon's Friend, having seen Ajax in his Youth, put upon him the Lion's Skin which he wore, as a Prefage of his future Valour.

The second Fable is united to the first; for we are told that Ajax had this Name (6) because Hercules, while he was offering Sacrifices to the Gods to solícite them to give Telamon a Son, and observing the Auguries, he saw an Eagle, which he reckoned a Prefage of his Birth; and perhaps the bare Resemblance of Names gave rise to this Fable.

The third is that Ajax was transformed into a Flower, after his Death (7). Ovid says the two first Letters of his Name, as also the Complaints of Hyacinthus, ai, were

(1) In Heroic. (2) L. 13. (3) Sat. 1. 2. (4) Apollod. l. 3. Pind. Isth. Od. 6. (5) The Scholiast upon Sophoc. in Ajac. Suidas, &c.

(a) Some Authors say it was in the Neck, others in the Side.

(6) In Greek Αἴας. (7) Ovid. loc. cit.

were marked upon this Flower. This Fable has seemingly no other Foundation, but the Flattery of some Wit, who invented this Circumstance in the Funeral Oration on that Heroe.

The fourth is, that the Soul of this Prince, after Death, had passed into the Body of a Lion: a Fable founded upon the high Idea of Ajax's Valour, and the Reveries of the Metempsychosis.

The fifth is, that Ulysses having been shipwreck'd, and lost the Arms of Achilles, the Waves conveyed them near to Ajax's Tomb, as may be seen in a Fragment of Ptolomy Ephestion, preserved by Photius (1); upon which the Greek Poets have moralized. Probably this Fable has no other Foundation, but that Ulysses in some Storm, promised to send his Army to the Tomb of Ajax, in order to appease his offended Manes. We find in Patin and in Spon, a Medal of the Prussians, whereon Ajax is represented naked; and plunging his Sword into his Bosom.

C H A P. IV.

The History of Diomedes.

DIOMEDES, the Son of Tydeus, and Grandson of Oeneus King of Calydon, is one of the Heroes of the Iliad, whose Exploits Homer seems to recount with the greatest Complacency. Being settled after the Death of his Father at Argos, where he had great Influence, and being of the Blood Royal, tho' he had never reigned, he was chosen, with Mecystheus his Relation, to conduct the Argives to the Siege of Troy (2), where he signalized himself by a thousand glorious Achievements. Homer represents him sometimes fighting with Hector and Eneas, whom he drives before him so furiously, that Venus is obliged to cover her Son with a Cloud, thereby to screen him from certain Death; sometimes encountering Venus herself, whom he wounds in the Hand. Again, it was he that entered by Night with with Ulysses into Troy, where having penetrated into the very Citadel, he stole away the Palladium, on the Preservation of which that City depended (1): Accordingly we have in Beger (2) and Spanheim (3), a Medal whereon that Prince, sitting naked, according to the Manner in which Pliny tells us (4) the ancient Heroes were figured, holds in his Right-hand this Statue of Minerva, as the most remarkable of his Trophies. He also went, as is commonly believed, into the Island of Lemnos, whence not being able to force Philoctetes, he carried off from him Hercules's Arrows; and it was with these Arrows in his Hand that he was represented in a Statue he had at Athens (5); tho' Ovid tells the Story differently, as shall be said in the History of Ulysses; and Sophocles, in his Tragedy of Philoctetes, one of the finest Antiquity has left us, makes Ulysses be accompany'd only by the young Pyrrhus, the Son of Achilles.

(1) Ptol. Ephest. apud Photium. (2) Homer l. 1. & l. 5.

At his Return from the Siege of Troy, where he highly signalized himself, he lost his Course in a dark Night, and landed at Phalera in Attica (6). The Argives whom he had with him, imagining they were in hostile Ground, began to pillage the Country; when Demophoon, who had lost all Knowledge of them, run up and slew several of those Argives, and carried off from them the Palladium. This Incident, which could be ascribed to nothing but the Mischance of not knowing one another, had no other bad Consequences.

Diomedes, being at Corinth, built a Temple to Minerva, under the Name of Minerva with the fine Eyes; and she was so called (7), in Commemoration of her having opened the Eyes of this Heroe before Troy, and dissipated the Darknefs in which he was involved. He also built another in Honour of Apollo (8), surnamed Epibaterius, because that God had saved him from the Storm, with which the Greeks were overtaken in their Return from Troy.

So

(1) Virgil, Ovid, Silius Italicus. (2) Treasure of Brandebourg, Tom. 1. (3) Add. ad Callim. (4) L. 34. c. 5. (5) Pausan. in Attic. (6) Pausan. Ibid. (7) Pausan. in Corinth. (8) Idem ibid.

So soon as he was arrived at Argos, his Grandfather Oeneus, expelled his Kingdom by the Sons of Agrius, applied to him for Assistance. He forthwith led an Army to Calydonia, and revenged the Injustice done to that Prince ; but after this Piece of Service, he declared to him, that he could not stay in Etolia, and advised him to return with him to Argos. Oeneus having accepted this Proposal, Diomedes put all possible Honour upon him as his Grandfather by the Father's Side ; and to perpetuate his Memory, called the Place where that Prince ended his Days, Oenoë.

While he was at the Siege of Troy, his Wife fell in Love with a young Man named Cyllabarus ; and there were not wanting Flatterers who said it was Venus had disposed him to gratify the Desire of his Lover, that she might be revenged of Diomedes for wounding her in the Hand. This Intrigue having made a great Noise, and Cyllabarus being a Person of considerable Interest, Diomedes grew sick of Argos, and went in Quest of a Settlement in that Part of Italy, since known by the Name of Great Greece ; where having married the Daughter of Damnus, he built in Japygia (a) the Town of Argos-Hippion, now Arpi. Turnus being then at War with Eneas, sent to him for Assistance, which he refused to grant (1) ; for at Bottom Eneas was no Enemy to the Greeks, as shall be said in his History. Accordingly, Pausanias positively asserts, that Diomedes never made War upon the Trojan Prince. Ovid (2), who gives the History of the Embassy that Turnus sent him, says Diomedes excused himself by reason of the few Troops he had, because his Companions, during his Voyage, having insulted Venus, were transformed by that Goddess into Fowls, that took Flight into a neighbouring Island. The Fact is, that Diomedes being dead, his Companions finding themselves not the strongest Party in their new City, retired secretly into a little Island ; and, it being full of Fowls, hence the Fable that it was the Argives themselves had assumed

(a) This is what we call at this Day Apulia.

(1) Ovid. Met. l. 13. (2) Loc. cit.

sumed their Figure. The Learned have given themselves the Trouble to enquire what Fowls these were, and one of them has composed a Dissertation, intitl'd, de ave Diomedæa. Solinus and Pliny, who make frequent mention of these Fowls, assure us that they caress'd the Greeks who arriv'd in that Island, and Ovid says they resembled Swans.

C H A P. V.

The History of Ulysses.

ULYSSES, King of two small Islands in the Ionian Sea, called Ithaca and Dulichium, was the Son of Laertes and Anticlea the Daughter of Autolycus: Hyginus (1), and after him Tzetzes, are of Opinion, as has been said elsewhere (a); that Anticlea was already with Child of Ulysses when Laertes married her; which Ajax throws up to him in the Diffension he had with him (2). Ulysses is known to have been a Prince of great Eloquence, sly, subtle, and artful; and to have contributed full as much by his Wiles to the taking of Troy, as Ajax and Diomedes did by their Valour. 'Tis also known, that in order to be exempted from going to the Siege of Troy; and that he might not forsake Penelope; whom he had but lately married; he feigned himself mad, and that Palamedes having discovered his Madness to be only counterfeited, he engaged him to join the other Captains; which afterwards cost him his Life. Antiquity is divided as to the Manner in which Ulysses put to Death that Prince, one of the most accomplished of his Time. Ovid says (3); that having hid some Money in Palamedes's Tent; he gave out, that he had received it as a Bribe from the Trojans, and so got him condemned by a Council of War to be stoned. Pausanias (4), on the contrary, asserts, that he had read in the Cypriacks, that Palamedes having gone

VOL. IV

U

(1) Fab 267.

(a) See the History of Sisyphus, Vol. II. B. IV.

(2) Ovid. Met. l. 13. (3) Ibid. (4) In Phœnicis.

gone a Fishing to the Sea Coast, Ulysses and Diomedes pushed him into the Water, where he was drowned.

As Ulysses was known to be no less eloquent than cunning and crafty, the Leaders of the Army prevailed upon him, before they embarked, to go in Quest of Achilles to the Island of Scyros, where he found him out in spite of his Disguise, and brought him with him to the Grecian Camp, as has been said in the History of that Heroe. He was deputed also towards the End of the Siege of Troy, to go to Lemnos, in Quest of Philoctetes, who had Hercules's Arrows; he carried off the Palladium with Diomedes, slew Rhesus, and took his Horses, and performed several other remarkable Actions, more from a Spirit of Revenge that animated him, and by his Wiles, than from true Valour and Prowess. 'Tis also well known, that in his Return he had several Adventures, which are the Subject of Homer's Odyssey (a). We shall endeavour to explain such Actions of this Heroe as contain historical Truths.

After that Telamon, in revenge of the Death of his Son Ajax, had defeated his Fleet, he took ship in a Phenician Vessel, with which he arrived in Sicily. Homer, and after him Ovid, tells us, that upon his Arrival in that Island, where the Cyclops then were, Polyphemus devoured six of his Soldiers: They add, that Ulysses bored out his Eye with a burning Brand, and lodging himself, with his Companions, under the Bellies of some of his Sheep, happily escaped from the Cave of that terrible Cyclop.

In order to explain this Fable, we must know, that Thucydides says, the Cyclops were the most ancient Inhabitants of Sicily (b), that their Original was not known, and none could give Account what had become of them. They were reckoned the Natives of the Country, tho' 'tis very probable they were Strangers, and that 'tis for

(a) Consult Strabo, l. 1. Polybius, & Seneca, Ep. 88.

(b) Cluverius, in his Description of Sicily, Chap. 2. proves all Authors to be agreed, that the Cyclops inhabited Sicily; and he says, Homer is the only one who makes them to have inhabited the Continent. See that Chapter, as also Turnebus, l. 24. adv. Ch. 10.

for this Reason Homer says (1) they were the Sons of Neptune, a Name given to those who came by Sea to people any Island. This is the Opinion of Bochart (2), who thinks they entered thither about an Age after Phaleg; which made them be looked upon as Natives of the Island, especially by the Phenicians, who did not settle there till many Ages after. If we may believe Justin (3), the Cyclops were in Possession of that Island till the Reign of Cocalus; that is, until the Time of Minos II. and Theseus. They inhabited towards the West of the Island, near the Promontory of Lilybeum, and hence got the Name of Cyclops, compounded of two Phenician Words, Chek-loup; as much as to say, People of the Gulph of Lilybeum (a); which misled the Greeks, who not understanding that Language, took their Name to be derived from Cyclos (4), which signifies round; upon which they uttered the Fable, that the Cyclops had but one Eye in the Middle of their Forehead. There are Authors however of Opinion, that this Fiction has no other Foundation, but that the Cyclops were armed with small Bucklers of Steel that covered their Faces, and that had a Hole directly against the Eyes; whence they were said to have but one Eye. Virgil seems to confirm this Conjecture, by comparing their Eye to a Shield (b).

As the Cyclops were a savage, brutal Race (c), the Poets represent them as real Man-eaters; and instead of saying, they had slain some of Ulysses's Companions, who were wandering in the Island, assert, that they had eat them up. As for the Fable that makes them pass for Vulcan's Smiths, it comes from the Place of their Residence, which was near Mount Ætna, which from the Flames it throws out, was reckoned the Shop of that God; and the dreadful Noise which the Fire and Winds make

U 2

in

(1) Odyss. l. 11. & 12. (2) Chan. l. 1. c. 30. (3) L. 4.

(a) Viros finus Lilybetani. See Bochart. loc. cit.

(4) Circulus.

(b) *Ingens quod torva solum sub fronte latebat,
Argolici Clypei & Phæbææ Lampadis instar.* Æn. 3. 636.

(c) It was this Ferocity of Manners gave the Greeks a Handle to invent so many Fables about them.

in those horrid Caverns, passed for the redoubled Thumps they gave upon their Anvils (a). We are told further, that Jupiter made use of them in forging his Thunderbolts (b), and that they had been employed in surrounding several Cities with Walls; insomuch, that in general all Walls and Towers that had great Solidity were accounted their Work. Virgil says (1), it was they had made the Inclosure and Gates to the Elysian Fields:

- - - - - Cyclosum edueta Caminis, Mœnia conspicio, atque adverso fornice portas.

and several other Works; and, if we may believe Aristotle, they are to be reckoned the first that super-added Turrets to the Walls of Cities.

The Cyclops were also ranked among the Gods, and Pausanias (2) speaks of a Temple at Corinth wherein they had an Altar upon which Sacrifices were offered to them.

Polyphemus is the most celebrated of the Cyclops: Homer, Virgil, Ovid, have made him very famous in their Works (c). The first tells us, that Ulysses found occasion for all his Address to get out of the Cavern. That Prince having entered thither, Polyphemus returning with his Flocks, shut himself in with a huge Stone, and first eat up two of his Companions, threatening him with the same Fate; but our Heroe having made him drunk, bored out with a Fire-brand the only Eye he had in the Middle of his Forehead, and the Cyclop having the next Day opened his Cave, to let out his Flocks, Ulysses placed his Companions under their Bellies,

(a) Virgil, l. 2. calls them Ætæos fratres.

(b) *Ferrum exercebant vasso Cyclopes in antro
Brontesque Steropesque & nudus membra Pyracmone - - -
His informatum manibus jam parte polita
Fulmen erat, toto Genitor quæ plurima celo
Dejicit in terras, pars imperfecta manebat;
Tres imbris torvi radios, tres nubis aquosæ.
Adliderat, &c.* Virg. Æn. 8. 425.

(1) Æn. l. 6. (2) In Corinth.

(c) Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum.

Æn. l. 5.

Bellies, and thus they got out without being perceived. 'Tis obvious that this Fable, when explained apart from the Marvellous, means, that Ulysses happily escaped out of the Hands of the Cyclops; tho' Homer might have brought him out of the Cave more ingeniously, unless the Poet means some Stratagem to which he has not thought fit to leave us the Key. These Adventures, fabulous as they are, have a Foundation in History; and this is what we have in our Eye. Polyphemus lived in the Time of Ulysses, and was King of Sicily, as we learn from Diodorus, and some other Authors (a). This Prince arrived there, and having captivated the Affections of Elpe, that Cyclop's Daughter, carried her off. The Lestrigons, who were other Inhabitants of that Island, took her from him by Force, and returned her to her Father. Further, these Lestrigons were a barbarous Race; and, if we may credit the Poets, both they and the Cyclops were real Cannibals, who devoured six of Ulysses's Companions. But the learned Bochart (1) will have the Rise of this Fable to be, that the Lestrigons were anciently called Leontini, a Name derived from their barbarous and cruel Manners (2); e Leontinis moribus. Homer adds, that Neptune, offended at Ulysses, for having put out the Eye of his Son Polyphemus, sunk his Ship near the Island of the Phenicians, where he however swam ashore with the Scarf which Leucothoe had given him.

When Ovid and Theocritus (b) represent Polyphemus in Love with the lovely Galatea, and Acis's Rival, telling us, that this hideous Giant buried that young Prince under a Rock which he pluck'd up by the Root, and that the Gods transformed him into a River, or rather into a River-God; this is a Romance, which I take to have no other Foundation but a poetical Fancy. Some Authors however are of Opinion, that Acis was a young Prince of Sicily, who was in Love with the beauteous Galatea, and that in Despair he threw himself into the River,

U 3

(a) See Tzetzes, in his Chil. Diodorus, &c.

(1) Chan. l. 1. c. 26. (2) Idem ibid.

(b) See also Lucian, and Philostrophus.

River, which from that Time has born his Name: Tho' the learned Author so often quoted (1), takes this Explanation to be itself a new Fable, and the River Acis to have had its Name from the Rapidity of its Streams.

If Hesiod says (2) the Cyclops were the Offspring of Heaven and Earth, it is because their true Original was unknown; and it was usual to make them the Offspring of the Earth, whose Genealogy was not known.

That they were considered as Giants, was owing, I believe, more to the monstrous Enormity of their Manners, than to any thing extraordinary in their Size or Stature; and, as for the gigantic Bones that are sometimes found in Sicily, which are said to be those of the ancient Inhabitants of that Island, I refer to what has been said on this Subject in the second Volume.

As Ulysses was also made to pass thro' the Straits of Scylla and Charybdis, 'tis proper to consider what may have given Rise to the Fables that were delivered on this Occasion. Ovid says, Scylla was a beautiful Nymph, of whom Glaucus, a Sea-God, became enamoured; but not being able to make any Impression upon her, he had recourse to the Art of a certain Sorceress, named Circe. She herself, struck with Glaucus's Merit, resolved to punish him for being insensible to her, and to put to Death her Rival Scylla; and having composed a Poison, threw it into a Fountain, where the Nymph having come to bathe, was transformed into a Monster. Homer says, she had twelve Claws, six Mouths, and as many Heads; Virgil also gives the Description of her (a). We are further told, that she being frightened herself with the dreadful Howlings of the Dogs that kenneled in her Womb, threw herself into the Sea, near the Place where are the famous Straits that bear her Name; and thus she was avenged on Circe, by destroying the Ships

(1) Bochart loc. cit. (2) In Theog.

(a) *Prima hominis facies, & pulchro pectore Virgo
Pube tenus, postremo immani corpore Pistrix, Delphinum caudas utero commissa luporum.*

Ships of Ulysses her Lover. 'Tis easy to see that this is a mere Romance ; but it is made up of several real Adventures, which we must unfold.

There is between Messina and Reggio a very narrow Firth, where huge ragged Rocks jut out into the Sea, from the two opposite Shores. This Firth was called Scylla on the Side of Reggio, and Charibdis on the Side of Messina (a). In Proportion as you remove from this Place, the Rocks seem to meet together, and then the Ships that enter there seem swallowed up ; which Justin very happily expresses after Trogus Pompeius (b). As the Currents there are extremely rapid, and the Water violently agitated in Gulfs and Whirlpools, a confused Noise is heard, not unlike to that of several Dogs barking together ; and hence, according to the same Author, came the Fable of Scylla, her Transformation into a Monster, and her Howlings (c). Accordingly Virgil compares the Noise of the Waves breaking upon one another near a Rock, to the baying of Dogs ;

Multis circum latrantibus undis (1).

Hence we may consider as new Fables, what some Authors have invented for explaining this, as when they say what gave Rise to it, was the Shipwreck of a Princess named Scylla, whom Pausanias (2) and Virgil (3) make to have been the Daughter of Nisus King of Megara, who perished in these Straits (d) ; or accord-

U 4

ing

(a) Dextrum Scylla latus, lævum implacata Charybdis
Obsidet. Æneid, l. 3.

(b) Ea est procul insipientibus natura loci, ut sinum maris, non transitum putes : quo cum accesseris, discedere ac sejungi promontoria, quæ antea juncta fuerant, arbitrere. Justin, l. 4.

(c) Hinc fabulæ Scyllam & Charybdim peperere, hinc latratus auditus, hinc monstri credita sumulachra, dum navigantes magnis vorticibus pelagi desidentis ætæriti, latrare putant undas quas sorbentis cestus vorago conludit. Id. Ibid.

(1) Æn. l. 7. (2) Pausan. in Corinth. (3) Ecl. 6.

(d) Quid loquar aut Scyllam Nisi, quam fama secuta est
Candida succinctum latrantibus inguina monstis.
Dulichias vexasse rates, & gurgite in alto,
Ab ! timidas nautas canibus lacerasse marinis.

Virg. loc. cit.

ing to Lycophron (1), it was a Daughter of Phorcus, who having stole from Hercules Geryon's Oxen, was put to Death by that Heroe; and her Father having put her Body upon the Pile, and refined it from its Mortality, she became a Divinity. We are not to place in the same Class what Palephatus says, that Scylla was a Ship of the Tyrrhenians, who laid waste the Coasts of Sicily, and which carried upon its Prow the monstrous Figure of a Woman whose Body was encompassed with Dogs Heads; that Author adds that Ulysses declined any Encounter with them, which gave Rise to all the Fables which Homer has vented in Relation to this Subject. Eusebius, to mention it by the Way, explains this Fable as Palephatus does; but still I am rather inclined to Bochart's Opinion, that the Name of the Straits of Scylla comes from a Phenician Word Sol, which signifies Ruin, and that it was given to it upon Account of the frequent Shipwrecks that happened there; as that of Charybdis, which signifies Gulph (2), was given to the other Promontory upon Account of the Eddies there which sometimes swallowed up Ships (a); which is the more probable, that the Etymologies given by the Greeks to these two Straits, differ but little from this, since, according to them, Scylla imports to spoil, and Charybdis, to swallow up.

Again, when we are told that Ulysses slew the Monster, which gave Rise to this Fable, 'tis probably because this Heroe having happily passed the Straits of Scylla, it was afterwards reckoned a Place of less Danger, and Ships began to pass there with Confidence. Homer, who says this Monster swallowed up Ships, and afterwards threw them up, adds that Tiresias having warned Ulysses of this, he profited by his Advice, waiting till Charybdis should give him back the Mast of his Ship which was gone to the Bottom, by Means whereof he escaped Shipwreck.

As

(1) In Cassand. (2) Bochart, l. i. c. 26.(a) Hic a mari profundoque sorbet navigia.Senec. de consol. animæ.

As Homer speaks at great length of this Heroe's Abode with Circe, I shall give her ^{The History} of Circe. History in this Place. Circe, Hesiod tells us

(1), was the Daughter of the Sun and Perseis, and Sister to Pasiphae the Wife of Minas; and the Sun, according to the same Author, was the Son of Hyperion and Theia, the Offspring of Heaven and Earth. Homer adds (2) that she was Sister to Æetes King of Colchos, who lived in the time of the Argonauts, as has been said in speaking of the Expedition of those Heroes to the Conquest of the Golden Fleece. Some Authors, who reckon this Genealogy a Fable, will have it that this Princess passed for the Daughter of the Sun only upon Account of the great Knowledge she had of Plants and Medicine, whereof Apollo, or rather the Sun, was the God (a). Others, with Diodorus, take this Fiction to have no other Foundation but that her Grand-father was called Elius or Sol.

Circe devoted herself to the Study of Herbs, wherein she succeeded so well as to find out several Remedies; but as she made Use of her secret Art in taking Revenge of her Enemies by Poison, hence she passed for a Sorceress. We are even told, that having married the King of the Sarmatians, or of the Scythians, she poisoned him; whereby she became so odious to her Subjects, that she was obliged to quit her Kingdom to retire to the Coasts of Italy, into the Place which from that time bore the Name of Circe's Promontory, upon the Tuscan Sea, now Monte Circello (b).

Apollonius assures us that Apollo, this Princess's Father, rescued her from the Hands of her Subjects, who were going to have killed her, and transported her in his Chariot to Italy; which imports that she happily made her Escape, and against all Probability, from the Vengeance of the Scythians, by Means of some Ship with Sails. But notwithstanding all these Authorities,
I am

(1) In Theog. (2) Odyss. l. 10.

(a) Orpheus makes her the Daughter of Apollo and Asterope.

(b) *Præxima Circeæ raduntur littora terræ,
Dives inaccessos ubi Solis filia lucos Assiduo resonat cantu.*

Virg. Æn. l. 3.

I am of Opinion that this Princess had no Connection with Medea who lived with her in the time of the Argonauts, but Resemblance of Character. I rely upon the Authority of Strabo, who very judiciously remarks that Homer having heard of Jason's Expedition to Colchis, and to the City Æea, which was the Capital thereof, and knowing all the Fables that had been vented concerning Medea and Circe, their Inchantments and Conformity of Manners, upon that Account makes them to be related, wherein he has been followed by Onomacritus and Apollonius Rhodius. And if the same Homer has transported the Seat of Circe to the middle of the Ocean, it was to add a greater Air of the marvellous to the Relation which Ulysses gives of his Adventures to the Pheacians, who loved Fiction, and were too ignorant to be capable of confuting him.

As Circe lived much about the Time of the Trojan War, 'tis credible enough that Ulysses arrived at her Palace, and that he actually fell in Love with her. This at least is the Sentiment of those who affirm that he had a Son by her named Telegonus. The Charms of this Princess having made him neglectful of his own Honour, as well as of his Companions, they plunged themselves into the Pleasures of a voluptuous Court; which makes Homer say she had transformed them into Swine: and what he adds of Mercury's giving that Prince an Herb named Moly (a) whereby he had evaded Circe's Charms, is to teach us that having at length recovered himself from his Remissness, he had given Counsel to his Companions to quit so dangerous an Abode. This Plant, so difficult to be found, according to Homer, is the Prudence which Ulysses exerted in extricating his Soldiers from the Seat of Voluptuousness; and it may be supposed that all the Transformations which Homer, Ovid, and the other Poets say this Princess wrought, were rather the Effects of her Charms and

(a) 'Tis probably wild Rue, whose Root is black, and the Flower white; which makes Ovid say:

Pacifer hunc dederat florem Cyllenius album,
Moly vocant superi, nigra radice tectur.

Met. I. 14.

and Beauty, than of her Magic, tho' Horace gives us plainly to understand (a) it was the Potions she gave that brought about these Wonders. You have heard, says he, of the Songs of the Sirens, and of Circe's Potions. Had Ulysses, like his Companions, been so foolishly enslaved to his Passions as to drink of the intoxicating Cup of that Sorceress, he must have sunk himself into a beastly and sottish Life, like those impure Animals that delight to wallow in Mire and Dirt, under the Dominion of a base Prostitute.

To support the Character of an Enchantress which they gave to Circe, they went the length of saying that she possessed the Art of drawing down the Stars from Heaven, to denote that Voluptuousness degrades the most exalted Minds; unless we chuse rather to say with Bochart, for Moralizings are very arbitrary, that the Fable of Circe's Enchantments came from the Phenician Word Lat, or Latim, which signifies Inchantment (1), whence the Latins were denominated Enchanters. Bochart had read in the Ancients that Latium abounded with Plants of a venomous Nature, and proper for making Spells and Enchantments, as may be seen in Theophrastus (2), Strabo (3), in the Scholiast on Apolonius (4), and several others.

As the Princess we are now speaking of excelled in that Art, and greatly surpassed the other Inhabitants of that Country, this is undoubtedly what made her be reckoned the Daughter of Apollo the God of Medicine, a Branch of which is the Knowledge of Plants.

In short, what is more certain than any Thing else in this whole History is, that Circe, notwithstanding her Inchantments and depraved Morals, had divine Honours paid to her; and in the Time of Cicero she was

(a) *Sirenum voces, & Circes pocula nosti;
Quæ si cum sociis stultus cupidusque bibisset;
Sub domina meretrice fuisset turpis & excers,
Vixisset canis immundus, vel amica luto sus.*

1. Epif. 2. 23.

(1) Φάρμακωδης Chan. l. 1. c. 13. (2) Hist. Plant. (3) L. 5.

(4) L. 3.

was still worshipped by the Inhabitants of the Italian Coast, where she had fixed her Residence.

We may remark, after a learned Mythologist (1), that there were two Circes who came afterwards to be confounded; she whom Diodorus, after Hesiod, calls the Daughter of the Sun, was much more ancient than Ulysses, since she lived in the Time of the Argonauts, and was Sister to Æetes; she at whose Court Ulysses spent some Time, and who reigned over the Coasts of Italy, about the Time of the Trojan War, was the Daughter of the former Circe, the Grand-daughter of Elius, and Sister to Æetes the second. As few Authors distinguish these two Circes, and the two Æetes's Kings of Colchos, no wonder that there is so much Obscurity in this ancient History. Boccace, who is the Mythologist I have in my Eye, had on his Side the Authority of Theodotion, whose Work is since lost. Ovid adds to all that has been now said, that Circe having fallen in love with Picus King of Italy, transformed him into a Magpye, as has been said in the History of the terrestrial Gods.

Ulysses, according to Homer, arrived also at the Court of Calypso, the Daughter of the Ocean, and of the ancient Tethys, or according to Hyginus (2) and Tibullus, of Atlas, Fœcunda Atlantidos arva Calypsus.

Calypso reigned over the Island of Ogygia, in the Ionian Sea, better known by the Name of Calypso's Island. This is what we read in Homer, Pliny, and Strabo; but Hyginus and Mela make her to have reigned near the Coasts of Italy in the Island of Æea, probably confounding her with Circe who dwelt there. Homer (3) tells us, in what manner Calypso received Ulysses upon his Return from the Trojan Expedition, and how she detained him for seven Years (a), offering him

(1) Boccace's Genealogy of the Gods, l. 4. c. 14. (2) Fab. 125.

(3) Odyss. l. 5.

(a) Ovid says she detained him but six Years, and Hyginus only one Year.

him even Immortality, if he would marry her; but this Prince not being capable of forgetting his dear Penelope, preferred his own Island of Ithaca to all the Proposals Calypso could make him; and Mercury being sent to her from Jupiter, she let him go: But not without shedding a Flood of Tears at his Departure, as may be gathered from this Verse in Ovid:

Ab quoties illum doluit properare Calypso (1).

What Homer says of this Goddess, as also of the Island that she inhabited, has always been reckoned a mere Fiction; and so fine an Occasion for moralizing and framing Allegories has not been neglected. Pliny, who places this Island (2) upon the Coasts of Italy that bordered with Great Greece, speaks of it in the following Manner:

“ The Island of Ogygia, so called by Homer, is the “ habitable Land in that whole Hemisphere which the “ Ancients believed to be surrounded on all Sides with “ the Ocean, for which Reason it is called Navel “ Island (3), that is, the middle of the Ocean. There
 “ he places Calypso the Daughter of Atlas, who knows
 “ the Foundations of the Ocean, and supports upon “ immense Pillars the Weight of Heaven and Earth.
 “ This is Nature herself, such as she appears in that “ Hemisphere; and Homer gives her the Name of a “ Woman very well known then, because there are “ many Things in Nature which she keeps concealed;
 “ the Word καλύπτειν, signifying to conceal.”

Bossu (4) raises another Allegory from it: Calypso, says he, as her Name implies, is the Goddess of Secrecy; at her Court Ulysses is concealed for seven Years, to denote that a great Politician never becomes compleatly so, but by a long Secrecy and Dissimulation. 'Tis in vain to enquire at present where the Island lay which this imaginary Goddess inhabited.

Ulysses, at departing from the Island of Ogygia or of Calypso, arrived in the Country of the Pheacians, who inhabited

(1) De Art. Aman. l. 2. (2) L. 3. (3) Homer. Odyss. l. 1. v. 50. (4) Treatise of the Epic Poem.

inhabited the Island of Cercyra (1), in the Ionian Sea, and met upon the Sea-coast Nausicaa the Daughter of Alcinous King of the Island, who according to the Manner of those ancient Times, was coming to see the Lye Washing, and she introduced him to her Father. Homer brings in here the Intervention of the Gods, to set off an Adventure that has nothing in it but what is very common; and when he says his Heroe was shrouded with a Cloud that no body might perceive him, he means it was Night when he arrived at the Palace of that Prince.

The Pheacians, whom Commerce had enriched, lived in Opulence and Luxury, and nothing was to be seen among them but Dancings, Festivals, and continual Banqueting, where Musick commonly accompanied good Cheer, and where Songs often very loose, such as that which Phemius sings in the Presence of Ulysses, upon the Adultery of Mars and Venus, were the Concomitants of those kinds of Feasts. Nothing was more magnificent than the Gardens of Alcinous, with which Antiquity has brought into Comparison only those of Adonis and Scmiramis. It was in this delightful Place Ulysses was received, for Homer, to give us a full View of his Heroe's Virtue, shews him to us in every Light: And here, after some stay, he embarked in the Ship which the King of the Phenicians equipped for him, and arrived at length at Ithaca, where having concealed himself with Eumeus one of his Domesticks, he concerted proper Measures to rid himself of some neighbouring Princes, who had been for twenty Years past making Court to his Wife Penelope (a), squandering away his Estate. The various Pretexts she made use of to amuse them till her Husband should return, gave rise to that famous Web which she undid by Night.

Ulysses having slain or put to flight all his Rivals, reigned in Peace, while Telegonus, whom he had by Circé, having arrived in the Island of Ithaca to see him,

(1) This is the Island of Corfu.

(a) See the four last Books of the Odyssey.

him, he endeavours to hinder his landing ; and Telegonus having struck him with a Spear, the End whereof was made of a Sea-Tortoise named Pastinace, and which according to Pliny is very venomous, he thus lost his Life, as Tiresias had foretold him; when he consulted him in Hell. His Son Telemachus ascended the Throne.

History makes no mention of his Successors ; and, to say the Truth, I am of Opinion that were it not for Homer, Ithaca and all that relates to it, would be quite unknown to us. That Poet acquaints us farther, that the young Telemachus went in quest of his Father, and after having brought him in his Voyage as far as Sparta, he leaves him there, that is, from the fourth Book of the Odysssey, to Ulysses's Arrival at Ithaca. 'Tis this Interval that M. de Fenelon has so happily filled up in his Telemachus, one of the finest Poems, and the most judicious that ever was writ.

Such is the History of Ulysses, which Homer has so artfully disguised by the Fables he has blended with it.

We have explained elsewhere the Adventures he had at Eolus's Court, in the Island of the Sirens, his Descent to Hell, and some others, but I have said nothing hitherto of what befel him among the Ciconians, a People of Thracia, near the River Hebrus, whose capital City, named Ismara, he pillaged, and divided their Spoils among his Companions : Nor of the Adventure he had among the Lotophagi (a), a People of the Island Gelve, near the Coasts of Afric, where he was obliged to bind two of his Companions, whom the Fruit of the Lotos had made to forget their Country ; nor of the unhappy Shipwreck he suffered at his Departure from Sicily, by the Resentment of Apollo, who thus avenged the Death of his Daughter Lampetia and Phaetusa ; as also the Theft of his Companions who had stole some Oxen that were consecrated to him ; in which Shipwreck our Heroe had perished, if he had not not swam as far as the Island of Ogygia. I have, I say, purposely waved these Fables, whose Meaning, if they have any, is easy to be discovered; the Poet having exposed his Heroe to the Hatred of the Gods, and to the Dangers of three or four Shipwrecks, the better to illustrate his Valour and Prudence, and to make him still preserve, in the most enchanting Places, and amidst the most bewitching Charms of Pleasure, the Desire of returning into his Country, where his Presence was necessary, according to the End which the Poet has in his Eye, to redress the Disorder which his Family had fallen into thro' the Absence of its Master:

(a) So called because they eat of the Fruit of the Lotos, which had a Quality to make those who eat of it to forget their Country.

Ulysses after his Death was promoted to heroic Honours, and had even an Oracle in the Country of the Eurithenians, a People of Etolia, as we read in Aristotle quoted by Tzetzes, upon the 794th Verse of Lycophron (1). Among the Monuments of this Prince now remaining; there is a Medal of Gorlay representing him naked, holding a Pique in one Hand, with his right Foot upon a Wheel; near to him is a Pillar upon which is his Helmet.

The History of Penelope. Penelope was the Daughter of Icarius, who lived at Athens in the Time of Pandion II. of the Name. He is said to have had Bacchus for his Guest, who, as a Reward for his Civility, taught him the Art of planting the Vine, and of making Wine. This Hospitality, to mention it by the Way, signifies that Icarius was among the first in adopting the Worship of Bacchus, which from his Time was introduced at Athens. Penelope his Daughter had offers of Marriage made her from several Princes of Greece; and her Father, to avoid Quarrels that might have happened, obliged them to contend for her in the Games which he made them celebrate; a thing very common in those Times. Ulysses was the Conqueror (2), and gained the Lady for his Prize.

Icarius, who had settled at that Time in Sparta, where this Marriage was solemnized, used his utmost Efforts

(1) Grantmenil, p. 436. (2) Pausan. in Lacon;

Efforts to prevail upon his Son-in-law to stay with him, but all in vain. Despairing of being able to persuade him, he applied himself to his Daughter, conjured her not to forsake him ; and so soon as he saw her set out from Sparta to take Ship, he redoubled his Solicitations, and would needs follow her Chariot. Ulysses tired out at length with these Importunities, told his Wife that she might choose between her Father and her Husband, and that he left her at liberty either to go with him to Ithaca, or to return with her Father. Penelope blush'd at this Speech, and answered only by covering her Face with her Veil. Icarius who understood this dumb Language, let her go with her Husband ; but moved with the graceful Confusion he saw her in, he consecrated a Statue to Modesty, in the same Place where Penelope had put a Veil over her Face.

The World are so prepossessed in favour of Penelope's Virtue, that she is always considered as the most perfect Model of conjugal Love, and many People are highly offended with Bayle for having attacked her Character in his Critical Dictionary (1). I myself have been reflected upon for having said (2) that the Poets disguising the Characters of the Persons they spoke of, had made Dido a Lover abandoned to Despair, even her who was always faithful to the Memory of her first Husband Sicheus ; and Penelope a Model of Chastity, tho' many Authors tell us, she suffered herself to be debauched by some of her Lovers, who were always about her during the Absence of her Husband. One thing certain is, that Pausanias tells us (3) the Tradition of the Arcadians concerning this Princess did not agree with the Poets of Thesprotia. These gave out that after the Return of Ulysses she had a Daughter by him, who was called Ptoliporthé, a Name given her because she had been born after the taking of Troy. But the Mantineans contended, that being accused by her Husband of having herself introduced Disorder

VOL. IV.

X

into

(1) Art. of Penelope. (2) Expl. des Fab. T. 3. (3) In Arcad.

into his Family, she had been expelled by him, and that she repaired first to Sparta, and from that to Mantineia, where she ended her Days. The Mantineans were probably in the Right, for the Tomb of this Princess was actually among them, which stood in a small Plain, at the Foot of the Mountain, where the Town of Mantineia formerly was. How could she have been buried there, had she always lived and died at Ithaca? And why would she have been banished Ithaca, had not her Deportment during her Husband's long Absence, obliged him to inflict that Punishment upon her at his Return?

C H A P. VI.

The History of Antenor and Eneas.

I Join here the History of these two Trojans, because they are thought to have been Traitors to their Country, and to have had much the same Adventures; and if the latter is much more renowned than the former, it is owing to Virgil's having thought fit to make a Heroe of him, and immortalize his Memory by his Eneid.

Antenor was suspected for having favoured the Greeks, because he entertained their Deputies when they came to redemand Helen, and he was thought to have known Ulysses, at the Time he entered Troy to carry off the Palladium, without having discovered him, as he ought to have done. If we add to this what we are told by some of the Ancients, and the Iliac Table authorises it, that in the Night wherein that City was sack'd, the Greeks set a Guard upon his Palace to save it from being pillaged; and that in the midst of his Enemies, he quietly took Ship to pursue his Fortune elsewhere, it will appear that the Suspicion of his Treachery was but too well founded (1). Be that as it will, Antenor arrived with his small Fleet, by the Adriatic Sea, in that part of Italy which constitutes at present the State of Venice, and there built the City of Padua. This Article

(1) See Tzetzes upon Lycophron, Diogenes of Crete, &c.

ticle of the History of those Times is one of the most certain. Pliny (1) in Confirmation of it has recourse to the Authority of Cato, who asserted it in his Book of Origines: Venetos Trojana stirpe ortos Author est Cato. Virgil says so expressly (a), and Titus Livius asserts (2), that the Place where Antenor landed, got the Name of Troy, as also a Village which was in the Neighbourhood of it. To these Authorities we may add ancient Monuments, and established Tradition. Tacitus (3) informs us, that it was believed in his Time, that the Games celebrated at Padua had been instituted by this Trojan; and some Authors maintain that the Bonnet of the Doges of Venice, is made after the Model of those of the ancient Phrygians. Antenor, to establish himself in that part of Italy, entered directly into an Alliance with the Henetes, the present Venetians; and with their Assistance expelled the Eganians, and built the City which we have been now speaking of.

Some Authors are of Opinion that Eneas escaped from Troy by the Intelligence he had with the Enemy: And, on the other Hand, this Heroe, who is commonly reckoned the Founder of the Roman Empire, is become so famous by the fine Poem which Virgil has composed upon his Adventures, that the Reader will not be displeased to be determined which Side of the Question to choose.

Tros the King of Troy had two Sons, The History of Ilus and Assaracus; the latter had a Son Anchises.
named Capys, who was Father to Anchises, and Grandfather to Eneas; thus he was of the Blood Royal by the Father's Side (4); and in the Opinion of most of the Ancients, the Goddess Venus was his Mother. Nothing

X 2

(1) L. 3. c. 13.

(a) Antenor potuit mediis elapsus Achivum

Illyricos penetrare sinus; atque intima tutus

Regna Liburnorum, & fontem superare Timavi.

Hic tamen ille urbem Patavi, sedesque locavit

Teucrorum, & genti nomen dedit, armaque fixit

Troia —

Æn. l. 1. v. 246, & 251.

(2) L. 1. c. 1. (3) L. 16. c. 21. (4) Homer. Iliad. l. 20.

thing is so famous among the Poets, as the Commerce of Anchises with this Goddess (1); but probably this Fable was invented to cloak some Piece of Gallantry, and to calm the Jealousy of Anchises's Wife, who saw him too often frequent the Banks of the River Simois, where he was probably smitten with the Charms of some Shepherdess, who was perhaps denominated Venus upon Account of her Beauty. It would seem that she was that Venus, whom Homer makes to have been the Daughter of Dione (2), and who is mentioned by Cicero (3). The Poets add that Venus enjoined her Gallant not to speak of this Adventure; but that he not being able to keep the Secret, was struck with Thunder, by which Servius says he lost his Sight; others say the Wound he received thereby never could be closed up (a). What gave rise to this Fable, by the Way, is that anciently Thunder was considered as the most dreadful Instrument of the Vengeance of the Gods; and those who were struck with it, were reckoned a kind of excommunicated Persons; whence Anchises was looked upon as the Object of the Wrath of the Gods, as Virgil gives us to understand in the following Lines:

*Jampridem invisus Divis & inutilis annos
Demoror, ex quo me Dicum pater atque hominum Rex Fulminis afflavit ventis & contigit igne.*

Æn. l. 2. v. 647.

Grown to my Friends an useless heavy Load,
Long here I liv'd, abhor'd by every God;
Since, in his Wrath, high Heav'n's Almighty Sire, Blasted these Limbs with his avenging Fire.

Pitt's Æneid.

Anchises however lived till the Age of eighty Years, and was buried, according to Eustathius (4), upon Mount

(1) Idem Hymn. upon Venus Virg. &c. (2) Il. l. 9. (3) De Nat. Deor. l. 3.

(a) Consult for all this the learned Meziriac upon Ovid, or Bayle who has copied him in his Critical Dictionary, Art. Anchises.

(4) Upon the 22 of the Iliad.

Mount Ida. Opinions however are very much divided on this Head : Virgil makés him to have died at Drepana in Sicily ; Pausanias in Arcadia ; Dionysius of Halicarnassus and others, bring him as far as Italy, where he ends his Days.

Eneas his Son was educated in the Coun- The History of Eneas.
try till he was put under the Direction of a Governor, and some Years after, Priam gave him his Daughter Creusa in Marriage, by whom he had a Son named Iulus, or Ascanius (a).

As Homer is the most ancient Author who has spoken of this Prince, 'tis in the Iliad we are to seek for his Character, and to learn what he did at the Siege of Troy. The celebrated F. Hardouin, is even of Opinion that he is the true Heroe of the Poem now mentioned, which, according to him, was only composed to flatter the Kings of Troas, Eneas's Descendants, who were still reigning in the Time of that Poet, who being an Ionian must have known them. In a Word, the Iliad, according to this learned Author, was nothing but the History of the Fall of the eldest Branch of the Trojan Kings, that is, of Laomedon and Priam, to which the youngest Branch, or that of Asseracus, must have succeeded, from whom Eneas descended, as has been already said in the Article that relates to the Succession of the Kings of Troy.

Among the Atchievements of Eneas, during the Siege, as they are related by the Poet, he says he fought with Achilles, but that Neptune carried him off from the Combat ; and I am of Opinion, to mention it by the Way, that what had given a Handle to this Fiction, was, that the Combat between Achilles and Eneas having lasted the whole Day, Night put an End to it, or rather some Feast of Neptune obliged them to suspend it. Eneas distinguished himself, especially in the Night

X 3 that

(a) The Poet Lescheus, and the Author of the Cypriacs, give Eneas to Wife Eurydice, as we are told by Pausanias in Phoc. but the most common Opinion is that he had Creusa the Daughter of Priam ; and as she died in the Burning of Troy, the Poets gave out that the Mother of the Gods, and Venus, had carried her away from the Greeks, Vid. Pausanias loc. cit.

that the City was taken, when, without dwelling upon all that Virgil tells us to this Purpose (1), rather in a poetical than an historical Manner, Dionysius of Halicarnassus says, he entered into the Citadel of Ilium, and defended it to the last; that when he saw it was impossible to save it, he let out the Women, the old Men and Children by a Back-Door, and then came out himself with his Garrison, fighting his Way thro' the Enemy till he came to Mount Ida, which was the Place of Rendezvous; that he there formed a little Army of those who were able to bear Arms; and the Greeks not daring to venture a Battle, made a Treaty with them, by which they were permitted to march off. Eneas fitted out a Fleet of twenty Ships near the City Antanaros, at the Foot of Mount Ida, in which having embarked, he first arrived in Thrace, where he founded the City Ænia, and peopled it with those whom he could most easily spare.

Setting out from thence he made the Island of Delos, where Anius the high Priest of Apello gave him a favourable Reception (a). After this having coasted along the Island of Cythera, he arrived at a Cape of the Peloponnesus, which he called Cynetium, from the Name of one of his Companions who was buried there; and having entered Greece, he quitted the Fleet, to go and consult the Oracle of Jupiter at Dodona (b). It was there he found his Brother-in-law Helenus, who was reputed in that Country a great Prophet. Arrived in the Country of the Salentines, where Idomeneus come from Crete, established his new Colony, he would have continued his Course by the Fare of Messina, but he was obliged to put in to Sicily, where he assisted Elimus and Egestus who also came from Phrygia, in building two Towers of their own Name, leaving with them those of the Ship's Crew, whom the Fatigue of the Voyage and old Age had rendered useless to him.

In

(1) Eneid. l. 2. & 3.

(a) We shall give afterwards the History of this Anius and his Daughters.

(b) Eneas was very superstitious; but Virgil gives him always the Designation of Pious.

In fine, having departed from that Island, he happily arrived at Laurentum upon the Coasts of Tyrrhenia, near the Mouth of the Tyber, in the Country of the Aborigines (1). These People, frightened at the Arrival of a Fleet man'd by Strangers, assembled under the Command of their King Latinus; but that Prince having been informed of the Motive that brought them into his Dominions, and that they were Trojans, who under the Conduct of Æneas the Son of Venus and Anchises were in Quest of some Place where they might settle and found a City, after the burning of their own, as the Oracles had prescribed to them; being farther informed that their Leader was a Man of Wisdom and Piety, who was carrying with him his Household Gods; viewing besides, with a Mixture of Astonishment and Awe, an illustrious Nation, the History of whose Misfortunes was already known, and a Heroe their Commander, who was indeed disposed to treat with him amicably; but at the same time determined to have Recourse to Force, if he could not otherwise compass his Design, he himself made up to Æneas, gave him his Hand in Token of Friendship, and the two Armies united. The Remembrance of an Oracle, and we know how far Predictions made Impression upon Peoples Minds at that Time, which had foretold Latinus the Arrival of some Strangers, whose Leader was to be his Son-in-law, was the principle Cause of the Advances he made to Æneas. He conducted him to his Palace; and in order to confirm by the strictest Ties the Alliance which he had made with him, and to unite the two Nations for ever, he gave him in Marriage in a short time after Lavinia, his only Daughter and the Heiress of his Crown. Æneas, with the Assistance of his Father-in-law and the Latins, built at that time a City which he called Lavinium, from the Name of his Wife, by whom he had a Son named Ascanius.

In the mean time this Match brought upon the Trojans and Aborigines a common Enemy. Lavinia before Æneas's Arrival had been promised to Turnus King of the Rutulians, Julians, who inhabited the Maritime Part of Campania, near the Place where Rome was afterwards built. This Prince, young and ambitious, Nephew to Queen Amata Latinus's Wife, enraged that a Stranger should be preferred to him, declared War upon his Rival, and gave him Battle, which cost both Sides dear. The Rutuli indeed were routed, but it cost Latinus his Life, who commanded in Person with his Son-in-law. Æneas being sole Master of his Father-in-law's Dominions, omitted nothing to prevent the new Efforts which Turmus was making to repair this Loss; especially when he understood that he had struck up an Alliance with the Etrurians, whose Power was then very formidable.

Mezentius who was their King, kept his Court at Core, a wealthy City, and one of the strongest in the Country. As that Prince, according to Titus Livius, had always looked with an evil Eye upon the Trojan Colony, and considered the rising Power of those Strangers as a just Ground of being alarmed for himself and his Neighbours, he made no Difficulty of joining with the Rutuli. In the mean Time Æneas, destitute of Assistance, in a Country where he had but new settled, finding that he had Occasion to be strictly united with the Aborigines to sustain the Storm with which he saw himself threatened, considered how this might best be effected. For that End he resolved henceforth to incorporate that People and the Trojans who followed him into one State, governed by the same Laws, under the Name of the Latin People. This Piece of Policy succeeded, and thereby he so gained the Affections of the Aborigines, that they were for ever after as faithful, and as much attached to him as the Trojans themselves. Æneas, strengthened by this Union, would not wait to receive the Enemy in the City: he took the Field, and the two Armies being very soon met, he fought a bloody Battle, wherein he lost his Life.

His Body not being found, it having probably fallen into the River Numicus, near which the Battle was fought, it was given out that Venus having purified him in the Water of that River, had promoted him to the the Rank of the Gods. A Tomb was erected to him upon the Banks of the River, a Monument which was still subsisting in the time of Titus Livius, and where Sacrifices were offered to him afterwards under the Name of Jupiter Indiges. This Heroe died at the Age of thirty eight Years, and reigned only three. His Son Ascanius succeeded him, and built the famous City Alba, where his Descendants reigned over the Latin Territory, until Numitor, Romulus's Grand-Father.

The Kingdom of Alba, according to Arnobius, lasted 420 Years, or 432, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, under fourteen Kings. Æneas reigned three Years, his Son Ascanius 38, partly in Lavinium, and partly in Alba, to which he transferred the Seat of the Empire. After his Death search was made every where for his Mother-in-law Lavinia, who had concealed herself in a Forest where she was delivered of a Son, who from thence got the Name of Sylvius, which the Kings of Alba thought it their Honour to assume afterwards: he was also surnamed Posthumus, because he was born after his Father's Death, Iulus the Son of Ascanius disputed the Crown with that young Prince; but the Latins obliged him to drop his Pretensions, and invested him with the Office of high Priest, which continued a long time in this Prince's Family. Sylvius reigned 29 Years, and his Son Æneas Sylvius 31. Latinus, who succeeded him, reigned 50. Alba 29. Capetus 26, Capis 28, Calpetus 30, Tyberinus 8. It was from this Prince's having drowned himself in the Albula that it got the Name of the Tyber, which it has gone by ever since that time. Agrippa reigned 41. To him succeeded the Tyrant Alladius, equally detested by Gods and Men, for having usurped divine Honours; he was punished for his Impiety, and drowned himself in a Pond, after a Reign of 19 Years. Aventinus, who derived his Name to the Aventine Mount, was in Possession of the Crown thirty seven Years; Procas twenty nine; Amulius, who supplanted his Brother Numitor, reigned 42 Years, until Romulus his Grandson, and the Son

Son of Rhea Sylvia his Niece, put him to Death, and re-established his Grand-Father upon the Throne of Alba, whereof he was the last King; tho' this City stood till the time of Tullus Hostilius the third King of Rome, who demolished it after the Defeat of the Curatii (a): thus Æneas, as we see, precedes Romulus by 450 Years.

Before Æneas, there had been five Kings in Latium, Janus, Saturnus, Picus, Faunus and Latinus, whose Reigns, if we may believe Eusebius, had lasted 150 Years (b). Their History is full of Fables, and we know nothing in that Country more ancient than Janus. This is what appears most probable in the History of Æneas; and all the rest is only to be looked upon as Embellishments. Upon the whole, I have followed the most common Opinion; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and Titus Livius, who are more conform to Virgil, have been my Guides. I am not ignorant that in this Article, as well as most others of the fabulous Age, Authors vary prodigiously. There are some of them who, in order to deprive the Romans of the Glory of having had this illustrious Leader of the Trojans for their Founder, contend that Æneas never came into Italy (c): That he reigned in Troas, according to the Prediction which Homer mentions in his Iliad.

That Poet, speaking of the Combat in which Æneas was like to have perished by Achilles's Hand, says:

*Achilles rushing in with dreadful Cries,
Draws his broad Blade, and at Æneas flies:
But Ocean's God, whose Earthquakes rock the Ground,
Saw the Distress, and mov'd the Pow'rs around.
Lo! on the Brink of Fate Æneas stands,
An instant Victim to Achilles' Hands:*

By

(a) See Dionysius of Halicarnassus, l. 1. Titus Livius, l. 1.

(b) See for the ancient People of Italy, the Dissertations of Theodorus Rickius.

(c) To this Purpose may be seen the Dissertation of the learned Bechart: it is in M. Scgrais's Translation of the Eneid into French Verse, who knew not what Answer to give to it; but Theodorus Rickius has both fully answered that, and Cluverius in his Dissertation on the ancient People of Italy, Chap. 12. to which I refer the Reader.

*By Phoebus urg'd; but Phoebus has bestow'd
His Aid in vain: The Man o'erpow'rs the God.
And can ye see this righteous Chief atone
With guiltless Blood, for Vices not his own?
To all the Gods his constant Vows were paid;
Sure, tho' he wars for Troy he claims our Aid.
Fate wills not this; nor thus can Jove resign
The future Father of the Dardan Line:
The first great Ancestor obtain'd his Grace,
And still his Love descends on all the Race,
For Priam now, and Priam's faithless Kind,
At length are odious to th' all-seeing Mind;
On great Æneas shall devolve the Reign,
And Sons succeeding Sons the lasting Line sustain.*

*The great Earth-shaker thus: to whom replies
Th' imperial Goddess with the radiant Eyes,
Good as he is, to immolate or spare
The Dardan Prince, O Neptune, be thy Care;
Pallas and I, by all that Gods can bind,
Have sworn Destruction to the Trojan Kind;
Not ev'n an Instant to protract their Fate
Or save one Member of the sinking State;
Till her last Flame be quench'd with her last Gore,
And ev'n her crumbling Ruins are no more.*

*The King of Ocean to the Fight descends,
Thro' all the whistling Darts his Course he bends,
Swift interpos'd between the Warriours flies,
And casts thick Darkness o'er Achilles' Eyes.
From great Æneas' Shield the Spear he drew,
And at its Master's Feet the Weapon threw:
That done, with Force divine he snatch'd on high
The Dardan Prince, and bore him thro' the Sky,
Smooth-gliding without Step, above the Heads
Of warring Heroes, and of bounding Steeds.*

Pope's Iliad. xx. 341.

This formal Passage is very considerable, and of great Weight to demolish the Pretensions of the Romans, who valued themselves on that chimerical Conceit of being descended from Æneas; for unless we allow low what I remark elsewhere, that Homer, who was an Ionian, puts this Prediction into Neptune's Mouth, for no other Reason, in all Probability, but because he saw the Posterity of Aeneas still in Possession of the Throne of the Trojans; would he ever have made Neptune speak so, who was their declared Enemy?

Thus all that the Historians have written of Aeneas's Voyage to Italy, may be looked upon as Romance, that has no other Tendency but to over throw historical Truth, since the most ancient of these is several Ages later than Homer, while that Poet lived only 260 Years, or thereabouts, after the taking of Troy, and wrote in some of the Cities of Ionia, in the Neighbourhood of Phrygia, or at no great Distance from it. Accordingly some Historians before Dionysius of Halicarnassus having perceived the Force of this Passage in Homer, would needs explain it in a Consistency with this Fable, by saying that Aeneas after having been in Italy, returned to Troy, and there left his Son Ascanius. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, not satisfied with this Solution, which appears to him improbable, has taken another Method to preserve to the Romans the Glory of being descended from Venus's Son, by saying that by these Words, He shall reign over the Trojans, Homer meant he shall reign over the Trojans whom he shall carry with him into Italy. Might not Aeneas, says he, have reigned over the Trojans whom he carried into Italy, tho' settled elsewhere?

This Historian, who wrote in Rome itself, and under the Eye of Augustus, was willing to make his Court to that Prince, by explaining this Passage of Homer so as to favour the wild Notion with which he was intoxicated. This is a just Ground of Reproach against him; for that Poets should flatter Princes by their Fictions is no wise surprizing; but for Historians to corrupt the Gravity and Severity of History to substitute Fable and Falshood in the Room of Truth, is a Fault not to be pardoned. Strabo acts a much better Part; for though he wrote his Geography about the Beginning of Tiberius's Reign, yet he has the Courage to explain this Passage of of Homer, and to assert (1), that this Poet says, and would have us to understand that Æneas remained at Troy, that he reigned there, all Priam's Race having been extinct, and that he left the Crown to his Children after him. 'Tis needless to take Notice here of the pleasant Correction which Strabo tells us some Criticks had made upon Homer's Text by reading, παντεσσι, instead of τροεσσι; he shall reign over all the World, instead of he shall reign over the Trojans; as if Homer had known and foretold in that Time that the Empire of the whole World was promised to the Family of Æneas; the Flattery to Augustus in this is too discernable.

Again there was another Tradition, perhaps of equal Authority with that which I have now delivered, according to which it was a Question whether Ascanius, who succeeded Æneas in Italy, was the Son of Lavinia, or that other Prince of the same Name whom he had by Creusa, who followed his Father in his Expeditions, and who was surnamed Iulus. However, it was from this last, the Grandson of Venus, that the Romans valued themselves on being descended, and from whom the Julian Family boasted to have derived its Name and Original.

Another Tradition again is what Conon follows (2). After the Destruction of Troy, says he, Æneas, to avoid falling into the Hands of the Greeks, repaired to Mount Ida; but scarcely had he settled there, when he was driven thence by Eytius and Scamander the Sons of Hector, who obliged him to go and seek his Fortune some where else, and reigned in his Stead. What is singular in this Narration of Conon, is that he names two of Hector's Sons of whom we know little or nothing, none of the Ancients having mentioned any Son of his, but Astyanax.

Other Authors, so great Diversity is there among the Ancients as to this Article, will have it that Æneas was made Prisoner by Pyrrhus, and that after the Death of his Conqueror, he repaired to Macedonia: there are even Authors who tell us farther that Æneas was absent sent when Troy was taken, and that Priam his Father-in-law had sent him into Italy with some Troops: Some alledge, as has been said, that Æneas betrayed the City Troy, from the Hatred he bore to Priam, who used him ill. Servius (1) mentions this Treachery after Titus Livius, among whose Works, as they are now extant, this Passage is not to be found: Others write that he died in Thrace or in Arcadia: Others, in fine, that Turnus slew Æneas, and that Ascanius avenged his Father by killing Turnus.

(1) L. 13. (2) Nar. 46.

'Tis impossible to reconcile Sentiments so opposite, and it would be no Reconciliation of them in earnest to say with Tryphiodorus (2), that Venus had transported Eneas thro' the Air into Italy. Let us therefore leave the Romans in Possession of their Claim, nor envy them the Glory of being descended from Venus and Eneas.

But before I close this Chapter, I am still to explain other Fables that are interwove with the History of the Prince now in Question. We begin with that of his Amour with Elisa, so celebrated under the Name of Dido. She was the Daughter of Belus II. King of Tyre in Phenicia. Pygmalion her Brother ascended the Throne after the Death of his Father (a), and Elisa was married to Sicbarbas (b) the Priest of Hercules, her Mother's Brother, who was possessed of immense Riches; but which the Fear of the covetous Pygmalion obliged him to keep so secret, that he was only conjectured to be so rich. This however was enough to inflame the Avarice of the King, who without regard to the Ties of Blood which united them, cruelly murdered him.

Elisa, dissembling her Resentment, gave out that she was desirous to leave a Place which served only to renew

(1) In 2d Æneid. (2) Poem upon the taking of Troy.

(a) Here is the Order of her Genealogy: Jupiter Epaphus, Libra, Belus I. Agenor, Phœnix, Belus II. or Metres, Pygmalion and Dido.

(b) This is Virgil's Sicbæus.

new her Grief, and to go and live with Pygmalion (a). He presuming she would bring with her the Treasure of her Husband, sent her a Ship and a Convoy; but having set sail, she had the Precaution to lodge in the Ship some Bales loaded with Sand; and having given out that she was going to sacrifice to the Manes of her Husband whatever was most dear to her in the World; she threw them into the Sea, telling the Soldiers it was the Money of the unfortunate Sicharbas, and that consequently there was no other Resource for them but to fly with her, since Pygmalion, if he found them come without Sicharbas's Treasures, would put them all to Death; which obliged them to go and seek a Sanctuary from the Persecutions of that Prince. They first landed in Cyprus, whence Dido carried off fifty young Virgins, whom she gave in Marriage to her Companions in the Expedition. The Wind drove them afterwards upon the Coasts of Africa, where that Princess raised a Citadel, near which the City Carthage was afterwards built, so great was the Concourse of People and Merchants who arrived there from all Quarters. A Fable was afterwards trump'd up, which I must explain here. We are told that Dido bought from the Inhabitants of the Country as much Ground as a Bull's Hide could cover; upon which she cut down a Hide into many Thongs, which encompassed a Quantity of Ground sufficient to build a Citadel upon, which from thence was called Byrsa, that is, a Bull's Hide; but this Fable is owing to the Greeks, who pretended to find in their Language the Etymology of all Antiquities, not knowing that Bostra, or Botbrab, in the Phenician Language imports a Citadel (1); thus instead of saying simply that Dido built a Citadel, having found this barbarous

(a) We must not confound, as Ovid has done, this King of Tyre, with another Pygmalion the King of Cyprus, who having made a fine Statue which he fell in love with himself, and Venus having animated it, he begot upon it Paphus, who built the City Paphos in Cyprus, and the Temple of Venus, which has been so much talked of; a Fable which has no other Foundation, but that he gained the good Graces of some Beauty whom he was in love with: barbarous Word in the Annals which they read, and not knowing its Signification, they translated it by that of Byrsa, which having no Sense in this Place, they framed the Commentary now mentioned. We are told further, that those who dug the Foundations of this Citadel, found there a Horse's Head, which they reckoned a Prefage of its future Grandeur; another Fable, if we may believe Bockart, founded upon this Citadel's being named Cacabé, a Word which in the Language of the Phenicians signifies a Horse (a).

(1) Bochart. Chan. l. 1. c. 14. Vossius de Idol. l. 1. c. 3.

After the Phenicians, whom Dido led into this Part of Africa, had made this Settlement there, they would needs compel the Queen to marry Iarbas King of Mauritania, who had declared War upon them, and she sought three Months to consider of it. During that Time, having erected a funeral Pile, as if by some Sacrifice she had been to appease the Manes of her former Husband, she stabb'd herself with a Poniard, whereof she died. This Action made her get the Name of Dido, which imports valiant Woman, and by a strange Reverse of History, Virgil, instead of representing her as a Woman who killed herself, rather than marry a second Husband, makes her so much in love with Eneas, that his Departure drove her to Despair.

But what is farther remarkable, he makes an Anachronism of near 300 Years, which has been already often observed, for there is no less an Interval between Eneas and Dido; and tho' there are several Opinions as to the Time when she lived (b), 'tis agreed that she was later than the Trojan Heroe by some Ages, and nobody doubts of Virgil's Anachronism: Troy having been taken in the Time of the Judges, and Pygmalion, Dido's Brother, not having come into the World till the Reign of Joram King of Judah. Accordingly Eccbert (c) makes Dido to have been Aunt to the famous

(a) Bockart lcc. cit. adds that the Name of Carthage comes from Cacabé.

(b) Sil. Ital. de Bell. Punic. lib. 1. Velleius Patenc. l. 1. Appian in Libycis, &c.

(c) See Meziriac upon the Epistle of Dido to Eneas, and the Teleme- com. p. 77. & sequ.

mous Jezebel whom Abaz married, and who brought so many Calamities upon the Kingdom of Israel. But, to say something more precise; Dido left the Kingdom of Tyre, in the seventh Year of Pygmalion's Reign, 247 Years after the taking of Troy, and 953 Years before Jesus Christ.

Her Subjects after her Death ascribed divine Honours to her, and instituted to her religious Worship (a). According to Ovid she had paid the same Honours to her Husband Sichæus.

The History of the Daughters of Anius, at whose Court Eneas resided for some Time, and who, according to Ovid, were transformed into Pigeons; requires also to have the Fable of it explained.

Anius King of Delos, and also High-Priest of Apollo (b), was of the Family of Cadmus on the Side of his Mother Rheo, the Daughter of Staphilus, who claimed Bacchus for his Father. Rheo having had some Intrigue (c), her Father exposed her upon the Sea in a little Ship, in which she arrived at Delos, where she was delivered of Anius; who by his Marriage with Doripe, had three Daughters extremely frugal, and who laid up great Store of Offerings that were brought to the Temple of Apollo. The Greeks, during the Siege of Troy, sent Palamedes to ask Provisions from Anius, and obliged him even to give his Daughters Hostages. These Princesses however found a Way to make their escape; which gave occasion to say that Bacchus had transformed them to Pigeons. As to what is alleged that they turned every thing they touched into Wine, Corn and Oil, it was founded, in the Opinion of the learned Bochart, upon the Etymologies of the Names of these three Virgins, Æno, Spermo, and Elaïs, which may refer to the Wine, Corn; and Oil; that were offered for ordinary to Apollo, and whereof they laid up Store that were of great Service to the Grecian Army.

VOL. IV.

Y

As

(a) See his Epistle to M. Segrais's Loco cit.

(b) Rex Anius, Rex idem hominum Phœbique sacerdos. Virg. l. 3.

(c) Dicd. l. 7.

As to what Virgil says, that Eneas upon his Arrival in Italy went to consult the Sibyl who conducted him to Hell, this is only an Episode of that Poet's Invention, to embellish his Poem; and we will not resume here, what has been said of those famous Prophetesses in the first Volume (1). There occur however some other Fables in the History of Eneas, which are neither important, nor difficult to be explained. The first is that of the City Ardea, which is said to have been transformed into a Bird (2); the Foundation whereof is that Eneas's Troops having set Fire to that City, the Capital of the Rutuli, it was given out to be metamorphosed into that Bird which bears the same Name with the City (3). It appears to have been afterwards rebuilt, since we learn from Titus Livius, that it was still subsisting in the Time of the Tarquins.

The second is that of Eneas's Ships transformed into Nymphs by Cybele (4), but this is only another Episode to embellish the History of this Heroe; for the Truth is that Turnus set Fire to them, to cut off from his Enemy all Means of escape: And because they would needs have every thing that concerned this Founder of the Roman Empire to be marvellous, hence Virgil took a Handle from those Ships being made of Firr consecrated to Cybele, to say that Goddess, to revenge the Affront offered to her thereby, had transformed them into Sea-Nymphs.

The third is that of the White Sow that pointed out to Eneas the Place of his Settlement. After the following Manner is the Story related by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (5), and Titus Livius (6). Eneas having learned from the Oracle of Dodona, or according to others from the Sibyl, that he was to stop at the Place where a white Sow should bring forth her young; when this Prince had arrived in Italy, and was preparing to offer a Sacrifice in order to get farther Insight into his Destiny, the Sow that was to have been sacrificed, escaped out of the Sacrificer's Hands, and fled fled towards the Sea. Eneas, calling to Mind the Oracle, followed her until she stopp'd in a Place that was very high. This Place being barren and uncultivated, our Heroe was at a Loss how this could be reconciled with the magnificent Promises of the Oracle, when a Voice proceeded from the neighbouring Wood, and intimated to him that this was the Place where he was to build a City, and that after having resided there as many Years as the Sow should bring forth young, a more considerable Settlement was decreed for him by the Fates. Eneas obeyed the heavenly Voice, and began to lay the Foundations of a City that was called Lavinium, as has been said; the Day after the Sow brought forth thirty young, which presaged that within thirty Years he was to build another City.

(1) L. 5. (2) Ovid. Met. l. 14. (3) Ardea. (4) Virg. l. 9.
(5) Ant. Rom. l. 1. (6) L. 1.

This Fable would seem to signify, that Eneas was able to procure at first only a little barren Spot of Ground overgrown with Wood; but that afterwards, upon the Defeat of Turnus, and his Alliance with Latinus, he became capable of aggrandizing himself. Perhaps too as he was very superstitious, the Victim might happen to escape by Accident, and he follow it as a Presage given him by the Gods. The same Authors inform us of other Prodigies that are as little worthy of Credit.

C H A P. VII.

The History of Memnon.

THERE is no doubt, as we shall see in the Sequel of this Chapter, but that Memnon the Son of Tithonus, as Priam's Kinsman and Ally; furnished him with Troops towards the End of the Siege of Troy; this is what all the Ancients who have made mention of this War are agreed in. Homer, 'tis true, says nothing of it in his Iliad, because that Prince not having arrived till about the Middle of the tenth Year of the Siege, at which Period of Time all the Incidents that enter into that Poem had happened, he was in the right not to name him among the other Allies of the Trojans. However, as he has inserted in his Odyſſey ſeveral Particulars concerning this ſame War, he there ſays (1), the Son of Aurora ſlew Antilochus the Son of Neftor; which all the Learned underſtand of Memnon, for Reaſons which we ſhall ſee afterwards. The ſame Poet names him too in the eleventh Book, where he makes Ulyſſes ſay, that of all the Shades the moſt beautiful next to Memnon, was that of Eurypilus. But 'tis not very eaſy to determine who he was, and whence he came, the Learned being very much divided on this Head; ſome following the Greek Traditions, that make him come from Persia, whither his Father Titbonus had retired; others from Egypt, whither it was Amenophis, or Setbos, or ſome other Prince that reigned there at that Time: Difficulties on both ſides, tho' not ſo great in following the Greek Hiſtory, than the Egyptian Tradition concerning that Time. To be convinced of this, we need but conſider, how Perizonius and M. Fourmond the elder have been perplexed, they who have examined this Article with a great deal of Care.

Thus the firſt knows not what King of Egypt to fix upon to find out Memnon; he ſeems however, after many Diſcuſſions, to conclude that he was the Son of Proteus, who, according to Homer, reigned there in the Time of the Trojan War; and that Proteus is the ſame with Setbos, or the Titbonus of the Greeks. But in following this Hypotheſis, we are very ſoon intangled in a new Difficulty. Pauſanias ſpeaking of the famous Statue of Memnon, ſays it was that of an Egyptian King whom they named Phenompbas, or Amenophis: Now about that time we find two Princes of this laſt Name; namely the eighth and ſeventeenth of the eighteenth Dynasty of the Dioſpolitans. Whoſe Statue was it of the two? Eusebius and after him Syncellus, are of Opinion that it is the firſt's; and Perizonius ſometimes will have it to belong to the ſecond, ſometimes

he

(1) Odyſſey, l. 4.

he knows not what to make of it, ad alterutrum ego retulerim hunc Memnonem.

Farther, another thing that perplexes our Author, is what we read in Strabo (1) that the Memnon of the Siege of Troy was named by the Egyptians, Ismandes, or Mandes; he must therefore find his Memnon in that Prince, as he does: But still new Difficulties. Diodorus Siculus gives the Name of Maro to this Mandes, and asserts that it was he who built the Labyrinth: We must therefore once more seek the Memnon of the Greeks, in him who during his Reign executed that Work which has been the Admiration of the World; but how had he the Time to get it done, his Father Titbonus having died in extreme old Age, and he himself having lost his Life at the Siege of Troy? It required at least a long Reign and a continued Tract of Peace to carry on that Structure, which Pliny calls Portentosissimum humani ingenii opus. The most amazing Work of human Invention.

M. Fourmond the elder (a), sufficiently shews the Weakness of Perizonius's Opinion, and that his very Conjectures destroy themselves. In fact, that learned Author having made Amemenes the Son of Proteus, pitches afterwards upon Amenophis, then he returns to the former: And after a good deal of Reasoning, he comes to agree with Manetho, whose Opinion he pretends to recede from. The same M. Fourmond fully proves next under what King of Egypt Troy was taken; being persuaded that Manetho, an Egyptian Author, must be preferred to Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus; but does he find the Titbonus of the Greeks, and his Son Memnon in him who lived at Diospolis, in the Time of the Siege of that City? This is what he seems not to me to have proved. Besides, another Difficulty that equally affects all those who have recourse to Egypt for the Prince who came to the Succour of the Phrygians, on what Foundation can they assure us, that the King of Egypt

(1) Geogr. 1. 17.

(a) Reflexions upon the History of ancient Nations. Tom. ii. p. 169.

of that Time, was the Kinsman and Ally of Priam, and that he sent from the Extremity of Thebais where he reigned, his Son with twenty thousand Men, to the Relief of a City so remote, and whereof probably he had never heard a Word? The Kings of Egypt, those especially of Diospolis who reigned in that Time, proud of their Power, their Forces and Riches, had a high Contempt of other Kings, and never would admit of any Comparison with them.

We must therefore return to the Tradition of the Greeks, the only probable one as to this Article. Hesiod is the first who made use of it; Pindar improved upon it afterwards, and Ovid adds new Circumstances to it of his own. 'Tis true, in these Poets it is adulterated with several Fables, but they are such as are not inexplicable, as will appear at first Sight.

Reinerius Reinecius, in his learned Work upon ancient Families (1), is of Opinion that Tithonus was the Son of Tros, and Brother to Laomedon; and he prefers this Opinion to that of Homer, followed therein by Apollodorus, Ovid and Hyginus, who will have it that Laomedon was his Father, and consequently that he was Priam's Brother. Tithonus not satisfied with his Portion, and his Brother Laomedon who succeeded to his Father Tros, probably allowing him no great Share in the Administration, he had no other Way to employ his Time but in Hunting, of which he was desperately fond. As he was wont every Morning to get up before the rising Sun, to plant his Toils in the Woods, hence he was said by a natural enough Metaphor to be enamoured of Aurora; and having abandoned Phrygia from some Disgust, whereof we know not the Cause, and repaired to Susa where Teutamus then reigned, he was favourably entertained by him, the Kingdom of Priam holding at that Time of the King of Persia. This Retreat gave Birth to a second Fiction. It was given out that Aurora had ravished Tithonus; a Fable which, no doubt, took its rise from what we have said of his love of Hunting, and from his his Retreat into a Country which lay to the East of Phrygia.

(1) Tom. iii. de Trojan. orig. & imperio, p. 13.

Teutamus procured Titbonus a good Settlement in his Dominions, and gave him in Marriage Ida, by whom he had Memnon; and as the Exercise of the Body, when it is not carried too far, has a great Influence to strengthen the Constitution, and to produce a good State of Health, Titbonus died in an extreme old Age. Hence arose another Fiction: It was fabled that his Lover had transformed him into a Grasshopper, either to set forth to us that he had lived to a great Age; for, according to popular Opinion, this Insect, like the Serpent, is thought to renew its Age every Year by changing its Skin; or to denote that he resembled that little Animal in endless Prattle, as is the Manner of old Men.

Memnon led to Troy ten thousand Persians, and as many Ethiopians, with a great Number of Chariots. He set out, according to Pausanias, not from Ethiopia, but from the City Susa in Persia, and from the Banks of the River Choaspes; and his Expedition was so unquestionably true, that the Phrygians shewed even in the Time of that Author, the Rout he had taken, his Marches, and his several Encampments. We learn the same Fact from most of the Ancients, and particularly from Diodorus Siculus, Quintus Smyrneus, and Ausonius. This Prince was presently distinguished by his Valour, and made great Havock of all the Greeks who came in his Way. He slew Antilochus, who was hastening to the Relief of his Father Nestor, ready to sink under his Blows, and who saved his Life at the Expence of his own. Homer, who makes no mention of Memnon in his Iliad, as I have already remarked, has not omitted this Piece of History in his Odyssey (1). After that Poet has told us that the Speech of Menelaus concerning Ulysses, had drawn Tears from all who were present, he adds: Pisistratus the Son of the wise Nestor, was tenderly affected with the Relation; his Brother Antilochus, whom the valiant Son of the Morning had slain

(1) Odyss. l. 4. v. 187.

in Battle, occurred to his Mind, and at this Remembrance, with Tears trickling down his Cheeks he bespeaks Menelaus, &c.

Nestor inconsolable for the Death of his Son, who had so generously devoted himself for him, engaged Achilles to give him Revenge; and that young Prince having attacked Memnon, slew him at last after a sharp Combat, which Quintus Smyrneus describes at full length. Sumptuous Funerals were given him. According to some of the Ancients, his Ashes were carried into Persia, to comfort his Father who was still alive (a), tho' 'tis more probable that his Body was burnt, and his Ashes put in a Tomb upon the Trojan Coast; and that the Tomb which Strabo says he had in Susiana, was but a mere Cenotaph which had been raised there to his Honour. This Combat of Achilles with Memnon employed the Pencil of Polygnotus, as we read in Pausanias.

It happened perhaps that during the Ceremony of his Funerals, some travelling Birds that came at that Time into Pbrygia, alighted in that Place; which gave some Flatterers a Handle to say, that they had sprung from his Ashes (1), and from that Time they got the Name of Memnonides. Elian (2) says these Birds were black, shaped much like Hawks, which came every Year in Autumn from the Country of Cyzicus, to the Mountain where was this Prince's Tomb; that they divided into two Companies, fought together, and that the Conquerors returned after the Fight. Pliny adds (3), that there are several Authors who assert the same Thing; and if we may believe Cremenius (4), they performed the same Game in Ethiopia every fifth Year, near the Place where Memnon's Palace stood. Pausanias, (b) Solinus, and others, make mention of it likewise. The

(a) The Death of Antilochus and the Combat between Memnon and Achilles, are represented in the Iliac Table, as they also were, according to Pausanias, upon a Work of Bathycles.

(1) Ovid. l. 13. (2) L. 5. de Anim. (3) L. 2. c. 26. (4) Apud Plin. loc. cit.

(b) See Pausanias in Attic. Strabo, Pliny, Tacitus, Lucian, Philophrastus, Tzetzes, &c.

The first, after having said that Polygnotus had represented in that fine Picture, the Subject whereof was the taking of Troy, these Birds which had no other Name but the Birds of Memnon, tells us that those who inhabited the Coasts of the Hellespont, asserted that every Year upon one precise Day, they came and made clean a certain Space of Ground about the Tomb of this Prince, where neither Tree nor Grass was left to grow, and that afterwards they watered it with their Wings, which they went and dipped of purpose in the River Efopus.

What is reported of the Statue of this Prince at Thebes in Egypt, is no less wonderful: It is alledged that when the Sun-beams happened to strike upon it, it sent forth an harmonious Sound. Strabo, a very judicious Author, says he himself had been Witness to this Miracle, which can be attributed to nothing but either the Quality of the Stone it was made of, or to the Imposture of the Priests, or rather to some secret Spring which the learned Kircher, after Pausanias, alledges to have been a kind of Harpsicol inclosed within the Statue, and whose Strings being first slackened by the Moisture of the Night, and then distended by the Heat of the Sun, broke with a Noise (1) resembling that of the String of a Violin when it breaks. Cambyfes, who spared not the Egyptian Ox Apis, having a Mind to see through this Mystery, wherein he suspected some Trick of Magic, broke the Statue from the Head to the middle of the Body.

But 'tis necessary to observe, that the Ancients vary so much with respect to this Statue, that we would not know what to fix upon; if Strabo (2), an Author who was an Eye-witness, and who has no Design to impose, had not told us that he himself saw it, and heard the Noise it made. “ I was, says he, with Ælius Gallus, “ and with a Number of Friends, when as we were “ surveying the Colossus, we heard a certain Sound, “ without being able however to determine, whether “ it came from the Statue, or the Base, or if it proceeded

(1) Pausan. in Attic. (2) Lib. 17.

“ceeded from any of the By-standers : For I would “rather believe any thing else, than imagine that “Stones ranged in such and such a Manner, were “capable of yielding such a Sound.”

To the Authority of this learned Geographer, we might add that of Pausanias, who in his Travels thro’ Egypt, saw the sorry Remains of this Statue, which Cambyfes had broke. The lower Part of the Colossus, says he, was still upon its Pedestal, while the rest of the Body was thrown down to the Ground, and every Morning at the Sun-rising yielded the Sound we have now been speaking of. Pliny (1) indeed, and Tacitus (2) both advance the same Fact, but without having been Witnesses to it; and Lucian (3) informs us that Demetrius went of purpose to Egypt, to see there the Pyramids, and Memnon’s Statue, from whence a Voice proceeded at the rising of the Sun. What the same Author adds in the Dialogue of the false Prophet, appears to be meer Raillery : “When, says he, in my “younger Days I was in Egypt, I had the Curiosity
 “to go and see the Miracle that was reported concerning Memnon’s Statue, which uttered a certain “Sound at Sun-rising; and I heard this Sound as the “Voice of an Oracle, and not after the Manner of “others who heard only an inarticulate Noise, since “Memnon himself delivered an Oracle every seventh “Year, which I would rehearse, if I did not think it “needless.”

Tho’ ’tis obvious that Lucian only jeers in that Place, ’tis nevertheless true, that the Statue we are now speaking of was believed to deliver Oracles.

Those who have read the Poets know with what flourishes they have set off the Article of Memnon’s Death. We see in their Writings, sometimes the Gods in full Council, at a Loss what Resolution to take upon the Death of this Prince : Sometimes Aurora in the Bitterness of her Grief refusing her Light to the World, until Jupiter had determined her to resume her ordinary Functions, &c.

If

(1) L. 36. c. 7. (2) Annal. l. 2. (3) In Toxi.

If it be asked whence it came to be said that Titonus his Father first asked of Aurora his Spouse to live several Ages, and that afterwards oppressed with the Infirmities of old Age he desired to be transformed into a Grasshopper, which was granted him; I answer that this implies in plain English, that Titonus lived very long, and that he was perhaps, after the Example of other old Men, so open and talkative, as to be compared to a Grasshopper; or rather this Fable was composed to support the Fiction of his Intrigue with Aurora; for the Grasshopper feeds upon the Dew that falls at the Rise of the Morning; or, if you will, it intimates that this Prince, weakened by great Age, had often recover'd his Strength by Remedies that were given him, whence he came to be compared to the Grasshopper that changes its Skin, and recovers its Strength, after it is exhausted by continual singing, and the Heat of the Sun.

There is no less Variety among both Ancients and Moderns concerning Memnon himself than in Relation to his Statue. As Hesiod had said he was King of Thebes, the Greek Authors who came afterwards, instead of examining if what that Poet said had any Foundation in Chronology, and in the Egyptian History, adopted it without any Restriction. Pausanias, Strabo, Diodorus speak of it, as also Pindar and Ovid. They thought themselves sufficiently warranted by Hesiod's saying Memnon was the Son of Titonus, Laomedon's Brother, to give out that that Prince had sent him to the Assistance of Priam his Nephew. And if these same Authors make him King of Ethiopia, tho' Hesiod says he was King of Egypt, it is because before Psammeticus, the Greeks were but little acquainted with Egypt, believing that Kingdom extended not far beyond the Delta, taking all the rest, especially Thebais, for Ethiopia, as Strabo remarks (a). The Author whom I here mention, has laid out a great deal of Erudition upon this Article, as well as upon Memnon's Statue; but in order, order to reconcile him with the other Greeks, we may say there were several Princes of the same Name, and that the History of Amenophis served perhaps to embellish that of Memnon. M. le Clerc has a very singular Opinion concerning this Prince: he takes him for Hammon, or Hem, the Son of Noah; and Vossius (a) asserts that he was the same with Bealtis, a Divinity of the Syrians, Male and Female, called by the Greeks, Aphrodité, and represented under the Form of a Stone: Accordingly Philostratus, as that learned Author remarks, says, Memnon was transformed into a black Stone, or rather into a Statue of black Stone, in the Taste of the Ancients, whereof the Eyes were shut, the Legs and Arms joined, and very little different from rough unpolished Stones. This is the Idea that Author gives of it in the Life of Apollonius Tyanæus, though all the rest speak of Memnon's Statue that was at Thebes, in Egypt, as a Colossal Figure, having the Mouth open, and resembling a Man who is about to speak.

(a) L. 1. Homer has confounded these two Countries in his Odsey, L. 4. See Marshall's Seculo 15.

To finish this History, I shall add that we have nothing more particular upon this Subject than what we read in Diodorus Siculus: namely, that this Prince the Son of Tithonus led to Troy the Assyrian Troops, under the Reign of Teutamus, who was the twentieth King from Ninus and Semiramis, the Assyrians possessing at that time, which is upwards of a thousand Years ago, the Empire of Asia; Priam who was Tributary to the Kingdom of Teutamus, having applied to him for Assistance in his pressing Exigency, and having sent to him under the Conduct of Memnon, ten thousand Assyrians, and as many Persians; with two hundred Chariots, as has been already said. Whence we must conclude that the Persians whom Diodorus speaks of in this Place, being from Sesiana, that Part of Persia that went under that Name was then Subject to the Assyrians, and that those Ethiopians were oriental Ethiopians, sufficiently distinguished by the Ancients, from the Ethiopians that are in the middle of Egypt. Such was the Country of Memnon, and that of the Troops he led to Troy. Those who make

(a) Observat. upon Pomponius Mela.

make this Prince a Native of Phrygia, give Ground to believe that this was possibly the Reason why Teutamus made Choice of him to command the Troops he sent to Priam. That the Kingdom of Tros had been tributary to the ancient Empire of the Assyrians, besides what has been quoted from Diodorus Siculus, is confirmed by Plato, who expressly says so (1); but here is a Passage taken from Huetius's Treatise concerning the Situation of the Terrestrial Paradise (2), which throws more Light upon the History of Memnon, than all that had been said before him. “ Memnon, says that learned Prelate, was the Son of Tithonus and Aurora. “ Tithonus was the Brother of Priam King of Troy, and “ to him is sometimes ascribed the Founding of the “ City Susa, the Capital of Susiana. From the Name “ of Memnon his Son, the Citadel was denominated “ Memnonium, the Palace and the Walls Memnonian, “ and Susa itself the City of Memnon, upon Account “ of the Veneration that was paid to him there; and “ in Honour of him a Temple was built, whither the “ Assyrians went and mourned for him, which is to be “ understood of the People of Susiana. This is that “ Memnon who came to the Assistance of the Trojans, “ from whom he derived his Original, and who was “ slain by Achilles. When the Greeks feigned that he “ was the Son of Aurora, they would have us to understand that he came from the East. - - - - I know the “ History of Memnon is very perplexed, and very differently related. Most ancient Authors tell us he “ was an Ethiopian: This Error flows from their confounding Chus, which signifies Susiana, with Chus “ which signifies the Countries situated upon the Borders of the Arabick Gulph, I mean Ethiopia and Arabia. - - - - What we are in Reason to think concerning Memnon's Expedition, may be gathered from “ Diodorus, and some others. The Kingdom of Troas “ was in the Dependence of the Empire of Assyria. “ Tithonus, Priam's Brother, who was Master of that “ King-

(1) De leg. L. 3. (2) Ch. 13.

“ Kingdom, went to the Court of the King of Assyria,
 “ who gave him the Government of Susiana. There
 “ he married in his old Age; and because his Wife “ was from a Country situated to the East of Greece
 “ and Troas, the Greeks who turned all History into “ Fiction, said he had married the Morning. Mem-
 “ non and Enaibion were the Issue of this Marriage:
 “ the War having after this arisen, Priam applied to “ Teutamus for Assistance, or at least to some King of “ Assyria, who granted him twenty thousand Men,
 “ and two hundred Chariots of War. Diodorus says
 “ this Supply consisted of ten thousand Ethiopians,
 “ and ten thousand Susians, returning to the vulgar “ Error, and confounding the Chus of Ethiopia with “ the Chus of Susiana. To make this Supply of more “ Service, Teutamus gave the Command thereof to “ Memnon, a young Prince of the Trojan Race, and “ who was therefore concerned for the Preservation of “ Troy. He kept Tithonus with himself upon Account “ of his Age, which rendered him unfit for the Ex“ pedition, and his Prudence which qualified him for “ being Member of his Council. Memnon found Re“ sistance in his March. The Solyimi, who have been “ since called the Pisidians, would needs dispute the “ Passage with him; but he defeated them and all that “ opposed him. He cleared the Passes, repaired the “ Ways, and by Reason of that long and dangerous “ March, had the Honour to communicate his Name
 “ to that high Way which was denominated Memnoni-
 “ an. He sustained the Attacks of the Greeks before “ Troy with great Valour; but at last was slain by “ Achilles. Various Accounts are given of the Place “ of his Burial; for not to mention Philostratus, who “ will have it that he had no Sepulchre, but that he “ was transformed into that miraculous Stone, Troas, “ Phenicia and Susiana contended together for him,
 “ and especially Ethiopia, tho’ it has no other Right
 “ to his Burial any more than to his Birth, but that “ which arises from the Equivocation of the Word “ Chus. But notwithstanding the Obscurity that this Equivocation

“ Equivocation has cast upon this History, Philostratus, “ George Syncellus, that is, the Coadjutor to the “ Church of Constantinople, and Suidas who had read
 “ and copied good Authors, tho’ often not very judi“ ciously, have not been wanting to bear Testimony “ to the Truth; the first telling us that Memnon the “ Ethiopian, that is Amenophis, never came from Troy,
 “ and that he was wrongfully confounded with Mem-
 “ non the Trojan, not comprehending how Memnon
 “ could have brought Supply to the Trojans from so “ great a Distance, nor even by what Adventure Ti- “ thonus had gone and settled in Ethiopia, and came to “ be King thereof: the second, by distinguishing exact“ ly Amenophis King of Thebes in Egypt, who is also “ stiled Memnon, from the speaking Statue of Memnon
 “ the Son of Tithonus, whom he ranks among the “ Kings of Assyria; and Suidas, by asserting that that “ Memnon was not an Ethiopian, but a Susian. Pausa- “ nias, tho’ of a very penetrating Genius, has but half “ unravelled this Confusion; saying that Memnon the “ Ethiopian came not from Ethiopia to Troy, but from “ Susa. Eustathius, and the Scholiast on Pindar, who “ goes by the Name of Triclinius, write that Memnon
 “ and Emathion his Brother were the only white Men “ among those Ethiopians, tho’ Virgil and others make “ Memnon black. This Remark confirms my Opinion;
 “ for tho’ the Poets and Writers of Romance have “ taken the Liberty to feign that Andromeda and Cha- “ riceus were born white among the Blacks, yet this “ is so singular in the ordinary Course of Nature, that “ there is much more Reason to believe that Memnon
 “ was white, because in Fact he was not an Ethiopian.”

C H A P. VIII.

The History of Eurypilus.

A MONG the Trojan Allies Eurypilus deserves a Place of Distinction, no less for his Birth than his excellent Qualifications, which gained him the Name
 of

of Heroe from the Greeks themselves; for Ulysses, who saw his Shade in Hell, gives him this Title.

He was the Son of Telephus, and Grandson of Hercules; and by the Side of his Mother Astioche, Priam's Sister, derived his Extraction from the Blood of the Trojan Kings.

This Prince was one of the handsomest and best made of his Time; but his were not effeminate Beauties, since to the personal Qualities with which Nature had favoured him, he joined a great deal of Valour and Courage. Accordingly we learn from Quintus Smyrneus, and the same Thing is represented upon the Iliac Table, that he slew Nireus, the Son of King Charosi and Aglaia, who had brought from Synna his Troops, in three Ships, as we read in Homer (1), and after a sharp Combat he slew Machaon the Son of Esculapius, who was seeking to revenge the Death of Nireus.

As he arrived not at the Siege of Troy till the End of the tenth Year, 'tis no Wonder that Homer has said nothing of him in his Iliad; but he has not omitted him in the Odyssey, as has been already remarked. After the following Manner does Ulysses speak of him to Alcinous, in Relation to the Feats of Neoptolemus at the Siege of Troy, where he arrived after the Death of his Father.

*Before the Van, impatient for the Fight,
With martial Port he strode, and stern Delight;
Heaps strow'd on Heaps beneath his Faulchion groan'd,
And Monuments of Dead deform'd the Ground.
The Time wou'd fail should I in order tell
What Foes were vanquish'd, and what Numbers fell;
How, lost thro' Love, Eurypilus was slain,
And round him bled his bold Cetaean Train.
To Troy no Heroe came of nobler Line,
Or if of nobler, Memnon, it was thine.*

Pope's Odysf. B. xi. 629.

This

This Passage in Homer informs us of many Circumstances of this Heroe's History which we should otherwise have been ignorant of: That this Prince was one of the handsomest of his Time; that he fought stoutly at the Siege of Troy, that he was slain by Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus the Son of Achilles; that he had conducted to this Siege the Ceteans, over whom no doubt he reigned. Now the Ceteans inhabited Mysia, a Part of Asia Minor which was near the River Caicus. This is what we learn from Quintus Smyrneus (1) when speaking of the Arrival of Eurypilus at the Siege of Troy, he says he was followed by the warlike Ceteans who inhabited upon the Banks of the Caicus; or, to speak more accurately, upon the Banks of the Cetium, another River near the Caicus, as appears from a Medal referred to by Spanheim, and struck at Pergamus, in the Time of Adrian the Emperor. If it be ask'd why the Pergamenians struck this Medal, it was, as we are told by that learned Antiquary after Aristides, because that People reckoned Telephus the Father of Eurypilus in the Number of their Founders. The Pergamenians, to flatter Adrian, had represented upon this Medal of theirs this Heroe, under the Resemblance of, and with the same Features as Antinous.

We learn farther from the Passage in Homer, that Eurypilus came to the Siege of Troy in Hope of becoming Son-in-law to his Uncle Priam, who had promised him his Daughter Cassandra in Marriage. In fine, that the Ceteans his Subjects, who all fought about their King till they died, had been drawn to the same Siege in Hope of marrying Trojan Women; for 'tis thus Madam Dacier explains it, tho' the Text of Homer bears only; His Companions the Ceteans were slain as they fought about his Body, for the Presents of the Women.

Strabo, who has quoted this Passage of Homer in his Geography, speaks of it to this Effect: Homer in this Place proposes to us a Riddle rather than a Point of clear and plain History, for we neither know what People these Ceteans were, nor what we are to understand by the Pre- sents of the Women, and the Grammarians, in the Fables they deliver, set forth to us their own Fancies much more than a Solution of the Difficulty. There are therefore here two Riddles instead of one, the first consists in finding out who these Ceteans were whom Eurypilus had brought to the Siege of Troy. The second, what we are to understand by these Presents of Women. But the first is no Riddle: we know it, and I have proved from the Authority of Quintus Smyrneus, to whom we may join Hesychius, that they were a People of Mysia who inhabited upon the Banks of the Caicus, and that it was there Telephus the Father of Eurypilus had settled. Strabo agrees to it, and says this is Homer's Sentiment. The same Author also grants that a Rivulet, which was called the Ceteum, run into the Caicus; why then would he not understand that the People who inhabited the Confines, might be called the Ceteans? Madam Dacier in her Notes upon the Odysssey (1), has endeavoured to explain the second Difficulty; but not to dissemble, she has for her Opinion only Diclys of Crete, whose Authority is not generally acknowledged. This Author will have it that Homer in this Passage had an Eye to the Presents which Priam had sent to his Sister Astioche to engage her to make her Son come to his Assistance, with a Promise besides to his Nephew to give him his Daughter in Marriage. Among these Presents is reckoned a golden Vine, which Jupiter was said to have given formerly to Tros. Whatever be in that, it appears that Priam, hard put to it by his Enemies, had drawn to his Assistance several Princes by promising them his Daughter Cassandra. Virgil informs us that Chorebus came thither with that View, and Homer says the same of Othryoneus the Thracian.

(1) L. 6, v. 121.

C H A P. IX.

The History of Laocoon.

LAOCOON for his Birth, and Dignity, no less than for the tragical Adventure that ended his Days,

(1) Tom. 2. p. 379.

Days, an Adventure which Virgil so elegantly describes in the second Book of the Æneid, and which is represented in one of the finest Monuments of Antiquity now remaining, well deserves a separate Article. The Ancients who are not agreed as to the Family whence he derived his Original, are unanimous however that it was an illustrious one. Hyginus (1) says he was the Son of Acætes, and the Brother of Anchises. The Commentators on this Mythologist are of Opinion, and with Reason, that there is an Error in this Place, and that if Laocoon was Brother to Anchises, we must substitute in Place of Acætes, Capys, who with the Consent of all, was the Father of that Trojan Prince. Priest of Apollo, he was appointed by Lot to the same Office for Neptune, as we learn from Virgil (a), and it was in Quality of Priest of that God that he was sacrificing a Bull upon the Sea-shore, on the Day that preceded the Destruction of Troy. While the Trojans were busied in surveying the wooden Horse which the Greeks had left in their Camp, Laocoon came from Troy, and after having in vain endeavoured to persuade them to have nothing to do with such a Present, which they ought to consider only as a Machine, in whose capacious Womb their Enemies lay concealed, or which was designed for the battering down of their Walls, he darted his Javelin at it, which made it ring with a hollow confused Sound.

This Action was construed by all as Impiety, and they were much more confirmed in their Opinion, when at the same time that this Priest was offering the Sacrifice above mentioned, two hideous Serpents from the Island of Tenedos, according to Virgil, or from Calydonæ, if we may believe Bacchillides quoted by Servius, after having crossed the Sea that separates those Islands from Troas, advanced directly to the Altar where Laocoon was sacrificing, fell upon his two Sons, whom Hyginus names Antiphatus and Tymbræus (b); and after having piteously devoured them, seized upon Laocoon

Z 2

him-

(1) Fab. 735.

(a) Laocoon ductus Neptuno sorte Sacerdos.

Æn. l. 2.

(b) Theffander in Servius calls them Melanthus and Ethronus.

himself as he was coming to their Relief, and cruelly stung him to Death (a).

'Tis this Adventure has given Rise to a Master-piece of Sculpture representing it. This admirable Groupe, the Work, according to Pliny, of three celebrated Sculptors in Rhodes, Agessander, Polydorus, and Athenodorus, made of one single Block of Marble, was in the time of that Author in the Palace of Titus the Emperor, and is at this Day in the Gardens of the Belveder (b).

Those who have seen the Original, or the fine Copy, which is in bronze at Trianon, will easily perceive that this Groupe is formed upon Virgil's Description, whereof it perfectly exhibits the Spirit and Expression. But I must observe that our French Translators of this Poet, even the last who is so elegant, have not done Justice to the whole Sentiment, contenting themselves with saying that the two Serpents in curling Volumes twice in-folded the Body of Laocoon, and twice his Neck, taking no Notice of what follows, tho' it gives the finishing Stroke to this fine Picture, superant capite & cervicibus altis; it ought therefore to have been added, that notwithstanding those complicated Folds, they still over-top'd Laocoon by the whole Head and Shoulders.

C H A P. X.

The History of Paris, Helen, Menelaus, and Oenone.

HECUBA, when with Child, had a frightful Dream: She thought she carried in her Womb a Torch that was one Day to set on Fire the Trojan Empire. The Soothsayers consulted about this Dream, said

(a) Hæginus ascribes this sad Catastrophe to the Wrath of Apollo, who thereby took Vengeance on Laocoon for having married contrary to the express Prohibition given him against it.

(b) Laocoon qui est in Titi Imperatoris domo, opus omnibus & picturæ & statuariæ artis præferendum. Ex uno lapide, eum & liberos, draconumque mirabiles nexus, de consilii sententia fecere summi artifices Agessander, Polydorus & Athenodorus.

Rhodii. Plin. l. 36. c. 4.

said the Son whom this Princess was to bring forth, would be the Cause of the Desolation of Priam's Kingdom. Thus the Queen being delivered, he was exposed upon Mount Ida, where some Shepherds brought him up. Alexander, this is the Name he went by at first (a), being grown up, distinguished himself among his Companions, and fell in Love with a Shepherdess named Oenone, the Daughter of the River Cedrenus; that is, of a petty King of that Country, who gave his Name to that River, and by her he had a Son exquisitely beautiful, named Corythus. Oenone jealous of Paris who had carried off Helen, as shall be said immediately, sent this Son to Troy, enjoining him to visit her Rival constantly; and the young Man discharged this Commission so well, that Paris took Umbrage at him; and having one Day entered his Wife's Apartment, and finding him sitting by her, slew him in a Transport of Passion (b). Oenone, incensed at this new Insult, poured out a thousand Imprecations upon her Lover; and as she had the Gift of Prediction, and some Skill in Plants, and their Use in Medicine, Talents which she was said to have received from Apollo who had been in Love with her, she foretold that the perfidious Paris would one Day be wounded, and have Recourse to her in vain, as I observe elsewhere.

In the mean while, an Adventure happened which brought Alexander to be known: One of Priam's Sons having carried off one of his Bulls, to give to him who should win the Prize at the Funeral Games that were to be celebrated at Troy, he went thither himself, entered the Lists with his Brothers, and vanquished them (1):

Z 3

Deiphobus,

(a) This Name, which is derived from a Greek Word that signifies, to defend, to succour, was given him by the Shepherds of Mount Ida, upon Account of the Courage he had shewed in defending his Flocks. He is thought to have been called Efacus before.

(b) Conon. nar. 23. gives this Account of young Corythus's Death; nor is he the only one of the Ancients who speaks of this Son of Paris and Oenone. Parthenias, who cites to this Purpose the Troicks of Hellanicus, Lycophron, and his Commentator Tzetzes, make also mention of him.

(1) Hygin. Fab. 91.

Deiphobus, or, according to others, Hector, was going to have killed him; but Alexander having shewed the swadling Cloaths in which he had been exposed (1), was known by Priam, and received by him with great Joy; and believing the Oracle which foretold him that his Son would bring about the Ruin of his Kingdom, before he came to the Age of thirty Years, to be false, since he was now full thirty, he was conducted to the Palace, and had the Name of Paris given him.

Some Time after, his Father having sent him into Greece, under Pretext of sacrificing to Apollo of Delphi, but in Reality to take Possession of his Aunt Hesione's Estate, he fell in Love with Helen, carried her off, and drew upon his Party that Bloody War which we have been speaking of, wherein he lost his Life. Oenone is said to have foretold all the Circumstances of his Life, and that he would come one Day and die in her Arms; which accordingly happened: For finding himself wounded, he gave Orders to carry him to Mount Ida to apply to her for a Cure; but all her Remedies were ineffectual; the Wound he had received from Philoctetes by one of Hercules's poisoned Arrows, proved mortal. The unhappy Oenone died of Grief for the Loss of this faithless Lover.

To conclude, Paris, as we learn from Dares the Phrygian, who had seen him (a), was a very handsome Man; he had a fair Complexion, fine Eyes, a sweet Voice, and graceful Stature; besides, he was forward, bold, valiant and courageous, as Homer says in several Places. He wounded Diomedes, Machaon, Menelaus, Antilochus, Palamedes, and slew Achilles; and if he,
and

(1) Servius upon the fifth of the Eneid.

(a) Destruction of Troy, Corn. Nep. & Dion. Chrysost. say the same Thing.

I would have it observed once for all, that when in this History of the taking of Troy, and of the Circumstances that accompanied this Event, I cite Dares the Phrygian and Diclys of Crete, 'tis not that I believe they were present at the taking of that City, as they themselves say. Never did two Authors appear with more Marks of Imposture; but as they are incontestably ancient; that is, of the third or fourth Century, and as they seem to have read Works now lost, I thought their Authority was not to be despised.

and some other of the Grecian Captains sometimes throw up his Beauty to him, and tell him that he was more proper for the Feats of Love than War, it is owing to their Passion. Let us now say something of Helen.

The History of Helen. Helen was the Daughter of Tyndarus King of Sparta, and of Leda: I have said already what we are to think of her Birth, and of the Fable that made her pass for Jupiter's Daughter. As this Princess was exquisitely beautiful, Theseus ravished her at the Age of seven Years, according to some Authors, or of ten according to others, and put her into the Hands of his Mother Æthra, at Aphidnes. Her Brothers having received her, she was courted by several Princes who assembled at Sparta, that is, by all the Nobility of the Country, in an Age so fruitful in Heroism: Ulysses the Son of Laertes, Dio- mede the Son of Tydeus, Antilochus the Son of Nestor, Agapenor the Son of Anceus, Sthenelus the Son of Capaneus, Amphilochus, Thalpius, Mnestheus, Ajax the Son of Oileus, Ascalaphus the Son of Mars, Elpenor, Eumelus the Son of Admetus, Polypetes the Son of Pyrithous, Podalirius and Machaon the Sons of Esculapius, Philoctetes, Eurypilus, Protefilaus, Ajax and Teucer the Sons of Tela- mon, Patroclus the Son of *Menæti*us, and Menelaus the Son of Atreus; in a Word, almost all the Princes who were afterwards at the Siege of Troy, and who were the Children of those who had joined in the Conquest of the Golden Fleece, or in the Theban War, contended, according to Apollodorus (1), for this great Beauty, who was one Day to give the Crown of Sparta to him who gained her.

Tyndarus, amazed to see so many Competitors for his Daughter, was afraid lest if he gave the Preference to any one of them, the rest should raise an Insurrection; but Ulysses, who thought not himself powerful enough to get the better of the rest, and who was come to Sparta more out of Policy than Love, assured him that he would extricate him from his Difficulty, if he would contribute his Endeavours to get him Penelope.

(1) L. 3.

to Wife: That Prince having promised to do as he desired, Ulysses said his best Way was to take an Oath of all those Rivals, that when he had given one of them his Daughter they would join in Defence of him whom he should choose against those who should claim her from him. When Tyndarus had followed the Advice of the wife Ulysses, he determined in Favour of Mene-laus, the Brother of Agamemnon, who had already married Clytemnestra his other Daughter.

The Beginnings of this Marriage were very happy; and even her Adventure with Paris, which we have before related, did not quite extinguish the Passion of Mene-laus for her, since after the Ruin of Troy, this Traitors having basely given up to him Deiphobus, whom she had wedded after Paris's Death, he was so good natured as to construe this Sacrifice to be a Mark of her Affection to him (a), and was reconciled to her, tho' this is what all Authors are not agreed in (b).

After the Death of this Prince, or if we may believe Pausanias (1), while he was still abroad, Megapenthes and Nicostratus his natural Sons banished her, and she was forced, according to Herodotus (2), to repair to the Island of Rhodes, where Polixos, to revenge the Death of her Husband Tlepolemus slain at the Siege of Troy, sent to her in the Bath two Chamber-maids, who hanged her upon a Tree. The Rhodians, says Pausanias, erected a Temple to her under the Title of Helen Entitris, that is, hanging from a Branch, and decreed to her divine Honours.

This was not the only Temple that was raised to the Honour of this Princess. The Lacedemonians had built one to her in a Place of their City, called Terapne, above that of Apollo; and this Temple, we are told, had a Quality

(a) *Egregia inter conjux arma omnia tectis
Amovet, & fidum capiti subduxerat enssem.
Intra tecta vocat Menelaum, & limina pandit;
Scili et id magnum sperans fore munus amanti,
Et famam veterum extinguere sic posse malorum.*

(b) Pausanias l. 5. makes mention of a Statue of Menelaus, pursuing Helen with Sword in Hand; and Euripides, in his Troas, represents her Husband inveighing bitterly against her.

(1) In Lacon. (2) Lib. 2.

Quality of giving Charms to ugly Women; at least Herodotus (1) tells us that a Spartan Lady extremely rich, being delivered of a very ugly Daughter, a Person unknown appeared to the Nurse, who counselled her to carry her often into the Temple of Helen, in Consequence of which she became so handsome, that being married to Agetes Secretary to Ariston King of Sparta, this Prince fell in Love with her himself, and took her to Wife. If this pretended Miracle had been well attested, and the officious Nurse not substituted another Child, sure I am there had not been in all Greece a Temple more frequented than that of Helen.

As the Greeks had turned the Island Leucé into a kind of Elysian Fields, as has been said in the History of Achilles, there it was, say they, that Helen's Shade resided; and we read in Conon (2) that when Autoleon went thither to be cured of a Wound he had received in fighting against the Opuntians (3), Helen still resenting, even in that happy Region, the Aspersions Stesichorus had thrown upon her in his Verses, gave him to understand that if that Poet would recover his Sight, he must advise him to retract, and to write a Recantation.

To conclude, we must not forget that there occur vast Difficulties as to the Age of this Princess. 'Tis commonly thought that she was Twin-Sister to Castor, who joined in the Conquest of the Golden Fleece, that happened about thirty-five Years before the taking of Troy; we cannot allow this Prince less than fifteen Years when he made this Expedition with the Argonauts; thus it would follow that she was at least fifteen when Theseus ravished her, and sixty about the End of the Siege of Troy. If so, must not the Determination of Priam's Counsellors appear ridiculous, when being consulted (4) if they were for making Peace by giving up Helen, and she having appeared before them in that very Moment, they gravely declared, that so fine a Woman was well worth the Suffering all the Calamities of War to enjoy her. If with Eusebius we reckon kon the Conquest of the Argonauts to have been upwards of sixty Years before the Destruction of Troy, in that case Helen must have been above eighty Years; accordingly Lucian represents her at that Time as a decrepit old Woman.

(1) L. 6. (2) Nar. 16. (3) Iliad. l. 3. (4) Ibid.

It may indeed be said, that some Women preserve their Beauty longer than others. Thus we see that Sarab was fourscore Years when Abimelech, smitten with her Beauty, was going to have ravished her; but we have no need of all these Suppositions. It belongs to those who set the Events of that Age at too great a Distance to have recourse to them.

In the System that I have followed, all these Difficulties vanish. I even suppose, that Helen was Twin-Sister to one of the Tyndaride, which we might absolutely deny, and make her several Years younger. Castor and Pollux might have joined in the Expedition of the Argonauts when they were but fifteen or sixteen Years of Age. 'Tis no Wonder that two young Princes who saw all the Flower of Greece setting out in an Expedition wherein so great Glory was to be reaped, obtained leave from their Father to make their first Campaign with them. This Expedition happened about thirty-five Years before the taking of Troy, when Helen must of consequence have been but fifty Years. We may still cut off some of these Years, since the Ancients inform us that when Theseus carried her off, he was full fifty, and she but seven or ten Years at most. Now Theseus having died about the first Year of the Siege of Troy, or in the preceding one, at the Age of about seventy, in that Case, at the time of taking the City, only thirty Years would have intervened from her being ravished by that Heroe, which added to seven or ten, make but thirty-seven or forty for her Age when the City was taken. 'Tis true, upon this Supposition, it must be granted that Helen was not Twin-Sister to the Tyndaridæ. Now there is nothing extraordinary in either of these Conclusions; a Woman may still be lovely at that Age; and we need not be in the least surprized that Deiphobus married her after the Death of his Brother Paris.

not

If it be objected that Pausanias (1) delivers the Opinion of three of the Ancients, who alledge, as has been said in the History of Theseus, that this Heroe had a Daughter by her, then I shall allow her to have been thirteen or fourteen Years when she was ravished, which will be no great Addition to her Age. In fine, those who, with Scaliger, reckon only twenty Years between the Argonautic Expedition and the taking of Troy, are still less embarrassed with this Difficulty.

Be this as it will, I have followed the most common Opinion with relation to Paris and Helen, and the Causes of the Trojan War; for in short, how would I perplex my Readers, should I lay before them all the Variety that is to be found among the Ancients upon this Head. Should I tell them that some contend (2) that Helen never was married to Menelaus; that being courted by all the Princes of her Time, she preferred Paris to all the rest; that Menelaus, who was in love with her, raised an Army against Troy; and that Achilles having been slain in a Combat, Ulysses advised the Greeks to desist from the Enterprize, and also to leave upon the Shore a gilded wooden Horse, as an ex voto, that Minerva might favour their Return. Should I add farther what has been already hinted at in the History of Proteus, that Paris, as he was carrying off Helen, had been driven by Storm upon the Coasts of Egypt; where, according to the Report which Herodotus had from the Priests of that Country, this Princess was detained till Menelaus came for her; that none of all these Circumstances, according to the same Herodotus, were unknown to Homer; but that he had adapted his Fable to the Taste of the Greeks, whom he was desirous to please; that according to other Authors of no less Credit (3) Helen was not ravished by Theseus, nor carried by him to Aphidnes, as is commonly thought, but to Egypt, where he engaged Pro-
teus

(1) In Corinth. (2) Dion. Prax. (3) See Servius upon the 5th of the Eneid.

teus to keep her till his Return, and that this Prince gave her up to Menelaus, who came and demanded her; in fine, that the Trojan War, which I have been speaking of, was not undertaken for the sake of Helen, but upon Account of the old Quarrel between Hercules and Laomedon, and the Rape of Hesione, whom Priam wanted to recover. To which purpose spoke Dion Chrysostom in the middle of Troy itself, in the Harangue I have already mentioned: If the Greeks, said he, took and sack'd Troy, whence came it that they returning home victorious and triumphant, were so ill received, some of them assassinated, while most of the rest were shamefully banished, and forced to go to remote Countries in quest of Settlements? Again, whence came it that the Trojans, vanquished and subdued, instead of retiring into different Countries of Asia, where they had Friends and Allies, crossed the Seas and passed near the Coasts of Greece, to go and found Cities and Kingdoms in Italy, some of them, as Helenus, having settled even in the Heart of Greece? In all this there is no Probability; and we must give up with the common Tradition.

C H A P. XI.

The History of Protefilaus, Calchas, and Philocetusa.

P*rotefilaus* deserves a Place among the first Heroes of that Age, for having devoted himself to certain Death, in behalf of the Greeks, and for abandoning, the Day after his Marriage, a lovely Spouse whom he fondly doated upon. Hyginus says (1) he was called Jolans (a), and that having quitted his Spouse from the first Day of his Marriage, and join'd the other Greeks, tho' an Oracle had declared that he who first landed upon the Enemy's Shore was to lose his Life,

(1) Fab. 103.

(a) This Action was the Occasion of changing his Name to Protefilaus.

Life, finding others durst not venture, he sacrificed his Life for the Preservation of his Companions, and no sooner set his Foot a-shore than he was slain by Hector (a). His Wife Laodamia the Daughter of Acastus, to comfort herself for this Loss, got a Statue made that resembled her Husband, and kept it always by her. A Servant having seen it in Laodamia's Bed, went and told Acastus that his Daughter was in Bed with a Man; upon which he run up to her, and finding nothing but this Statue, ordered it to be burnt, that he might remove this sad Spectacle from his Daughter's Sight; but Laodamia making up to the Fire, threw herself into it, and so perished in the Flames; and this is what gave occasion to the Poets to say, that the Gods had restored Protesilaus to Life for three Hours, and that finding himself obliged after that Time to re-enter Pluto's Kingdom, he had persuaded his Wife to follow him.

Strabo (1), who in three or four Places of his Geography, speaks of Protesilaus, says his Dominions were in Thessaly, extended from Pthiotis where Peleus reigned, as far as the Sea, and that his chief Towns were Antrona, Phyla, &c. and this in conformity to Homer, who in the second Book of the Iliad, says he had brought with him in forty Ships the Inhabitants of Philucé, Pyrrhesa, Icona, Antrona, and Pholea.

To proceed, I know not if what Conon (2) says of Protesilaus relates to another Prince of the same Name, or if, as is frequently his Case, he recedes from the Tradition followed by Homer and all the Ancients, since he says he survived the taking of Troy, and that having been overtaken with a Storm between Mendes and Scione, Ætilla Laomedon's Daughter, and Priam's Sister, who was of the Number of his Slaves, persuaded her Companions to set fire to his Ships, that they might not be carried into Greece; which having been executed,

(a) Homer, l. 2. says only he was slain by a Dardanian.

(1) L. 9. (2) Nar. 13.

executed, he was obliged to stay at Scione, where he built a City of the same Name.

Calchas. As in all their Expeditions the Ancients always employed Religion, they never undertook any without taking Priests and Prophets along with them; and Sacrifices, with the other Acts of public Worship, were as regularly performed in a Camp, as in the best governed City. Thus was Calchas employed during the Siege of Troy. He was consulted as a Prophet, and as High-Priest he offered Sacrifices and Oblations. Homer, who speaks of him in several Places of the Iliad, gives us every where to understand that he was in high Esteem and Regard. It was he that ordered the Sacrifice of Iphigenia, to obtain a favourable Wind; and that foretold, by the Omen of a Serpent that devoured a Bird with her nine young, that Troy would not be taken till after ten Years Siege.

When the Army was overtaken with the Plague, Calchas was consulted, who, without troubling himself about the Interests of the Generals who had carried off Chryseis, pronounced that she must be returned to her Father (1): Before the funeral Pile was lighted to burn the Body of Ajax, who had killed himself upon Account of his being disappointed of Achilles's Armour, Calchas, whose Opinion was asked to know if that Heroe was worthy of this Honour, decided that he was not. In the general Pillage of Troy, the same High-Priest orders the House of Eneas not to be touched, and he was accordingly obeyed. Is the Question about sacrificing Pelicea to the incensed Manes of Achilles, Calchas must be consulted, and he appears in Person at the barbarous Sacrifice that is made of this Princess, who is offered up to Pyrrhus's Resentment; and if he gives her not the mortal Blow, it is because she prevents him, as Ovid so elegantly describes in the fourteenth Book of his Metamorphoses. In a Word, nothing of Importance was transacted in the Army, without first consulting him. He was the Son of Thestor, and is therefore frequently siled by the Poets Thestorides.
After

(1) Iliad. l. 1. See the Illustr. Table.

After the taking of Troy not being inclined to embark with the Grecian Captains, he travelled by Land in Company with Amphilochus the Son of Amphiaraus, to Colophon a City of Ionia, where, as he was one Day in a Grove sacred to Apollo, he met with Mopsus, another celebrated Diviner of those Times, who having proposed to him a Question, namely, how many young a Sow that happened to be passing by carried in her Belly ; and he not being able to resolve it (1), while Mopsus did, it cut him so to the Heart that he died.

This is the Account of this Diviner's Death, as related by Pherecides. Hesiod says, Mopsus challenged him to divine how many Figs were upon a Fig-Tree which he pointed to him, and relates the rest of the Adventure as above ; but Sophocles, such Uncertainty is there in these Sorts of Histories, had followed a Tradition quite different from these two. According to him, it was not at Colophon in Ionia, but in Cilicia that Calchas died. Lastly, Conon (2), who agrees with Pherecides as to the Place where this Prophet ended his Days, gives a quite different Account of his Death. Amphimachus King of Colophon, was preparing for an Expedition at the time that Calchas arrived at his Court, where Mopsus had distinguished himself of a long Time, not only by the prophetical Talent he possessed, but also by his Courage and Valour. The King consulted both of them. Calchas foretold him a signal Victory, while Mopsus denounced against him nothing but Disaster. The King having followed the Council of the former, was totally routed, and the Prophet died for Anger and Vexation.

Philoctetes was one of the most celebrated Heroes of that Age. He was the Son of Pæan, and Companion of Hercules, who at his Death left him his Arrows, whereof one prov'd fatal to him afterwards. For having bound himself by Oath, not to reveal the Place where he deposited that Heroe's Body, and after this the Greeks, when just ready to set out for Troy, having learned from an Oracle that before they Philoctetes.

(1) Pherecides. (2) Apud Phot. Nar. 6.

they could become Masters of that City, it was necessary they should be in Possession of Hercules's Arrows, they sent Deputies to Philoctetes to get Notice where they were hid. Philoctetes, who was neither willing to violate his Oath, nor yet to deprive the Greeks of the Benefit they were to reap from those Arrows, after some Resistance, pointed with his Foot to the Place where Hercules was buried, and owned that he had his Arrows in his Custody. This Indiscretion cost him dear afterwards ; for while they were carrying him to Troy, one of these Arrows having fallen upon the same Foot with which he had pointed to the Place of Hercules's Burial, it grew to an Ulcer which sent forth such a noisome Smell, that at Ulysses's Entreaty, they left him in Lemnos, where for the Space of ten Months he suffered all those Pains and Agonies, which the illustrious Author of Telemachus describes so eloquently after Euripides (1) and Ovid (2). In the mean Time after the Death of Achilles, the Greeks finding it was impossible to take the City without the Arrows he had carried with him to Lemnos, Ulysses, tho' Philoctetes's mortal Enemy, undertook to go and bring him, which accordingly he did. 'Tis this Voyage and Negotiation, to mention it by the Way, that make the Subject of one of the finest Tragedies left us by Antiquity.

Philoctetes was no sooner arrived in the Grecian Camp, than Paris challenged him to a Duel ; but the Grecian Heroe having wounded him mortally with one of his Arrows, he went and died in the Arms of his dear Oenone. As his Ulcer was not yet cured, not daring after the taking of Troy to return to his own Country, he went to Calabria where he built Petilia, and was at last cured by Means of Machaon, as we learn from Propertius (3) and Ovid (a).

Philoctetes having been one of the most famous of the Argonauts, as has been said in their History ; and yet having survived the Destruction of Troy, this is a new

(1) In Philoct. (2) Met. l. 14. (3) L. 2. Eleg. 2.

(a) Tarda Philoetæ sanavit crura Machaon,

new Argument to prove the Proximity of these two Events.

C H A P. XII.

The History of Idomeneus and Merion.

I*domeneus* the King of Crete, was the Son of Deucalion, and Grandson to Minos II. whose Father was Lycaſtus the Son of Minos I. who was conſequently Idomeneus's Great Grandfather. This Prince, according to Homer, accompanied by Merion his Couſin-German (a), conducted to the Siege of Troy the Troops of Crete with a Fleet of twenty-four Ships (b), and diſtinguiſhed himſelf there by ſome glorious Exploits. The Poet now named, deſcribes the Combat of this Prince with Olbryoneus, who in hope of marrying Cassandra Priam's Daughter, had come to his Aſſiſtance from Cabeſus, a Town in Cappadocia (c), whom he ſlew, even inſulting him after his Death, according to the bad Practice of that Age, for having flattered himſelf with the hope of carrying away with him that Princeſs. Aſius the Leader of the Troops raiſed from Percote, Sestus and Abydos, Cities ſituated upon the Coaſts of the Propontis, and in the Neighbourhood of Phrygia, as he was ſeeking to revenge Olbryoneus, received the ſame Fate with him; while Merion, not ſo fortunate, or not ſo brave as his Couſin, ſhot an Arrow at Deiphobus who attack'd him, and miſs'd him. The Iliac Table represents theſe three Combats much in the ſame Manner as Homer deſcribes them, and the reſt of the Ancients are agreed with that Poet.

After the taking of the City, Idomeneus and Merion, loaded with the Spoils of the Trojans, were returning to Crete, when they were overtaken with a Storm by which they were like to have periſhed. While the

VOL. IV.

A a

Fleet

(a) Merion, according to Diod. Siculus, l. 5. was the Son of Molus the ſecond Son of Minos, and Brother to Deucalion.

(b) Diod. Siculus, l. 5. makes the Number of them amount to 90, but the Text of that Author is thought to be vitiated in this Place:

(c) Steph. in Cabeſo.

Fleet was in this pressing Danger, Idomeneus made a Vow to Neptune, that if he returned to his own Kingdom he would sacrifice to him the first thing that met him. The Tempest ceased, and he arrived happily at the Port of Crete, where his Son, hearing of his Father's Arrival, was the first Object that presented to his View. 'Tis easy to imagine what Surprize and Distress Idomeneus must have been in at the Sight of him. In vain did the Sentiments of paternal Affection plead in his behalf; Religion, or rather Superstition prevailed; and he resolved to sacrifice his Son to the God of the Sea.

Some Ancients will have it that this Sacrifice was accomplished; but others believe, with more Reason, that the People, undertaking the Defence of that Prince, carried him off from the Altar. Be that as it will, a general Conspiracy was formed against Idomeneus, who finding himself not safe in his own Dominions, set sail for Italy, where he built, soon after his Arrival, the Town of Salentum, which M. de Fenelon has rendered very famous by the fine Episode which this Event furnishes him with.

Those who are of Opinion that the Origine of most of the ancient Fables is to be found in Scripture, which the Pagans, who are alledged to have been acquainted with it, had perverted, have not been wanting to tell us that Idomeneus's rash Vow was but a Copy of that of Jephthé. This is actually the Account given of it by Huetius (1), F. Thomassin (2), and some others: 'Tis in vain to object to them, that Motives equally strong might have induced both Jephthé and Idomeneus to make the same Vow; that to the one his Daughter presented herself first, and to the other his only Son, and a thousand other Reasons which 'tis easy to imagine, they still persist in their Opinion, and the smallest Resemblance they think a sufficient Foundation for pursuing Parallels to great length. But I have fully refuted elsewhere these Parallels always overstrained (3).
But

(1) Demonst. Evang. p. 4. (2) Lect. des Poetes. (3) See the 14th Source of Fables, V. 1. B. 1.

But perhaps after all this Vow of Idomeneus is a mere Chimera of late Invention, at least Diodorus Siculus (1) following another Tradition, makes no mention of it, he who lived near enough to Crete, to be able to inform himself of a Fact so notorious as this I am now speaking of, and who together with this cites his Vouchers, as Epimenides the Theologue, Soficrates, and Dosiades, who according to Atheneus, wrote the History of Crete. He says on the contrary, that this Prince and Merion his Cousin, after the taking of Troy, returned happily to their own Country, where after their Death, a magnificent Tomb was erected to them, at which they received divine Honours. This Tomb was still to be seen in the Time of Diodorus in the City Gnossus, with this Inscription :

Here lies Merion by the Side of Idomeneus.

The Cretans sacrificed to them as to Heroes, and in their Wars invoked them as their Protectors. Hence it appears that the Vow I have mentioned, the Expulsion of Idomeneus, his Voyage to Italy, and the Building of Salentum, were at least Facts very much controverted.

Perhaps it will be said, that this Prince having distinguished himself in the City he is supposed to have built in Italy, and having established there the wise Laws of Minos the First his Great Grandfather, the Salentines paid him divine Honours, and instituted to him religious Worship, which was afterwards adopted by the Cretans ; but what probability is there that those Islanders would honour as a God, and invoke upon the most important Occasions, a Man whom they had expelled for his Impiety and Rashness.

We may conclude that there is at least a great deal of Uncertainty with relation to the Founder of Salentum, and that it is very possible that City was built by another Idomeneus, who came to be confounded with the King of Crete.

PART SECOND.

TO make this System of Mythology compleat, I have still two Articles to be considered. The first relates to some particular Fables that have not any Connection with the Events of the fabulous Age, which have hitherto been the Subject of this Volume; for I have hardly omitted any that have a Reference to them.

The second concerns the Games of the Greeks; not those of Amusement, whereof Meursius and some others have given us the History; but those public Exercises which made a Part of their Religion, and that had been mostly instituted in the heroic Age. These two Articles shall be the Subject of the two following Books.

BOOK VII.

The Explanation of some particular Fables that occur in the Books of Mythology.

THESE Fables have a Relation only to particular Facts upon which they were founded. This was commonly the Marriage of some Prince, or the Birth of some famous Child, or the amorous Despair of some Princess: For upon these Occasions, the Wits of the Age were not wanting to compose some Epithalamium or Elegy, where giving a Loose to the Sallies of their Genius, they almost always ways made the Gods interpose in these Adventures ; thus intermixing the supernatural and sublime with Facts that were often not worthy of it.

We find of these Fables in Apollodorus, Hyginus, Antoninus Liberalis, Conon, Menander of Colophon, Planciades-Lactantius, and others, chiefly in Ovid, who of all the Ancients has made the most ample Collection of them ; and I must own, that with respect to the last, having explained them along with his Metamorphoses, I shall be often obliged to copy myself. For as they mostly allude to a particular Fact, when once we are come at that, there is little or nothing more to be added. But judicious Persons have given me to understand that I ought not to make any Scruple of this ; that a Mythology, such as this which I now offer to the Public, ought to contain whatever Readers have a Right to expect, and which they would frequently neither have Inclination nor Opportunity to consult in other Works.

C H A P. I.

The History of Tereus, Pandion, Progne, Philomela, the Daughters of Pandareus, and Erechtheus.

OVID (1) and Hyginus (2) relate this History at very great Length, tho' with some Variation : History I call it, because Strabo, Pausanias, and several other Ancients, are agreed that the Event which gave rise to the Fictions, with which it is embellished, are true.

Pandion, the second of the Name, King of Athens, had two Daughters exceedingly handsome, their Names Philomela and Progne. He having no Male Issue, looked out for a Son-in-law who was powerful, and near his own Dominions. Tereus, a Prince whose Kingdom was not far from Attica, was the Person he made Choice of, and to him he gave his Daughter Progne in Marriage, hoping to get some Assistance from him

A a 3

in

(1) L. 6. (2) Fab. 45.

in the War he had with the Thebens: but the Brutality of his Son-in-law reduced him, thro' time, to such a Habit of Melancholy, that he died. In fact, some Years after the Marriage, whether Progne was dead, as Hyginus will have it; or at the Solicitation of that Princess who was desirous to see her Sister, as we are told by Ovid, Tereus came to Athens, and demanded Philomela of her Father, with a Design to carry her to Thrace, where her Sister was impatiently desirous to see her. Pandion refused a long Time to gratify the Importunity of his Son-in-law, as if he had actually foreseen that this Expedition would prove fatal to his Daughter; but at last he yielded her up to him, giving the young Princess Guards to take Care of her. So soon as Tereus saw himself in Possession of this Beauty, whom he was desperately in Love with, he was wholly bent upon gratifying his Passion; and no sooner came ashore, than he put to death the Guards which Pandion had put on Board with him, and carrying Philomela either to a Mountain, as Hyginus has it, or to an old Castle which belonged to him, as we read in Ovid, he ravished her; and stung with the cruel Reproaches she loaded him with, cut out her Tongue, and left her imprisoned in the Castle under a Guard of some Persons in whom he confided.

In the mean time Philomela delineated her Misfortune in a Piece of Needle-work, and by that means made known what had befallen her to her Sister, who taking Advantage of one of the Feasts of Bacchus, during which the Women were allowed to run thro' the Fields, she came directly to the Castle where her Sister was, carried her off with her, shut her up secretly in the Palace, slew her Son Itys (a), cut him in Pieces, and having boiled him, had him served up at the Feast she prepared for her Husband upon Occasion of the Festival now mentioned. Philomela appearing at the End of the Repast, threw upon the Table the Head of the Child, the King in a desperate Rage

(a) Pausanias lays this Murder to the Charge of the Thracian Women, which is more probable.

Rage and Fury put his Hand to his Sword to kill his Wife and Sister-in-law ; but these two Princesses having got to a Ship which they had prepared for their Purpose, arrived at Athens before he could overtake them.

Thus far all is natural ; but the Poets hardly ever fail to add to such Events the Intervention of the Gods : Thus it was given out that Progne had been transformed into a Swallow, Philomela into a Nightingale, Itys into a Pheasant or Goldfinch, and Tereus into a Lapwing. The Mythologists find Reasons corresponding to these Metamorphoses : They will have it that these symbolical Transformations were designed to figure the Characters of these several Persons. As the Lapwing is a Bird that delights in Filth, they will have this to be an Emblem of Tereus's impure Morals ; because the Flight of that Bird is very slow, it signifies at the same time that he was not able to overtake the Princesses, his Ship not being so good a Sailor as theirs. A Verse of Aristophanes, in the first Act of his Comedy of the Birds, where Tereus, to abate the Astonishment of Eulpis, surprized to see that Prince under so hideous a Figure, gives us sufficiently to understand these ancient Fictions were often invented, or at least improved by the tragic Poets, and especially this one, since Tereus says : Sophocles has thought fit to put me into this Disguise (a). The Nightingale that hides itself in Woods and Thickets, seems as it were industrious to cover Philomela's Shame and Misfortunes ; and the Swallow that frequents Houses, sets forth the Disquietude of Progne, who in vain seeks after her Son whom she inhumanely murdered.

All this is very ingenious, but unluckily other Authors of greater Antiquity have demolished the very Foundation of all these fine Reflections ; thus Anacreon, and after him Apollodorus, tell us that Philomela was transformed into a Swallow, and Progne into a Nightingale. Be that as it will, 'tis alledged that this Event happened at Daulis, a City of Phocis, where Tereus had taken up his Residence ; which may be true, since that Prince intending to assist Pandion his Father-in-law, who was at War with the Thebans, might have come with his Court to Phocis, to be in a better Capacity to help him.

A a 4 that

(a) This Tragedy of Sophocles is not now extant.

We may fix the Date of this Event to about the Year 1440. before the Christian Æra, under the Reign of Pandion II. King of Athens. Eusebius sets it farther back, since he is of Opinion that Progne and Philomela were the Daughters of Pandion the first of the Name, who succeeded Erichonius. To conclude, 'tis probable that Tereus perished in Pursuit of his Wife and Sister-in-law, since Pausanias (1) informs us that his Tomb was to be seen at Megara.

Homer (2), whose Authority is of so great Weight in these Matters, follows another Tradition. What he says of her is to this Effect, in that Passage where he gives Account of Penelope's Woes:

*The Day (ne'er brighten'd with a Beam of Joy!)
My Menials, and domestic Cares employ:
And, unattended by sincere Repose,
The Night assists my ever-waking Woes;
When Nature's busb'd beneath her brooding Shade,
My echoing Griefs the starry Vault invade.*

*As When the Months are clad in flowry Green,
Sad Philomel, * in bow'ry Shades unseen,
To vernal Airs attunes her varied Strains;
And Itylus sounds warbling o'er the Plains:
Young Itylus his Parents darling Joy!
Whom Chance misled the Mother to destroy;
Now doom'd a wakeful Bird to wail the beautiful Boy.* }
Pope's Odyss. 19. 599.

It would seem from this Comparison that Homer knew neither Progne nor Tereus, and that he followed the Tradition I am going to relate.

Pandareus the Son of Merops, had three Daughters, Merope, Cleotbera, and Ædo; this last, being the eldest

(1) In Attic. (2) Odyss l. 19.

* He calls her the Daughter of Pandareus.

eldest, was married to Zethus, Amphion's Brother, by whom she had but one Son, named Itylus. Envyng the numerous Progeny of her Sister-in-law Niobe, she resolved to kill the eldest of her Nephews; and as her Son was brought up with her Cousin, and lay with him, she gave him Notice to change his Bed the Night she was to commit this Crime. The young Itylus, forgetting his Mother's Orders, was slain by his Mother instead of the Nephew: Homer in the following Book (1), resumes the same History, and adds that after the Gods had made Ædo's two Sisters, Merope and Cleothera Orphans, by cutting off their Father and Mother, they were carried away by the Harpies, who delivered them up to the Furies at the Time they were to have been married.

To obviate some Difficulties before hand, that may arise from the History now given, 'tis necessary to distinguish with Thucydides (2), the Thrace where Tereus resided, from Thrace properly so called. The latter was very remote from Greece, in Comparison of the former, which bordered upon Thessaly. The Capital where Tereus dwelt, was called Daulis; this Canton, adds that judicious Writer, and not Thrace proper, was really the Scene of the tragical Adventure of young Itys murdered by his Mother and Aunt; and 'tis probable, he says farther, that the King of Athens had given his Daughter to a neighbouring Prince, in hope of getting speedy Succour from him against his Enemy. A convincing Proof, concludes the same Author, that it was at Daulis this Adventure happened, is, that the Poets commonly give the Nightingale, or Philomela, the Epithet of Daulias.

Antoninus Liberalis, upon the Authority of Nicander, in his Ornithologia, relates an Adventure not unlike this we have now read. Pandareus of Ephesus, says he, had two Daughters, the one named Ædon, whom he married to Polytechnus, of the City Colophon in Lydia, the other called Chelidonia. The new Spouses were happy while they revered the Gods; but having boasted boasted one Day that they loved one another better than Jupiter and Juno, this Goddess provoked at their Language sent Discord to them, who very soon set them together by the Ears. Polytechnus went to the Court of his Father-in-law to ask of him Chelidonia, whom her Sister longed to see, and having led her into a Wood, ravished her. She in Revenge informed Ædon of the Insult he had offered to her, and both of them resolved to make the Husband eat his only Son Itys. Polytechnus being apprized of this horrid Design, pursued his Wife and Sister-in-law to the Court of Pandareus their Father, whither they had repaired, and having clap'd him in Chains, and rub'd over his whole Body with Honey, threw him out to the open Fields. Ædon having conveyed herself to the Place where her Father was, strove to keep off the Flies and other Insects that annoyed him; and an Action so laudable being contrued by her Husband as a Crime, he was going to have put her to Death, when Jupiter, moved with the Misfortunes of that Family, transformed them all into Birds of the same kind with those above mentioned.

(1) Odyss. l. 20. (2) Lib. 2.

Lastly, there is another Fable to be explained in the same Family of Pandion. Erechtheus his Son had four Daughters (1), who, from I know not what Whim, bound themselves by Oath not to survive one another, and that if one happened to die, the rest would die with her. In the mean time, Eumolpus declared War upon the Athenians, pretending that Attica belonged to his Father; but he was vanquished in the Battle fought upon that Occasion. Neptune his Father, to cut off from Erechtheus all Ground of Joy for this Victory, required that Othonee the Daughter of that Prince might be sacrificed to him, which accordingly was put in Execution. His Sisters upon this killed themselves, and Erechtheus was killed with a Thunder-bolt which Jupiter hurled against him, at the Request of the same Neptune.

C H A P.

(1) Hygn. Fab. 146.

C H A P. II.

The History of Lycaon.

TH O' I have said something of this Prince in the History of Jupiter, the Greek Historians have signalized both him and some of his Descendants too much for me not to enlarge more upon this Article. First, I would premise that the Ancients distinguish two Princes of this Name. The first was the Son of Pboroneus, and reigned in that Part of Greece, which was afterwards called Arcadia, and to which he communicated the Name of Lycaonia, about 250 Years after Ce-crops.

The second, who is the Subject of the Fable I am to explain, succeeded him, and was a Prince equally polite and religious; but by an Inhumanity which was but too common in those rude Ages, he polluted the Feasts of the Lupercalia, whereof he was the Founder, according to the Arundel Marbles, by sacrificing human Victims. This Feast, after having been interrupted for some Ages, was re-established at Athens, in the Time of Pandion, as we learn from the tenth Æra of the same Marbles. Lycurgus abolished at Lacedemon the barbarous Custom of offering there human Victims. And Evander some time after introduced the same Feast into Italy.

Lycaon built upon the Mountains of Arcadia the City Lycosura, which is reckoned the most ancient City of all Greece; and it was upon the Altar he erected there in Honour of Jupiter Lyceus, that he began to offer the barbarous Sacrifices I have been speaking of. This is the Foundation of the Fable in Ovid, and what made the Poets say he had given Jupiter an Entertainment, at which he had served up to him the Members of a Slave whose Throat he cut; for thus it is explained by Pausanias in his Arcadicks. His Cruelty, and his Name, which in Greek imports a Wolf, made it be said he was transformed into that fierce and ravenous Animal. Lycaon had been at first very much beloved by his People, whom he taught to lead a less savage Life than they had done before.
by

Suidas relates the Fable of the Repast we have been speaking of, according to a Tradition which appears itself a new Fable. Lycaon, says that Author, to incline his Subjects to the Observance of the Laws which he had enacted, gave out that Jupiter made him frequent Visits in his Palace, under the Figure of a Stranger. His Children, in order to find out the Truth of this, when their Father was going to offer Sacrifice to that God, mixed among the Flesh of the Victims that of a young Child whose Throat they cut, being persuaded that none but Jupiter could discover it: But a violent Tempest having arose with an impetuous Wind, Flashes of Lightning reduced to Ashes all the Authors of this Crime; and it was upon this Occasion, we are told, that Lycaon instituted the Lupercalia.

According to Pausanias, Lycaon's Posterity settled in Arcadia and the neighbouring Provinces, where they built several Cities; but of them I have already spoke in the Beginning of this Volume, upon Occasion of the Grecian Colonies. The Author now quoted, appears to me too credulous as to the Article of Lycaon's Transformation into a Wolf.

“ The Thing, says he, is not incredible; for be“ sides that the Fact passes current among the Arcadi- “ ans, there is nothing in it against Probability; and “ indeed, the first Inhabitants of that Country often “ entertained the Gods in their Houses, and at their “ Tables: this was the Reward of their Justice and “ Piety: The Good were honoured with the Society
 “ of the Gods, while the Bad were visited with im“ mediate Tokens of their Anger. Hence some were “ then exalted to a divine Nature; and for the con“ trary Reason we may presume that Lycaon was de“ bascd to a Brute, and Niobe turned to a Rock.”

After the Death of Lycaon, Nyctimus the eldest of his Sons succeeded him, while his Brothers went and sought their Fortunes in different Parts of the World, as has been said in the Passage I have already quoted.

As

As Arcas the Son of Calisto ascended the Throne after Nyctimus, and had a numerous Posterity, 'tis probable that the History of Arcadia made no mention of the Fable related by Ovid, which says that Prince, when very young, was caught up to Heaven with his Mother, whom Juno had transformed into a Bear, just as he was going to shoot her with an Arrow.

Arcas and Calisto.

C H A P. III.

The History of Narcissus, Echo, Pyramus and Thisbe.

NARCISSUS, born at Thespia, a City in Beotia, as we learn from Conon (1), was a Youth of exquisite Beauty, and passed for the Son of Cepheus; that is, no doubt, of the Prince who gave his Name to that River. Falling in love with his own Figure, which he saw in a Well, he dwelt so long in contemplating it, not knowing that what he saw was nothing but his own Shadow, that he pined away with Love and Desire: Thus it is that Ovid relates this Fable; but Pausanias (2), tho' in other respects credulous enough, says this is a Story composed for Amusement. "For what probability, says he, is there that a young Man should be so senseless as to be taken with himself, as one is with another; and not be able to distinguish a Shadow from a Substance? Accordingly there is another Tradition, less known indeed, but which wants not however its Partisans and Authors. We are told that Narcissus had a Twin-Sister who perfectly resembled him; she had the same Air of Face, the same Hair, they often dressed like one another, and hunted together. Narcissus fell in love with his Sister, but had the Misfortune to lose her. After this Disaster, abandoning himself to Melancholy, he frequented the Banks of a Fountain, whose Water was like a Mirrour, and there he took Pleasure

(1) Narr. 24. (2) In Beot.

“ sure in contemplating himself, not but he knew it “ was his Shadow, but in seeing it he thought he saw “ his Sister, which gave him some Consolation. As “ for the Flowers which are called Narcisses, if we believe “ Pamphus, they are older than this Adventure, for long “ before Narcissus the Thespian was born, according to “ that Poet, the Daughter of Ceres was gathering Flowers “ in a Meadow, when she was ravished by Pluto; and
 “ the Flowers, he says, she was gathering, and which “ Pluto made use of to seduce her, were Narcisses
 “ and not Violets.”

Perhaps after all, the Manner of Narcissus’s Death has no other Foundation but his Name, which is derived from a Greek Word that signifies, to be benumbed, without Sensation, whence soporifick Druggs are called Narcotic. I say, the Manner of his Death, for the Ground of the Story is true. As this young Man had shewed nothing but disdain to all Persons who conceived an Affection for him, Love himself is said to have taken Vengeance upon him for his Indifference, by making him in love with himself; and Ovid, whose Turn is always to the Marvellous, has considered this Story in a Light that best answered that End. It is related more naturally by Conon, as also by Pausanias. We are told, that after this Adventure the Thespians honoured Love with a particular Worship.

Echo. This Youth it seems was destined to have none but Phantoms the Objects of his Passions, and of those which he inspired, since Ovid adds to what has been now said, that the Nymph Echo fell in love with him, and that his Disdain obliged her to retire into Caves and Rocks, where she retained nothing but the Voice; a physical Fable that requires no Regard.

Pyramus and Thisbe. That of Pyramus and Thisbe, which Ovid relates in the fourth Book of his Me- tamorphoses, contains one of those particular Facts which the Passions too often produce. We are told that those two Lovers, to whose Amour their Parents were averse, appointed to meet together under a Mul-

a Mulberry-tree that was without the City. Thisbe arrived there first, and being forced to hide herself at sight of a Lion, her Scarf which she drop'd, was besmear'd with Blood by that Animal, whereby Pyramus who arrived soon after, being led to believe she was devoured by the Lion, killed himself for Grief. Thisbe immediately returning, and being fully convinced by the Sight of the Scarf, that her Lover had killed himself from a false Persuasion that she was dead, stabb'd herself to the Heart with the same Sword. This Fact, in short, is no where to be met with but in Ovid and Hyginus (1).

Ovid sometimes cursorily mentions several similar Stories that seem to stand by themselves. That of one Daphnis, to whom he gives no other Designation, transformed into a Rock for having been insensible to the Charms of a young Shepherdess, is said however to be founded upon this, that his Wife, to make him love her, gave him some Potion that made him stupid and insensible.

Daphnis transformed to a Rock.

The Transformation of Hemus King of Thrace, and his Wife, into Mountains, for having affected to be adored under the Names of Jupiter and Juno, intimates to us, that the Impiety of this Prince and his Wife was punished, and that they both perished perhaps in the Mountains, whither the People, incensed to see them compare themselves to Gods, had obliged them to retire.

Hemus and Rhodope transformed to Mountains.

The same Poet tells us, that the Nymph of the Fountain Salmacis, having attempted to embrace Hermaphroditus, the Son of Mercury and Venus (a), was the Occasion of his changing Sex; upon which the Mythologists have vented many idle Notions: What had given rise to the Fable was this. There was in Caria, near the City of Halicarnassus, as we learn from Vitruvius, a Fountain which had effect

to

(1) Fab. 242.

(a) Hermaphroditus is a Word compounded of Hermes, which in Greek signifies Mercury, and Aphrodite, the Name of Venus.

to civilize some Barbarians, who having been expelled by the Colony which the Argives planted in that City, were obliged to come thither to draw Water ; and this Intercourse with the Greeks not only refined their Manners, but by Degrees infected them with the Luxury of that voluptuous Nation ; and this is what gave that Fountain the Character of having Virtue to change the Sex. We may also suppose that the Water of this Fountain enervated the Mind, and rendered those effeminate who drank of it, as there are others that make People stupid or furious. Lyllo Giraldi (1) will have the Foundation of the Fable to be, that this Fountain being inclosed with Walls, Adventures used to happen there from time to time which gave it this Character ; but as that Mythologist proves not his Conjecture, it is better to adopt Strabo's Reflection, who says he knows not why that Fountain was under so bad Fame, since Effeminacy proceeds much less from the Air or Water, than from Riches and Luxury. This Fable is written by our Poet, in a Manner that sets forth but too plainly the Effects of Voluptuousness.

To these Metamorphoses the same Poet Celmis. subjoins that of Celmis, who, we are told (2), being faithful to Jupiter during his Infancy, became at last so indiscreet, as to deserve to be transformed into an Adamant. Pliny, who considers this Fable as a Piece of History, says Celmis was a young Man of great Wisdom and Moderation, and over whom the Passions had no Influence ; and that this is the Reason of his being transformed into an Adamant. Some of the Ancients will have it that Celmis, for having revealed Jupiter, to whom he was Foster-father, to be Mortal, was shut up in an impenetrable Tower, which was therefore called the Adamant. Others in fine alledge, that he was always faithful to Jupiter, and that this God, by way of Recompence, heap'd Wealth and Riches upon him.

CHAP.

(1) Synt. 5. (2) Met. l. 4.

C H A P. IV.

The History of the Pygmies, and of Pygas their Queen; of their Battles with the Cranes and Partridges; where we examine what is meant by the Pygmies, whereof the Prophet Ezekiel speaks.

THERE are few Fables in Antiquity The Pygmies. more celebrated than that of the Pygmies. Homer, the first who has mentioned them, employs this Fiction only in a Simile; but that same Simile comprehends the most considerable Part of it:

*Thus by their Leader's Care each martial Band Moves into Ranks, and stretches o'er the Land.
With Shouts the Trojans rushing from afar,
Proclaim their Motions, and provoke the War:
So when inclement Winters vex the Plain
With piercing Frosts, or thick-descending Rain,
To warmer Seas the Cranes embody'd fly,
With Noise and Order thro' the mid-way Sky;
To Pygmy-Nations Wounds and Death they bring,
And all the War descends upon the Wing.*

Pope's Iliad. iii. 1.

Several Poets who are later than Homer, (for we have not now among the Works of Hesiod, what Strabo says he wrote of them) have mostly spoke of the Pygmies in the same manner. Nonnus has used the same Simile, in speaking of Bacchus's Army: Ovid in his Metamorphoses, and in his Fastes (1): Antoninus Liberalis, Juvenal, in a Word almost all the Poets, have copied Homer; Statius (2) adds to this Tradition that the Pygmies have all the Advantage in the Battles they wage with the Cranes. Claudian describes the Return of these Fowls after having fought with the Pygmies. But other Authors more adventurous have attempted to refine upon Homer's Ideas. Juvenal (3) speaking of the Stature of the Pygmies, says they were but one Foot high. According to others, they were Dwarfs, who being mounted on Horses and Rams of a Size proportional to their own, armed themselves compleatly to go out to battle against Fowls, which came every Year from Scythia to attack them, as we learn from Pliny after Aristotle; or who had their Chariots drawn by Partridges, as we are told of Basilis in Athenæus (1). According to others, their Wives bore Children at the Age of three or five Years, and were superannuated at eight. Their Cities and Houses, as Pliny tells us (2), were only built of Egg-shells, and those who dwelt in the Country, according to Aristotle and Philostratus, had no other Retreat but Holes which they wrought in the Earth, whence they came out in the time of Harvest, to cut down their Corn with Axes, as if it had been to fell a Wood. We see in Ovid (3) and Eliau (4), a Queen of the Pygmies who is so vain of her Beauty as to despise Juno, who transforms her into a Crane; and in Philostratus, an Army of these little Men, that attacking Hercules when asleep, after the Defeat of Antæus, and taking all the same Precautions for the Conquest of him, as we would for forming a Siege. The two Wings of this little Army fall upon the right Hand of that Heroe, and while the main Body attacks the left, and the Archers lay close Siege to his Feet, the King, with the bravest of his Subjects, assaults the Head. Hercules awakes, and smiling at the Enterprize of these Myrmidons, folds them up in the Skin of the Lion of Nemea, and carries them to Eurystheus.

B b high.

(1) Met. l. 6. & Fast. l. 6. (2) L. 1. Sylv. 6. (3) Sat. 13.

What is particular in this Fable, is that the Historians speak of it in the same manner with the Poets, without any softening or Restriction; and they who often help out the Mythologists, when the Question is to reduce these ancient Fictions to Probability, serve only in this Occasion to encrease their Difficulty. In fact, Ctesias, Noanesus (5), Pliny (6), Solinus, Pomponius Mela (7), Basilis in Athenæus (8), Onesicritus, Aristæus ristæus, and Egesias in Aulus Gellius; even the Fathers of the Church, Saint Augustin (1), Saint Jerome (2); all are agreed as to the Existence of Pygmies, their little Stature, and their Battles with the Cranes. Aristotle especially seems fully persuaded thereof: What we are told of the Pygmies, says he; is not a Fable, but Matter of fact.

(1) L. 9. (2) L. 9. (3) Met. l. 6. (4) Hist. Anim. (5) Phot. Narr. 40. (6) Loc. cit. (7) L. 3. (8) L. 9. c. 4.

There is not such Uniformity among the Historians, when they speak of the Country of the Pygmies. Philostratus and Pliny place them in the Indies, towards the Sources of the Ganges, and the latter, who compiled different Relations; makes them inhabit sometimes towards the northern Extremities of Europe, sometimes towards the Banks of the Strymon or Hebrus. Stephen of Byzantium gives them a Greek Original; but the most ancient Authors place them in Ethiopia; and there it is we are actually to seek for them, as we shall see in the Sequel.

Modern Authors are still more divided than the Ancients, concerning this little People and the Country which they inhabited. Some make them dwell in Lapland, others in Thuringia, &c. But I refer those who want to be more fully acquainted with their Opinions, to the Dissertation I have made upon this Subject, which is printed in the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles-Lettres (3). But of all the Opinions of the Learned, the most singular is that of a German Professor, named Wonderart (a). According to this Author, the Fable of the Pygmies and Cranes contains the History of two People who inhabited Megaritis, namely, the Pageans and Geranians. After long Wars the Geranians got the better, and gave Laws to the Pageans. Homer, he adds, going upon the Similitude of Names, alludes to this History, representing it under the Emblem of the Cranes and Pygmies; this is the whole Mystery. The Poets, to give their Readers Variety, made

B b 2

(1) De Civ. Dei. (2) In Ezek. (3) Tom. 5. p. 101.

(a) The Work wherein that Author advances this Opinion is entitled: Hermanni Wonderart detecta Mythologia Græcorum, in decantato Pygmæorum, Græum & Perdicæ bello, Lipsiæ, 1714.

made frequent Use of such Figures; and the whole Art of Poetry consisted in transferring the History of neighbouring and known Nations, to Countries remote. When Ovid and Antoninus Liberalis, says this Author, tell us that the Pygmies were governed by a Woman, this imports that the Pageans fell under the Dominion of the Geranians, who had always been inferior to them before; and when Eliau asserts that the Pygmies paid divine Honours to their new Queen, 'tis that the Pageans truckled to their new Masters; and if 'tis fabled that this same Queen was transformed into a Crane, and that she was obliged to fly away to avoid the Repentment of her Subjects, the Meaning in short is, that the Pageans shook off the Yoke, and forced the Geranians to betake themselves to the Mountains, where their City stood.

When once we are entered into the Field of Conjectures, 'tis no difficult Matter to make Conquests therein. In the time of their Prosperity, adds the German Professor, the Geranians grew so insolent as to contemn their Neighbours; the Cities of Corinth, Athens, Thermus, Oropus, they looked upon as Rivals with which they might dispute the Empire of Greece. This is what makes Eliau say, that Gerane had preferred her Beauty to that of Juno, Minerva, Diana and Venus, who represented the four Cities now named; and whereas Ovid adds that Juno had transformed her into a Crane, he means that the Corinthians, with the Assistance of other Cities, having vanquished the Geranians, writ a bloody Satyr against them, wherein Corinth, or Ephire, was represented under the Name of Juno, Ἥρα; Athens under that of Minerva, Ἀθήνη; Thermus under that of Diana Ἄρτεμις; and Oropus under that of Venus, Ἀφροδίτη. The Pageans and Geranians, in this ingenious Writer, were only a despicable Race of Mortals, whose Vanity was justly the Jest of their Neighbours; and, according to the Analogy of their Names, they were called Cranes and Pygmies.

But what Arguments can be brought in Support of so singular an Opinion? 'Tis true these Towns were in Greece

Greece which the learned Author speaks of; but no where is Mention made of their Wars, far less of that Corinthian Satire, which will never pass for any thing but a mere Fiction of the Author. Where is Corinth represented under the Name of Juno, Thermus under that of Diana, and Oropus under that of Venus? But, says he, the Poets to disguise their Subjects, often transported the Scenes of them into remote Countries. This is his great Principle, which he repeats in every Page; and yet nothing is more contrary to Truth. Homer is so exact in not changing the Places which his Heroes had travelled thro', that he has always been reckoned an excellent Geographer, and Strabo often fixes the Situation of those Places from his Descriptions: Virgil and the other Poets have followed the same Method. If we read Ovid's Metamorphoses those especially that have a plain Connection with History, we shall see that he has scrupulously preserved the Names of Countries where the Events he describes had happened.

But, not to dwell upon the Refutation of an Opinion which falls to the Ground of itself, I ask if there would be any Hazard in following, with Relation to the Pygmies, a Tradition which relies upon so great a Number of Testimonies? May not one, under the Protection of so great Authority, adopt all that has been delivered upon this Subject? Perhaps, in an Age less enlightened, and where Criticism would prescribe less severe Limitations, we might follow an Opinion which seems at first Sight to be so well supported; but Number of Votes is not always a Test of Truth; Authors often copy one another; and 'tis surprizing that after a long List, the Authority of the first is frequently the only one that needs to be examined. Now Homer, who is at the Head of the Catalogue now given, is a Poet who upon all Occasions intermixes ingenious Fictions with uncertain Traditions. Aristotle, a graver Author, speaks indeed in the Affirmative; and because the most authentic Relations give us no Account of the pretended Battles of the Cranes and Pygmies, Pomponius Mela is forced to say that the Reason why that little People is not to be found now a Days, is that they were destroyed by the Cranes: Contra Grues dimicando defecit. A Solution more becoming a tragic Poet, than an Historian.

Before I give my own Opinion, I would remark in the first Place, that the Greeks, transported with the Marvellous, employed it upon all Occasions; always exaggerating whatever came to them from foreign Countries. They had heard of some Men of an extraordinary Stature; and they wanted no more to form their Giants capable of plucking up the highest Mountains by the Roots. In like manner they had heard that there was in Ethiopia a People extraordinary little in Proportion to other Men: Being fond of contrasting them with the Giants, they imagined their Pygmies, that is, according to the Etymology of the Word, Men who were but a Cubit high; as if Nature deviated so far from the order she follows in her Works. For my Part, therefore, I am of Opinion that the Pechinians are the true Pygmies of Homer: and indeed, there is all the Probability in the World, that it was the Resemblance of the Name, and the small Stature of that People, gave the Greeks a Handle to call them Pygmies, from the Word πυγμή, the Fist, or rather from πυγών, which signifies a Cubit, and bears such Conformity to the Name of the Pechinians, that there seems to be a perfect Analogy between them. The Poets did not always seek after so remarkable a Resemblance, to found their Fables upon. They had heard from the Relations of some Travellers, that the Pechinians were of a little Stature; that the Cranes removed in Winter to their Country, and that those People assembled together to destroy them; what excellent Materials has a Greek Poet here out of which to form so pretty a Fable as that which I am explaining!

But it is not mere Conjecture which I advance in Support of my Opinion; I shall make it appear that whatever has been fabled of the Pygmies agrees to the Pechinians. First, the Ancients assure us that there were in Ethiopia Men of a very little Size, and Hera- dotus

dotus (1) relates that some young Nasamones, having a Mind, from a Spirit of Curiosity, to penetrate into the Deserts of Afric, had found Men extremely little, who inhabited a City thro' which a River passed, which Etearchus King of the Country, who told the Story, believed to be the Nile. Diodorus Siculus and Strabo, not to mention others, are also agreed that there were such little Men in diverse Countries of Africa; and Aristotle adds, that the same Littleness was to be seen also in the Animals.

In like manner, Nonnosus, as we read in Photius, found in the same Country Men of a little Stature; and Ctesias had said the same long before him (2). Modern Travellers, whose Authority here is of great Weight, are agreed with the Ancients, as to the little Stature of the Ethiopians. Bergier and Alvares (3) say so expressly of the Nubians: Job Ludolphus (4) says these People are generally very little, and 'tis from among them, if we may believe Thevenot (5), that almost all the little Men are got, who are sent to the Courts of the Princes of the Levant. All these Relations are conformable to Hesychius who confounds the Pygmies with the Nubians, Νέβα Πυγμαίοι. But what still further confirms this Opinion, we must look for the Pygmies in the Country to which the Cranes retire at the Approach of Winter. Now 'tis certain that this is Ethiopia, as we read in Aristotle (6); and if Homer and Nonnus say it is near the Ocean, it is because in Reality the Nile, anciently called the Ocean, runs there. Now there it was precisely that the Peckinians dwelt, and that M. Delisle, in his Map of Africa, places the Bakkes, who, according to the Analogy of their Name, can be no other but the Peckinians of Ptolomy.

As for the Fables about them which I have delivered, they are to be looked upon as poetical Imaginations; amongst others, that of the little Stature, which Juvenal ascribes to them; for tho' it may be true,

B b 4

as

(1) Lib. 2. (2) Phot. bib. n. 3. (3) See the Travels of that Author. (4) Comm. upon the History of Ethiopia. (5) Collection of Travels. (6) Hist. Anim. l. 8. c. 18.

as in Fact it is, that excessive Heat, or excessive cold cramps the Growth of Animals, and that this is the Reason why the Laplenders and the other Northern Nations, as also those in the torrid Zone, are of a smaller Size than those in the temperate Zones, yet this never goes to the Excesses which that Poet speaks of. Thus as the tallest Men we know are little more than six Foot high, those of the small Size will be three and a half or four. As for some Examples that may be brought of Dwarfs that are less, 'tis plain no Consequence can be drawn from thence for a whole People, any more than from those of some Giants who have far exceeded the Stature of ordinary Men.

As for the Battle between the Pygmies and the Cranes, we may suppose the Pechinians assembled together in a certain Season of the Year to hunt those Fowls, and to hinder them from breeding there, and from devouring their Crop. Those who will have it that the Pygmies dwelt in the Holes of the Earth, have confounded them with the Troglodytes, who were in the same Country, and who got that Name because they resided in Caves.

Pygas. The Fable of Pygas, whom Ovid makes (1) to have been transformed into a Crane, and who afterwards waged with her People a bloody War, is easy to be explained, to one who has read Antoninus Liberalis (2). For this Author assures us, upon the Faith of Boëus, whose Theogony he cites upon this Occasion, that there was among the Pygmies, that is, no doubt, among the People to whom the Greeks gave that Name, a Princess very handsome, named Oenoe, who greatly oppressed her People. Having married Nicostratus, she had a Son by him named Mopsus, whom her Subjects took away from her to educate him after their Manner. The Cruelty of this Queen, her Insolence, or perhaps the bare Name of Gerané, the Greek Name of a Crane, which she bore, according to Elian, gave rise to the Fable of her being transformed into that Fowl. The War, which Ovid says she waged with her her People, probably arose upon Account of the carrying away of the young Prince.

(1) Metam. l. 6. (2) Met. l. 10.

We shall close this Article with a few Words concerning the Pygmies which Ezekiel speaks of. That Prophet, after he has given a fine Description of the City Tyre and its Advantages, says, according to the Vulgate; but the Pygmies that were upon your Walls, have compleated your Beauty (a). Interpreters are very much at a Loss how to explain this Passage, and according to them it would seem that the Pygmies, forced to give way to the Cranes who made continual War upon them, had retired to the Coasts of Phenicia to list themselves under the Service of the Tyrians, who posted them upon their Turrets; as if such kind of Soldiers could have been any Ornament to a City, which, according to the same Prophet, had among its Troops Soldiers of almost all Nations. 'Tis very true, the Septuagint Names these Soldiers, whoever they were, simply Φύλακες, Guards; and in another reading Μηδοι, Medes; the Chaldean Text has Gapadin, the Cappadocians, having changed the M into II; but the Hebrew uses the Word Gammadin; and as Gomed signifies a Cubit, this is what had given occasion to the Author of the Vulgate, to St. Jerom and Aquila, to translate this Word by that of Pygmæi.

The Source of the Ambiguity is thereby proved; but it still remains to know who were these Gammadins who had been put upon the Towers of Tyre. Were they real Pygmies, as Schottus, Bartholin and some Interpreters have said after R. Chimchi? Or the Inhabitants of Megiddo, as other Authors have advanced; or simply Guards, as Forsterus will have it (1); or lastly, the Gamaliens, of whom Pliny speaks? For my part, after having carefully examined this Passage, since the Prophet seems to prefer the Gammadians to the Persians, Assyrians, Greeks, and all the other Nations who had had joined in the Army of the Tyrians, and adds that they made the Ornament of their City; I am of Opinion that he means Divinities that had been set upon the Towers with their Arms and Arrows, as the Gods Pataici upon the Prows of Ships, whereof they made the principal Ornament; and that both the one and the other were represented by little Idols, as Herodotus expressly says of the latter, which Cambyfes found in the Temple of Vulcan in Egypt, and which, according to that Historian, resembled Pygmies.

(a) Sed & Pygmæi qui erant in turribus tuis Pharetras suas suspenderunt in muris tuis per gyrum, ipsi compleverunt pulchritudinem tuam.

(1) Lib. 21. 19.

This cuts off the Conjectures of Commentators, who, upon the bare Signification of the Word Gomed, set up Pygmies upon the Towers of Tyre, instead of finding in the Passage of the Prophet, either a People robust and dextrous at handling the Bow, and named after the rest, as the most distinguished; or the tutelar Gods of an idolatrous City which placed all its Confidence in them.

C H A P. V.

The History of Cephalus and Procris.

THE Fable of Cephalus and Procris, is one of those which Ovid describes at greatest Length, and with most Elegance. History informs us that this Prince, the Son of Deioneus King of Phocis, was one of the most accomplished of his Time. As he had a passionate Love for the Chace, and rose up early every Morning to that Exercise, hence he was said to be enamour'd with Aurora. Procris his Wife, who was in love with Pteleon, as we learn from Apollodorus, no doubt propagated this Report, in order to hide or justify her Intrigue. In the mean Time, Cephalus who had some Jealousy of her, quitted the Country where he commonly resided, and returned to Thoricus where the Queen dwelt. Procris, hearing of her Husband's Return, fled to the Court of Minos II. who fell in love with her, and at parting with her some time after, made her a Present of an excellent Dog, which he thought would be agreeable to Cephalus. Accordingly she she gave it to him, in order to be reconciled to him. This Dog, which Ovid calls Lelapus, was given out to be the Work of Vulcan; who had given him to Jupiter, and he to Minos, Minos to Procris, and she to her Husband, who made him over to Amphitryo, to deliver the Confines of Thebes from a Fox that made great Havock there, and to which the Thebans, from a Superstition no less impious than cruel, exposed every Month one of their Children, believing that this would save the rest from the Fury of that Animal. This Fox, the Instrument of Bacchus's Vengeance upon the Thebans, laid waste, as Pausanias tells us, the Confines of Teumessus. Ovid adds, that just as Lelapus was going to catch him, they were both transformed into Stones; but at bottom this Fable signifies only that the Country was delivered from some Robber, who made great Desolation therein, and who was pursued as far as his Retreat; which gave rise to his Metamorphosis (1).

Cephalus at last was reconciled to his Wife, but having killed her in hunting, tho' by Mischance, it was presumed to be from some Remains of Resentment he still retained against her; and the Areopagus, the Judge in this Affair, condemned him to perpetual Exile (2). His Son Celeus succeeded him, and reigned in the Island of Cephalenia: Celeus was the Father of Acrisius, Grandfather of Ulysses, who led to Troy the Cephalenians with the Ithacians. Oeneus, the second Son of Cephalus, reigned in Phocis after the Death of his Grandfather Deioneus. Cephalus lived in the Time of Minos II. that is, about an hundred Years before the Trojan War.

I know none but Apollodorus (3), who admits two Cephalus's, the one the Son of Mercury and Herse the Daughter of Cecrops, the other the Son of Deioneus King of Phocis, and Diomedes the Daughter of Xutus (4). The first was ravished by Aurora, and went and dwelt with her in Syria, where he had a Son by her named Tithonus, the Father of Phaeton. The second married

Procris

(1) See Palephatus. (2) Apollod. l. 3. Paus. &c. (3) L. 3.
(4) Idem. l. 1.

Procris the Daughter of Erechtheus King of Athens. However in the third Book that Author seems to confound the Actions of those two Princes. Ovid, and after him all the Ancients, speak only of the Daughter of Deioneus; who was ravished by Aurora, and who having deserted her, returned to Procris.

C H A P. VI.

The History of Ceyx and Alcyone, of Philammon, Autolycus, Kioné, and Thamiras.

Ceyx and Alcyone. THIS is satisfactory to an Author, when as he advances in his Work, he sees his Principles confirmed by new Examples. I have said more than once, after Lactantius (1), that the Poets did not invent the Groundwork of their Fables, but only superadded to them the Ornaments of Poetry. Of this the Fable of Ceyx and Alcyone is a convincing Argument. That Prince, Cotemporary with Hercules, on whom he performed the Ceremony of Expiation, is very well known in the Grecian History. Pausanias tells us, that (2) Eurystheus having summoned Ceyx to give up to him the Children of Hercules, that Prince finding himself not strong enough to maintain a War against so powerful a King, sent those young Princes to Theseus, who took them under his Protection. Ceyx married Alcyone, whose Genealogy is in the first Book of Apollodorus. To deliver himself from the Melancholy into which he was plunged by the Death of Dealion his Brother, and that of his Niece Kioné, Ceyx went to Claros to consult the Oracle of Apollo. He was shipwreck'd in his Return, and Alcyone was so afflicted upon that Account, that she died for Grief, or threw herself into the Sea, as we read in Ovid and Hyginus. It was fabled that they were both transformed into Kings-fishers; a Circumstance which has no other Foundation but the Name of that Princess: Perhaps the Harmony and Affection between those two Spouses made made them be compared to those Birds, which are accounted the Emblem of conjugal Love. Apollodorus (1) gives not so favourable an Idea as Ovid, of the Affection of these two Persons. According to that Author, they were ruined by their Pride. Jupiter incensed against that Prince for assuming his Name, and against Alcyone for taking that of Juno, transformed the one into a Didapper, and the other into a Kingfisher. Alcyone was the Daughter of Eolus, not he who was the God of the Winds, as Ovid alledges, but of the Son of Hellen, of Deucalion's Race.

(1) Div. Inst. l. 1. (2) In Attic.

I shall say nothing farther here about the time when Ceyx lived, the Æra thereof being sufficiently known from the History of Hercules, Telamon, and other Heroes who were his Contemporaries.

If we now compare these historical Facts with the magnificent and pompous Description which Ovid gives of them (2), we shall see how much a truly poetical Imagination is capable of embellishing Subjects upon which it exercises itself, tho' almost always at the Expence of Truth, which it little regards.

It will not be from the Purpore to subjoin here what Antiquity informs us concerning Philammon, Autolycus and Kioné (a), upon Account of the Connection which their History has with that I have now given. Philammon of Delphos, the same who composed Poems upon the Birth of Latona, Diana and Apollo, that were sung, and who was the first that founded Choirs of Musick in the Temple of Delphos, was Twin-Brother to Autolycus, Ulysses's Grandfather by the Mother's Side, and known by his crafty Pieces of Theft. They were the Sons of the Nymph Kioné, whom some call Philonis, and whose Father Deion or Dedalion (3), the Brother of Ceyx King of Trachine, dwelt in the Confines

(1) L. I. (2) Met. I. II.

(a) See the Remarks of M. Burette upon Plutarch's Treatise of Musick, Mem. de l'Acad. des Belles Lettres, Tom. 10. whence I have taken this whole Article Word for Word, being persuaded that nothing could be added to it.

(3) Hygin. Fab. 200.

finer of the Parnassus. The Beauty of this Nymph, if we may believe the Poets and Mythologists (1), made Apollo and Mercury fall in love with her, and that on one and the same Day, and of these Amours at the end of nine Months were born Autolycus and Philammon, the first of whom was owned for the Son of Mercury, and the second of Apollo. Kioné (2), vain of having pleased these two Divinities, presumed to prefer herself to Diana; she was punished by that Goddess who killed her with her Arrows; which has no other Foundation but her hasty Death, according to the Principle I have established in more Places of this Work than one. Her Father, afflicted with the Death of an only Daughter whom he affectionately loved, was transformed into a Hawk; a Fiction which is probably owing to his having quitted the Country, and settled in some remote Place.

Philammon derived from his Father (3) the Talent of Poetry and Musick, improving both by the Melodiousness of his Voice, with which he accompanied the Notes of the Lyre. His Son was the famous Thamiras (4). Tatian (5) ranks this Poet and Musician among the Writers who flourished before Homer, and the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (6) after Pherecydes, says it was he, and not Orpheus, who accompanied the Argonauts in their Expedition. Pausanias (7) tells us that at the Pythic Games, where Prizes were proposed for Poetry and Music, the first who gained them was Chrysothemis the Son of Carmanor; the second Philammon, (whom the learned French Translator, misled by the Latin Version, makes the Son of Chrysothemis) and the third Thamiris, or Thamiras; that Orpheus, and Museus, who affected to imitate the latter in every thing, disdained to come upon the Field; and that another Musician, named Eleutherus, won the Prize there merely by the Graces of his Voice, tho' he had only sung in in honour of Apollo the Poems of others. Now this Poetry consisted in Hymns to the Honour of that God, which were sung to the Lyre and Harp.

(1) Idem. ibid. Schol. Anonym. Hom. Odyss. 19. v. 432. Ovid. lcc. cit. (2) Ovid, ibid. (3) Ovid, ibid. v. 317. (4) Suidas Vcc. Philammon. (5) Pagl 136. & 139. Edit. Oxon. (6) L. 1. v. 33. (7) L. 10. c. 7.

From this Passage in Pausanias we may infer, observes Fabricius (1), that in those Games every Poet used to sing his own Verses and not those of others. The same Historian adds (2), that Philammon was reckoned to have instituted the Lernean Mysteries; but that the Prose and Poetry employed in those Mysteries, both composed in the Dorick Dialect, belied so remote Antiquity, since before the Return of the Heraclidæ into the Peloponnesus, the Argives had no other Dialect but the Attic, and in the time of Philammon the Name of Dorians was not so much as known. If we may believe Plutarch, Philammon composed not only Songs, wherein was celebrated the Birth of Latona, Diana and Apollo, but he was the Founder of those Choirs of Music which were sung about the Temple of Delphos. These Choirs consisted of Companies of Men and Women, who danced as they sung the Praises of the Gods to the Sound of instrumental Music, which in the Pagan World made a considerable Part of divine Worship.

If Music made Philammon one of the most celebrated Men of his Time, it served only to make his Son Thamiras, whom he had by Agiopé, unfortunate. He, concerning whom the Reader will find Things interesting enough in Bayle's Critical Dictionary, and Fabricius's Bibliotheca Græca, tho' his Father dwelt at Delphos, was born at Brinelas, a City of the Edonians, a People of Thrace (3), or at Odrysus, a City in the same Country, whither his Mother had fled to conceal her big Belly, upon Philammon's refusing to marry her. Educated in the Principles of an Art which his Father possessed in such Perfection, his Knowledge contributed only to his own Ruin. He had the Presumption to challenge the Muses themselves (4); they accepted the Challenge,

on

(1) Bib. Græc. l. 1. c. 26. T. 1. pag. 157. (2) L. 2. c. 37. p. 198. (3) Suidas upon the Word Thamiras. (4) Schol. Anon. upon Homer.

on Condition that if he got the better they would be at his Discretion, and that if he was vanquished he would submit to the Punishment his Arrogance deserved. He had the Misfortune to be worsted in so unequal a Trial, and delivered over to the Vengeance of those incensed Deities, was at once deprived by them of his Sight, his Voice, his Reason, and his Talent of playing upon the Lyre, which in Despair he flung into a River of Messenia, that from thence took the Name of Ballyra (a).

Homer, speaking of the City Dorion, says it was there the Adventure happened of Thamiras with the Muses, which, according to Pausanias, was represented in the fine Picture of Polygnotus, the Subject whereof was Ulysses's Descent to Hell. There Thamiras appeared sitting near Pelias, with his Eyes put out, a forlorn down-cast Air, his Hair and Beard neglected, and his Lyre, whereof the two Branches and the Strings were broke, thrown at his Feet. Tho' the Authority of Homer, who mentions Thamiras's Trial with the Muses, ought to have great Weight with Pausanias, yet he seems persuaded that this celebrated Musician became blind only through bodily Indisposition, and that this Misfortune was common to him with Homer, with this Difference, that the latter was not discouraged by it, whereas the former renounced Poetry and Music for the rest of his Days. It was fabled after his Death that his Soul passed into a Nightingale, as that of Orpheus into a Swan, Emblems of the soft Airs which those two Musicians sung to the Notes of their Lyre. As Thamiras had learned Poetry and Music from Linus, whose Disciple he was with Orpheus and Hercules, 'tis easy to determine the Time when he lived, from that of his two Contemporaries, whose Æras I have fixed.

But let us not conceive too highly of this Music, nor of the Instruments that accompany'd it. So many Wonders, no doubt, were fabulously reported of it, only because till the Time of the Persons we have been speaking speaking of, nothing had been heard equal nor near to it, tho' at Bottom neither the Instruments nor the Art of Composition were carried at that Time to a great Degree of Perfection; and we may very well apply what Horace says of the first Players on the Flute, to the Trumpet, the Lyre and the Harp (a).

(a) From two Greek Words Βαλλέειν to throw and λύρα a Lyre.

C H A P. VII.

The History of Orion.

Orion. THE Fable of Orion is one of the most celebrated; and at the same time most obscure in Antiquity. Several modern Authors have strained their utmost to unfold the Meaning of it; and I shall endeavour, by giving their Opinions, to enable the Reader to judge which has succeeded best. There is no Doubt but that it is built upon a historical Bottom; but it is certain likewise that it is interspersed with a great deal of Astronomy. In the first Place, the Birth of Orion exhibits a Mystery equally indecent and obscure.

As Jupiter, we are told (i), Neptune and Mercury were travelling on the Earth, they lodged with Hyrieus, who, probably thro' a Fault of the Transcriber, is named Byrseus in Hyginus; and were so well pleased with the Entertainment they met with; that they asked him what he wish'd for most, promising to grant it him. Hyrieus answered that having no Children, this was the Thing he desired most; and a little Time after Arion was born, in the manner related by Hyginus (b);

C c

and

(a) *Tibia non ut nunc Orichalco vineta, Tubæque
Æmula; sed tenuis simplexque foramine pauco,
Aspirare & adesse Choris erat utilis, atque
Nondum Spissa nimis complere sedilia flatu.*

Art. Poët. 202.

(i) Enphorinus and Hyginus.

(b) Jovis, Neptunus, Mercurius in Thraciam ad Byrseum regem in hospitium venerunt: qui cum ab eo liberaliter essent accepti optionem ei dederunt, siquid peteret. Ille liberos optavit. Mercurius de tauro quem Hercules immolarat, corium protulit. Illi in eum urinam fecerunt, & in terram obruerunt, unde natus est Orion.

The Foundation of this Fiction is that it was after offering Sacrifices to these three Divinities, that Hyrieus, and not Byrseus, as Hyginus calls him, had a Son according to his Desire.

and all the other Mythologists, and from thence he got the Name of Ourion, or Arion. Afterwards, to deface the Memory of his Birth, the first Letter of his Name was changed, and he was called Orion; which Ovid expresses in this pentameter Verse.

Perdidit antiquum Littera prima sonum.

Homer, who speaks of Orion in more Places than one, says nothing of the Fable of his Birth, which probably was not invented in his time; and Pbericides, cited by Apollodorus, says only he was the Son of Euryalus. Homer gives us no further Account of this celebrated Person, but that he was slain by Diana, wherein he is followed by all who came after him. This much is certain, that Orion signalized himself greatly by his Love of Astronomy, which, no doubt, he had learned from Atlas, who, according to Homer, dwelt in the Neighbourhood of Tanagrus, upon a high Mountain from whence he studied the Heavens, or in the Island of Calypso his Daughter.

Further, Orion was passionately fond of Hunting; which undoubtedly is the Foundation of the Connection of his History with that of Diana. He was one of the handsomest Men of his Time, and of so happy a Stature, that by a Hyperbole, overstrained indeed, he was said to be able to walk through the Waves of the Sea, and appear with his whole Head above Water (1); which imports that he was frequently upon the Sea in some Ship. To this Fiction they added, it was while he was thus traversing the Sea, that Diana seeing Orion's Head, and not knowing what it was, slew him with an Arrow; which signifies that he died in one of his maritime Expeditions.

He first married a Woman named Fida (2), whom Vanity destroyed; for having offered to compare her Beauty to that of Juno, this Goddess put her to Death. Orion having passed into the Island of Chios, to return to Tanagrus in Beotia the Place of his Birth, asked Oenopion to give him his Daughter Merope in Marriage; but he

(1) Homer Odyss. l. 1.

(2) Pbericides in Apollod. l. i.

he having put out his Eyes, after making him drunk, left him upon the Sea-shore (1). Orion having got up after his Pain was abated, arrived at a Forge, where having found a young Man, he took him upon his Shoulders, praying he would guide him to the Place where the Sun rises. Upon his Arrival there he recovered his Sight, and went and revenged himself upon Oenopion for his Cruelty.

This Circumstance of Orion's Life, fabulous as it is, may, I think, be explained by saying that the Wound of his Eyes not being incurable, he was cured perhaps with the Water of the Forge. Apollodorus adds that having distinguished himself in Vulcan's Art, he made a subterraneous Palace for Neptune his Father, and that Aurora, whom Venus had inspired with Love to him, ravished him and carried him to the Island of Delos; a new Fable, a Consequence of what I have now said of his Journey to the Place where the Sun rises, and which may be also explained like that of Tithonus and that of Cephalus, from his being so passionately fond of Hunting, as to rise very early for that Exercise, and from his going to settle in the Island of Delos.

Be that as it will, there it was that Diana shot him to Death with her Arrows, either because he had offered Violence to Opis, one of those Virgins who came from the Country of the Hyperboreans, to present their Offerings at Delos, as most of the Mythologists say; or, according to another Tradition, because he would needs constrain Diana to play at the Coit with him; or, if we may believe Nicander, for having dared to touch the Veil of that Goddess with an impure Hand: And as he died at the Time the Sun travels thro' the Sign of the Scorpion, it was fabled that this Animal had killed him with one of its Claws, and that Diana had made the Earth produce that Animal, to punish the Insult she had received from him; which, when strip'd of the Marvellous, signifies either that he died of some contagious Distemper, or in the Flower of his Age; for tho' Deaths of this kind were ascribed to A- pollo for the Men, as those of the Women were to Diana, yet there are Examples of the Death of some Men being attributed to that Goddess.

(1) Idem. ibid.

Pausanias says Orion's Tomb was to be seen at Tanagra in Beotia; but this was probably but a Cenotaph, since he was actually interred in Delos. Homer is the first who attributes Orion's Death to the Jealousy of Diana.

*So when Aurora sought Orion's Love,
Her Joys disturb'd your blissful Hours above,
'Till in Ortygia (1), Dian's winged Dart
Had pierc'd the hapless Hunter to the Heart.*

Pope's Odyss. 5. 155.

This Poet twice makes Mention of the same Orion (2). 1. When speaking of the goodly Mien of the two Sons of Neptune and Tyra, Ephialtes and Otus, he says they were inferior in Beauty to none but Orion. 2. In saying that in Hell he was incessantly employed in Hunting wild Beasts; intimating thereby that he had been a celebrated Hunter; for in the other World, according to the ancient Theology, every one employed himself in the same Exercises he had loved in his Life-time.

We may easily guess that the Circumstance of the three Divinities who lodge with Orion's Father led our Hebraizers to believe that this Fable was the same with, or at least a Copy of the Story of Abraham's entertaining the three Angels, who came and foretold to him the Birth of a Son, tho' Sarah his Wife was then superannuated. M. le Clerc (3) had this Notion of it, without insisting however upon the Greek and Hebrew Etymologies, which might have given some Probability to this Assertion. Blaeu, who took the Name of Cæsius (4), insinuates also that this same Fable had a great Resemblance to the Story of Jacob, so much the more as the Name of Jacob's Staff is given to the three brightest Stars

(1) This was the ancient Name of Delos. (2) Odyss. l. 11.

(3) Bibl. Univ. T. 6. (4) Cæl. Poet. Astr. Art. of Orion.

Stars in the Constellation of Orion; and the Name of Jacob, which signifies strong against the Lord, upon Account of the mysterious Combat he had with an Angel, may have given rise to it. Besides the Arabians call the Constellation of Orion, Algebar, or Algebao, the Strong, the Giant. M. Michel, in a Work entitled Fasciculi Bremenses, labours to prove the Conformity of this Fable with the History of Abraham and his Wife; but the Proofs and Etymologies which he offers for it, are hardly conclusive. In fine, the Abbé Fourmont, of the Academy of Belles-Lettres, has given a very large Dissertation to prove that this Story is the same with that of the Patriarch; but as this Dissertation is not yet printed, it is not my Business to pre-possess the Public on this Head.

In general, these Authors have to say in Favour of their Sentiments, that Orion being of Tanagrus, a City of Beotia, the Country where Cadmus settled, and having introduced thither the Religion of the Phenicians, the History of Abraham so celebrated in all the East, might have been known there.

But without entering farther into such Discussions, we shall only observe that Orion was placed in the Heavens, where he forms the brightest of the Constellations; and as it occupies a great Space there, this may probably have given the Ancients, and particularly Pindar, Occasion to say that he was of a monstrously large Size, which Manilius expresses in these Words; magni pars maxima cæli. Nothing was more noted among the Ancients than this Constellation. It is even mentioned in several Places of the Bible (1), and both the Septuagint, and the Vulgate call it Orion, as well as the Greeks. Lycophron gives it the Name of Tripater for the Reason assigned by Euphorion, who also says the Beotians called it Candaor. The Arabians made a Woman of Orion, whom they called Algiauza, with whom her Husband, called Sokeil, was exceedingly enamoured (a).

(1) Job. c. 9. v. 9. Ezek. c. 13. v. 10. Amos c. 5. v. 5.

(a) See Thomas Hyde's Religion of the Persians from Onlog-Bsc.

The Daughters of Orion. The Fable of the Daughters of Orion, who, according to Ovid, devoted themselves for the Preservation of Thebes infested with the Pestilence, and whose Ashes were transformed into young Men, undoubtedly signifies that their Example gave Courage to the young Thebans, who having till then led a soft and effeminate Life, had not Resolution to die for the Salvation of their Country.

C H A P. VIII.

An Explanation of the Fables of Byblis, and Caunus; of Iphis and Janthe, and Anaxarete; of Arion, &c.

Byblis and Caunus. HUMAN Nature often exhibits Scenes, which Passions not check'd in their Rise render equally criminal and dangerous. Such was the mad Passion of Byblis for her Brother Caunus, whereof we have the History in Antoninus Liberalis and Ovid (1) which they have embellished with a Circumstance that is only the Product of their own Imagination. They make this Maid travel over Countries in Quest of her Brother who fled from her, and at length bring her to Caria, where, according to the former, she was transformed into a Hamadryad, just as she was going to throw herself down from a Mountain; and according to the second, into a Fountain, which from that time bore her Name. They ought to have said on the contrary, that this Adventure happened in Caria itself, since it is certain, as we read in Apollodorus (2), and Pausanias (3), that Miletus their Father came from Crete, and planted a Colony in Caria, where he conquered a City, which he embellished and enlarged, and called it after his own Name: Pausanias adds that all the Men of that City having been slain during the Siege, the Conquerors married their Wives and Daughters. Miletus had for his Lot Cranea, the Daughter of Micander; and the Issue of this Marriage were Caunus and Byblis. This Princess having entertained a criminal Passion for her Brother, had had Recourse to all Means whereby to captivate his Heart; Caunus requited all his Sister's Solicitations with nothing but Scorn and Indifference, and seeing himself incessantly persecuted, travelled into distant Countries in Quest of that Tranquillity which he found not in his Father's House. Byblis not being able to live without him, nor to enjoy the Place where she was no longer blest with her Brother's Presence, retired into the Mountains, where she grieved herself to Death. Ovid, who did not let slip Occasions of painting the Weaknesses and Disorders of the Heart, has enlarged a great deal upon this History, for the Adventure is but too true. Byblis was transformed into a Fountain; an Emblem of the Flood of Tears she shed; and 'tis true there was a Fountain near Miletus that bore her Name.

(1) Met. l. 9. (2) Lib. 3. (3) In 4.

Pausanias (1), who as an Historian says nothing of the Metamorphosis, informs us only that in the Country of the Milefians was a Fountain of Byblis, near which happened the celebrated Adventure of the Amours of that Princess. Conon (2), who is not always consonant to Ovid and the other Mythologists, says it was Caunus was in Love with his Sister, and tho' she had a mutual Affection for him, yet she never discovered any Thing but virtuous Sentiments. Caunus reduced to Despair by her Obstinacy, sought to remedy his Passion by Flight; and Byblis, unable to live without him, retired, as has been said, into the Heart of a Wood, where after shedding a Flood of Tears, she fastned her Girdle to a Walnut Tree and hanged herself.

In the mean Time Caunus arrived in Lycia, and there a Naiad ascending from the Bottom of a River (3), strove to console him, and offered him the Sovereignty of that Country, which was at her Disposal. Caunus believed her, took her to Wife, and had by her Egialus, who succeeded him, and who in order to draw together the People who were Subject to him, and who till then had led an erratic and vagabond Life, built a City which he called Caunus, after the

C C 4

Name

(1) Loc. cit. (2) In Phot. Narr. 2. (3) Her Name was Protoë.

Name of his Father. Ovid, who in his Metamorphoses follows the common Tradition, grants in his Art of Love that Byblis hanged herself.

Arsit, & est laqueo fortiter ulta nefas.

Miletus lived in the Time of Minos the First, and, according to some Authors, he married Acacallide his Daughter; but having quarrelled with his Father-in-law, he was obliged to quit the Island of Crete, and retire into Caria. Thus the Æra of Minos's Reign, which I have fixed elsewhere, will determine the Time to which the History now given refers.

Ovid has writ this Fable with all the Art of one who was thoroughly acquainted with the Weaknesses of the human Heart; but he enters into Details which chaste Ears can hardly bear.

Iphis and Ianthe. The Adventure of Iphis, who changes Sex by the Power of Isis (1), in order to gain a Mistress whom he fondly loved, is one of those Facts for which Medicine may challenge History; and therefore all I shall say is, that I find nothing in fabulous Antiquity, that has the least Conformity to this Adventure; but the Reader may consult Ovid, who has described it with a great deal of Art.

Iphis and Anaxarete. The same Poet, who had a Mind to collect all Fictions, relates also the Adventure of another Iphis, whom the Insensibility of Anaxarete his Mistress, reduced to hang himself in Despair, while Anaxarete was transformed into a Rock; an Emblem of the Hardness of her Heart.

Arion. But these are Trifles on which we insist not; let us come to the Fable of Arion, which exhibits a Fact more interesting and historical. Arion, according to Hyginus and Probus, was of the City Metbymna in the Island of Lesbos; he was a Lyrick Poet, and a skilful Player upon the Lute. Having gone into Italy along with Periander King of Corinth, his Friend and Protector, he there gained a deal of Wealth during the Stay he made there. In his Return, the Seamen who who managed the Ship where he was, having a Mind to kill him for the sake of his Riches, he begg'd to be allowed, before he died, to play some Tune, hoping perhaps to be able to subdue them by the Sweetness of his Melody. We are told that several Dolphins having gathered about the Ship, he flung himself into the Sea, and that one of them receiving him upon its Back, carried him as far as the Cape of Tenarus, whence having gone to Periander's Court, he informed him of his Adventure. That Prince having taken the Seamen, ordered them all to be crucified.

(1) Ovid. Met. l. 9.

Pliny (1) and Aulus Gellius (2) affirm, after Herodotus, this to be the true Account of the Fact, and they enlarge very much upon the Love which Dolphins bear to Men, as to which 'tis so far true, that they follow Ships without being frightened (a); but 'tis more probable that Arion, to escape Death from the Seamen, threw himself into the Sea pretty near the Coast, and saved himself by swimming, and that he himself propagated the Fable of the Dolphin for the sake of Fame. Be that as it will, this Dolphin of Arion is believed to be that which is placed among the Stars. Arion lived in the Time of Periander, and about the twenty-eight Olympiad.

I ought however to add, that some Authors tell us the Sign of the Dolphin is composed of one Delphinus, who made Amphitrite consent to marry Neptune; others of one of those Mariners whom Bacchus transformed into Dolphins.

But now that I have been speaking of Lesbos, I shall subjoin here the Fable of Nyctimene the Daughter of Epopeus King of that Island (3), whom Ovid and the other Mythologists call Nycteus, who was transformed into an Owl. The Fact is, that her Father had entertained a criminal Passion for her, and that she went and hid herself from him in the Recesses of the Woods; which gave rise to Nyctimene and Epopeus.

(1) L. 9. (2) Noct. Att. l. 16.

(a) See Lucian in the Dialogue of Neptune.

(3) Hygin. Fab. 204.

to her Transformation. Laëtantius (1) transports the Scene of this Incident into Ethiopia, whereof, according to him, Nycteus was King.

Harpalice. The Fable of Harpalice (2) offers to us a Fact no less shocking, and far more tragical, but unluckily not so well vouched in History : But I ought to draw a Veil over these Obscenities.

Dryope. That of Dryope is more moving, and not so hideous. As she was one Day in a Wood with her Child (3), she would needs pull a Branch of the Tree called Lotos, and was in an Instant transformed into a Tree ; as Ovid describes it in a very affecting Manner. But this is one of those uninteresting Facts which has no Foundation, but the Conformity between the Name of that Nymph, and that of the Oak which the Greeks called Drys, and which has a great Resemblance to the Lote Tree. But if we would reduce it to History, we might say that this Princess was punished for having offered to profane a Tree of some Wood consecrated to the Gods.

Olenus and his Wife Lethæa. That of Olenus, transformed into a Rock, presents us with such another Adventure. We are told, that in order to secure his Wife Lethæa from the Chastisement which she had incurred by her Impiety, he was willing to substitute himself in her stead ; but it was not in his Power to save her (4), and all he obtained was to share in her Punishment, and to be transformed into a Rock with her. This Adventure, doubtless, has no other Foundation, but that this Prince perished with his Wife, among the Rocks where they had taken shelter from the Pursuit of the Priests, who accused Lethæa of some Profanation.

The Cerastræ and the Propetides. The Cerastræ, whom Ovid speaks of in his Metamorphoses (5), a People of Cyprus, are said to have been transformed into Bulls, only to denote the barbarous and rude Manners of those Islanders, who stained Altars with the Blood of Strangers.

(1) Ad. 3. Theb. v. 507. (2) Hygin. Fab. 206. (3) Ovid. Met. l. 10. (4) Met. l. 10. (5) Met. l. 11.

Strangers. A mere Quibble gave rise to this Fable; for Cerasta imports a Horn.

Unde etiam nomen traxere Cerastæ (1);

And the Reason why they had this Name given them, is because the Island of Cyprus is surrounded with Promontories which project into the Sea, and exhibit pointed Rocks at a Distance; whence it got the Name of Cerasta, or Horned: This is the Source of the Fable (2).

The Prophetides, who dwelt in the same Island, were very debauched Women. Justin and several other Authors, give us amazing Accounts of a Custom which prevailed in that Island, of prostituting young Virgins, in the same Temple of the Goddess Venus. And how could they better do Honour to a married Goddess, whom all the Gods had surprized in Adultery? Ovid says (3) Venus had turned them to Prostitutes, to punish their Contempt of her. It was probably the neglect which those Women had of their Honour, that gave the Poets a Handle to transform them into Rocks (4).

It was much the same as to the Metamorphosis of the Cercopes into Apes: The Cercopes into Monkies.

- - - - - Ut iidem

Dissimiles homini possentque similesque videri (5).

The Fable having no other Foundation, but that there was upon a Mountain in Sicily, a Nest of crafty and tricking Robbers, who were called Cercopes, which is the Greek Name for a kind of Monkey.

Much the same Account is to be given of that Shepherd, whom Ovid makes to have been transformed into a wild Olive-tree, for having insulted Nymphs as they were dancing; because, probably, he was punished for his Insolence: His symbolical Transformation denotes the Character of that Savage:

- - - - - Succoque licet cognoscere mores (6).

C H A P.

(1) Ovid. ib. (2) Bochart. Chan. l. 1. c. 3. (3) Met. l. 11.
(4) Idem. l. 10. (5) Ovid. Met. l. 14. (6) Ovid. ibid.

C H A P. IX.

The Continuation of the Fables taken from Ovid:

THIS Poet, conformably to the Historians (1), relates the Adventure of Cyppus the Roman Captain, on whose Forehead Horns appeared upon his Return from a Conquest, or at going out of Rome, according to Valerius Maximus; upon which Occasion the Soothsayers and Augurs whom he consulted, unanimously predicted that if he entered Rome, he would be declared King thereof; and as he knew the Aversion the Romans had to the bare Name of King, he chose rather to go into voluntary Exile. The Romans, charmed with so generous Behaviour, set up a Head in Bronze with Horns upon the Gate through which he had passed, and it was called Raudusculana, because anciently Brass or Bronze was called Raudera.

To this Recital I shall subjoin some Remarks. First, that Valerius Maximus is mistaken in saying that this Portent happened when Cyppus came from Rome: It was in returning from the War, and after having brought a Reinforcement to the Consul Valerius; wherein Ovid is more consonant to History than Valerius Maximus. Secondly, that the Senate decreed Lands to Cyppus, who built a Country-house upon the Ground given him by the Public; which our Author says not. Thirdly, that this Event fell out in the third Year of the 135 Olympiad, in the Year of Rome 525, and 137 Years before Jesus Christ.

As to the Truth of this History, Authors are divided; and Pliny himself (2), who has been often accused of adopting the most incredible Things, says the Horns of Cyppus are as fabulous as those of Acteon. There are Naturalists however, who alledge that a strong and lively Imagination may operate such Prodigies, and it must be owned that Excrescences have sometimes been seen pretty like Horns. Bayle in his

News

(1) Met. l. 15. (2) Lib. 11. c. 37.

News from the Republic of Letters (1), says there appeared not long ago at Palermo, a Girl who had Horns all over her Body, not unlike those of a Calf. Farther, Valerius Maximus, as credulous as he is, says not they were real Horns, but somewhat like them: In capite ejus subito veluti cornua emerferunt. Notwithstanding all this, I am of Opinion, that Cyppus on his Return to Rome, having fancied he had Horns growing in his Head, consulted the Augurs, who having replied to him that he would be King if he entered the City, he chose rather voluntarily to submit to perpetual banishment.

In fine, the same Poet transiently touches upon some Metamorphoses still less important, which he endeavours to connect with his Subject as well as he is able. Such are those of the aged Cerambus, who is said to have been transformed into a Bird at the Time of the Deluge; a Fiction which signifies that he happily escaped some Inundation. He was, we are told, transformed into that kind of Beetle which has Horns; and it is the Etymology of his Name had given rise to the Transformation (a).

That of the Women of the Island of Cos transformed into Heifers, has no other Foundation, but that the Companions of Hercules slew some of them to offer them in Sacrifice to the Gods. The Inhabitants of the Island of Rhodes were said to be transformed into Rocks, because most of them perished in a great Inundation, which drowned almost the whole Island, and especially the City Talisus, the Inhabitants whereof were called Telchines, a Name given them by the Greeks upon Account of their Sorceries. For, according to Diodorus, they were mostly Sorcerers and Enchanters, whose Business it was by all kinds of evil Arts to injure their Neighbours. Thus the Inundation wherein they perished, was construed a Judgment from Heaven, and gave

(1) July 1686.

(a) The Greeks call the Beetle, κέραμβον upon Account of its Horns.

gave Occasion to fable that they had been transformed into Rocks.

The same Author says the Daughter of Alcidas, was transformed into a Pigeon, to denote her Fruitfulness. Hirie into a Pond, because upon the Death of her Son Cygnus, she threw herself into a Pond which went from that Time by her Name: Combe into a Bird, because he dextrously made his Escape, against all Probability, from a Conspiracy of his Sons, who were going to have put him to death:

Mera into a Bitch, an Emblem of her Rage and Despair, Diana having banished her from her Company upon Account of her Gallantries: Me-

Menephron into a Brute, to denote the Abhorrence which all Nature had to his infamous Passion; his Mother is thought to have put him to death before he executed his Design: Arne into an Owl, because having sold his Country, his Avarice was signified by the Symbol of that Bird, which, according to popular Opinion, loves Money.

Phillyra, the Mother of the Centaur Chiron, into a Linden-tree, because the Name of that Woman was the same in Greek with that of this Tree.

That of Metra, the Daughter of Erisichthon, deserves a little more Attention:

'Tis Achelous who relates it to Theseus (1). Erisichthon having cut a Tree consecrated to Ceres, that Goddess revenged herself upon him by making him so famished, that he eat up himself at last. In vain had his Daughter Metra, to whom Neptune, who loved her, communicated the Power of transforming herself into several Shapes, sold herself to several Masters to procure her Father Sustenance; all was to no Purpose, he died in a miserable Manner, as has been said. Ovid describes the canine Hunger of Erisichthon, with all the Ornaments of Poetry; but, after all, it is thought that that the various Transformations of that Maid, conceal her Debaucheries.

(1) Met. l. 8.

Our Poet adds, that she married Autolycus, that famous Robber, so noted for having stole the Oxen of Eurytus. Callymachus in his Hymn to Ceres, describes the Fable of Erisichthon at length, and gives him for his Father Triopas the Son of Neptune and Canuce the Daughter of Eolus. Julius Scaliger (1) endeavours to reconcile Ovid's Narration with that of the Greek Poet, by means of the Relations of Erisichthon, whom Antiquity reckons an Atheist, and especially by means of his Son-in-law Autolycus, the Grandfather of Ulysses: We find that he lived forty or fifty Years before the taking of Troy.

That of Æsacus deserves also some Attention: I shall take the Account of it from Apollodorus (2), and Ovid (3), who are agreed in the first Place that he was the Son of Priam, and that he was transformed into a Didapper, but they differ as to the other Circumstances of this History. The latter of these Authors, as we have seen elsewhere, says the Mother of Æsacus was named Alixothoe, and that she was the Daughter of the River Cebrenus, or as it is in some Authors, of the Granicus. He adds, that Æsacus pursuing Hesperis, with whom he was in Love, that Nymph had been stung by a Serpent; and that young Prince not being able to support the Death of one he loved so dearly, had thrown himself into the Sea, and been transformed into a Didapper. Apollodorus says Æsacus was the Son of Priam and Arisba the Daughter of Merope, his first Wife; that his Father made him marry Sterope, who having died very young, he was so afflicted therewith that he flung himself into the Sea. That Author adds, that Priam having divorced Arisba to marry Hecuba the Daughter of Cisseus, Æsacus finding his Mother-in-law with Child of her second Son, had foretold his Father that that Child would one Day prove the Author of a bloody War, which would bring about the Ruin of Troy, and that that from this Prediction the Child was exposed on Mount Ida. Tzetzes adds, that Esacus had told his Father that he must put to Death the Mother and the Child who was to be born that Day ; and that Priam being informed that Cilla the Wife of Timoetes was that Day delivered of a Son, he put her to Death with her Child ; presuming thereby to be able to elude the Prediction. Servius, upon the Authority of Euphron, relates the Story in the same Manner ; but an ancient Poet, cited by Cicero in his first Book of Divination, says it was the Oracle of Zelia, a little Town at the Foot of Mount Ida, that had delivered this Response, as the Interpretation of Hecuba's Dream. Pausanias in his Phocics, alledges it was the Sibyl Herophyle who interpreted this Dream, and several other Authors give the Honour thereof to Cassandra. Be that as it will, Apollodorus informs us further, that Æsacus had learned the Art of Prediction from his Grandfather Meropus. Probably he left the Principles thereof in his Family, since we see that Cassandra and Helenus practised it afterwards. The Transformation of Æsacus into a Didapper, is one of those Episodes that was invented to console the Parents ; a Key which ought often to serve as a Principle, for explaining most of these sorts of Events.

(1) Poet. l. 5. c. 8. (2) Lib. 3. (3) Met. l. 11.

Phillis and Demopheon. Phillis was the Daughter of Lycurgus, King of the Daulians, 'a People of Thrace. Demopheon King of Athens, the Son and Successor of Theseus, having taken Daulis in his Way, captivated her Affections ; but having learned that Minestheus had died in his Return from the Trojan War, he was obliged to set out for Athens in order to take Possession of that Kingdom, which that Prince had usurped from Theseus. He promised to Phillis to return so soon as his Affairs were ended, and signified the Time to her pretty near. The Day that she expected him being arrived, she run nine Times to the Shore where he was to have landed, and hearing no Account of him, she hanged herself in Despair, or according to others, threw herself into the Sea. The Place

Place where she ended her Days was called The nine Ways, Novem Viæ, in Memory of that Race nine times repeated; this was also the first Name of Amphipolis, built in the same Place, which Antipater in an Epigram of the Anthology calls Phillis's Tomb. We have in Ovid a fine Epistle from this Princess to Demophoon, where she expresses to him all her Love, and her ardent Desire to see him again, in which it appears that Demophoon had promised to return at the End of four Months. This is the true History of Phillis; but to give an Air of the Marvellous to this Adventure, it was given out that the Gods had transformed her into an Almond-tree, because in Fact that Tree is called in Greek Philla. Hyginus (1) says nothing of this Metamorphosis: He only says there grew Trees upon that Virgin's Tomb, whose Leaves at a certain Season of the Year appear moist, as if they were shedding Tears for her. In those ancient Times, a small Resemblance was a sufficient Foundation for tacking a Metamorphosis to the End of a true History. But if I be asked the Reason why, at the Return of Demophoon, the Almond-tree flourished? I answer this Circumstance is only the Play of some Poet's Imagination; or it implies, some Stroke of Physiology of no great Importance. We are told that as the Almond-tree flourishes while the Zephyr blows, which Wind blows in Thrace towards Athens, it was said that this was Phillis's Lover come to visit her, and that she expressed her Joy at his Return by expanding her Blossoms.

Egesta, the Daughter of Hippotas a noble Trojan, was sent to Sicily by Crinifus transformed into a Bear.

her Father, to prevent her being exposed to the Monster which Neptune had raised up to punish Laomedon: The River Crinifus fell in love with her, and transformed himself into a Bear to seduce her, as we learn from Virgil (a). This Fable includes a Piece of History

VOL. IV.

D d

(1) Fab. 59.

(a) Troia Criniso conceptum flumine mater.

Quem genuit - - - occurrit Acestes.

Horridus in jaculis & pelle Libystidis ursæ.

tory veiled, as all the rest, under poetical Fictions ; and we have only to divest it of them, or rather to explain two Circumstances therein : That of the River Crinifus, which is to be understood of the King, who was afterwards confounded with the River of the same Name ; and that of his Transformation, which may be explained by saying that Crinifus hid himself in Rocks and Caves to lie in wait for Egesta, or rather that he went on board a Ship named the Bear, to pursue her.

Whatever be in this Fable, Egesta became the Mother of the famous Acestes King of Sicily, so noted in the Eneid for giving a magnificent Entertainment to Eneas and his Companions, as his Allies. After this manner is the Story related by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, strip'd of its poetical Dress. Laomedon, disobliged at a noble Trojan, put him to Death, as also all his Sons, and sold his Daughters to some Merchants, on Condition that they would transport them into foreign Countries. In the mean Time, a young Man of Quality being in the Ship that carried them, fell in love with one of those Virgins, and having bought her, conveyed her into the Island of Sicily, where he married her. Some Time after she bore Acestes, who upon the Death of Laomedon, obtained Priam's Permission to return to Troy, where he was during the War : But seeing his Country ruined by the Greeks, he returned to Sicily in one of the Ships that Achilles left near some Rocks which they had touched upon. Eneas arriving there some time after, assisted him in building two Cities, and there left the most useless of his Crew.

Such are the Fables of Ovid, that remained for me to explain ; and if I omit some of them, 'tis that I may not tire the Patience of my Readers, by enlarging upon Subjects that deserve no Regard, and have no Connection with the History of the World.

C H A P. X.

Fables collected by Conon and Antoninus Liberalis.

CONON lived in the Time of Archelaus Philopater, the last King of Cappadocia, to whom he dedicated a small Work, containing Fifty Narrations or Pieces of History, taken from ancient Authors; and Archelaus having obtained that Kingdom from Marc Antony, about Forty Years before the Christian Æra, we see thereby at what Time Conon lived, who from hence appears different from the Astronomer of the same Name, who flourished under Ptolomy Philadelphus. As Photius had copied him, it is in him his Work is preserved.

Conon had often followed Traditions different from those of other Mythologists, without informing us whence he took them. I believe I have quoted, upon Occasions that offered, such of that Author's Narrations, as had Connection with the Fables I have explained in the Course of this Work: As to those whereof I have made no Mention, they are mostly little Stories, in which there is nothing now interesting.

Antoninus Liberalis, whom Authors take to be the same mentioned by Suetonius, who reckons him in the Number of the most illustrious Grammarians, and of whom Eusebius also makes mention in his Chronicle, composed a Work upon the Metamorphoses; but he takes Care to inform us that he had taken them, either from Nicander's Book intitled Ἑτεροίεμνον, The Transformations of Figures, or from Boeus's Ornithology, or from some other Ancients, whose Works are lost. I have also quoted most of them occasionally; and shall only give the Reader Notice, that most of the rest contain only Facts that stand by themselves, and that almost all the Metamorphoses mentioned by this Author, of Persons transformed either into Beasts or Birds, or into whatever Form it is, answer almost always to their Names: Thus the Rules I have laid down in the first Volume, are sufficient for understanding and explaining them.

C H A P. XI.

Fables taken from Hyginus.

Icarus and Erigone. I Begin with that of Icarus, the Son of Oebalus, who (1) having given Wine to some Shepherds of Attica, they intoxicated themselves, and believing he had made them drink Poison, slew him and cast him into a Well. A Bitch discovered him to his Daughter Erigone, who hanged herself for Grief. Upon this, the Pestilence laying waste Athens, the Oracle being consulted, let them know that Bacchus was avenging the Death of Icarus, who had taught them to plant the Vine. The Murderers were sought out, and put to Death. A Festival was even instituted in honour of Icarus and Erigone, at which Wine and Grapes were offered to them in Sacrifice, in acknowledgement of the Blessing they had received from them, in being taught by them to cultivate the Vine. This was not all, they fabled afterwards that the Gods had placed them in the Heavens, where Icarus formed the Constellation of Bootes, Erigone the Sign of the Virgin, Mera, Icarus's Bitch, that of the Dog-Star or Canicula.

There is nothing extraordinary in all this but the Apotheosis, the rest needs no Explication. Apollodorus (2) tells us, that Icarus had by his Wife Periba five Sons, Troas, Damessippus, Imensinus, Aletes and Perilaus, and another Daughter Penelope, who was married to Ulysses (a).

Theonea. The History of Theonea, related by Hyginus (3), furnishes a very moving Adventure. This Princess was the Daughter of Thestor, and Sister to

(1) Fab. 130. (2) L. 3.

(a) See what has been said of this Marriage in the History of Ulysses.

(3) Fab. 90.

to Leucippe: Pyrates finding her upon the Sea-shore as she was walking, carried her off, and sold her to Icarus King of Caria. Her Father, who loved her passionately, fitted out a Ship in haste to pursue the Ravishers; but having suffered Shipwreck upon the Coasts of Caria, he was taken and brought to the Court of the King, who ordered him to be laid in Prison. Leucippe not hearing of her Father, went and consulted the Oracle to know what she should do to find him, and the Answer given her was, that she was to cut her Hair, and go in quest of him under the Habit of a Priest of Apollo, until she had found him out. This young Virgin set out forthwith, and arrived in Caria in the Equipage the Oracle had ordered her to take. Theonea, struck with the Beauty of the young Priest, fell in love with him; and he refusing to gratify her Passion, she clap'd him in Chains, and ordered Thestor to put him secretly to death. He having entered the Prison with the Sword which Theonea had given him, told the pretended Priest, whose sad Fate probably affected him, that he was still more unhappy than he, since having lost his two Daughters, Leucippe and Theonea, he was also put upon this cruel Action; he added that he chose rather to die than perpetrate it, and thereupon was going to have stabb'd himself to the Heart. Leucippe, knowing her Father, snatched the Poniard from him, run to the Apartment of Theonea to put her to death, and called her Father Thestor to her Assistance; at this Name Theonea cried out that she was his Daughter. Icarus hearing of so extraordinary an Event, loaded all the three with Presents and Caresses, and sent them home to their own Country. This in short is the same Thestor, who was the Father of Calchas so noted at the Siege of Troy, as Hyginus remarks, so that we see the Time when this Incident happened.

Alope the Daughter of Cercyon, who claimed Vulcan for his Father (1), was so beautiful, that she kindled love in the God of the Alope transformed into a Fountain.

(1) Hygin. Fab. 287.

Sea, who had a Son by her whom she secretly exposed, to prevent her Father's coming to the Knowledge of her Frailty. When she exposed him, she covered him with a Part of her Robe, which she had torn for that End. A Mare strayed from the Herd was giving her suck, when a Shepherd, who was seeking for her, seeing this Prodigy, took up the Child, and carried him to his Hut. His Companion, charmed with the goodly Mein of the Child, demanded him from him, and got him quite naked; he to whom he was given, demanded also the Robe, which was refused him; whereupon the two Shepherds quarreling with one another, they tabled their Complaint before Cercyon, who knew his Daughter's Robe, ordered the Mother to be put to Death, and the Child to be exposed once more; and as another Mare took care to nurse him, the Shepherds who discovered him, presuming that he was under the Protection of the Gods, brought him up, and gave him the Name of Hippothous. Theseus, as has been said in his History, having slain the cruel Cercyon, gave that Tyrant's Dominions to Hippothous, who was descended with him from Neptune.

Argé transformed into a Stag.

The Transformation of Argé into a Stag by the Sun (1), provoked at her for having said of a Stag that was flying before her, that tho' he went as swift at that Luminary, she would overtake him, conceals the Adventure of a Virgin, otherwise unknown, who was very fond of hunting, and perished in the Woods. Borchart (2) derives the Name of Argé from the Hebrew Word Arga, which signifies the Cry of Stags; and if so, we may well say she had no fine Voice.

To these Fables, which I ought to explain, as I have done others in the Course of this Work, the same Author has subjoined another Mythological Work, to which he gives the Name of Cælum Poetico-Astronomicum, wherein he shews, that almost all the Signs and Constellations bear the Name of some Heroe; their Souls, according to the ancient Theology of Paganism, having

(1) Hygin. Fab. 205. (2) Hier. part. first col. 883.

having taken Possession of them after their Deification : Thus it is that Cepheus, Cassiopeia, Andromeda and Perseus, form the Constellations that bear their Names ; Calisto that of the Greater Bear ; her Son Arcas the Artophylax ; Castor and Pollux, the Sign of the Twins ; Chiron, that of the Centaur ; Medea, the Cup ; Amalthea, the Goat ; Cygnus, the Swan ; Pegasus, the Horse ; the Dragon of the Hesperides, the Serpent ; the Bull and Eagle, whose Figures Jupiter assumed to carry off Europa and Ganymede, the two Signs that bear their Names ; Ariadne's Crown, that which is in the Heavens ; the Lyre, that of Mercury or Orpheus ; Erichthonius the Charioteer, called Heniochus or Auriga ; Hercules, who slew near the River Sangar in Lydia, a frightful Serpent, or, according to others, Lyncus who was going to put Triptolemus to death, the Sign of Serpentarius ; the Arrow is that which the same Hercules made use of to slay the Eagle, that preyed upon Prometheus's Liver ; the Ram which saved Phryxus, the Sign Aries ; the Crab, that which Juno raised up to bite Hercules, while he was employed in killing the Hydra of Lerna ; the Lion, that of Nemea ; Astrea, or, according to others, Erigone, that of the Virgin ; the Scorpion, that which Diana produced from the Earth, to be avenged of Orion for his Insolence ; the Centaur, or according to many Authors, Creton, Foster-father to the Muses, Sagittarius ; Pan, or Ægipan, Capricornus ; Aquarius, Ganymede ; Venus and her Son the Fishes, because it was under the Figure of Fishes, that they saved themselves in Syria from the Pursuit of Typhon ; the Monster which Neptune raised up to devour Andromeda, the Whale ; the Nile, or the Ocean (for both these Names were given to that River) the Eridanus, or Canopus ; Orion the Constellation that bears his Name ; as the celestial Hare is that which was pursued by that famous Hunter's Dog, as he seems still to do on our Globes.

There are other Authors however who give us another History on this Occasion, Hares say they had never been seen in the Island of Lero, or rather of Hiero, when a young Man who was passionately desirous that there should be some there for the Pleasure of hunting them, brought one thither, and took so great Care of its young, that in a little time the whole Island was stocked with them, and they multiplied there afterwards to such a Degree, that they consumed all, and occasioned a Famine there; insomuch that it was found necessary to exterminate them. The Gods, they add, placed one of them in the Heavens, to teach Men that the things they most ardently desire are often the most pernicious to us. The Dog which Jupiter gave to Europa to guard her, and whereof Minos made a Present to Procris, and she to Cephalus her Husband, forms the Sign which bears that Name, tho' 'tis alledged that this too is that of Erigone. Procyon (1), the Constellation so called, because it rises before the great Dog, represents that of the celebrated Orion; Argo is formed of the Ship of the Argonauts; the Centaur represents the famous Chiron; the Altar, the Work of the Cyclops, that upon which the Gods sacrificed before they gave Battle to the Titans; the Hydra, above which is the Raven, with an antique Horn, is either that Bird itself, or Coronis the Mother of Esculapius, transformed into a Crow; the Fish, that which procured Water to Iris, or according to other Authors, to Derceto, while she was oppressed with extreme Thirst, also appears in the Heavens fetching Water from Aquarius. The Mythologists, to mention it by the by, consider this Fish as the Father of two others, which form in the Zodiac the Sign which bears their Name; the Dolphin again that which saved Arion.

We say nothing here of the five Planets which bear the Name of so many Divinities; nor of the Hyades, whereof we have spoke in the History of Atlas; nor of the milky Way, the Fable whereof has been given in the History of Hercules; nor in fine, of some other Signs or Constellations, that I might not repeat what has been said of them already.

BOOK

(1) That is, Antecanis.

B O O K VIII.

Of the Games of the Greeks.

BY these Games, as has been already said, I understand that Sort of Shows which Religion had consecrated, and which were exhibited in Greece, and afterwards at Rome, either in a Circus, or in the Stadium, or in the Amphitheatres, or in other Places destined to that Use. I say, which Religion had consecrated, for besides that there was none of them but was dedicated either to some God in particular, or to several, the Solemnization of them never commenced, as we learn from Tertullian, till after having offered Sacrifices, and performed other religious Ceremonies (a); and afterwards when the Romans adopted those Games, the Senate made an Act bearing that they should always be dedicated to some Divinity. If we would trace the Origine of those Games, the same Tertullian tells us that the Lydians were the first Inventors of them, and that Tyrrhenus, obliged to resign to his Brother the Part which he claimed in the Dominions their Father, had left them, having planted a Colony in that Part of Italy, which from that Time was called Tyrrhenia, introduced thither the Use of those Sorts of Shows. Herodotus (1), and after him Dionysius of Halicarnassus, had said (2) the same thing long before, and the former of these Authors informs us it was during a Famine which raged in Lydia in the Time of Atys the Son of Menes, that the Lydians, to redress their Grievances, finding the Ground when cultivated, did not answer the Expectation of the Labourer, invented for their Amusement several Sorts of Games; but, to say the Truth,

(a) In ludis quanta sacra, quanta sacrificia præcedunt, intercedunt, succedunt. De Spect.

(1) L. 11. (2) L. 2.

Truth, those which Herodotus speaks of were rather Games of Recreation than Shows of Religion.

I know not whether it was from the Lydians that the Greeks formed the Idea of them ; but 'tis certain that their Use was known in Greece in the heroic Age. These Games of the Greeks, for 'tis theirs and some of those of the Romans that I intend to speak of in this Book, were instituted on different Occasions, and Religion or pious Duties were always the Motives of their Institution.

They may be considered, either as destined to be celebrated at set Times, such as the Olympic, the Pythic, the Nemean, and the Isthmian Games ; or as simple Vows immediately executed ; or as Duties paid to the illustrious Dead, such as those which Acastus appointed to be celebrated at the Death of his Father Pelias, the Greeks in Honour of Achilles, and Aeneas at the Anniversary of the Death of Anchises his Father ; or as public or private. The former were celebrated in Honour of the Gods to whom they were consecrated ; the others were ordered at Rome by the Magistrates, especially while they were Ediles or Pretors. According to Lactantius, the Games were Festivals dedicated to the Gods, either to celebrate their Birth, or the Dedication of their Temples (a) ; and their Celebration consisted in different Sorts of Exercises or Combats, as shall be said afterwards.

Ausonius had observed that among the four principal Games of Greece, namely the Olympic, the Pythic, the Nemean, and the Isthmian, two were consecrated to Gods, and two to Heroes ; but his Remark is not accurate ; for 'tis certain that the first were dedicated to Jupiter, the second to Apollo, the fourth to Neptune, and the third alone to Archemorus the Son of Lycurgus. 'Tis also certain that the Equestrian or Curule Games were dedicated to the Sun and to Neptune, the Agonalia and the Gymnica to Mars and Diana ; the Scenic, the Poetic Games,

(a) Ludorum celebrationes Deorum festa erant, qui quidem ob natalis eorum, vel Templorum novorum dedicationes sunt constituti.

Divin. Instit. lib. 6. c. 3.

Games, and those of Singing and Music to Bacchus, Apollo, Minerva, and Venus, to the rest.

As most of those Games, at least in Greece, had been instituted by Heroes, upon important Occasions, they made no Scruple to enter the Lists themselves, and it was fabled that Saturn, Jupiter, and the other Gods, had formerly disputed the Victory. In after Ages, when all Comers were permitted to enter the Lists, these Sorts of Exercises were divided: The Grandees and Kings themselves appeared there either in the Horse or Chariot Races; while the less noble Trials of Skill, such as Wrestling, Fencing and others, were reserved for the Populace, and for the Gladiators, who held the last Rank of all, and at the same Time the most despicable.

Nothing, in short, was more celebrated in Greece, than these Games, especially those of Olympia: It was upon them that the whole Chronology of Greece rested, and its principal Events were dated from the Time of their Celebration. The Greeks made those Games often the Subjects of their whole Conversation and their sole Employment; and as they were celebrated in different Times and Places, they were always careful to be prepared for them. Oftentimes too the Time from one Olympiad to another, that is, a Revolution of four Years, was not sufficient for that Effect. Those who were disposed to combat therein, chose the best Horses, and took particular Care of the Beauty and Lightness of their Chariots: In a Word, these Games engaged the chief Attention and were the most ordinary Employment of People, distinguished either by their Birth, or by their Actions; especially among the Youth. Multitudes flock'd to them not only from all Quarters of Greece, but also from the neighbouring Countries, and nothing was so magnificent as those Sorts of Assemblies.

What made the Greeks so ardent on this Head was the Honour that accrued to the Conquerors, and the Fame which they got thro' all Greece, and even in other Countries, by Victories gained in those Games; they they were distinguished on all Occasions, and had every where the most honourable Places. The greatest Poets thought it their Honour to celebrate those Victories, and it is to their Triumphs we owe the Odes of Pindar. It was not, doubtless, from a Motive of Avarice that those Competitors strove to carry the Victory from one another: A mere Wreath of Laurel, Olive, Poplar, or of some Plant, and Statues raised in Honour of the Conquerors, were all the Rewards allotted to them. 'Tis true other Marks of Distinction were annexed to the Victory afterwards; those who won it having commonly the chief Places in the public Assemblies, and often a Breach was made in the Walls; to receive as in Triumph those who conquer'd at Olympia; but still it is certain that at first Glory was the sole Motive that animated those who entered the Lists in those Games. I say, Avarice was not the usual Motive of the Combatants, tho' it may have been so in the Funeral Games, where the Prize was either Slaves, or Moveables, or even Money; but these Games were commonly celebrated but once.

C H A P. I.

The Motives for the Institution of those Games, and their different Kinds.

I Said Religion often gave Rise to the Institution of those Games; but I ought to add that Policy had likewise a good Share therein; and that Policy had two principal Objects; one that thereby the Greeks acquired from their Youth a martial Genius, and qualified themselves for Battles and other military Expeditions; the other, that they became thereby more nimble, more alert and robust; these Exercises being very proper, according to the most skilful Physicians, to promote bodily Strength and a vigorous State of Health. Further, we may easily conceive, that such a Subject has escaped neither the Ancients nor Moderns; both have written upon it; even the Fathers of the Church, Tertullian, tullian, Clement of Alexandria, S. Cyprian, S. Augustine, have made Mention of it in their Works. But no Ancient has enlarged more fully, especially as to the Olympic Games, than Pausanias, who has given a very full and curious Description of them.

These Sorts of Exercises were commonly divided into three Classes; into Races, Combats, and Shows. The first, which were denominated Ludi Equestres, si-ve Curules, consisted in Races that were performed in the Circus, dedicated to the Sun, or to Neptune. The second were called Agonales or Gymnici, whence the Name Gymnastic was derived, which was employed to signify all in general, and which consisted of Combats and Wrestling, partly of Men, and partly of wild Beasts trained for that Purpose; and it was in the Amphitheater consecrated to Mars and Diana, that these Exercises were performed. The third, in short, were Scenici, Poetici, Musici, consisting of Tragedies, Comedies and Satyrs that were represented upon the Theater, in Honour of Bacchus, Venus, Apollo and Minerva.

Under these general Classes were included all the Games of Greece and Rome; such were the Pythian, the Nemean, the Isthmic, the Olympic, the Pyrrhic, the Megale-sian, the Aetiac, the Apollinarian, the Capitoline Games, those of Ceres, the Equestrian, the Floral, the Iselastie, the Juvenal, the Hieronie, those of the Youth, those of the married Men, the Neronian, the Plebeian, the Roman, the Secular, the Trojan, and several others; in fine, the Funeral Games, such as those I mentioned a little while ago.

These last were commonly celebrated but once, and returned not, like the rest, at set Times. I say commonly, for some of them, tho' Funeral in their Original, as the Nemean, instituted on Occasion of the Death of Archemorus, and some others, became perpetual, and were resumed regularly at certain Times.

Among those that were renewed, there were some whose Celebration was fixed and stated, and were therefore called Stativi; others that depended upon the Appoint-

pointment of the Magistrate, Indictivi; others, in short; that were the Consequence of a Vow made on important Occasions, Votivi; lastly, there were of them annual, triennial, decennial, Secular, &c.

We are only to remark that all these Games were not peculiar to Greece, since several of them, as is obvious, were of Roman Institution.

CHAP. II.

Of the Founders of those Games.

H*yginius* in the 273 Fable names fifteen Founders of Games, until Eneas who was the fifteenth; but the Names of the four first are not now to be found, neither in the Manuscripts of that Author, nor in the printed Copies, while neither Kunius nor his other Commentators have given themselves the Trouble to fill up this Blank. This Chapter of Hyginus begins therefore with the fifth Founder of Games. Danaus, says he, the Son of Belus, instituted Games at Argos in Honour of the Marriage of his Daughters; and as Epithalamiums were sung there, for those Games consisted of no other Trials of Skill but those of Music, they got the Name of Hymenean; Lynceus his Son-in-law, the Son of Egyptus, whom our Author makes the sixth, founded of them in the same City in Honour of Juno Argian (a). The Conquerors in those Games, instead of a Crown, received a Buckler, because Lynceus having escaped the general Massacre of the other Sons of Egyptus, took from the Temple of that Goddess the Buckler which Danaus had consecrated there, to give it to his Son Abas, who had it after the Death of his Father-in-law. These Games were renewed at stated Times. The seventh Founder, according to the same Author, was Perseus, who solemnized them at the Funerals of Polydectes, who had taken Care of his Education; and Perseus combating there himself, had the Misfortune to slay his Grand-father Acrisius, with the Blow of a Coit. The

(a) These Games were called ἀσπιτομαχίαι, from a Word compounded of ἀσπίς or, Ἀσπίς, &c.

The eighth was Hercules, who instituted the Gymnic Games at Olympia in Honour of Pelops, the Son of Tantalus; and this Heroe won the Prize there of the Pancratia, that is, according to Aristotle, of the boxing and wrestling Matches, or to speak more accurately, of the single Wrestling, and the compound Wrestling. The seven Chieftains who led the Army to Thebes, instituted the Nemean Games in Honour of Archemorus, the Son of Lycurgus and Eurydice, as has been said in speaking of the Theban War, and they are reckoned by Hyginus the ninth Founders; Eratocles, or rather Theseus, is the tenth, who instituted Games in the Isthmus of Corinth, in Honour of Melicerta the Son of Athamas and Ino, which got the Name of Isthmic: these two last were renewed also at stated Times. The Argonauts, whom the same Author reckons the Eleventh, celebrated Funeral Games in Honour of Cyzicus, whom Jason had slain by Accident: Jumping, Wrestling, and throwing the Javelin, were the Three Combats there exhibited. Acastus the Son of Pelias, after the Return of the Argonauts, appointed the Celebration of Funerals in Honour of his Father, where most of those Heroes disputed the Prize. Zethus the Son of Aquilo, was Conqueror there, as also Calais his Brother, in the Diakulus or double Course (a). Castor in that of the Stadium, and Pollux his Brother in the Gauntlet Fight; Telamon in that of the Coit; Pelias in the Wrestling Match; Hercules in all the Combats; Meleager in that of the Javelin; Cygnus the Son of Mars slew therein Diodotus in a desperate Fight; Bellerophon was victorious in the Horse-Race; Iolaus the Son of Iphichus, in the Chariot-Race, where he outstripped Glaucus the Son of Sisyphus, whose Horses turned head-strong. Eurithus the Son of Mercury gained the Victory in shooting the Bow; Cephalus in Slinging; Olympus, the Disciple of Marsyas, in blowing the Trumpet; Orpheus the Son of Oeagrus, gained the Prize of the Harp; Linus, the Son of Apollo, that of Singing; Eumolpus

(a) This is what was called Dolichodromos. See the Treatise of Mercurialis, l. 2. p. 159.

Eumolpus that of the Voice, in Concert with the Trumpet.

These Games, as we may easily see, were very solemn, and almost all sorts of Trials of Skill were exhibited therein, which were frequently but in Part in most of the other Games.

Priam is the Thirteenth, who after having exposed his Son Paris, appointed Games to be celebrated several Years after, near a Cenotaph which he had raised in Honour of him, wherein contended Neleus the Son of Nereus, Helenus, Deiphobus, and Polytesus, all three Sons of Priam; Telephus the Son of Hercules, Cygnus, Sarpedon, and Paris himself, who having vanquished his Brothers, was acknowledged by his Father.

Achilles is the Fourteenth in this List, who celebrated Funeral Games in Honour of Patroclus, which are so elegantly described in the Twenty fourth Book of the Iliad. In fine, Eneas is the last, who celebrated Games at the Court of Acestes his Host, in Honour of Anchises his Father, dead a Year before, for which I refer to the Fifth Book of the Eneid.

As this Author makes no mention of the Pythian Games, celebrated in Honour of Apollo, nor of some others of much the same Antiquity, I make no doubt but that their Institutors were those whom he had mentioned in the Place of that Chapter which is lost.

All these Games had each their Combats and particular Ceremonies; and it was these Combats and Exercises that made up the Gymnastic of the Ancients; but as I am not to treat of this Subject thoroughly, it having no Connection with Mythology, I refer the Curious to the Treatise of Jerom Mercurialis, to that of Peter Faustus, and to the learned Dissertations of M. Burette, dispersed thro' almost all the Volumes of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles-Lettres.

However, to instruct such as have no Access to those Authors, I shall give here a general Notion of this Gymnastic.

C H A P. III.

Wherein we explain what the Gymnastic was.

THE Word Gymnastic comes from a Greek Word, that signifies naked, because it was in that Attitude the Athletes fought, at least from the Time of the Accident that befel Orcippus, whose Drawers being untied, embarrassed him, and hindered him from gaining the Victory; which happened in the Thirty second Olympiad. There were in the Games of Greece different Kinds of Exercises, all proper for exerting Strength, Agility, and Address; and when they were not carried to Excess, very serviceable to Health. Offman, in his Dictionary (1), makes the Number of these Exercises amount to Fifty five; but the most common were the Race, Leaping, the Disc or Coit, the Wrestling Match or Pancrace, the Javelin and Boxing Matches; and these Exercises compose what is called the Pentathlum. In the Scenic Games there was Singing, Music, and Tragedies, wherein the Musicians and Poets disputed the Prize. This Combat is very ancient, since mention is made of it in the Games celebrated by the Argonauts.

I said the Race was one of those Exercises, and I add it was either on Foot or Horseback, or in Chariots drawn by Two or by Four Horses; which is expressed by the Words Bigæ or Quadrigæ. This Race was single or double; in the latter they run over the Stadium or Lifts twice, and it was called Diaulus.

The Coit was a kind of Square, made either of Wood, or of Stone, or of Iron; and the Victory was adjudged to him who threw it farthest. The Coits were very large and heavy, and sometimes fatal Accidents happened from them: It was with a Blow of one of those Coits that Apollo, or some of his Priests, slew the young Hyacinth, and Perseus his Grandfather Acrisius, as has been said. Menagius, in his Origines, derives the Name for a Coit, Palet, from the Arabic Pa-lat, which signifies lapidibus sternere, to overthrow with Stones; but 'tis probable the Word is not so far fetched, but derives its Original from Palaestra.

Boxing was a Match fought with the Cestus, which Cestus was a kind of Gauntlet made of Ox's Hide. In earlier Times, the Leather of those Gauntlets was softer, more limber, and therefore called μελιχαι. Afterwards they were of a harder Leather. The Combatants covered their Hands with them, and their Arms as far as the Elbow, by Means of several Straps; and with those Gauntlets they dealt to one another such terrible Blows, that they often beat out one another's Teeth, and crush'd their Jaws.

The Bebrycians especially excelled in this Gauntlet-Fight: Accordingly, Virgil, in the Description of Ancises's Funeral Games, feigns that Entellus, who signalized himself in this Combat, came from that Country, as has been said of Amycus, in the History of the Argonauts.

Wrestling consisted in a Combat between two Persons Hand to Hand, and he who by Force or Address overthrew his Antagonist, and kept him down, gained the Victory. This Exercise was one of the most common, and was in Use in the Heroic Age, as appears from the Combat between Hercules and Antæus. The Wrestlers besmeared their Bodies with Oil, the more easily to elude their Adversaries, and they tried all the Feats of Activity they were Masters of to obtain the Victory. When one of the two Champions was thrown down, he strained his utmost to get up again, while his Antagonist squeezed his Throat, trod upon his Belly, and treated him with all possible Inhumanity. The Wrestling Match, whether simple or compound, was called the Panrace.

Leaping was performed either over a Ditch, or some determined Spot of Ground, or in jumping up an Eminence: Thus the Ancients distinguish several Sorts of Leaps, as may be seen in Mercurialis (1). 'Tis sufficient to observe, that he who leaped best and farthest, gained the Prize.

(1) L. II. c. II.

The Javelin Match consisted either in throwing a Stone, or a Dart, or some other Thing, with the most Address, and to the greatest Distance. Plato (1) admitted two Sorts of Jaculations, if I may use this Term, the first he calls τοξικήν, the other ἀκόντισμα; and Galen informs us; that Apollo and Esculapius were the Inventors of them. The Latins translated the first by the Word Sagittatio, and the Second by that of Jaculatio. In those Exercises they equally employed either a Bow or a Sling, or another Instrument (2); which they made use of for hanging to the Arrow a Thong which they held in their Hand, to take the more steady Aim (a).

As the noblest of all these Matches was the Race (b); especially when it was performed on Horseback, or in Chariots, so the most despicable was that of the Gladiators, who fenced for Life and Death. Their common Weapons were two Swords, wherewith they attack'd and defended equally with both Hands, and then they were called Dimachæri, from an old Latin Word, which signifies a double Sword. Nothing can parallel the Rage with which these Combatants fought; but the Fury which actuated the Greeks and Romans in seeing them batter one another with Blood and Wounds, and often kill one another in the midst of the Amphitheatre. In vain did the Emperors make several Edicts to stop this Fury; they were ill obeyed, and hardly was this Combat abolished till after the

E e 2

Establish-

(1) De Leg. l. 8.

(2) Which was called Amentum.

(a) These five Exercises were expressed by these Greek Words.

Ἄλφα δισχὸς ἀκόντιστον δρόμος καὶ πύλη

Saltus, Discus, Jaculum, Cursus et Lucta.

(b) Horace shews sufficiently in his first Ode, what high Esteem it was in.

Sunt quos curriculo pulverem Olympicum

Collegisse juvat, metaque fervidis

Evitata rotis, palmaque nobilis

Terrarum Dominos evehit ad Deos.

Establishment of Christianity; nor even then was it laid aside at the same Time, and in all Places where it had been practised.

For each Celebration of Games, Judges were chosen to decide who should have the Victory, and these Judges were named Hellandices. They had a Place set apart for them, where they might view and judge best of the Advantage which one Combatant had over the other, and from their Decision there lay no Appeal. The Number of these Judges, especially at Olympia, was not always the same: Iphitus, the Restorer of the Games that were celebrated there, would needs be the sole Judge of them, and Oxilus, as well as his Successors, retained the same Privilege. In later Times, the Number of these Judges encreased to Twelve, and there were several Changes in this Matter, as may be seen in Pausanias (1).

Lucian fell upon a very ingenious Contrivance (2), to expose the Fury and Infatuation of most of these Combats, by introducing the Scythian Anacharsis thus discoursing of them to Solon: “ What would these “ young People be at, by putting themselves into such “ a Rage, by tripping up one another’s Heels, and “ tumbling together in the Dirt like so many Swine, “ striving to stifle and stop one another’s Breath?
 “ They anoint their Bodies, and shave one another,
 “ at first, in a peaceable enough Manner; but all of “ a sudden sinking their Heads, they run against one “ another like Rams; then the one lifting up his Com“ panion, lets him fall to the Ground with a violent “ Shock, and throwing himself upon him, hinders “ him from rising, pressing his Throat with his El“ bow, and squeezing him with his Legs; insomuch
 “ that I am in Terror lest he stifle him, tho’ the other “ taps him on the Shoulder, praying to be released, as “ acknowledging himself vanquished. How absurd “ is it that they should first anoint themselves with “ Oil, and then roll in the Dirt! For my Part, I cannot

(1) In Eliac. c. 9.
 Body.

(2) Dialogue of the Exercises of the “ cannot help smiling to see them mock the Grasp of “ their Companions, and glide away like Eels from “ the Hand that holds them. See some of them do“ ing the same Thing openly, saving that they roll “ themselves in the Sand like Pullets, before they en“ gage, that the Hands of their Antagonist may get “ the better Hold, and not slip with the Oil and “ Sweat. See others, in like Manner, overspread

 “ with Dust, belabour one another with Blows of Feet
 “ and Fists, without striving, like the first, to over“ throw one another; one spits out his Teeth with the “ Sand, from a Blow he has received in the Jaws, “ while that Man clad in Purple, who presides at these “ Exercises, gives himself no Trouble to part them.
 “ Some make the Dust fly about them as they jump “ and spring in the Air, like those who dispute the “ Prize in the Race, &c.”

C H A P. IV.

Of Places allotted for the Celebration of Games, and of the principal Cities that exhibited the Representations of them.

THE Exercises and Combats that were exhibited in these Games were different, and required some more, some less Ground. There were Places built of Purpose for the Celebration of them, whose Spaciousness and Conveniency answered to their Magnificence, and to the Ornaments that were laid out upon them;
 and these Places, tho' destined for the same Exercises, had not every where the same Extent, nor the same Form, nor did they bear the same Name.

In the earlier Ages, when Simplicity reigned, it appears that for the Games, at least for those that were celebrated but once, they contented themselves with chusing in the open Fields a commodious Place for the Exercises that were to be there performed. Thus Achilles did, for the Celebration of Patroclus's Funeral Games, and Eneas for the Anniversary of his Father, for which no other Preparations were made, but to measure the Space of Ground that was to be taken up, make it clean, and place Boundaries to it. Adrastus, and the other Chiefs who instituted the Nemean Games, made no other Provision for them, tho' they designed to have them represented at stated Times: But afterwards proper Places were prepared, especially in great Cities, for celebrating them with all possible Magnificence, and these Places bore different Names. At Pisa, the Place allotted for the Olympic Games was called the Stadium, whercof I give a Description in the following Chapter: At Rome it was the Circus, and at Constantinople the Hippodromos. As the Races, whether on Foot or Horseback, or in Chariots, required a considerable Space of Ground, these Places were ample and spacious, of greater Length than Breadth, such as they ought to have been for the Races there perform'd.

For the Scenic Games they had public Theatres; and for the fencing Matches and the Gladiators, whether against one another, or against wild Beasts, there were Structures raised on Purpose, that were called Areas, or Colisees, &c. And in both the one and the other Care was taken to provide a vast Number of Lodges, and other Places to which they got up by little Stairs contrived in the Thickness of the Walls. These Places were allotted for Persons of different Stations. The Concourse of People that frequented them was very great, for the Greeks and Romans loved those kinds of Shows; the last especially, those of the Gladiators, with a Fury not easy to be expressed.

In those Edifices wherein Animals were combated, there were Cells contrived below wherein the Animals were shut up, and which opened by Means of a sliding Door which drew up when they were to be let out upon the Amphitheater, where those who were to fight with them stood ready to receive them. Great Pains were taken to provide the fiercest and at the same Time the rarest Animals, and sometimes they were brought from the Extremity of Afric at extraordinary Expence. As Sea-fights were sometimes exhibited in some of those Places,

Places, Water was conveyed into them in so great Plenty, and the Space that contained it was so large, that several Gallies plied there with Ease; and a real naval Engagement was represented there with all possible Exactness.

Antiquaries have taken great Care to give us Draughts of most of those Edifices: Onuphrius Panvinus especially has preserved to us those of the Circus of Rome, of the Hippodrome, and several others. There are even some of them still remaining in that City, and some others, which Time has not destroyed; such as the Amphitheatres of Nismes, those of Orange, and several others; but nothing gives a higher Idea of the Magnificence of those Monuments, than the Remains of the Colisee that is still to be seen at Rome, and which has something in it that strikes with Astonishment, tho' one of the Popes of the past Age destroyed a great Part of it in order to build a stately Palace.

Having given a general Idea of those Games, and of the Exercises that were therein performed, I shall be somewhat more particular upon the Chief of them; those especially that were instituted by the Greeks; but I presume it is necessary to quote first an ancient Inscription (a), which the Megarians had made, in order to perpetuate the Memory of the Victories of an illustrious Wrestler, because it lets us know the several Places where these Games were celebrated.

The Olympic Games were celebrated at Pisa, in Honour of Jupiter.

The Pythian at Delphi, in Honour of Apollo.

The Nemean, at Argos.

The Isthmian, in the Isthmus of Corinth.

The Panathenaia, at Athens, in Honour of Minerva.

The Olympian, also at Athens.

The Pan-Hellenian, that is of all Greece, in the same City.

The Eleusinian, also at Athens.

The Heraclian, in Honour of Hercules, at Thebes.

E c 4

The

(a) Spon's Travels thro' Greece, Tom. I. p. 289. and Tom. III. p. 221. where we find much such another in the Arundel Marbles.

The Trophonian, at Lebadia.

The Eleutherian, at Platæa.

The Junonian, at Argos.

The Pythian, at Miletus in Ionia.

The same, at Magnesia.

The common Games of Asia, at Philadelphia.

The Ælian Games for Apollo, at Nicopolis.

The Pythian, at Sida.

The same, at Perga.

The same, at Thessalonica.

The Esculapian Games, in Honour of Esculapius at Epidaurus.

The Capitoline, at Rome.

Those which were called Eusebia, at Puzzoli.

The Games in Honour of the Emperors, at Naples.

Among these several Games, Greece chiefly distinguished four ancient ones, which it celebrated with high Solemnity; namely the Olympic, the Pythic, the Nemean, and the Isthmian, according to this Verse of Ausonius:

Quatuor antiquos celebravit Achaia ludos :

of them I shall give an Account in the four subsequent Chapters.

CHAP. V.

Of the Olympic Games.

I Begin with the Olympic Games, as the most celebrated, and perhaps the most ancient of Greece. Not that the Time of their Institution is precisely known, there being diversity of Opinions as to this among the Ancients. Diodorus Siculus will have it that they were instituted by Hercules of Crete, one of those Idæi Dædali, whom I have spoke of in the History of Jupiter. But as this Author lets us know nothing else upon this Subject, I shall take for my Guide Pausanias, who seems to have been at particular Pains to get Information in his Travels thro' Greece, of whatever related to this Solemnity. “ As for the Games
“ of

“ of Greece, says he, this is what I have learned con“ cerning them from some Eleans, who appeared to “ me profoundly skilled in the Study of Antiquity.
“ According to them, Saturn is the first who reigned
“ in Heaven, and in the Golden Age he had a Temple
“ at Olympia. Jupiter being born, Rhea his Mother “ committed the Education of him to the Daſtyli of “ Mount Ida, otherwise called Curetes. These Daſtyli “ came afterwards from Crete to Elis, for Mount Ida
“ is in Crete. They were five Brothers, namely, “ Hercules, Peoneus, Epimedes, Jasius and Ida. Her- “ cules, as being the eldest, proposed to his Brothers
“ a Running-Match, whereof the Prize was to be a “ Crown of Olive; for the Olive was then so common,
“ that they took the Leaves of it to strew the Ground,
“ and to sleep upon: Hercules was the first who brought “ that Tree into Greece, from among the Hyperboreans.
“ It was therefore Hercules of Ida had the Honour of “ inventing these Games, and gave them the Name of “ Olympian; and because they were five Brothers, he “ would have these Games celebrated every fifth Year.
“ Some say that Jupiter and Saturn fought a wrestling “ Match together in Olympia, and that the Empire of “ the World was the Prize of the Victory: Others al“ ledge, that Jupiter having triumphed over the “ Titans, instituted these Games himself, wherein Apollo, “ among others, signalized his Address, and win the “ Prize of the Race from Mercury, and that of Box“ ing from Mars.”

We must not imagine that these Games, from their first Institution, were celebrated continuedly: They were often interrupted, and even for very considerable Intervals; then renewed again, and again laid aside, till at last they assumed a fixed and durable Form; their Celebration returning regularly every five Years, that is, to speak more accurately, after a Revolution of four Years, and in the first Month of the fifth Year: This is the Reason why they reckoned five Years from one Olympiad to another, tho' at Bottom there were but four Years compleat. But the Author now cited will instruct us in these Interruptions and Re-establishments.
I will

“ Fifty Years after Deucalion's Deluge, says he, Cly- “ menes the Son of Cardis, and one of the Descendants “ of Idean Hercules, having come from Crete, cele“ brated those Games at Olympia; then he consecrated “ an Altar to the Curetes, and particularly to Hercules, “ under the Title of Hercules the Protector. Endymion
 “ the Son of Aethlius. banished Clymenus from Elis, “ seized upon the Kingdom, and proposed it to his “ Sons as the Prize of a running Match: But Pelops,
 “ who came about thirty Years after Endymion, ap“ pointed those Games to be represented in honour of “ Jupiter, with more Pomp and Apparatus than any “ of his Predecessors. His Sons not being able to “ maintain themselves in Elis, and having dispersed “ themselves thro' diverse Places of the Peloponnesus, “ Amythaon the Son of Cretheus, and Endymion's Cou“ sin-German, (for Aethlius is said to have been the “ Son of that Eolus who was surnamed Jupiter) Amy- “ thaon, I say, exhibited these Games to the People.
 “ After him Pelias and Neleus exhibited them at the “ common Charge. Augeus also appointed the Cele“ bration of them, and then Hercules the Son of Am- “ phitryo, when he had taken Elis. The first whom “ he crowned was Iolaus, who, that he might win the “ Chariot-Race, borrowed Hercules's own Mares; for
 “ in those Times they borrowed without Ceremony,
 “ Horses that were in Reputation for Swiftmess.”

From Oxylus, who as little neglected these Shows, the Olympic Games were interrupted until Iphitus, who restored them. They had almost lost the Memory of the Exercises and Trials of Skill, that had been exhibited there at their Original; however, they were gradually recovered, and in proportion as any one of those Exercises came to be recollected, it was added to those that were already resumed. During the Interruption we have been speaking of, Greece groaned under the Oppression of intestine Wars; and was at the same Time laid waste by Pestilence. Iphitus went to Delphos,

Delphos, to consult the Oracle about these so pressing Calamities, and the Response given him by the Pythia, was that the Renewal of the Olympic Games would be the Safety of Greece; that he and his Eleans should therefore set about it. Iphitus forthwith ordered a Sacrifice to Hercules to appease that God, and then celebrated the Games.

These Games were again interrupted for the Space of eighty-six Years; then they were resumed, and it was at this first Olympiad, Coræbus gained the Prize of the Race. This Victory is the more remarkable in Antiquity, as it was by this same Celebration the reckoning by Olympiads begun, which were no longer interrupted afterwards; which Event happened 1776 Years before Jesus Christ; a famous Æra among the Greeks, tho' to speak accurately, they never used Olympiads for computing Time till about fifty Years before Alexander the Great, as I have remarked on another Occasion. But they set out with the Olympiad of Coræbus, and from that Time these Games served for an Æra to all Greece, in Contradistinction to all other Games, which were only used for that Purpose in Countries where they were celebrated. Thus the Inhabitants of Delphos, and the Beotians, employed in their Chronology the Pythian Games; those of the Isthmus and the Corinthians computed their Years by the Celebrations of the Istmic Games; and the Argives and Arcadians, for this Purpose, made use of the Nemean Games; for I find none but these four Games whose Celebration served for an Æra to the Greeks.

The Place where these Games were exhibited was called the Stadium; it was a The Stadium of Olympia. Space of six hundred Paces, inclosed with Walls, near the City Elis, and the River Alpheus, and was adorned with proper Embellishments. But being necessitated to take up with Ground which was unequal, this Stadium was very irregular, as may be seen from the Plan which Chevalier Folard has drawn of it upon Pausanias's Description, and which the Abbé Gedouyn has got engraved, to insert the Print of it in his Translation of that Greek Author.

This

This Stadium (1) consisted of two Parts : The first whose Figure pretty much resembled the Prow of a Ship, was called the Barrier. There were the Stables and Coach-houses where the Horses and Chariots were kept, and where they were matched. The second was called the Lists, and it was within the Space of Ground it contained that the Races were performed, whether on Horseback, or in Chariots. At the Extremity of the Lists was the Goal round which they were to turn ; and as he who approached it the nearest, formed a shorter Circle, he was sure, all things else being equal, to come in sooner to the Place whence he set out. It was in this chiefly consisted the Address of those who guided the Chariots, and wherein at the same Time they run the greatest Hazard. For besides the Danger there was of encountering with another Chariot ; if they happened to touch the Goal, the Axle-tree broke in a thousand Pieces, or received at least some fatal Blow which they could not recover. This is what Horace expresses in these Words, Metaque fervidis evitata rotis (2).

Again, beyond this Goal was another Occasion of Danger. I mean the Figure of the Genius Taraxippus, which we have spoke of in the fifth Book of the second Volume, which was framed after such a Fashion as to fright the Horses. We cannot determine whether it was placed there of Purpose to augment the Danger of the Race, or if out of respect to that Genius, it had been left to stand there, as it had done before the Construction of the Stadium ; but still this is certain, that it was a Place of very great Danger.

On both sides of these Lists, all along were the Places for the Spectators. The principal ones were for the Judges and Persons of Distinction ; the Populace, who flocked thither in Crowds, planted themselves wherever they could ; for nothing equals the Curiosity they had for these Sorts of Exercises.

I said from the Barrier the Chariots entered the Lists, and I shall add that these two Places were separated rated by a Rope, which was let down by a kind of Mechanism, the Description whereof is in Pausanias; and this was the Signal that gave Notice to enter the Lists.

(1) Pausan. in Eliac. (2) Ode 1.

These Games, which were celebrated about the Summer-solstice, lasted five Days; for a single Day would not have sufficed for all the Trials of Skill that were exhibited there. As they were consecrated to Jupiter, and made Part of the religious Ceremonies of Paganism, the first Day was destined for the Sacrifices, the second for the Pentatblum and the foot Race, the third for the Combat of the Pancrace, and the simple wrestling Match; the other two, for the Horse and Chariot Races (a).

As the Athletes or Wrestlers fought naked in those Games, at least ever since the Accident I have mentioned, Matrons and Maids were prohibited, under pain of Death, to be present there, and even to pass the Alpheus during the whole Time of their Celebration (1); and this Prohibition, as the Inhabitants of the Country told Pausanias, was so punctually observed, that there never was an Instance of any but one Woman's violating that Law. This Woman, whom some call Callipatria, and others Phivenia, being a Widow, dressed herself after the Fashion of the Masters of the Exercises, and conducted her own Son Pisidorus to Olympia. The young Man having been declared Conqueror, the Mother was so transported with Joy, that she threw aside her Man's Habit, and jumped over the Barrier where she was planted with the other Masters, and so her Sex was discovered. However, she was pardoned for this Infringement of the Law, out of regard to her Father, her Brothers and Son, who had all been crowned at the same Games; but from that Time the Masters of Exercises were forbid to appear otherwise than naked at these Shows. The Punishment imposed by the Law, was to throw
the

(a) There was from Time to Time some Variety as to the Order I speak of, as may be seen in Pausanias, in Eliac, cap. 9.

(1) Pausan. ibid. c. 8.

the Women who durst infringe it, headlong from a very steep Rock which was called Mount Typhæa, on the other Side of the Alpheus.

The Men were also prohibited, under Pain of a considerable Fine, to use the least Fraud towards gaining the Victory; but neither Laws nor Penalties are always a Curb sufficient to confine Ambition within due Bounds. There were Tricks committed; and the severe Punishments inflicted upon them did not deter others from falling now and then into the same Faults. There were, says Pausanias (1), in the Way from the Temple of the Mother of the Gods to the Stadium, six Statues of Jupiter, all six of Bronze, which had been made of the Produce of the Fines to which Wrestlers had been condemned, who had used Fraud to win the Prize, as was signified by the Inscriptions in Elegiac Verse that were inserted there. The Verses inscribed upon the first, set forth that the Prize of the Olympic Games was gained, not by Money, but by Swiftnefs of Foot, and Strength of Body. Those of the second bore that this Statue had been erected by Jupiter to inspire the Combatants with Dread of the Vengeance of that God, if they durst violate the Laws prescribed to them; and it was much the same as to the rest.

Eumolpus the Thessalian is thought to be the first who bribed with Money those who offered themselves with him to the Gauntlet-fight; he was punished for having given this Money, and those to whom he had given it, for having received it. Tho' nothing was more infamous than this Fine, and the Monuments which I have mentioned, yet there was an Athenian named Callipus, who bought the Prize of the Pentathlon. He was condemned to the Fine; and Hiperides, the Deputy for Athens, having asked his Pardon, and not being able to obtain it, the Athenians forbid the Offender to pay this Fine; but the Elians, firm to the Maintenance of their Laws, excluded them from the Games, and this Interdiction lasted till upon their consulting the Oracle of Delphos, the Priests declared she had

(a) Pausan. in Eliac. c. 22.

had no Answer to give them till they had made Satisfaction to the Eleans. Upon this the Athenians submitted to the Fine, whereof the Produce was employed in consecrating to Jupiter six other Statues, with Inscriptions containing their History.

The prodigious Concourse of People which the Celebration of those Games drew to Olympia, enriched that City and all Elis: Accordingly nothing in all Greece was comparable to the Temple and Statue of Olympian Jupiter, whereof I have given some Description in the first Volume of this Mythology. About this Temple was a sacred Grove, named Altis, wherein besides the Chapels, Altars, and other Monuments consecrated to the Gods, and whereof we have a very full Description in the Author I have quoted so oft, were Statues, all by the Hand of the most celebrated Sculptors, erected in Honour of those who had won the Prizes in these Games; a valuable Reward, which added to the Laurel Crown wherewith they had their Heads incircled in Presence of all the Grandees and Persons of Distinction in Greece, and the Honour done them by the Cities in receiving them, were very capable to support that Ardour for Victory which animated the Combatants.

We may remark, before we close this Chapter, that the Descendants of Helen having formed a prodigious Number of Families in Greece, became so powerful, and gained therein so much Interest, that they made a Law be passed, ordaining that none but those who derived their Origine from those Families should be capable of being admitted to dispute the Prizes at the Olympic Games; and Herodotus informs us to this Purpose that Alexander the Great himself was obliged to prove his being one of the Hellenes, before he was received to enter the Lists in those Games. But the Consequence of this was that all the Greeks made it out that they were sprung from some one of those Families; so numerous and diffusive had they been in all the Country; and from that Time the Name of Hellenes, peculiar to one single People, became the general Name of all the Greeks.

I have insisted at some length upon the Celebration of these Games; but as they were at the same Time, as has been said, the most ancient and most solemn of Greece, and as much the same Laws and Regulations were observed in the rest, much the same Exercises, Crowns for Reward, Judges and Combatants, as both the one and the other were bound by Oath to submit to certain Laws, I thought it was necessary to give a full Account of them: I shall be a great deal shorter in the Description of the rest.

C H A P. VI.

Of the Pythic Games:

I Have said in the History of Apollo (1), that the Overthrow of the Serpent Python gave rise to the Institution of the Pythic Games, which makes Ausonius say:

Pythia placando Delphi statuere Draconi (1).

I have explained this Fable, and shewed what we are to understand by this Monster which Ovid says had been formed of the Mud left upon the Earth by Deucalion's Deluge; what remains here is only to relate what particularly relates to these Games. First, 'tis uncertain at what Time they were instituted, and their first Founder is not known; for when Pausanias (2) gives the Honour thereof to Diomedes, who upon his Return from Troy built a Temple in Honour of Apollo Epibaterius (a), I am persuaded he is mistaken, since their Institution was a long while before the Time when that Heroe lived. What may be said with more Probability upon this Subject is, that he established in the Place where he erected the Temple now mentioned,

the

(1) Vol. II. B. 1. (2) Eli (3) In Corinth.

(a) So called from a Greek Word, which signifies consecrado, to go on board, to intimate that this God had gone on-board Diomedes's Fleet, to avoid the Danger to which he and his Companions were exposed.

the same Games that had been celebrated long before at Delphos.

At first, these Games consisted only in singing and Music Matches, as the same Pausanias observes; and consequently it would seem that they had been instituted only for celebrating the Praises of the God who had delivered the Earth from a Monster that threatened it with Desolation. The other Exercises were not admitted there 'till afterwards. 'Tis sufficiently plain in fact that the Thing was so, from those who disputed there the first Prizes, since in the first Representation (1) Chrysothemis of Crete gained the Victory, and next Thamyris the Son of Philammon. What is singular in this, considering the Veneration that was generally entertained for all those Games which Religion had consecrated, and which were specially dedicated to some Divinity, is, that neither Orpheus, who was distinguished by his deep Wisdom and a profound Knowledge of the Mysteries, nor Museus, would ever condescend to dispute the Prizes of the Pythic Games: One Eleutherus was crowned there merely upon Account of his fine Voice, for the Hymn he sung was not his own. We are told that Hesiod was not admitted to dispute there for the Prize, because he could not sing in Concert with the Lyre. As for Homer (2), we read that he went to Delphos; but that being blind, he had made but little Use of his Talent of singing and playing upon the Lyre in Concert. The Painters too were admitted there to dispute the Prize, and Timagorus was preferred to Peaneus the Brother of Phidias.

In later Times Changes were introduced into these Games. In the third Year of the forty eight Olympiad, the Amphictyons, leaving the Prize of Music and Poetry still to subsist, added two others to them (3), the first for those who sung in concert with the Flute; the other for those who played upon the Flute alone: At length the same Combats and Exercises were admitted at those Games as at Olympia: The Race in Chariots drawn by four Horses, after having been a long Time excluded, was introduced thither in the Time of Orestes. Even Children were by an express Law admitted at the Races both of the single and double Stadium. Immediately after, these are still Pausanias's Words, that is in the Pythiad next after that wherein Children were permitted to run, the Prize was abolished, and it was regulated that the Conquerors there should only have Crowns, as in the other Games of Greece. By this it appears that there was anciently a Prize in Money or Cloaths, &c. as at the Funeral Games of Patroclus, but wherein it precisely consisted is more than we can determine.

From these Games they retrenched afterwards the singing along with the Flute, because there was something mournful in it, which suited only with Elegies; but in Exchange Chariot Races with four Horses were admitted; and Clisthenes, the same who afterwards became the Tyrant of Sicyon, was crowned at the first of those Races.

To these and some other Exercises which Pausanias mentions, the Panrace was added at last, in the sixty first Pythiad, wherein Laidus of Thebes gained the Victory. The Laurel Crown was at first the sole Reward of the Conquerors, and the Branches of this Tree were preferred to those of others, from a prevailing Opinion that Apollo had been in Love with Daphné (1). Afterwards a Reward was given in Money, even in the Places where the Use of Crowns prevailed.

To conclude, we may observe that anciently these Games were celebrated only every eighth Year, but afterwards once in four Years, and they served for an Æra to the Inhabitants of Delphos, and the Neighbourhood. The Time of their Celebration, according to Diodorus Siculus, Pausanias and Plutarch, regularly coincided with the third Year of each Olympiad. This Change was introduced by the Amphietyons, for which I refer to Petavius, Scaliger, and especially to the Cycles of the ingenious Dodwel.

The Romans were induced by some Verses of Martius to

(1) See the History of Apollo V. II.

to adopt these Games in the Year of their City 642 (1), and gave them the Name of Apollinares. If you would overcome the Enemy, said the Prediction of that Soothsayer, institute Games in Honour of Apollo. At first the Pretor presided in the Representation of these Games, then Quindecimvirs were appointed to take Care of them, and to exhibit them after the manner of the Greeks.

C H A P. VI.

Of the Nemean Games.

IN the History of the first Theban Expedition (2) I have given Account of the Institution of the Nemean Games by Adrastus and the other Chiefs who accompany'd him, after the sad Adventure that befel the young Archemorus, or, as others call him, Ophelias the Son of King Lycurgus, whom Hypsiphile the Daughter of Thoas suckled. This Tradition concerning the Institution of those Games, tho' well vouched by Antiquity, was not however the only one that passed current in Greece, and there was another that attributed it to Hercules, who founded them after having rid the Forest of Nemea, and the Neighbourhood, of that Lion so celebrated in Fable, whereof he always wore the Skin. This is the Opinion of Tertullian, who had got it, no doubt, from the Greek Authors: Olympia Jovi, quæ sunt Romæ Capitolina, item Herculi Nemea (3). Further, these Games, tho' renewed at stated Times, that is, either every three Years, according to some Authors, or rather every fifth Year, were much of the Nature of Funeral Games. This is the Account given of them by Statius (a) and Artemidorus: The Crown that is given at Nemea, says the latter (4), is one of those that are destined to Funeral Combats, called ἀγῶνας ἐπιταφίους, in Honour of those who died in some Combat.

F f 2

In

(1) Tit. Liv. l. 25. (2) Above B. 4. (3) De Spect. c. 11.

(a) Illic et Siculi suteraſsem dona ſepulchri, Et Nemææ lucum, & Pelopis ſolemnia primi.

Syl. l. 5.

(4) L. 79.

In these Games the same Exercises were performed as in the others, even those of Vocal and Instrumental Music. 'Tis true, F. Faur, who contends that this Trial of Skill was then in Use, quotes for his Opinion a Passage in Hyginus (1), which proves nothing for the Nemean Games, for there that Mythologist is only speaking of the Games of Argos, which he plainly distinguishes from those of Nemea, which he treats of in a separate Article; however, the Thing is not the less certain, since we have an express Passage for it from Pausanias (2), where it is said that “Philopemen joining in the Nemean Games, where the Players on the Harp disputed the Prize of Music, Pylades of Megaropolis, one of the most skilled in that Art, and who had already won the Prize at the Pythic Games, began to sing a Song of Timotheus of Miletus, intitled the Gates, which begun with this Verse: Hero, to whom the Greeks owe their happy Liberty, presently all turned their Eyes on Philopemen, and with one Voice cried out, that nothing could be more applicable to that great Man.”

The Reward of the Conquerors in the Nemean Games, was a Crown of green Parsly, in Memory of the Adventure of the young Archemorus, whom his Nurse had laid down upon some Sprigs of that Plant, when she left him to guide the Leaders of the Argive Army; and their Celebration served for an Æra to the Argives, and the Inhabitants of that Part of Arcadia, which lay next to the Forest of Nemea.

C H A P. VII.

Of the Isthmic Games.

IT IS necessary, before we discourse of these Games, to resume in a few Words what has been said of Ixo and Melicerta (3). Athamas King of the Orchomenians, a People of Beotia, having divorced his

(1) Fab. 273.

(2) L. 8 c. 50.

(3) Vol. I. and Vol. II. Hist. of the Argonauts.

his former Wife, named Nephele, by whom he had two Sons, Phryxus and Hellé, and having married Ino (1) by whom he had also two Sons, Learchus and Melicerta; the latter persecuted the Children of the former Marriage, so far as to make her Husband believe, that the Oracle of Delphos demanded the Blood of Phryxus, as the Means of putting a Stop to the Famine, whereof she herself was the Cause; and the too credulous Athamas was upon the Point of sacrificing his Son to the Safety of his Subjects; but upon Information of his Wife's whole Management, he slew her Son Learchus, and set himself in Pursuit of Ino with so much Eagerness, that she was forced to throw herself down with Melicerta, whom she held in her Arms, from the Top of the Rock Moluria, into the Sea. A Dolphin, we are told, or rather the Waves, carried Melicerta into the Isthmus of Corinth, and the Corinthians, at the Persuasion of Sisyphus, the Brother of Athamas, after having given him a splendid Funeral, instituted to his Honour Games which got the Name of Isthmic, from the Place where they were celebrated the first Time.

These Games, wherein were exhibited the same Trials of Skill as in the others, and chiefly those of Music and Poetry, having been interrupted, probably by some Wars, were afterwards re-established by Theseus, who consecrated them to Neptune, whose Son he pretended to be, as to the God who peculiarly presided over the Isthmus of Corinth; and they were renewed so regularly every five Years, about the Middle of the Month Hecatombion, that they were not even discontinued after the City Corinth had been destroy'd and reduced to Ashes by Mummius; the Sicyonians having received Orders to celebrate them (2), notwithstanding the public Grief and Desolation. When the City was afterwards rebuilt, the new Inhabitants resumed the Care of these Games, and continued to exhibit them with great Regularity. Some Time after, the

F f 3

Romans

(1) Apollod. l. 1. Ovid. Met. l. 5. &c.

(2) Pausan. In Corinth. l. 2.

Romans were admitted to them, and celebrated them with so much Pomp and Apparatus, that besides the ordinary Exercises, a Hunting Match was there exhibited, wherein were presented the most rare Animals; the City Corinth neglecting no Means whereby to please their Conquerors: And what still encreased their Fame is, that they served for an Æra to the Corinthians, and Inhabitants of the Isthmus. A Crown of Pine-Leaves was the Reward of those who gained the Victory in those Games.

C H A P. VIII.

Of the Scenic Games; and the Prizes proposed for the Tragic Poets in the Games of Greece.

AMONG the Scenic Games are ranked, the Trials of Skill of the Tragic Poets, and those of the Musicians and Players on Instruments, who disputed the Prize there. Nothing came up to the excessive Fondness the Greeks had for these Shows, but the Ardour of those who were to exhibit them, in making Preparations for them. These Games were, as has been said, consecrated to Bacchus, Apollo, Venus, and Minerva, and never begun till the ordinary Sacrifices had first been offered to the Gods. The Autumn, the Time of Vintage, was the Season made Choice of especially for the Representation of Tragedies, because those Shows were especially consecrated to Bacchus. The Tragic Poets, who were willing to dispute the Prize there, were obliged to prepare four Pieces, three Tragedies, and a Satire; this is what was called Tetralogia. It was requisite that those Pieces which were hardly represented but upon such Occasions, tho' they sometimes happened to be resumed, should have some Connection with one another; but the Satire was only a Farce, not unlike those that were formerly acted upon our Theatre, as appears from the Cyclop of Euripides, the only Piece of that Kind we have now extant. 'Tis easy to judge that those Satires were extremely free, and full

full of Buffoonry, and consequently merely designed to entertain the People, and to gain their Applause. 'Tis surprising that the first Genius's of the Athenians should have submitted to degrade the Buskin to so mean and ludicrous a Piece of comic Humour.

It was in this kind, I mean the four Pieces joined together, that Eschiles disputed the Prize with his Contemporaries ; but Suidas tells us, that Sophocles was the first that opposed Tragedy to Tragedy, and 'tis probable that this Custom took Place afterwards. And indeed, it was a Thing pretty singular thus to bring into Competition tragic and comic Pieces, four against four, since it might very well happen that one or two of a Poet's Works might be preferable to an equal Number of those of his Competitor, while at the same Time the other two of the former, might be inferior to those of the latter.

At the End of all these Representations, the Votes, which were exactly collected in the Time of Action, were numbered, and he who had the most Votes was publicly crowned. The Poet on whom this Honour was conferred, took the Title of Poet Laureat, because the Crown he received was of Laurel. This Reward, frivolous as it may appear to mercenary Souls, was the Boundary of those great Mens Ambition, and procur'd them the most flattering Distinctions. As to what remains, the Practice of crowning Poets has lasted a long Time, especially in Italy, for which I refer to the Dissertation of the Abbé Reynel, which is to be published in the Volumes of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles-Lettres, which are printing at present.

As to the Games wherein were proposed Prizes of Poetry and Music, the one not going without the other, there were of them among the Greeks in the earliest Periods of Time, and that not a few. These Trials of Skill were admitted in the great Games, that is, in the Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian ; as for the Olympic Games, there is some doubt, at least with respect to the heroic Age. For Suetonius (1), from whom we learn that Nero disputed therein the Prize of Music, adds that this was a Thing new and unusual: Olympiæ præter consuetudinem Musicum Agona commisit. But, as M. Burette very judiciously remarks (a), perhaps these Words, contrary to Custom, out of Course, refers only to the Season, or the Time when that Emperor exhibited those Games. And indeed, if we may believe Atheneus (1), Cleomenes the Rhapsodist sung there the Poem of Empedocles, intitled The Expiations, and sung it from his Memory. To this Argument we may add the Remark of Pausanias (2), who informs us, that near Olympia there was a Gymnasium, called Lalichmian, open to all who had a Mind to be Competitors in those Trials of Wit and Learning of whatever kind, whence those of musical Poetry were probably not excluded. The learned Academic now named, adds to these Arguments, the Authority of Eliau (3), who relates that Xenocles and Euripides disputed the Prize of dramatic Poetry in those same Games, so early as the eighty first Olympiad; and we find at the End of Eusebius's Chronicle, that in the forty fourth there was a Prize proposed for the Players upon the Trumpet, which Timæus the Eliau won.

F.f 4 learn

(1) In Nerone.

However it may have been as to these Combats in the Olympic Games, 'tis certain that they were common in the other three I have named, especially in the Pythic Games, whereof they made the first and most considerable Part.

But it was not only in the great Games of Greece, that those Prizes of Poetry and Music were proposed; they were admitted also into many others that were celebrated in several Cities of Greece, such as Argos and Sicyon, as we learn from Plutarch (4); into Thebes, as may be gathered from the 25th Chapter of the 15th Book of Eliau, who tells us, it was in that City Pindar was vanquished in that Sort of Trial by Corinnus; and into Lacedæmon, in the Carnian Games

(a) Remarks upon the Treatise of Music by Plutarch.

(1) L. 14. c. 3. (2) L. 6. c. 23. (3) Var. Hist. L. 2. c. 8.

(4) Treatise of Music.

Games (a), that were celebrated in Honour of Apollo, where Thersander was the first who gained the Prize (1). Into Athens, during the Feast of the Presses (2), and that of the Panathenaia; to Epidaurus, in those of Esculapius (3); to Ithome, a City of Messenia, during the Feast of Jupiter, as Pausanias expressly says (4). In like manner Delos, Samos, Dion in Macedonia, and several other Cities, exhibited these Games.

In those Trials of Skill the Voice was accompany'd with some Instrument, especially with the Harp; but I believe they sometimes disputed with the Voice alone without any Instrument; as they did with Instruments without the Voice.

Vitruvius (5) observes, that one of the Ptolemies consecrated to Apollo this Sort of Trial, probably at the Time of its Admission into Egypt; but from the earliest Times we can trace, for the Origine thereof is not known, the Greeks had dedicated it to the Gods now named. I say from the earliest Times, for we learn from Pausanias and Hyginus, that this Sort of Combat was exhibited in the Games which Acastus instituted in Honour of his Father Pelias, after the Return of the Argonauts. I have already shewn that Linus, Thamyris, and some others, had been Conquerors there,

(a) I know not if I have given Account of the Origin of those Games elsewhere; however I shall give it here. The Feast Carnæa had been instituted at Sparta in the 26th Olympiad, the Occasion of which was this, according to Pausanias, L. 5. c. 12. An Acar-nanian named Carnus, a famous Soothsayer, whom Apollo himself had inspired, having been slain by Hippotus the Son of Phylax; Apollo infested the whole Camp of the Dorians with the Plague. Upon which the Murderer was banished, and the Manes of Carnus appeased by Expiations, appointed with that View, under the Name of the Carnian Feasts. Others, according to the same Author, assign a quite different Origin of this Feast, and of the Surname of Carnian given to Apollo, and tell us that the Greeks, to build the wooden Horse, having cut down upon Mount Ida, a great Quantity of Cornel-trees (κρῆναι) in a Wood sacred to Apollo, thereby incensed that God against them; and that in order to appease him, they instituted a Worship in his Honour, gave him the Name of Carnian, transposing the Letters of the Name of the Tree to which their Disgrace was owing.

(1) Plutarch, ibid. (2) Idem. ibid. (3) Plato in his Ion. (4) L. 4. (5) In Proem.

there, in that heroic Age. The Poets and Musicians shewed a great Zeal for these Games, and frequently came from a very great Distance into Places where they were celebrated ; so much were they charmed at that Time with the Glory of Victory. This sort of Trial, in short, must have been very amusing to those who were Witnesses to it.

I must not forget, before I close this Chapter, a Story related by Conon (1); for tho' it appears only composed for Amusement, yet it is supported by good Authorities. Two Musicians, of whom the one was of Locris, namely Eunomus; the other Aristan (a) of Rhegium, having gone to Delphos to dispute the Prize of their Art, it happened that the former having broke a String of his Harp, forthwith a Grasshopper appeared, which alighting upon the Harp, supplied so well the Deficiency of the String by its Singing, that Eunomus gained the Victory. The same Author adds, that tho' the two Cities which he Names were only separated by the River Alex, the Grasshoppers sung on the Side of Locris, and were mute on the Side of Rhegium. What is singular herein, is, that this Particularity is attested by Strabo, by Diodorus Siculus, Pliny and Pausanias. The first of these Authors gives a very plausible Account of it, namely that Rhegium is a woody and moist Country, which makes that Insect languid and dull, while it is dry and open towards Locris, which leaves the Grasshopper liberty to sing. When 'tis known, as the thing is now-a-days beyond Question, that the Chirping of the Grasshoppers is nothing but the rapid Motion of their Wings in warm Weather, this makes the Account of that learned and judicious Geographer appear still more rational; to which we may add, that it is undoubtedly this Singularity had given rise to the Fable. The Inhabitants of Locris, had represented in Marble Eunomus, with a Graf-

(1) Nar. 5.

(a) This Name is not to be found in Photius, but Strabo, who relates the same Story from Timæus, has supplied it.

Grashopper, no doubt with a Design to confirm the Truth of the Adventure.

C H A P. IX.

The Continuation of the same Subject.

AFTER having discoursed at some Length of the Chief of these Games, of those who had instituted them, and of the Time when they were represented, 'tis proper to give at least some Account of the rest, as well those that were celebrated in Greece, as those that were adopted, or newly instituted by the Romans; which I shall do in this Chapter, with as much Brevity as possible, as their Names shall occur.

Of the Game called Trojan, or the Game of the Youth.

This Game or Exercise, which Eneas instituted at the Funeral Games of his Father (1), was for the Youth, who being divided into two Bands shewed therein both their Valour and Address. The Romans, who adopted this sort of Combat, represented it in the Circus. Sylla, as we read in Plutarch (2), exhibited this Show; but civil Wars interrupted the Performance thereof until Cæsar, who restored it, as we are told by Suetonius: Trojan ludit turma duplex, majorum minorumque puero- rum (3); and from that Time, the Representations thereof were pretty frequent, since the same Author informs us, that Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, exhibited it to the Roman People; but none of the Emperors did it either with so much Pomp, or so often as Augustus, who gave a Representation of it for the first Time after the Victory at Actium, in the Year of Rome 726. This Prince chose for the Purpose two Companies from among the Roman Youth, the one younger, and the other of a more advanced Age; majorum minorumque delectu, as it is in Suetonius; being persuaded that this Exercise would give the Youth

(1) Virg. Æn. 1. 5. (2) In Syll. (3) In Cæs.

Youth of Quality an Opportunity of forming themselves, and of shewing their Address.

In order to give a just Idea of it, I believe I cannot do better than copy the Description of it from Virgil.

*Now call'd the Prince, before the Games were done,
The hoary Guardian of his royal Son,
And gently whispers in his faithful Ear,
To bid Ascanius in his Arms appear,
And with his youthful Band and Courser come,
To pay due Honours at his Grandfire's Tomb.
Next he commands the huge assembled Train
To quit the Ground, and leave an open Plain.
Strait on their bridled Steeds, with Grace Divine,
The beauteous Youths before their Fathers shine.
The blooming Trojans and Sicilians throng,
And gaz'd with Wonder as they march'd along.
Around their Brows a vivid Wreath they wore ;
Two glittering Lances tipt with Steel they bore :
These a light Quiver stor'd with Shafts sustain,
And from their Neck depends a golden Chain.
On sprightly Steeds advance three graceful Bands,
And each a little blooming Chief commands.
Beneath each Chief twelve sprightly Striplings came,
In shining Arms, in Looks and Age the same.
Grac'd with his Grandfire's Name, Polites' Son,
Young Priam, leads the first gay Squadron on ;
A Youth, whose Progeny must Latium grace :
He press'd a dappled Steed of Thracian Race :
Before, white Spots on either Foot appear,
And on his Forehead blaz'd a silver Star.
Atys the next advanc'd, with Looks divine,
Atys the Scarce of the great Attian Line :
Iulus' Friendship grac'd the lovely Boy :
And last Iulus came the Pride of Troy,
In Charms, superior to the blooming Train ;
And scurr'd his Tyrian Courser to the Plain ;
Which Dido gave the princely Youth, to prove
A lasting Pledge, memorial of her Love.*

*Th' inferior Boys on beauteous Coursers ride,
 From great Acestes' Royal Stalls supply'd.
 Now flush'd with Hopes, now pale with anxious Fear,
 Before the shouting Crowds, the Youths appear;
 The shouting Crowds admire their Charms, and trace
 Their Parents Lines in every lovely Face.
 Now round the Ring, before their Fathers, ride
 The Boys in all their Military Pride,
 'Till Periphantes' sounding Lash from far
 Gave the loud Signal of the mimic War;
 Strait, in three Bands distinct, they break away,
 Divide in Order, and their Ranks display:
 Swift at the Summons they return, and throw
 At once their hostile Lances at the Foe:
 Then take a new Excursion on the Plain;
 Round within Round, an endless Course maintain;
 And now advance, and now retreat again;
 With well-dissembled Rage their Rivals dare,
 And please the Crowd with Images of War.
 Alternate now they turn their Backs in Flight,
 Now dart their Lances, and renew the Fight;
 Then in a Moment from the Combat cease,
 Rejoyn their scatter'd Bands, and move in Peace.
 So windes delusive, in a thousand Ways
 Perplext and intricate, the Cretan Maze;
 Round within Round, the blind Mæanders run,
 Untrac'd and dark, and end where they begun.
 The skilful Youths in Sport, alternate ply
 Their shifting Course; by Turns they fight, and fly:
 As Dolphins gambol on the watry Way,
 And, bounding o'er the Tides, in wanton Circles play.*

Pitt's Eneid V. ver. 702, &c.

Such was the Order of these Games; and when afterwards Ascanius built the City Alba Longa (1), he brought this military Diversion again into Repute, and taught that Exercise to the ancient Latins. The Albans having received it from him, transmitted it down to their Posterity. In fine, Rome in Honour of the

(1) Virg. ibid.

the Memory of its Founders, resumed the Use of that ancient Carrousel, and the Body of Youths that were prepared for this Exercise, was still called, in the Time of Virgil, the Trojan Band.

The Games of Augustus.

Tacitus informs us (1) that these Games were instituted in Honour of Augustus, at the Request of the Tribunes of the People, who asked Liberty to exhibit them at their own Charges, and that the Celebration of them should be mark'd in the public Calendar. But what that Historian advances on this Head, is not accurate, since it was neither on that Occasion those Games were instituted, nor that they were register'd for the first Time in the Calendar, since their Original reaches back to the Year of Rome 735. When Augustus, after having made the Tower of Greece and Sicily upon his Return to Rome, allowed an Altar to be raised to Fortune of safe Conduct, Fortunæ reduci; and that Day was mark'd in the Calendar under the Name of Augustalia (2); and it was eight Years after, under the Consulship of Ælius Tubero, and Paulus Fabius, that these Games were instituted by an Act of the Senate, and celebrated for the first Time on the fourth of the Ides of October *.

Of the Capitoline Games.

These Games were founded by the Romans, according to Titus Livius, to thank the Gods for having saved the Capitol, when the Gauls plundered Rome; and to add to their Magnificence, and at the same Time that they might be renewed at stated Times, a new College of Priests was instituted: Capitolinos ludos, says that Author, Solemnibus aliis addidimus; Collegiumque ad id novum, autore Senatu, condidimus. In these Games three Sorts of Exercises were commonly exhibited, the Horse Race, the Trial in vocal and instrumental Music, and

(1) Annal. l. c. 15. (2) Diod. c. 54.

* The eleventh of October.

and the Gymnastic Games; that is, all those which composed the Pentathlon (1).

The Games of Ceres.

Tho' the Greeks celebrated the greater and the lesser Mysteries in Honour of Ceres, as has been said in the fourth Book of the second Volume, yet no Games were therein represented; thus those I speak of here, owe their Origine to the Romans, and, according to Tacitus, it was (a) C. Mummius while he was Edile, gave the first Representation of them in the Circus (b). But he was not their Founder, since we learn from Titus Livius, that long before him, even from the second Year of the Punic War, under the Dictatorship of Servilius Geminus, they had been exhibited. The Celebration of these Games, which lasted eight Days, commenced on the Day before the Ides, or on the twelfth of April (2).

As in those Games the Mourning of Ceres for the Rape of her Daughter was commemorated, as well as in the Eleusinian Mysteries, the Roman Ladies appeared there in white Robes, with lighted Torches in their Hands, to represent that Goddess seeking for her dear Proserpine; the Men too who joined in them, came thither fasting; for the strictest Abstinence was enjoined before Night, especially from Wine and Women, and most punctually observed too: The smallest Blemish excluded the Spectators from them, and the public Herald took Care to warn all who might profane them, to quit the Assembly. If any one was convicted of having stained his Purity, he was punished with no less than Death. This is confirmed by the unanimous Testimony of all the Historians who have spoke of the Celebration of these Games, and it would be an easy Matter

(1) Petr. Faber.

(a) Tandem statuere Circensium ludorum die, qui Cereri celebratur exequi destinata. Annal. lib. 15.

(b) Circus erit pompa celebris numeroque Deorum,

Primaque ventosis palma petetur equis.

Hi Cereris ludi, &c.

Ovid. Fast. lib. 4.

(2) Ibid.

ter to quote them. As to what remains the same Shows were exhibited there as in the other Games, especially that of the Horse-Race. I believe they were celebrated every fifth Year; at least it was after such an Interval that the Sibyllin Oracles ordained a Day of fasting by Way of Preparation for them; to which was added the Use of the warm Bath, as very conducive to Continency and Purity, with which they were obliged to come up to the Solemnity.

The Actiac Games.

Augustus, according to Suetonius (1); after the Victory he gained over Marc-Antony, built the City of Nicopolis, and there instituted Games in Honour of Apollo, to be renewed every fifth Year. Dion Chrysostom (2) adds that in their Celebration the Gymnic Trials of Skill were admitted, with those of Music, and the Horse-Race; that Augustus gave them the Name of Actiac, from the Promontory of that Name, where Apollo, to whom he believed himself indebted for the Advantage he had gained over the Enemy, was especially honoured; that he committed the Care of them to four Colleges of Priests; namely, the Pontiffs, Augurs, Septemvirs, and Quindecimvirs; and that they were celebrated afterwards at Rome in the Stadium made for that Purpose in the Campus Martius. From those two Authors it appears that Augustus was the Founder of these Games; but Strabo, more exact, informs us that they were celebrated at the Promontory of Actium long before him, and that he only renewed them, added to their Solemnity, and ordered them to be repeated every five Years; whereas before they were represented every third Year; there the Conquerors were crowned, as in the other Games.

Of the Agonal and Astyc Games.

These Games, which were celebrated at Rome with a great deal of Magnificence, were so called from the Victim that was offered there, which went by the Name of

(1) In August. c. 18 (2) Lib. 51.

of Agonia. As the Tyber sometimes overflowed the Plain where the Circus stood, they were represented near one of the Gates of Rome, which from thence was called Agonal, as well as the little Hills adjoining.

The Astic Games were originally Greek, and at the same Time of the Scenic Kind: The Romans borrowed them from the Athenians, and the Emperor Caligula appointed them to be celebrated first at Syracuse; but the Neapolitans, who were the Race of a Greek Colony, had represented them before. Authors are divided as to the Signification of the Name of these Games: Some are of Opinion that it answers to Urbani in Latin, because they were celebrated in the City, in Opposition to those that were exhibited in the Country, and were therefore termed Rustici. Ausonius (1), who says the Romans had adopted them, seems to confound them with the Actiac Games; but perhaps the true Pronunciation of this Word is Attic, as it is in some of the Manuscripts of Suetonius.

Of the Games celebrated in the Camps.

These Games did not require so much Ceremony and Apparatus as the others; they were celebrated by the Soldiers themselves in their Camps, either for their Exercise or Recreation. And indeed nothing was more proper to keep them in Breath than those Sorts of Combats, among which, besides Wrestling, Running and other Trials of Skill, it seems they fought with the fiercest Animals; this is what we learn from a Passage of Suetonius, who says Tiberius, to shew that he enjoyed a perfect State of Health, for there was a Surmise to the contrary, not only was present at these Games, but himself attacked a Boar with his Arrows.

Of the Games of Castor and Pollux.

The Romans, who conferred upon these two Heroes a particular Worship, as has been said in their History, instituted these Games in the War they had with the Latins, who had abandoned the Romans, and joined the Tarquins. It was the Dictator Aulus Posthumius made a solemn Vow to exhibit these Games in Honour of those two Heroes, if he was successful in that Expedition; and the Senate, in Confirmation of Aulus Posthumius's Vow, passed an Act for the Continuation of these Games every Year (1). Nothing exceeded the magnificent Pomp with which they were ushered in and accompanied, as we learn from Dionysius of Halicarnassus (2). After the ordinary Sacrifices, says he, such as presided over those Games set out from the Capitol to march in Order thro' the Forum to the Circus (3), where this Show was exhibited; they were preceded by their Children, on Horse-back, when they themselves were of the Equestrian Order, while the Plebeians marched a Foot. The former composed so many Troops, and the latter Companies of Foot Soldiers; that Strangers, who came in Crowds to this Spectacle, and who were received on the Occasion with all possible Regard, might see the Resource which Rome had in that illustrious Body of Youth, who were ready to appear soon in the midst of their Armies. This Procession, followed with Chariots, some drawn by two, some by four Horses, and with the other Knights who were to run in the Circus, was closed by the Athletes, who were also to fight there.

(1) Idyll. 10.

Of the Megaleſian Games celebrated in Honour of Cybele and the other great Gods.

These Games, instituted by the Greeks, and adopted by the Romans, went by the Name of great Games, Megaleſes, from the Goddess in whose Honour they were celebrated, and who was called the Great-Mother. Cicero (4), who informs us that a great Concourse of People and Strangers frequented these Games, adds that they were exhibited upon the Palatine Mount, near the Temple, in Order to be represented in the very

(1) Dion. Hal. l. 7. (2) Ibid. (3) Panvinus de Lud. Circ.

(4) De Arusp. c. 12.

very Presence of the Goddess. Their Celebration fell on the Day before the Ides of April on which the Romans had received her Worship (a).

Some Authors have confounded these Games with those of the other great Gods, who had the same Name; but Cicero (1) plainly distinguishes them. The last had been instituted by Tarquin the elder; the others not till the Romans brought from Pessinus the Worship of Cybele, in the Year of Rome 543. under the Consulship of Cornelius Cethegus, and Cornelius Tuditanus. The Day of their Celebration was likewise different, since those of Cybele fell on the Day before the Ides of April, as has been now said from Titus Livius, and those of the great Gods, on the Day before the Calends of September, as we learn from Cicero (2).

Of the Floral Games.

In Order to understand what I have to say on this Article, we must call to Mind what has been observed elsewhere of the Goddess Flora, worshipped at Rome from the Foundation of that City, or from the Time even of Romulus and Numa. She had Priests and Festivals, and was different from a Courtesan of the same Name, who made the Senate and Roman People Heirs to an Estate, which she had made by Prostitution.

Further, it was not upon the Estate she had left that the Floral Games were instituted, nor upon the Money raised by their Representation, as some Authors will have it; but upon the Fines to which those were condemned who had been convicted of Peculation, as we learn from Ovid (3), and more particularly from Medals, on which are represented the Genius of the Roman People, with the Figure of a Ram, or of a Sheep, the Symbols of Peculation. These Medals, which are of Silver, were struck during the Edileship of Publius Malleolus, and the Institution of the Games falls under the Consulship of Claudius Centho and Marcus Sempromius,

G g 2

(a) Pertulere Deam pridie Idus Aprilis: isque dies festus factus fuit: populus frequens dona Deæ in Pallatium tulit, lectisterniumque & ludi fuere, Megalesia appellata. Tit. Liv. 29.

(1) In Vert. l. 5. (2) Loc. cit. (3) Fast. l. 7. v. 279.

nus, in the Year of Rome 513 but it was not till the Year 580 that these Games became annual, on Occasion of a Famine which lasted three Years, and which had been ushered in by cold and rainy Springs; the Senate, to appease Flora, and obtain better Crops, having passed an Act that Year, appointing the annual Celebration of these Games at the End of April (a) in Honour of that Goddess, which was regularly executed for the future (b).

Tho' the Expence of these Games was not defrayed from the Estate of the Courtisan Flora, they must needs however have been instituted upon Occasion of her Testament, tho' afterwards they were dedicated to the ancient Flora, since therein the Memory of the Gallantries of the former was kept up, by the excessive Liberty, or rather the unbounded Licentiousness and Impudence that prevailed there, as has been said in its proper Place, where I have mentioned a Circumstance of Cato's Life, who left them that he might not lay the People under a Restraint by his Presence.

CHAP. X.

Of some other Games.

I Should never have done were I to speak at any length of all the other Games, since there were no considerable Cities in the Roman Empire, but valued themselves upon the Celebration of some Games or other, either upon the Arrival of the Magistrates who were to govern them, or upon Occasion of Victories and other Advantages gained by the Common-wealth. The Magistrates also took Care to exhibit Games at their own Expence, when they entered on their Office; and tho' of all Offices the Edileship was the least considerable, it was however during it that the greatest Expence

(a) The fourth of the Calends of May, or the 28th of April.

(b) Convenire Patres, E, si bene floreat annus, Numinibus nostris annua festa covent.

Annuitis votis; Consul cum consule Lænus Posthumio ludos persolvere mihi.

Ovid, Fast. lib. 5. v. 324.

pence was laid out upon those Games, because the People judged from thence how those who were invested with it were likely to behave when they came to be advanced to more considerable ones. Lastly, others were exhibited at the Birth of great Men, which were called Natalitii, and on a thousand other Occasions. However, as among those Games some were very noted tho' commonly not annual, as most of those I have discoursed of hitherto, it will not be amiss to end with a summary Account of them.

Of the Circensian Games.

Tho' by the Circensian Games we are to understand only the Combats, the Races, and other Exercises that were performed in the Places known by the Name of Circus, which had been raised for the Representation of all Sorts of Games, yet the Antiquaries comprehend under that Name, the Race which was instituted in the Isthmus of Corinth by Ænomaus King of Pisa, to rid himself of those who were courting his Daughter Hippodamia, and wherein Pelops was Conqueror, as has been said in its Place; or that other Race which Hercules instituted in Elis, wherein he having gained the Victory, received a Crown of Olive from the Hand of the same Pelops (a): Primus Hercules hunc honorem habuit, manibus Pelopis, as we have in Lactantius.

Romulus, after the Rape of the Sabine Women, appointed the same Games to be celebrated in the open Fields, for there was no Place then destined for that Purpose. These first Games of the Romans went by the Name of Consualia; and if Virgil gives the Name of Circensian Games to those which Romulus exhibited on the Occasion now mentioned, it is by Way of Anticipation; for it was only in the Time of Tarquinius the Elder that the first Circus was built. These Games were also called by the Name of the great Games,

G g 3

Ludi

(a) Primum Pisæa per arva,
Hunc pius Alcides Pelopi certavit honorem,
Pulveremque fera crinem deterfit oliva.

Stat. Theb. l. 6,

Ludi magni. I insist no farther on these Edifices, which were proper for the Chariot and Horse-Races, and were very numerous at Rome and about it, because their Names and Figures may be seen in Onuphrius Panvinus, who has composed a Treatise of Purpose upon the Subject.

The Games of the Cross-ways or Compitales, and others.

Tarquin the elder having observed a Prodigy in the sacred Hearth of the Household-Gods, instituted these Games, that were celebrated afterwards at certain stated Times, that is, during the Winter, and about the Time of the Saturnalia.

The Equestrian Games were those whose Celebration consisted in Horse-Races, and of them the Romans distinguished two Sorts. The Decumani were such as they represented every tenth Year, and which the Senate had instituted in Honour of Augustus, who every fifth Year, and sometimes every tenth Year, proposed to quit the Reins of Government which he kept however his whole Life-time. The Games of the Leaves, were so called either from the Leaves that the Crowns were made of, or because the People threw of them upon the Conquerors (1). Those of the Gladiators took their Names from the desperate Engagement of that Sort of Combatants, who fought therein with inconceivable Fury and Obstinacy, and for which the Romans had an inhuman Curiosity. The Gymnic Games borrowed theirs from the Nakedness of the Wrestlers, and from the five Sorts of Combats that were exhibited therein, which made up what the Ancients called the Gymnastic. The Instaurative Games were those that were represented a second Time. The Lustral, Lustrales, or Rubigalia, had been instituted in Honour of Mars, and it was during their Celebration that the Arms, the Trumpets, &c. were purified. The Games of Mars, which were celebrated on the first of August, had been instituted in Honour of that God, to perpetuate the Memory of the Temple built to his Honour in the Time of the Emperor Claudius (2).
The

(1) Ludi foliacei. (2) Dion. l. 60.

The Games named Novendiles, were the same with those funeral Games we have discoursed of, and which were exhibited at the Death of great Men, or of the Emperors. The Palatine Games, Palatini, were instituted by Augustus in Honour of Julius Cæsar, and got that Name, from the Temple which was upon the Palatine Mount, where they were celebrated every Year for eight Days, beginning with the 25th of December. Those of the Fishers, Piscatorii, were renewed every Year in the Month of June, by the Prætor of the City, in Honour of such of the Fishers upon the Tyber, whose Gain was carried into the Temple of Vulcan, as a Tribute paid to the Dead. The Plebeian Games were exhibited in Honour of the People, who had contributed so much to the Extinction of the regal Power. The Pontificals were those exhibited by the Priests at entering on their Office, in Imitation of the Questors, whose Games went by the Name of Ludi Quæstorii Romani, or the Roman Games had been instituted by Tarquin the Elder (1), in Honour of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, as we learn from Cicero (2). The Sacerdotal Games, were those which the People in the Provinces obliged the Priests to present them with. The Triumphales, those that were represented upon occasion of some Triumph. The Votivi were exhibited in Consequence of some Vow; and those were either public, when it was a public Vow, as was the Case either in public Calamities, or in the Heat of a Battle, or on other momentous Occasions; or private, when some private Person gave a Representation of them. The former were given by the Magistrates in Consequence of an Act of the Senate: We have an Inscription that makes mention of one of these Votive and Public Games, for the happy Return of Augustus. Ti. Claud. &c. Ludos Votivos pro reditu Imp. Cæs. Divi F. Augusti.

Ludi Sigillares, were so called upon Account of the little Figures, either of Silver or some other Metal, which they sent to one another in Token of Friendship, and that commonly during the Saturnalia. Ludi Taurii, were instituted to the Honour of the infernal

G g 4 Gods,

(1) Tit. Liv. (2) In Verr. 5.

Gods, on Occasion of a Plague, under the Reign of Tarquin the Proud, which Plague arose from the exposing of Bulls Flesh to sale.

Lastly, the Secular Games were so called not from their being repeated only once in an hundred Years, as is commonly believed ; but this Name was given to certain Games that were renewed but seldom, or that were represented but once during the same Persons Life. This is the Idea of them given by Ovid :

*Jussrat & Phæbo dici ; quo tempore ludos
Fecit, quos ætas aspicit una semel.* Trist. l. 2.

Accordingly their Original, at it is related at very great Length by Valerius Maximus (1), and Zosimus (2), had no Relation to the Name which they went by afterwards. Volusius Valerius says the former of those two Authors, having three Children, two Sons and a Daughter, who were seized by the Plague that wasted the Province where they lived, and finding the Remedies applied by Physicians ineffectual, having addressed himself to the Genius of his Gods Lares, heard a Voice enjoining him to carry them to the Banks of the Tyber, and to make them drink of the Water of the River. He at first scrupled to obey, considering the Distance he was at from that River ; but at last the Malady and the Danger encreasing, he was determined to set out ; and having arrived near the Tyber, at a Place named Tarentum, he gave them drink, and they were cured. In Gratitude to the Gods for so signal a Kindness, he offered Sacrifices of black Victims to Pluto, Proserpine, and the other infernal Divinities, for three Nights successively. Valerius Publicola, continues the same Author (a), who was made Consul when Tarquin was banished, believing the Romans had more need than ever of the Protection of the Gods, renewed the Sacrifices of Volusius in the Year of Rome 245, appointed them to be

(1) Lib. ii. c. 4. (2) Lib. 2.

(a) Primos ludos seculares, ex ætis Regibus post Romam conditam annos 245. Valerius Publicola instituit. Antias apud Censor, de die natali, c. 17.

be offered upon the same Altar and to the same Gods, and added Games to them. In fine, we learn from Varro, whose Testimony is cited by Censorinus (a), that the Romans, affrighted by several Prodigies that happened one after another, having consulted, according to Custom, the Books of the Sibyls, learned that they were to renew the Sacrifices and the Games of Volusus, and to celebrate them for the future every hundred Years in the Campus Martius: This was the Origin of the secular Games.

To proceed, nothing came up to the Solemnity of these Games. First, Heralds were dispatched thro' all Italy to invite every Body to them, as to a Solemnity which they would never see again; and when the Time of their Celebration approached, the Consuls, Decemvirs, and at last the Emperors themselves went into different Temples to offer Sacrifices, and ordered a Distribution to be made to the People of such things as were necessary, that every one might set about the expiating of his Sins; such as Torches, Sulphur, and Bitumen, and none were excepted but the Slaves. The People thus furnished with Materials for the Expiation, flock'd to the Temple of Diana, which was upon the Aventine Mount, and every one gave his Children Barley, Corn and Beans, to offer the whole in Sacrifice to the Destinies in order to appease them. Then upon Arrival of the first Festival consecrated to Juno, three Days and three Nights were employed in offering Victims to Jupiter, Juno, Neptune, Vulcan, Mars, Diana, Vesta, Venus, Hercules, Saturn, to Divinities of the Fountains, and lastly to the Parcæ, Proserpine, and Pluto; and all this at Tarentum itself, a Place not far from the Campus Martius, where these Games were to be performed.

On the first Night, at the second Hour, the Consuls in the Time of the Republic, and afterwards the Emperors perors themselves, accompanied by the Decemvirs who presided at this Solemnity, went to the Banks of the Tyber, where they raised three Altars, on which they sacrificed three Lambs; and after sprinkling the Altars with the Blood of those Victims, they ordered the rest of them to be burnt. This Ceremony was illuminated by a great Number of Lamps, and accompanied with singing several Hymns in Honour of the Gods, and terminated by the offering of several black Victims, such as Volusus and Publicola had formerly offered.

(a) Cum multa portenta fierent——& ideo libros Sibyllinos Decemviri adiissent, & Diti Patri, & Proserpinæ ludi Tarentini in campo Martis fierent, & hostiæ fuvæ immolarentur; utique ludi centesimo quoque anno fierent. Varro apud eundem loc. cit.

While they were taken up in these religious Functions, Artists erected a Theater, and prepared the Place where the Exercises common to the Games were to be performed; then the next Day in the Morning they went to the Capitol, where after offering a Sacrifice to Jupiter, they returned to the Place now mentioned, and began to celebrate the Games in Honour of Apollo and Diana. The next Day the Roman Ladies repaired to the same Capitol to sacrifice to Juno: Lastly, the Emperor himself, accompany'd by the Decemvirs, went the same Day and offered to each of the foresaid Divinities the Victims that belonged to them.

On the third Day, seven and twenty Youths of the best Families, all in Robes, and as many Virgins, marched in Procession to the Palatine Mount to the Temple of Apollo, where they vied with one another in singing Hymns and Songs, to make the Gods propitious to the Emperor, the Senate, and the Roman People. Lastly, during the three Days and three Nights that the Solemnity of these Games continued, all the Theaters in Rome, the Cirques, and the other public Places destined for these Festivals, were employed in Shows that were therein exhibited. Among other things, there were also hunting Matches, Combats with wild Beasts, Sea-fights, &c. The People divided the whole Time between Mirth and Devotion.

Thus it is that the Games of the Greeks and Romans were intermixed with Religion, and this is what induced me to give the History of them a Place in this Mythology.

A C O M P L E A T
I N D E X
O F

P E R S O N S and T H I N G S

Contained in the F O U R V O L U M E S of this
M Y T H O L O G Y.

The Numerals or Roman Characters refer to the Volume, and the Figures to the Page.

A.

A B I D I R, the Name of the Stone which Saturn swallowed, ii. 189.

Abas, the Son of Lyncus King of Argos, and his Successor, iii. 364, 414.

Abdabaram, an Arabian God, i. 570.

Abellio, a God of the Gauls, iii. 275.

Abenauquis, a People in America, their Religion, i. 142.

Aborigines, their Country, ii. 262. Hercules distributes to his Soldiers a Part of that Country, iv. 90. The Trojans unite with the Aborigines under the Name of Latin People, ib. 312.

Abraham, the Founder of Judaism, i. 162. Whether Serug his Father was the first Author of Idolatry; if Abraham himself was an Idolater, ib. 172, 173. Idolatry more antient than Abraham, ib. 169, 192, 193. ii. 2. That he was versed in the Knowledge of the Stars, i. 434. Whether the Expedition of the Argonauts was borrowed from the Journeyings of Abraham and Moses, iv. 3. See Patriarchs.

Abfyrthus the Son of Ætes, and Brother to Medea, assassinated by his Sister, i. 419. iii. 44, 46. This Murder is a Calumny

I N D E X.

- lunmy of the tragic Poets, 62. 'Tis variously related by Authors, ib. 49.
- Abydenus*, an antient Author of the Chaldeans, a Fragment of his History, i. 80, 85.
- Abyla*. See Calpe.
- Acacallide* the Daughter of Minos I. married to Apollo, iii. 483. Then to Miletus, iv. 392. See Miletus.
- Acacus*, the Son of Lycas, what City he founded, iii. 354.
- Acamas* the Son of Theseus, iii. 431.
- Acara* or Alquibila, a Tower, an Object of Religion among the Arabians, i. 570.
- Acarnania*, a Country of Epirus, the Origin of that Name, iv. 98. See the Note.
- Acasta*, one of the Nymphs, ii. 531.
- Acastus*, the Son of Pelias, and Coulin to Jason, was one of the Argonauts, iv. 16. Appoints the Celebration of funeral Games in honour of his Father, 53. Pursues his Sisters for the Murder of their Father, 100. Astidamia the Wife of Acastus. See Astidamia, Alceges.
- Acca Laurentia*, Nurse to Remus and Romulus, ii. 578.
- Acca Laurentia* or Larentia, a Courtisan whom the Romans worshipped under the Name of Flora, ii. 575, &c. See Floral Games.
- Accitans* or Accitanians, a People in Spain, worshipped a God of War, iii. 305.
- Accorn*, that it cannot be the Food of Man, i. 49.
- Accephali*, or Men without the Head, i. 74.
- Accidas* and Accisus worshipp'd in Greece as Heroes, iii. 433.
- Acerra*, an Instrument for the Sacrifices, iii. 276.
- Acestes* King of Sicily, his History, iv. 402.
- Achaia*, a Country of Greece. See Acheus.
- Achas*, a City of Egypt; the Water of the Nile was employed there in a religious Ceremony, iii. 114, 116.
- Acheans*, a People of Greece. See Acheus. They are banished from the Peloponnesus by the Heraclidæ, iv. 129.
- Achelous*, a River in Ætolia; the Combat of the God of that River with Hercules, i. 29. Hercules tears off one of his Horns; the Explanation of this Fable, ii. 488. iv. 97.
- Acheron*, a River in Epirus, the Quality of its Water, iii. 34, 35. This was made one of the Rivers in Hell, ib. Other Rivers named Acherons, 35.
- Acherusia*, a Lake in Egypt, iii. 3. It was from this Lake the Greeks derived their Idea of their Acheron, iii. 35. Another Lake of this Name in Thesprotia, whence the Acheron rises, ib.

Acheus

I N D E X.

- Acheus*, who gave his Name to Achaia, iii. 397. His Genealogy, 398. See the Table.
- Achilles*, his Genealogy, iii. 391. iv. 274. Thetis dips him in Styx; his Education, ib. He is forced to the Siege of Troy, 226, 275. He leads thither the Myrmidons, 216. His Conquests during the Siege, 276. His Wrath against Agamemnon, 223, 232. His Death, 277. He is worshipped as a Demi-God, 278. See Deidamia, Polixena.
- Achillaea*, Feasts in Honour of Achilles, i. 298.
- Achivians*, or Hevcaans, a Name given to the Greeks, iii. 407. Its Etymology, 408, 413.
- Achlis*, the first Being in the Pagan System, i. 119.
- Achor*. See Myagrus.
- Acis* transformed into a River, iv. 293.
- Acmon*, the Father of Cælus or Heaven, his History, his Death and Apotheosis, i. 120. ii. 171.
- Acmonia*, two Cities of this Name built by Acmon, ii. 171.
- Acræus*, a Surname of Jupiter, ii. 219.
- Acrisius* or Acrifus, the Son of Lynceus, and Father of Danae, iii. 364. His Death, 463. See Danae and Perseus.
- Æteon*, his Genealogy, iii. 410. His Death, 413. Is ranked among the Demi-Gods, 419. The Ætia or Ætiaca, Feasts in Honour of Apollo, i. 298. Ætiac Games instituted by Augustus, why, iv. 448. See Games.
- Ætica*, a Country of Greece, its different Names, iii. 374. See the Note.
- Ætium*, a Promontory of Epirus, i. 298. iv. 448.
- Ætor*, the Grandfather of Achilles, iii. 391.
- Ætor*, another, an Argonaut, iv. 16.
- Adad* and Benadad, Names common to the Kings of Syria. Their Signification, i. 189.
- Adam*, the Rabbins believed he was created with both Sexes, i. 83.
- Adder*, worshipp'd as representing Esculapius, i. 203.
- Adcona* and Abcona, two Roman Divinities, iii. 195.
- Adephagia*, the Goddess of Gluttony, a Temple which she had in Sicily, iii. 179.
- Ades*, the Name of Pluto, and of the Infernal Regions, i. 70. iii. 28, 441.
- Adma*, one of the Nymphs, ii. 531.
- Admetus*, the King of Pheres, Spouse to Alcestes, his Genealogy, iii. 594. One of the Argonauts, iv. 17.
- Adod*, or Adodus, King of the Gods among the Phenicians, i. 97.
- Adoneus*, the Arabians worshipped the Sun under that Name, i. 188.

Adonis

I N D E X.

- Adonis* or Thammuz, the Symbol of the Sun among the Phenicians, i. 175. ii. 12. The Origin of the Fable of Venus and Adonis, i. 70. ii. 8. His Birth; his Adventures; his Death, ii. 8. Rank'd among the Gods, why, 7. His Worship in the Provinces adjoining to Syria; and from thence in Greece; and especially at Athens, 15, 18. Feasts established in Honour of him, 14, &c. Adonis beloved by Proserpine in Hell, 9. Venus contends for him, with Proserpine, 9, 20. In his Feasts Jollity was made to succeed to Mourning, 14. Why, 20. The Origin of his Worship, 7, 23. His Transformation into the Anemone, 23. See Astarte.
- Adonis*, a River whose Water turns red at a certain Season, i. 14.
- Adramelech* and Anamelech, Gods of Sepharvaim, ii. 1. Victims that were offered to them, 61. Who these Divinities were, 62.
- Adramus*, a Sicilian God, iii. 175.
- Adrastus* King of Argos, his History, iv. 198. Gives his two Daughters in Marriage to Polynices and Tydeus, 187. He is one of the seven Chiefs in the War of Thebes, 188. His Genealogy; his Children, 198, 199. The Fable of Adrastus's Horse, 200.
- Adraste*, one of the Nymphs who nursed Jupiter, ii. 165.
- Adrastea* or Adrastia, the Daughter of Jupiter and Necessity, iii. 76. The same with Nemesis, 93.
- Æa* or Æea, the Capital of Colchis, iv. 39.
- Æacus*. See Eacus.
- Æditui*, Ministers of the Temple, i. 282.
- Ædæ* or Ædon, the Daughter of Pandarus. See Pandærus.
- Ædon*, the Daughter of Pandareus. See Pandareus.
- Ægeria*, one of the Nymphs, ii. 531.
- Ægina*. See Egina.
- Ægiuchus*, a Surname of Jupiter, ii. 225.
- Ægipans*. See Satyrs.
- Ægle*, one of the Nymphs, ii. 531.
- Ægobolæ*. See Egibole.
- Ægophaga*, a Name given to Juno, ii. 244.
- Ægyptius*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.
- Æello*, one of the Harpies, iv. 34.
- Æneas*. See Eneas.
- Æon*, the Name of the first Woman in the Theogony of the Phenicians, i. 91.

Ærope,

I N D E X.

- Ærope*, the Wife of Atreus, iv. 256. See Atreus and Thyestes.
- Ærumna* or Inquietude, i. 113.
- Æs*, Æsculanius and Æres, Gods who presided over the Coinage of Brass Money, i. 199. iii. 200.
- Æsculapius*. See Esculapius.
- Ætalides*, one of the Argonauts, the Son of Mercury, iv. 17.
- Æetes*, King of Colchos, the Father of Medea, i. 117, 189. ii. 380. Kills Phryxus his Son-in-law, iv. 7. Designs to destroy the Argonauts, 39. See Jason, Phryxus, the Argonauts.
- Æetes* II. of the Name, the Brother of Circe, iv. 300.
- Æther*, its Formation according to the Greeks, i. 111, 112.
- Æthra*. See Ethra.
- Æthlius*, the Son of Eolus, surnamed Jupiter, iii. 433.
- Ætolia*. See Etolia.
- Ætolus*. See Etolus.
- Æton* or Æthon, one of the Horses of the Sun, ii. 383.
- Africa*, whence it got the Name, i. 60.
- Agamedes*, the Brother of Trophonius, his Death, i. 341.
- Agamemnon*, his Genealogy, iii. 422. The hereditary Hatred between the House of Priam and that of Agamemnon, iv. 214. He is General of the Grecian Army against the Trojans, 216. Transfers the Kingdom from Argos to Mycenæ, 257. His Death, 259.
- Aganice*, the Fable of this Maid, i. 46. See the Note.
- Aganippe* or Hippocrene, a Fountain of Beotia, ii. 436.
- Agapenor*, the Son of Anceus King of Arcadia, was at the Siege of Troy, iii. 356.
- Agathodæmon*, one of the Egyptian Gods, i. 493.
- Agatete*, one of the Nymphs, ii. 431.
- Agave*, the Daughter of Cadmus, i. 117. The Mother of Pentheus, her Phrenzy, iii. 412. Receives divine Honours after her Death, 420.
- Agave*, one of the Nymphs, ii. 531.
- Age*, the Golden Age, in what Period of Time it is placed, ii. 263. The Description of the Golden Age, 270. Whence the Idea of it was formed, 271.
- Agenor*, the Son of Pleuron, his Children, iii. 390, 391.
- Agenor*, the King of Phenicia, his Genealogy, his Children, iii. 402, 404. See Europa.
- Agenoria*, a Goddess of the Romans, who inspired with Courage, i. 199. iii. 194.
- Ageronia* or Angeronia, the Goddess of Silence; a Feast instituted in her Honour; how she was represented, iii. 135. Why joined with the Goddess Voluptas, ibid.

I N D E X.

- Agefilaus*, a Name of Pluto, what it signifies, iii. 44.
- Aglaia*, one of the three Graces, i. 117.
- Aglauros* or Agraulos, the Daughter of Cecrops, her inhuman Worship in the Island of Cyprus, iii. 375. She is transformed into a Rock, 376.
- Aglibolus* and Malachbelus, Gods of the Palmyrenians, how they were represented, ii. 67.
- Agentalia* or Agonia, Feasts instituted by Numa Pompilius, whence they derived that Name, i. 309.
- Agminis*, a Divinity. See Agentalia.
- Agrai* or Agrus, or Agrotes, also called Alcton or Titans, i. 92.
- Agrania*, Feasts of the Greeks, i. 298.
- Agraulia*, Feasts in Honour of Agraulos. See Aglauros.
- Agræus* and Halæus, the Inventers of Fishing and Hunting, i. 92.
- Agrionia*, Feasts, how they were celebrated, i. 298.
- Agrippa*, one of the Kings of Alba, the Time of his Reign, iv. 313.
- Agrius*, the Son of Ulysses and Circe, i. 118.
- Agrius*, one of the Giants who attacked Jupiter, ii. 169.
- Agrætera*, a Surname of Diana of Athens; what Sacrifices were offered to her, i. 273.
- Agrotes*, a famous Divinity of the Phenicians, i. 92.
- Agrotæ*, a Name given to the Priests of Cybele, i. 287.
- Ajax*, the Son of Oileus, a Captain at the Siege of Troy, iv. 216. Ravished Cassandra in Minerva's Temple, 242, 243, 281. His Death, ib. The Confidence of the Locræans in his Valour, even after his Death, 283.
- Ajax* the Son of Telamon, the Greatness of his Size, ii. 197, 198. A Grecian Captain at the Siege of Troy, iv. 216. Disputes with Ulysses the Armour of Achilles; his Character; his Death, 283. Fables relating to him explained, 285, &c.
- Ajæxia* or Arantia, Feasts in Honour of Ajax, i. 299.
- Aichecra*, a God of the Arabians, who he was, i. 570.
- Aidoneus*, King of Epirus, often confounded with Pluto, iii. 53. Two Kings of this Name, ibid.
- Aimene*, a Trojan Woman who had a Temple in Greece, iii. 434.
- Air*, the Air worshipped under the Name of Jupiter and Esus, i. 196. Divination by means of the Air, i. 395.
- Aius Locutius*, the God of great Talking, iii. 136. His Temple at Rome, ibid.
- Alabanus*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 430.
- Alabandus*, the Founder of the City Alabanda in Caria, his Worship, iii. 178.

I N D E X.

Alalcomene, the Daughter of Ogyges, Nurse to Minerva ; Her Worship, iii. 370, 371.

Alasparus, who was so called in the System of the Chaldeans, i. 86.

Alba, one of the Kings of Alba, the Duration of his Reign, iv. 313.

Alba, a City of Latium ; its Founder ; its Kings, and the Duration of that Kingdom, iv. 313.

Albula, the antient Name of the Tyber, ibid.

Alcathoia, a Feast of the Greeks, i. 299.

Alceus, the Father of Amphitryo, iii. 365. iv. 74.

Alcestes, the Wife of Admetus, pursued for the Murder of her Father Pelias, iv. 100. Her generous Resignation for her Husband, ibid. See Admetus, Acastus.

Alcibiades, why he was banished, i. 248.

Alcides, the first Name of Hercules, iv. 117.

Alcimus, Alcimides, and Alcinus, Heroes of Greece, iii. 433, 434.

Alcinous, King of the Pheacians, his Gardens ; receives Ulysses at his Court, iv. 302.

Alcippe, the Daughter of Mars, had an Adventure which gave rise to the Establishment of the Areopagus, ii. 317.

Alcmena, the Mother of Hercules, i. 117. ii. 170. Her Genealogy, iii. 365. iv. 74. Her Marriage with Amphitryo, 75. The Birth of Hercules, 76, &c.

Alcmeon, the Son of Amphiaraus, his History and Death, iv. 98, 194.

Alcyone or Halcyone, the Daughter of Atlas, one of the Pleiades, i. 108. ii. 273.

Alcyone, the Wife of Ceyx. See Ceyx.

Alcyoneus, one of the Giants who attacked Jupiter, ii. 168.

Alcyons or King's-Fishers, Birds consecrated to Thetis, i. 264.

The Symbols of conjugal Love, iv. 380.

Alea, the Surname of Minerva, iii. 354. See Aleus.

Aleto, one of the Furies, iii. 78.

Alektor, the Son of Magnes King of Magnesia, iii. 392.

Aleia or Aleaia, a famous Festival in Arcadia, i. 299.

Alemannus, King of the Boians, and the Hercules of their Country, iii. 332.

Aleon, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 434.

Aleto. See Agrai.

Aletes, the Son of Egisthus and Clytemnestra, slain by Orestes, iv. 266.

Aletes, one of the Heraclidæ, iv. 129. See Sisyphus.

I N D E X.

- Aleus*, the Son of Nyetimus King of Arcadia, built the Temple of Minerva Alea, iii. 354. The Son whom he had by Clesbule his Wife, iv. 17.
- Alexander* will needs pass for the Son of Jupiter, i. 333, 338. iii. 205. How he was admitted to the Olympic Games, iv. 431, 432.
- Algonquins*, a People of America, their principal Divinity, i. 142.
- Alia*, a Feast of Apollo among the Greeks, i. 299.
- Alilat*, a Goddess of the Arabians, i. 571.
- Alitius*, an Epithet given to Jupiter, ii. 224.
- Alladius*, the Tyrant of Alba, his Insolence; his Death, iv. 313.
- Allegories*, whether the Fables are mere Allegories, i. 20, &c.
- Allirotius*. See Alcippe.
- Almighty*, an Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 217.
- Alsia*, or the Feasts of the Barn-floors, i. 299.
- Alceus*. See Aloides and Iphimedies.
- Aloides*, the Giants who attacked Jupiter, ii. 168. iii. 116. The Explanation of their Fable, iii. 118.
- Alopiis*, transformed into a Fox, i. 77.
- Alorus*, this was the Adam of the Chaldeans, i. 86.
- Aloüs*, the Son of the Sun and Antiope, iv. 66.
- Alpha* or Ilpha, a Phenician Word, i. 65. See Europa.
- Aiphaga*, another Phenician Word. See Alpheus.
- Alpheus*, his Pedigree, i. 114. A River of Elis. His Amours with the Fountain Arethusa, i. 67. iii. 57, 58. See Arethusa.
- Alphesibea*, the Daughter of Phegeus, marries Alcmeon, who divorces her afterwards; how she is avenged for this Affront, iv. 194, 195.
- Alphitomantia*, a kind of Divination, i. 396.
- Alrunæ*, the Superstition of the antient Germans.
- Altars*, their Antiquity, i. 233. Their Forms; the Places where they were erected, 234, 235, 236. The Veneration of the Pagans for their Altars, 237. No Altars for the infernal Gods, iii. 103.
- Althea*, the Wife of Oeneus, the Mother of Meleager. Her Genealogy, iii. 391. She devotes her Son to the Furies, iv. 172. Her deep Distress, ibid.
- Amalthea*, the She-Goat that nursed Jupiter, ii. 207.
- Amathia*, one of the Nymphs, ii. 531.
- Amenus*, Omanus, and Anandratus, Divinities of the Persians and Cappadocians, ii. 128, 131.
- Amasis*, King of Egypt; the Temple of one single Stone which he conveyed to Sais, i. 222.

Amazons,

I N D E X.

- Amazons*, the Country which they inhabited; the Wars of Bellerophon, Priam, and Hercules against them, iii. 474. Who they were; if there actually were Amazons, iv. 101, 102. If there are any at this Day, ibid. Temples which they had built, i. 222, 223.
- Ambarvalia*, Feasts of Ceres, i. 307.
- Amberthkend*, a Book containing the Doctrines of the Indians, i. 138.
- Ambition*, a Divinity, i. 199.
- Amber*, the Place where it grows, ii. 390, 391. See He-liades.
- Ambrosia*, one of the Hyades, ii. 278.
- Ambrosia*, Feasts in Honour of Bacchus, i. 299.
- Amelon*, who he was in the System of the Chaldeans, i. 86.
- Amenon*, ibid.
- Amenophis*, King of Egypt, whether he is the same with Memnon, iv. 324.
- Amenthes*, the God of the Egyptians, this is the Ades of the Greeks, iii. 828.
- Americans*, their Religion has a great Deal of Conformity with that of the ancient Pagans, i. 140. & seq. There is no Nation in America but Worships the Sun, 145, 188.
- Amicleus*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 430.
- Amilcar*, a Divinity of the Carthaginians, i. 576.
- Amintor*, the Son of Phrastor King of Argos, iii. 342.
- Amithaon*, the Son of Cretheus, his Descendants; iii. 394. iv. 8. The Uncle of Jason, iv. 10.
- Ammon*. See Jupiter, Ham.
- Ammon*, the Father of Adonis, and Husband of Myrrha, ii. 10. His Death, ibid.
- Amphiaraus*, a famous Soothsayer, one of the principal Leaders in the Theban War, and one of the Argonauts, iv. 17, 193. His Death; his Family, 194, 195. The Worship that was paid to him after his Death, 196.
- Amphiaraia*, Feasts in Honour of Amphiaraus, i. 299.
- Amphictyon*, King of Athens, iii. 376. The Founder of the Court of Amphictyons; what this Court was; 388.
- Amphidamas*, one of the Argonauts, iv. 17.
- Amphilochus*, the Son of Amphiaraus, iv. 196.
- Amphion*, the Son of Jupiter and Antiope, ii. 170. iii. 415. Why he is said to have built the Walls of Thebes by the Musick of his Lyre, ibid. See Zethus.
- Amphion*, one of the Argonauts, the Son of a King of Arcadia, iv. 17.
- Amphis*, Anedophus, or Amenpsinus, who he was among the Chaldeans, i. 86.

I N D E X.

Amphithoe, one of the Nymphs, ii. 531.

Amphitrite, the Wife of Neptune, her Genealogy, i. 117.
ii. 498. The Etymology of the Name, ibid. Two Nereids called by this Name, ii. 508.

Amphitryo, his Birth, iii. 365. iv. 74. Loses the Kingdom of Mycenæ; his Retreat to Thebes, where he is received by Alcmena, whom he marries, 75. See Alcmena.

Amulius, the Mars of the Latins, the Father of Remus and Romulus, ii. 316.

Amycleus, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 430.

Amycus, King of Bebrycia, Pollux puts him to Death, iv. 33.

Amynus and Magus, who were so called among the Chaldeans,
i. 92.

Anacæa, Feasts in Honour of Gastor and Pollux, i. 299.

Anaces or Anactes, the Etymology of the Name, ii. 84. A Name given to several Deities, ibid. See the Dioscuri and Cabiri.

Anagogia, Feasts in Honour of Venus, i. 299.

Anaitis, the Surname of Diana or of the Moon, among the Cappadocians and Armenians, ii. 128, 424. A Feast in Honour of her, ii. 128, 129. Her Temple in Armenia; her golden Statue pillaged, 133.

Anaxagoras punished with Death, why, i. 47.

Anaxandra, the Heroine of Athens, iii. 434.

Anaxarcte transformed into a Rock, iv. 392. See Iphis.

Anaxis, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 433.

Anaxo, the Mother of Alcmena, iii. 365.

Anceus, the Son of Neptune and Astiphaëa, one of the Argonauts, iv. 18. His singular Death which gave rise to a Proverb, ibid.

Anchises, the Father of Eneas, i. 118. His Genealogy, iv.
250, 307. Why he was Thunderstruck, 308. The Time and Place of his Death, 309.

Ancilia or Anciles. See Sacred Bucklers.

Anculi or Anculæ, Gods of the Servants and Maids, i. 200.
iii. 199.

Androgeos, the Son of Minos II. his Death, iii. 493. Funeral
Games instituted in his Honour, 500.

Androgenia or Androgeonia, Feasts in Honour of Androgeos,
i. 299.

Androgynæ, Man-Monsters, i. 83.

Andromache, the Wife of Hector, her Genealogy, iv. 241.
See the Note. The Children she had by Pyrrhus and Helenus, ibid. How the Poets have represented her, ibid.

Andromeda, the Daughter of Cepheus and Cassiopeia, is exposed to a Sea-Monster, delivered by Perseus whom she marries,

I N D E X.

- marries, iii. 457. What Truth there is in her Adventure, 458. The Bones of the Monster brought to Rome; Their Dimensions, 459. Andromeda, a Constellation, i. 195. Anementus, one of the Doctors of the Chaldeans, i. 85. Angeronalia, Feasts in Honour of Angerona, i. 309. Angerona. See Ageronia.
- Angels*, the Worship paid to them, i. 179. The Giants sprung from the Commerce of Angels with the Daughters of Men, 120.
- Animals*, worship ascribed to Animals by the Egyptians, i. 542. Of what Nature it was, 547. Those who killed any of them were punished with Death, 543. The Care that was taken of their Interment, 544, 546. The Animals of the Zodiac, 551. The Animals consecrated to each Divinity, 263, 264.
- Anius*, the High Priest of Apollo at Delos, iv. 310. His Genealogy; his Daughters transformed into Pigeons, iv. 321. See Oeno.
- Anna Perenna*, a rural Divinity of the Latins, ii. 586. Feasts in her Honour, 587.
- Annedots*, Genii worshipped among the Chaldeans, i. 85.
- Antandros*, a City of Phrygia, where Eneas built his Fleet, iv. 310.
- Anteus*, who he was, i. 532.
- Antenor*, a Trojan Prince, his Intelligence with the Greeks, iv. 306. He retired to Italy; the City which he built there, 307.
- Anteros*, or the Counter-Cupid: His Birth, ii. 341. How he was represented, ibid.
- Antesion*. See Sisamenes.
- Antheus* the Giant, the Son of the Earth, his Combat with Hercules; the City which he built in Africa, iv. 92, 93.
- Anthesphoria*, Feasts in Honour of Proserpine, i. 299.
- Anthisteria*, Feasts of the Greeks, i. 300.
- Anticlea*, the Daughter of Autolycus, married to Sisyphus, iii. 107.
- Anticlea*, the Daughter of Sisyphus, married to Laertes, iii. 107. iv. 289.
- Antigone*, the Daughter of Oedipus, iv. 182. Her wretched Death, 200.
- Antilibanus*. See Libanus.
- Antinous*, the Favourite of Adrian the Emperor, iii. 205.
- Antiochus*, the Son of Hercules and Medea, one of the Heroes Eponymes, iii. 431.
- Antiope*, the Daughter of Niſteus, her Adventures, iii. 415, 416, &c.

I N D E X.

- Antiope*, or Hippolita, one of the Amazons, iii. 101.
Antithei, bad Genii invoked by the Magicians, iii. 176.
Antion, the Father of Ixion, iii. 526.
Antium, a City in Italy, Oracles delivered there, i. 354.
Anxur. See Axur.
Aonides, an Epithet given to the Muses, ii. 435.
Aonia, one of the Names of Beotia, ibid.
Apalachites, a People of Florida, their Religion, i. 144.
Apathy, a Greek Word, its Etymology, i. 134.
Apaturia, Feasts of the Atheniaas, what gave rise to them, i. 300.
Aphacite, the Oracle of Venus Aphacite, i. 347.
Apbia, a Grecian Heroine, iii. 434.
Apbea, a Divinity of the Eginetes and Cretans, iii. 173, 434, 568.
Aphrodisia, Feasts of Venus, i. 301.
Aphrodite, the Name of Venus, its signification, i. 68, 98, 113. ii. 328.
Apidas. See Azan.
Apis, the God of the Egyptians, he is transformed into an Ox, i. 68. The Figure of that Ox, 517. His Funerals; his Successor, 518. That there were two Ox-Apis's, 519. The Oracle of the God Apis, 346.
Apis, the King of Athens, his Genealogy, iii. 358. This was Jupiter the Gallant of Io and Niebe, i. 499. At what time he lived, ii. 164. Apis King of Sicyon, his Genealogy and Descendants, iii. 361.
Apobomia, a Greek Festival, i. 299.
Apollo, his various Names, i. 16. ii. 156. His Genealogy according to the Phenicians, i. 96. According to the Egyptians, 105. According to the Greeks, 117, 170. How many Apollos are distinguished, ii. 392. The Egyptian Apollo is the Model of that of the Greeks, 395. Who is the Apollo of the Greeks, 396. This God almost always confounded with the Sun, 393. That they must be distinguished, 378, 379. A Titan Prince known to the Greeks under the Name of Apollo, ii. 396. Fables blended with his History explained, 398. That of Daphne, ibid. That of Leucothoe, 399. That of Hyacinthus, 401. That of Cyparissus, 402. Of Miaas, ibid. Why said to be banished Heaven, 415. Worship paid to him; Animals consecrated to him, 416, 417. Sudden Deaths attributed to this God, i. 13. ii. 409. Why, ibid. How represented, 417. His various Names, ibid. &c. Oracles which he had in several Places, i. 333, 334, &c.

I N D E X.

- Apollo Hyperborean*, the Worship ascribed to him by the Hyperboreans, ii. 142.
- Apollonius Tyanæus*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 430.
- Apollonia*, Feasts in Honour of Apollo, i. 300.
- Apomyius*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 217.
- Apon* or Aponus, the Name of a Fountain near Padua; the Virtue that was attributed to it, i. 348.
- Apostrophia* or Averting, Epithets given to Venus, ii. 326.
- Apotheoses*, the Origin of those of Princes and great Men, i. 34, 35. That of the Roman Emperors, iii. 204.
- Appearances of the Gods*, or Theoptia; the Belief of the Pagans as to the Presence of their Gods, ii. 223.
- Appiades*, Goddesses among the Romans, iii. 195.
- Apples*, (Golden) thrown by Discord, i. 154. iv. 208. Of the Garden of the Hesperides, i. 30. ii. 274, 275, 279. What those Apples were, ii. 275, 279. iii. 93.
- Aquarius*, one of the Signs of the Zodiac, the Origin given of it, i. 195. iv. 213, 214. See the Note.
- Arabians*, their ancient Religion, i. 188, 193, 567. When they embraced Mahometanism, 571. The Name which they gave to the Sun, 188.
- Arachne*, transformed into a Spider, i. 70. ii. 307.
- Aratæa*, Feasts in Honour of Aratus, i. 301.
- Aratus*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 433.
- Arbitrator*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.
- Arcadia*, its first Inhabitants; its first Kings till the Arrival of the Egyptian and Phenician Colonies, iii. 352, &c.
- Arcas*, the Son of Jupiter and Calisto, ii. 169. His History, iii. 355. The Constellation which he forms in the Heavens, iv. 407.
- Arcefilaus*, the Son of Jupiter and Toredia, ii. 170.
- Arcesius*, the Father of Laertes, his Genealogy, iii. 395. iv. 379.
- Arche*, one of the Muses according to Cicero, ii. 430.
- Archegetes*, an Epithet of Hercules, iv. 121.
- Archemorus*, the Son of Lycurgus slain by a Serpent, Games instituted in his Honour, iv. 188, 189.
- Archigalli*. See Galli.
- Architecture* invented before Sculpture, i. 208.
- Architis*, Venus Architis, worshipped upon Mount Libanus, ii. 25.
- Archons of Athens*, their Institution, iii. 377. The Origin of their Priesthood, and of that of their Wives, i. 284. The Veneration that was paid to them, ibid.
- Arculus*, a God of the Romans, his Functions, iii. 195.

I N D E X.

- Aëtea*, a City of the Rutulians burnt, a Bird sprung from its Ashes.
- Arduina*, the Diana or Goddess of Hunting of the Gauls, iii. 247.
- Arecia*, an Island where the Argonauts landed in their Way to Colchis, iv. 38.
- Arenæ*, or Areas, of Nismes and Orange, iv. 423.
- Arecpagus*, the Etymology of the Name; the Origin of that Court, ii. 317.
- Areotopotes*, or the great Wine-Drinker, iv. 430.
- Ares*, the Name of Mars among the Greeks, ii. 316.
- Aresburg*, to whom consecrated, iii. 333. See Mars.
- Ares-Koui*. See Okki.
- Arethusa*, a Fountain-Nymph, iii. 48. The Amours of Alpheus and Arethusa, i. 66. iii. 57, 58.
- Arge*, transformed into a Stag, iv. 406.
- Arge*, one of the Cyclops, i. 113.
- Argia*, the Daughter of Adrastus, the Wife of Polynices, iv. 198.
- Argo*, the Name of the Ship of the Argonauts, iv. 12. See Ship Argo.
- Argonauts*, the Causes of their Expedition, iv. 4. The Number of Argonauts, their Names, 15. Their Adventures in the Voyage, 30. What befel them in Colchis, 39. Their Return variously related, 44. The Æra of this Event, 55.
- Argos* or Argus, the Son of Phrixus, one of the Argonauts, iv. 19.
- Arges*, a City of the Peloponnesus; the Foundation of the Kingdom of Arges, i. 500. iii. 357. Its Kings till the Arrival of Danaus, 358.
- Argus*, the Son of Jupiter and Lardane, ii. 170.
- Argus* with the hundred Eyes, the Keeper of Io, i. 499.
- Argus*, the fourth King of Arges, i. 500.
- Argus*, the Son of Alector, built the Ship Argo, was one of the Argonauts, iv. 12, 15.
- Argynnis*, a Surname given to Venus, ii. 334.
- Ariadne*, the Daughter of Minos, befriends Theseus, iii. 502, &c. See Theseus. Her Crown transformed into a Star, iii. 506.
- Ariadnæa*, Feasts in Honour of Ariadne, i. 301.
- Arimanius*. See Oromasus.
- Arimaspians*, a People said to have but one Eye, i. 74.
- Arimi*, Arimeans, or Arimians, a People of Syria, i. 513.
- Arion*. See Orion.
- Arion*,

I N D E X.

- Arion*, a Lyric Poet of Lesbos, saved from Shipwreck by a Dolphin, iv. 393.
- Arion*, the Name of Adrastus's Horse, iv. 199.
- Arisba*, the first Wife of Priam, iv. 139, 399.
- Aristeus*, Autonoe's Husband one of the Grecian Heroes, iii. 429.
- Aristeus*, King of Arcadia, took Care of Bees. He was invoked for the Preservation of Bees, i. 588.
- Aristhenes*, takes Care of Esculapius, whom he finds exposed, iii. 156.
- Arithmonancy*, a Sort of Divination, i. 396.
- Armenians*, their principal Divinities, ii. 133.
- Armilustrum*, a Feast of the Romans, i. 310.
- Armenia*, whence so called, i. 60.
- Arminius*, the General of the Cherusci; the tutelar God of the Country, iii. 322.
- Arne*, a Nymph transformed into an Owl, iv. 398.
- Arne*, the Mother of the God of the Winds; her Adventures; her Children, ii. 537.
- Arnus*, a famous Soothsayer of Apollo; funeral Games in his Honour, iv. 128, 129.
- Arrows*, the Arrows of Apollo, ii. 408, 411. Hercules's poisoned Arrows, iv. 85, 226.
- Arfaces*, King of the Parthians, placed after his Death among the Stars, ii. 135.
- Arsinoe*, a City of Egypt; the Regard that was paid there to Crocodiles, i. 544.
- Artemides*. See Titanides.
- Artemisia*, Feasts of the Greeks, in honour of Diana Artemis, i. 301.
- Artophylax*, a Constellation, iv. 407.
- Arts*, Inventors of Arts, i. 59. Considered as Gods, 49. The Origin of Arts in Egypt, 69. The Worship that was paid to them; why joined with that of Poverty, iii. 181.
- Arvales*, Priests among the Romans, i. 296.
- Arueris*, a God of Egypt; the Model of the Apollo of the Greeks, i. 492. His Mother with Child of him when she was born, 496.
- Aruspices*. See Haruspices.
- Asabinus*, the Name of the Sun among the Ethiopians, i. 188.
- Ascanius* or Iulus, the Son of Eneas and Creusa, iv. 309. The Founder of the Kingdom of Alba, iv. 313. The Duration of his Reign, ibid.
- Ascalaphus*, transformed into an Owl, i. 76. iii. 35, 49. Why, 56.
- Ascalaphus*, one of the Argonauts, iv. 19.

Ascalon,

I N D E X.

- Ascalon*, Divinities worshipped there, ii. 2.
- Asclepia*, Feasts in Honour of Esculapius, i. 301.
- Asclepios*, the Name of Esculapius. See Esculapius.
- Asclepius*, the Son of Sydic, i. 96.
- Asera*, Asero, or Aserim, the Names of Astarte in the Bible, ii. 7, 24. See Astarte.
- Asera*, a City built at the Foot of Mount Helicon, iv. 391.
- Asia*, whence it got the Name, i. 60.
- Ashima*, the God of the Hemathians, ii. 1. How represented, 62.
- Asses*. Asses with red Hair in Abhorrence among the Egyptians, i. 516. The Jews accused of worshipping the Head of an Ass, 548. The Ass was offered in Sacrifice to Priapus, ii. 584. Asopus King of Beotia, and Father of Egina, iv. 268. See Egina.
- Asopus*, a River in the Country of the Phenicians, iv. 269. See the Note.
- Astb*, the God who was worshipped there, ii. 2.
- Aspasia*, the Priestess of the Sun, ii. 95. or of Diana Anaitis, 132.
- Aspergillum*, an Instrument for Sacrifice, i. 277.
- Assaracus*, the Grandfather of Anchises, his Genealogy, iv. 250, 307.
- Assabinus*, the Name of Jupiter among the Arabians, ii. 225.
- Astaroth*, the Signification of this Name, i. 68.
- Astarte*, the great Divinity of the People of Syria; the Astaroth of the Bible; the Venus of the Greeks, ii. 6, 7. Ranked among the Gods, why, ibid. Her Worship always joined with that of Baal in the sacred Writings, ii. 24. How she was represented, 25. That Adonis represented the Sun, and Astarte the Moon, 26. Her Temple at Hierapolis, 27. And at Babylon, 61.
- Astarté*, the Daughter of Uranus, according to the Theogony of the Phenicians, i. 96, 97.
- Asteria*, her Birth and her Children, i. 115.
- Asterion* the Son of Cometes, and Asterion the Son of Neleus, both Argonauts, iv. 20.
- Asterius* King of Crete; this is the Jupiter who ravished Europa; his Genealogy, iii. 395, 400.
- Asterope*, one of the Pleiades, i. 108. ii. 273.
- Astiage*, the Daughter of Iphesus, her Children, iii. 526.
- Astianax*, the Son of Hector, iv. 240.
- Astidamia*, the Daughter of Amintor; the Child whom she had by Hercules, iv. 112.
- Astidamia*, the Wife of Acæstus, iv. 271. See Peleus.
- Astiechus*, the Son of Eolus King of the Liparian Isles, ii. 538.
- Astieche*, the Daughter of Philantus, the Mother of Tlepolæmus, iv. 112. Astione.

I N D E X.

Astione. See Chryseis.

Astrabacus, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 433.

Astrea, a Goddess who presided over Justice, i. 199.

Astreus, the Son of Creus and Eurybæa, i. 114.

Astrology, who were the Inventors of it, i. 433. The Vanity of that Science, 435.

Astronomy, a Science quite distinct from Astrology, i. 434.

Who was the Father of Astronomy, ii. 289.

Astyci. See Games so called.

Asyla, the Places of Asyla among the Pagans. Their Original, their Privileges, their Suppression at Rome, i. 242, &c.

Atabirius, a Name given to Jupiter, ii. 220.

Atalanta, the Daughter of Schæneus, or of Menalion, her Birth, iv. 174. Her Swiftneſs in Running, ibid. Her Taste for Hunting; she is at the Hunting of Calydon, 176. Transformed into a Lioness, 175. See Meleager.

Ate, the Daughter of Jupiter, her Character, iii. 145. Was thrown down from Heaven, ibid. See Discord and Prayers.

Atergatis, the Etymology of the Name, i. 70. See Derceto.

Athamas, the King of Thebes in Beotia, the Father of Phrixus and Helen, iii. 394. Was the Cause of the Argonautic Expedition, ibid.

Atharid, the Name of Mercury among the Arabians, i. 570.

Atheists, more odious to the Divinity than Idolaters, i. 165, 166.

Atheism, whether it commenced before the Deluge, i. 165.

Athene, the Daughter of Chronos, i. 95.

Athene, the Daughter of Cecrops, the Minerva of the Greeks; the Etymology of the Name, ii. 299. See Minerva.

Athenaia, a Festival of the Greeks, i. 305. In Honour of Minerva, ii. 302.

Athens, the Foundation of the City, and of the Kingdom of Athens, iii. 372. Cecrops the first King, his Successors, ibid.

Magistrates who succeeded the Kings, iii. 377. Minerva is there peculiarly honoured, gives her Name to it, ii. 302, 304.

The shameful Tribute which Minos King of Crete imposes upon the Athenians; how they were freed from it, iii. 497, &c. See Minos, Theseus.

Atlantides, or Atlantidæ, a People of Africa, their Theogony, i. 106.

Atlantides, or the Daughters of Atlas, form the Constellation of the Pleiades, i. 108. ii. 274, 276. Are also called Hesperides, 274.

Atlas, three Princes of that Name, where they reigned, ii. 278.

Atlas, one of the Titan Princes, his Dominions, i. 108. His Children, ib. ii. 273. Was addicted to Astronomy, 275. His Metamorphosis into a Mountain, i. 25, 30. iii. 441, 455. Atlas,

I N D E X.

- Atlas*, a Mountain in Africa. See the preceeding Article.
- Athletes*, their Combats in the Games, iv. 429.
- Atreus* and Tbyestes, their Genealogy, iii. 422. Their mutual Enmity, 256, 257.
- Atridæ*, a Name given to Agamemnon and Menelaus; whether they were the Sons of Atreus, iii. 258.
- Atropos*, one of the Parcæ, of whom she was born, i. 113. Her Function, iii. 86, &c. The Etymology of her Name, ibid. How she was represented, 91.
- Attestation* of Life and Manners that was put into the Coffin of a Person when dead; the Muscovites practise the same Custom at this Day, iii. 31.
- Atys*, his Adventures with Cybele, variously related, ii. 558. His Transformation into the Pine-Tree, 561.
- Aventine*, a Mount in the Latin Country, whence the Name is derived, iv. 313.
- Avernus*, a Lake near which the Poets placed the Mouth of Hell, iii. 12. Its Situation, 20. The Etymology of the Name, ib.
- Averuncir*, Gods who were invoked against evil Presages, i. 165, 411, 418.
- Avesta*, the Name of Fire among the Chaldeans, a Book of Zoroastres, so called, ii. 5, 71.
- Auge*, the Daughter of Aleus, the Son whom she had by Hercules, iv. 112. Her Marriage with that Son.
- Augias*, King of Elis, one of the Argonauts, his Genealogy, iv. 20. Hercules cleans his Stables, 87. His Ingratitude and Death, ibid.
- Augiles* or Augelites, a People in Africa, their Religion, i. 580.
- Augurs*, the Signification of the Word Augur, the Antiquity of the Art of Augury, i. 397. A College of Augurs established at Rome, ibid. The Manner of taking Auguries; Birds used for that Purpose, 399, 403. How the Gauls took the Auguries, iii. 248. The Augural Staff or Battoon, i. 277.
- Æulon*, an Arcadian, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 433.
- Aurora*, her Birth, i. 114. The Children she had by Astreus, by Tithonus and Cephalus, i. 114, 117. Her Amours with Tithonus, iv. 326. See Cephalus and Tithonus.
- Auspices*, see Augurs.
- Ausonians*, a People of Italy in the Time of Janus, ii. 262.
- Autocbthon*, one of the first Men according to the Phenicians, i. 92.
- Autobtones*, the Signification of the Word, iii. 349.
- Autoleon*, see Leuce.
- Autolicus*, Grandfather of Ulysses, his Genealogy, iv. 381.
- Autolicus*,

I N D E X.

- Autolicus*, one of the Argonauts, iv. 21.
Autonoe, the Daughter of Cadmus, the Wife of Aristeus, i. 117. The Mother of Acteon, iv. 412.
Autopsie, or intimate Commerce with the Gods, i. 427.
Auxesia, a Goddess worshipped by the Epidaurians, iii. 175.
Ax, Jupiter Labradæus, worshipped under the Figure of an Ax by the Carians, ii. 226. See Labradæus.
Axinomancy, a Sort of Divination, i. 396.
Axur, or Auxur, the Sirname of Jupiter, how he was represented, ii. 232.
Azan the Son of Arcas, King of Arcadia, the first funeral Games celebrated on the Occasion of his Death, iii. 355.
Azifus, the Sirname of Mars at Edeffa, ii. 317.
Azorus, one of the Argonauts, iv. 21.

B.

- BAal*, Bel, or Baalfemen, the Sun adored under these Names, their Signification, i. 188. ii. 52. This is the Moloch of the Bible, ibid. His Worship prohibited to the Jews, 53. The Ceremonies used in his Worship, ibid. His Origin, 54.
Baal-Berith, the God of Oaths, ii. 58. The God of the Covenant, 59.
Baal-Gad, a God of the Affyrians, i. 570.
Baal-Peor, a God of the Syrians and Arabians, ibid.
Baal-Phegor, a God of the Moabites, ii. 52, 53. The Signification of the Name. He is the same with Priapus, 55.
Babel. Nimrod Author of the Design of the Tower of Babel, i. 80, 217. It served for a Temple to Belus; a Description of this Tower, ibid. This is the Origin of the Fable of the Titans, who attempted to dethrone Jupiter, ii. 206.
Babylon, the Capital of Chaldea, its Idolatry, ii. 3.
Bacchanalia, Feasts in Honour of Bacchus, how they were celebrated at Rome, i. 307. They were abolished, 308.
Bacchanals, their various Names, i. 289. ii. 449. How they celebrated the Feasts of Bacchus, i. 307. ii. 446.
Bacchus, his History, ii. 436. His Original, ibid. and 437. How many Persons had that Name, ii. 440. The Bacchus of the Egyptians is Osiris, ii. 438. His Name and his Mysteries were introduced very late into Greece, i. 72. ii. 439, 443. Whether he is the same with Moses, 441. The Grecian Bacchus the Son of Semele, ii. 436. His Birth, 444. His Expedition to the Indies, 445. His various Names, 447. His Descent to Hell, 449. The Panther was consecrated to him, 452. An Explanation of the Symbols which accompanied his Figures, 453.

I N D E X.

- ii. 453. Feasts in his Honour, ii. 457. See Orgies, Trieterides, Bacchanalia. The Worship of Bacchus among the Gauls, iii. 281.
- Bactriana*, its first Inhabitants, ii. 170.
- Bætili*, Stones which were held in Veneration, their Origin, ii. 189.
- Bal*, a Carthaginian Word, what it signifies, ii. 53.
- Balba*, a City of Syria, ii. 66.
- Baptæ*, Priests of Cotytto, very despicable, and why, iii. 69.
- Barbarism*, the Religion from Adam to Noah, i. 161.
- Bards*, Ministers of Religion among the Gauls; what was their Employment; the Respect that was paid to them, iii. 226.
- Barn-floors*, Festival of, in Honour of Ceres, i. 299.
- Basin*, a German Heroe, iii. 333.
- Bas-Reliefs*, dug up Anno 1711, iii. 250. An Explanation of the Figures that are there represented, 252, &c.
- Bassarides*. See Bacchanals.
- Baton*, the Relation and Squire of Amphiaraus, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 433. His Death, iv. 196.
- Battus*, his Worship in the Cyrenaicum, i. 581. The Founder of the Kingdom of Cyrene, ibid.
- Battus*, a Shepherd transformed into the Touch-stone, ii. 371.
- Baubs*, an old Woman, Hostess to Ceres, iii. 48.
- Baucis*, see Philemon, iii. 48.
- Becon*, one of the Egyptian Gods, i. 492.
- Bebrycia*, an antient Name of Bithynia, iv. 33.
- Bebrycians*, distinguished themselves in the Gauntlet-fight, iv. 418.
- Ecd*, see Eeth.
- Beel-Phigor*, see Baal-Phigor.
- Beelzebub*, a Divinity worshipped at Accaron; the Signification of the Name; the Power that was attributed to him, ii. 57. The Title given him in the Bible, 58.
- Beelshamen*, see Baal.
- Becs* that nursed Jupiter, ii. 209.
- Behergir*, an Indian Brahman, i. 138.
- Being*, the supreme or first Being, what Idea the Pagans had of him, i. 119. The Chinese, 131. The Philosophers, 171.
- Belus*, what Divinity this was according to the Chaldeans, i. 81.
- Belatucada*, or Belertucades, the Name of Apollo in Great Britain, iii. 271, 301.

Bel-

I N D E X.

Belbuck, a Genius adored by the Vandals, what the Name signifies, iii. 333.

Belentus, a God of the Gauls, his various Names, i. 16. ii. 270. The Sun, i. 188. His Origin, ii. 271. His Worship, 272.

Belides, the Name of the Kings of Argos, the Descendants from Danaus, iii. 363.

Belisana, the Name of Minerva among the Gauls, how they represented her, iii. 273.

Bellerophon, his Genealogy, iii. 392, 467. Whence he got this Name, 467, 476. His History and Exploits, 467. His Posterity; his End, 475. The Time when he lived, 477.

Bellinus, see Belenus.

Bellona, the Goddess of War, her Birth, i. 197. ii. 313. Her Worship in Cappadocia, ii. 133. Pallas confounded with Bellona, ii. 313. Who are however to be distinguished, ibid. How she was represented, ibid.

Bellonarii, Priests of Bellona, ii. 314.

Belus, the great Divinity of the Babylonians and Assyrians, i. 485. The Worship of the Sun under the Name of Belus, i. 195. ii. 53. This is the Nimrod of the Bible; he bore also the Name of Mars, ii. 316. His Temple, i. 217. ii. 4. enlarged by Nabuchadonosor, i. 218. Pillaged and demolished by Xerxes, 219.

Belus, the King of Tyre and Phenicia, the Father of Pygmalion and Elisa, iv. 318.

Benadad, see Adad.

Beotia, a Country of Greece, whence it was so called, iii. 407.

Berecyntha, or Berecynthia, the Surname of Cybele, whence derived, ii. 564. See the Note, iii. 276. The Worship of Cybele Berecynthia among the Romans and Gauls; Monuments representing her, iii. 276, 277, 278.

Berginus, a God peculiar to the Bressians, iii. 208.

Berith, see Baal-Berith.

Beroe, a Trojan Lady, i. 42.

Berosus, an ancient Chaldean Author, i. 80.

Beruth, the Wife of Hypsistus, her Children, i. 92.

Beryth or Beryt, a City of Phenicia, i. 98.

Beza, a God not much known, his Oracles, i. 348.

Befas, or Bessas, a God adored at Abida, iii. 175.

Beth, or Bed, the Name of Books that contained the Religion of the Indians, i. 138.

Betili, see Bætili.

Betica, the ancient Name of Andalusia, iii. 43. See the Note.

Betis,

I N D E X.

- Betis*, a River in Spain, the present Guadalquivir, ibid.
- Betilus*, the Son of Uranus and Ge, i. 93, 95.
- Bias*, the Son of Amitbaon, his Marriage with the Daughter of Neleus; his Descendants, iii. 394.
- Biblis*, see Byblis.
- Bibraë*, a City of the Gauls, worshipped as a Divinity, iii. 288.
- Bicorniger*, one of Bacchus's Epithets, ii. 448.
- Biformis*, a Name given to Bacchus, ii. 447.
- Billets* or Letters, Oracles that were delivered by sealed Letters, i. 348, 353, 356. The Manner of divining by Letters thrown into Water, i. 394.
- Bimater*, one of the Epithets given to Bacchus, ii. 447.
- Birds*, Auguries and Auspices drawn from them, i. 396, 399, 403, 406. Birds sacred in Egypt, 543. Birds of the Island of Arecia, iv. 38. Birds of the Stymphalic Lake, see Stymphalus. Birds of Dismede, iv. 288, 289. Birds sprung from Memnon's Ashes, 328.
- Bitch* of Erigone, placed among the Stars, iv. 404.
- Biton*, see Cleobis.
- Bear* of Erymanthus, see Erymanthus.
- Boedromia*, Athenian Feasts, their Original, i. 301.
- Boians*, the Worship which they paid to Hercules, iii. 333.
- Bolsmancy*, a Kind of Divination, i. 393.
- Bonus Eventus*, a Divinity, how represented, ii. 548, 589.
- Bonzes*, Ministers of Religion in China and Japan, i. 136, 137.
- Books* of the Brahmans, see Brahma. Classical Books of the Chinese, i. 130, 131. Books of the *Sybil*s, see Sybillin.
- Boxing-Match*, one of the Exercises practised in the Games of Greece and Rome, what it was, iv. 417.
- Bough* (golden) with which Eneas passed to Pluto's Kingdom, iii. 21. 30. How Eneas found it; what we are to think of this Fiction, 38, 39.
- Boopis*, one of Juno's Appellations, ii. 244.
- Bootes*, or the Waggoner, a Constellation, i. 195.
- Boreasmi*, Feasts in Honour of Boreas, i. 301.
- Boundaries* of the Fields, the God who presided over them, i. 198. See Terminus.
- Boves*, a Sort of Cakes once offered to Jupiter, i. 192.
- Bucklers*, sacred, named Ancilia, the Origin of those Bucklers; their Form; the Feast of the sacred Bucklers, ii. 321.
- Brachmans*, see Bramines.
- Brachma*, a God of the Indians, what is the Signification of the Name, i. 138.
- Bramines*, or Brachmans, Priests of the Indies, their Office, the

I N D E X.

- the Veneration that was paid them, i. 138. Their Theogony, ibid.
- Brasil*, the Opinion of the Brasilians about the Origin of the World, i. 140.
- Brescia*, a City in Italy, Gods peculiar to that City, iii. 207.
- Briareus*, the Birth of that Giant; his Make, i. 113.
- Brimo* and Brizo, two Goddesses of Sleep among the Greeks, iii. 101.
- Briseis*, the Captive of Achilles, iv. 222. Agamemnon forces her from him, 233.
- Britomartus*, the Son of Jupiter and Carne, ii. 170. iii. 173.
- Britomartis*, a Name given to Diana, ii. 421.
- Bromius*, a Sirname of Bacchus, ii. 447.
- Brontes*, one of the Cyclops, i. 113.
- Bubaste* or Bubastis, the Name of Diana in Egypt, what it signifies, i. 70.
- Bubastis*, a City in Egypt that worshipped Cats, i. 544. There a Feast was celebrated in honour of Diana, which still subsists at this Day, 558.
- Bubona*, the Goddess of Oxen and Cowherds, i. 198. ii. 588.
- Bulls* with Brazen Feet, subdued by Jason, iv. 40, &c. The Bull that carried off Europa. See Europa. Pasiphae's Bull. See Pasiphae.
- Bunus*. See Æetes.
- Buphagus*, a Name given to Hercules, iv. 120.
- Buphonia*, Feasts celebrated at Athens; whence the Name was derived, i. 301.
- Buraicus*, an Appellation given to Hercules, iv. 124.
- Busiris*, a God of the Egyptians, i. 492. Who he was, 532.
- Busiris*, a City in Egypt, the Feast that was celebrated there in Honour of Isis, i. 559.
- Busiris*, King of Spain, attempted to carry off the Hesperides, and was slain by Hercules, ii. 274. iv. 93.
- Butes*, one of the Argonauts, worshipped at Athens after his Death as a Heroe, iv. 26.
- Butzen*, one of the first Divinities of the Indians, i. 138.
- Byblis's* Passion for her Brother, iv. 390, 391.
- Byblos*, the chief City of Phenicia, i. 95. Adonis, or Tham-mus, was worshipped there. ii. 2. See Isis.
- Byrsa*, the Name of the Citadel of Carthage; the Fable concerning that Name, iv. 319.

C.

- Abira*, the Daughter of Proteus, the Mother of the two Cabiri, ii. 72.
- Cabiri*, the Origin of these Gods, ii. 79. Their Number and

I N D E X.

- and Names, 73. The Etymology of the Word Cabire, ibid. The Myſteries of theſe Gods were in high Veneration, 75, 77, 79. Their Worſhip very famous in Samothrace, 77. Whether they are to be confounded with the Corybantes, the Curetes, and the Idæi Daſtyli, 81.
- Cabiria*, a Sirname of Ceres, ii. 78.
- Cabiria*, Feaſts in honour of the Cabiri, i. 301.
- Cabrus*, a God of the City Phaſelis, iii. 178.
- Caca*, a Goddeſs of the Romans, iii. 193.
- Cacus*, a famous Robber in Italy, ſlain by Hercules, iii. 193. iv. 91.
- Cadiz*. See Gades.
- Cadmia*, a Stone ſo called, its Uſe, ii. 212.
- Cadmus*, the Son of Agenor King of Phenicia, plants a Colony in Greece, iii. 391. Eſtabliſhes there the Worſhip of the Gods of his own Country, i. 69, 72. ii. 154. iii. 411. The Fable of the Dragon's Teeth ; its Explication, 405, 407. Cadmus teaches the Grecians the Uſe of Letters, 409. He is obliged to fly to Illyricum, 407. The Hiſtory of his Family, i. 117. iii. 411. He and his Wife are transformed into Serpents, i. 65, 76. iii. 408. His Poſterity, iii. 420. Worſhip paid to ſeveral of his Family, 419. A Mine of Gold and Braſs diſcovered by him, i. 212.
- Caduceus* of Mercury, its Original, its Uſes and Properties, ii. 369, 370, 373. Bacchus has alſo the Caduceus given him, 462.
- Cæſia*, an Epithet given to Minerva, ii. 309.
- Cain*, his Deſcendants, how the Author of the Theogony of the Phenicians enumerates them, i. 93, 94. Their Irregularities the Cauſe of the Deluge, 93, 163.
- Calais* and Zethes, Sons of Boreas, of the Number of the Argonauts, iv. 166. They purſue the Harpies, 34, 35. The Signification of their Names ; they are ſlain by Hercules, 167. Why they are pictured with Azure Hair and with Wings, ibid.
- Calchas*, the famous Soothſayer of the Grecian Army, iv. 60. Foretells the Duration of the Siege of Troy, 217, 350. His Death, 351.
- Calciopæ*, the Daughter of Æetes, married to Phryxus, iv. 5. Her Children, 7.
- Calends*, to whom they were conſecrated, ii. 242.
- Calf*, the golden Calf worſhipped by the Hebrews, imitated in the Ox Apis, i. 555, 560.
- Calisto*, the Child whom ſhe had by Jupiter, ii. 170.
- Calisto*, or Callisto, the Daughter of Lycaon, beloved by Jupiter.

I N D E X.

- piter*, ii. 170. iii. 355. She is transformed into a Bear, and becomes a Constellation, iii. 355. iv. 407.
- Calliope*, one of the nine Muses, ii. 433.
- Callipatira* or Phevenia, appears at the Olympic Games against the Law excluding Women from them, iv. 429.
- Callirhoe*, the Daughter of the Ocean, and Wife of Chrysaor, her Children, i. 114. iii. 438. Another of the Name, the Daughter of Achelous. See Alcmeon.
- Callirhoe*, Princess of Calydon, her singular Death, iv. 177, 178. See Corefus.
- Callistia*, Feasts of the Island of Lesbos, i. 301.
- Calpe* and Abila, Pillars of Hercules, i. 28.
- Calpetus*, King of Alba, the Duration of his Reign, his Successors, iv. 313.
- Calvin's* Argument for rejecting the Book of Wisdom, i. 169.
- Calybes*, Blacksmiths, Inventors of Steel, ii. 285.
- Calyce*, the Daughter of Eolus, and Mother of Endymion, iii. 390.
- Calycepis*, the Name of Venus the Mother of Eneas, ii. 356, 356.
- Calydon*, the Son of Endymion, founded a City of his own Name, his Ancestors, his Posterity, iii. 390, 391. The History of the famous Hunting of Calydon, the War of which it was the Occasion, ii. 211, 212. iv. 168. The Æra of this Event, iv. 176.
- Calypso*, Queen of the Island of Ogygia, her Genealogy; receives Ulysses at her Court, iv. 300, &c. The Children she had by Ulysses, i. 118.
- Cambyfes* ridicules the Gods of Egypt, i. 221, 250. ii. 72, 79, 87. Kills the Ox Apis, and orders the Priests to be bastinated, i. 519.
- Camillus*, one of Mercury's Names, ii. 374.
- Camilli*, subaltern Ministers of the Temples, i. 296.
- Camæna*, a Goddess worshipped at Rome, iii. 198.
- Camænæ*, the Surname of the Muses, ii. 435.
- Campe*, a Personage not much known in Mythology, i. 176, 186. iii. 9, 10.
- Canache*, the Daughter of Eolus, the Children she had by Neptune, iii. 391.
- Canathos*, a Fountain of Nauplia, its singular Property, ii. 245.
- Candarena*, one of Juno's Appellations, ii. 244.
- Candelabrum*, an Instrument for Sacrifice, i. 278.
- Canens*, the Wife of Picus, transformed into a Voice, ii. 601. Her Worship in the Latin Country, iii. 207.

I N D E X.

- Canopus*, a God of the Egyptians, how he was represented, ii. 534, 535.
- Cantbus*, the Son of Abas, one of the Argonauts, iv. 21.
- Capaneus*, one of the seven Chiefs of the Theban War, iv. 201. How he perished there, his Wife throws herself into his Funeral Pile, ibid. The Character of Capaneus, 202.
- Capitolinus*, a Surname of Jupiter, ii. 220. How represented, 233.
- Cappautas*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 222.
- Capricorn*, a Sign in the Zodiac, i. 539. iv. 407.
- Caprotina*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 244.
- Caprotinæ*, Feasts of Juno, i. 310.
- Capys*, the Son of Affaracus, and Grandfather of Eneas, iv. 251, 307.
- Caræus*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.
- Caraibes*, Americans, their principal Divinity, i. 142.
- Cardea*, the Goddess of Gates, i. 198. iii. 195.
- Caria* or Carya, Feasts in honour of Diana, i. 302.
- Carmelus*, a God of the Syrians, iii. 172.
- Carmenta*, the Mother of Evander, i. 310.
- Carmenta*, the Wife of Evander, iii. 207.
- Carmentalia*, or Carmentaia, Feasts in honour of Carmenta, the Mother of Evander, i. 310.
- Carna*, a Roman Goddess, her Temple, iii. 198.
- Carne*, the Daughter of Eubalus, the Child she had by Jupiter, ii. 170.
- Carnea*, a Goddess invoked for Children, i. 197.
- Carnæa*, Feasts in honour of Apollo, i. 301.
- Carthage*, its Foundation, the Fable on that Subject, iv. 319.
- Carthaginians*, their Divinities; the Oracles delivered by certain Images, i. 560, 561. The Worship paid by the Carthaginians to Saturn and Juno, &c. 575. Illustrious Men whom they deified, 577.
- Casius*, a Surname of Jupiter, how he was represented, ii. 220.
- Cassandra*, Priam's Daughter, has the Gift of Prediction; her Death, iv. 242, 267.
- Cassiopeia*, the Mother of Andromeda. See Andromeda.
- Cassiopeia*, the Constellation, i. 195. iv. 407.
- Cassius*, one of Gain's Descendants, i. 94.
- Castaballa*, a City in Cilicia. See Perasia.
- Castalia*, a Fountain at the Foot of Mount Parnassus, ii. 435.
- Castalides*, an Epithet given to the Muses, ii. 435.
- Castor* and Pollux, their Birth, iv. 147. Are called Dioscuri, 149. What meant by the Fires of Castor and Pollux, 150.

I · N · D · E · X ·

150. The Death of Castor, 151. The Immortality of Pollux shared with Castor, what gave Rise to that Fable, 151, 152. Their Worship, 153. How they are represented, 154. Whether the Gauls had any Knowledge of these Gods, iii. 256. That they were in the Number of the Argonauts, 20.
- Catabathmi*, a People of Africa, their Divinities, i. 581.
- Catoptromancy*, a Sort of Divination, i. 396.
- Catius*, or Cautus, a Roman Divinity, i. 199. iii. 195.
- Cats*, adored by the Egyptians, i. 544.
- Caunus*, the Brother of Byblis, iv. 390. See Byblis.
- Caystrius*, one of the Heroes of Greece, who had an Altar near the River Cayster, iii. 430.
- Cecropia*. See Cecrops.
- Cecrops*, a Native of Egypt, plants a Colony in Greece, ii. 305. At what Period of Time, iii. 372. Founded the Kingdom of Athens, ibid. Established there the Worship of his Gods, ii. 154, 158. iii. 374. Why said to be half Man and half Serpent, ii. 267. iii. 374. Called the Country Cecropia after his own Name, 374. in the Note.
- Celeus*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 430.
- Celeus*, the Son of Cephalus King of Cephalenia, his Genealogy, iii. 395. iv. 379.
- Celeno*, the Daughter of Atlas, i. 108. ii. 273.
- Celeno*, one of the Harpies, i. 114.
- Celmis*, transformed into Adamant, iv. 368.
- Celtæ*, Original of the Name, i. 60. The Country of the Celtæ, their Religion, iii. 216.
- Celtiberians*, a People of Spain, they worshipped an anonymous God, iii. 306.
- Ceneus*, a Surname of Jupiter, ii. 220.
- Ceneus*, one of the Lapithæ, iii. 538. And of the Argonauts, iv. 22.
- Centaurs*, their Original, i. 13. Their Birth, iii. 526, 531. Whether their Existence is possible, ibid. The Etymology of the Name; who the fabulous Centaurs were, 534.
- Centaurus* and Lapithus, the Sons of Apollo and Stilbia, iii. 526.
- Cephalus*, the Son of Deioneus, his Amours with Aurora, iv. 378. He kills his Wife Procris thro' Mistake, 379. His Descendants; whether he had two Heads, ibid.
- Cepheus*, a Constellation, iv. 407.
- Cerambus* transformed into a Bird in the Time of the Deluge, iv. 397.
- Ceraste*, People of the Island of Cyprus transformed into Bulls, iv. 394.

I N D E X.

- Cerberus*, the Dog of Hell, whence he was ingendered, i. 114. iii. 33. His Figure and Function; the Origin of the Name, and of this Fable, iii. 27, 32, 33. The Combat of Pluto with Hercules, for having carried off Cerberus, iii. 32, &c.
- Cercopes*, a People transformed into Monkeys, iv. 395.
- Cercyon* the Arcadian, vanquished by Theseus, iv. 135.
- Cerealia*, Feasts in honour of Ceres, i. 307.
- Ceres*, the Daughter of Saturn, i. 115. The Mother of Plutus, 117. iii. 70. She is the Goddess of Corn, iii. 47. Her Worship in Sicily, 61. The Origin of her Worship in Greece and Sicily, 55, 60. What the Mysteries of Ceres were, 63. See Eleusis. How she was represented, 67. What Victims were offered to her, 68. That she is the Isis of the Egyptians, i. 105. Why she is said to have loved Jasion, i. 77. That she was worshipped among the Gauls, iii. 281.
- Cernunnos*, a Gallic Divinity, iii. 261.
- Ceremancy*, a Sort of Divination, i. 396.
- Cesar*, his Apotheosis, a Temple built in his Honour, iii. 204.
- Ceryces*, Ministers for the Sacrifices, i. 283.
- Cestus*, or Venus's Girdle, its Property, ii. 330. Was stole by Mercury, 370.
- Ceteans*, a People of Mysia, who came to the Relief of Troy, iv. 337.
- Cethim*, the Grandson of Japhet, where he settled, iii. 350, 351.
- Ceto*, the Mother of the Graiaë, her Genealogy, i. 114.
- Ceus*. See Cæus.
- Ceyx*, King of Trachinæ, took Care of Hercules's Children, iv. 380. He marries Alcyone, ibid. The Metamorphosis of Ceyx and Alcyone into King's Fishers, ibid. i. 76.
- Chalcis*, a City of Eubæa, ii. 211.
- Chaldeans*, the most antient People known, whether they are the first Authors of Idolatry, i. 187, 191. ii. 2. Their Tradition about the Origin of the World, i. 80, &c. They were addicted to Magic, i. 426. They are the Inventors of Astrology, 433. ii. 3.
- Cham*, the Son of Noah, whether he is the Menes of the Egyptians, i. 220, 521, 572. He is the Jupiter Ammon, i. 579. ii. 233.
- Chamæmion*, an Idol representing the Sun, ii. 62.
- Chamos*, the God of the Meabites, the Signification of the Name, ii. 55.

I N D E X.

- Chanaan*, the Son of Cham, where he settled, i. 174.
- Changti*, the first God of the Chinese, i. 131.
- Chaos*, what Idea the Chaldeans had of it, i. 82. The Phenicians, 84. The Greeks, iii. 112, 118. The Chaos of Ovid, 125. The Foundation of all the different Ideas of the Chaos, 125, 516.
- Chares*. See the Colosse of Rhodes.
- Charisius*, the Son of Lycaon, what City he founded, iii. 355.
- Charites*, the Name of the three Graces. See Graces.
- Charitia*, or Charistia, Feasts in honour of the Graces, that were celebrated at Rome, i. 302, 310.
- Charon*, the Etymology of the Name, the Origin of the Fable of his Boat, iii. 3, 4, 26, 28. Who had a Right to pass over in his Boat, 21. His Genealogy, his Character, 29. The Tax for Passage, 30. Various Sentiments about Charon, 31.
- Chartres*, or the Chartan Country. The Woods of that Country formerly famous for Religious Assemblies, iii. 222, 223, 242.
- Charybdis*. See Scylla.
- Chastity*. See Modesty.
- Chains*, what the Chains were that bound Saturn in his Prison, ii. 182.
- Chiromocrates*, the famous Architect of the second Temple of Ephesus, i. 224.
- Che-kia* or Cha-ka, an Idol of the Chinese, his History, i. 136.
- Chelone*, a Nymph transformed into a Tortoise, ii. 236.
- Chemien*, a Divinity of the Caraibes, i. 142.
- Chera*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 245.
- Chersiphron*, or Ctesiphron, Architect to the Temple of Ephesus, i. 223.
- Chersonesus Taurica*. See Tauris.
- Chickens* (sacred), how Auguries were taken from them ; the Confidence of the Romans in those Auguries, i. 346, 403, 404.
- Chief Priests* and Chief Priestesses among the Greeks, i. 284.
- Chiliomb*, a Sacrifice of a thousand Animals, i. 272.
- Chilon*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 433.
- Children* nursed by Animals. The Origin of those Fables, i. 68. Tutelar Divinities of Children, 197. Children sacrificed to the Gods, 145.
- Children* of the Gods, the vast Number of them, i. 75. ii. 164. The Distinction between the Children of the Gods, 458, &c. See Demi-Gods.
- Chimera*, by whom engendered, i. 114. The Description of

I N D E X.

- of this Monster ; vanquished by Bellerophon, iii. 468. The Explanation of this Fable, 469.
- Cbina, Chinese.* Religion of the Chinese, i. 131. Their Books which they call Classicks, 131, 132. Their Byas to Magic, 133. The Sect of the Tao-se, 134. Sect of the Che-Kia, 136.
- Chiromancy*, what kind of Science it is, i. 396.
- Chiron*, a famous Centaur, his Birth, iii. 531. The chief Princes of Greece were his Pupils, 540. iv. 9. in the Note, 275. His Death, iii. 540. He forms the Constellation of Sagittarius, iii. 540. iv. 407. The Kalendar which he composed for the Argonauts, iii. 541.
- Chloris*, the Surname of Melibæa, Nestor's Mother, ii. 414. Her Genealogy ; her Children were all slain by Hercules, except Nestor, iii. 393.
- Chonidas* or Chronidas, Governor to Theseus, worshipped by the Athenians as a Demi-God, iv. 131.
- Chresmotbetæ*, Ministers of the Temples, i. 282.
- Chresphontes*, one of the Heraclidæ, iv. 129.
- Cbrodo*, a God of the ancient Germans, how represented, iii. 330.
- Chronia*, a Feast in Honour of Saturn, i. 302.
- Chronicle of Paros.* See Marbles.
- Chronology* of the ancient Greeks, not certain, iii. 341.
- Chronos*, the Saturn of the Phenicians, i. 93. One of the eight great Gods of the Egyptians, 105.
- Chronia*, a Festival in Honour of Saturn, i. 302.
- Chromes*, by whom built, iii. 355.
- Cbryasus*, King of Argos, the Descendant of Inachus, iii. 258.
- Chrysaor*, sprung from the Blood of Medusa, the Father of Gerion, i. 114, 117. iii. 438. The Etymology of his Name, 438. The Explanation of this Fable, 453, 454.
- Chryseis*, the Captive of Agamemnon ; he was obliged to give her back to her Father, iv. 232, 233.
- Chrysippus*, the Son of Pelops, slain by Atreus and Thyestes, iv. 256, 266.
- Chrysor*, the Vulcan of the Phenicians, i. 94.
- Chtonius*, an Epithet given to Mercury, ii. 375.
- Cidon*, the Grandson of Minos I. gave his Name to the City Cidonia, iii. 484.
- Cilix*, the Son of Agenor, Brother of Cadmus, communicated his Name to Cilicia, iii. 404.
- Cimmerians*, who are the Cimmerians mentioned in Homer, i. 74. iii. 10, 11.
- Cinyras*, accused of Incest with his Daughter Myrrha, ii. 8.
- Cinxia*,

I N D E X.

- Cinxia*, one of Juno's Epithets, ii. 242.
- Circe*, the Sister of Æetes King of Colchos, receives Medea and Jason at her Court, then banishes them, iv. 47. Why said to be the Daughter of the Sun or Apollo, 297. Why said to be a Sorceress, ibid. She receives Ulysses, 298. Transforms the Nymph Scylla into a Monster, 294. Her Worship in Italy, 299. That there were two Princesses of this Name, 300.
- Circumcision*, whether the Mutilation of Uranus and Saturn alludes to the Circumcision of Abraham, ii. 180.
- Circus*. See Games of the Circus.
- Cisson*, metamorphosed into Ivy, ii. 453, 406, 461.
- Cissotonia*, Feasts in Honour of Hebe, i. 302.
- Cistophoræ*, what they are, ii. 460. Medals so called. ibid.
- Citheronia*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 244.
- Citheronius*, an Epithet given to Jupiter, ii. 220.
- Citheriades*, an Epithet of the Muses, ii. 435.
- Citheron*, King of Plataeæ, reconciles Juno and Jupiter.
- Citheronius*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 220.
- Cities*, Ceremonies performed at the founding of Cities, i. 323. Cities of Egypt that derived their Names from the Animals that were worshipped there, 545. Cities put into the Number of Divinities, ii. 287, 288. The Foundation of the Worship that was paid to Cities, ii. 289.
- Cius*, an Argonaut, iv. 22.
- Cladeus*, worshipp'd as an Heroe, iii. 433.
- Claros*, a City famous for the Oracle of Apollo, i. 344.
- Claudia*, a Vestal whose Virtue was suspected, she proves her Innocence, ii. 567.
- Cledonismancy*, a Sort of Divination, i. 396.
- Clemency*, promoted to a Divinity, iii. 139.
- Cleobis* and Biton, their Piety to their Mother; Statues raised in their Honour; a Monument representing them, ii. 248.
- Cleodea*, the Daughter of Hillus, worship'd as a Heroine, iii. 431.
- Cleodeus*, the Son of Hillus, a Heroe, iii. 433.
- Cleomedes*, Cleoneus, also Heroes, iii. 431.
- Cleopatra*, the Wife of Meleager, her Genealogy, iv. 174. Her Death, ibid. See Meleager.
- Clidomancy*, a Species of Divination, i. 396.
- Clio*, the first of the Muses; the Etymology of the Name; the Invention that is attributed to her; and in what manner she is represented, ii. 432.
- Clitor*, the Son of Nyctimus King of Arcadia, and his Successor, iii. 355.

Cloacina,

I N D E X

- Cleacina*, the Goddess of Common-shores, iii. 196.
- Clothera*, the Daughter of Pandarus. See Pandarus.
- Clotbo*, one of the Parcæ, by whom engender'd, i. 113. iii. 84. Her Office, 86. The Etymology of her Name, ibid. How she is represented, 91.
- Cloud*, what that Cloud was which had Children by Ixion, iii. 528, 530.
- Clusius* and Patuleius, Gods of the Gates, i. 198.
- Clymene*, the Daughter of the Ocean, the Mother of Atlas, i. 115.
- Clymenus*, the Son of Oeneus, King of Calydon, iv. 173.
- Clymenus*, one of the Descendants of Idean Hercules, iv. 426.
- Clyta*, the Wife of Cyzicus. See Cyzicus.
- Clytemnestra*, the Daughter of Tyndarus and Leda, iv. 257. Married to Agamemnon, ibid. Kills her Husband, 259.
- Clytides*. See Iamides.
- Clytia*, her Metamorphosis into the Heliotrope, i. 32.
- Clytius*, a Giant slain by Vulcan, ii. 168.
- Clytus*, one of the Argonauts, iv. 22.
- Cneph*, the first Principle in the Theogony of the Egyptians, i. 103, 491, 493. How he was represented, 493.
- Coalemus*, the God of Imprudence, i. 199.
- Cocalus*, King of Sicily, receives Dedalus at his Court; puts Mines to Death, iii. 511.
- Cock*, consecrated to Minerva, why, i. 264. ii. 297, 310.
- Cocytus*, an infernal River or Lake, iii. 35. iv. 3, 22, 37.
- Cocytus*, the Physician who cured Adonis, ii. 13, 21.
- Codrus*, the last King of Athens, iii. 377.
- Cœlestis*, or Bona Dea, iii. 198.
- Cœlus*. See Heaven.
- Cœus* or Ceus, the Son of Heaven and Earth, or of Cœlus and Terra, i. 113. His Children, 115.
- Coit*, one of the Exercises in the Games, iv. 417, 418.
- Calax*, the Son of Jupiter and Ora, ii. 170.
- Calisee* of Rome, the Remains of that ancient Structure, iv. 423.
- Collatina*, a Goddess worshipp'd at Rome, iii. 198.
- Collina*, a Goddess of the Latins, ii. 590.
- Colosse* of Rhodes, one of the seven Wonders of the World, i. 250.
- Combe*, transformed into a Bird, iv. 398.
- Cometo*, the Daughter of Pterelas, her Perfidiousness to her Father; her Death, iv. 76.
- Common God*, an Epithet given to Mars, ii. 320.
- Compitalia*, Feasts and Games so called, i. 310. ii. 610, 617.
- Comus*, the God of Revels and Jollity, his Character, iii. 152, &c. Concord,

I N D E X.

- Concord*, ranked among the Gods, i. 200. iii. 129. Her Temples at Rome, iii. 129.
- Conservatrix*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 243.
- Constellations*, the Names of several Constellations, iv. 407.
They were believed to be the Receptacles of the Souls of those whose Names they bore, i. 198, 494.
- Consualia*, Feasts in Honour of the God Consus, i. 310.
- Consus*, one of the Gods of Physic, i. 200.
- Contracts*, Divinities who presided over the Faith of Contracts, iii. 131, 132.
- Coraces*, Ministers of Mithras so called, i. 289.
- Coral*, sprung from the Blood of Medusa, iii. 453, 455.
- Corcyra*. See Pheacians.
- Corea*, the People of Corea attributed Divinity to the Rivers and Mountains, i. 146.
- Coræa*, or Coreia, Feasts of Proserpine, i. 302.
- Corefus*, the Priest of Bacchus. See Gallirhoe.
- Coriphagena*, one of Minerva's Epithets, ii. 309.
- Corinth*, its first Name; by whom built, iii. 392.
- Corn*, the Inventors of the Art of sowing Corn according to the Phenicians, i. 95. According to the Greeks. See Ceres, Triptolamus.
- Cornucopia*, whence the Greeks make it to be derived, ii. 208.
- Coræbus*, communicates his Name to the first Olympiad.
Why, iv. 427.
- Coronis*, one of the Hyades, ii. 278.
- Coronis*, the Mother of Esculapius, ii. 400. iii. 156, 157.
Her Death, and Transformation into a Crow, iii. 157.
She had a Statue in the Temple of Esculapius, 163, 179.
- Coronis*, a City of Cyprus. See Salamis.
- Corybantes*, Priests of Cybele, whether they are to be confounded with the Cabiri, ii. 76, 81. How they celebrated the Feasts of their Goddesses, 82, 562. The Origin of the Name, 560.
- Corybantica*, Feasts in Honour of the Corybantes, i. 302.
- Corybus*, the son of Jasion and Cybele, ii. 560. The Wife whom he married, ibid.
- Corymbifer*, one of Bacchus's Epithets, ii. 448.
- Corythus*, Son of Paris and Oenone, slain by his Father,
iv. 341.
- Coscinomancy*, a Sort of Divination, i. 396.
- Cosmogonies*. See Theogony.
- Cossutius*, a Roman Citizen who finished the Temple of Olympian Jupiter, i. 226.
- Cottus* a Giant, the Son of Heaven and Earth, i. 113.
Banished with his Fraternity to the Extremities of the Earth, 116. Cottytto,

I N D E X.

- Cettytto*, the Goddess of Debauchery, her Feasts, iii. 69.
 Her Priests. See Baptæ.
- Covenant Gods*, who presided over Covenants, i. 59.
- Cranaus*, second King of Athens, iii. 377.
- Crane*, a sort of Dance invented by Theseus, why, iii. 508.
- Cranes*, their Battles with the Pygmies. See Pygmies.
- Cranius*, worshipped as a Hero, iii. 433.
- Creus*, the Son of Heaven and Earth, i. 113. His Offspring, 114.
- Creon*, King of Corinth gave his Daughter to Jason, iv. 66.
 See the Note. His Death imputed to Medea, 67.
- Creon*, King of Thebes, iv. 81. Marries his Daughter Megara to Hercules, ibid. And his Daughter Jocasta to Laius, 179. Then to Oedipus, 180. See Laius, Oedipus.
- Crepitus*, a Divinity, how represented, i. 199. iii. 196.
- Cres*, the Son of Jupiter, King of Crete, ii. 177.
- Cretans*, whence so called, i. 60.
- Crete*, the Island of Crete; Jupiter was educated and died there, ii. 176, 177. Teuctamus, the first Grecian King in Crete, iii. 395. A List of the Kings of Crete, 516. Its first Inhabitants, ibid.
- Cretheus*, the Son of Eolus, his Brothers and Sisters, iii. 390; His Children and their Descendants, 394.
- Cretans*, whence they derived their Name, i. 60.
- Creusa*, the Daughter of Erechtheus, King of Athens, Mother of Janus, ii. 261. The Mother also of Ion and Acheus, iii. 396.
- Creusa*, married to Peneus, her Children and their Descendants, iii. 526.
- Creusa*, the Daughter of Priam, Wife of Eneas, iv. 139, 309. Her Death, ibid.
- Crinifus*, transformed into a Bear, iv. 401.
- Criobole*, or Criobolium, a sort of Sacrifice, i. 272.
- Criophoros*, one of Mercury's Epithets, ii. 375.
- Crocodile*, this amphibious Creature was in high Veneration at Arsinoe, i. 544. And looked upon with Horror in the rest of Egypt, 545. How it is the Symbol of the Divinity, 551.
- Cræsus*, King of Lydia, from whom descended, iv. 111.
- Crommyon*, a Woman of that Town, called the Sow, iv. 134.
- Cross*, the Cross is often one of the Symbols of the Egyptian Divinities, i. 563.
- Crow*, consecrated to Apollo, why, ii. 417.
- Crown*, Ariadne's Crown transformed into a Star, iv. 407.
- Crudelis*, or Cruel, an Epithet given to Mars, ii. 320.
- Ctesiphon*.

I N D E X.

- Ctesiphon*. See Gherfiphron.
- Cthonius*, the Surname of Mercury, ii. 375.
- Cuckoo*, a Bird consecrated to Jupiter, why, ii. 236.
- Cuirasses* and Javelins, their Use introduced into Greece, or invented by Cadmus, iii. 406.
- Cunina*, a Goddess that was invoked for Children; her Office, i. 197. iii. 192.
- Cupid*, the Son of Venus, ii. 329, 337. How many Cupids, 338. The Amours of Cupid and Psyche, 342. See Love.
- Curetes*, who they were, ii. 209. They educated Jupiter, 166, 173. Their Origin. The Etymology of their Names, 210. The Institution of the Olympic Games is owing to them, 213. They had Temples after their Death, 214. That they are not to be confounded with the Cabiri, 81.
- Custos*, an Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 224.
- Cyane*, a Nymph of Sicily, transformed into a Fountain, iii. 48. The Veneration paid to that Fountain, 51. The Foundation of this Fable, 57.
- Cyanææ*, or Symplegades, Rocks at the Mouth of the Euxine Sea, iv. 37. The Argonauts pass thro' between these Rocks, 38. The fabulous Account of them, i. 74.
- Cyanipe*, the Daughter of Adrastus, iv. 198.
- Cybele*, the Earth adored under that Name, ii. 552. The History of Cybele according to Diodorus Siculus, ii. 405, 557. That there were several Cybeles, 562. Her Worship; her Feasts; her Priests and Priestesses, 562, 563. Her various Names, ibid. Why she was called the Mother of the Gods, 563. The Statue of Cybele brought to Rome, 567. How represented, 565.
- Cyclops*, by whom engender'd; their Figure; their Employment, i. 113. The Arms which they forged for the Gods, ii. 166, 186. Apollo kills the Cyclops, ii. 415. Their History; the Etymology of their Name. Why they are said to be Vulcan's Blacksmiths, and Canibals, iv. 290, &c. The Worship that was paid to them, 292. Why they passed for the Offspring of Heaven and Earth, and for Giants, 294.
- Cidypppe*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Cygnus*, the Brother of Phaeton, his Transformation into a Swan, ii. 385, 390, 392.
- Cygnus*, the Son of Neptune, also transformed into a Swan, iv. 221. Other Princes of the same Name, ii. 392.
- Cylindus*, the Son of Phryxus and Calciope, iv. 7.
- Cyllabarus*, Gallant to Diomedes's Wife, iv. 388.

Cyllen,

I N D E X.

- Cyllen*, the Son of Elatus King of Phocis, communicated his Name to Mount Cyllene, iii. 355.
- Cyllene*, a Mountain in Arcadia, ibid.
- Cylleneus*, one of Mercury's Names, ii. 374.
- Cynisea*, a Heroine who won the Prize at the Olympic Games, iii. 434.
- Cymopolia*, the Daughter of Neptune, married to Briareus, i. 116.
- Cymodusa*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Cymothoe*, ibid.
- Cynisea*, a Grecian Heroine, iii. 434.
- Cynocephali*, what kind of Animals, i. 534.
- Cynophontes*, Feasts celebrated at Argos in the Dog-Days, i. 302.
- Cynofarges*, a Surname given to Hercules, iv. 120.
- Cyparissus*, a young Man transformed into a Cypress, ii. 402.
- Cyppus*, a Roman Captain. Horns grew in his Head, iv. 396.
- Cypria*, one of Juno's Appellations, ii. 244.
- Cyprus*, the Birth of Venus in that Island, i. 113. ii. 328.
- Cypress*, consecrated to Pluto, i. 264. The Symbol of Grief, therefore made use of at Funerals, ii. 402.
- Cyprina*, an Epithet of Venus, i. 113.
- Cyrenaica*, a Country of Africa, i. 581.
- Cyrno*, one of Jupiter's Mistresses, ii. 170.
- Cythera*, an Island, its Situation; it was consecrated to Venus; why, ii. 328. Her Temple at Cythera, ibid.
- Cytherea*, Surname of Venus, i. 113. ii. 333.
- Cyzicus*, King of Cyzicus. Jason kills him undesignedly, and builds a Temple to him, iv. 32. Clyta, the Wife of Cyzicus, hangs herself in Despair, iv. 33.
- Cyzicus*, a City at the Foot of Mount Dyndimus, iv. 32.

D.

- DACIANS*, what Gods that People worshipped, ii. 147.
- Daëtyli* of Crete, different from the Cabyri, ii. 76, 81, 82. The same with the Curetes, 211. Whence the Name of Daëtyle is derived, ibid.
- Daëtyliomancy*, a Sort of Divination; how it was practised, i. 396.
- Dades*, Feasts of the Greeks; whence the Name is derived, i. 302.
- Daduchus*, or Lampadophorus, a Minister of Religion among the Greeks, i. 282. ii. 462. iii. 66.
- Dædalus*, See Dedalus.

Dæsanus,

I N D E X.

Dæfanaus. See Defanans.

Dagon, or Siron, who that God was in the System of the Phenicians, i. 93, 95. The Etymology of the Name, ii. 36. How he was represented, 37. A famous Divinity of the Philistines; his Temple at Asoth, ibid. He is the Derceto of the Greeks, i. 70. ii. 36, 37.

Daimogorgon, or Demogorgon, the Signification of this Name, i. 119. ii. 549. Who this God was, ibid. His Genealogy, 550. The Explanation of this Fable, ibid.

Damastes, a Giant who was called Proustes, why, iv. 135.

Damium, a Feast in Honour of the good Goddesses, surnamed Damia, ii. 554. The Signification of the Name, ibid. See the Note.

Danae, the Daughter of Acrisius, Mother of Perseus, ii. 164, 170. Shut up in a brazen Tower, iii. 436. Exposed upon the Sea with her Son, 437. Her Return into Greece, 462.

Danae, the Daughter of Danaus, Neptune offers Violence to her, ii. 496.

Danaids, their Punishment in Tartarus, iii. 23, 115. What had given rise to this Fable, 116.

Danaus, his Arrival in Greece, iii. 363. Seizes upon the Kingdom of Argos, ibid. Marries his fifty Daughters to the fifty Sons of Egyptus his Brother, ibid. See Danaids.

Danube, a River worshipped by the Scythians, ii. 479.

Daonus, or Daos, one of the Gods of the Chaldeans, i. 86.

Dapalis, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.

Daphnæus, an Epithet of Apollo, ii. 420.

Daphne, the Daughter of Peneus, beloved by Apollo, i. 77. ii. 398.

Daphne, the Suburbs of Antioch, there an Oracle was, and a Statue of Apollo, i. 345. ii. 399.

Daphnephora and Daphnephoria, Feasts so called in honour of Apollo, i. 304.

Daphnis, metamorphosed into a Rock, iv. 367.

Dardania, the first Name of the City Troy, iv. 250.

Dardanus, the Son of Jupiter and Electra, ii. 170, 559. iii. 71. His Retreat to Phrygia, ii. 565. His History, iv. 249.

Daulias, the Surname of Philomel. See Daulis.

Daulis, a Feast of the Argives, i. 302.

Daulis, a City of Phocis, i. 61. Famous for the Adventure of Progne and Philomela, iv. 359.

Dead, what Laws and Customs were observed in Egypt with respect to the Dead, iii. 3, 4, &c. Why they embalmed

I N D E X.

- balmed the Dead, 8. The Notions of the Druids about the Fate of their Dead, 236.
- Death*, a Divinity, by whom procreated, i. 113. iii. 101. Under what Name adored at Cadiz, iii. 304. The Goddess who presided over Death, i. 197. Sudden Deaths, and those occasioned by the Plague, to whom attributed, i. 13. ii. 409, 411.
- Deceartes*, the Son of Lycæon King of Arcadia, iii. 354.
- Dædalus*, his Genealogy, iii. 519. Was the most skilful Artist in Greece, 520. His Works, ibid. His jealousy against his Nephew, 521. See Talus. He is shut up with his Son in the Labyrinth which he had built, i. 25. iii. 509. How he made his Escape; the Fable of his Wings, iii. 509. His Retreat in Sicily, 510.
- Dedala*, or Dædala, a Feast of the Greeks, i. 302.
- Dedalion*. See Deion.
- Deidamia*, married to Pirithous. See Hippodamia.
- Dejanira*, the Daughter of Oeneus King of Calydon, married Hercules, iv. 97. Was the Cause of that Heroe's Death, 107. The Children she had by Hercules, 111.
- Deion*, the Son of Eolus, iii. 390. Marries Diomede the Daughter of Xutus, 394, 395.
- Deion* or Dedalion, the Brother of Ceyx, iv. 381. Transformed into a Hawk, 382.
- Deioneus*. See Eioneus.
- Deioneus*, the Son of Eurytus King of Oecalia, the People that came of him, iv. 133.
- Deiopeia*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Deipyle* or Deiphile, the Daughter of Adrastus; her Marriage with Tydeus, iii. 187, 198.
- Delia*, Feasts so called, i. 302.
- Delos*, the Island where Apollo was born, i. 345. ii. 393. The Origin of that Island according to the Poets, 395, 396.
- Delphos*. See the Temple of Delphos, Oracle of Delphos.
- Delphinia*, a Feast celebrated at Egina, i. 302.
- Deluge Universal*, the Memory of that Event preserved among all Nations, i. 12, 54. iii. 387. The Tradition of the Chaldeans concerning the Deluge, i. 87. The Deluge of Ogyges, iii. 368. The Æra of that Event, 369, &c. The Deluge of Deucalion, iii. 379. At what Period of Time it happened, 384.
- Demarson*, the Jupiter of the Chaldeans, i. 97:
- Demi-Goddesses*, how they were known among the Greeks, iii. 170.

I. N. D. E. X.

- Demi-Gods, or Children of Gods*, i. 117. Their Original, 120. A prodigious Number of Demi-Gods, 203, &c. Where they resided, 462. See Genii. Heroes.
- Demogorgon*. See Daimogorgon.
- Demon of Socrates*. i. 473.
- Demonassa*, the Daughter of Amphiaraus, iv. 193, 196.
- Demonax*, a Mantinean, the Worship he established in the Cyrenaica, i. 581.
- Demophoon*, the Son of Theseus and Phedra, iv. 146. Went to the Siege of Troy, 58. See Æthra, ibid. The Amours of Phillis and Demophoon, 400. See Phillis.
- Derceto, or Atergatis*, metamorphosed into a Fish, i. 70. ii. 31. Whether she is the same with Astarte, ibid. 35.
- Disanaus or Disanaus*, the Name of the Phenician Hercules, iv. 123.
- Descensor*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 222.
- Destiny, or Destinies*, the Ideas which the Ancients had of them, iii. 84, 86. By whom engender'd, i. 113.
- Deucalion*, the Son of Jupiter and Iodamia, ii. 170.
- Deucalion*, the Son of Prometheus; settled in Greece, iii. 378. A Deluge that happened in his Time; his Posterity, 379, 388. His Genealogy, 398. That he built the first Temple in Greece; what Temple this was, i. 211.. iii. 387. Was honoured in Greece as a Divinity, iii. 432.
- Deucalion*, the Son of Minos II. and Pasiphae, iii. 505. Marries his Sister Phedra to Theseus, 515.
- Deverra*, a tutelary Goddess of Children, i. 197.
- Deverrona*, the Goddess who presided over the Reaping of the Fruits, i. 198.
- Devotings. Devotio* in Latin; private Devotings; the Form of public Devoting; Devoting of Criminals, i. 321.
- Diamastigotis*. See Flagellation.
- Dianaſta*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Diana*, that there were several Goddesses of that Name, ii. 421. Often taken for the Moon, 422, 423. Her different Names and Functions, 423, 424. The Worship that was paid to her in different Countries, 426. Especially among the Gauls, iii. 282. How she is represented, ii. 426. Her Oracles, i. 346.
- Diana Perrasia*. See Castaballa.
- Dice*, by whom and when invented, iv. 224.
- Dice*, the Daughter of Themis, i. 116. Presided over Justice, i. 199.
- Diæus*, an Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 220, 225.
- Diæe*, the Cave where Jupiter was born, ii. 165.
- Diæus*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.

I N D E X.

- Dietynnia*, a Festival to Diana Dietyнна, i. 304.
- Dido*, the Surname of the Princess Elisa, what it signifies; her History; her Amours with Eneas; her Death. The Worship that was paid to her after her Death, iv. 318, 319. Of what Gods she established the Worship in Africk, i. 574.
- Didyme*, the Oracle that was there, i. 345.
- Diespiter*, an Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 218.
- Diipolia*, a Feast celebrated at Athens, i. 301.
- Dindyme*, the Mother of Cybele, ii. 558.
- Dindyminæ*, an Epithet given to Cybele, ii. 564.
- Dindymus*, a Mountain in Phrygia, ii. 558. iv. 33.
- Dio*, the first Name of Ceres, iii. 46.
- Diocleia*, Feasts in Honour of Diocles, i. 304.
- Dioclesian*, the Prediction concerning him given by a Druidess, iii. 245.
- Dismedes*, worship'd as a Heroe, iii. 432.
- Dismedes*, the first Name of Jason, iv. 9. In the Note.
- Dismedes*, the Son of Tydeus, iv. 286. His Exploits at the Siege of Troy, 228, 229, 233, 286, & seq. Repaired to Great Greece, after his Return from that War; the City which he built there, 247, 288. Refused to furnish Troops against Eneas, ibid.
- Dismedes*, King of Thrace, slain by Hercules, why, iv. 88.
- Dicmede*, the Daughter of Xuthus. See Deionee.
- Dione*, the Daughter of Uranus, i. 96.
- Dione*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Dione*, the Mother of Venus, ii. 170.
- Dicnea*, one of Venus's Appellations, ii. 333.
- Dionysia*, Feasts of Bacchus, i. 305.
- Dionysius*. See Liber.
- Diocuri*, the Name given to Castor and Pollux, iv. 149. See Caberi.
- Dirce*, the Wife of Licus, her Cruelty to Antiope, iii. 416. Her Punishment, ibid. Her Metamorphosis into a Fountain, 419.
- Dirphya*, one of Juno's Epithets, ii. 244.
- Dis*, the God of the Celtæ, i. 44.
- Discord*, ranked among the Goddesses, i. 199. iii. 145. She is banished from Olympus. Her Description, iii. 145. By whom engender'd; her Children, i. 113.
- Discus*, a Vase made use of in the Sacrifices, i. 277.
- Ditches*, for the Sacrifices to the infernal Gods, iii. 102.
- Ditbyrambus*, a Surname of Bacchus, ii. 448.
- Divination*, what that Science is; the Antiquity of it, i. 391. How many Sorts of Divination, and how they were performed, 393. Diviners,

I N D E X.

- Diviners*, their Office and Functions among the Greeks, i. 266.
- Divinity*, the Idea which the Pagan Philosophers had of him, i. 438.
- Divinities Allegorical and Physical*, invented for the different Ages, the different Professions and Actions of Life, i. 198. iii. 121. Virtues and Vices raised into Divinities; Divinities assigned to the Affections and Passions; Divinities who presided over every Part of the Body. i. 199, 200.
- Divipotes*, Roman Divinities, iii. 193.
- Dodanim*, the Grandson of Japhet, where he settled, iii. 350, 351.
- Dodonæus*, an Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 220.
- Dodona*. See the Oracle of Dodona.
- Dog*, worshipp'd in Egypt, i. 544. See Anubis. Men with Dog's-Heads. See Cynocephali.
- Dog*, a Constellation, iv. 404, 407.
- Dolabra*, an Instrument for the Sacrifices, i. 278.
- Dolichenius*, a Name given to Jupiter, ii. 219. A Monument representing Jupiter, ibid.
- Dolichenius*, the Etymology of the Name, iii. 275.
- Dolphin*, a Constellation, ii. 497. iv. 393. The Dolphin that carried Arion upon its Back, ibid. The Affection of Dolphins to Men, ibid.
- Domiduca*, an Epithet of Juno, ii. 242.
- Domiducus*, a God who presided over Marriage, his Function, i. 197. ii. 252.
- Doricles*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 434.
- Dorians*, a People in Greece, iii. 395.
- Doris*, the Mother of the Nereids, i. 114. ii. 508.
- Dorfanus*, the Name of the Indian Hercules, iv. 74.
- Dorus*, the Grandson of Deucalion, where he settled, iii. 390, 395. His Descendants, ibid.
- Dorycius*. See Erycia.
- Dosithea*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Dozo*, ibid.
- Dragon*, a kind of Serpent consecrated to Bacchus and Minerva, i. 263. ii. 297. Dragon of the Garden of the Hesperides, i. 30, 67, 114. ii. 275, 279. iii. 455. Dragons that kept the Golden Fleece, i. 29, 67. iii. 41, 42. Cadmus's Dragon, i. 67. The flying Dragon of China, i. 137. The flying Dragons of Medea's Chariot, iv. 64, 66. The Dragon upon which Cerberus was formed, iv. 32.
- Dreams*, by whom procreated, i. 113. iii. 100. Oracles that were delivered by Dreams, i. 345, 346, 353. The Names of the Dreams, iii. 100.

I N D E X.

- Druids*, chief Ministers of Religion among the Gauls, iii. 225. What Places they frequented, 229. A Parallel between the Druids and Persian Magi, 217, 228. The Idea which they had of the Divinity, 218. The Etymology of the Name of Druids, iii. 227. Their Origin, their Manner of Life, their Functions, Science, and their Authority in the Nation, iii. 227, 228, &c. Their Superstitions, 235, &c. Their Maxims, 242. When their Order was abolished, 246.
- Druidesses*, what kind of Women they were; their Authority; they had the Gift of Prediction, iii. 243, &c. They resembled the Vestals of the Romans, iii. 284.
- Dryads*, Nymphs of the Woods, their Worship, ii. 527, 528.
- Drymo*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Dryope*, transformed into a Tree, iv. 394.
- Duikclaites*, a People in Arabia, their Religion, i. 570.
- Duiffanian*, an Epithet given to Hercules, iii. 265.
- Dufares*, a God of the Arabians, i. 569.
- Dyētinnia*. See Diētynnia.
- Dynamme*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Dzobara*, a Goddess the Arabians, i. 570.
- Dzobl*, a Divinity of the same People, i. 570.

E.

E A, Eca, or Æa. See Æa.

Eacus, one of the Judges of Hell, iii. 22, 27, 41.

Whose Son he was, iv. 268. His great Equity, 269.

Who were his Subjects, 270. His Children, ibid.

Eagle, consecrated to Jupiter, i. 264. Why, ii. 208.

Earth, its Origin according to the Chaldeans, i. 82. According to the Greeks, 112, 114, 116. Adored under various Names, i. 196. ii. 551. The Worship of the Earth very ancient, 551. How represented, 557.

Ears, Jupiter represented without Ears in Crete, and at Lacedemon with four Ears, ii. 229. Omens drawn from the Tingling of the Ear, i. 409.

Eaubadnes, Eubadnes. See Oannes.

Echecrates, ravishes the Priestesses of Delphos, i. 337.

Echemus, King of Arcadia, iii. 356.

Echidna, a female Monster, her Figure; her Offspring, i. 114.

Echion, the Father of Acteon, iii. 412, 420. See the Table.

Echion, the Son of Mercury, one of the Argonauts, iv. 22.

Eclipses, Fables delivered about the Cause of Eclipses, i. 45, 46. Echo,

I N D E X.

- Echo*, a Nymph in Love with Narcissus, iv. 366.
- Educa* and Eduia, Goddesses of the Romans, their Functions, iii. 199.
- Eduia* or Edusa, the tutelary Goddess of Children, i. 197. iii. 192.
- Egeus*, King of Athens, iii. 377. His Genealogy, 494. The Father of Theseus, iv. 131, 132, 135. His Commerce with Medea, 69. Is the Author of assassinating Androgeos, iii. 493. Communicates his Name to the Egean Sea, iii. 504.
- Egeon*, one of the Gods of the Sea, his Genealogy; his Death, ii. 524.
- Egeria*, a Goddess who presided over Women in Childbed, i. 197. iii. 191. Juno had also the same Name, ii. 242.
- Egeria*, a Nymph whom Numa consulted, iii. 484.
- Egestus*. See Elimus.
- Egesta*, the Daughter of Hippotas, the Mother of Acestes King of Sicily, iv. 401, 402. See Crinifus.
- Egg*, the primitive Egg, the Source of all Beings, i. 84, 104, 112. The Fable of the Egg of Osiris and Typhon, 178. The Fable of the Egg Anguinum of the Druids, its Virtue, iii. 209, 237, 238.
- Egialea*, the Daughter of Adrastus, iv. 198.
- Egialeus*, whether he is the Founder of the Kingdom of Sicyon, iii. 358, 359.
- Egialeus*, the Son of Adrastus, slain in the War of the Epi- goni, iv. 191, 199.
- Egibolium*, or Egobolium, a kind of Sacrifice, i. 275.
- Egis*, the Buckler of Minerva, a Description of this Piece of Armour, ii. 297, 309, 311. iii. 438. Its Origin, ii. 312.
- Egis*, a Monster that vomited Fire, ii. 311.
- Egina*, the Daughter of Asopus King of Beotia, Mother of Eacus, iii. 391. Transformed into the Island of his Name, iv. 269. The Situation of that Island, its Inhabitants, 270.
- Egistus*, the Son of Thyestes, his Birth, iv. 256. His Crimes, his Death, 260, 261.
- Egiuchus*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.
- Egle*, one of the Goddesses of Physic, iii. 159.
- Egophaga*, an Epithet of Juno, iv. 107.
- Egregores*, or Angels of Heaven, i. 121.
- Egypt*, the first Theater of Idolatry and Fables, i. 69, 73. As well as of Arts and Sciences, 48, 69. Temples of Egypt, their Magnificence, 211, 220, 221. The Abominations of Egypt, 487.

I N D E X.

Egyptians, their Cosmogony and Theogony, i. 102. What sort of Gods they had, 486, 524. Who were their eight great Gods, 492.

Egyptus, the Brother of Danaus, his fifty Sons, iii. 115, 363. See Lynceus.

Eimarmene, the Daughter of Uranus, i. 96.

Eioneus, or Deioneus, Ixion his Son-in-Law puts him to Death, why, iii. 527.

Elaphobolia, Feasts of Athens, i. 303.

Elara, the Mother of the Giant Tityus, iii. 108.

Elatea, a City of Phocis, iii. 355.

Elatus, the Son of Arcas, what City he founded, ibid.

Elestra, the Daughter of the Ocean, i. 114.

Elestra, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.

Elestra, the Daughter of Atlas, one of the Pleiades, i. 108. ii. 273. See Pleiades.

Elestra, the Daughter of Agamemnon and Sister of Orestes, married to Pylades the Friend of Orestes, iv. 264.

Electrides, pretended Islands, ii. 391.

Electrion, the Father of Alcmena, his Genealogy, iii. 365. iv. 74. His Death, 75.

Eleusis, what were the Mysteries of Eleusis, iii. 61. Why it was forbidden to reveal them, 67.

Eleuterian, an Epithet of Jupiter, i. 304.

Eleutheria, Feasts in Honour of Jupiter, ibid.

Elis, a Country of Greece, whence it got that Name, iii. 351.

Elimus and Egesthus, Trojans who settled in Sicily, iv. 310.

Eliou, or Hypsistius, the Import of the Name, a Divinity of the Phenicians, i. 92.

Elios, or the Sun, one of the eight great Gods of Egypt, i. 493.

Elis, or Elisba, the Grandson of Japhet, where he settled, iii. 351.

Elisa. See Dido.

Eliud, the Son of the Nephelim, i. 122.

Ellotes, an Epithet given to Minerva, ii. 309.

Elcim, Gods of Chronos's Party, i. 95, 96.

Eloquence, false Eloquence of Orators; the Source of several Fables, i. 34, 35.

Elpe, the Daughter of Poliphemus, iv. 293.

Elphenor, King of Eubæa; went to the Siege of Troy with the Sons of Theseus, iv. 144, 145.

Elysian, the Elysian Fields, whence the Greeks derived the Idea thereof, iii. 1, 6, &c. The Time that Souls were

to

I N D E X.

- to remain there, 14, 15. Description of those Elysian Fields, 18, 19, 23, 24. Where the Poets placed them, i. 37.
- Ematuria*, or Æmaturia, Feasts in Honour of Pelops, i. 229.
- Emeriones*, one of the Heroes of Grecce, iii. 430.
- Emithea*, a Demi-Goddes worshipped at Castabe a City of Caria, iii. 170.
- Enak*, and his Descendants, called Giants in Scripture, ii. 195. Whether he is the same with Inachus. See Inachus.
- Enarephorus*, one of the Grecian Heroes, iii. 434.
- Enceladus*, the Giant, whether he is the same with Tiphon, i. 508, 514, 515. His Overthrow in the Combat of the Giants against the Gods, ii. 168.
- Encenia*, Feasts of Dedication, i. 305.
- Enclabris*, an Instrument of the Sacrifices, i. 278.
- Endeide*, or Endeis, the Mother of Peleus, iv. 134.
- Endocus*, the Scholar of Dedalus, his Genius, iii. 525.
- Endovillicus*, a God of the Spaniards, iv. 124.
- Endimion*, or Endymion, the Son of Æthilia, King of Elis, ii. 428. There was another Endymion, a Shepherd of Mount Latmos, ibid. Fable of the Amours of Diana and Endymion, i. 45, 77, 427.
- Eneas Sylvius*, King of Alba, iv. 313.
- Eneas*, his Genealogy, iv. 307, 308. His Actions at the Siege of Troy, 309. His Arrival in Italy, 311. His Death, 312. His Apotheosis, ibid. Suspected of Treason, 307. The Opinion of those who believed that Eneas never came from Troas, 314. His pretended Amour with Dido, 318. Eneas's Ships transformed into Nymphs, 322. Who was the Venus his Mother, 308.
- Eneid*, an Analysis of that Poem divested of all Fiction, i. 39.
- Eneugamus*, and Eneubulus, two of the Challdiac Doctors, i. 85.
- Enna*, Meadows of Enna, iii. 47, 50. See Proserpine.
- Enoch*, the spurious Book of Enoch very ancient, i. 121, 164.
- Enosichthon*, one of Neptune's Epithets, i. 500.
- Envy*, a Divinity, her Description, iii. 142.
- Enyalius*, the Epithet of a God among the Sabines, ii. 319.
- Enyo*, the Surname of Bellona, ii. 313.
- Enyo*, one of the Daughters of Phorcis, i. 114.
- Eolus*, the Son of Deucalion, ii. 533. iii. 390. Gives to the Hellenians the Name of Eolians, ibid. His Children, ibid.

I N D E X.

- Eolus*, the God of Winds, i. 32, 46, 65. ii. 532. Reckoned in the Number of the Gods of the Sea; where he reigned, ii. 532. Receives Ulysses at his Court, 533. His Genealogy, 537. His Children, 538.
- Eoliæ*, or Eolian Islands, where Eolus reign'd, their Situation, ii. 533. There Vulcan's Forges were placed, ibid.
- Eoria*, Feasts of the Greeks, i. 299.
- Eous*, one of the Horses of the Sun, ii. 383.
- Epaphus*, the Son of Jupiter and Io, i. 499. His Contest with Phaeton, ii. 384, 387.
- Ephesus*, the Temple of Diana of Ephesus, i. 222. The Burning of that Temple; the Building of a second Temple, 224.
- Ephira*. See Corinth.
- Ephestia* and Ephestria, Feasts of Vulcan, i. 302.
- Ephialtes*, and Otus, two of the Giants who made War upon the Gods; their Genealogy, their Birth and Stature, ii. 168. iii. 116, 391. The Adventure of Mars with these two Giants, iii. 117, 118. Another Adventure of Neptune with the Giants, ii. 206. Their Death, 117. They were the first who consecrated Mount Helicon to the Muses, ii. 435. iii. 118. See the Gods Alloides.
- Ephyra*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Epicastè*, the Mother of Oedipus, her tragical Death, iv. 183.
- Epicastè*, the Daughter of Egeus, iv. 111.
- Epidaurus*, a City of the Peloponnesus, iii. 155. See Esculapius.
- Epideliu*s, an Epithet of Apollo, ii. 419.
- Epidotes*, Gods who presided over the Growth of Children, i. 198.
- Epigeus*, the same with Uranus, i. 92.
- Epigoni*, War of the Epigoni, what it was, iv. 190.
- Epimeletæ*, Ministers of Religion, i. 284.
- Epimenides*, how he pretended to come by his Laws, iii. 484.
- Epimetheus*, his Genealogy, i. 115, 116. ii. 279. Marries Pandora 280. See Pandora. He is transformed into an Ape, 286.
- Epiphanes*, a Surname of Jupiter, ii. 222.
- Epitus*, King of Mycenæ, his Successors called from his Name Epitides, iv. 129.
- Eponymes*, Heroes Eponyms, iii. 430.
- Epopeus*, King of Sicyon, the Spouse of Antiope, iii. 415. His Death, ibid.
- Epopeus*, King of Lesbos, iv. 393. See Nyctimene.
- Ereptes*, the Name given to the initiated, iii. 64.

I N D E X.

- Epochs*, principal ones of the fabulous Age, iii. 342. Epochs of universal History, 344. A celebrated Epoch among the Greeks, iv.
- Epulones*, an Order of Priests among the Romans, their Privileges, i. 296.
- Epunda*. See Vallonia.
- Epytus*, King of Arcadia, his Genealogy, iii. 355. His Death, ibid.
- Equestris*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 244.
- Equitation*, or the Use of Riding, whether this Art is later than the Siege of Troy, iv. 155.
- Equity*, Goddess of, how represented. iii. 138. Often confounded with Astrea and Dice, ibid.
- Equivocation* of Words of different Languages, the Source of several Fables, i. 17, 28, 60, 65, &c.
- Erato*, one of the nine Muses, the Import of the Name, ii. 433.
- Erceus*, or Hersceus, an Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 226.
- Erebus*, his Union with Night, i. 118.
- Erece*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Erechtheus*, King of Athens, one of the Heroes of Greece, ii. 261. iii. 431. Ranked among the Gods, ii. 269. His Death, iii. 61. iv. 362. The singular Oath taken by his Daughters, iv. 362.
- Ergane*, a Goddess, by whom worshipped, iii. 432.
- Ergane*, an Epithet of Minerva, ii. 309.
- Erginus*, the Argonaut, why said to be the Son of Neptune, iv. 22.
- Erichthonius*, King of Athens, the Fable of his Birth, ii. 308. iii. 376. Invented the Use of Chariots, iii. 376, 377. He forms the Constellation of Bootes, 377, 407.
- Erichthonius*, the Son of Dardanus, King of Troy, iv. 250.
- Eridanus*, a River in Italy, now the Po, a Conjecture concerning this antient Name, ii. 391.
- Eridanus*, a Constellation, iv. 407.
- Erigone*, the Daughter of Icarius, her Death; Feasts instituted in honour of the Father and Daughter, iv. 404. Constellations which they form in the Heavens, ib. 407.
- Erigone*, the Daughter of Egistus and Clytemnestra, the Sister and Wife of Orestes, iv. 265. Was consecrated to the Service of Diana, 266.
- Eriphile*, the Wife of Amphiaraus, iii. 394. iv. 194. Sold her Husband for a Necklace, iv. 188.
- Erisichton*, his canine Hunger; eats up himself, iv. 398.
- Erminful*. See Irminful.
- Eros*, the Son of Chronos, i. 96.

I N D E X.

- Erestratus*, who burnt the Temple of Ephesus, i. 224.
- Erotidia*, Feasts in honour of Cupid, i. 303.
- Ericia*, a Canton of Sicily, iv. 107.
- Erycina*, an Epithet of Venus, ii. 334. See Mount Eryx.
- Erymanthus*, a Forest of Arcadia; the Boar of Erymanthus, iv. 86.
- Erynnies*, the Epithet of the Furies, its Etymology, iii. 76.
- Erythius*, a Name given to Hercules, iv. 124.
- Eryx*, King of Sicily, was defeated by Hercules, iv. 107.
- Eryx*, a Mountain in Sicily, the Temple that Venus had there; the Work which Dedalus made there for that Temple, iii. 525.
- Esacus*, the Son of Priam, the Occasion of his Death; his Transformation into a Didapper, iv. 139, 399. Had the Gift of Prophecy, the Prediction which he pronounced to his Father, ibid.
- Eschinades*, Isles newly formed, Fables relating to these Isles, iv. 98.
- Esculapius*, that we must seek for the true Esculapius in Egypt, or in Phenicia, iii. 154. That there were several Esculapius's, ibid. 160. Of the Greek Esculapius, his Birth, 155. Fictions intermixed with it, 156. Passed for the God of Physic, 157, 160. His Descendants, 159. His Death, 161. His Worship propagated to several Countries, how he was represented, 162. How his Worship was established at Rome, 163. The Constellation which he formed in the Heavens, 158. Whether Esculapius was one of the Argonauts, 159.
- Esculapia*, or Æsculapia, a Festival of Esculapius, i. 309.
- Esen*, the Son of Cretheus, iii. 393. Was dethroned by Pelias, iv. 8. Was the Father of Jason, ibid. He is restored to Youth by Medea, 63.
- Ejus* or Hesus, the great Divinity of the Gauls, who this God was, ii. 316. iii. 256, 257. How he is represented upon Bas-Reliefs, 258. When his Worship began to diminish, 267.
- Elymetus*, the Epithet of Bacchus, ii. 454.
- Etecretes*, antient Inhabitants of Crete, iii. 516.
- Eternity* of one supreme Being acknowledged by the Antients, i. 119. Eternity, a Roman Goddess, iii. 125.
- Etesippus*, the Son of Hercules and Aspidamia, iv. 112.
- Etheacles*, King of Orchomenos, called the Father of the Graces, ii. 351.
- Etheacles* and Polynices, Sons of Oedipus and Jocasta, iv. 182. The Origin of their mutual Hatred, their Death, 186, &c.

I N D E X.

- Æt.* Their Diffensions manifested even after their Death, 191. They had heroic Honours paid them, ibid. The Poets however place them in Tartarus, iii. 23.
- Etheocles*, one of the seven Chiefs in the Theban War, his Character, iv. 202.
- Ethiopia*, that the Antients knew two Ethiopias, iii. 458.
- Ethiopians*, who their Gods were, i. 572. They consecrated to the Sun Cinnamon; how they gathered that Plant, 573.
- Ethra*, the Wife of Egeus and Theseus, iv. 131. Becomes Helen's Slave, 142. Was returned to her Grandson after the Siege of Troy, ibid.
- Etolus*, the Son of Endymion, gave his Name to Etolia, iii. 390. His Descendants, ibid.
- Etolians*, the War of the Etolians and Curetes under the Walls of Calydon, iv. 173.
- Evan*, an Appellation of Bacchus, ii. 447.
- Evander*, an Arcadian by Birth, plants a Colony in Italy, iv. 90. Receives Hercules at his Court, and honours him, even in his Lifetime as a God, ibid. He gained the Veneration of the People, ibid. Had divine Honours conferred upon him by them after his Death, iii. 207. He introduced into Italy the Worship of the several Divinities, i. 539. iii. 206.
- Eubages*, or Vates, Ministers of Religion among the Gauls, iii. 226.
- Eudora*, one of the Hyades, ii. 278.
- Evemerion*, worshipped at Sicyon as a God, iii. 179.
- Evedoracus* or Evedoriscus, who he was in the Theogony of the Chaldeans, i. 86.
- Everes*, the youngest of the Sons of Pterelas survived his Brothers, iv. 75.
- Evcrez*, the Son of Hercules and Parthenope, iv. 112.
- Eumeus*, an old Domestic of Ulysses, his Master conceals himself at his House, iv. 302.
- Eumenides*, the Appellation of the Furies; what the Word imports, iii. 77.
- Eumenidia*, Feasts of the Furies, i. 303.
- Eumolpus*, was Hieriphante to the Eleusinian Mysteries, iii. 61.
- Eunomia*, the Daughter of Jupiter and Themis, i. 116.
- Eunomus*, a Musician of Locris, the Service done him by a Grasshopper, iv. 442.
- Evedocus*, a Doctor of the Chaldeans, i. 85.
- Evocations*, three Sorts of them, i. 320. The most solemn and the most antient was that of the Souls of the Dead, i. 431.

I N D E X.

- i. 431. Whom the Magicians pretended to call up, 432.
Evoke, the Cry of the Bacchanals, ii. 446, 456, 459.
Euphemus, one of the Argonauts, iv. 20. And their Pilote, iv. 23. The History of the Clod of Earth given to Euphemus by the Triton, 52, 53.
Euphrosyne, one of the three Graces, i. 117. See Graces.
Euriganea, the second Wife of Oedipus, iv. 184. Her Death, 185.
Eurises, a Gallic Word which is found on an Inscription, what it signifies, iii. 252.
Eurythnians, a People in Etolia; Ulysses, after his Death received heroic Honours in their Country, iv. 304.
Europa, the Daughter of Agenor King of Phenicia, her Rape,
 iii. 400. Her Children, ii. 169. iii. 402. Receives divine Honours in Crete under the Name of Minerva, and among the Sidonians under the Name of Astarte, 403, 404. Who is the Jupiter who ravished Europa, ii. 164.
Europe, one of the Parts of the World, whence it got its Name, i. 60. iii. 404.
Europe, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
Eurotas, a River of Laconia worshipped by the Lacedemonians, ii. 479.
Euryale, one of the Gorgons, i. 114. iii. 438.
Euryalus, one of the Argonauts, and one of the Leaders of the Argives at the Siege of Troy, iv. 23, 216.
Eurybates, one of the Argonauts, famous for the Game of the Coit, iv. 20.
Eurybia, or Euribea, the Daughter of Pontus and Terra, i, 114. Her Children, ibid.
Eurybia, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
Eurydamas, one of the Argonauts, iv. 23.
Eurydice, the Wife of Orpheus, her Death; Orpheus goes to Hell in search of her, iv. 160, 162. See Orpheus.
Eurylnus, the Son of Menecus, one of the Grecian Heroes,
 iii. 431.
Eurymedon, a Giant beloved by Juno, ii. 239.
Eurymedon, Agamemnon's Charioteer slain with him, iv. 260.
Eurymene, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
Eurynome, the Mother of the three Graces, i. 117.
Eurynome, the Wife of Jupiter, ii. 169.
Eurypilus, Prince of Cyrenaica, who was serviceable to the Argonauts, the Fable relating to him, iv. 52.
Eurypilus, the Grandson of Hercules, his History and Death,
 iv. 335.
Eurystheus King of Mycenæ, his Genealogy, iii. 364. iv. 74.
 He persecutes Hercules and his Children, iv. 79. He is slain

I N D E X.

- slain by Hillis the Son of Hercules, 127.
Eurytus, the Son of Augias, slain with his Father by Hercules, iv. 87.
Eurytus, King of Oecalia, slain by Hercules, why, iv. 107.
Eurytus, one of the Giants who made War upon the Gods, his Death, ii. 168.
Eusebius, a Name given to Bacchus, ii. 448.
Euterpe, one of the Muses, ii. 432.
Expiation, what Act of Religion this was, i. 417. There were several Sorts of it. Expiations for Prodigies, 418.
 Expiation for Homicide, ibid. Expiation of Cities, 421.
 Expiation of Armies, ibid. Private Expiations, 422.
Expiator, an Epithet given to Jupiter, ii. 226.
Extispices, or the Manner of divining by Inspection of the Entrails, i. 270, 407. Etymology of the Word, 270, 404.

F.

- FABLES, Division of the Fables, i. 4, 30. Various Systems proposed for the Explanation of the Fables, 9, 12, 17, 20, &c. The Country where Fables took their Rise, 14, 15. Conjectures as to the Sources of Fables, 32-to 76. That Greece was the most fertile Country in Fables, 78.
Fabulinus, a tutelary God of Children, i. 197. iii. 192.
Faith, or Fidius, a Divinity who had Temples, and was in high Veneration, iii. 131.
Fame, a Divinity, her Worship, her Origin, her Portraiture, iii. 144.
Fatalities affixed to the City of Troy, iv. 225.
Fatidica, what Sort of Signs so called, i. 400.
Fatua, the Wife of Faunus, also named Fauna. Her Chastity made her be honoured under the Name of Good-Goddesses, ii. 555, 598.
Favour, taken into the Number of Divinities, iii. 181, 198.
Faula, a Goddess, Hercules's Mistress, iii. 194.
Fauna. See Fatua.
Faunalia, a Festival in honour of Faunus, i. 311.
Faunus, King of Italy, at what Time he lived, ii. 598. Why said to be the Son of Mars, why made a rural Divinity, ibid. He is often confounded with Pan and Sylvanus, i. 540. ii. 599.
Fear, by whom engendered, i. 117.
Fear and Paleness, Divinities, iii. 143. How represented, 144. The Temple of Fear at Rome, and at Sparta, ibid.
 Fear of Evil one of the Sources of Idolatry, i. 165, 181.
Februata, a Name given to Juno, ii. 242.

Feciales,

I N D E X.

- Feciales*, what were the Functions of those Priests, i. 296.
- Fecundity*. See Fruitfulness.
- Felicity*, a Roman Goddess, the Opinion of St. Augustine concerning this Goddess, iii. 121.
- Feralia*, a Festival of the Dead, instituted by Eneas, i. 311.
- Feretrius*, an Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 217.
- Feriæ Latinæ*, a Roman Festival, i. 312.
- Feronia*, a Goddess who was in high Veneration through all Italy, iii. 197.
- Ferula*, a Plant, its Property, ii. 285.
- Fessoria*, a Goddess who presided over Repose, iii. 194.
- Feasts*, the Feasts of Religion, i. 266. Feasts for the Gods, 295. Gods of Feasts, iii. 152.
- Festivals* of the Greeks, i. 298 to 306. Festivals of the Romans, 306 to 316. Of the Egyptians and other Nations, ii. 556.
- Fetivæ Dæ*, Roman Divinities, iii. 193.
- Fever*, a Divinity, iii. 139.
- Fidius*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 224.
- Fidius*, who this Divinity was, iii. 132.
- Fire*, who found out the Use of Fire, according to the Phenicians, i. 91. Fire stole from Heaven by Prometheus, ii. 28c. The Meaning of this Fable, 284.
- Fire* (sacred), the Worship of Fire established among the Chaldeans, i. 183. ii. 570. Among the antient Persians, i. 177. ii. 95, 98. Among the Romans, ii. 570. Among the Gauls, iii. 220. This Worship still subsists in the Indies, i. 177. And in several Countries of America, ii. 570. Under what Names the Fire was adored, i. 196, 492. How they sacrificed to it, ii. 97. Divination by Fire. See Pyromancy.
- Fires of Castor and Pollux, what they are, iv. 150.
- Fires (Nocturnal) what, i. 415.
- Fishes*, worshipp'd in several Places, i. 203. There were of of them consecrated to certain Divinities, 264. Why the Syrians abstained from eating Fish, 553. ii. 32.
- Fishes*, or Pisces, one of the Signs of the Zodiac, i. 195. iv. 408.
- Flagellation* (Feast of) or Diamastigosis, where, and how it was celebrated, i. 304.
- Flamines*, Priests of the Romans, their Number, their Privileges; the Veneration that was paid to them, i. 292.
- Flaminicæ*, Wives of the Flamines, i. 294.
- Fleece* (Golden) the Fable of the Golden Fleece, i. 29. iv. 5, 6. What it was, iv. 43. See Jasôn, Argonauts.
- Flies*,

I N D E X.

- Flies*, worshipped in Acarmania, i. 203. The Gods of Flies, i. 199. ii. 57. Hercules called Fly-Hunter, iv. 121.
- Flora*, a Goddess who presided over Corn, i. 198.
- Floral Games*, by whom instituted, ii. 578. How they were celebrated, and at what Time, ibid. iv. 451, 452. Cato absents himself from them, 579.
- Flora*, the Earth worshipped under that Name, i. 196.
- Flora*, a famous Courtesan in Rome, her History, ii. 575. She was made the Goddess of Flowers, ibid. That there was a Flora before the Foundation of Rome, 577.
- Florida*, the People of that Country worship the Sun, i. 144.
- Fluonia*, a Goddess of Women in Child-bed, i. 197.
- Flower*, offered in Sacrifice at first, i. 255, 269.
- Flute*, the Origin of the Flute. See Pan. Marsyas.
- Flux* and reflux of the Sea. The Opinion of the Chinese Philosophers relating to this Subject, i. 147.
- Flyas*, a Goddess of the Germans, how she was represented, iii. 331.
- Fly-hunters*, God's Fly-hunters. See Beelzebub.
- Fo* or Foe, the Idol of the Indians, i. 147.
- Fountain*, Tutelar Divinities of each Fountain, i. 45. Fountains that delivered Oracles, 346. Veneration for the Fountain of Amphiaraus, iv. 196.
- Fontinalia*, Roman Festivals, i. 311.
- Forculus*, a God of the Gates, i. 198. iii. 195.
- Fordicalia*, Roman Festivals, i. 311.
- Fornacalia*, Festivals in honour of the Goddess Fornax, i. 311.
- Fortune*, a Divinity who is no other than Destiny, iii. 147. The Origin of her Worship in Greece, how she was represented, 148, 149, 150, 151. The Places where she was worshipped, that she was confounded with the Parcæ, and with the Lots, 149, 150. Temples raised to her Honour, i. 192, iii. 250. Worship paid also to Bad Fortune, 152.
- Fox* that made a Havock of the Country about Thebes, transformed into a Stone, iv. 379.
- Fraud*, a Divinity, how represented, iii. 135.
- Friendship*, deified by the Romans, how represented, iii. 180.
- Fruetusea*, the Goddess of the Harvest, ii. 591.
- Fruitfulness*, a Roman Divinity, iii. 138.
- Fruits* of the Earth offered to the Gods, i. 254, 258. That oftentimes nothing was presented to them but Fruits, 269.
- Fulgura*. See Thunder, iii. 193.
- Funerals* of the Egyptians, the Origin of the Infernal Regions

I N D E X.

ons of the Greeks; the Description of the Ceremonies therein used, iii. 3.

Furies, the Doctrine of Furies wisely invented, iii. 73: Whence it took its Rise, 75: Their Functions, their Number and Names, 76, 77. The Worship that was paid to them, their Temples, their Sacrifices, 78, 79, 80. How they were represented, 81.

Furina, the Goddess of Thieves among the Romans, i. 311: She had a Priest named Flamen Furinalis, and a Festival named Furinalia, i. 311. iii. 80, 81: That she is the same with the Furies, ibid. iii. 198.

Futurity, whether it would be beneficial to know Futurity; i. 436. The Desire of knowing future Events, a Source of many Superstitions. See Divination, Magick, Astrology:

G.

GABIA, one of Juno's Epithets, ii. 244.

Gad, the Name of a Son of Zilpa, Leah's Hand-maid; what it signifies, i. 168. iii. 148.

Gadez, a City in Spain, the Worship that was there ascribed to Hercules: His magnificent Temple, i. 578, 582, iii. 303. iv. 95, 96. The Punishment of a King who was going to rife this Temple, 96. How Hercules was there represented, 304.

Galantis, the Slave of Alcmena, transformed into a Weasel, why, iv. 78.

Galatea, a Nymph beloved of Polyphemus, ii. 531, iv. 293.

Galaxia, a Festival to Apollo, i. 303.

Galaxora, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531:

Galli, or Archi-Galli, Priests of Cybele, a very contemptible Generation. Whence they got that Name, i. 286. ii. 563. Their Character, i. 287. They castrated themselves in honour of Atys, 287, 288. Their Chief was called Archigallus. His Garb or Habit, 288. They were also named Corybantes, ii. 562, 565, 566.

Gamelia, an Epithet of Juno, ii. 242. The nuptial Feast celebrated in honour of her, i. 305.

Gamelion, the Name of the Month of January among the Greeks, ibid.

Games of the Greeks and Romans, what they were, their Origin, iv. 409, &c. At what Time they were celebrated; 410. To whom they were consecrated, ibid. Preparations for those Games; Honours conferred on the Conquerors, 411, 412. The Motives for the Institution of them, 412. Several Kinds of Games, 413. The Founders of those Games, 414. Places appropriated to the Celebration of them, 421. Games,

- Games, Olympic*, iv. 424.
 — Pythian or Pythic, iv. 432.
 — Nemean, iv. 435.
 — Isthmic, iv. 436.
 — Scenic, iv. 438.
 — Gymnic, iv. 454.
 — Floral, iv. 451.
 — Trojan, or of the Youth, iv. 443.
 — Ætiac, iv. 448.
 — Capitoline, iv. 446.
 — of Ceres, iv. 447.
 — of Augustus, iv. 446,
 — Astyc, iv. 448.
 — of Castor and Pollux, iv. 449.
 — celebrated in the Camps, iv. 449.
 — Megalesian, iv. 450.
 — celebrated in the Roman Empire, iv. 452.
 — of the Circus or Circensian, iv. 453.
 — of the Cross-Streets or Compitales, iv. 454.
 — Decumani, ibid.
 — Equestrian, ibid.
 — of the Leaves, ibid.
 — of the Gladiators, ibid.
 — Lustral, or Rubigalia, ibid.
 — Instaurative, ibid.
 — of Mars, ibid.
 — Novendiles, iv. 455.
 — Palatine, ibid.
 — of the Fishers, Piscatorii, ibid.
 — Plebeian, ibid.
 — Pontifical, ibid.
 — Sacerdotal, ibid.
Games, called Quæstorii, ibid.
 — Triumphal, ibid.
 — Votive, ibid.
 — Sigillares, ibid.
Games called Taurii, ibid.
 — Secular, iv. 456.
Ganges, the Veneration of the Indians for this River, still subsisting at this Day, ii. 478.
Ganymede, the Son of Tros King of Troy, carried off by Tan- talus King of Lydia, iv. 213. Why said to be ravished by Jupiter transformed into an Eagle, ibid. i. 29. ii. 164.
 iii. 114.
Garamantis, Children whom she had by Jupiter, ii. 170.
 L I Gar-

I N D E X.

- Gardens*, Gods of Gardens, i. 198. ii. 575, &c.
- Gates*, Gods of the Gates, i. 198. ii. 264, 265.
- Gauls*, their Religion, iii. 212. Whence they derived it, 214. A Comparison between their Religion and that of the ancient Persians, 217. The Changes in their Religion from the Time of Julius Cæsar, iii. 219. Their Temples, 221. Their sacred Groves, 222. Their Ministers of Religion, 225. See Druids. Their Superstitions, iii. 246. Gods of the Gauls from 268 to 291.
- Gauntlet-fight*, iv. 418.
- Gauri*, or Guebri, or Pharjis, a People in Persia, their Religion more refined, i. 179. ii. 94, 101.
- Gaza*, a City of the Philistines, their Divinity, ii. 2.
- Ge*, the Sister and Wife of Uranus, i. 92, 95.
- Geinus Atocthon*, the Explanation of this Word, i. 92.
- Gelanor*, King of Argos, dethroned by Danaus, iii. 358, 363.
- Genea* and Genus, who they were according to the Phenicians, i. 91.
- Generations*, the ten first Generations according to the Chaldeans, i. 86. According to the Phenicians, i. 94. The ten second Generations, 95. The Grecian Manner of computing by Generations in the fabulous Age; the Duration which they assigned to each Generation, iii. 341.
- Genii*, Men of the Golden Age became good Genii, according to Hesiod, i. 119. ii. 255.
- Genii*, of the Nature of Genii, i. 466. The Platonic Philosophers believed the Existence of them, ibid. What Conceptions they had of their Nature, 471. In what Class of Gods they reckoned them, 465. The Worship that was paid to them, 472. The Worship that is still paid to them in idolatrous Countries, and especially in America, 142, 179. What Socrates's Genius was, 473. A Genius allotted to every Man, 205, 471. Whence came the Idea of Genii, 121. Who were the good Genii, and the subterranean Genii, 119. The familiar Genii of the Gauls, iii. 287. Tutelar Genii of the Provinces and Towns of the Gauls, 288.
- Geography*, the Ignorance of that Science one Source of Fables, i. 74.
- Geomancy*, a Kind of Divination, i. 393.
- Gerane*. See Oence.
- Geranians*. See Pageans.
- Gereræ*, the Names of fourteen Women who assisted the Queen of the Sacrifices at Athens, i. 284.
- Gereſtia*, a Festival to Neptune, i. 303.
- Germans*, the Origin of the People, iii. 306. Their Religion

I N D E X.

- gion pretty much of a Piece with that of the Gauls, 307, 312, 313. Who their Gods were, 308. That they had no other Temples but their Woods, 314. Their Superstitions, 315. Of some of their peculiar Divinities, 330. Of their Heroes, 332. Of the great Respect they had for their Women, 320.
- Geronthæa*, a Festival of Mars, i. 303.
- Geryon*, a Giant with three Heads, his Birth, i. 114. The Explanation of his Fable, iv. 88. Hercules carries off his Oxen, ibid.
- Getes*, the Gods of that People, ii. 147.
- Giants*, their Genealogy in the System of the Phenicians, i. 91. From whom they sprung, according to the Greeks, 113. What we are to understand by the Commerce of the Angels with the Daughters of Men, whose Offspring they are said to be, 121, 122. The Giants who attempted to dethrone Jupiter, ii. 167. Their Description, ibid. The Names of the Leaders; their Battle, their Overthrow, 168. The Explanation of this Fable of the Giants making War upon the Gods, ii. 205. Whether there were real Giants, 192. Various Opinions about it, 193, &c. Testimonies of Scripture proving their Existence, 194. The Testimony of profane Authors, Poets and Historians, 195, &c. Of modern Travellers, 199. an Examination of all these Proofs, 301, &c.
- Gigantophontis*, an Epithet given to Minerva, ii. 308.
- Ginnes* or Gennes, a Sort of Genii, i. 121.
- Gladiators*, the Combats of the Gladiators, iv. 419. The Fury of those Combats, 420, 421.
- Glauce*, the Daughter of Creon the Spouse of Jason; Medea puts her to Death, iv. 66.
- Glaucis*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Glaucus*, a famous Fisher transformed into a Sea-God, ii. 525, &c. How he was represented, ibid. The Explanation of this Fable, 526. His Apparition to the Argonauts, ibid.
- Glaucus*, the Son of Minos, the second of the Name, ii. 525.
- Glaucus*, the Father of Bellerophon, iii. 392. One of the Argonauts, iv. 23. His Death, 54.
- Glaucus*, another of the Argonauts who was drowned, was ranked among the Sea-Gods. iv. 23, 32.
- Glaucus*, the Grandson of Bellerophon, iii. 475. Joins in the Siege of Troy, iv. 60.
- Glicizonus*, the Son of Hercules by Dejanira, iv. 112.
- Goat*, that suckled Jupiter. See Amalthea.
- Goats*, the Veneration of the Egyptians for those Animals,

INDEX.

- Goetie,*

I N D E X.

- Goetie*, a Kind of Magic ; its Object ; what Rites were used therein, i. 427.
- Good God*, or the Good Genius, iii. 180.
- Good Goddess*, or Bona Dea, by whom invoked, i. 197.
The Earth worshipped under that Name, ii. 552. Feasts celebrated at Rome in honour of her, 553.
- Good Goddess Celestial*, or Cælestis Bona Dea, iii. 198.
- Gorgons*, their Birth, i. 114. What the Poets and Historians have said of them, iii. 437, &c. Various Explanations given of those Fables, 442, &c. What is most probable therein, 450. That there is in Libya an Animal called Gorgon ; its Figure, 443.
- Gorgophone*, the Daughter of Perseus, married Perieres King of Messenia, iii. 392. iv. 74.
- Goslings*, consecrated to Juno, ii. 246.
- Graces*, their Birth, their Number and Names, i. 117. ii. 348, 349. Their Attributes, 349, 352, 354. How they were represented, 350. The Worship that was paid to them, 351. Monuments consecrated to them, 352. Favours expected from them, 353. Their Names explained, ibid.
- Gradivus*, the Surname of Mars as God of War, ii. 318.
- Graiaæ*, the Name of the Daughters of Phorcis, whence derived, i. 114.
- Grashopper*, consecrated to Apollo, why, ii. 417. A Story told of a Grashopper, iv. 442. The Singing of the Grashopper, what, ibid.
- Gratitude* of People to their Benefactors, a Source of many Fables, i. 49, 50.
- Great Britain*, or England, the Religion of that People like that of the Gauls. Their Gods, iii. 301.
- Great Mother*, a Designation given to the Earth, or Cybele, ii. 552.
- Greece*, the State of ancient Greece ; the History of its first Inhabitants, i. 48. iii. 347. The first Colonies that arrived there, iii. 356.
- Greeks*, their Theogony derived from Orpheus and Hesiod, i. 110. That it is a monstrous Composition of History and Fable, 118. Who those were whom they reckoned Gods, i. 46, 120. That theirs is the most monstrous and superstitious of all Religions, 152, &c.
- Groves* (sacred), their Origin from the Beginning of Idolatry, i. 239. In Use among the ancient Gauls, ii. 221. Among the Americans, i. 141. Where the sacred Groves commonly were ; a Law against cutting or wasting them, 239, &c. Moses forbids to plant Groves round the Altars

I N D E X.

- of the true God, and commands to cut down those that were consecrated to Idols, 240. Altars built in the sacred Groves, 233, 234.
- Guadalethe*, a River in Spain; that it may be the River Lethæ in Hell, iii. 44, 45.
- Guadalquivir*, another River in Spain, formerly the Betis, iii. 43. In the Note.
- Guebri*, or Gauri. See Gauri.
- Gyara*. See Alycone.
- Gyges*, one of the Titans; the Birth of that Giant, i. 113. He is condemned to the Gulph of Tartarus, 116.
- Gymnastic*, what was the Gymnastic of the Ancients. The Etymology of the Word, iv. 417. Of what Exercises it consisted, 413.
- Gymnic Games*, how they combated therein; why so called, iv. 454.
- Gymnosophists* of the Indies, whether the Druids were descended from them, iii. 227, 228.

H.

- HALCIONE*, the Daughter of Atlas, i. 108.
- Halcjon*. See Alcyone.
- Hali*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Halicus*. See Agræus.
- Hamadryads*, what Nymphs they were, ii. 527.
- Hamburg*, to whom consecrated, iii. 333.
- Hammon*, one of the greatest Gods of Egypt, also named Jupiter, i. 16, 492. Whom the Egyptians adored under that Name, 195, 552.
- Hare*, a Constellation, whence formed, iv. 407.
- Harmonia*, or Hermione, whose Offspring she was, i. 117. Her Husband and Children, iii. 411. The fatal Present which Vulcan makes her, 412. The Etymology of her Name, 409, 413.
- Harpalice*, her Fable, iv. 394.
- Harpedophorus*, the Surname of Mercury, ii. 375.
- Harpocrates*, why represented holding a Finger on his Mouth, i. 181, 199, 529, 550. He is the Orus of the Egyptians, or the Sun, 530, 531.
- Harpies*, whose Daughters they were; their Names and Number, i. 114. iv. 34. Taken for the Furies, iii. 76. Their Figure; the Mischief they wrought, ibid. The Explanation of their Fable, 35.
- Haruspices*, or Aruspices, a Sort of Diviners among the Romans, their Functions, i. 266, 270, 404. Who were the

I N D E X.

- the most knowing of all the Haruspices, 405. The Origin of that Science, 404. Whence they drew their Presages, 406, 407.
- Harvests*, the Gods of Harvests, i. 198.
- Head of the Victim*, an Abomination to the Egyptians, i. 489.
- Hebe*, the Goddess of Youth, of whom she was born, and how, i. 117. ii. 239. Why said to renew Iolaus's Age, i. 77. iv. 24. Her Marriage in Heaven with Hercules, i. 117. iv. 112.
- Heaven*, or Cælus, the Origin of Heaven according to the Chaldeans, i. 81, 82. According to the Phenicians, 92. According to the Egyptians, 103. According to the Atlantides, 106. According to the Greeks, 112. His Marriage with the Earth, and his Children, ibid. How he is used by Saturn, 113.
- Hecate*, the Goddess who presided over Childbed, i. 197: iv. 245. The Triple Hecate. See Diana.
- Hecatomb*, a Sacrifice of a hundred Animals, i. 272.
- Hecatombæa*, a Festival of the Greeks, i. 303.
- Hecatombæus*, an Epithet given to Jupiter, ii. 225.
- Hecatombchires*, their Birth, i. 120.
- Hecatomphonia*, a Festival of the Lacedæmonians, i. 303.
- Hector*, the Son of Priam; the Destiny of Troy annexed to his Life, iv. 232. His Exploits, 233. He is slain by Achilles, 234. He had divine Honours paid him after his Death, 239.
- Hecuba*, Priam's second Wife; her Children, iv. 239. The frightful Dream she had when with Child of Paris, 340. What became of her after the taking of Troy, 243, 244, 245. Whose Daughter she was, 245.
- Helen*, the Daughter of Tyndarus, her Birth, iv. 343. Was carried off by Theseus, ibid. 141. The true Cause of her Rape by Paris, iv. 212. Married to Menelaus, 142, 344. Carried off a second Time by Paris, 211, 214. Her Death, 344. She had Temples erected to her, 344, 345. Difficulties in Chronology as to her Age, 345.
- Helenus*, the Son of Priam and Hecuba, iv. 205, 239. Married Andromache, and succeeded Pyrrhus King of Epirus, 240. His Children, 241. Had the Gift of Prediction, 242, 400.
- Heliaci*, a Name given to the Priests of Mithras, i. 289.
- Heliades*, Phaeton's Sisters transformed into Trees, ii. 390. Explained, 391.

I N D E X.

- Helicon*, a Mountain in Beotia consecrated to the Muses, ii. 430, 435.
- Heliconiades*, an Epithet of the Muses, ii. 430.
- Helinophagi*, a People in the Neighbourhood of the Troglydytes, why so called, i. 137. Heliogabalus the Emperor, the odd Pleasure he indulged himself in at the Expence of the Parasites, iii. 530.
- Helion*, the Son of Rhea, his Wisdom; his Death; communicates his Name to the Sun, i. 107.
- Heliospolis*, a City in Egypt, the Oracle of Apollo that was there, i. 333. A Festival that was celebrated there, 559. There they also adored an Ox Apis named Mnevis, 519.
- Helisson*, one of Lycaon's Sons, iii. 354.
- Hell*, the Gods of Hell, iii. 1. Whence the Greeks took all their Notions of Hell, 2. The Sentiments of the Greek Philosophers on this Subject, 6. The Sentiments of the Poets, and the Description which they have given thereof, 8, 16. Of the infernal Rivers, 34. Of the Judges of Hell, 41. Journeys of several Heroes to Hell. Worship paid to the infernal Gods, 102.
- Helle*, the Daughter of Athamas, the Sister of Phrixus, iii. 394. Her Death, iv. 5. Communicated her Name to the Hellepont, ibid.
- Hellen*, the Son of Deucalion, iii. 389. Where he reigned, 390. His Descendants, ibid. The Privilege of his Descendants, 431.
- Hellenians*, whence the Greeks derived that Name, iii. 390, 431.
- Hellenism*, one of the four ancient Religions, more ancient than Judaism, i. 162.
- Hellepont*, a Part of the Archipelago, whence it got its Name, iv. 5.
- Hellotes*, the Surname of Europa, its Etymology, iii. 403.
- Hellotia*, a Festival in honour of Europa, ibid.
- Hellotis*, an Epithet of Minerva, why it was given to her, ibid.
- Hematbion*, the Son of Aurora and Cephalus, i. 117.
- Heimus*, King of Thrace transformed into a Mountain, iv. 367.
- Henctes*, a People in Italy, now the Venetians, iv. 307.
- Heniochus*, or Auriga, the Charioteer, a Constellation, iv. 407.
- Henochia*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 244.
- Hepatoscopy*, a Sort of Divination, i. 393.
- Hephaisteia*,

I N D E X.

- Hephaisteia*, one of the Feasts of Lamps, i. 305. See Lamps.
- Hephestus*. See Vulcan.
- Hera*, the Surname of Juno, ii. 235. A Name given also to Isis, i. 105.
- Heraclea*, Feasts in Honour of Hercules, i. 303.
- Heracidae*, or the Descendants of Hercules, driven out of the Peloponnesus, whereof they afterwards make themselves Masters, iii. 378. iv. 127. Their Return makes a principal Æra in History, iv. 130.
- Herbs*, the first Offerings made to the Gods were nothing but Herbs, i. 254, 255.
- Hercules*, that there were several Heroes of that Name, iv. 72. That they attributed the Exploits of all the rest to one, i. 44, 45, 74.
- Hercules the Phenician*, is the most ancient of all, i. 97. See the Note. 490, 491, 582. His Temple at Tyre, 578. His Worship brought to Carthage, and from thence propagated through Africa and Europe, ibid. He found out the Art of dying purple, iv. 113.
- Hercules the Egyptian*, one of the twelve great Gods of Egypt, i. 490. He who raised the famous Pillars in Africa, iv. 72.
- Hercules Idean*, or of Crete, who instituted the Olympic Games, i. 63. iv. 73, 425, 426.
- Hercules of Greece*, whose Name was taken from the Hercules of the Egyptians, i. 490. His Genealogy, i. 117. iv. 74. His Birth, iv. 76. He is subject to Eurystheus, 79. Juno persecutes him, ii. 237. iv. 79. He crushes two Serpents in his Cradle, 82. The Explanation of the Labours of Hercules, ibid. Slays the Lion of Nemea, ibid. Kills the Hydra, 84. The Boar of Erymanthus, 86. Cleans Augias's Stables, 87. Carries off the Cretan Bull, and Diomedes's Mares, 87, 88. Defeats Geryon, 88. Defeats Antæus, 92. Rescues the Hesperides, ii. 274. iv. 93. Why Atlas is said to have rested upon him his Load of the World, ii. 275. iv. 93. The Pillars of Hercules, i. 28. iii. 303, 450. iv. 95, 112, in the Note. He kills the Eagle that preyed upon Prometheus, 96. He tears off a Horn of the River Achelous, i. 29. ii. 488. iv. 97. His Descent to Hell, iii. 53. iv. 98. He combats Death, and delivers Alcestes, iv. 100. Defeats the Amazons, 101. Delivers Hesione, takes Vengeance on Laomedon, 103, 104. Remains three Days in the Belly of a Monster, ibid. 105. His Death owing to Dejanira, 108. His Wives and Children, 111. His Apotheosis and Worship, 115. His Marriage

I N D E X.

- Marriage in Heaven with Hebe, i. 117. iv. 112. His several Names, iv. 117. How he was represented, 126. His Arrows. See Arrows. His Descendants, 127. See Heracles.
- Herca*, a Festival in Honour of Juno, i. 307.
- Hercs*, the Goddess of Heirs, iii. 197, 201. Surnamed Martea, ibid.
- Hermaphroditus*, the Son of Venus and Mercury, iv. 367. The Etymology of the Name, ibid. See the Note.
- Hermapollus*, Statues of Apollo, i. 248.
- Hermathenæ*, Statues of Minerva, ibid.
- Hermaia*, Feasts of Mercury, i. 303.
- Hermeros*, Statues of Cupid, i. 248.
- Hermes's* or Termes, Statues of Mercury so called: their Figure, i. 248.
- Hermes*, the Name of Mercury: its Etymology, ii. 374.
- Hermes Trismegistus*, he is the Thot or Thoautus of the Phenicians, i. 88, 101. One of the great Gods of the Egyptians, 105. The Works that are attributed to him; the Time when he lived, ii. 365.
- Hermione*, See Harmonia.
- Hermione*, the Daughter of Menelaus and Helen, the Wife of Orestes, iv. 264.
- Hermesians*, a People said to be in the Neighbourhood of Hell, and who therefore paid nothing for Charon's Boat, iii. 30.
- Hermotimus*, a Divinity of the Clazomenians, iii. 432.
- Heroes*, Origin of the Name of Heroe, iii. 424. What Period of Time was most fertile in Heroes, i. 62. iii. 428. That none could be Heroes, who were not descended from Gods, i. 61. That the Fictions of the Poets impair the Glory of the Heroes instead of exalting it, i. 33, 36. Worship paid to Heroes distinct from that of the Gods, i. 455. iii. 425. At what Time this Worship began, iii. 426. What we are to understand by the Tombs of the Heroes, 427. Of the Heroes and Heroins of Greece, 429.
- Herceus* or Erceus, an Epithet given to Jupiter, i. 198. ii. 226.
- Herse*, the Daughter of Cecrops, beloved by Mercury, iii. 376. Had a Temple at Athens, 377.
- Hersilia*, the Wife of Romulus, ranked among the Goddesses under the Name of Horta, iii. 204.
- Herta*, a Name under which the Germans worshipped the Earth, iii. 310, 313.
- Herviones*. See Ingevones.

Hesione,

I N D E X.

- Hesione*, the Daughter of Laomedon, exposed to a Sea-Monster; delivered by Hercules; married to Telamon, i. 29. iv. 16, 105, 214.
- Hesperides*, their Genealogy; their Employment, i. 113. ii. 275. iv. 93. Golden Apples of the Garden of the Hesperides, i. 30. ii. 275. iv. 93, 94. The Rape of the Hesperides, and their Recovery, iv. 93.
- Hesperia*, what Countries so called, ii. 278.
- Hesperis*, the Wife of Atlas, her Children, ii. 274.
- Hesperitis*, what Country it was, ibid.
- Hesperus*, the Brother of Atlas, ii. 274, 278.
- Hesperus*, the Son of Atlas, a Constellation, i. 108.
- Hesus*. See Efus.
- Heveans*. See Achivians.
- Hierapolis*, or the sacred City in Syria, where Astarte was most worshipped, i. 27, &c.
- Hierarchy* of the Greeks and Romans, i. 281.
- Hierax* transformed into a Hawk; the Foundation of this Metamorphosis, i. 77.
- Hierocoraces*, Names of the Priests of Mitbras, i. 289.
- Hieroglyphics*, whether a Key to all the Tables is to be found in the Explanation of the Hieroglyphics, i. 9. What were the Hieroglyphics of Egypt, 562.
- Hierophantæ*, famous Priests at Athens; the Etymology of the Name; their Functions; the Honour that was given them, i. 282. What Qualifications they were to have for their Priesthood, 281. iii. 66.
- Hierophantides*, Wives of the Hierophantæ, their Functions, i. 282.
- High Places*, the Custom of sacrificing there very ancient, i. 143, 144, 235. See Sacred Groves.
- Hilaria*, the Wife of Castor, among the Heroins, iii. 434. iv. 150. See Phæbea.
- Hilaria*, jovial Feasts in Honour of Cybele, i. 311. ii. 553.
- Hilas*, the Son of Perseus, iv. 74.
- Hillus* or Hilus, the Son of Hercules and Dejanira, iv. 112. marries Iole who had been beloved by his Father, ibid. Slays Eurystheus, and is killed himself in a Duel, 127, 128.
- Hippo*, a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Hippo-Centaurs*, what Monsters they were, iv. 531, 533. The Explanation of this Name, 535.
- Hippocoon*, one of the Heroes Eponymes, iii. 430. Was slain with his Children by Hercules, iv. 106.
- Hippocrene*, a Fountain in Bæotia, its Origin, i. 66. See Aganippe.

Hippodamia,

I N D E X.

- Hippodamia*, the Daughter of Oenomaus King of Pisa, how Pelops got her to Wife, iv. 253, 254. Her Children; her Death, 256.
- Hippodamia*, or Deidamia, married to Pirithous, iii. 538. insulted by the Centaurs on the Day of her Marriage, ibid.
- Hippodetes*, a Name given to Hercules, iv. 125.
- Hippolitus*, the Son of Theseus, his unfortunate Death, iv. 518. He received divine Honours after his Death; the Constellation which he forms in the Heavens, ibid. A counterfeit Hippolitus who appeared in Italy, ibid.
- Hippolita*, or Antiope, an Amazon, the Wife of Theseus, Mother to Hippolitus, iv. 101.
- Hippolochus*, the Son of Bellerophon, iii. 475.
- Hippolytus*, one of the Giants who made War upon Jupiter, ii. 169.
- Hippomedon*, one of the Leaders in the Theban Expedition; His Character, iv. 202.
- Hippomenes*, the Son of Macareus. See Atalanta.
- Hippomona*, the Mother of Amphitryon, iv. 74.
- Hippona*, the Goddess of Horses and Grooms, i. 198. ii. 590.
- Hippothoe*, the Mother of Taphius, of the Race of Perseus, iii. 365, 466. iv. 74.
- Hippotus*, the Son of Alope, his History, iv. 406.
- Hippoton*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 434.
- Hippotus*, the Father of Eolus, the second of the Name; his Descendants, ii. 537.
- Hirie*, the Mother of Cygnus, transformed into a Pond, iv. 398.
- History*. That Tradition was prior to History, i. 33, 34. Source of Fables blended with History, 24, &c. Ignorance of History was the Cause of many Fables, 58. The Æra of ancient History, 61. iii. 336, 342, 344. The Utility of the Greek History, 339.
- Historians*, the Vanity of Historians the Source of several Fables, i. 35. At what Time profane Historians began, 61.
- Ho-Chang*, a Chinese Name, i. 136.
- Hobang-Ho*, a Chinese Divinity, the History of his Daughter, i. 146.
- Holocaust*, what Sort of Sacrifice it was, i. 562.
- Homer*, worshipped as a Demi-God, iii. 430. That he was not the Inventor of the Fables he delivers, i. 123.
- Homer Hebraizing*, the Author of that Book, his Sentiment as to the Origin of Fables, i. 57.

Homerites,

I N D E X.

- Homerites*, an Arabian Nation, the Gods whom they adored, i. 569.
- Homicide*, how the Expiation of Homicide was performed. i. 418, 419. Homicide honoured by the Corybantes, ii. 81.
- Honour*, a Divinity ; his Temple near that of Virtue, iii. 127.
- Hope*, a Divinity of the Romans, how represented, iii. 123.
- Hora*, the Daughter of Uranus, i. 96.
- Horæa*, Feasts of the four Seasons of the Year, i. 305.
- Horns*, whether it is possible that Horns may grow in Men, iv. 396.
- Horta*, the Goddess of Youth, i. 196. See Herfília.
- Horse Pegasus*. See Pegasus.
- Horse (Trojan)*, iii. 236.
- Horses*, their tutelar Divinity, i. 198.
- Horses of the Sun*, ii. 381, 383. What were the Horses of Laomedon promised to Hercules, iv. 104.
- Hospitalis*, an Epithet given to Jupiter, ii. 219.
- Hostilina*, a Goddess of Corn, i. 198. ii. 591.
- Hyacinth*, Apollo's Favourite, slain by that God, and transformed in a Flower, i. 29, 38. ii. 401. The Explanation of this Fable, ibid.
- Hyacinthia*, Feasts in honour of Hyacinth, i. 303.
- Hyades*, who they were ; their Names ; their Number ; the Etymology of the Name, ii. 278.
- Hyagnis*, the Father of Marsias, ii. 405. The Invention that is attributed to him, 406.
- Hyale*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 531.
- Hydra of Lerna*, whence it sprung, i. 114. Slain by Hercules ; what this Fable imports, iv. 84, &c.
- Hydria*, the God of Water among the Egyptians, how they represented him ; his Worship, i. 535. ii. 476.
- Hydromancy*, a Kind of Divination, i. 394.
- Hygeia*, an Epithet given to Minerva, ii. 310.
- Hygieia*, the Daughter of Esculapius, the Goddess of Health, i. 196, 200. iii. 159, 165. How she was represented ; the Veneration of the Romans for this Goddess, iii. 166.
- Hylas*, the Favourite of Hercules ; his Death ; of whom he was born, iv. 16. 103.
- Hyllonome* kills herself, iii. 538.
- Hymeneus*, or Hymen, the God of Marriage, i. 197. The Origin of the Word, ii. 249. The Genealogy of this God ; how she was represented, 250.
- Hymenæa*, Feasts of Hymen, ii. 249.
- Hyparetæ*, Ministers of the Temples, i. 283.
- Hyperboreans*, who those People were, ii. 141. Their long Life,

I N D E X.

- Life*, i. 74. The particular Worship they ascribed to Apollo. The Reason of that Worship, ii. 142, 143.
- Hyperion*, the Son of Uranus, his Death, i. 107.
- Hyperion*, the Son of Heaven and Earth, i. 113. ii. 291.
- His Children, i. 114. ii. 290. Why made the Father of the Sun and Moon, ii. 290.
- Hypermnestra*, the Daughter of Danaus, her laudable Disobedience, iii. 364. See Lyncæus.
- Hypoprophets*, or Delegates of the Prophets, a Sort of Ministers of the Temples, i. 284.
- Hyppotes*. See Arnus.
- Hypsiphile*, the Daughter of Thoas King of Lemnos, saves her Father's Life, iv. 30. Flies from Lemnos, 188. The Children she had by Jason, 31.
- Hypsistius*. See Elion, Acmon.
- Hypsiranius*, i. 91. See Memrumus.
- Hyrieus*, builds an Edifice for his Treasures; how it was robb'd, and how he discovered the Thief, i. 341.
- Hyricus*, the Father of Orion. See Orion.

I.

- IACRA*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Jagut*, or Jaug, a God of the Arabians, i. 570.
- Iamidæ* and Clytidæ, two Families set a-part for the Functions of the Augurs, i. 406.
- Janiculum*, a City built by Janus upon a Mountain of the same Name, ii. 262.
- Janira*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Iantbe*, the Name of a Nymph, ibid.
- Janus*, the God of the Gates, i. 198. First built Temples in Italy, ii. 263. His History, ii. 261. Why he had two Faces given him, 262, 267. He was reckoned the God of Peace; his Temple, 263. Worship that was paid to him, ibid. The Æra of his Arrival in Italy, 268.
- Japetus*, the Son of Uranus, and Brother of Saturn, i. 113. ii. 172, 175. His Children, 115. ii. 279. He is the same with Japhet the Son of Noah, ii. 150.
- Japhet*, the Son of Noah, i. 167. His Descendants, iii. 350, 351.
- Jasion* beloved by Ceres, i. 77. Of whom he was born, ii. 559. iii. 71. Marries Cybele; the Child whom he had by her; he is taken into the Number of the Gods, iii. 71. The Child he had by Ceres, 70.
- Jasius*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 429.
- Jaso*, the Goddess of Sicknefs, i. 196, 197. iii. 159, 165.
- Jason*, his Birth and Adventures till the Expedition to Colchis, iv. 8.

I N D E X.

- iv. 8. How he was induced to this Expedition, 11. He is declared Chief of the Argonauts, 15. He offers a Sacrifice before his setting out, 29. Is beloved by Medea, who makes him Master of the Golden Fleece, 40. The Explanation of the Fables interwoven with this History, 41, &c. He has Recourse to Circe to be expiated from the Murder of Abfyrthus, 47. Upon his Return he repairs to Corinth with Medea, 66. He divorces Medea after ten Years, ibid. His Death, 71.
- Javan*, the Son of Japhet, the Greeks descended from him, iii. 351.
- Javelin*, the Exercise of the Javelin, how practised, iv. 417, 419.
- Iberians*, the Religion of that People, iii. 302.
- Ibis*, a Bird in Veneration among the Egyptians, why, i. 547, 555.
- Icarus*, the Son of Dedalus, his Death, iii. 509.
- Icarus*, an Island, whence it derived its Name, i. 60.
- Icarian Sea*, whence so denominated, iii. 510.
- Icarius*, the Father of Penelope, i. 538. iii. 304. Learned from Bacchus the Art of planting the Vine; why he consecrates a Statue to Modesty, iv. 304, 305. His Family; his Death; the Constellation which he forms in the Heavens, 404.
- Icarus*, King of Caria, iv. 405.
- Ichneumon*, an Animal in Veneration among the Egyptians, why, i. 544, 548.
- Ictinus*, Architect to the Temple of Eleusis, i. 225.
- Ida*, a Nymph who nursed Jupiter, ii. 165.
- Ida*, the Mother of Minos II. iii. 514.
- Ida*, a Mountain in Crete, where the Use of Iron was discovered, ii. 212.
- Ida*, a Mountain in Phrygia, iv. 209, 310, 341.
- Idæus*, one of the Names of Jupiter, ii. 220.
- Idas*, one of the Argonauts, how he was slain, iv. 24, 150, 151.
- Idmon*, a famous Soothsayer, one of the Argonauts; his Family; his Death, iv. 24, 38.
- Idolatry*, the Etymology of the Word, i. 160. At what Time it commenced, 9, 72, 132, 162, 173. Its Rise in Egypt and Phenicia, 174, 176, 485. What was the first Object of Idolatry, 160, 176. That it commenced with the Worship of the Stars, 182. Of the Progress of Idolatry, 192 to 210. General Reflexions upon Idolatry, 474.
- Idols,*

I N D E X.

- Idols*, the Signification of the Name, i. 161. What the first Idols were, i. 91, 144, 193, 207, &c.
- Idomeneus*, King of Crete, his Genealogy, iii. 515. iv. 353. Signalizes himself at the Siege of Troy, iv. 216, 217, 234, 253. Whether he was the Founder of Salentum, 354. The Worship paid to him by the Cretans, 355.
- Idothea*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Idyia*, the Daughter of the Ocean, the Mother of Medea, i. 117.
- Jephthe*, whether the Sacrifice of Jephthe's Daughter is not the same with that of Iphigenia, i. 54, 218, 219.
- Jesabel*, Queen of Israel, introduced thither the Worship of Astarte, ii. 24. Her Genealogy, iv. 320, 321.
- Ignorance* of Letters or Writing, one Source of Fables, i. 33. As also Ignorance of Philosophy, 45. Of ancient History, 58. Of Languages, 65.
- Iliac Table*, where the principal Events of the Siege of Troy are represented, iv. 234.
- Ileffus*, a River of Attica, worshipped by the Athenians, ii. 479.
- Ilithia*, Hebe's Sister, ii. 239. The same with Lucina, ii. 242. Why they brought a Piece of Money into her Temple, ibid.
- Illyrians*, the singular Opinion entertained of that People, iii. 408.
- Ilus*, i. 93. See Chronus.
- Ius*, King of Troy, makes War upon Pelops, iv. 214. His Genealogy; his Posterity; the Duration of his Reign, 250.
- Imbrasia*, one of Juno's Appellations, ii. 243.
- Immarandus*, the Son of Eumolpus, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 431.
- Impudence*, a Divinity, iii. 149.
- Inachides*, the Name of Inachus's Descendants, iii. 358.
- Inachus*, of what Country he was a Native, i. 51. iii. 357. In what Age he lived, iii. 345, 346, 357. Founded the Kingdom of Argos, 357. His Posterity, 367. Derives his Name to the River Amphilocheus, and becomes the tutelar God thereof, 358.
- Inachus*, the Name of a River, iii. 358. The Dispute between Juno and Neptune for that River, 365, 366.
- Indies* (East), Gods there adored, i. 12, 135, &c. How Fables have been propagated thither, 73. The Opinion of that People concerning the Eclipses of the Moon, 46. See the Note. The Theogony of the Indians, 130, 135. Their

I N D E X.

- Their Opinion about the Formation of the World, 138.
 Of their Men with two Faces, 147.
Indiges, an Epithet given to Jupiter; who that Jupiter was, iv. 313.
Infernal Rivers. See Hell.
Influences of the Stars; whether the Stars can act upon Men, i. 433, 435.
Ingevones, a People in Germany, iii. 308, 329.
Ino, the Daughter of Cadmus, i. 117. iii. 417. Her History, i. 157. ii. 523. iv. 4. The Worship that was paid to her, ii. 523. Under what Name she was worshipped at Rome, 524.
Inoea, a Festival in Honour of Ino, i. 303.
Inscriptions, their Usefulness for the Knowledge of History, i. 28.
Intercido, a tutelary God of Children, i. 197.
Intercidona, a Goddess of Women in Child-bed, i. 197.
Inventor, one of Jupiter's Names, ii. 224.
Invincible, or Inviatus, an Appellation of Jupiter, ii. 217, 224.
Io, the Daughter of Inachus, transformed into a Heifer, i. 70, 498. The Explanation of this Fable, 499: That she is not to be confounded with the Ino of the Greeks, 500.
Iobates, King of Lycia, receives Bellerophon at his Court; what Command he lays upon him, iii. 467, 468. Gives him his Daughter in Marriage, 47.
Jocasta, the Daughter of Creon, marries Laius, iv. 180. her Misfortunes; her Death, 182.
Iodamia, the Mother of Deucalion, ii. 170.
Iodamia, transformed into Stone. A Heroine, iii. 434.
Iolaus, one of the Argonauts and Hunters of the Calydonian Boar, iv. 24. Was restored to his Youth by Hebe, ibid.
Iolas, slain by Hercules, iv. 81.
Iolas, one of the Argonauts, Hercules's Companion; wins the Prize in the Funeral Games, iv. 21, 54: Marries Megara one of Hercules's Wives, 82.
Iolaia, a Festival to Iolaus, i. 303.
Iolchos, a City of Theffaly, by whom built, iv. 8.
Iole, the Daughter of Eurytus King of Oechalia, ravished by Hercules, iv. 107.
Ion, the Son of Xutus and Creusa, his Exploits; communicates his Name to Ionia; his Death, iii. 396.
Ionia. See Ion.
Ionians, from whom they were descended, iii. 351, 396, 397.

I N D E X.

- 397, See the Note. Expelled the Peloponnesus by the Heracleidæ, iv. 129.
- Jeshua*, that he was known in several Countries, i. 51.
- Iou*, the true Name of Jupiter, ii. 174. iii. 266. The Etymology of the Name; the Celtæ gave him that Name, ibid.
- Jovialia*, a Festival in Honour of Jupiter, i. 307.
- Ioxides*, a People in Caria; their Original; the Veneration which they had for the Asparagus and Reeds, iv. 134.
- Izbianassa*, a Name common to the Daughter of Jephthe, and the Daughter of Agamemnon, i. 54. See the Note.
- Iphicles*, the Brother of Hercules, one of the Heroes, iii. 434.
- Iphiclus*, the Father of Protesilaus, one of the Argonauts, iv. 24. He wins the Prize at the Funeral Games, 54.
- Iphiclus*, another Argonaut, iv. 24.
- Iphigenia*, or Eryphile, the Daughter of Theseus and Helen, iv. 142, 218, 219.
- Iphigenia*, the Daughter of Agamemnon, was to have been sacrificed to Diana, iv. 218.
- Iphimedeia*, a Heroine, iii. 434.
- Iphimedia*, the Daughter of Triopas, the Mother of the two Giants Alcides, ii. 168. iii. 117. Was carried off with the Bacchanals, iii. 119.
- Iphis*, one of the Argonauts, iv. 25.
- Iphis*, who changed Sex, iv. 392.
- Iphis*, who hanged himself in Despair, ibid.
- Iphitus*, who renewed the Olympic Games, iv. 129, 426. See Games Olympic.
- Iphia*, a Surname of Minerva, ii. 309.
- Irene*, the Daughter of Jupiter and Themis, i. 116.
- Iris*, or the Rainbow, a Physical Divinity; the Etymology of the Name, she was Juno's Messenger; her Office, i. 116. ii. 376, 377. Her Genealogy, ii. 376.
- Irminful*, Erminful or Irminsus, the God of the ancient Germans, was their Mercury, ii. 374. iii. 320. His Temple; how he was represented; his Feasts, iii. 321, 322. That Temple destroyed by Charlemagne, 321.
- Iron*, the Art of forging Iron when invented, ii. 211. iii. 490.
- Iroquois*, a People in America, their Idea of the Formation of the World, i. 140.
- Ischys*, the Grandson of Arcas, iii. 355.
- Isæa*, Feasts in Honour of Isis, i. 303.
- Isiack*, the Isiack Table, a Monument of Antiquity, why so called, i. 561. The Explanation of this Table, and of

I N D E X.

- of the Figures it represents, 563. That Isis occupies the principal Place therein, 567.
- Isis*, that the Egyptians worship'd the Moon under that Name, i. 16, 103, 104, 185. What is signified by the Name Isis, 104, 496. Various Names of Isis, 105. Fables which the Egyptians delivered concerning Isis, 495, 496. Where they made the Soul of Isis to reside, 494. The Greeks confounded her with Io, 498. The true History of Isis, 501, 502. Votive Tables consecrated to Isis, 567. That Isis was worshipped in the Gauls, iii. 284. By the Suevi, iii. 325.
- Ismena*, the Daughter of Oedipus and Jocasta, iv. 182.
- Ismenus*, a River in Bœotia, ii. 413.
- Isse*, the Daughter of Macareus, beloved by Apollo, ii. 398.
- Iffedons*, Men who had but one Eye, i. 74. Who those People were, their Customs and their Religion, ii. 145.
- Istevones*, iii. 308. See Ingevones.
- Isthmus of Corinth*. The Dispute between Neptune and the Sun for the Property of the Isthmus, ii. 306.
- Isthmic Games*, by whom instituted, iii. 107. iv. 415, 437. By whom renewed, 138, 437. Were adopted by the Romans; how they were celebrated, 437, 438.
- Ithomatus*, an Appellation of Jupiter; where he was worshipped under that Name, ii. 220.
- Ithomæa*, a Festival to Jupiter, i. 302.
- Ithome*, the Wife of Minos the first, her Children, iv. 361.
- Ithobal*, King of Tyre, the Father of Jezabel, ii. 24.
- Itylus*, the Son of Zethus and Ædo, slain by his Mother, iv. 361.
- Ityphallephori*, Ministers of the Feasts of the Orgies, ii. 460.
- Itypballus*. See Phallus.
- Ilys*, the Son of Tercus and Progne, slain by his Mother; transformed into a Pheasant, iv. 358, 359.
- Juba*, King of Mauritania; worshipped as a God in that Country, i. 582.
- Judaism*, who was the Founder of it, i. 162.
- Juga*, one of Juno's Epithets, ii. 242.
- Jugatinus*, one of the Gods of Marriage, i. 197. ii. 252. And of Mountains, ii. 590.
- Judges for the Dead in Egypt*, iii. 4.
- Judges of Hell*. Whence the Greeks derived the Idea of those Judges, iii. 22, 27. Who they were, 22, 42. For what End appointed, 41. Where their Tribunal was placed, 42. The Distribution of Functions among those Judges, iii. 489.
- Julus*, the Son of Æneas. See Ascanius.

I N D E X.

- Julus*, the Son of Ascanius, resigns his Crown to Sylvius the Son of Æneas, iv. 313.
- Juno Moneta*. See Moneta.
- Juno*, one of the great Divinities of Egypt, i. 105, 492. Her History, ii. 235. Her Genealogy, i. 115. ii. 165, 235. Her various Names, ii. 235, 241. Her Marriage with Jupiter; Fables on this Subject, ii. 175, 235, 236. Her bad Agreement with Jupiter; her Intrigues, 238. Her Children, i. 117. ii. 238. How she was represented, 239. The Worship that was paid to her, 245, 247. Her Aversion to the Trojans, whence it sprung, iv. 207, 208.
- Juno* the Assyrian, or Astarte, ii. 245.
- Junonia*, a Festival of Juno at Rome, i. 307.
- Junones*, a Kind of Genii peculiar to Women, i. 205, 473. ii. 247.
- Jupiter*, a Name common to several Gods, i. 16, 44. ii. 161. His History according to the vulgar Opinion, 165. Who was the Jupiter Labourer, i. 95. His History according to a second Tradition, 170.
- Jupiter*, one of the great Gods of Egypt, i. 105, 492. His Genealogy according to the Egyptians, i. 105. According to the Atlantides, 108. According to the Greeks, 115, &c. ii. 165, &c. His Wives, his Children, i. 116, 117. ii. 169, 170. His Death; the Fate of his Descendants and of his Empire, ii. 177. An Explanation of the Fables intermixed with his History, ii. 179, &c. His Oracles, i. 329, 332, 345. His various Names, ii. 216. How he was represented, ii. 227 to 233. The Worship that was paid him, ii. 233. In what Age he lived, 292.
- Jupiter Olympian*, his Temple at Athens, i. 225. ii. 227.
- Justice*, a Divinity, i. 198. iii. 137, 138. How she was represented, iii. 137. What Divinities presided over Justice, i. 199. ii. 138.
- Juturna*, a Goddess of Health, i. 196. A Goddess of Aid, iii. 193.
- Juventa*, a tutelar Goddess of Children, i. 197.
- Ivy*, a Shrub consecrated to Bacchus, why, ii. 447, 454, 460.
- Ixion*, his Punishment in Tartarus, ii. 23. His Genealogy, iii. 526. How he cut off his Father-in-law Deioneus, 527. His Love to Juno; Jupiter thunderstrikes him, 528. In what Age he lived, 530.
- Ixion*, the Son of Aletes, King of Corinth, iii. 530.

I N D E X.

K.

K*AABA*, the Temple of Mecca. Statues that were there round the Kaaba, i. 570.

Kai-Souven, Prince of Corea, i. 145.

Kaivai, a God of the Persians, ii. 60.

Kao-Kiuli, a Tartar Nation, their fabulous Origin, i. 146.

καταβάτης, or Descensor, an Appellation of Jupiter, ii. 222.

Kelibites, an Arabian Nation; who was their great God, i. 570.

King, an Appellation given to Jupiter, ii. 216.

King-Priest, or Rex Sacrorum, when and why he was instituted, i. 294. On what Day he fled, 315.

Kink, the Name of certain Chinese Books, i. 131.

Kione, a Nymph beloved by Apollo and Mercury, iv. 381.

Kite, a Fowl employed in the Auguries, i. 403.

Kiun, or Rempham, a Divinity of the Moabites, ii. 60.

Krutzanam, an Epithet of Hercules; what the Import of it is, iii. 266.

L.

L*ABDACUS*, the Father of Laius, iii. 415.

Labraddæus, an Epithet of Jupiter; how he was represented, ii. 226.

Labyrinth, that of Egypt, iii. 519. That of Crete, 497, 519. The present State of that of Crete, 523.

Lacedemon, King of the Lacedemonians; the Temple which he built to the Graces, ii. 351.

Lacedemonia, one of Juno's Epithets, ii. 244.

Lachesis, one of the Parcæ, i. 113, 116, 117. The Etymology of her Name; her Office, iii. 86. How she was represented, iii. 91.

Lacinia, one of Juno's Epithets; her Temple under that Name, ii. 244.

Laconia, (the Kingdom of) by whom founded; Kings who reigned there, iii. 378. The Heraclidæ make themselves Masters of it, iv. 129.

Lacrau, a Plain near Arles, covered with Stones; the Fable about the Origin of those Stones, iv. 114. The Benefit that is derived from them, ibid.

Laeturtia, a Goddess of Corn, i. 198. ii. 591.

Ladon, a River, the Father of the Nymph Syrinx, i. 538.

Laertes, the Father of Ulysses, his Genealogy, iii. 395. One of the Argonauts, iv. 25. Marries Anticlea. See Anticlea.

Laius, the Son of Labdacus, King of Thebes, iii. 415.

I N D E X.

- How he was reinstated in the Throne usurped by his Uncle; his Death, iv. 179, 180.
- Lais*, a famous Courtezan, her Death, ii. 333.
- Lakes*, in Veneration among the Gauls; what were the most famous of them, iii. 220.
- Lamas*, Names of the Disciples of Fo among the Orientals, i. 136. How the great Lama is perpetuated, i. 147.
- Lamiæ*, the Description of those Monsters, ii. 545. See the Note.
- Lamps*, lighted at Scis at the Festival of Minerva, i. 559.
- Lampteria*, or the Festival of Lamps, i. 305.
- Lance*, or Spear, the Symbol of Mars among the Sabines, ii. 319, 322. The Worship paid to that Lance, i. 209.
- Languages*, the Necessity of being acquainted with the ancient Languages, i. 28, 65, 71.
- Laocœon*, the Priest of Apollo and Neptune at Troy. His tragical Story represented on an ancient Monument still subsisting, which is a Masterpiece of Sculpture, iv. 338, 340.
- Laodamas*, the Son of Etheccles King of Thebes, succeeds him, iv. 192. His Defeat by the Epigoni, ibid.
- Laodamia*, a Princess of the Blood royal of Epirus, her violent Death; how it was revenged, i. 244, 245.
- Laodamia*, the Wife of Protesilaus, her Mourning for the Death of her Husband; her Death, iv. 349.
- Laodamia*, the Daughter of Bellerophon Mother of Sarpædon; her Death, iii. 475.
- Laodice*, Priam's Daughter, iv. 230. Her Death, 240. Her Tomb, ibid. See the Note.
- Laodice*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Lao-kiun*, a Chinese Philosopher, i. 134. His Birth; the Sect whereof he was the Founder; his Morals; his Apotheosis; the Honour done to his Descendants, i. 134.
- Laomedon*, King of Troy, his Genealogy, iv. 250. Defrauded Neptune, who was avenged of him, 103, 250. Defrauded also Hercules, who put him to Death, 104. The Explanation of both these Facts, 252. The Destruction of his Tomb, which was one of the Fatalities of Troy, 230.
- Laphistius*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 434.
- Laphria*, Latria, Heroins of Greece, iii. 434.
- Lapithæ*, their Wars with the *Centaur*s, iii. 539.
- Lapis*, an Epithet of Jupiter, why, ii. 218.
- Laplanders*, a general View of their Religion, iii. 334.
- Lara*, a Nymph beloved by Mercury, by whom she becomes Mother to the Lares, ii. 532, 609.

Lardana,

I N D E X.

- Lardana*, a Nymph beloved by Jupiter; her Children, ii. 170.
- Lares*, the Gods Lares, their Functions, their various Kinds; the Etymology of the Name, ii. 609, 610, 612. Confounded with the Gods Manes, 610. iii. 94, 95. How they were represented, their Worship, ii. 611.
- Lariscola*, the Surname of a Family in Italy; whence it is derived, ii. 390.
- Larissæus*, an Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 220.
- Larix*, a Tree, why it burns not in the Fire, ii. 390.
- Laronda*. See Lara.
- Laterculus*, or Lateranus, the God of Hearths, i. 198. iii. 195.
- Latialis*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 224.
- Latin*, the Latin Country, whence the Name came, i. 60. iv. 312. Kings of the Latin Country before Eneas, 314.
- Latinus*, King of Latium, whose Son he was, iv. 92. Receives Eneas, 311.
- Latinus*, the Son of Circe and Ulysses, i. 118.
- Latium*, a Country in Italy; the Etymology of the Name, ii. 258, 262, 269.
- Latius*, a Grecian Heroe, iii. 434.
- Latmus*, a Mountain in Caria, ii. 428. See Endymion.
- Latobius*, the God of Health, or the Esculapius of the Carinthians, iii. 332.
- Latona*, the Mother of Apollo and Diana, ii. 170. Who that Goddess was among the Egyptians, i. 497. ii. 393, 394. Among the Greeks, i. 115, 117. ii. 170, 393, 395. She is beloved of Jupiter, and persecuted by Juno, 395. In what Place she was delivered, ibid. She took Revenge on Niobe, why, 409.
- Lattices*, Plants employed in the Feast of Adonis, ii. 19.
- Laverna*, Goddess of Sharpers, i. 197, 311.
- Lavinia*, the Daughter of Latinus, her Marriage with Eneas, iv. 311. Where she was delivered of Sylvius, 313.
- Lavinium*, a City built by Eneas, iv. 311. The Prodigy which induced him to found it, 323.
- Laurentalia*, a Festival of the Romans, i. 311.
- Laurel*, a Tree consecrated to Apollo; why, i. 264. ii. 412, 417. The Omen that was taken from the Laurel, ii. 417. The Metamorphosis of Daphne into a Laurel. See Daphne.
- Laws*, those of Minos highly esteemed, iii. 486. Whether he took those of Moses for his Model, ibid. 487.
- Leaping*, one of the Exercises of the Pentathlon, iv. 417. Wherein it consisted, 418.

I N D E X.

- Learchus*, the Son of Athamas and Ino, slain by his Father, iii. 411.
- Leah*, Jacob's Wife; why she gives the Name of Gad to the Son of her Handmaid, i. 168.
- Lebadæa*, a City in Bæotia, i. 341, 344.
- Leëtisternium*, a Kind of public Supplication wherein it consisted; the Origin of the Word, i. 295, 317. When it commenced, whether it is of Roman Institution, 318. The Solemnity of the Days set apart for this Festival, 319.
- Leda*, the Mother of Castor and Pollux, ii. 169. iv. 148. The Fable of the two Eggs of which she was delivered, iv. 148, 149.
- Lelapus*, the Name of a Dog given to Procris, iv. 379.
- Leleges*, a People in Lacœnia. There were in Ionia People of the same Name, iii. 391.
- Lelegia*, the ancient Name of Laconia, iii. 378.
- Lelex*, an Egyptian, became King of Megara, iii. 398. Another Prince of that Name, a Greek by Birth, King of Lacœnia, 391.
- Lemnos*, the Island where Vulcan set up Forges, ii. 357, 358. The Adventure of the Argonauts in that Island, iv. 30, 31.
- Lemures*, or Lemuriæ, a Kind of Genii, i. 312. ii. 611. iii. 95.
- Lemuria*, a Festival to appease the bad Genii, i. 312.
- Leonidea*, a Festival in Honour of Leonidas, i. 303.
- Leontbadome*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Leontica*, Mysteries of Mithras, i. 289.
- Leos*, worshipped as a Heroe; why, iii. 431.
- Lero*, or Hiero, an Island, how it was stocked with Hares, iv. 407.
- Leſtrigons*, who these People were; whence their Name, i. 60. iv. 293.
- Lethe*, a River in Hell, iii. 3, 4, 14, 15, 27. Whence the Greeks got the Idea of it, 37, 44, 45.
- Lethea*, the Wife of Olenus, transformed into a Rock, iv. 394.
- Letters*, the Use of Letters brought into Greece by Cadmus, iii. 409, 410.
- Letus* and Politus, Gods of the Sarmatians; these were their Castor and Pellux; their Name is pronounced among them at this very Day in Token of Joy, ii. 146.
- Levana*, a tutelar Goddess of Children, i. 197. iii. 192.
- Leuce*, an Island in the Euxine Sea where Achilles was worshipped,

I N D E X.

- shipped, iv. 278. The Fable delivered concerning this Island, 278, 283, 345.
Leucippe, the Daughter of Thestor. See Thestor.
Leucippus, the Son of Oenomaus, in love with Daphne; his Death, ii. 398.
Leucothoe, the Name of Ino in Italy, i. 15. ii. 523. Her Temple at Rome, from entering which female Slaves were prohibited, ii. 524.
Leucothoe, the Daughter of Archamus, transformed into the Frankincense Tree, i. 32. ii. 399.
Libanus, one of Cain's Descendants, i. 94.
Libanus and Antilibanus, Mountains; whence they derived their Name, i. 91.
Libations in the Sacrifices; the Use of Libations; what Liquors were employed therein, i. 267.
Liber, an Epithet given to the Sun by the Indians, i. 188. And to Bacchus by the Romans, i. 308. ii. 447.
Liberalia, a Festival to Bacchus, i. 308.
Liberty, a Divinity, i. 200. Her Temples at Rome, iii. 133.
Libethra, the City where Orpheus was born; when it was destroyed, iv. 160.
Libitina, the Goddess of Death, i. 198.
Liboa, the chief Architect of the Temple of Olympian Jupiter, i. 226.
Liceus, one of Bacchus's Epithets, ii. 447.
Licurgus. See Lycurgus.
Life, a Divinity, i. 199.
Ligea, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
Lightning, worshipped as a Divinity, ii. 596.
Ligula, or Lingula, an Instrument for the Sacrifices, i. 278.
Limentina, a Goddess for the Gates, i. 198, iii. 195.
Limnatidia, a Festival of Diana, i. 303.
Limnatis, an Epithet of Diana, ibid.
Limneria, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
Limniades, Nymphs of Ponds and Lakes, ii. 527.
Limyra, a Fountain that delivered Oracles; in what Manner it delivered them, i. 346.
Linia, a Festival in honour of Linus, i. 303.
Linus, the Son of Apollo, ibid.
Lions, worshipped in Egypt, i. 544.
Lion of the Forest of Nemea, slain by Hercules, i. 114. iv. 82. That Heroes wore always its Skin, and the Heraclidæ frequently wore the same, iv. 82, 83.
Lions, Priests of Mithras, so called, i. 289.
Lipara, one of the Eolian Islands, ii. 533.

Lipariæ,

I N D E X.

- Lipariæ*, the ancient Name of the Eolian Isles, whence so called, ii. 536, 537.
- Lithomancy*, a Kind of Divination, i. 396.
- Litteralis*, an Epithet of the God Sylvanus, ii. 600.
- Lituus*, the Augural Wand, i. 277.
- Lotophagi*, a People in Africa, whence so called ; the Adventure of Ulysses among them, iv. 303.
- Lotus*, a Tree consecrated to Apollo and Venus, i. 561.
- Love*, the most ancient of the Gods, his Birth, i. 113. Beneficent Love sprung from an Egg ; his Union with Chaos, 118. Another Origin of Love or Cupid, according to Plato, ii. 338. Two Gods of Love among the Romans, 199. How many Loves the Ancients admitted, ii. 325, 337, 338. The Worship of this God, 340, 341.
- Luceria*, a Festival of the Romans, why so denominated, i. 312.
- Lucerus*, an Epithet of Jupiter, why, ii. 218.
- Lucifer*, the Morning Star, whose Son they made him, i. 114, 115.
- Lucina*, the Daughter of Jupiter and Juno, i. 117. ii. 238. One of the Divinities of Marriage, and of Women with Child, i. 197. A Name given also to Juno, ii. 241. And to Diana, 423.
- Lumen Boreale*, what it is, i. 415.
- Lunæburg*, to whom consecrated, iii. 333.
- Lunus*, the God Lunus ; this was the Divinity of the Moon, ii. 7, 69, 428. This God confounded sometimes with Night ; how he was represented, iii. 97. A City where he was especially worshipped, ibid.
- Lupercalia*, a Festival of the Greeks and Romans, in honour of Pan, i. 308. By whom it was introduced into Italy, i. 539. iv. 363.
- Luperci*, Priests of the God Pan, i. 296, 309.
- Lusitanians*, their Religion, iii. 305.
- Lustrum*, the Space of five Years, whence the Name is derived, i. 421.
- Lycæon*, King of Arcadia, the Worship he instituted to Jupiter Lycean, iii. 354. iv. 363. His Cruelty made him be transformed into a Wolf, i. 68, 76. iv. 363, 364. He is the first who sacrificed human Victims, i. 258.
- Lychas*, a Domestic of Hercules, his Death, iv. 108.
- Lycastus*, the Father of Minos II. iii. 483.
- Lyceus*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 219. iii. 354.
- Lycimnius*, the Son of Electrion, alone escaped from the Battle in which his Brothers fell, iii. 75.
- Lychnomancy*, a Sort of Divination, i. 396.

Lycesta,

I N D E X.

- Lycesta*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
Lycius, one of Apollo's Epithets, ii. 419.
Lycomedes, King of Scyros, puts Theseus to Death, iv. 145.
Lycopolitan, a District of Egypt that worshipped Wolves, i. 545.
Lycorias, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
Lycorea, a City built upon the Parnassus, i. 61. iii. 383. A Province of the same Name, where Deucalion settled, iii. 378, 379.
Lycosura, a City in Arcadia, by whom built, iii. 354. iv. 363.
Lycurgus, a Grecian Heroe, iii. 434.
Lycurgus, the Son of Dryas, he is punished by Bacchus, ii. 450.
Lycurgus, King of Arcadia, and Father of Anceus, his Genealogy, iii. 355, 356.
Lycurgus, the Father of Archemorus, iii. 394.
Lycurgia, a Festival in honour of Lycurgus, i. 303.
Lycus, the Brother of Nycteus usurps the Crown of Thebes from Laius; his Birth, iii. 421. The War he had with the King of Sycion, his Death, 416, 418.
Lynceus, the Son of Egyptus, saved from the Massacre of his Brothers by his Wife Hypermnestra, iii. 115, 364. His Flight, 116. Succeeds to Danaus in the Kingdom of Argos; the Duration of his Reign, 364.
Lynceus, one of the Argonauts. His quick Sight, iv. 25. He is slain by Castor, 151.
Lyncus, King of Scythia, transformed into a Lynx, why, iii. 49, 60.
Lyndia, an Appellation of Minerva, ii. 309.
Lyons, the City, whence its Name derived, i. 60.
Lyre of Orpheus. See Necanthus.
Lyrnessus, a City in Phrygia, iv. 222.
Lyfidice, the Daughter of Pelops, the Mother of Pitheus, iii. 422.
Lyssa, one of the Furies, iii. 76.

M.

- MACEO*, a God of the Egyptians, how he was represented, i. 532, &c.
Machaon, the Son of Esculapius King of Messenia, iii. 158, 159. What Troops he led to the Siege of Troy, iv. 210. He is slain there, 336. He receives divine Honours after his Death, iii. 159.
Madbachus, an Epithet given to Jupiter, what it imports, ii. 221.

Mæ-

I N D E X.

Mæmaetes, another Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 226.

Magazanus, one of Hercules's Epithets, iv. 123.

Magi (Persian), their Functions in the Sacrifices, ii. 96, 97, 98. Their Doctrine conformable to that of the Galic Druids, iii. 217.

Magic, the Origin of Magic, i. 425. Several Kinds of Magic; natural Magic; Mathematical Magic; what each of these Kinds is, ibid. and 426. What the Egyptian Magic was, 426. The Definition of Magic, 427. Mysterious Words therein made use of, 428. Great Actions reputed to be the Effect of Magic, 430. The Druids were addicted to Magic, iii. 238. And especially the Druidesses, whereof some Traces still remain among the inferior People, 247.

Magicians. See Magic.

Magism, the Religion of the Persians, what the Object of it was, i. 191. That it still subsists in Persia, ii. 94.

Magnes, the Son of Eolus, settles in Magnesia; his Descendants, iii. 390, 392.

Mageg, the second Son of Japhet, his Descendants, ii. 170. iii. 350. Whether he is the same with Prometheus; the Etymology of his Name, ii. 286.

Manus. See Amynus.

Magusan, or Macusan, iii. 265. See Hercules.

Maia, the Mother of Mercury, ii. 170. One of the Pleiades, i. 14, 108, 117. ii. 170, 273.

Maiumæ, a Festival of the Romans, i. 313.

Mallet, or Malleus, an Instrument for the Sacrifices, i. 272, 277.

Masters, served their Servants at Table in certain Festivals, i. 305, 307.

Malachbelus. See Aglibolus.

Maladies, deified, i. 165.

Mamercus, a Name of Mars, given to a Roman Family, ii. 319.

Man, or Mannus, a God of the Germans; his Children; his Descendants, iii. 308.

Man, the Formation of Man, according to the Chaldeans, i. 82, 83. According to the Phenicians, 91. According to Orpheus, 111. According to Aristophanes, 118. According to Ovid, 126. According to the Indian Brahmins, 138. According to the Americans, 140.

Mana, or Mania, a Goddess of the Romans, who presided over the Ailments of Women, and the Birth of Children; why young Dogs were offered to her, iii. 199.

Manco-

I N D E X.

- Manco-Guina-Capac*, Ynca of Peru : Civilized the Peruvians, i. 141.
- Manes*, the Heresiarch, his Doctrine concerning the good and bad Principle, i. 176.
- Manes*, their Origin according to Hesiod, i. 119.
- Manes*, the Gods Manes confounded sometimes with the Gods Lares ; the Worship of those Gods upon what founded, ii. 610. iii. 94, 95, 96.
- Manyelia*, a Roman Festival, i. 307.
- Mania*, the Mother of the Gods Manes, iii. 199.
- Manitou*, the principal Divinity of the Algonquins, i. 142.
- Mantichus*, a Name given to Hercules, iv. 124.
- Mantinæa*, by whom built, iii. 354.
- Manto*, the Daughter of Tiresias, had the Gift of Prediction ; she is transformed into a Fountain ; the Quality of the Water of that Fountain, i. 344. Whether she is the same with Daphne, ii. 399. Worshipped as a Heroine, iii. 434.
- Marbles* of Paros, or Arundel, what they are, how they were found out and brought into England, iii. 372.
- Marcea*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Margiana*, its first Inhabitants, ii. 170, 171.
- Marriage*, the Gods who presided over it, i. 197. ii. 242, 249. Usages of the Ancients in Marriage, iii. 527.
- Marnas*, one of the great Gods of the Philistines, the Etymology of his Name, ii. 38.
- Marna*, a Name given to the Virgins of Crete, what it imports, ibid.
- Maro*, a God of the Egyptians of the second Class, i. 492.
- Mars*, one of the twelve great Gods of Egypt, i. 492. His Birth, ii. 315. That there were several Princes of this Name, and that several warlike Princes assumed it, 316. The Adventure of the Grecian Mars with Allirotius, for which he was tried by the Areopagus, 317. Explained, ibid. His various Names, 319. That he was highly honoured at Rome, 320. How he was represented, i. 209. ii. 322. Why his Temples built without the Walls of Cities, i. 215, 216. Mars, the great Divinity of the Gauls. See Esus.
- Marsyas*, the Inventor of the Flute, his Love to Cybele ; he is flead alive by Apollo, ii. 404. Monuments that represent him, 406. Why said to have been flead alive by Apollo, 407.
- Marsyas*, a River that run through the City Celene, ii. 406, 407.
- Martius*, an Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 226.
- Maspurg*, to whom consecrated, iii. 333.

I N D E X.

- Massagetes*, a People that sacrificed to the Sun, i. 188. ii. 148.
- Matralia*, a Festival celebrated by the Roman Matrons, i. 313.
- Matronalia*, the same Festival, i. 313.
- Matres sacrorum*, who so called, i. 289.
- Matura*, the Goddess of Corn in Maturity, ii. 591.
- Matuta*, a Goddess, who she was, i. 15, 197, 198. Juno worshipped under that Name, ii. 243.
- Medals*, their usefulness, i. 28.
- Medicine*, Gods who presided over it, i. 196. iii. 155, &c. 167.
- Medea*, her Genealogy, i. 117. Her love to Jason, iv. 40. Flies with him, 46. She celebrates her Marriage with Jason, ibid. The Character of Medea; that the ancient Tragedians have corrupted her History, 60, 61, 68. Whether she was guilty of the Murder of Abfyrthus, 62. See Abfyrthus. How she renewed Æson's Youth, 64. Her Retreat to Corinth, 66. She is divorced by Jason, ibid. Whether she destroyed her Children, 67. How she ended her Days; her Children, 70, 71.
- Medes*, whether they derived their Origin from Medus the Son of Medea, i. 14. iv. 70. When they made their first Appearance, i. 14.
- Medica*, an Epithet given to Minerva, ii. 310.
- Mediterranean*, how that Sea was formed according to Fable. i. 28. iv. 95.
- Meditrina*, a Goddess of Physicians, i. 200, 314. iii. 165, 167.
- Meditrinalia*, a Festival of Meditrina, i. 314.
- Medius Fidius*, an Oath taken by Hercules, iii. 132, 133.
- Medus*, the Son of Medea and Jason, i. 117. iv. 70, 71.
- Medusa*, one of the Gorgons, her Parents and Children, i. 114. iii. 438. Her Hair transformed to Serpents, why, iii. 440. Perseus cuts off her Head. The Explanation of the Fables about Medusa, 445.
- Megalasclepeia*, Feasts of Esculapius, i. 301.
- Megale*, an Appellation given to Juno, ii. 235.
- Megelesca*, a Roman Festival, i. 307.
- Megaira*, one of the Heroins of Greece, iii. 435.
- Megapenthes*, the Son of Pontus King of Argos, iii. 463. Relinquishes a Part of the Kingdom to his Brothers-in-law, 464.
- Megapenthes*, the natural Son of Menelaus, banishes Helen, iv. 344.
- Megara*, the Daughter of Creon King of Thebes, married to Her-

I N D E X.

- Hercules*, who kills her Children, and gives her to another, iv. 81, 82.
- Megara*, a City in Attica, Apollo had helped to build it, iii. 495, 496.
- Megaris*, the Territory of Megara, iii. 391.
- Megera*, one of the Furies, iii. 78.
- Melampus*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 430.
- Melampus*, the Son of Amithaon, iii. 394. Marries a Daughter of Prætus, why, 464.
- Melampus*, introduced into Greece the Mysteries of Bacchus, i. 69. ii. 153.
- Melanthus*, chosen King of Athens, why ; puts his Competitor to Death, i. 300.
- Melantho*, one of the Nymphs, ii. 532.
- Melas*, the Son of Phryxus, iv. 7.
- Melchon*, the same with Moloch, ii. 49.
- Melcrates*, an Epithet of Hercules, iv. 123.
- Meleager*, the Son of Oeneus King of Calydon, one of the Argonauts, iv. 25. Kills the famous Calydonian Boar, 169. Fights for the Etolians, ibid. The Fable of the fatal Brand thrown into the Fire, which was the Cause of his Death, 172.
- Meleagrides*, Melcager's Sisters transformed into Birds, 173.
- Melete*, one of the Muses according to Cicero, ii. 430.
- Meliastes*, a Name given to Bacchus, ii. 448.
- Melicerta*, the Son of Athamas King of Thebes, transformed into a Sea-God, iii. 411. The Worship paid him by the Greeks, ibid. Games instituted to his Honour, iv. 437. See Ino, Palemon.
- Melicertus*, the Name of the Phenician Hercules, i. 97.
- Melissæus*, an Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 226.
- Melissæ*, Nymphs that nursed Jupiter, ii. 165.
- Melita*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Melius*, one of Hercules's Epithets, iv. 119.
- Mellona*, the Goddesses of Bees, i. 198. ii. 588.
- Meloboris*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Melpomene*, the Name of one of the Muses ; the Signification of the Name ; the Symbol that distinguishes her from others, ii. 433.
- Memercus*, the Son of Medea, his Death, iv. 67.
- Memnesthe*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Memnon*, King of Egypt, his Genealogy, i. 109.
- Memnon*, Priam's Kinsman, brings Troops to his Assistance, iv. 220, 323, 327. Who this Memnon is, 324. His Death and Tomb, 328. His Statue in Egypt ; the Miracle

I N D E X.

- facte that is reported of it ; the Sentiments of Authors about this Statue, 329.
- Memnon's* History according to Huetius, 333.
- Memnon*, an Epithet of the City Suza, ibid.
- Memnonides*, Birds sprung from Memnon's Ashes, iv. 328.
- Memnonian*, the Name of a Palace in Suza, 333.
- Memnonium*, the Name of the Citadel of Suza, ibid.
- Memphis*, the Son of Jupiter, ii. 170.
- Memphis*, a City of Egypt, the Worship paid there to Animals, i. 202, 549, 553. See Apis.
- Memrumus*, God of the Phenicians, who he was, what he taught Men, i. 91.
- Mena*, a Goddess of Women in Child-bed, i. 197.
- Menalus*, a City in Arcadia, its Origin, iii. 354.
- Menalus*, a Mountain of Arcadia, where Pan was worshipped, i. 202.
- Menalippe*, Queen of the Amazons, how she ransomed herself from Hercules, iv. 101.
- Menalippus*, his Impiety in the Temple of Diana, ii. 425.
- Menasinus*, the Son of Pollux, his Worship, iv. 151.
- Mendaians*, or Christians of St. John, i. 190.
- Mendes*, the Pan of the Egyptians, i. 492, 537.
- Mendes*, a City in Egypt, where She-Goats and He-Goats were in Veneration, why, i. 537.
- Mené*, the Name given to the Moon, i. 107.
- Menelaus*, the Spouse of Helen, the Daughter of Tyndarus, iv. 142. During his Absence she is carried off from him, 209, 210, 214. He is reconciled to her after the taking of Troy, 344.
- Menephron*, transformed into a Brute, iv. 398.
- Menes*, King of Egypt, the Temple which he built, i. 220, 521, 522.
- Menctius*, the Son of Japetus, crush'd to Death with a Thunderbolt, i. 115, 116.
- Menctius*, the Father of Patroclus, his Adventures, iii. 391.
- Menipus*, an Idol of the Indians, with many Heads, i. 147.
- Menæcius*, the Son of Creon King of Thebes, his Death for his Country, iv. 191.
- Mens*, Thought or Intelligence, a Divinity, iii. 126.
- Menthe*, a Maid transformed into a Plant of that Name, iii. 57.
- Meon*. See Gybele.
- Mephitis*, the Goddess of ill Savour, iii. 196.
- Mera*, a Companion of Diana, transformed into a Bitch, iv. 398.

Mercury,

I N D E X.

- Mercury*, under what Names he was known in different Countries, i. 16, 44, 70. ii. 361. 374. That there were several Mercurys, ii. 362. Of the Egyptian Mercury, 363. See Thot. The Mercury of the Greeks, his Genealogy, i. 117. ii. 366. His History, ibid. That it has been disguised by Fables and Allegories, ii. 368. His Caduceus, 369. Why said to have been expelled Heaven, 371. His Offices, his Worship; the Etymology of his Name, ibid. & 372. How he was represented, 373. His various Names, 374.
- Mercury Trismegistus*. See Hermes.
- Mercurialia*, Feasts of Mercury, i. 307.
- Mercy*, a Divinity, iii. 126.
- Merodach*, one of the Gods of Babylon, ii. 4. His Name joined to that of the Princes who reigned there after him; why, 5.
- Meroe*, where was an Oracle of Jupiter, i. 345.
- Merope*, one of the Pleiads, i. 108. ii. 273, 276. Why this Constellation is said to hide herself, i. 14. ii. 276.
- Merope*, the Daughter of Pandarus. See Pandarus.
- Mesraim*, the Son of Cham, settled in Egypt; Why Egypt is often called the Land of Mesraim, i. 174, 521, 522, 579. ii. 162. He is the same with Osiris, i. 521.
- Messengers of the Gods, i. 47. in the Note.
- Mestor*, the Son of Perseus, his Descendants; the War for his Succession, iii. 365. iv. 74.
- Metalarus*, or Megalarus, one of the Phenician Gods, i. 86.
- Metamorphoses*, upon what founded, i. 76, 78.
- Metempsychosis*, where this Doctrine took its Rise, i. 71, 554. iii. 7. What it taught, i. 493, 494. iii. 233, 234. The Benefit that arose from it, i. 554, 555. This Doctrine diffused through China and the Indies, i. 133, 136. Whether the Gauls believed the Metempsychosis, and by whom they had been instructed in it, iii. 228, 233, 234.
- Metis*, Jupiter's first Wife, the Fable to this Purpose; what is the Import of the Name, i. 116. ii. 166, 296.
- Metis*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Metra*, the Daughter of Eresichthon, she had the Gift of assuming all various Shapes, i. 76. iv. 398.
- Metragyrte*, one of Cybele's Names, ii. 564.
- Mexicans*, the Superstition of that People, i. 141, 144, 145.
- Mezentius*, King of Etruria, loses his Life in a Battle with Eneas, iv. 312.
- Midas*, the Son of Cybele, King of the greater Phrygia, ii. 402, 403. His Avarice; the Fable of his converting what-

I N D E X.

- whatever he touched into Gold, 403, 605, 606. His Concern for Religion with the Assistance of Silenus, 606. The Fable of his Asses Ears, upon what founded, i. 77. ii. 402, 607.
- Migonitis*, a Name given to Venus, why, ii. 313.
- Miletus*, the Father of Caunus and Byblis, iii. 390. In what Age he lived, 392.
- Miletus*, a City in Caria, by whom founded, iii. 390.
- Militia*. See Mylitta.
- Milo*, punished for the Murder of Laodamia, i. 244, 245.
- Mimallonides*, the Surname of the Bacchanals, ii. 449.
- Mineides*, transformed into Bats, ii. 450.
- Minerva*, five Goddesses of that Name, ii. 295. The Fable about her Birth, the various Explanations given of it, 296, &c. The Etymology of her Name, 299. Of the Minerva of Egypt, ibid. Her several Names among the Greeks, 301. Her Worship in Libya, at Sais, at Athens, at Rhodes, i. 109, 582. ii. 301. The Dispute between Minerva and Neptune about Athens, ii. 304. Explained, ibid. Her Contest with Arachne, 307. Her Adventure with Vulcan, 308. Her various Names, ibid. How she was represented, 309.
- Egis* of Minerva. See Egis.
- Minetra*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Ming-Ti*, the Emperor of China; The Sect to which he gave Rise, i. 135.
- Ministers of the Temples. See Priests.
- Minopene*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Minos*, the first of the Name, his Genealogy, ii. 169. iii. 395, 402, 482, 514. He is the first Judge of Hell, iii. 22, 26, 42, 489. The Time when he lived, ii. 169. iii. 489, 490. His History, iii. 483. Why said to be the Son of Jupiter, 484. His Death; his Tomb, 488.
- Minos* the Second, the Grandson of the first, iii. 482, 512. His Reign, his Exploits, 493. That the Greeks had a Mind to render him odious, iii. 493, 497. His Death, and Burial, 511.
- Minotaur*, the Fable of that Monster, how the Poets paint it, iii. 497. The Origin of this Fable, 498, &c.
- Minutius*, a God worshipped at Rome, iii. 194.
- Mipbelctzeth*, or Mepheletzeth, the same with Beelphegor; the Signification of the Name, ii. 55.
- Mirtle*, a Plant consecrated to Venus, i. 264. ii. 332, 333. and to the Graces, 351.
- Misfrain*. See Mcfrain.
- Asseltse* of Oak, the Ceremony of that Plant; its Description;

I N D E X.

- tion ; the Use that the Druids made of it. How they gathered it, and in what Place, iii. 239, 240. The Origin of these Words, the new Year to Misseltoe, which are still used in several Provinces of France, 241.
- Mitia*, the Name of Urania among the Persians, ii. 96.
- Mitras*, or Mithras, the God of the Persians, i. 188. ii. 94, 102, &c. His Worship introduced into Rome, ii. 103, 104. Signified the Sun, ii. 102. How he is represented, 103. His Symbol explained, 107, &c. Why said to be born of a Stone, 122. To have stole Oxen, ibid. The Mysteries of Mithras, ibid. The Preparations for his Mysteries, 124. His principal Festival, 126. The Progress of his Worship, 127. That he was worshipped in the Gauls, iii. 276. Names that were given to the Priests and Priestesses of Mithras, i. 289. ii. 110, 123, 124.
- Mnasinous*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 433.
- Mnemosyne*, whose Daughter she was, i. 113. The Mother of the nine Muses, i. 117. ii. 170, 289. Inventions attributed to her, ii. 290.
- Mnestheus*, King of Athens after Theseus, his Genealogy, iv. 145, 271. Commands the Athenians at the Siege of Troy, 216. His Death, 246.
- Mnevis*, King of Egypt, attributed his Laws to Mercury, iii. 484.
- Moabites*, their Divinities, i. 188.
- Moazim*, a Divinity of whom the Prophet Daniel speaks, ii. 63.
- Moazin*, an Idol, whose Worship Antiochus restored, ibid.
- Modesty*, her Temples and Altars at Rome, i. 199. iii. 134. A Distinction made between the Modesty of the Patrician and Plebeian Ladies ; the Origin of the Distinction, ibid.
- Mæragetes*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 226.
- Mæris*, King of Egypt, i. 220. ii. 2.
- Moloch*, the great Divinity of the Ammonites, i. 145, 188. ii. 2, 48. The Sacrifice that was offered to him, i. 145, 188. He is the Saturn of Carthage, i. 575. ii. 48. How he was represented, ii. 50.
- Molossians*, a People in Epirus, iv. 280.
- Molossia*, the Name of a Country in Epirus, ibid.
- Molossus*, a Surname of Jupiter, ii. 220.
- Molossus*, the Son of Pyrrhus and Andromaché, iv. 241, 280.
- Molus*, the Son of Minos the second, iii. 514.
- Moly*, the Plant which Mercury gave to Ulysses, why, iv. 298.
- Momus*, who this God is ; his Origin ; the Etymology of his Name, i. 66, 113, 199. iii. 153.

I N D E X.

- Moneta*, the Goddess of Money, her Temple at Rome; how she was represented, i. 199. ii. 243. iii. 200.
- Monitoria*, what Sort of Sights so called, i. 400.
- Money*. See Moneta.
- Monkies*, worshipped in Egypt, i. 544.
- Moon*, one of the great Divinities of Egypt; under what Names she was adored, i. 103, 104, 190, 485. ii. 7. Her Genealogy, i. 114. The Origin of the Worship paid to her, 181, 185, 188. The Worship that the Gauls paid to her; she had an Oracle among them, iii. 283.
- Moors*, what Gods they worshipped, i. 582.
- Mopsus*, one of the Argonauts, his Death; his Worship; his Oracle, iv. 25, 26, 351.
- Mopsus*, the Son of Manto, a famous Soothsayer during the Siege of Thebes, his Worship; his Oracle, i. 581. iv. 25. Was more skilled than Calchas; his Death, 351.
- Morpheus*, the Son of Sleep, his Functions; what his Name imports, iii. 100.
- Moschtara*, the Name of Jupiter among the Arabians, i. 570.
- Moses*, whether he was the Model of the Pagan Gods, i. 11. The Parallel between him and Bacchus, ii. 441, 442.
- Most-high*, a Name given to Acmon at the Time of his Deification, ii. 171.
- Mot*, or Mod, who he was among the Phenicians; the Explanation of this Term, i. 90.
- Netber-Goddesses*, what Sort of Goddesses those were; the Worship that was paid to them, and in what Country, iii. 291, &c.
- Mother of the Gods*. See Great Mother.
- Mountains*, by whom formed, i. 112. Nymphs of the Mountains, ii. 527.
- Mourning-women*, hired for Funerals by the Americans, as by the Romans, i. 142.
- Mouth*, the Son of Chronos, i. 98. Pluto adored under that Name; what it imports, iii. 45, 304.
- Moyé*, the Indian Fable relating to her, i. 136.
- Mucareus*, one of Lycaon's Sons, iii. 354.
- Mundus*, a Roman Knight, his Adventure with Paulina, i. 75.
- Murder*, the Expiation of that Crime, i. 418, 419.
- Murcia*, the Goddess of Sloth, i. 198. iii. 130, 140, 194.
- Murtia*, one of Venus's Epithets, ii. 333.
- Musagetes*, an Epithet of Apollo, ii. 429. Of Osiris and Hercules, ii. 431, 433. iv. 119.

Muscarius,

I N D E X.

- Muscarius*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 217.
- Musæa*, Feasts in Honour of the Muses, i. 303, 309.
- Muses*, their Genealogy, i. 117. ii. 170, 429, 430. Their Number, 430. Their Origin; their Names; their Functions; their Symbols, ibid. & 431. Why ranked among the warlike Goddesses, and represented with Wings, 433, 434. Their Challenge given to the Daughters of Pierus, 434. Epithets given to the Muses, 435, &c.
- Musica*, a Surname of Minerva, ii. 308.
- Music*, its Origin in Greece, ii. 213.
- Muyades*. See Myagrus.
- Myagrus*, or Myagron, Gods of Flies or Fly-Hunters, i. 199. ii. 57. An Epithet given to Hercules, iv. 120.
- Mycenæ*, a Kingdom in Greece, its Foundation; its Kings, iii. 364. iv. 74, 75. Atreus seizes upon that Crown, iv. 127, 256. His Successors, 257. The Period of that Kingdom, 265.
- Mycone*, one of the Cyclades Islands; its Union with Delos, ii. 397.
- Mydas*. See Midas.
- Mylitta*, the Name of Venus Urania, i. 568. ii. 96, 424.
- Mynians*, a People, their Origin; they are driven from Lefbos; where they go and settle, iv. 53. See Thera.
- Myrmidon*, his Genealogy; his Descendants, iii. 391.
- Myrmidons*, their fabulous Origin from Pismires, i. 71. iv. 270.
- Myrrha*, transformed into the Frankincense Tree, i. 32. ii. 8, 11. Her Crimes, ii. 8.
- Myrtilus*, Oenomaus's Charioteer, his Treachery; his Punishment, iv. 254.
- Myrtle*. See Mirtle.
- Mysteries of Bacchus*. See Bacchus. Eleusinian Mysteries. See Eleusis. Of Cybele. See Galli. Of Mythras. See Mithras.
- Mystæ*, the Name given to the initiated, iii. 64.
- Mythology*, the Necessity of being acquainted with it, Preface 5, 6. The Signification of the Name, i. 3. Analysis of several Treatises of Mythology, ibid. 6, 7, 8.
- Mythologist*, what Method he is to take in Order to be exactly informed; what he is to shun, i. 3, 8.

N.

- N ABAHAS, or Nibbaz, a God of the Heveans, what the Word imports, ii. 61, 62.
- Nabo*. See Nebo.
- Nænia*, the Goddess of Funerals, iii. 101.

I N D E X.

- Nabalennia*, or Nebalennia, a Goddess of the People of Germany, how she was represented, iii. 323.
- Naharvales*, or Naharvali, a People in Germany, their Religion, iii. 311, 333.
- Naiads*, Nymphs, their Destination, ii. 474, 527. Their Worship, their Festivals, 486.
- Names*, Plurality and Variety of Names, one Source of Fables, i. 44, 45. The Origin of the Names of Countries, 60. And of those of the Gods, 501.
- Nanus*, one of the Descendants of Lycaon King of Arcadia, iii. 343.
- Napææ*, Nymphs, their Functions; their Worship, ii. 474, 527, 528.
- Narcissus*, his History; he is transformed into a Flower, iv. 365.
- Nasamones*, what Country they inhabited; their Religion, i. 581.
- Nascio*, or Natio, a Goddess invoked for Children, i. 197. iii. 191.
- Natalis*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 242.
- Natchez*, a Nation in Louisiana, that worship the Fire, i. 143.
- Nature*, adored as a Divinity, i. 195.
- Navel*, a Story about Man's Navel, i. 83.
- Nauplius*, the Father of Patroclus, one of the Argonauts; his Genealogy, iv. 26. Is the Ruin of the Grecian Fleet in his Return from Troy, i. 43.
- Nausica*, the Daughter of Alcinous, introduces Ulysses to her Father's Court, iv. 302.
- Nausinous*, and Nausithous, Sons of Ulysses and Calypso, i. 118.
- Nearbus*, torn in Pieces by Dogs; why, iv. 166.
- Nebo*, a God of the Babylonians, ii. 1, 5. What is the Import of the Name, 5, 62.
- Necessity*, a Goddess, iii. 140, 180.
- Necklace*, given to Eryphile. See Eryphile.
- Nebalennia*. See Nabalennia.
- Neith*, a Name of Minerva of Egypt, i. 492.
- Nelus*, the Brother of Pelias, one of the Argonauts, iv. 26. His Birth; retires into Messenia, iii. 392, 393. His Children; their Destiny, 394. iv. 26, 105.
- Nembrod*, or Nimrod, in what Age he lived, i. 80, 173. ii. 3. Whether he was the Founder of Idolatry, i. 173. He is the Belus of the Assyrians, ii. 316. And the Orion of the Persians, 317.

Nemea,

I N D E X.

- Nemea*, a City, the Lion of the Forest of Nemea, i. 114. iv. 82.
- Nemean Games*, their Institution; the Prize of the Conquerors, iv. 189, 415, 435. How they were celebrated, 435.
- Nemeses*, the same with the Goddess Nemesis, iii. 92. Taken for the Furies, iii. 76.
- Nemesis*, an infernal Divinity, iii. 92. How she was represented, ibid. The Worship that was paid to her; with what Divinity she was confounded, 93. Of whom she was engendered, i. 113. iii. 76.
- Nemestrinus*, a God worshipped among the Romans, iii. 194.
- Nemifæa*, Feasts of the Dead, i. 305.
- Neocori*, Ministers of the Temples, their Functions, i. 285.
- Neomenia*, a Festival of the New Moon, i. 305.
- Neoptolemus*. See Pyrrhus.
- Nephele*, the Wife of Athamas, her Children, iii. 394. iv. 5. She is transformed into a Cloud; why, 7.
- Nephelim*, or Nephilim, a Name given to the Giants, what it signifies, i. 121, 122, 167. ii. 205. A Name given also to the *Centaur*s, iii. 537.
- Nephte*, the Wife of Typhon, i. 492. Her Familiarity with Osiris, 510.
- Neptune*, the Etymology of this Name, ii. 491. That it was from the Libyans the Greeks received his Worship, i. 18, 109, 582. ii. 152, 492. His Genealogy, ii. 494. His History, ibid. How he marries Amphitrite, 497. Why said to have built the Walls of Troy, 499. How he was represented, ibid. & 505. The Explanation of his various Symbols, 505. His various Names, ii. 497. His Worship was very extensive, 502. His various Metamorphoses, 500, 504. His Dispute with Minerva for the Name of Athens, 304. And with the Sun for the Isthmus of Corinth, 306.
- Nere*, a Period of Time, which the Ancients made use of in their Chronology, i. 86. in the Note.
- Nereids*, Nymphs of the Sea, ii. 528.
- Nereus*, his Genealogy, his Children, i. 97, 114. ii. 507. His Character; the Etymology of his Name, 508, 509. That he had the Gift of Prediction; why he often changed Shapes, ibid.
- Nereids*, what Divinities they were, ii. 510. Of whom they were said to be born, i. 114. Their Names and Number, ii. 508. How they were represented, ii. 512. The Worship that was paid to them, 512, 527, 528.

I N D E X.

- Nergel*, a God of the Cutbeans, who this God was; the Import of the Name, ii. 161, 62.
- Nero*, the Emperor, his high Estimation of Magicians, i. 429.
- Neso*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Nesrock*, a God of the Babylonians, i. 1.
- Nessus*, the Centaur, punished by Hercules for offering Violence to Dejanira, iv. 107, 541.
- Nestor*, his Genealogy; how he became King of Messenia, iii. 392. iv. 105, 106, 151. The Troops which he led to the Siege of Troy, 216. He retired into Italy, 246. His long Life; the Fable of the Poets about it, 59.
- Neso*, a God of the Arabians, i. 570.
- New Year* to Misseltoe. See Misseltoe.
- Nibbas*, a Syrian Divinity, ii. 62.
- Nibechan*, or Nibhaz, a God of the Heveans, ii. 1.
- Nice*, the Daughter of Pallas and Styx, brought to the Assistance of Jupiter, i. 115.
- Niella*, a Goddess of the Latins, ii. 591.
- Night*, by whom procreated; her Union with Erebus; her Children, i. 112, 113. ii. 428. iii. 96. How she was represented, ii. 429.
- Nile*, a River in Egypt, taken into the Number of the great Gods of the Egyptians; why, i. 492. ii. 475, 479. Festivals in Honour thereof; Sacrifices offered to it, ii. 476, 477. The Nile called Ocean, 475.
- Ninus*, the first King of the Assyrians. The Idolatry which he introduced, i. 173.
- Niobe*, the Daughter of Tantalus, her History; her Children; her Transformation into a Rock, i. 13. ii. 409, &c.
- Nisbe*, the Daughter of Pheroneus, Jupiter's first Mistress; her Children, ii. 170, 409, 410.
- Nisa*, a City in the Neighbourhood of Athens, iii. 494.
- Nisæa* and Nise, Names of Nymphs, ii. 532.
- Nijus*, King of Nisa, his Genealogy, he is transformed into a Hawk, iii. 494, 495.
- Niſſes*, an Island, how it was formed, ii. 168, 169.
- Nitocris*, Queen of Egypt, the Signification of her Name, ii. 299.
- Nixii Dii*, Gods of Women in Child-bed, i. 197.
- Noah*, whether he is the same with Bacchus, ii. 443. He is the Xixutrus of the Phenicians, i. 86. Whether the Division of the World among the Sons of Saturn is imagined upon that of the Sons of Noah, i. 18. ii. 214, 215.
- Nadatus*,

I N D E X.

Nodotus, a God who presided over the Corn, i. 198. ii. 591.

Nome, an Egyptian Term, what it imports, i. 492, 545.

Nomus, a Surname of Mercury, ii. 374.

Nondina, a tutelary Goddess of Children, i. 197. iii. 192.

Notus, the Wind Notus, whose Offspring he was said to be, i. 116.

Novella, one of Juno's Epithets, ii. 242.

Novemfides, who those Gods were at Rome, iii. 193.

Nuċtulus, the God of Night, how he was represented, iii. 98.

Numa Pompilius, prohibits making Statues of the Gods, i. 208. His Books burnt, ibid. His Regulations of Religion, 430, 431. iii. 185, 186. From whom he received the Laws he made, iii. 484.

Numeria, the Goddess of Arithmetick, iii. 195.

Numitor, King of Alba, Father of Rhea Sylvia, ii. 316. Grandfather of Romulus, iv. 313.

Nycteus, the Father of Antiope; his Aversion to her; his Death, iii. 415, 417. The Alliance of the Families of Cadmus and Nycteus, 421.

Nyctilea, a Festival in honour of Bacchus, i. 307.

Nyctileius, a Surname of Bacchus, ii. 461.

Nyctimene, the Daughter of Epepeus King of Lesbos, transformed into an Owl, iv. 393.

Nyctimus, the Son of Lycaon King of Arcadia: His Successor, iii. 355.

Nyctis, the Mother of Laius, iii. 415.

Nymphs, their Origin, i. 113, ii. 528. Their Number and various Species; Names whereby they were distinguished, ii. 482, 529, 531. How long they lived, 530. Metamorphoses into Nymphs explained; the Worship that was paid to them; the Victims that were offered to them, 486, 528.

Nysa, the City where Bacchus was educated, ii. 438.

O.

O*AK*, a Tree consecrated to Rhea, i. 264. The Veneration which the ancient Gauls had for the Oak, iii. 221.

Oannes, or Oes, who he was in the Theogony of the Chaldeans, the Etymology of his Name, i. 81, 84, 85.

Oaths, the Origin of Oaths, i. 423. The Form and Ceremony of Oaths; to what Use they were applied, and the Abhorrence they had to Perjury, ibid. 424. What God presided over Oaths, 423. Of the Oath of the Gods by Styx, i. 115, 423.

Obodan,

I N D E X.

- Obodan*, one of the Arabian Gods, i. 569.
- Obolus*, that was put into the Mouth of the Dead, iii. 30.
- Occasion*, a Divinity among the Greeks and Romans, iii. 134.
- Ocean*, reckoned a God, and the Father of the Gods, i. 106. ii. 486 and 487. Whose Son he was, i. 112, 113. ii. 172, 487. The Children he had by Tethys, i. 114. ii. 482, 487, 490. The frequent Visits which the Gods paid to Oceanus, ii. 489. How he was represented, ibid. The Etymology of his Name, 488.
- Oceanides*, Daughters of the Ocean; their Number, ii. 482.
- Ostavia*, her famous Temple, iii. 435.
- Ocypete*, one of the Harpies. See Harpies.
- Ocyroe*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Odin*, King of Thrace, is the Hyperborean Mars, ii. 316.
- Odyssey* of Homer, the Analysis of that Poem, i. 48.
- Oeagrus*, the Father of Orpheus, ii. 405, 432. iv. 158.
- Oebalus*, the Father of Icarus, iv. 405.
- Oebalus*, a Heroe of Greece, iii. 431.
- Oebazus*. See Plestorus.
- Oedipus*, the Son of Laius, his Genealogy; his History according to the Poets, iv. 179. His true History, 182. Condemned to Tartarus, iii. 23.
- Oeneus*, King of Phocis, Son of Cephalus, iv. 379.
- Oeneus*, of the Family of the Eolidæ, the Father of Meleager, iii. 391. iv. 173. Became King of Calydon. See Calydon. His Death; his Tomb, iv. 173, 288.
- Oeneus*, or Ænea, a Town upon the Confines of Attica, iii. 494. Another Place of that Name, iv. 288.
- Oeneus*, the natural Son of Pandion, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 431.
- Oeno*, or Æno, the Daughter of Anius, transformed into a Pigeon, iv. 321.
- Oenoe*, Queen of the Pygmies, transformed into a Crane, iv. 376.
- Oenomaus*, King of Pisa, Father of Hippodamia; his Death, iii. 422. iv. 253, 254.
- Oenone*, a Shepherdess of Mount Ida, beloved by Paris, iv. 341. The Death of her Son, ibid. Oenone's Skill, ibid. Her Death, 342.
- Oenopion*, the Son of Ariadne and Theseus, iii. 505. iv. 145, 146.
- Oenophoria*, a Greek Festival, i. 305.
- Oenstrians*, a People in Italy, ii. 262, 268.
- Oenstrus*, the first Name of Janus, ii. 268.
- Oenobrus*, the Son of Lycæon King of Arcadia, settled in Italy, iii. 355.

I N D E X.

- Oes, Oen.* See Oannes.
- Oeonus, Hercules's Uncle* ; his Death avenged by his Nephew, iv. 106.
- Oeta*, a Mountain, its Situation, iii. 392.
- Og, King of Bashan*, his enormous Size, ii. 202. Whether he is the same with Typhon, i. 507.
- Ogenus*, the God of old Men, iii. 138.
- Ogga*, or Onka, a Name given to the Egyptian Minerva, the Etymology of the Name, ii. 300.
- Ogmios*, or Ogmios, the Name of the Gallic Hercules, iii. 262. iv. 124. How they represented that God, 263, 264.
- Ogoa*, a God worshipped in Caria, iii. 172.
- Ogyges*, at what Time he lived, iii. 345, 371. His Wife, his Children, 370. A Phenomenon in the Heavens under his Reign, 371, 372. The Deluge that happened in his Time, i. 62. iii. 345, 368, 371.
- Ogygia*, the Isle where Calypso reigned, iv. 300. Where they placed it, 301.
- Oicles*, the Father of Amphiaraus, iv. 193.
- Oileus*, the Father of Ajax, iv. 20. Whether he was one of the Argonauts, 26, 27.
- Oinotrus*, the Son of Lycaon King of Arcadia, iii. 243.
- Okki*, or Areskoui, the chief God of the Hurons, i. 142.
- Olaimi*, a Mountain in Florida, where the People come to sacrifice to the Sun, i. 144.
- Old-age*, by whom engendered, i. 113. The Divinity who presided over it, i. 199.
- Old Woman of Gold*, an Idol worshipped by the People who dwelt near the River Obi ; how they consulted her, ii. 146.
- Olenus*, transformed into a Rock ; why, iv. 394.
- Olive*, to whom it was consecrated, i. 264. ii. 234. The Olive which Minerva made to spring out of the Earth, ii. 304.
- Olla*, a Vase used in Sacrifice, i. 278.
- Olympiad*, the Establishment of the Olympiads, i. 62, 63. When the Way of computing by Olympiads began, 64. iii. 372. iv. 427. Which was the first Olympiad, iii. 371. iv. 427. The Time from one Olympiad to another, iv. 411, 425.
- Olympia*, a City where Saturn had a Temple, iv. 425.
- Olympic Games*, at what Time instituted, i. 63. ii. 213. iv. 424. When renewed, ii. 213. iv. 423, 427. How they became famous, Honours therein paid to the Conquerors, iv. 411, 412, 431. The Punishment inflicted on those who used Fraud to obtain the Victory, iv. 430.

I N D E X.

430. Women were prohibited to be present at them, 429.
And all who were not the Descendants of Hellen, 431. See Games.
- Olympius*, one of Jupiter's Appellations, ii. 220.
- Olympus*, a Mountain in Thessaly, taken for Heaven, ii. 176, 205. There the Giants besiege Jupiter, 214.
- Omanus*, or Amanus, a God of Cappadocia; what Divinity he represented, ii. 98, 99, 131.
- Omoroca*, who this Woman was in the System of the Chaldeans, i. 81.
- Omphale*, Queen of Lydia, the Wife of Hercules, who spun by her, iv. 111.
- Onarus*, Priest of Bacchus, who ravished Ariadne, iii. 504, 505.
- Ontogonia*. See Eternity.
- Onuava*, a Gallic Divinity; the Description of her Head, iii. 286,
- Opalia*, a Festival in honour of Ops, i. 314. ii. 557.
- Opas*, a Surname of Vulcan, ii. 354.
- Opigenia*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 243.
- Opis*, the Name of a Goddess for Children, i. 197.
- Opis*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Ops*, a Name under which the Earth was worshipped; what it imports, i. 196. ii. 552. iii. 137.
- Ops*, the Goddess of Riches, i. 198. Ops, the same with Cybele, ii. 552. See Opalia.
- Optimus Maximus*, Epithets of Jupiter, ii. 216.
- Ora*, the Children she had by Jupiter, ii. 170.
- Oracles*, what we are to understand by the Word, i. 325. That all idolatrous Nations have had their Oracles, 326. Whether Oracles were nothing but the Effect of Priestcraft, 327, 350. Who were the Gods of Oracles, 328. Oracles of Dadana, 329. Of Jupiter Ammon, of Jupiter Phlius, 332, 334. Of Apollo at Heliopolis, 333. Oracle of Delfi, 334. Oracle of Trophonius, 340. Other Oracles, 344. Various Manners of delivering Oracles, 352. Oracles delivered by Lots, 354. The Oracle of the Ox Apis, 352, 519. Oracles of the Egyptians, 556.
- Orators*, the Divinities whom they invoked, i. 200.
- Orbona*, a Goddess worshipped at Rome; what was her Office, i. 197. iii. 140.
- Orchomenos*, the Father of the Orchomenians, his Genealogy, iii. 354.
- Orchone*, the Daughter of Peleus, beloved by Hercules, iv. 112.
- Orcus*, whose Son he was, i. 114.
- Orcades*, what Nymphs they were, ii. 528.

Ordrysius,

I N D E X.

- Ordrysus*, in honour among the Thracians, ii. 148.
- Orestes*, the Son of Agamemnon, iii. 365. iv. 259. His History, 260.
- Oresteus*, the Son of Lycaon, the Founder of a City of his own Name, iii. 354.
- Oresthasium*, a City built by Oresteus, iii. 354.
- Orgiastæ*, the Name of the Women who presided over the Orgies, i. 282.
- Orgies*, the Festival of Bacchus, i. 282, 289, 307. Their Origin, ii. 457. When they were suppressed, 463. How they were celebrated by the Gallic Women, iii. 281.
- Orgiophantæ*, the Name of the Men who presided over the Orgies, i. 282.
- Oriental*s, their Genius leads to Fiction, i. 25, 26. Their giving several Names to the same Person, a Source of many Fables, 44.
- Orion*, the Name of Mars among the Parthians, ii. 317.
- Orion*, the Son of Hyrieus, Fables delivered about him, iv. 385. Forms a Constellation in the Heavens, 388, 389.
- Orithya*, the Daughter of Eretheus King of Athens, carried off by Boreas King of Thrace, iv. 21, 166.
- Orithya*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Ornithomancy*, a Kind of Divination, i. 396.
- Oromazes*, or Oromasdes, a Persian Divinity, i. 178. ii. 94. His Origin; his Worship, ii. 101.
- Oropians*, a People in Attica, iv. 196.
- Orpheus*, his Genealogy, ii. 405, 432. iv. 158. His History blended with Fables, iv. 156, 157. Explained, 162. The Story of Orpheus and Eurydice, 163. His Death, 160. His Works, 161. His Cosmogony, i. 110, 111. Inventions that are ascribed to him, 110, 432. The Worship paid him by the Thracians, ii. 147. Why said to have charmed the Tygers and Lions, i. 77. iv. 163, 164.
- Orseis*, the Wife of Hellen, iii. 390.
- Orthione*, an Epithet given to Diana, ii. 424.
- Orthona*, a Divinity worshipped at Athens, iii. 175.
- Orus*, a God of Egypt, i. 16, 105, 492. His Birth, 495, 527. His Wars with Typhon, whom he destroys, 510, 527. His Death; he is raised again to Life, and becomes immortal, 527, 528. How he was represented in the Isiack Table, 529.
- Oscillæ*, what Sorts of Victims, i. 261.
- Osiris*, an Egyptian God, i. 16. He is the Bacchus of the Greeks, 69, 71. The Sun adored under that Name, 103, 104, 185, 485, 496. The Etymology of the Name,

I N D E X.

- Name, 104, 496. Other Names of Osiris, 105. What meant by the Persecutions of Typhon against Osiris, 178. Osiris worshipped through all Egypt, 489, 492. The History of Osiris, 494, and 521, 522. Worship paid to Osiris, 516. The Sentiments the People had of that God, 522.
- Oschor*, or Chon, the Name of Egyptian Hercules, iv. 74, 123.
- Offa*, a Mountain in Theffaly, ii. 205.
- Offilago*, a tutelary Goddess of Children, i. 197. iii. 192.
- Otiartes*, who he was, according to the Theogony of the Chaldeans, i. 86.
- Otus*. See Ephialtes.
- Owl*, a Bird consecrated to Minerva, i. 264. Why, ii. 297.
- Oxen worshipped in Egypt, i. 202. Oxen of Apollo stole by Mercury, ii. 371. Oxen of Geryon. See Hercules.
- Oxilus*, an Etolian, the Chief of the Heraclidæ, who re-entered the Peloponnesus, iv. 129.
- Oxyrinchian*, a Canton of Egypt, i. 545.

P.

- PACIFICUS*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 221.
- Paetolus*, a River in Lydia, which rolled Gold with its Sand, ii. 403, 605. See Midas.
- Pæan*, a Song in honour of Minerva, ii. 304.
- Pageans*, a People described under the Name of Pygmies, iv. 372.
- Pagod*, the Indian Idol, i. 136.
- Painters*, that they invented and propagated many Fables in the World, i. 37, &c. 44, 201.
- Palestes*, an Epithet given to Jupiter, ii. 225.
- Palamedes* invented the Game of Dice at the Siege of Troy, iv. 224. Ulysses destroyed him, 289. Worship'd as a Heroe, iii. 433.
- Palemon*, who this God was among the Greeks, i. 15. See Pertumnus.
- Pales*, the Goddess of Shepherds, i. 313. ii. 585. Her Worship; her Festival, ibid. 586.
- Palici*, who those Gods were; their Origin; their Worship, ii. 89, &c. Basins that were by their Temple; the Virtue of the Water that was therein, 91. Prophecies delivered by them, 93.
- Palilia*, what Festival it was, i. 313, 314.

Pal-

I N D E X.

- Palladium*, the Statue of Pallas, its History, iv. 227, 287, 290, 306.
- Pallantium*, a City built by Pallas, iii. 354.
- Pallantides*, the Sons of Pallas Brother to Egeus, conspire against Egeus, iv. 131. Are defeated by Theseus, 136. Oblige Theseus to quit Athens, 144.
- Pallas*. See Minerva.
- Pallas*, the Son of Creius, i. 114.
- Pallas*, one of the Giants who made War upon Jupiter, fled by Minerva, ii. 169, 295, 296.
- Pallas*, the Brother of Egeus, iii. 494. See Pallantides.
- Pallas*, the Son of Evander, the Bigness of his Body, ii. 200.
- Pallas*, the Son of Lycaon, the Founder of a City called Pallantium, iii. 354. One of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 432.
- Palmyra*. See Tadmor.
- Pallor*. See Fear, Pavor.
- Pamphagus*, an Epithet given to Hercules, iv. 120.
- Pan*, one of the great Gods of Egypt, i. 536. 'Tis in Egypt we are to seek for his Origin, 537. His History according to the Greeks; he invented the Flute, 538. His Worship, 195, 539. The Origin of the panic Terror, 539, 540. Whether he is the same with Faunus and Sylvanus, 540. The Etymology of his Name. What the Egyptians adored under the Name of Pan, ibid. Of the Voice that intimated the Death of the great Pan, 541. That several went by the Name of Pan, 538.
- Panacea*, one of the Divinities of Medicine, iii. 159, 165.
- Panathenea*, a Festival distinguished into the greater and less, i. 306. ii. 302, 303. iv. 137.
- Pancrace*, one of the Exercises in the Games; what it was, iv. 418.
- Pancratis*, the Daughter of Aloeus and Iphimedia, her Adventures, iii. 119.
- Panda*, a Goddess worshipped among the Romans, iii. 195.
- Pandarus*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 433.
- Pandarus*, the Son of Merops, his History, iv. 360, 361.
- Pandareus* of Ephesus, his History, iv. 361.
- Pandemos*, one of Venus's Epithets, ii. 333.
- Pandion*, the second of the Name, King of Athens, the Father of Philomele and Progne, iii. 376. iv. 357.
- Pandora*, and her Box, ii. 280.
- Pandrosos* the Daughter of Cecrops, her Temple at Athens near that of Minerva, iii. 376.
- Pangea*, a Mountain in Thrace, where a golden Mine was found, ii. 212.

I N D E X.

- Panompheus*, an Epithet given to Jupiter, ii. 225.
Panope and Panopea, two Nymphs, ii. 532.
Panthea, or Pantbean Figures, what they are, 526.
Pantbeon, a Temple built at Rome in honour of all the Gods; its Description, i. 231.
Pantibibla, a City of Chaldea, i. 85. in the Note.
Paphian Goddess, a Name given to Venus, ii. 333.
Paphos, a City founded by Paphus in the Island of Cyprus, iv. 319. in the Note.
Paphus, the Fable of his Birth, ibid.
Pappeus, an Epithet given to Jupiter by the Scythians, ii. 163.
Papremis, a City in Egypt, where was celebrated a singular Festival in Honour of Mars, i. 559.
Parasites, Ministers of the Temples, their Rank; their Functions, i. 283.
Parasites. See Nero.
Parcae, their Genealogy, i. 113, 116, 117. iii. 83. The Origin of the Name, ibid. Their Functions and Power, ibid. Their Names; what the Import of them is, iii. 86, 87, 88. The Worship that was paid to them; how they were represented, 89, 90.
Paris, the Son of Priam, his Birth; his Amour with Oenone, iv. 340. His Judgment between the three Goddesses; the Foundation of this Fiction, iv. 209, 210. How Priam knew him to be his Son, 342. How he carried off Helen, ibid. His Adventure in Egypt, ii. 518. He wounded Achilles, iv. 276. His Death; his Character, 240, 342.
Parnassus, a Mountain in Beotia, the Seat of the Muses, ii. 435. Whence it derived its Name, i. 60.
Parnassides, an Epithet given to the Muses, ii. 435.
Parthenope, the Daughter of Stymphalus, iv. 112.
Partenopeus, the Son of Atalanta, one of the Leaders of the Army of the Argives; his Death before Thebes; his Character, iv. 203.
Parthenia, or Parthenos, an Epithet given to Minerva, ii. 302, 308. A Name also given to Juno; why, ii. 245.
Partition of the World among the Sons of Saturn, i. 17, 18. ii. 214.
Partians, their Religion, ii. 135.
Parts of the Body, a Divinity that presided over each, i. 200.
Partunda, a Goddess worshipped at Rome, her Ministration, iii. 191.
Pasiphae, the Daughter of Minos King of Crete, Mother of the Minotaur; the Foundation of this Fable, i. 29. iii.

I N D E X.

- 497, &c. Passed for the Daughter of the Sun, iii. 500.
- Pasithea*, a Heroine of Greece, iii. 433.
- Pasithoe*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Pasoemon*, the Son of Hercules and Orchonoe, iv. 112.
- Pataici*, or Patarchæ, who those Gods were ; their Origin ; the Etymology of their Names, ii. 87, &c.
- Patilina*, or Patilena, a Goddess of Corn, i. 198. ii. 591.
- Patellarii Dii*, Gods worshipped by the Romans, iii. 193.
- Pater*, an Appellation of Jupiter, ii. 216.
- Pater Sacrorum*, who so called, i. 289.
- Patera*, an Instrument of the Sacrifices, i. 277.
- Patriarchs*, whether their History gave Rise to the History of the Argonauts, iv. 3. Whether the Gods of Paganism were derived from their History, i. 16, 51, 52. ii. 180, 293, 294, 372, 373, 441, 442.
- Patrica*, Mysteries of Mythras, so called, i. 289.
- Patroclus*, the Friend of Achilles, his Genealogy, iii. 391. His Death, iv. 233.
- Patrous*, the Statue of Jupiter Patrous, which had three Eyes, ii. 215, 216.
- Patuleius*. See Clusius.
- Paventia*, a tutelary Goddess of Children, i. 197. iii. 192.
- Paulina*. See Mundus.
- Pausanias* dies of Famine, i. 244. Statues which the Lacedæmonians erected to him to expiate their Cruelty, 245.
- Pausania*, a Festival in honour of Pausanias, i. 303.
- Peace*, a Divinity, i. 199. iii. 129, 130. Distinct from Concord ; her Temple at Rome ; how represented, ibid.
- Peacock*, consecrated to Juno, ii. 246. See Argos.
- Pechinians*, a People characterised under the Name of Pygmies, iv. 374.
- Pecunia*, a Goddess worshipped at Rome, iii. 200.
- Pegasus*, (the Horse) his Origin, i. 114. iii. 438. The Fables delivered concerning this winged Horse, with the Explication of them, iii. 439, 441, 451, 453.
- Pegas*, a Cape in Magnesia, whence the Argonauts embarked for Colchis, iv. 13.
- Pegomancy*, a Sort of Divination, i. 394.
- Pelasgi*, the most ancient People of Greece, their Origin, iii. 352, 353. By them were the Worship and Mysteries of the Cabiri introduced into Greece, ii. 70, 151, 152.
- Pelasgia*, one of Juno's Names, ii. 244.
- Pelasgus*, King of Arcadia, the Father of Lycaon, iii. 353. His Qualifications of Body and Mind ; what he taught the Arcadians, ibid. His Descendants, 354, &c.

I N D E X.

- Pelasgus*, the Son of Jupiter and Niobe, ii. 170.
- Peleus*, the Father of Achilles, his Genealogy, iv. 134, 271. Marries Thetis, 208, 272. His History, 271, &c.
- Pelias*, the Brother of Neleus, his Birth ; his History, iii. 394. iv. 8, 9. Whether he was actually assassinated by his Daughters, iv. 64, 65.
- Pelion*, a Mountain in Thessaly, ii. 205.
- Pellene*, an Epithet of Diana, ii. 425, 426.
- Pellonia*, a Goddess invoked at Rome, i. 199. iii. 194.
- Pelopæa*, the Daughter of Thyestes ; how she became Mother to Egythus ; her Death, iv. 257.
- Pelopia*, a Festival of Pelops, i. 303.
- Peloponnesus*, a Peninsula of Greece, iii. 422. How the Heracliidæ settled there, iv. 128, &c.
- Pelops*, the Son of Tantalus King of Lydia, iii. 422. The Fable of the Entertainment given to the Gods by Tantalus, and of Pelops's Ivory Shoulder, 113, 114. The Palladium made of Pelops's Bones, iii. 114. iv. 227. His History, iii. 422. iv. 253, 254. His Children ; his Death, 256.
- Peloria*, what this Festival was, i. 305. iii. 383.
- Peloris*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Pelorus*, from whom the Festival Peloria was derived, iii. 383.
- Penates*, Gods of the Hearths, i. 193. That they are to be distinguished from the Lares ; how many Sorts of Penates, ii. 609. 613. Their Origin, their Statues, 614, 615. Sacrifices that were offered to them, 615. The Veneration of the Romans for those Gods ; whence they received them, 617.
- Peneleus*, one of the Argonauts, iv. 27.
- Peneus*, the Son of Oceanus and Tethys, his Posterity, iii. 526.
- Peneus*, a River in Thessaly, the Worship paid to it by the Thessalians, ii. 479. The Rivers that it receives ; its Canal formed by Neptune, iii. 381, 382, 383.
- Penelope*, the Character given of her by the Poets, i. 38. Her Genealogy ; how she became the Mother of Pan, 537. Her Marriage with Ulysses, iv. 304. Whether she was really a Model of conjugal Duty, 305.
- Penia*, the Goddess of Poverty, i. 199. And Mother of Love, ii. 338.
- Peninus*, or Penin, a God of the Inhabitants of the Pennine Alps ; what he represented, iii. 274.
- Pentathlon*, a Name given to certain Exercises in the Games, iv. 417.
- Pentheus*, the Son of Cadmus, torn in Pieces by the Bacchanals, i. 157. ii. 440, 456, 457. iii. 412.
- Pepbredo*, the Daughter of Phorcys, i. 114. iii. 448.

Peplus

I N D E X.

- Peplus* of Minerva, what it is, ii. 304.
- Perasia*. See Castaballa.
- Perdix* or Perdrix. See Talus.
- Perseus*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 221.
- Pergamus*, the Son of Pyrrhus and Andromache, founds the City Pergamus in Asia, iv. 241.
- Perrhebi*, a People in Thessaly whence Janus came, ii. 261, 268.
- Peribea*, marries Oeneus King of Calydon; her Genealogy; her Children, iii. 391. iv. 173.
- Peribæa*, a young Athenian Slave sent to Crete, and delivered by Theseus, iii. 506.
- Periclymenus*, or Periclymenes the Son of Neleus, assumed all Sorts of Shapes; how he was slain by Hercules, i. 76. iv. 26, 105, 106.
- Perieres*, the Son of Eolus, iii. 390. Became King of Messene; his Descendants, 392.
- Perigone*, the Daughter of Sinius, her Adventures, iv. 133.
- Perilaus*, Tyrant of Argos, iii. 436.
- Perimedes*, the Daughter of Eolus the Wife of Achelous; her Children, iii. 390, 391.
- Periphetes*, a Robber slain by Theseus, iv. 133.
- Peristera*, a Nymph transformed into a Pigeon, ii. 332, 333.
- Perone*, the Daughter of Neleus, the Wife of Bias, their Descendants, iii. 394.
- Peru*, People of Peru, their Religion, their Morals, i. 140, 141.
- Perfa*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Persephone*, the Daughter of Chronus, i. 95.
- Perfes*, the Son of Creius, his Children, i. 114, 115.
- Perseus*, the Son of Jupiter and Danae, ii. 170. iii. 364. 435. His Birth, 436, 437. The Fable of Medusa and the Gorgons, 437. How he delivers Andromeda, 441. Where this Event happened; how it is to be understood, 461, 462. He slew his Grandfather Acrisius by Mistake; he built the City Mycenæ, 463. Worship that was paid to him after his Death, 463, 464. In what Age he lived, 477, 478.
- Perseis*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532. The Children whom she had by the Sun, i. 117.
- Persians*, their Religion; Changes introduced into it successively, ii. 94, &c. Worshipped the Fire, 95.
- Pertunda*, a Goddess worshipped at Rome, i. 197.
- Phaeton*, the Son of the Sun and Clymene; His History, ii. 384. His Fable explained, 385. Monuments representing his History, 388.

I N D E X.

- Phaeton*, the Son of Aurora and Cephalus, i. 117. Or their Grandson, according to some Authors, ii. 384.
- Phallopberi*, Ministers of the Orgies, ii. 460.
- Phallus*, what it was; its Origin among the Egyptians; what it signified, i. 503, 517. Its Origin among the Greeks, ii. 446, 457.
- Phaneus*, the Father of Acmon, ii. 171.
- Phaneus*, or Phanæus, an Epithet given to Apollo, ii. 419.
- Phantasia*, the Name of one of the Dreams, iii. 100.
- Pharfis*, a People in Asia among whom Sabism still prevails, i. 190.
- Pharygea*, one of Juno's Epithets, ii. 244.
- Phaya*, the Name of a mischievous Sow slain by Theseus, iv. 134.
- Pheacians*, a People who inhabited the Island of Corcyra; their Manners when Ulysses landed there, iv. 302.
- Phedra*, the Daughter of Minos the Wife of Theseus; her History, iii. 516, &c.
- Phenicia*, the Gods of Phenicia, the same with those of Egypt, i. 102. That these are the two Countries where Idolatry took its Rise, 174. And that from Phenicia it spread itself through the World, 175. Colonies come from Phenicia, 48, 65, 72, ii. 151, 162.
- Phenicians*, that they were the first who carried on Commerce and Navigation, i. 10. Their Cosmogony and Theogeny, 88. The Model of that of the Greeks, 101.
- Phenix*, the Son of Agenor and Brother of Cadmus, where he settled, iii. 404.
- Phenix*, a Bird consecrated to the Sun, i. 264.
- Phesr*, or Chamos, a God of the Moabites, ii. 2.
- Pherephata*, the Name of Proserpine, what it imports, iii. 47.
- Pheres*, the Son of Medea and Jason, whether his Throat was cut by his Mother, iv. 67.
- Pheres*, the Son of Cretheus, Uncle to Jason; his Children, iii. 394. iv. 8, 10.
- Pherusa*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Phoenia*. See Callipatira.
- Phialus*, the Son of Bucolion, communicated his Name to the City Phialia, iii. 354.
- Phigalus*, built the City Phigalia, iii. 354.
- Philacus*, whose Oxen were kept by Mastives, iii. 394.
- Philammen*, the Son of Kione. See Kione.
- Phileus* the Son of Jupiter and Garamantis, ii. 170.
- Phileni*, two Brothers raised to Divinities by the Carthaginians; why, i. 577.
- Phileto*, one of the Hyades, ii. 278:

Philip,

I N D E X.

- Philip*, King of Macedon; his Chapel; his Statue, iii. 432.
- Philistines*, their Divinities, ii. 2, 6, 18.
- Phillis*, the Daughter of Lycurgus King of the Daulians; her Metamorphosis into an Almond-Tree, iv. 400.
- Phillyra*, Chiron's Mother transformed into a Linden-Tree, iv. 398.
- Philoctetes*, the Companion of Hercules, one of the Argonauts, iv. 27, 351. One of the Grecian Leaders at the Siege of Troy, 216. Was left in the Island of Lemnos, then brought back by Ulysses before Troy, 226, 290, 352. Repaired to Calabria after the Siege of Troy, 352.
- Philomele*, surnamed Thetis the Daughter of Aëon, the Wife of Peleus and Mother of Achilles, iii. 391, 210.
- Philomela*, the Wife of Tereus; her History and Metamorphosis into a Nightingale, iv. 357, 358.
- Philosophers*, what their Sentiments were of Idolatry, i. 1, 2. ii. 156. And of the Nature of the Gods, i. 437, 438, 480.
- Philosophy*, Ignorance of Philosophy one Source of Fables, i. 45, 47. And the Origin of Physical and Astronomical Gods, ibid.
- Phine*, one of Mercury's Names, ii. 374.
- Phineus*, the Son of Phenix King of Salmydeffa, was struck blind, and then tormented by the Harpies, iv. 33. The Argonauts deliver him from them, 34, 35.
- Phincus* petrified by Perseus; why, iii. 457, 461.
- Phia*, an Island in the Lake Tritonis, by whom inhabited, iv. 50.
- Phlegeton*, one of the infernal Rivers, iii. 22.
- Phlegon*, one of the Horses of the Sun, ii. 383.
- Phlegyas*, his Punishment in Tartarus, iii. 109. His History, 110, 111.
- Philammon*, one of the Argonauts, iv. 27.
- Phlias*, one of the Argonauts, his Genealogy, iv. 23.
- Phliasia*, a Country that had its Name from Phlias, ibid.
- Plox*. See Phos.
- Phobetor*, one of the Dreams, the Signification of the Name, iii. 100.
- Phocis*, a Country in Greece, iv. 273.
- Phocus*, the Son of Eacus, i. 117, 118. Slain by Telamon his Brother, iv. 270. Gave Name to Phocis, 273.
- Phæbades*, Priestesses of Apollo at Rome, i. 296.
- Phæbe*, the Daughter of Heaven and Earth, i. 113. Her Children, 115. ii. 418.
- Phæbe*, Phaeton's Sister, her Transformation, ii. 390.
- Phæbe*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.

I N D E X.

- Phæbus*, the Surname of Apollo, ii. 418.
- Pholoe*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Pholus*, one of the Centaurs, whom Hercules exterminated, iii. 539. His Death lamented by Hercules himself, 541.
- Phorbas*, one of the Descendants of Inachus, iii. 358.
- Phorbas*, a Robber slain by Apollo; the Explanation of this Adventure, ii. 416.
- Phorcys*, or Phorcus, his Genealogy; his Children; becomes a Sea-God, i. 114. ii. 313, 522. iii. 438.
- Phroneus*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 430.
- Phroncus*, the Son of Inachus King of Argos, iii. 358.
- Phos*, Pur, and Phlox, who they were among the Phenicians, i. 91.
- Phrastor*, King of Argos, his Genealogy, iii. 343.
- Phrentis*, one of the Sons of Phryxus, iv. 7.
- Phryxus*, the Son of Atamas and Nephele; his History, iii. 394. iv. 4, &c. How he was transported to Colchis, iv. 5. His Death; his Children, 7.
- Phtha*, a God of the Egyptians, the Vulcan of the Greeks, i. 104, 493.
- Phylacus*, one of the Herces of Greece, iii. 432.
- Phyllidæce*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Phyllira*, a Nymph beloved by Saturn, the Mother of the Centaur Cbiron, iii. 531.
- Physicians*, what Gods they invoked, i. 200.
- Physicus*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.
- Picumnus*, what Sort of Divinity he was, i. 197. ii. 590.
- Pickpockets*, had their Gods, i. 197.
- Picus*, the Son of Sterces, King of the Aborigines, ii. 261, 269. Succeeded Janus, ii. 600. His History; his Metamorphosis into a Magpie, 601. The Explanation of this Metamorphosis, ibid.
- Pielus*, the Son of Pyrrhus and Andromache; he reigned in Epirus, iv. 241.
- Pieria*, a Country of Macedonia, ii. 430, 431, 435, 436.
- Pierides*, their Challenge to the Muses, ii. 434.
- Picrides*, an Epithet of the Muses, ii. 430, 435.
- Pierus*, the Son of Magnes in Pieria, which he called after his own Name, iii. 392.
- Picty*, a Divinity, i. 199. iii. 126.
- Pigeons*, consecrated to Venus, i. 264. ii. 332. Pigeons that fed Jupiter, ii. 208. The Worship which the Assyrians and Inhabitants of Ascalon paid to Pigeons, i. 202. ii. 33, 34. Why, ibid.
- Piliars of Hercules*, ii. 303. iii. 450. iv. 95, 112.

Pilumnus,

I N D E X.

- Pilumnus*, what God he was, i. 197. ii. 590. His Genealogy, ii. 170.
- Pinarii*, Priests of Hercules in Italy; at what Period of Time their Priesthood was abolished, i. 294, 295.
- Pirithous*, his Genealogy, iii. 527. His Marriage disturbed by the *Centaur*s, 538. Undertakes with Theseus to carry off Proserpine; his Death, 544, 545. iv. 140, 141.
- Pisidice*, the Daughter of Eolus, married to Myrmidon; her Children, iii. 390, 391.
- Pismires*, Divinities of the Thessalians, i. 203. Why the Greeks derived their Origin from the Pismires of the Forest of Egina, 71.
- Pistor*, an Appellation of Jupiter, ii. 218.
- Pitheus*, King of Trezene, his Genealogy, iii. 422. iv. 130. in the Note. Takes Care of the Education of Theseus' his Grandson, iv. 131.
- Pitho*, the Goddess of Orators, i. 200. An Epithet given to Diana, ii. 425. The Goddess of Persuasion; her Temples, iii. 138.
- Pitho*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Pixius*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 224.
- Placida*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 243.
- Planets*, adored by the Egyptians, i. 103. Their Origin according to the Greeks, 112. Their Worship among the Persians and other Nations, 175, 190, 485. By whom inhabited, 493, 494. ii. 158.
- Plants*, that several of them were consecrated to the Gods, i. 263, 264.
- Pleiades*, a Constellation, the Daughters of Atlas, i. 108. ii. 273, 276.
- Plestorus*, worshipped among the Thracians as a Heroe, ii. 148.
- Pleuron*, the Son of Endymion, his Ancestors; his Descendants, iii. 390, 391.
- Plexaura*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Plexippus*, the Son of Phineus; his Father makes his Eyes be put out, and is punished by him, iv. 33, 34.
- Plexippus*, the Brother of Altheus. See Toxeus.
- Plione*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Plisthenes*, the Brother of Atreus; whether he was the Father of Agamemnon and Menelaus, iv. 257, 258.
- Plotæ*, an Island in the Ionian Sea, named the Strophades, iv. 35.
- Plusios*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.
- Pluto*, the Son of Saturn and Rhea, i. 115. iii. 42. What Country

I N D E X.

- Country fell to his Lot, i. 19. ii. 214. iii. 42, 43. Why he passed for the God of Riches, iii. 44. Why made the God of Hell, ibid. The various Names which he had; 45. His Worship; how he was represented, 46. Carries off Proserpine, ibid. The Fable explained, 53. Why Pluto and the infernal Gods were hated; Why they were worshipped, 102, 103. The Worship paid to him by the Gauls; upon what this Worship was founded, 279.
- Plutus*, the God of Riches; whose Son he was, i. 117. iii. 70. His Origin, 71. Why said to be blind and lame, 72.
- Pluvius*, an Appellation of Jupiter; how this Jupiter was represented, ii. 218.
- Plynteria*, a Festival of Minerva, how it was celebrated, i. 306.
- Podalirius*, the Brother of Machaon, his History, iii. 158, 159. One of the Grecian Heroes, iii. 430.
- Podarces*, the first Name of Priam. See Priam.
- Poetry*, ancient in the East, i. 72. Its Origin in Greece, ii. 213. Games wherein the Prize of Poetry was disputed, ii. 303. iv. 417, 433.
- Poets*, were the first Historians, i. 21. Authors of most of the Fables, i. 37, 38. Their Theology, i. 148, 475.
- Pogwid*, one of the Gods of the Sarmatians, ii. 145.
- Polemocrates*, the Son of Machaon, a Heroe of Greece, iii. 430.
- Polidora*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Polignus*, the Son of Proteus, slain by Hercules, ii. 515.
- Polijo*, one of the Hyades, ii. 278.
- Polinchos*, or Polias, a Name given to Minerva, ii. 309.
- Polyboies*, one of the Giants who made war upon the Gods; The Island which was formed of his Body, ii. 168, 169.
- Polydectes*, King of the Island of Seriphus, gave Danae a favourable Reception; took Care of Perseus, iii. 392, 437. He is petrified by Perseus; why, 439, 454, 455.
- Polydorus*, the Son of Alcamenes King of Sparta, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 432.
- Polydorus*, the Son of Cadmus and Harmonia, i. 117. iii. 411. Is banished from the Kingdom of Thebes; why, 415. His Descendants, ibid.
- Polydorus*, the Son of Priam and Hecube, iv. 139. Sent when yet a Child to the Court of Polymnestor King of Thrace, who put him to Death, 243, 244.
- Polydora*, the Daughter of Meleager and Cleopatra. See Protesilaus.

Polydora,

I N D E X.

- Polydora*, the Daughter of Peleus and Antigone; the Mother of Mnestheus, iv. 271.
- Polyhymnia*, one of the Muses; the Signification of the Word; how she was represented, ii. 433.
- Polymnestor*, King of Thrace, his Avarice, iv. 243, 244.
- Polynices*, the Son of Oedipus and Jocasta, one of the illustrious Personages condemned to Tartarus, iii. 23. See Etheocles.
- Polyphagus*, an Epithet given to Hercules, iv. 120.
- Polyphemus*, one of the Cyclops in Sicily, his Adventure with Ulysses, iv. 292, 293. Who this Cyclop was, 293. His Amour with Galatea, ibid.
- Polytechnes*, the Son-in-law of Pandareus. See Pandareus.
- Polytheism*, by whom introduced, i. 112.
- Polixena*, the Daughter of Priam, sacrificed to the Manes of Achilles, iv. 240. Why and by whom, 276, &c. 350.
- Pomona*, the Goddess of Gardens and Orchards, i. 198. ii. 579. The Amours of Pomona and Vertumnus; what we are to understand by them, ii. 579, 580. How she was represented; whence she had her Name, 582.
- Pomus*, a God of Gardens, i. 197.
- Pontifs* of the Romans, their Preheminence over the other Priests; their Functions, i. 291.
- Pontus*, who he was according to the Chaldeans, his Children, i. 97, 114.
- Poplar-Tree*, consecrated to Hercules, iv. 116.
- Populifugia*, a Roman Festival; why instituted, i. 312.
- Populonia*, a rural Divinity, ii. 590. iii. 192, 195. Also a Name given to Juno, ii. 243.
- Porevith*, a God of the Germans; how he is represented, iii. 331.
- Porphyryon*, one of the Giants who made war upon the Gods, his Death, ii. 168. Offered Violence to Juno in the Presence of Jupiter, 205, 206.
- Portugal*, the Origin of the Name, i. 60.
- Portumnus*, or Portunus, this is the Palemon of the Greeks, and the Melicerta of the Phenicians, i. 15. ii. 523. He is transformed into a Sea-God, ibid.
- Porus*, the God of Riches, the Father of Love, ii. 338.
- Posëidon*, the Name of Neptune, its Etymology, ii. 214, 504.
- Posidonia*, a Festival in Honour of Neptune, i. 304.
- Postularia*, what Signs so called, i. 400.
- Postverta*, a Roman Goddess, i. 197. iii. 191.
- Pothos*, the Son of Chronos and Astarte, i. 96.
- Potitii*. See Pinarii.
- Potina*, a tutelary Goddess of Children, i. 197. iii. 192.
- Potniades*,

I N D E X.

- Petniades*, who those Greck Goddesses were; the Origin of the Name, iii. 177.
- Poverty*, a Goddess, i. 199. Her Worship joined with that of the Arts, iii. 181.
- Prædator*, an Epithet given to Jupiter, ii. 218.
- Prayers*, Divinities, how represented, iii. 181. The Fable of Ate the Sister of these Goddesses, i. 31.
- Praxidicians*, who those Goddesses were, iii. 370.
- Prefericulum*, a Vase for the Sacrifices, i. 277.
- Præma*, a Goddess invoked in Marriage, ii. 252. iii. 192.
- Prencste*, a City in Italy, how the Lots were consulted there, i. 354.
- Presages*, of how many Kinds, i. 409, &c. Superstitions of the Pagans in relation to them, 410, 411.
- Preugones*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 434.
- Priam*, the Son of Lacmedon, the Origin of the Name; how he was called at first, iv. 104. The Source of the Enmity between his Family and that of Agamemnon, 213. His History, 215, 220. His Interview with Achilles in the Grecian Camp, 276. His Death, and the dismal Fate of his numerous Family, 278.
- Priapus*, the God of Gardens, i. 198. ii. 583. His Original; Fables delivered concerning this God; his Worship; how he was represented, 584, 585.
- Priestesses*, Women who presided over Religion, in high Veneration among the Greeks, i. 282, 283, &c. And among the Romans, 294.
- Priests* of the Gods, the Authors of several Fables, i. 45. Their Impostures, 75, 76, 220, 458. How they prepared themselves for the Sacrifices, 270, 271, &c. How they were chosen, 281.
- Priests* of the Greeks; the Princes of the Priests of Delphos, i. 281, 282. Three Sorts of Priests common to the Greeks and Romans, 286. Priests peculiar to the Romans, their Privileges, 290, 291. The Establishment of several Orders of Priests at Rome, iii. 186. Usages of the Priests of Egypt, i. 488, 489.
- Principles*, the Opinion of two Principles; the Antiquity of this Opinion, i. 176, 177, 495.
- Proas*, a God of the Germans, his Functions; his Statue, iii. 330.
- Procas*, King of Alba, the Father of Numitor and Amulius, iv. 313.
- Processions*, those that were made in Honour of Isis and Osiris, i. 556. In Honour of Mais and Papremis, 559. In Honour of Jupiter of Heliopolis, 559, 560. Processions of

I N D E X.

- of the Hebrews imitated by those of the Egyptians. Processions in Use among the Germans; among the Gauls, 560, 561.
- Procris*, the Wife of Cephalus, her History; her Husband puts her to Death by Mistake, ii. 318. iv. 378, 379. Whose Daughter she was, 379, 380.
- Procustes*, the Appellation of a Giant, iv. 135.
- Procyon*, the Name of a Constellation, iv. 408.
- Prodice*, one of the Hyades, ii. 278.
- Prodigies*, two Classes of Prodigies, i. 411, 412. The Relation of several Prodigies, 412, &c. What we are to think of those whereof we cannot assign a natural Cause, 415, 416.
- Prodomei*, Gods of the Megareans, iii. 177.
- Prodromia*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 245.
- Proerosia*, a Festival of Ceres in Attica, iii. 62.
- Prætides*, the Daughters of Prætus, who believed themselves transformed into Heifers; the Foundation of this Fable, iii. 464.
- Prætus*, his Genealogy; he is the Jupiter in Love with Danae, ii. 164. iii. 364, 435. His Death, 462.
- Profanus*, an Epithet given to Mercury, ii. 375.
- Progne*, the Daughter of Pandion, her History; her Metamorphosis into a Swallow, iv. 357, 358.
- Promacos*, an Epithet given to Mercury, ii. 375.
- Promachus*, a Name given to Hercules, iv. 125.
- Prometheus*, why said to have formed Man, i. 49, 50. ii. 283. He invented the Art of Statuary, ibid. & i. 209. Whose Son he was, i. 115, 116. ii. 279. How he imposes upon Jupiter; how he steals Fire from Heaven, 280. Explained, 284. The Punishment to which he is condemned, 280. Hercules delivers him from it, 281. iv. 96. Sir Isaac Newton's Opinion of him, ii. 287. Worship paid to him after his Death, ibid.
- Prometheus*, one of the Gods of the Egyptians, in what Class, i. 492.
- Prometheia*, the Festival of Lamps, i. 304. See Lamps.
- Promethæa*, a Festival in Honour of Prometheus, i. 304.
- Pronuba*, an Epithet of Juno, ii. 242, 249.
- Propetides*, debauched Women of the Island of Cyprus, iv. 395.
- Prophets*, what Sort of Ministers they were in the Temples, i. 281.
- Prorsa*, or Prosa, a Goddess, by whom invoked, i. 197. iii. 191.

Prosclystius,

I N D E X.

- Prosclystius*, an Epithet given to Neptune, what it imports, ii. 307, 501.
- Proserpina*, a Goddess for Corn, i. 198.
- Proserpina*, the Daughter of Jupiter and Ceres, i. 117. ii. 170. Carried off by Pluto, iii. 47. The Explanation of this Fable, 53, 56. She was in Veneration among the Gauls, 280.
- Prosymma*, one of Juno's Epithets, ii. 244.
- Proteus*, a Sea-God; why said to assume various Shapes, i. 25. ii. 517, 520. The Explanation of this Fable, ibid. why said to be the Son of Neptune, 521. The Etymology of his Name; in what Age he lived, 521, 522.
- Protesilaus*, the Son of Iphiclus, the first who was slain at the Landing of the Greeks upon the Trojan Shore, iv. 20, 174, 221, 348. His History, 348, &c.
- Protesilaia*, a Festival in Honour of Protesilaus, i. 304.
- Protegenia*, one of Jupiter's Mistresses, ii. 170.
- Protegnus*, the Name of the first Man in the System of the Phenicians, i. 91. His Posterity, 94.
- Protegenia*, beloved by Jupiter; her Children, ii. 170.
- Providence*, a Divinity, how represented, iii. 136.
- Psalachas*, a Nymph in Love with Bacchus, her Death; her Transformation into a Plant of her Name, iii. 507.
- Psamathe*, the Wife of Æacus, i. 117, 118. Her Genealogy; her Son, iv. 270.
- Psammeticus*, King of Egypt, re-established upon his Throne by brazen Men sprung from the Sea, iii. 406.
- Psaphos*, a God worshipped in Libya; to what Stratagem he owed his Divinity, iii. 172.
- Psilas*, an Epithet given to Bacchus, ii. 448.
- Psyche*, her Birth; her Amours with Cupid; her Adventures; she is carried up to Heaven, ii. 342. How represented, 348.
- Pycomancy*, a Sort of Divination, i. 396.
- Pteras*, the Architect of the Temple of Delphos, the Origin of his Name, i. 68.
- Pterelas*, the Son of Taphius, his Ancestors, iv. 74. The Death of his Children, 75. His Death owing to the Treachery of his Daughter, 76.
- Ptolemy Philadelphus* ranked among the Heroes Eponymes, iii. 434.
- Pure*, the Pure Gods, worshipped by the Arcadians, iii. 177.
- Purple*, by whom the Art of staining Purple was invented, iv. 113.

Putæ,

I N D E X.

- Putā*, a Goddess who presided over those who pruned Trees, iii. 198.
- Pygas*, Queen of the Pygmies, transformed into a Crane; why, iv. 376.
- Pygmalion*, King of Tyre, the Brother of Eliza or Dido, his Avarice; his Cruelty, iv. 319.
- Pygmalion*, King of Cyprus, who fell in Love with a fine Statue, ibid. in the Note.
- Pygmies*, what the Poets and Historians have related of their Existence, their Size, Manners and Battles with the Cranes, iv. 369. The Explanation of these Fables; what People designed under that Name, 374, 375. Who the mygmies are, whom the Prophet Ezekiel speaks of, 377.
- Pylades*, the Son of Strophius King of Phocis, the Cousin of Orestes, and his intimate Friend, iv. 260. The generous Struggle of Friendship between those two Friends, 263. he marries the Sister of Orestes; the Children he had by her, 264. His Ancestors, ibid.
- Pyramus* and Thisbe, their Amours; their Death, iv. 365.
- Pyreneus*, the Tyrant of Phocis, who persecutes the Muses, ii. 434.
- Pyrenean* Mountains, whence their Name derived, i. 60.
- Pyriphlegeton*, or Phlegeton, a River in Epirus, whereof they made an infernal River; the Etymology of the Name, iii. 10. ii. 35, 36.
- Pyritheus*, one of the Heroes of Greece, iii. 432.
- Pyromancy*, a Sort of Divination, i. 396.
- Pyrous*, the Name of one of the Horses of the Sun, ii. 383.
- Pyrrha*, the Wife of Deucalion; her Genealogy, ii. 280. iii. 376.
- Pyrrhifous*, the first Name of Achilles, iv. 274.
- Pyrrhus*, the Son of Achilles, was led to the Siege of Troy, though very young; why, iv. 59, 278. How he distinguished himself there, 278. The Children he had by Andromache, 241. He marries Hermione already betrothed to Orestes, who is the Mean of his being assassinated at Delphos, 264, 278, 279. Where his Descendants reigned, 280.
- Pythagoras*, his Doctrine of the Metempsychosis; whence he borrowed this Notion, i. 71, 554. See Metempsychosis. From whom he said he had learned his Doctrine, iii. 484.
- Pythia*, the Priestess of Apollo at Delphos, i. 283. How she was chosen; how she delivered her Oracles, 337, &c. Her Responses put into Verse; turned to Ridicule, 339, 360. The Cause of the Declension of the Oracle, 360.
- Pythian Games*, their Institution; the Prize of the Conqueror

I N D E X.

- ror at those Games; what the Exercises therein were, ii. 408. iv. 432, &c. When they were celebrated, iv. 434. under what Name the Romans adopted them, ibid. 435.
- Pythius*, the Surname of Apollo, ii. 419.
- Python*, a Serpent, whose Offspring the Poets make him, i. 504, 512. He is overthrown by Apollo; the Origin of the Pythian Games, ii. 408, 419. That the Typhon of the Egyptians is the Model of the Fable of Python, i. 504, 512.
- Pytocampes*, a Freebooter slain by Theseus, iii. 107.

Q.

- QUADRATUS, one of Mercury's Epithets, ii. 375.
- Quail*, was offered in Sacrifice to Hercules, iv. 116. The Quality ascribed to the Smell of that Fowl, ibid. Latona transformed into a Quail. See Latona.
- Queen*, one of Juno's Epithets, ii. 241.
- Queen*, by Way of Eminence, the same with Rhea and Pandora, i. 107. Her History according to the Atlantides, ibid.
- Queen* of the Sacrifices at Rome, Regina Sacrorum, i. 294.
- Querron*, a Lake in Egypt, whence the Greeks formed their Acheron, iii. 26, 27.
- Quies*, a Roman Goddess, her Temples, iii. 194.
- Quindecimvirs*, Ministers established for keeping the Sibylline Books, i. 296, 374, 375.
- Quinquatria*, a Festival of the Scholars at Rome, i. 314.
- Quirinalia*, another Festival celebrated at Rome, i. 314. iii. 204.
- Quirinus*, a Name given to Mars; the Distinction between the Name Quirinus and that of Gradivus, ii. 319.
- Quirinus*, a Name given also to Romulus; why, i. 314. ii. 319. iii. 186, 204.
- Quirita*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 242.

R.

- RABDOMANCY, a Kind of Divination, i. 393.
- Race*, one of the Exercises practised in the Games, iv. 417.
- Rachel*. See Teraphims.
- Radagaisus*, the Heroe of the Heruli, iii. 333.
- Rainbow*. See Iris.
- Ram* with the Golden Fleece. See Golden Fleece, Argonauts. Another Ram with a Golden Fleece, that was the Cause of all the Calamities of the Pelopidae, iv. 254, 258, 267.
- Raven*, consecrated to Apollo, ii. 417.

Regifugium,

I N D E X.

- Regifugium*, a Festival so called by the Romans; why, i. 315.
- Reidanus*, a River in Prussia, ii. 391. See Cygnus and the Heliades.
- Religion*, how many ancient Religions are distinguished, i. 161. That the Substance of all Religions was ever the same, 169. What was the Religion of the Learned in the Pagan World, 171. See Idolatry and Theogony.
- Remmon*, or Rimmon, a God of the Syrians, ii. 1.
- Rempham*. See Kiun.
- Remus*. See Romulus.
- Rescintus*, one of Juno's Appellations, ii. 244.
- Retheum*, a Promontory, near which was erected a Tomb to Ajax, iv. 285.
- Rex Sacrificulus* or King-Priest at Rome, i. 294.
- Rhadamanthus*, the Son of Jupiter and Europe, ii. 169. iii. 402, 482. One of the Judges of Hell, iii. 22. His History, 42, 489, &c. That there were several Persons of this Name, 492.
- Rhadina*, a Heroine, by whom worshipped, iii. 435.
- Rhampus*, a City in Attica, the Worship of Nemesis established in that City, iii. 93.
- Rhamsinitus*, King of Egypt, what he did to the Temple of Vulcan at Memphis, i. 220, 221. His Descent into Hell, iii. 41.
- Rhamnusia*, the Surname of the Goddess Nemesis, iii. 94.
- Rhapsodists*, who they were, ii. 304.
- Rhea*, one of the eight great Divinities of Egypt, i. 105, 492. Her Children; her History according to the Greeks, 113, 115. ii. 165. How she was delivered of Jupiter, ii. 165. the Earth worshipped under the Name of Rhea, i. 196. ii. 552.
- Rhea Sylvia*, the Mother of Remus and Romulus, i. 75. Who was the God Mars, by whom she was got with Child, ii. 316. iv. 313, 314.
- Rhea*, the Daughter of Uranus, becomes Chronos's Concubine; her Children, i. 96.
- Rheo*, the Daughter of Staphilus, the Mother of Anius; to whom she had a Child, iv. 321.
- Rhesus*, King of Thrace, comes to the Relief of Troy, iv. 220. He is slain before he enters Troy, and his Horses are stole; why, 229.
- Rhine*, a River in Veneration among the Gauls, why, iii. 221. How they tried the Fidelity of their Wives by that River, 248.
- Rhodea*, a Nymph, ii. 532.

Rhodes,

I N D E X.

Rhodes, an Island, whence its Name derived, i. 60. The Worship it paid to Minerva, ii. 301. The Fable of the golden Shower having fallen in that Island ; why Minerva quitted it, and repaired to Athens, 302. The Transformation of the Rhodians into Rocks, iv. 397.

Riches, Divinities who presided over them, i. 198.

Ridiculus, a Roman Divinity, his Origin, iii. 197.

Ring, the Origin of the first Ring that was worn, ii. 281.

A Ring that was thrown into the Sea by Minos, and given back to Theseus by Amphitrite, iii. 506.

Risus, the God Risus, or Laughter, a Divinity ; his gay Festival, iii. 180.

Rivers, of whom they are said to be propagated, i. 114.

Their Number, ibid. Every River had a tutelar Divinity, i. 45. ii. 280. The Worship paid to Rivers was universal, ii. 479. Whereupon it was founded, 480. How Sacrifice was performed to them, ii. 97, 485. Infernal Rivers, iii. 34. The Foundation of their Fable, 37.

Robigalia, a Festival so called, i. 315.

Robigus, a God of Corn ; the Etymology of his Name, i. 198, 315. ii. 589.

Rodigast, a Divinity of the Germans, how they represented him, iii. 331.

Romans, their Religion, i. 124. That they added several Divinities to those of other Nations, 199, 201.

Rome, raised to a Divinity ; her Worship ; how she was represented, iii. 202.

Romulus, his Birth, i. 75. The Care he took of Religion, iii. 182, 183. Was ranked among the Gods ; his Worship ; his Temple ; his Pontif, 186, 202, &c. A Festival instituted in his Honour ; under what Name he was worshipped, 204.

Rose, a Flower consecrated to Venus, why, ii. 332.

Rotunda, the modern Name of the Pantheon, i. 231.

Routren, one of the principal Gods of the East Indies, i. 12.

Rumilia, a Goddess ; why invoked, i. 197.

Rumina, or Rumia, a Goddess ; why invoked, i. 197. iii. 192.

Runcina, a Goddess of the Harvest, ii. 591.

Rusina, or Rutina, a Goddess of the Fields, ii. 591. iii. 199.

S.

SABASIA, a Festival so called, i. 306.

Sabastus, one of Bacchus's Names, ii. 447.

Sabath, to go by Night to Sabbath ; the Origin of that Notion, iii. 247, 248.

I N D E X.

- Sabeans*, an Arabic Nation ; a Sacrifice which they offered every Day to the Sun, i. 571, 574.
- Sabism*, what Sort of Religion it was ; the Object of that Religion, i. 162, 177, 190, ii. 2.
- Sacæ*, a Name of the Scythians, ii. 130.
- Sacrifice*, what it is ; the Simplicity of the first Sacrifices, i. 254. When bloody Sacrifices began, 256. And the barbarous Sacrifices of human Victims, 258. Who were at first the Ministers of the Sacrifices, 261. Their necessary Qualifications, 262. Different Sorts of Sacrifice, ibid. Different Sacrifices allotted to different Gods, ibid. and 263. Prayer, and other Ceremonies used at them, 271. Instruments of Sacrifice, 276. Ministers of Sacrifice, 280 to 297. See Priests. What was meant by the Sacrifices of the Dead, ii. 54.
- Sadid*, the Son of Chronos, who put him to Death, i. 95.
- Sagaritis*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Sagittarius*, a Constellation, how it was formed, iii. 540. iv. 407.
- Sain*, the Island of Sain, situated upon the Coast of Britain ; what Divinity was adored there ; the Reputation of the Druidesses of that Island, iii. 284.
- Sais*, a City in Egypt, whence it derived its Name, i. 60. What Animals were worshipped there, 202, 545. The singular Temple built there by Amasis, 221. The Festival that was celebrated there in honour of Minerva, 559.
- Sails*, of Ships, to whom the Invention of them is attributed, iii. 509, 520.
- Sakea*, a Goddess, the same with Anaitis, ii. 128.
- Seasons*, by whom they were brought forth, i. 116.
- Salacer*, a Divinity of Rome, iii. 196.
- Salacia*, the Goddess of Tempests, i. 199. The Wife of Neptune, ii. 498.
- Salamis*, a City in Cyprus, its ancient Name ; what Sacrifices were offered there, iii. 375.
- Salentum*, a City in Italy, by whom built, iii. 354, 355.
- Salii*, Priests of Mars at Rome, by whom instituted, and why, ii. 320, 321.
- Salisubulus*, an Epithet given to Mars, ii. 320.
- Salmacis*, her Passion for Hermaphroditus ; the Foundation of this Fable ; a Fountain of the same Name, iv. 367.
- Salmoneus*, the Son of Eolus, iii. 390. His History, 393. Condemned to Tartarus ; why, 23.
- Salus*, the Goddess of Health, her Worship at Rome, iii. 167.
- Samia*, one of Juno's Appellations, ii. 244.

I N D E X:

Samos, an Island; the Worship that was paid there to Juno, ii. 235, 244, 246.

Samothæi, a Name given to the Druids, iii. 227.

Samothrace, an Island; what Gods were worshipped there, ii. 70, 71. The Renown of the Mysteries of Samothrace, iv. 149, 150.

Salmydeffa, a City in Thracia. See Phineus.

Salt, by whom the Use of it was found out, i. 94. Salt employed in Sacrifices, 255, 257, 269.

Sanchoniathon, the ancient Historian of the Phenicians; in what Age he lived, i. 58. Fragments of his History, 86, &c. Why he has mentioned only the Descendants of Cain, 93.

Sangaris, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.

Sangus or Sanctus, an Epithet given to Jupiter by the Sabines, ii. 224.

Sanctus, one of Hercules's Epithets, iv. 122.

Sares, the Custom of reckoning Years by Sares; how many Years a Sare denoted, i. 86. in the Note.

Sarmates, their Gods, ii. 145.

Saron, the God of Seamen, ii. 522. His History, ibid. and 524.

Sarpedon, the Son of Jupiter and Laodamia, iii. 475. The Troops which he commanded at the Siege of Troy, 479.

Sarpedon, the Son of Jupiter and Europa, iii. 402, 482. His History, 483, 492.

Sarnides, Ministers of Religion among the Gauls, their Functions, iii. 226.

Sarug, the Father of Abraham. See Abraham.

Saturnalia, Roman Festivals, how they were celebrated, i. 306, 307. ii. 256. Why instituted, ii. 184.

Saturn, the Etymology of the Name, ii. 257. His Genealogy according to the Tradition of the Atlantides, ii. 254. According to the Greeks, i. 112, 113. ii. 165, 172. His History, ii. 165, 253. The Age wherein he lived, ii. 292. What meant by the Stone he is said to have swallowed, ii. 189. Why said to devour his Children, 165, 166, 173, 257. To be bound with Fetters of Wool in his Prison, ii. 182. To be thrown down to Tartarus by Jupiter, 184. The Worship paid to Saturn, 258, 263, 279. He was one of the great Gods of the Egyptians, i. 105, 492. How he was represented, i. 253. ii. 182, 260.

Saturn, the Planet, what the Philosophers have said of it, ii. 257.

Saturnia, the ancient Name of Italy, ii. 256.

Satyres, Rural Gods, how represented, ii. 592, 596. Their Origin, 592, 593. Whether they were Men. Stories

I N D E X.

- of several Satyres, 594, 595. The Etymology of the Name, 596. The Mourning of the Satyres for the Death of Osiris, i. 539, 544.
- Saw*, who was the Inventor of that Instrument, and what was the Model of it, iii. 521.
- Scamander*, the King of Phrygia, iv. 249.
- Schylinide*, a Nymph beloved by Jupiter; her Children, ii. 170.
- Seia*, a Goddess for Corn, i. 198.
- Sciomancy*, a Sort of Divination, i. 396.
- Sciron*, a Robber slain by Theseus; his Villanies; his Memory justified by the Megarians, iv. 134.
- Sculptors*, that they gave Rise to several Fables, and to several Divinities, i. 44, 169, 193, 201.
- Sculpture*, the Antiquity of that Art; Artists who signalized themselves therein in Greece, i. 246, 247.
- Scuvac*, a God of the Arabians, i. 570.
- Scylla*, the Daughter of Nisus; she betrayed her Father, and was transformed into a Lark, iv. 294, &c.
- Scylla* and Charybdis, fabulous Monsters; the Origin of this Fable, i. 29, 74. iv. 294, 295.
- Scythe* of Saturn, i. 113. ii. 180, 181. Why represented with a Scythe in his Hand, 182.
- Scythians*, a Northern Nation, their Religion, i. 192, 193. ii. 135. Their first Gods, ii. 138. Their Superstitions, 140. Their Origin; Monuments of their Religion, 141. The Country which they inhabited, 170, 171.
- Scythism*, what Religion it was, i. 162.
- Sea*, worshipped as a Divinity, i. 196. ii. 474, 475. See Ocean, Water, Neptune. The Egyptians looked upon the Sea with Abhorrence; why, i. 516. ii. 478. The Chinese Way of accounting for the ebbing and flowing of the Sea, i. 147.
- Sebasius*, an Epithet of Jupiter, ii. 220.
- Sebrus*, one of the Grecian Heroes, iii. 434.
- Secespita*, an Instrument for Sacrifice, i. 278.
- Security*, a Divinity of the Greeks and Romans, how she was represented; Gods who procured Security, iii. 137.
- Seia* and Segetia, Goddesses of Corn, i. 198. ii. 588.
- Seed-time*, the Holy-days of Seed-time, a Festival in honour of the Earth, ii. 553.
- Selamanes*, ii. 221. See Mahdachus.
- Selago*, a Plant, otherwise called Black Hellebore; the Use which the Druids made of it, iii. 235, 236.
- Scelene*, the Daughter of Hyperion and Rhea; her Death; her

I N D E X.

- Worship under the Name of Isis, or of the Moon, i. 105, 107.
- Sem*, the Son of Noah; whether he preserved in his Lifetime the Worship of the true God, i. 167, 169. Whence his Descendants received Idolatry, 177.
- Semele*, the Daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, i. 117. iii. 411. The Mother of Bacchus by Jupiter; her Death, ii. 170, 436, 444. iii. 413. Was ranked among the Goddesses, iii. 449.
- Semiramis*, her Birth; the Etymology of her Name, ii. 33. Her Death; her Metamorphosis into a Pigeon, 34.
- Semixas*, the Head of the Rebel Angels, i. 121.
- Semnothei*, a Name of the Druids, iii. 227.
- Semo Sangus*, the Divinity of the Sabines, iii. 207.
- Semonia*, a Goddess of the Romans, iii. 193.
- Senani*, a Name given to the Druids, iii. 253.
- Sentia*, a Goddess over good Thoughts, iii. 199.
- Sentinus*, a Divinity who inspired with Thought, iii. 191.
- Senuius*, a God who presided over old Age, i. 198.
- Septimontium*, a Roman Festival, i. 315.
- Serapis*, one of the great Gods of Egypt; whether he is the same with Osiris, i. 492, 524, 525. The Origin of this God, 524. A Law forbidding to say that Serapis had been a Man, 530. That he is the same with Pluto, 527.
- Scriphus*, an Island, the Inhabitants whereof petrified by Medusa's Head, iii. 439. The Foundation of this Fable, 454.
- Serpent*, the Symbol of the Divinity among the Egyptians, i. 104. In Veneration in several Countries, 203. Serpents slain by Hercules in the Cradle, iv. 82.
- Serpent*, a Constellation; of what God said to be the Residence, i. 195. iv. 407.
- Serpentarius*, a Constellation, of what it is formed, iv. 407.
- Sesac*, a Divinity named in the Prophet Jeremiah, ii. 128, 129.
- Sesak*, a God of the Babylonians, ii. 1.
- Seth*, one of the Names of Typhon, i. 492.
- Severus*, the Emperor honoured with divine Worship, i. 582.
- Shades*, distinguished from Souls, what we are to understand by that Word, i. 142, 432. The Destiny of the Shade after Death, iii. 13, 14. Shades wandering upon the Banks of the Cocytus and Acheron, iii. 21, 38. The Origin of the Notion, ibid.
- Shcep*, a City in Egypt where they were worshipped, i. 545. The Origin of that Worship, 553.

I N D E X.

- Ship Argo*, the Origin of the Name, iv. 12, 14. Whereof it was built, i. 65, 66. iv. 13. Its Form, 14. Its Destiny after the Return of the Argonauts, iv. 55. See Argo.
- Ships*, Æneas's Ships transformed into Sea-Nymphs; the Origin of this Fable, i. 14, 42. Ship of the Argonauts, why said to have spoke, i. 65, 66. Ship built by Xixutrus, to save himself from the Deluge, i. 86, 87. Theseus's Ship, what became of it, iii. 508, 509. The various Forms of the Grecian Ships, iv. 14. The Ships of the Greeks for the Siege of Troy, 216. The Custom of giving Names to Ships, ii. 89.
- Sibyls*. Whether there were Sibyls, i. 361. Their Number, 364. Whether they had the Gift of Prediction, 369. The Collection of the Sibylline Verses, 372. How they delivered their Oracles, 382. The Longevity that was attributed to them, 385. Of the Worship paid to the Sibyls, 387.
- Showers* of Stone; of Ashes; of Fire; what those Showers were, i. 413, 415.
- Sicharbas*, or Sichæus, Dido's Husband, assassinated by Pygmalion, iv. 318.
- Sicily*, an Island consecrated to Ceres and Proserpine, iii. 46, 47, 50, 51, 61.
- Sicyon*, King of Sicyon to which he communicated his Name, iii. 362.
- Sicyon*, a City and Kingdom in the Peloponnesus; in what Period of Time that Kingdom was founded; the Series of its Kings; it was united to the Kingdom of Argos, iii. 358, 360, 361, 362.
- Sidon*, the Daughter of Pontus, the first who composed Odes, i. 97.
- Sidonians*, who was their principal Divinity, ii. 2.
- Sigalion*, the God of Silence, i. 199.
- Silenus*, the Foster-father of Bacchus; the various Characters given of him by the Ancients; his History, ii. 602, 603. The Explanation of the Fables that are blended with it, 605. The Worship that was paid to him, 609.
- Sileni*. See Satyres.
- Simpulum*, or Simpurium, an Instrument of Sacrifice, i. 277.
- Sinistra*, what Sort of Signs so called, i. 403.
- Sinius*, a Giant surnamed the Pine-bender, his Death, iv. 133.
- Sinon*, the Greek, his Artifice for surprizing the Trojans, iv. 236.
- Sippara*, the City of the Sun, i. 85. See the Note.
- Sirens*, the Origin of the Name, i. 65. Who the Sirens were;

I N D E X.

- were; the Idea given of them by the Poets, ii. 539. The Explanation of the Fables delivered about them, 542. Whether there ever were Sirens, 544. Who are the Sirens mentioned by Job, 545.
- Sisyphus*, the Son of Eolus, iii. 390. Built the City Corinth; his Children, 392.
- Sisyphus* the second, the Descendant of Eolus, the Successor of Medea in the Kingdom of Corinth, iii. 104. His History; Fables delivered in relation to him; his Punishment in Tartarus, iii. 23, 104, 106, 107. His Descendants, 107. His Piety towards Melicerta, ibid.
- Six*, the Number Six in Veneration among the Druids, iii. 241.
- Siwa*, a Goddess of the Germans; how she is represented, iii. 331.
- Sleep*, by whom procreated, iii. 98. Why invoked; how he was represented, 99. Dreams, the Children of Sleep; where Sleep had his Residence, 100. Who was Eternal Sleep, 101.
- Sminthian*, an Appellation given to Apollo, ii. 420.
- Smyt*, one of the Names of Typhon, i. 492.
- Sneezings*, the Presages that were drawn from thence, i. 410.
- Sogdiana*, a Country of Asia possessed by the Scythians, ii. 171.
- Sohail*, a God of the Arabians, i. 570.
- Solymi*, a People of Lycia, on whom Belierophon made War, iii. 473.
- Somnialis*, an Epithet given to Hercules, iv. 121.
- Somniales Dii*, Gods who presided over Dreams, ibid.
- Soraetes*, an Epithet given to Apollo, ii. 420.
- Soranus*, a God of the Sabines, the same with Pluto, iii. 45.
- Sorceresses*, who drew down the Moon to the Earth; the Origin of this Fable, i. 46. See the Note, iii. 33.
- Sortilegi*, Ministers of the Temples, i. 282.
- Sose*, the ancient Practice of reckoning by Soses, i. 86. in the Note.
- Sesipolis*, a God of the Eleans, his History, iii. 169.
- Seipita*, a Goddess of Women in Child-bed, i. 197. One of Juno's Epithets, ii. 241.
- Sejus*, one of the Egyptian Demi-Gods, i. 493.
- Soul*, universal, that animated the whole Universe, imagined by the Poets and Philosophers, i. 171, 206, 439, 443, 444. The Worship that was paid to Souls, i. 179, &c. The State of Souls after Death; the Opinion of the Americans, i. 142. Of the Ancients, 182, 194, 494, ii. 528, 529. Of the Egyptians, iii. 2. Of the Greek Phi-

I N D E X.

- Philosophers, 6. Of the Poets, 8. The Distinction between the Soul and Shade, 13. See Elisean.
- Sow*, the white Sow that shewed Eneas where he was to settle in Italy, iv. 233.
- Spain*, whence the Name derived, i. 60. A Country once abounding with Gold and Silver Mines, iii. 43. Pluto established his Kingdom there, 44. The Religion of the ancient Spaniards, 301.
- Speculatrix*, one of Venus's Epithets, ii. 333.
- Spermo*, Ancus's Daughter, transformed into a Pigeon, iv. 321.
- Sphinx*, whose Offspring they make this Monster, i. 114. iv. 181. The History of the Sphinx of Oedipus, iv. 180. The Explanation of the Fable, 181. How the Sphinx of Egypt is represented ; that it is different from that of Thebes, 182. in the Note.
- Spider*, the Indians believed the World to be spun out of that Insect's Bowels, i. 139.
- Spinusius*, a God of the Romans, ii. 591.
- Spio*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Spirit*, universal, diffused through the Universe, i. 171.
- Spirits*, the Idolatry of Spirits ; the Causes of that Idolatry, i. 179.
- Sponsor*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 224.
- Stabilitor*, one of Neptune's Epithets, i. 500.
- Stadium*, the Place where the Olympick Games were exhibited ; its Extent ; the Trials of Skill that were performed there, iv. 427.
- Stag*, with the brazen Horns, taken by Hercules, iv. 86, 87.
- Staphila*, a Nymph transformed into a Vine, ii. 453.
- Stars*, various Sentiments about their Origin, i. 82, 90, 103, 112, 115. The Worship that was paid to them, 165, 181, &c. See Sun, Moon. The Ancients believed the Stars to be animated, i. 184. See Constellations. The Care which Moses took to abolish the Worship of the Stars, 185.
- Stata*, a Goddess of the Romans, iii. 197.
- Statanus* and Statilinus, Gods of Children, i. 197. iii. 192.
- Stator*, an Epithet given to Jupiter, ii. 217.
- Statues*, that the Egyptians were Masters of the Art of Statuary Time immemorial, i. 246. Who was the first that applied himself to the Improvement of Statues, 247. What those were which they called Terms, or Hermes's, 248. Of what Matter the Statues were, 249. Of Colossal Statues, 250. Statues charged with Symbols of the Gods, 252. What induced to the Adoration of Statues, 169, 252. Statues prohibited at Rome in the Beginning ; when they were introduced thither, 208, 250, 251, 289. Statues

I N D E X.

- tues of the Temple of Babylon, 219. Statue of Jupiter Ammon, how it delivered its Oracles, 333.
- Semmutius*, worshipped as a Heroe, iii. 433.
- Stenclus*, King of Argos, his Genealogy, iii. 358, 365.
The Father of Euristheus, 365.
- Steno*, the Name of a Gorgon, i. 114. iii. 438.
- Stenobæa*, the Wife of Prætus, who has a Mind to destroy Tellerophon, iii. 367, 467.
- Stephanophori*, Priests so called, iii. 186.
- Sterces*, King of Italy, the Father of Picus, named Saturn after his Death, ii. 269.
- Stephanophorus*, one of the Priests in the Festival of Ceres, iii. 62.
- Sterculus*, a Surname of Saturn; why, ii. 590.
- Stercutius*, the God of Ordure, i. 199.
- Sterope*, one of the Cyclops, i. 113.
- Sterquilinius*, the Surname of the God Pilumnus, ii. 590.
- Sthenius*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.
- Stilbia*, the Daughter of Peneus, beloved by Apollo, iii. 526.
- Sthenias*, one of Minerva's Epithets, ii. 309. Her Children, ibid.
- Stimyclerus*, one of the Grecian Heroes, iii. 434.
- Stons*, swallowed by Saturn, i. 115. ii. 166, 188. Became the Object of religious Worship, i. 203. ii. 189. How it was called; the Explanation of this Fable, ii. 189, 190.
- Stones Bætili*. See Bætili.
- Stones* (shapeless) worshipped as Divinities, i. 208.
- Strenua*, a Goddess, who she was, iii. 130, 140, 194.
- Strophæus*, King of Phocis, the Father of Pylades, iv. 260.
Also Pylades's Son of the same Name, iv. 264.
- Stymphalus*, the Son of Elatus, communicated his Name to a City built in Greece, iii. 355.
- Stymphalus*, a Lake in Arcadia; the Fable of the Birds Stymphalides, iv. 83.
- Styx*, her Offspring, i. 115.
- Styx*, a Fountain in Arcadia, whose Water is mortal; the Origin of the Fable of the infernal River, iii. 36. What Styx imports, 28, 37. The fabulous History of the Styx. Why the Oath taken by Styx was to be inviolable; the Punishment of Perjurers, i. 115, 123. iii. 36. 37.
- Styx*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Suada*, the Goddess of Orators, i. 200.
- Swan*, consecrated to Venus, ii. 331. And to Apollo, ii. 417.
- Suantowith*, a God of the Germans, how he was represented, iii. 331.

I. N D E X.

- Succoth-Benoth*, a God of the Babylonians, ii. 1, 61. The Signification of these Terms, 61.
- Suevi*, a People in Germany, iii. 308. Their Religion, 311, 325, 327.
- Sumanus*, the Surname of Pluto, i. 44. iii. 45. The Origin of the Name, iii. 45.
- Sumatians*, from whence they came, iii. 355.
- Sumes*, a Name which the Carthaginians gave to Mercury, ii. 374.
- Sun*, the great Divinity of the Phenicians, i. 91. Of the Egyptians, i. 103, 493. Of the Atlantides, 109. Of the Americans, who sacrificed to him their Children, 144, 145. That Idolatry commenced with the Worship of the Sun, 182, &c. A Custom among the Pagans of turning towards the rising Sun to pray, and of directing that Way the Portals of their Temples, 187. The Foundation of the Worship of the Sun, 45, 165, 185. Under what Names he was adored among the several Nations, 188. How he was represented, ii. 381, &c. Apollo often confounded with the Sun, ii. 378, &c. Whose Son the Greeks made him, i. 114. Princes who assumed the Title of Sons of the Sun, i. 141, 145, 188, 189.
- Superstitions* authorized by Idolatry, i. 325. Superstitions of the Druids, iii. 235, &c. Of the Gauls, 246, &c.
- Supplications* publick and private, on what Occasions they were performed, i. 317.
- Syca*, a Nymph beloved by Bacchus, transformed into a Fig-Tree, ii. 453.
- Sword*, the Symbol of the God Mars among the Scythians, i. 209. ii. 317, 319. The Sword of Mars stole by Mercury, ii. 370.
- Sydic*, surnamed the Free, the Father of the Dioscuri, i. 94. Is the same with Shem, the Son of Noah or Uranus, 96.
- Sylla*, or Scylla, her History, iii. 494.
- Sylvanus*, a Divinity, the Terror of Children, i. 197. The Origin of that God; how he is represented, ii. 599. His Worship in great Vogue at Rome and in the Gauls, 600. He is confounded with Pan, i. 540.
- Sylvestris*, an Epithet given to Mars, ii. 320.
- Sylvius*, the posthumous Son of Eneas, King of Alba, iv. 313. The Duration of his Reign, ibid.
- Symplegades*. See Cyaneæ.
- Syrinx*, a Nymph transformed into a Reed, i. 538.

I N D E X.

T.

- TAAUT, or Tbaut. See Thot.
Tabernacle, built by Moses, whether this was the first Temple raised to the Deity, i. 210.
Table Iliac. See Iliac.
Table Ifiac. See Ifiac.
Tadmor, or Tanor, or Palmyra, the Etymology of the Name; Gods who were adored there. The Temple of Belus that was there, ii. 64, 65.
Tages, he who first taught the Tuscans the Science of the Auspices. His History, i. 397, 405, 406.
Talapains, the Disciples of Fo among the Siamese, i. 136.
Talaus, the Son of Bias, King of Argos, and his Successor, iii. 364.
Talismans, Magical Figures very much in Use among the Ancients, and with which the Orientals are still infatuated, ii. 42, 43.
Talus, the Nephew of Dedalus, and his Scholar in Statuary; the Instruments which he invented; his Genius excites the Jealousy of Dedalus, who puts him to Death, iii. 520. He is transformed into a Partridge, iii. 318. iii. 521.
Tancis, a Divinity peculiar to the Armenians, iii. 175.
Tanga-Tanga, the Idol of Peru, what is the Import of the Name, i. 12.
Tantalus, the Misrepresentations which the Poets have given of him, i. 39. His Genealogy, iii. 111. iv. 213. Made War upon Tros King of Troy, iii. 114. iv. 213. Why he is said to be condemned to Tartarus, iii. 23, 111. The Explication of this Fable, iii. 113, 114.
Tantalus, the Son of Thyestes, the first Husband of Clytemnestra, iv. 258.
Tao-se, a Sect introduced into China, i. 134.
Taphius, who built Taphos, iii. 365.
Taranus, the Epithet of Jupiter among the Gauls, ii. 222, 266, 267.
Taras, the Son of Neptune, Founder of Tarentum; how he is represented, ii. 506.
Taraxippus, a Genius, whose Figure was placed in the Stadium of Olympia; for what End: worshipped as a God by the Eleans, ii. 503, 504. iii. 178.
Tartack, a God of the Heccans, and of the Syrians, his Festival, ii. 62.
Tartarus, its Origin, i. 116. ii. 185. iii. 2. Where the Poets have placed it, iii. 9. The Pains of Tartarus, 15, & sequ.

I N D E X.

- & sequ. a Description of Tartarus, 22, 23, 103, &c.
 & sequ.
- Tartessus*, a River in Spain, iii. 9. Pluto settled on the Confines of that River, gave Rise to the Tartarus of the Infernal Regions, 44.
- Tauris*, or Chersonesus Taurica, where it is situated. The Religion of its People, ii. 141.
- Taurobole*, or Tauropolium, a Sort of Sacrifice; its Description, i. 273.
- Tauros Trigaranus*, the Explication of these Words on a Bas-Relief discovered, iii. 260, 261.
- Taurus*, the Prince who carried off Europa, ii. 402.
- Taurus*, a young Lord of Minos's Court, his Intrigue with Pasiphae, iii. 499.
- Taygete*, the Daughter of Atlas, i. 108. ii. 273.
- Tchu-Mong*, his Birth and Adventures, i. 146.
- Tebrus*, worshipped as a Heroe, iii. 434.
- Technites*, his History according to the Phenicians, i. 92.
- Tegeas*, the Son of Lycaon, who founded the City of Tegæa,
 iii. 354.
- Tegæa*, a City in Arcadia, ibid.
- Telamon*, the Father of Ajax, iv. 16, 104, 214. His Genealogy, 134, 135, 270. He is banished his Country, 270, 271. He gains the Kingdom of Megara, 273.
 Revenges upon Ulysses the Death of his Son Ajax, 290.
- Telchines*, Inhabitants of the City Talisus, the Signification of the Name, iv. 397.
- Telchinians*, a Sort of Priests; whether they are to be confounded with the Cabiri, ii. 81, 82.
- Telcboans*, People of the Colony that was planted in the Isle of Taphos. What is the Import of the Word, iv. 74.
- Telechus*, the Son of Archelaus, worshipped as a Heroe, iii. 431.
- Telegonus*, the Son of Ulysses and Circe, iv. 298. How he slew his Father, 302, 303.
- Teleia*, an Epithet given to Juno, ii. 245.
- Telemachus*, the Son of Ulysses and Penelope, his History, iv.
 303.
- Telephus*, the Son of Hercules and Augé, iv. 112. Drawn to the Siege of Troy; his History, 230, 231.
- Telephus* receives the Honours of Sacrifice at Pergamus, iii. 432.
- Telesphorus*, one of the Gods of Physicians, i. 200. How represented, iii. 165.
- Tellumo*, what God this was, ii. 552.
- Tellus*, one of the Names of the Earth, i. 196. ii. 551.
- Temenes*, one of the Heraclidæ; what City he had for his Lot in the Peloponnesus, iv. 129.

Temerus,

I N D E X.

- Temerus*, a Robber slain by Theseus; whence came the Proverb of the Temerian Evil, iv. 134.
- Temesius* of Clasemenos, worshipped as a Heroe among the Thracians, ii. 147, 148.
- Tempest*, a Divinity among the Romans, iii. 140.
- Temples*, the Origin of Temples, i. 210. Various Names given to the Temples; their Etymology, 212. How the Temples of the Ancients were divided, 213. The Consecration of Temples, 214. The Veneration which the Pagans had for Temples, 216. A Description of some of the most celebrated ones. The Temple of Belus, 217, &c. The Temple of Vulcan at Memphis, 220. The Temple of Diana at Ephesus, 222. The Temple of Olympian Jupiter, 225. The Temple of Apollo at Delphos, 229. The Temples of Rome, 231. Temples of the ancient Gauls, iii. 217, 221, &c. 280, 281. Temples of the Americans, i. 143.
- Tenarus*, a Promontory, where, according to the Poets, was the Gate of Hell, iii. 12, 32. iv. 99.
- Tenes*, the great Divinity of the Island of Tenedos, iii. 178.
- Tereus*, the Husband of Progne. See Progne and Philomele.
- Terminus*, the God of the Fields and Land-Marks, i. 198. ii. 571. His Worship, ii. 573. The Veneration for that God heightened by an Event, 574.
- Terminalia*, a Roman Festival, i. 315.
- Terpsichore*, one of the nine Muses, her Attributes; what is the Import of her Name, ii. 433.
- Terra*. See Earth.
- Terribilis*, or Terrible, an Epithet given to Mars, ii. 320.
- Terror*, whose Offspring, i. 117.
- Terror Panick*, The Origin of the Name, i. 539, 540.
- Tetbis*, the Daughter of Heaven and Earth, i. 113. Her Children, 114. ii. 482, 490. The Wife of the Ocean; the Service which she did to Jupiter, ii. 489.
- Teucer*, the Father-in-law of Dardanus, left the Island of Crete, and came and settled in the lesser Phrygia, iv. 249, 250.
- Teucramus*, the Son of Dorus, the first King of Crete, his Descendants, iii. 395.
- Teutamus*, King of Suzza, sends a Supply to Priam, iv. 326.
- Teutates*. See Theutat.
- Teuthis*, a Village in Arcadia; the Statue of Minerva that was there, ii. 310.
- Tentbis*, Leader of the Arcadians to the Siege of Troy; the Fable of the Wound which he gave Minerva, ii. 311.
- Thalassius*, the God of Marriage, i. 197. ii. 249.

Thalessa,

I N D E X.

- Thaleſſa*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Thalia*, ibid.
- Thalia*, one of the three Graces, i. 117. See Graces.
- Thalia*, the Mother of the Gods Palici, ii. 170.
- Thalia*, one of the nine Muses, her Attributes; what is the Import of her Name, ii. 432.
- Thamimaſdes*, the Name of Neptune among the Scythians, ii. 497.
- Thamiras*, the Son of Philammon, a celebrated Poet and Muſician. His Adventure with the Muses, iv. 382, 383.
- Thamus*, his Relation concerning the Death of the great Pan, i. 541.
- Thaon*, one of the Giants, who made War upon Jupiter; his Death, ii. 169.
- Thaphius*, his Genealogy, communicates his Name to the Island of Cephalenia; his Descendants, iii. 365. iv. 74.
- Thargelia*, what Festival it was, i. 306.
- Tharſes*, the Son of Javan, founded the City Tarſus in Cilicia, iii. 351.
- Tharſus*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.
- Tharſus*, the Name of an Island and City where Hercules was peculiarly worſhipped, iv. 118.
- Thaſius*, the Surname of Hercules under which he was worſhipped by the Tyrians and Thaſians, iv. 73, 118.
- Thaumas*, the Father of Iris, i. 114.
- Thaut*. See Tbot.
- Thea*, the Daughter of Heaven and Earth, her Children, i. 113, 114.
- Theagenes* of Thaſus received divine Honours, why, iii. 431.
- Thebe*, the Daughter of Jupiter and Iodame, the Wife of Ogyges, iii. 370.
- Thebes*, a City in Egypt, how Jupiter was there represented, i. 202.
- Thebes*, a City in Bæotia, built by Cadmus, iii. 404, 405. Why its Walls ſaid to have been built by the Muſic of Amphion's Lyre, i. 77. iii. 416. The Hiſtory of the Wars of Thebes, iv. 178, & ſequ. The Æra of thoſe two Wars, 205.
- Thelſinea*, the Daughter of Ogyges. See Praxidician.
- Thelxiopè*, one of the Muses, ii. 430.
- Themis*, the Daughter of Heaven and Earth, i. 113. ii. 289. Her Children, i. 116, 117. ii. 291. She preſided over Juſtice; her Hiſtory, ibid. The Worſhip that was paid to her; her Oracles, 291, 292. A Divinity unknown in Egypt, ii. 152.

Themis,

I N D E X.

Themis. See Carmenta.

Theogonies of the Chaldeans, i. 80, & sequ. Of the Phenicians, 88. Of the Egyptians, 102. Of the Atlantides, 106. The several Theogonies of the Greeks, 109. That which was attributed to Orpheus, 110. That of Hesiod, 112. That of Plato, 118. That of Ovid, 125. Reflexions upon the Theogonies of the Greeks, 127. Theogonies of the Chinese and Indians, 130. Of the Indian Brachmans, 138. Of the Americans, 140.

Theology Pagan, especially that of the Poets, i. 148, & sequ. 475, & sequ.

Thene, the Daughter of Thestor. See Thestor.

Thesphane, transformed into a Sheep by Neptune, iv. 6.

Thesphy, or the Vision of the Gods, ii. 223.

Thesria, the Import of the Name, iii. 508.

Thera, an Island where the Mynians came and settled, iv. 53.

Theraphims, worshipped by the Syrians and Chaldeans, ii. 1, 39, 45. Laban's Theraphims, ibid. The Explanation of the Word Theraphims, 39, 42, 619. The Extent of this Superstition, 43. The Manner of making them, ibid. & 44. What they were, 47.

Therimachus, the Son of Hercules by Megara, iv. 112.

Thero, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.

Thero, the Name of Odin's Mother, ii. 316.

Theron, King of Spain, attempted to pillage the Temple of Hercules near Cadiz, iv. 96.

Thersander, the Son of Polynices, set upon the Throne of Thebes, iv. 192. His Death; a Monument raised to his Honour, ibid.

Theseus, his Genealogy; his Birth; his Education, iv. 130, &c. His first Adventures, 133. Makes himself known at Athens, 135, 136. His Expedition into Crete to vanquish the Minotaur, iii. 501. He abandons the fair Ariane, 504. His Return is the Cause of his Father's Death, ibid. The Festival he instituted in the Island of Delos, 508. He united in one Body politick all the Inhabitants of Attica, iv. 137. He renews the Isthmic Games, 138. His other Expeditions, 139. He carries off the fair Heien, 140, & sequ. His Misfortunes, 144. His Children; his Wives; his Death, 145, &c. His Apotheosis; the Worship that was paid to him, iii. 519. iv. 146. Whether he was in the Number of the Argonauts, 27, 28, 135, 136. Why condemned to Tartarus; His Punishment, iii. 23.

Theseia, a Festival of Theseus, i. 304.

Thesmophoria,

I N D E X.

- Thesmophoria*, a Festival in Honour of Ceres, i. 307. iii. 62. Celebrated at Athens and Eleusis, 61, 62.
- Thesmophoros*, an Epithet given to Ceres, iii. 51.
- Thesmophoros*, a Surname of Isis, i. 105.
- Thespia*, a City in Boeotia, ii. 435. Thence Thespeades, an Epithet of the Muses, ibid.
- Thespia*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Thesprotia*, the Situation of that Country, ii. 185.
- Thessala*, the Daughter of Hercules and Epicaeste, iv. 111.
- Thessaly*, Fables delivered concerning that Country, i. 46. See the Note, iii. 33.
- Thessalians*, the first Greeks who broke Horses, iii. 535.
- Thetor*, the Father of Calchas, one of the Argonauts, iv. 27, 60. His Adventure at the Court of the King of Caria, 405.
- Thetis*, the Wife of Peleus, whose Offspring she was, i. 118. Her Marriage with Peleus, iv. 208, &c. 272. How she made Achilles invulnerable, 274. Would gladly have hindered him from going to the Siege of Troy, 275.
- Theurgy*, a Kind of Magic, wherein it consisted; the high Estimation it was in among the Learned, i. 276, 427. Rigid Terms of being initiated into it, 427, 429. The Power that was ascribed to it, 430, 467.
- Theutates*, or Teutates, a God of the Gauls, what he was among the other Nations, i. 16, 44, 70. ii. 367, 375. He is the Mercury of the Gauls, iii. 268. He was also worshipped among the Spaniards, 269.
- Thiphis*, the Pilot of the Ship of the Argonauts, iv. 15, 18. His Death, 18, 38.
- Thiras*, one of the Descendants of Japhet, where he settled, iii. 351.
- Thireus*, the Son of Oeneus King of Calydon, and of Althea, iv. 173.
- Thisbe*. See Piramus.
- Thoas*, King of Lemnos, the Husband of the Venus who was Aeneas's Mother, ii. 326, 356. How he was saved from the Massacre of the Men of the Island, iv. 30. He reigned in the Island of Chios, 188.
- Thoe*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Thorebia*, ibid.
- Thornax*, a Mountain stiled the Cuckow Mount, ii. 236.
- Thot*, or Thaut, a God of the Egyptians, i. 16, 44, 70, 94. ii. 156. Reckoned the Inventor of the first Letters, i. 88, 94. His Genealogy, 94. Chronos gives him all Egypt, 99. That he is the most ancient Mercury, ii. 363. His

I N D E X.

- His Talents; the Arts which he invented, 363, 364. The Books he composed, 364, 365.
- Thracians*, whence they derived their Name, i. 60. The Gods whom they adored, ii. 147.
- Thunder of Jupiter*, forged by the Cyclops, i. 113. Given by Cælus, 115. Gods who had the Power of darting the Thunder, ii. 247. How it is represented, 228. Jupiter invoked under the Name of Fulgora against Thunder and Lightning, iii. 195.
- Thundering and Fulminating*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 222.
- Thuribulum*, or Censer, i. 277.
- Thuriferi*, Ministers of the Temples, i. 282.
- Thurius*, one of Mars's Epithets, ii. 319.
- Thyades*, a Name given to the Bacchanals, ii. 449.
- Thycha*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Thyche*, ii. 532.
- Thyella*, ibid.
- Thyestes* condemned to Tartarus, iii. 23. His Genealogy, 422. See Atreus.
- Thymetes*, King of Athens, dethroned; why, i. 300.
- Thysneus*, an Appellation of Bacchus, ii. 448.
- Thyone*, the Name of Semele, when she was taken into the Number of the Goddesses, ii. 449.
- Thyrea*, a City and Gulph of the Country of Argos, founded by Thyreas, iii. 354.
- Thyrs*, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Thyrus*, a Kind of Weapon that is given to Bacchus and the Bacchanals, ii. 449, 454, 456.
- Thyrsea*, a City of Greece, founded by Thyrus, iii. 354.
- Tien*, the Name given by the Chinese to their great God, what it signifies in their Language, i. 131.
- Time*, a Divinity, how represented, iii. 125. The Parts of Time also deified, ibid. The Divisions of the Times, i. 61, 62, 86, in the Note, iii. 336. The Duration of the Heroic Times, 345.
- Timor*. See Fear.
- Tiresias*, a celebrated Soothsayer, his History blended with Fables, iv. 203, 204. Ulysses goes to Hell to consult the Ghost of Tiresias, iii. 11, 13.
- Tisamenes*, the Son of Thersander King of Thebes, the Descendant of Oedipus, iv. 193.
- Tisiphone*, one of the Furies, iii. 78.
- Titaia*. See Titea.
- Titans*, their Origin according to the Atlantides, i. 106, 107. According to the Greeks, 113. ii. 170. Their History, i. 19,

I N D E X.

i. 19, 116. ii. 165, 170, & sequ. 214. Why said to have been condemned to Tartarus, 185. Whether they are to be distinguished from the Giants, ii. 170, 206, 207. The Titans known to the Orientals; 253. In what Age the Titans lived; that divine Honours were paid to them, 292, &c.

Titan, the eldest Son of Uranus, the Brother of Saturn; on what Condition he resigned the Empire to him, ii. 165.

Titan, a Name of the Sun, i. 296.

Titanides, the Name given to the seven Daughters of Chronos, i. 96.

Totania, the Festival of the Titans, i. 304.

Titea, the Wife of Uranus, her Children; her Apotheosis, i. 106. ii. 170. What is the Import of her Name, ii. 351.

Tithois, one of the Egyptian Demi-Gods, i. 493.

Tithonus, the Children he had by Aurora; his Genealogy; his History, iv. 326, 333. He was transformed into a Grasshopper, 327, 331.

Tityus, the Son of the Earth, his enormous Size; his Death; his Punishment in Tartarus, iii. 23, 107.

Tlepolemus, the Son of Hercules and Astioche, iv. 112.

Imolus, the Judge between Apollo and Pan, ii. 402. His History. A Mountain that bore his Name, 404.

Tochnus, Founder of the City Tochnia. His Genealogy, iii. 354.

Tombs of great Men turned to public Temples, i. 193, 194. What the Ancients understood by the Tombs of the Heroes, iii. 427.

Torcularius, one of Bacchus's Epithets, ii. 447.

Toredia, a Nymph beloved by Jupiter, her Children, ii. 170.

Tortoise, the Veneration of the Troglodytes for that Animal, i. 137. A Nymph transformed into a Tortoise; that it is the Symbol of Silence, ii. 236, 237.

Tosarthrus, iii. 155. See Esculapius.

Toxeus, the Brother of Althea, slain by Meleager; the Revenge of Althea, iv. 171, & sequ.

Toxus, the Son of Oeneus King of Calydon: who put him to Death, iv. 173.

Tranquillity, a Divinity, her Temple at Rome, iii. 129, 130.

Trapezeus, the Son of Lycaon, iii. 354.

Travellers, the Authors of several Fables, i. 36.

Trees, were the first Temples of the Gods, i. 207. See Sacred Groves. Trees consecrated to certain Divinities, 264.

I N D E X.

- Triambes*, an Epithet of Bacchus, ii. 447.
- Tripod* of Jason; the Fable about that Tripod, iv. 50, 51.
See Euritus.
- Tripods*, that were in the Temples, their Use; of how many Sorts, i. 279. The Tripod of the Temple of Delphos, 337.
- Triceps*, a Title given to Mercury, ii. 375.
- Tricolonus*, from whom the Tricolons came, iii. 355.
- Triclaria*, an Epithet given to Diana; The Temple of Diana Triclaria, ii. 425.
- Trident* of Neptune forged by the Cyclops, ii. 166, 499. Stole by Mercury when but an Infant, 370.
- Trieterica*, Feasts of Bacchus, i. 305. ii. 456.
- Trinity*, whether there are any Vestiges of that Mystery in the Pagan Divinities, i. 12.
- Triformis*, an Epithet of Diana; what it implied, ii. 423.
- Trigla*, a Divinity of the Germans, how she is represented; Her Worship, iii. 331.
- Triopas*, one of Inachus's Descendants, iii. 358.
- Triptolemus*, instructed by Ceres in Agriculture, his History; the Fables blended with it, iii. 49, 55, 58, 61.
- Triptolemus*, one of the Egyptian Gods, i. 492.
- Triptolemus*, worshipped as a Heroe, iii. 434.
- Trismegistus*. See Mercury Trismegistus.
- Triton*, who appeared to the Argonauts, iv. 51.
- Triton*, the Son of Neptune and Amphitrite, i. 117. ii. 511.
The Relation of several Tritons seen and fished, ii. 511, 512.
- Tritonia*, or Tritogenia, a Name given to Minerva, ii. 308.
- Trivestper*, one of Hercules's Epithets, iv. 122.
- Troilus*, the Son of Priam, slain by Achilles; his Life was one of the Fatalities of Troy, iv. 230, 239.
- Tropæa*, one of Juno's Epithets, ii. 243.
- Tropæuchus*, an Appellation of Jupiter, ii. 219.
- Trophonia*, the Festival of Trophonius, i. 304.
- Trophonius*, his Birth; his Talents; his Death; his Oracle, i. 340, &c.
- Trophonius*, an Epithet given to Jupiter, ii. 220.
- Tros*, King of Troy, the War which he had with Tantalus, iii. 114. iv. 213. His Genealogy; his Descendants 250, 251.
- Troy*, its Walls built by the Gods, i. 42. iv. 250. This City taken twice, i. 62. The Origin of the War of Troy, i. 154. iv. 207, & sequ. The History of the Siege of Troy, 220, & sequ. Fatalities annexed to the City Troy, 225. The Taking of the City, 232, & sequ. The Æra of that Event, 247. The History of that City, 248, & sequ.

Trumpet,

I N D E X.

- Trumpet*, used in Sacrifice, i. 278.
- Truth*, a Divinity, her Original; her Genealogy, iii. 128.
 Why said to lie hid in the Bottom of a Well, i. 129.
 That Truth has had often need of Ornaments to appear, ibid.
- Tubal-Cain*, the most ancient of the Vulcans, and the Original of all the rest, ii. 354.
- Tubilustrium*, a Festival instituted by the Romans; why, i. 316.
- Tuiston*, a God of the ancient Germans, his Origin; his History and Worship, iii. 308, 328.
- Twins*, a Sign in the Zodiac, i. 195. iv. 407.
- Two*, the Number Two reckoned in Italy misfortunate, iii. 46.
- Turnus*, King of the Rutuli, and Eneas's Rival, iv. 311, 312.
- Turning-wheel*, an Instrument in Mechanics, by whom invented, iii. 521.
- Tutilina*, or Tutelina, a Goddess of Corn, i. 198. ii. 589.
- Tutela*, a Goddess worshipped at Bourdeaux. The Temple which she had there, iii. 289.
- Tyberinus*, King of Alba, his Genealogy; his Death, iv. 313.
- Tyber*, worshipped as a God, ii. 479, 480.
- Tyber*, a River of the Latin Country; the Origin of the Name, iv. 313.
- Tychon*, a Divinity worshipped at Athens, iii. 175.
- Tydeus*, the Son of Oeneus, and Father of Diomedes, iii. 391. iv. 173. He died in the first Theban War, 187. His Encomium, 203.
- Tyllinus*, a God peculiar to the City Brescia. A Description of his Statue, iii. 208.
- Tyndarus*, King of Sparta, his Genealogy and Children, iii. 379. iv. 148, 149.
- Tyndaridæ*, the Name of Castor and Pollux; the Festival of the Tyndaridæ at Rome, iv. 151.
- Typhis*, the Pilot to the Argonauts, iv. 18.
- Typhon*, the Brother of Osiris, one of the great Gods of Egypt, i. 493. His History, 503, 507, &c.
- Typhon*, his Offspring by Echidna, i. 114.
- Typhon*, a Monster imagined by the Greeks, i. 116, 503, 505. Makes War upon the Gods, ibid. 506. The Explanation of the Fables delivered concerning Typhon, 511, & sequ. How he perished, 513, & sequ. How he is represented, 511, 512.
- Tyrinthius*, one of Hercules's Epithets, iv. 118.
- Tyro*, the Daughter of Salmones, iii. 393. iv. 8. Her Children, ibid.

I N D E X.

V.

- VACANA*, a Goddess among the Romans, iii. 195.
- Vagitanus*, a God invoked for Children, i. 197. iii. 192.
- Vaison*, a City deified by the Gauls, iii. 288.
- Vallonia*, a Goddess who presided over Vaileys, i. 199. iii. 198.
- Vandals*, a People of ancient Germany, their Origin; their Religion, iii. 308, 329, 333.
- Vanity*, one Source of Fables, i. 32, 47.
- Water*, the Worship paid to the Water, ii. 474. Among the ancient Persians, 475. Among the Egyptians, ibid. & sequ. Among the Indians, and the People to the North of the Palus Mestis, 478. Among the Greeks and Romans, 479. The Grounds of this Worship, 480, &c. Sacrifices offered to the Gods of the Waters, 483.
- Lustral* or Holy Water, its Use, i. 285.
- Way*, the milky Way, how it is said to have been formed, iv. 93.
- Zeile*, a Word found upon a Bas-relief; what it signifies, iii. 253.
- Vesuvius*, or Vesupiter, how Jupiter was represented under that Name; the Worship paid to him then, ii. 232, 234.
- Venafini*, a People of Cappadocia, their Religion, ii. 134, 135, in the Note.
- Venetians*, from whom descended, iv. 307.
- Venus*, her Birth according to the Egyptians, i. 105. According to the Greeks, i. 68, 97, 98, 113. ii. 170, 324. How many Venus's they reckoned, 325. That several Persons bore that Name, 327. The Origin of the Fable of Venus, ibid. The Explanation of the Fables delivered about Venus, 329, & sequ. Her Worship; Birds, Plants, and Flowers that were consecrated to her, 332. Her various Names, 333, & sequ. How she was represented, 335. Her Marriage with Vulcan; her Gallantries with Mars and Mercury, i. 117. ii. 325, 329. The Virtue of her Girdle, ii. 330. Her Commerce with Anchises, i. 117. ii. 326, 331, 332. The Gauls ranked her among the infernal Goddesses, iii. 280.
- Venus Urania*. See Urania.
- Venus*, the Planet, worshipped in several Countries, i. 16. Gave Rise to the Venus of the Greeks, ii. 327, 328.
- Vergiliæ*, the Name of the Pleiads, ii. 276.
- Vergebrets*, a Sort of Magistrates among the Gauls, iii. 231.
- Verjes Sitylline*. See Sibyls.
- Verjotina*, a Divinity of the Moors, i. 582.
- Verticordia*, one of Venus's Epithets, ii. 333.
- Fertumnus*,

I N D E X.

- Vertumnus*, the God of Orchards and Gardens, i. 198. ii. 579. He marries Pomona, 580. The Etymology of his Name ; his History ; his Worship ; his Temple and Statue at Rome, ibid. How he was represented, 582.
- Vervein*, a Plant, its Use among the Druids, iii. 236.
- Vesne* or Vichnou. See Vichnou.
- Vesta*, one of the great Divinities of the Egyptians, i. 105. ii. 492.
- Vesta*, the Daughter of Saturn and Rhea, i. 115. ii. 165. Two Vestas, the one taken for the Earth, ii. 552. The other Vesta the Symbol of Fire, i. 196. ii. 568. The Worship of Vesta, as the Symbol of Fire ; the Origin of that Worship ; by whom it was introduced into Italy, ii. 568, 570. The Etymology of the Name of Vesta, 570, 571.
- Vestals*, their Institution ; their Functions ; their Laws, ii. 568. The Temples of the Vestals at Rome, 569. Vestals in America, i. 142, 143.
- Vetula*, a Goddess who presided over Pleasures, i. 199.
- Vialis*, an Epithet given to Mercury, ii. 375.
- Vichnou*, a God of the East Indies, i. 12, 138. The Tradition of the Brachmans as to the Transformation of that God into a Tortoise, 137.
- Victims*, when the Use of living Victims began, i. 256, &c. And the Superstition of human Victims, 258. ii. 238. The Choice that was made of the Victims, i. 261, &c. How they were prepared, 264, 265. What Victims were offered to the Gods of Hell, ii. 103. See Sacrifices.
- Victor*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 217.
- Victory*, a Divinity, i. 199. ii. 322. Temples built in honour of her ; how she was represented, ibid. and 323. Her various Names, 323.
- Winds*, who is the God of the Winds, i. 32, 46, 65. ii. 532. The Fable of the Winds given to Ulysses in a Bag, i. 32. ii. 533, 534. Winds, the Sons of Gods, i. 114, 115. The Worship that was paid to them, ii. 535, 536, 538. How they were represented, 539.
- Wine*, employed in Sacrifices, i. 255, 262. That the Egyptians and several other People did not make Use of it, 267.
- Viminalis*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.
- Vinalia*, a Feast so called, the Design of its Institution, i. 316.
- Violence*, a Divinity, Jupiter's inseparable Companion ; whose Offspring said to be, i. 115. Her Temple at Corinth, iii. 140, 180.
- Virginicuris*, a Goddess of Marriage, iii. 192.
- Virgo*, a Sign of the Zodiac, by whom said to be inhabited, iv. 404.

I N D E X.

- Viriplaca*, what Goddess this was, iii. 195.
- Virtue*, a Divinity, her Temple how represented, iii. 127.
- Vitala*, and Viturnus, Divinities who presided over Life, i. 199. iii. 191.
- Ulysses*, his Genealogy, iv. 289. His History and Adventures, 290. His Stay in the Island of Circe, 297, &c. And in the Island of Calypso, 300. His Return to Ithaca, 302, 303. His Adventure in the Island of the Sirens, ii. 540, 542. His Journey to Hell, iii. 11, 16, 17. He received heroic Honours after his Death, iv. 304. See Penelope.
- Ulor*, one of Jupiter's Epithets, ii. 225.
- Universe*, how it was formed according to the Chaldeans, i. 81. According to the Phenicians, 90. According to the Egyptians, 103. According to Moses, 128, 129. See Theogonies.
- Unxia*, one of Juno's Epithets, ii. 242.
- Vows*, the Practice of making private Vows; what Ceremonies were observed therein, i. 322.
- Voltumna*, or Volturna, a Divinity of Etruria, ii. 583.
- Volupia*, the Goddess of Pleasure; her Temple and Festival at Rome, iii. 135. Whose Daughter she is said to be, ii. 347.
- Volutina*, a Goddess of the Latins, ii. 591.
- Welf*, in Veneration among the Egyptians, consecrated to Apollo, ii. 417. See Typhon, Lycæon.
- Women*, of the Island of Cos, transformed into Heifers, iv. 397. Women excluded from the Olympian Games, iv. 429.
- Wood-Pecker*, a Bird consecrated to Mars, i. 264.
- World*, Sentiments about the Origin of the World, i. 80, 83, 84, &c. Sentiments of the Indians and Americans, 138, 140. Division of the World among the Sons of Saturn, 18, 19.
- Ur*, a City of Chaldea, by whom Idolatry was introduced thither, i. 168, 173. Reckoned the Metropolis of Sabism, 191.
- Urania*, a Goddess of the Arabians, the Celestis of the Moors, i. 568, 569, 583. ii. 433, 434. Venus, so called, ii. 26, 333.
- Urania*, one of the nine Muses; her Attributes, ii. 433.
- Uranus*, the great Divinity of the Phenicians, i. 92, 95. His History, 95, & seq. Who he was according to the Atlantides, 106. The Etymology of the Name, 171, 172.
- Urceolus*, an Instrument that was made use of in Sacrifice, i. 278.
- Wrestling*, one of the Exercises in the Games; wherein it consisted, iv. 417, 418.
- Ustal*, a God of the Arabians, i. 485, 568.

I N D E X.

Usons, one of the Descendants of Cain, i. 94.

Vulcan, one of the great Gods of the Egyptians, i. 105.

Vulcan, of the Greeks, whose Son he was, i. 117. That there were several Vulcans, ii. 354. The Etymology of his Name, ibid. The History of the Vulcan of Egypt, 355. The History of the Vulcan of Greece, 356. Why said to have fallen in the Island of Lemnos, 357. His Children, 358. His Worship, ibid. and 359. How he is represented, 360. iii. 255. Why his Temples built without Cities, i. 215, 216. His Temple at Memphis, 220. His Worship among the Gauls, iii. 255.

Vulcanalia, a Festival in honour of Vulcan, i. 316.

Vulcania, i. 305.

Vulcaniæ, the Name of the Eolian Isles, where Vulcan's Forges were erected, ii. 357, 358.

Vultur, a Bird consecrated to Mars and Juno, i. 264. ii. 246. Also made Use of for Augury, i. 403.

Vulturius, an Epithet given to Apollo, ii. 418.

Vuod, a God of the Arabians, i. 570.

X.

XANTHUS, the Leader of the Beotians, how he was slain, i. 300.

Xanthus, a River of Troas, it pursues Achilles, i. 41, 42.

Xanto, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.

Xenius, an Appellation given to Jupiter; what it imports, ii. 226.

Xipheus, Janus's Father by Adoption, ii. 261, 262.

Xixutrus, or Sisutrus, who he was according to the Chaldeans, i. 86. Whether he is the same with Noah, ibid. How he saved himself from the Deluge; his Apotheosis, 87.

Xuthus, the Grandson of Deucalion, iii. 390. His History, 395, 396.

Y.

YNCAS of Peru, the Magnificence of their Temples, i. 143. The Yncas take the Title of Sons of the Sun, 188.

Youth, Divinities assigned to it, i. 196. Games of the Youth, iv. 413, 443. See Trojan Games.

Yphicles, the Son of Amphitryon and Alcmena, Hercules's Twin-Brother, iv. 77.

Yphime, a Nymph, the Wife of Mercury, and Mother of the Satyres, ii. 592.

Z.

I N D E X.

Z.

- ZAMOLXIS, the Legislator of the Thracians and Getae, and their God, i. 138, 147. iii. 173. His History ; in what Age he lived, iii. 174. To whom he attributed his Laws, iii. 484.
- Zan, an Appellation of Jupiter ; what it signifies, ii. 177, 237.
- Zarax, a great Musician, who gave his Name to the City of Zaraxa, worshipped as a Heroe, iii. 434.
- Zelus, the Son of Styx ; why Jupiter kept him by him, i. 115.
- Zemia, a Sacrifice at the Festival of Ceres, iii. 62.
- Zemebuch, the black God, or the bad Genius among the Vandals, iii. 333.
- Zephrus, the Wind, whose Issue it was, i. 116. What Worship was paid to it, ii. 536.
- Zeratucht or Zerducht, the Surname of Zoroastres, i. 177.
- Zerynthia, one of Venus's Epithets, ii. 334.
- Zetus, the Brother of Amphion, and Son of Antiope, ii. 170. iii. 415. See Amphion.
- Zetbes. See Calais.
- Zcumichius, a Name given to Chryser at the Time of his Deification ; what it signifies, i. 92.
- Zeus, the Name given to Jupiter by the Greeks, ii. 293.
- Zeus Arctrius, Jupiter the Tiller, i. 95.
- Zeus Belus, the Son of Chronos, or Saturn, i. 96.
- Zeuxo, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Zexo, - - - - - ibid.
- Zilpa, Leab's Handmaid. See Gad.
- Zoara, a Name given to the first Obelisks that were worshipped ; why, i. 193.
- Zodiack, how the Egyptians represented the twelve Signs of the Zodiack, i. 551, 552.
- Zogonci, what Gods they were among the Greeks ; what is the Import of the Word, iii. 176.
- Zones, the Division which Ovid makes of them, i. 126.
- Zophazemin, what the Word imports in the Theogony of the Phenicians, i. 90.
- Zoroastres, the Legislator of the ancient Persians, who he was ; his Doctrine, i. 177. ii. 100. Whether he is the Author of the Idolatry of Sabism, 190, 191. Whether he is the first Inventor of Magic, 425. The Law of Zoroaster for the Worship of Mithras, ii. 94, 122. His Book about the Worship of Fire, ii. 570, 571. To what Divinity he attributed his Laws, iii. 484.
- Zygia, one of Juno's Appellations, ii. 242.

I N D E X.

Z.

- ZAMOLXIS, the Legislator of the Thracians and Getes, and their God, i. 138, 147. iii. 173. His History ; in what Age he lived, iii. 174. To whom he attributed his Laws, iii. 484.
- Zan, an Appellation of Jupiter ; what it signifies, ii. 177, 237.
- Zarax, a great Musician, who gave his Name to the City of Zaraxa, worshipped as a Heroe, iii. 434.
- Zelus, the Son of Styx ; why Jupiter kept him by him, i. 115.
- Zemia, a Sacrifice at the Festival of Ceres, iii. 62.
- Zesmebuch, the black God, or the bad Genius among the Vandals, iii. 333.
- Zephrus, the Wind, whose Issue it was, i. 116. What Worship was paid to it, ii. 536.
- Zeratucht or Zerducht, the Surname of Zoroastres, i. 177.
- Zerynthia, one of Venus's Epithets, ii. 334.
- Zetus, the Brother of Amphion, and Son of Antiope, ii. 170. iii. 415. See Amphion.
- Zethes. See Calais.
- Zeumichius, a Name given to Chryser at the Time of his Deification ; what it signifies, i. 92.
- Zeus, the Name given to Jupiter by the Greeks, ii. 293.
- Zeus Arctrius, Jupiter the Tiller, i. 95.
- Zeus Belus, the Son of Chronos, or Saturn, i. 96.
- Zeuxo, the Name of a Nymph, ii. 532.
- Zexo, - - - - - ibid.
- Zilpa, Leab's Handmaid. See Gad.
- Zsara, a Name given to the first Obelisks that were worshipped ; why, i. 193.
- Zodiack, how the Egyptians represented the twelve Signs of the Zodiack, i. 551, 552.
- Zogonsi, what Gods they were among the Greeks ; what is the Import of the Word, iii. 176.
- Zones, the Division which Ovid makes of them, i. 126.
- Zophazemin, what the Word imports in the Theogony of the Phenicians, i. 90.
- Zoroastres, the Legislator of the ancient Persians, who he was ; his Doctrine, i. 177. ii. 100. Whether he is the Author of the Idolatry of Sabism, 190, 191. Whether he is the first Inventor of Magic, 425. The Law of Zoroaster for the Worship of Mithras, ii. 94, 122. His Book about the Worship of Fire, ii. 570, 571. To what Divinity he attributed his Laws, iii. 484.
- Zygia, one of Juno's Appellations, ii. 242.